Amasa lying there dead, one of Joab's men was left to make Proclamation to the Forces, which followed him, saying, be that favourer to Joab, and be that is for David, let him go after Joab. The vul. Latin too obscurely, Eccē qui esse voluit pro Joab comes David. Josephus more fully; Joab leaving one by the dead carcase bade him proclaim to the Army, that Amasa was worthily slain, but who so favoured David's part should follow Joab & Abishai, as their Captains. This was done, lest the men brought by Amasa, when they saw him dead, should returne to the King to have further directions touching a new Captain. But they which follow the vul. Latin give another different sense, as if some of Joab's followers had stayed by the dead man to mock at him, and to say, behold the man, that would bee in Joab's place, the chiefe Captaine and David's companion, that would have Joab to bee in no reckoning in comparison of himselfe, see how hee hath paid for his ambition. But the Hebrew agreeth better to the former sense, and therefore it is rather to bee followed. Vers. 12. Thus the men of the Army were excited to follow Joab, and so it is likely, that the man left by Joab to speake unto them went away with some of them, but when others, who were behind came at the dead corps, seeing it lie in the blood, they stood still, till that another man perceiving it, who most probably was one of Joab's friends also, removed it out of the way into the field and there covered it with a garment, or cloth, and then all without staying went on after Joab. Of his buriall, or any lamentation made by David for him wee read nothing, as for Abner, although it is not to bee doubted, but that hee was affected with sorrow for him also being so neare of kine unto him, but in that murder there might bee some suspicion of David's integritie, which troubled him, in this none, because no man could thinke that hee would give the least consent to one kinsman, and manifestly out of favour to slay another newly reconciled unto him, and preferred by him.

And hee went through all the tribes of Israel unto Abel and Bethmaachab, and all the Beerites, &c. That is, as is generally understood, Sheba went through all these parts to gather up men, and was now in Abel in the Tribe of Nephthali, which lay farthest of all the Tribes from Judah, but Josephus saith, that Joab pursued Sheba through all those parts, till hee came at Abel Machabee, making that one Citie, which by the Hebrew Text seemeth to bee two. Jerom thinketh rather, that they were two, in the one of which hee was, and part of his forces in the other. It is to bee thought, that Sheba going through all these parts Joab pursued after him by that way, which hee understood that hee had gone, till that being certified, that hee was in Abel, hee hastened thither. And thus, hee went, is to bee understood, Sheba went and Joab after him. Junius rendreth it Abel, viz. of Machabee spoken of, 1 Chron. 7. 16. holding with Josephus, that it was all one Citie, so called to distinguish it from other Abels, of which Jerom saith, there were three. And this seemeth to bee best, seeing no mention is made of any of his forces being in Bethmaachab, but in Abel onely, where Joab besieged him, yea Vers. 15. it is Abel of Bethmaachab. Beerith was a Citie belonging to Benjamin,

V. 11.

*Josephus.Lyra.
Pellican.
Hugo Card.*

V. 12.

V. 14.

*Josephus.Hierom: in locis Hebr.Junius.*V. 15.
Joab 18. 25.

V. 16, 17.

Lyra.

V. 18.

Peier Martyr.

Lyra.

Pellican.

Theodoret.
Sallianus.

V. 19.

Lyra.

Benjamin, Sheba his tribe amongst whom Sheba had therefore gone to bee strengthened by the inhabitants thereof called Beerites. Joab being come to Abel presently seeketh to throw downe the walls thereof, but a wife woman called unto him out of the Citie, and perswaded so with the Citizens, that Sheba his head was cut off and throwne over the wall to Joab, who hereupon departed immediatly and came to the King to Jerusalem. This wife woman, say the Hebrewes, was Sarab the daughter of Asfer, who came downe with Jacob into Egypt, and had the spirit of prophesie, whereby shee foretold Jacob, when he mourned for Joseph, that hee was alive and he should see him againe. But this is confuted by Lyra, as a fiction, because from that timetill this was about 700. years, to which age none lived in those dayes. Wherefore hee saith, that shee is called a wife woman, not because she was a Prophetesse, but for her naturall wit, as the woman of Tekoa was called before. When this woman had obtained audience of Joab, shee said, it was a proverbe of old, They shall surely aske counsell in Abel, and so they ended the matter, with this preface shee began, that shee might winne attention, but what the ground of this saying was is uncertaine. Martyr thinketh, that in saying thus shee had respect unto Deut. 20. where they are directed, when they made warre, first to offer conditions of peace, whereby is implied, that Joab, before hee had attempted the overthrow of this Citie Abel, should have asked, whether the Citizens would take part with Sheba against the King, or unto Deut. 13. where before the destruction of any Citie for Idolatry, inquiry was commanded to be made, whether such a sinne had indeed been committed or no, which hee saith, this woman might apply to the present case. For that of Deut. 20. standeth Lyra, expounding the clause of this proeme, so the Ordinance and Law of God was fulfilled. Thus also Pellican and Junius, and others: My Citizens expected in the beginning that thou shouldst according to the Law have asked by Legats or Heralds sent unto them, whether they meant for Sheba his sake to maintaine any warre against David, this if thou hadst done, all might have been quietly ended. To this effect also Theodoret, but Sallianus because the word proverbe is used in Jeroms translation, will have it indeed a proverbe intimating the wisdome and counsell, that was noted of old to be in Abel, for which cause Joab might be willing to hearken to one appointed by the Citizens to speak unto him in the Cities behalf, although a woman. For so he thinketh, that the counsell of the City sent her up unto the wall to speake thus unto him, as being a thing which a woman might more safely doe then a man; and a businesse wherein shee might more easily prevaile being wise, and apter by reason of her sex to get attention, as to a thing unusuall. For if, of her own head shee should have made such an offer, as shee did, of the head of Sheba, shee might have been in danger of reaping nothing but shame and derision, if shee could not have effected it; thus hee. But it is more probable, according to Martyr, that out of her love to her Countrey of her owne minde shee thus adventured both her self and credit, because v. 22. it is said, she went to the Citizens in her wisdom, and by her wise perswasions they were moved to cut off Sheba his head. But for the saying touching counsell in Abel; I incline rather to think, that as the people of some place are notorious for folly, so they of some other place might be notable for wisdome, and this might have been the case of the people of Abel a long time, and if so, it was a good ground for this woman to goe upon to perswade Joab to hearken unto her, speaking to him in the name of them all, because they of this City were found by experience of old to be such as could give good and wholesome counsell.

I am one of them that are peaceable, and faithful in Israel, thou seekest to destroy a City, and a mother in Israel, &c. This shee spake in the name of the City, according to Lyra and others, for that City had alwayes hitherto been faithfull, and never rebellious against the King, wherefore shee chargeth Joab with injustice in going about to destroy it, which shee calleth a mother in Israel, because an ancient and metropolitall City, to which many more belonged. And in going about to destroy it, shee saith, hee went about to devour the Lords inheritance, because it was a part of the land of Canaan, of which the Lord had taken ken possession by his people, as of his owne peculiar inheritance. Joab having heard the woman answereth, that it was farre from him to destroy, onely a man of mount Ephraim was risen up against the King, if hee were delivered, the Citie should presently bee left in peace; then shee promised that his head should be throwne over the wall unto him, and this being by her perswasion done, Joab departed and came to David to Jerusalem. Sheba is said before to have been a Benjamite, how then is hee said here to bee of Mount Ephraim? Mount Ephraim was neare to Benjamin, as the boundary thereof, and so hee dwelling upon the foot of that hill might happily bee said to bee of Mount Ephraim; or although hee were of one Tribe, hee might upon some occasion dwell in another, and be called therefrom, as Elkanah was called an Ephratite, Obed-Edom a Gittite, and Uriah an Hittite: so Martyr. What words the wife woman used to perswade to the cutting off of his head, is not said, but Iosephus saith, that she put them in mind of the great benefits, which they had received by David, by whose army their whole Citie was now indangered, wherefore shee perswaded them not to hazzard themselves any further, and all that they had for one man, a stranger. His head then was cut off and throwne over the wall, for they thought this the safest way, and not to open their gates for feare of the Souldiers violence, that might thus thrust in upon them, and make a prey of their goods. So the traytour had his deserved punishment to the terrour of all rebels, that should hereafter attempt the like. As for Joab, hee having obtained this victory thus without bloodshed returned joyfully to Jerusalem, neither did the King once say any thing unto him for murdering Amasa, or after this put him from his Captainship, because hee feared certainly so to do, lest new troubles hereupon should arise by Joabs meanes, hee bearing so great a sway in that Commonwealth, as hee did. For to shew, that Joab was not put from his place it is added, Verf. 23. And Joab was over all the host of Israel, Benajah over the Cherethites and Pelethites, &c. as Chap. 8. 16, 17. but onely for Seraiah the Scribe there, here is, Seva was Scribe, as Martyr thinketh, the same man by another name, but hee might bee dead or removed by this time, as others conjecture and another in his place. Adorum was over the tribute, there was no such office then, but now many nations being subdued by David and made tributaries, it was necessary. Lastly for *David*s sonnes, Princes there, it is here said, Ira the Jairite was a chiefe ruler about David, Hebr. כהן לרב Priest to David, and so the vulg. Latine rendreth it, but *Chap. 8. David*s sonnes are also called כהנים, which words, as I have there shewed, signifyeth not onely Priests, but Princes. Martyr conjectureth, that hee was his counsellour taken into the roome of Achitophel, but I see no reason for that; rather, because *David*s sonnes Amnon and Absalom, who ruled under him before, were now dead, and hee would not adventure to commit any rule to Adonijah for feare of the like ambition, that had beene in Absalom, he put this Ira into this Office. R. Solomon saith, that David made him a Prince and Judge in Israel. The Chal. Paraphrase calleth him a Prince, Kimbi, the Prince of *David*s counsell, Chap. 23. 26. he is called Ira a Thechoite, here a Jairite Kimbi saith, that the Citie Thecho, of which hee was, abounded with oyle, which giveth a shining light, and from hence hee had the name of a Jairite, for Jair signifyeth to shine. Somethink that hee was the Kings Chaplaine, and some his Almoner, but I passe these over as conjectures without ground.

By Sheba mystically understand the author of Heresie, which draweth many from Christ figured out by David, the wife woman, by whose meanes his head was cut off, sets forth true doctrine, whereby heresie being confuted, all returne to Christ againe.

CHAP. XXI.

And there was a famine in the dayes David of three yeares, then David enquired of the Lord & he answered, that it was for Saul and for all his bloody house, because he slew

V. 20.
21.
22.

Peter Martyr.
Iosephus.

Note,

V. 23.
Peter Martyr.

Peter Martyr.

The Mystery.
Rabanus.

V. 1.

Peter Martyr.

Pellican.

Lyra.
Tostatus.P. Martyr.
Pellican.

Qu.

Note.

Qu.

Qu.

slew the Gibeonites. Whether this happened after Sheba his conspiracy according to the order here followed is doubted, because David was old, when hee fell into those troubles, and lived not long after, and this famine continued three yeares. Some, saith Martyr, thinke that it began sooner and that this was the last yeare of the three after Sheba subdued, but hee leaveth it, as uncertaine. I see no reason, but that it may bee thought to have happened in the order, wherein it is set downe: for although David were old, yet he was not so old, but that hee might live out these yeares after Sheba, and sometime after them. Pellican therefore thinketh, that the famine of these three yeares together was sent after three Rebellions, made by the Israelites against David: 1. under Ishbosheth, 2. under Absalom, 3. under Sheba, answerable to which were these three yeares punishments upon Israel. But this famine is said to have bene sent for Sauls sinne in slaying the Gibeonites contrary to the oath made unto them. But why was it sent in *David*s time, who had offended nothing herein? Lyra and Tostatus answer, that it was now sent to punish *David*s neglect, for hee being King ought to have relieved the Gibeonites being so oppressed, and to have punished their oppressors, Sauls posterity, this because hee had not hitherto done, God sent this famine to force him to doe it. This indeed may seeme to bee a reason, but considering that the Gibeonites never complained to David, and the law of God is, that the children shall not dye for the sinne of their father, David could no way bee guilty in this respect, unlesse that after answer received from God hee should have neglected to right the Gibeonites wrongs. Others therefore answer better, that it seemed good to God now to send this famine, that hereupon occasion might bee taken by his direction to roote out such as remained of Sauls posterity, that might any way hereafter disturbe the peaceable raigne of *David*s sonne, that should succeed him in the kingdome. The Lord had hitherto grievously punished David for his sinnes in the matter of Uriah, and therefore would not have him put to any further trouble, now here is shewed how hee tooke order for the preventing of like troubles afterwards in great mercy towards David, and justly in respect of the house of Saul.

But how could he justly lay so soare a punishment upon all Israel, for the sin of one Saul, and he being slaine long before for his offence, cut off his posterity? especially this being contrary to his owne law, and to his protestation Ezek: 18. Ans: The people of Israel might make themselves guilty by rejoycing at the cutting off of these strangers, that their houses and lands might come amongst them, and especially Sauls posterity, who happily were much enriched hereby, seeing their City Gibon was the City of Saul, otherwise called Gibeah, and if so, this judgement was brought justly upon them, and these children of Saul were justly cut off. And here wee ought to take notice, that wee may bee in danger of judgements for the sinnes of others, if either wee bee well pleased therewith, or sorrow not therefore, or stay not the course of sinne in others as much as wee can. Moreover touching a mans children, God hath limited mortall judges by his law, as R: Solomon hath it, but not himselfe, hee may justly punish the father in the children, though not guilty in that particular, because all are sinners before him, that the judgement against a wicked father may thus bee aggravated, and others seeing it the more terrified.

But why did God punish for the Gibeonites and not for the Priests much more? Sol. Saul and his sonnes for that massacre perished together in his last battle against the Philistims, and it is likely that the Israelites were all moved with compassion, when they heard thereof.

But whereby was Saul moved to slay the Gibeonites? *Ans*w. Some thinke, because they served the Priests, whom hee slew, and tooke their destruction heinously, some, that hee might bee the more enriched by their lands and goods, and enrich his Tribe, wherein they dwelt. But the reason is expressed, for his zeale not to God, but to Judah and Israel, to whom hee thought it would bee well pleasing to root these strangers out of the land, the plaine zeale of Hypocrites to seeke praise amongst men; and yet hee might also bee moved to this by covetousnesse and malice against all that any way appertained to the Priests, howsoever hee pretended zeale.

to

But why did not David enquire of God the cause of this famine, till the third yeare? and by what meanes did he enquire? R. Solomon, saith Lyra, yeildeth this reason. The first yeare hee enquired not, because hee thought, that the drought and famine might come of naturall causes, the second yeare seeing it still to continue, hee thought that the Idoll of Micab, which yet continued in the land might bee the reason, wherefoe hee destroyed that, and the third yeare seeing that this judgement ceased not, he enquired. But Tostatus better, either hee enquired at the first, but had no answer till the third yeare, or God tooke away the heart from David to enquire, till now, that his judgements might have their full course, and bee the more remarkeable against the breaking of so solemne and publique an oath. For David certainly never look't to secondary causes onely in the time of any calamity, but to God; and for the Idoll supposed to bee by him destroyed, it is without all ground, and against reason, that such an abomination should bee suffered to stand all Samuels time, yea it is expressely said 1 Sam. 7. 3, 4. that at his exhortation the people did put away the strange Gods, that were amongst them. For his asking of the Lord, it was most probably by the High-priest, because that was the most ordinary way of consulting with God.

David being certified, that the cruelty of Saul against the Gibeonites was the cause of this famine, called for them, and asked what would satisfie them, where-with the atonement might be made, that they might blesse the inheritance of the Lord. Meaning, that whereas now they sighed and prayed out of their misery for revenge upon those, by whom they had beene so greatly wronged, they would pray for them. A passage most remarkeable, that Gentiles and Amorites, who had been before appointed to destruction, should by their prayers avert a judgement and bring a blessing downe upon Israelites. But they were herein a figure of the Gentiles under the Gospell converted to the faith, when the Israelites were hardened and suffered by Gods great judgements, who pray now for their conversion and salvation. And forsomuch, as God shewed himselfe to have so great regard to these distressed strangers sighing unto him, that for their sakes hee punished his owne people so severely, wee may see how compassionate hee is to any being in misery, and specially to such, as of what Country or Nation soever they bee, embrace the true faith, and doe that with care and diligence in his service, which is required at their hands, as these Gibeonites did, serving under the Levites, as they were appointed, in hewing of wood and drawing of water to the whole Congregation for their sacrifices, and without any relucting that we read of to this day, to the shame of the Israelites, who could never bee kept long in obedience to that, which was required of them.

The Gibeonites answer first negatively, wee will neither have silver nor gold, &c. whence the Rabbines gather that David offered them money at the first, and hereupon they replied thus, but it may as well bee gathered, that hee offered to put some to death in Israel which had wronged them, because they added, neither shalt thou for us kill any man in Israel.

Then hee demanding, what they would have done for the expiation of this sinne, they answered, The man that consumed us, &c. let seven of his sonnes bee delivered unto us, and wee will hang them up to the Lord in Gibeab of Saul, whom the Lord did choose. The Vulgar Latin, to these words, the man that consumed us, adde, wee ought so to destroy, as not to leave one of his stocke in all the borders of Israel. Whereupon Lyra and Peter Martyr and others say, that they at the first propounded the utter rooting out of all Sauls posterity, but in the next words they limit their request to seven of his sonnes, which some thinke they did, because David replied, (although it bee here omitted) that hee could not grant this, because hee had sworne to Saul not to root out his posterity, and to Jonathan to shew kindeesse to his.

Yet Martyr rendreth the words according to our translation, and Junius making Qu.

Lyra.

Tostatus.

V. 3.

Note.

V. 5, 6.

Lyra.
Peter Martyr.

Pellican.
Peter Martyr.

making no mention of the rooting out of Sauls stocke, but of Sauls going about to root them out, that none of them should remaine in all the Coasts of Israel. The Hebrew word is נשמרה which may well be rendred, wee will destroy, and the next word, that there may bee no remainder, but of whom is not expresse, but left to be understood. And therefore I rather preferre the Vulgar Latin herein. They would hang them up, that the judgement might be the more remarkeable, they being thus exposed to the sight of all that passed by, that all might know, what a sacred band an oath is, and not dare hereafter to breake it, and what a care the Lord taketh even of strangers embracing the true faith, that none might be discouraged from comming unto it. And they hanged them up in Gibeah of Saul to his greater ignominy, of Saul, the chosen of the Lord, that is, as the Vulgar Latin expresseth, sometime chosen, but now reprobated for his wickednesse, and so the more worthy in respect of that singular favour of God abused, to bee put to this ignominy in his posterity.

V. 7. 8.

To this demand of the Gibeonites David presently yeilded, and delivered to them the two sonnes of Rizpah, Sauls concubine, and the five sonnes of Michal the daughter of Saul, whom shee had brought up for Adriel the sonne of Barzillai the Acholahite: of Rizpah see before, ch: 3. 7. and of Adriel, 1 Sam: 18. 19. hee had Merab Sauls daughter to wife, of whom hee begat these five, but they are said to be the sonnes of Michal Sauls other daughter, who was *David*s wife, because shee having no children of her owne, adopted them for her sonnes, so Lyra and others. But this is not so easily resolved, because Hebr: it is, which she bare unto Adriel, and so the Vular Latin rendreth it, and Junius supplying another word thus, the five sonnes of the sister of Michal, and if it be not read so, then he saith, the word רִצְפָּה rendred properly shee bare, must be taken μεταδωκεν for shee tooke, and brought them up, and for this hee saith, is Aben Ezra.

Lyra.
Junius.

Peter Martyr.

Peter Martyr also will have it understood likewise, and whereas a question may be made, whether a woman might adopt, seeing by the lawes of the Romans it was not permitted, but onely in case that shee had lost her sonnes in the war fighting for their countrey, hee answereth, that more anciently they might adopt, for Pharaohs daughter adopted Moses, and so Michal might adopt the children of Merob her sister being dead for her owne greatly solace, seeing shee had none herselfe; or else shee that was called Merob, might otherwise be called Michal also. Yet some, saith hee, thinke, that Michal is put for Merob, by the mistaking of the scribe. Of all these solutions the first is most probable, touching Michal her bringing of them up, unlesse we shall acknowledge some error in the writing, which is not much materiall, seeing any reader might easily know that by Michal here Merob was meant.

Salliansu.

V. 9, 10.

Then the Gibeonites hanged these seven men, and the time when is noted to have beene at the beginning of barly harvest, how long, untill water dropped upon them out of Heaven. For so long Rizpah is noted to spread haire-cloath to keep the Birds from preying upon them by day and the Beasts by night. Lyra saith, that it is to be understood, that of this haire-cloath shee made her a Tent neare to these dead bodies, and therein watched them night and day, that nothing might devour them; not herselfe alone, for that was impossible, but this was done by her and her servants at her appointment. If this shall seeme to be against the law, that they should be suffered to hang day and night, seeing Deut. 21. it is commanded, that at the going downe of the Sunne such should be taken downe, Hee saith, so indeed it ought commonly to be done, but in this case Nathan the Prophet had directed David to suffer them to hang, till that by the falling of raine upon the earth it should appeare, that the drought so long continuing and famin caused hereby was brought upon the land for the wrong done to the Gibeonites, who being satisfied, an end was put to this judgement.

Lyra.

Peter Martyr.

The reason, saith Martyr, of that Ordinance Deut. 21. was, lest the land should be defiled, as is there expresse, wicked men pollute the land, whilst they are living, and therefore being dead, they are soone to be taken away from polluting polluting it when they are dead. 2. Because hanging is punishment enough for a malefactor, therefore the Lord would not have the ignominy of suffering them to hang still night and day added hereunto. But this case being different as R. Solomon noteth, these were suffered to hang many dayes, that the Gentiles passing by that way, and learning hereby, what a care the God of Israel had of the Gentiles converted to the faith, might bee induced to turne to it also. The time that they hung, is described by the harvests beginning, and the barly harvest, because in that country it was first and the wheat harvest afterwards, the whole time according to the Hebrewes account being 6 months, viz. from March till Septemb. The sackcloth which Rizpah used she is said to have spread it for her upon the rocke, that is, by making her a Tent thereof, wherein she might see that performed, which she desired to these dead corpses, for her care was such, that she would not referre it to the care of her servants onely, and shee tooke sackcloth, as fittest for mourning, thus Martyr, but the sackcloth, which shee spread, is thought by other to bee to lie upon, the Tent being left to bee understood. And this was told unto David, who disliked it not, for when the time was come, hee caused them to bee taken downe, and bestowed upon them the honour of buriall in the sepulchre of their fathers. And hee tooke this occasion also to translate the bones of Saul and of Jonathan from Jabesh to bury them together more honourably, the place where they were laid before, saith Lyra, not being so fit for persons of their ranke and quality. This as a point of love and goodnesse Martyr commendeth in David, who disdained not to imitate a woman in shewing kindnesse to the dead, to the shame of many inferiours to David, who scorne to follow their inferiours in any thing, although it bee good, when as indeed wee ought to learne to do good even of the poorest little creatures, as of the Pismire, and the Crane, Stork and Swallow. How God liked of *David*s proceedings is shewed in the next words, hee was entreated for the land; to punish wickednesse is as a sacrifice expiatory to turne away Gods anger, but after severity used in such cases, wee may learne by *David*s example, that it is pleasing to God to shew kindnesse, and not to rage against dead bodies, except there be further cause, but not merely because they were our deadly enemies whilst they lived. For it is not to bee doubted, but that David shewed this kindnesse the rather, to shew that hee loved his enemies, and those that hated him, according to the Evangelicall precept.

Moreover the Philistims had yet warre againe with Israel, &c. that is, as is generally thought, according to the order, wherein they are set downe, after that the famine ceased. That which put the Philistims on to these battles may seeme to bee the confidence, which they had in their new Champions, Giants, who Goliath-like, thought that none were able to stand against them, but they being four fell all in four battles, God in his providence having a further end in these warres, viz. that the state of that kingdome might be left quiet and peaceable to Solomon. The Vulgar Latin, to make the time more plaine, hath it, after these things, and Josephus saith, after the famine ended David set upon the Philistims againe.

In this warre David fainted, then Ishibob a Giant being about to slay him, Abishai rescued the King and slew the Giant. This Josephus saith, was done, when the enemies being put to flight David pursued them before all others, and being scene now to waxe faint, the Giant whom hee calleth Armon, the sonne of Araph, turned backe, and had undoubtedly slaine him, but that Abishai comming on prevented it, and slew the Giant. By *David*s waxing faint it appeareth that this was done in his old age, hee being now about 65, and therefore they would not have him to goe forth to battle any more, lest hee quenched the light of Israel, whereby they meant that the glory of all his former victories would bee in danger to be obscured, if at any time hee should bee slaine in warre. Wherefore they would rather henceforth content themselves to enjoy his direction, counsell and prayers keeping at home, then that his person should be hazarded by going to warre abroad.

R. Solomon.

V. 12. 13.

14.

Lyra

Peter Martyr.

Note.

V. 15.

V. 16. 17.

Josephus.

The Vulg. Lat. also for Giants hath Araphab, according to the word in Hebrew, but Araphab signifieth a Giant.

V. 17.

Peter Martyr.

Some expositours, saith Martyr, hold that contrary to what was said before, these battailes with the Philistims were fought before the 3 yeares famine, and not in the order, wherein they are set downe for time, because it was a thing decreed in the time of Absaloms rebellion, that David should not be adventured to the warre in his owne person, and because 1 Chron: 20. 4. the three last of these warres are related immediately after the victory obtained over the Ammonites. But these reasons be of no force, not the first, for in the time of Absaloms rebellion David was kept from going out to the warre, because the Rebels would principally aime at his destruction, after that hee might still goe to warre against other enemies, till this time of his debility through old age appearing: nor the second, for the writer of the Chronicles omitteth whatsoever else happened betweene the subduing of the Ammonites, and these warres against the Philistims, yea and the first of these also, therefore it cannot be gathered by his placing of these next to that against the Ammonites, that they followed next after, but because his numbring of the people is placed there next unto these warres, that these were the last memorable gests of David before that unhappy numbring. Whereas it is objected, that the last three warres at the least must needs bee before, because David was kept from going to warre after the first of these foure battailes, he answereth although he went not to warre in person, yet he went by his forces.

This Giants speare is set forth by the weight, as Goliath, 1 Sam: 17. 7. it weighed 300 shekels of brasse; what weight this was may be gathered by that, which I have written upon that place: and hee was girded with a new sword, whereupon the Hebrewes say, that it was the first time of his coming forth to warre, and that hee was girt with a sword in token of some Captaines place, which hee had in the army, and that to purchase him the more credit at the first, he did thus set upon the King, seeing him to wax feeble. But God, that never faileth those that put their trust in him, preserved David in this great danger, by suddenly bringing Abishai to rescue him, for which, and so many victories more following, hee compiled that Psalme of praise ps: 22.

The second battle was in Gob, 1 Chron: 20. 4. it is said to have beene in Gezer, of which Gezer, see 1 Chron: 14. 16. it was a City in the Tribe of Ephraim possessed by the Philistims, happily by them called Gob. Vatablus hath it Nob, and Adrichomius saith, that Nob and Gob was all one City in the Tribe of Benjamin, but because this was the same with Gezer, that City could not be meant. In this battle Saph a Giant was slaine by Sibbecai an Hushathite. 1 Chron: 20. 4. for Saph is Sippai. Josephus calleth Sibbecai an Hittite, and saith that hee slew many, that boasted themselves to bee Giants, hee was one of Dauids worthies, 1 Chron: 11. 29.

The third warre was also in Gob, in which the brother of Goliath was slaine by Elhanan, the sonne of Jaare Oregim, here the word brother is supplied out of 1 Chron: 20. 5. where he is called Lahmi the brother of Goliath, and Elhanan is said to be the sonne of Jair a Bethlehemite. But because hee is said here to have slaine Goliath, and his speare is said to bee as a Weavers beame, as the speare of that Goliath, 1 Sam. 17. and Elhanan, who slew him, is said to bee of Bethlehem, of which City David was, the Hebrewes, as Jerom sheweth de tradit: Hebr: will have David to be meant by him, and this Goliath to bee the same spoken of before, for which ps: 22. it is said, these foure fell by the hand of David and of his servants, and accordingly his translation goeth, for Elhanan the sonne of Jaare Oregim, having Adeodatus, filius saltus polymitarium, which hee applyeth to David thus, hee was sent of God, and was the sonne of the forreit as it were, because he kept sheepe there, and is called Polymitarium, a maker of curious workes, as Oregim signifieth, because by his mother hee was of the kind of Bezaleel, to whom God gave the spirit of wisdom to make curious workes in brasse for the sanctuary. And with this conceit are carried away Lyra, Comestor, Gloss: Ordin: and Tostatus sometime, and divers others, but it may bee called their common delusion, wherein one followed another against sense, because it was not Goliath, whom David slew, that is here spoken of, but his brother

Note.

V. 18.

Adrichom.

Josephus.

V. 19.

brother, as is expressly said, 1 Chron: 20. 5. which was written after this to make all things more plaine, which were too briefly set downe in these bookes, neither doth the time agree at all, seeing that battle was above 40 yeares before this. And this Elhanan, to put it out of doubt, that he was not David, but one of his worthies, is numbered so 1 Chron: 11. 26. next after Asabel, and is called the son of his uncle, the Bethlehemite, in our translation, the sonne of Dodo, but because hee is here said to bee the sonne of Jaare, or Jair, the word Dodo is better rendred by Jerom, of his uncle, as it signifieth, and taken not as a proper name, but as an appellative. Lastly whereas v: 22. is alledged, these foure fell by the hand of David and of his servants, Martyr saith well, they fell by the hand of David, although he himselfe in person slew none of them, because they went out under him and by his appointment, that slew them, & they fell by the hands of his servants, because they were his instruments, by whom they were slaine.

And there was yet a battle in Gath, &c. This battle Tostatus conceiveth to have bene made to recover Gath taken by David from the Philistims, 1 Chr: 18. 1. They had now for their Champion a Giant of greatest stature, Josephus saith, 6 Cubits, that is, 9 foot high, and for his fingers and toes hee was monstrous, having 24 in number, and not unlike Goliath hee defied Israel, and then Jonathan David's brothers sonne slew him. What words hee used is not said, but most probably hee spake much like as Goliath had done, 1 Sam: 17. This Giant saith Josephus, Jonathan slew in single combat, and so the victory being obtained, the Philistims durst not make warre any more with Israel afterwards. Mytically by the Giants slaine in these warres, the principall cause whereof, was David's hand, our victories over our Giantlike spirituall enemies were set forth by the power of our David Christ Jesus, that wee may not bee afraid of them, seeing wee fight under such a King, and prevailing ascribe all the praise to him by whom onely wee are enabled to these conquests.

2 Sam. 23. 24.

Peter Martyr.

V. 20.
Tostatus.
Josephus.

The Mystery.

CHAP. XXII.

And David spake unto the Lord the words of this song, in the day that the Lord had delivered him out of the hands of all his enemies, and out of the hand of Saul. By all David's enemies are meant the Philistims, who were last subdued, ch: 21. and Sheba, ch: 20. and Absalom and Achitophel, and the Edomites, Ammonites, and Mobabites, the Jebusites, and Ishboseth with Abner, and before all them Saul, who ceased not to persecute him from the 10 yeare of his raigne, as long as he lived, who is named in particular, because hee was longest and most endangered by him, and he is named last, because hee acted his part against him long before his other enemies, who were more fresh in minde and therefore named first. This is put amongst the Psalmes, being the 18, committed to the chiefe Musitian to be sung to the praise of God in the Congregation. And it is called a song, because in Hebrew it is metricall, and it was a point of singular commendation in David, that in his old age, (for he is thought now to have bene 67.) when hee was free from all trouble of enemies, that hee studied how to set forth the praise of God best by compiling this, and as may bee well conjectured, many other heavenly songs, and spent not his time now in rest and idlenesse, and setting up, as others doe, some trophees of his victories to his owne praise. And the singular providence of God towards David in exempring him from warre and troubles, whereof hee was full all his life time before, is most remarkeable, that in his old age hee might the more quietly prepare for his end, by setting his minde upon things heavenly, by giving instructions to his sonne Solomon and to his Princes for the better establishing of his kingdome, and by disposing his worldly treasures to the building of a Temple to the honour of God.

The 18 Psalm hath one Verse before this, I will love thee O Lord my strength, and then followes, The Lord is my Rocke, in him will I trust. It is the same almost verbatim with Pf. 18. saving that for these words, my God, my strength in whom I will trust, my buckler and the borne of my salvation and my high tower, v: 2. of Psal. 18. here it is, the God of my rock, in whom I will trust, hee is my shield and the horn of my salvation, my high tower and my refuge, and my Saviour, thou savest mee from violence. But this, and whatsoever small difference there is more shall bee considered in expounding that Psalm amongst the rest, to which the explanation hereof doth properly belong, and therefore here omitting it I hasten to the next Chapter.

CHAP. XXIII.

V. 1.

Peter Martyr.

Lyra.

Chald. Parap.

Lyra.

Junius.
Gen. 49.
Deut. 32. 33.

V. 2.

TThese are the last words of David. David the sonne of Ishai said, The man, who was set on high, said, The anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet singer of Israel. This is a prophesie, as all both Jewish and Christian Expositors hold touching Christ, and is set forth by this title, The last words of David; because that after the song before-going compiled, and all other Psalmes, which hee made in his last old age, he uttered this, and left it as the last confession of his faith for the comfort of all the faithfull, which loved his house, of which Christ was to come, and for the terrour of all the wicked enemies to him and his. For it is not to be understood so, as if hee dyed without speaking more after these words spoken, for he caused the people to be numbred after this, Chap. 24. and appointed by word of mouth Solomon to bee his successour in the kingdome, 1 King. 1. and gave him many instructions, Chap. 2. unlesse we shall say, that those things were done before, though placed after, that this might come next to other matter of the like kinde. But granting all to bee set downe in order, these are called his last words, both because they are of things to come to passe in the last times, and the last words of praise to God which hee uttered, as Lyra hath it, or the last propheticall words. Jonathan the Chald. Paraphrast, hereupon saith thus; These are the propheticall words of David, which hee prophesied to the end of the world, to the times of comfort which were to come, that is, of the kingdom of the Messiah promised to David and to all the holy Fathers, they were spoken, and shall be performed in due time.

This prophesie beginneth with the titles of David, which are four: 1 David the sonne of Ishai hath said; hee setteth downe his parentage, as not being ashamed of it, although hee were a great King. 2 The man, that was raised up on high, that is, from a keeper of sheep, to bee King over Israel. 3 The anointed of the God of Jacob, for both these the vulg. Latine hath these words: Dixit vir, cui constitutum est de Christo dei Jacob, that is, saith Lyra, to whom a firme promise was made, never to bee revoked, concerning Christ of the God of Jacob, who is so called, because Jacob spake of him, Gen. 49. 10. Hebr. it is, the man said, that was set up, of the Christ of the God of Jacob, Junius hath it, the anointed of the God of Jacob, expounding it of his doing herein like Jacob when he was now ready to die, and like Moses holding that this was uttered by him last of all, when he had made an end of giving instructions to his sonne Solomon, 1 King. 2. and of praying for him, Psal. 72. and for the word rendred, cui constitutum est, both hee and Martyr have it, as in our translation, the man that was raised or set up on high, which I thinke to bee the best, but because in the next words there is the preposition by of, I preferre herein the vulg. Latine, to which the Chaldee Paraphrase agreeth. The last title is the sweet singer of Israel, for hee compiled many sweet and heavenly Psalmes for the publike use of the Church of God, and set them to Instruments of Musick, and did himselfe sing and play so sweetly, that hee drove away hereby the evill spirit from Saul. And that the giving of himselfe these titles might not seeme to come from vaine glory, and that the prophesie following might bee the better marked by all the faithfull, it is added, Vers. 2. the spirit of the Lord spake by mee, and his words were in my tongue, so that by the Spirit of God breathing upon him hee spake thus, as all Prophets did, 1 Pet. 2. 19. and therefore these words were not his owne, but both the matter and very words came from the Spirit of God.

The

The God of Israel said, the rock of Israel spake unto me, hee that ruleth over men must bee just, ruling in the feare of God; the vul Latin, he that ruleth over men, the just ruler in the feare of God, and this is according to the Hebr. and faith Lyra, they be all the titles of God, and of him it is said, ruling in the feare of God, because he striketh into men, in whose hearts he ruleth, the feare of God, not a servile but filiall. Pellican followeth the same translation, yet distinguisheth the sentence thus, the strong God, that is, the Almighty promised me who ruleth over the sonnes of men, being called just, because hee ruleth most justly. Lastly, he said, that he would one day set up a King, which should be the Messiah, who should be settled and rule with the feare of God, that is, whose kingdome is settled not by any other strength or firmenesse, but by the feare of God, it being a kingdome of beleivers and of such as doe worship and feare the true God onely. Martyr having mentioned the first exposition, faith, there is another exposition more agreeable to the words following thus: This rock of Israel said of meeto Samuel, that I should bee a just ruler, ruling in the feare of God, and taking care for the restoring of his worship, and this was performed partly in David, who yet by reason of his inbred corruption was not altogether so just in all things, but in the Messiah, who came of David perfectly, because hee also hath power to work in the hearts of men the true feare of God, which David had not, although hee taught it unto them. And this I thinke to bee the best, to understand the last words, as the thing spoken by the rock of Israel to David by the spirit of the Messiah. For so the sentence will bee perfect, one word, is, being supplied, the ruler over men is just, ruling in the feare of God, that is, hee of whom I said before, that I was about to speake, viz. the Messiah or Anointed.

And hee shall bee as the light of the morning when the Sunne riseth, &c. the vulgar Latine, as the light of the morning, when the Sunne ariseth, without these words connecting it with the former Verse, and hee shall bee, and therefore it is by Lyra applyed to the manner of Gods speaking unto David, and by him Vers. 2. as if it were meant, that his speaking was not obscure and as it were, clouded, but cleare and perspicuous, as a morning, wherein the Sunne ariseth cleare. And whereas the next words may seeme not to agree to this, as grasse groweth out of the earth by raines, that hee applyeth to Christ, to set forth whose comming of a Virgin the comparison is used, because as the ground is barren and bringeth forth no fruit, but by the rain falling upon it, so that virgin could not have brought forth a Sunne, but by the Spirit of God making her fruitfull. Pellican following R. David applyeth it to David's kingdome thus, as the morning light ariseth, and the Sunne alwayes increasing and shining, so shall or let my kingdome bee alwayes faire and never troubled with clouds, because if the morning be cloudy, one while cleare and then rainy, it never profiteth such things, as grow out of the earth. Hugo Card. applyeth it to the word of Christ, thus his word is like the morning light, which illuminateth and maketh fruitfull, so as that his rising againe is like the morning rising without any clouds of infidelitie, and hee shone by miracles and made the ground of beleivers hearts fruitfull, as the raine the earth, by the preaching of the Word. Peter Martyr expounding this and the next Verse together understandeth it of the kingdome of the Messiah, of which it is hereby prophesied, that it should bee cleare, as the fairest day, as the Sunne shining in his strength overcommeth and annihilateth all cloudinesse, so overcomming all that opposed themselves against it, and such was the covenant of God made with him touching it. And for the other similitude of the raine, hereby hee faith was meant, that persecutions notwithstanding should arise, but they should bee improved as raine to the making of the earth fruitfull, yet hee faith, that his house should not bee thus, because the raine falling upon the earth produceth fruits that are fading, but the fruit of this covenant should bee everlasting, because of the Kingdome of the Messiah there should bee no end; but of the last word, because he shall not make it to grow, he faith nothing, and so leaveth all indeed obscure. Junius having expounded the former of these Verses of them, that hee should rule over, for hee supplyeth these words, and they shall bee as the morning light, &c.

V. 3.

Lyra.Pellican.Peter Martyr.

V. 4.

Lyra.Pellican.Hugo Card.Peter Martyr.Junius

V. 4.

V. 5.

Ecce hee rendreth this, as the reason of the next words, although my house be not so, that is, although it bee not so cleare without clouds of sinne, yet Gods covenant with me is firme and sure, when hee maketh it not to grow, that is, when for sinne my house for a time shall not injoy such prosperitie. There are also divers other translations, as in the vulg. Latine, Verſ. 5. Neither is my house so great with God, that hee should make with mee an everlasting Covenant, &c. Neither is there anything of him, that shall not bud. The Geneva translation, after these words, the morning without clouds, hath it thus, Verſ. 4. so shall my house bee, and not as the grasse of the earth is by the bright raine, supplying all these words, so shall my house bee, and not, which are not in the Hebrew, Verſ. 5. the last words, therefore all my health and whole desire is, that hee would not make grow so, where so, againe is supplied, not being in the Hebrew. Our new translation followeth Iunius. Hebr. it is, And as the light of the morning, the Sunne, hee shall arise, the morning, not clouds, the tender grasse from the earth from the shining after raine, for my house is not so with God, and then the last words, for all my salvation and all my love, for he shall not make it grow. For the meaning, Iunius giveth the best light into it, for some words must needs bee supplied in such an abrupt and concise kind of speaking, that the sense may bee attained to, thus going forward here to prophesie of the Messiah, under the name of a just ruler, hee further saith, that hee shall bee as the Sun, the light of the morning, which is cleare and without all clouds, for he is called the Sun of righteousnesse, Mal. 4. for his glory, wherein hee excelleth the Sunne, and for a more superexcellent spirituall light comming from him, the tender grasse, that is, hee is also as the greene grasse, which the bright Sunne causeth to shoote out apace after a large raine, because his kingdome encreased so fast, the Gospel being received and Churches planted in so many countreys farre and wide over all the world in a short time. For my house is not so with God, that is, my house I grant is but meane, and not of that greatnesse, that God should out of it bring such a ruler, for I was at the first but a shepheard, yet God out of his meere grace & mercy towards me, hath made a firm Covenant with me, and given me a sure promise, that cannot be broken, but shall stand for ever, that such a ruler shall come of me, and this is my salvation and delight, for by him I hope to be saved eternally. For he shall not make to grow, or although hee shall not make, &c. for thus also may כי the word here used bee expounded, that is, as Iunius before, although my house flourish not constantly in my posterity, but bee sometime so crushed, as that it may seeme to bee without all possibilitie of growing up to such a glorious kingdome, yet that which hath beene said, shall bee verified: so that these words seeme to bee added, as pointing at the desperate state that the house of David should bee in under the Babylonish captivitie, and afterwards through Herods tyranny, to denote which and yet to give hope of the Messiah, Esa. 11. 1. it is said, a branch shall come out of the trunke or root of Iesse, that is, his house cut downe, as it were, to the roots.

V. 6.

V. 7.

Lyra.

But the sownes of Belial shall bee all as thornes thrust away, because they cannot be taken with hands. But the man that will touch them must bee fenced with iron and the staffe of a speare, and they shall bee utterly burnt with fire in the same place, the vulg. Latine comburentur usque ad nihilum, Hebr. בשבת ad cessationem, i. ad nihilum. This, saith Lyra, is to be understood of the wicked Jews, who were as thornes to those that handled them, that is, to Christ and his Apostles, wherefore they were by the Romans destroyed by force of Armes, and many of them with their Citie and Temple burnt with fire, and after that, because they died in infidelitie, they were burnt everlastingly in hell fire. Others generally understand this of all the wicked compared to thornes, because they beare no good fruit, but prick to hurt those that meddle with them by way of instruction or reprehension, wherefore as a man dealeth with thornes, so they shall be dealt withall, that is, powerfully proceeded against, and finally burnt in the place where they stand, that they may do no more hurt to such as come near them. Yet Alay in this bringeth the Jewes also for example, who were destroyed by Titus and Vespasian in their owne Citie. Pellican will have Apollonius and his adherents,

Peter Martyr.
Pellican.

rents, the greatest enemies of Christ understood, whom hee shall consume by the breath of his mouth, as by fire. I hold with Lyra, because it is a prophetic of things most remarkable happening about the kingdome of the Messiah, that his greatest enemies and first oppugners, the Jewes, are particularly meant, who were therefore justly destroyed by the Romans. And morally wee may note, what the end of all the incorrigibly wicked shall bee, viz. destruction for ever in hell fire.

These are the names of the valiant men, which David had. As the sacred history doth first and chiefly set forth the gifts of King David, as being a man singularly chosen of God, so it seemed good to the Spirit of God, that the valiant men about him with their worthy gifts should be put upon record for their honour, whereby is implied that they were not onely most valiant but faithfull also both to God and the King, and godly, for Joab who murdered two men most treacherously, Abner and Amasa, and presumptuously transgressed against the Kings charge touching Abalom, is not for these his wickednesses named amongst them, nor Amasa, who had rebelled with Abalom against the King, but onely such, as constantly followed him in adversitie and prosperitie, and helped him both in the time of his persecution under Saul, and against Ishboseth the sonne of Saul to obtaine the kingdome, to which God had chosen him, being for this purpose extraordinarily assisted with valour and might to subdue the enemy, and obtaine unto him a very large dominion over all the neighbouring nations, who had hitherto possessed a great part of the Land, which was given for inheritance to the children of Israel; some yet stand for Joab to bee meant by him sitting in the chaire: but Hugo, Rupert and Martyr hold, that hee was excluded from his ill deserts before spoken of.

And herein David was a figure of Christ, who had also his worthies, the Apostles, and 72. more Disciples, whom he sent out and instructed with power extraordinarily to conquer for him, by shewing signes and working miracles, and the putting off the names of David's worthies upon record in holy Scripture, figured out the writing of the names of Christs faithfull Ministers in heaven, as Martyr partly noteth, that wee all might bee encouraged to fight manfully under Christs banner, and never for any danger bee made to shrink from him; for the valour of any faithfull servant of God in this kind shall assuredly be registred, and hee shall not lose the praise thereof at Gods hands, as it is said of the Jew within, that his praise is not of men but of God. And in that David kept such men about him, who were both valiant and godly, it is commended hereby to other Kings and Princes to doe the like, and not to keepe about them vaine and vicious persons to the corrupting and weakening of their states and kingdomes.

Of these worthies of David here are reckoned up 36. and yet Vers. 39. they are summed up 37. Joab also, saith Junius, being understood, although hee be not named. Comesther numbred David for one, as the head of them all, and so maketh up 37. and this hee groundeth upon the vulg. Latine, where it is, David sitting in the chaire was most wise, but Hebr. there is no mention made of David any more, but that these were the valiant men, that David had, and then it is said, sitting in the chaire, the most wise, the head of the three, hee was Adino, the Eznite, or as in our new translation rather, the Tachmonite sitting in the chaire, he was Adino, for the word rendred, the most wise, Hebr. is חכם אדנו which, although חכם signifieth wise, cannot well bee rendred most wise, but rather Tachmonite, as setting forth the place, of which hee was, as the Eznite doth his family. But Junius for sitting in the chaire, &c. hath it, Joab habebat Tachmonites; but gratum fuit bastato una vice invadere 800. taking the two first words for his proper names, which are commonly rendred, sitting in the chaire, and Adino according to the signification (which is commonly taken for a proper name, but onely in the vulg. Latine, where it is expounded by tenerrimus) for grammel; it was delightfull to him, and ארס being armed with his speare, which is commonly rendred Eznite. The Hebrews will have David described here, as the chief of the most valiant, because it is for Kings and Masters to sit in

Note.

V. 8.

1 Chron. 11.
11.

The Mystery.

Note.
Peter Martyr.

Rom. 2. 29:

Junius.

Scholastic Histor.

Junius.

Lyra.

1 Chron. 11.

V. 9.

in chaires, and he, saith Lyra, is called most tender, because hee was gentle to his friends, although terrible to his enemies, for which is added ligni vermiculatus, as the vulg. Latine rendreth לִיגְנִי מְרִמְכָּל because as the worme eateth into the hardest wood, so hee pierced his strongest enemies by his might and destroyed them. But because David's worthies and not David himselfe are here propounded to bee numbered, neither doe wee read that ever hee slew 800. enemies at once, it is certaine that some other man and not David is meant. Some thinke that Job is thus described, because hee was Captaine of all the Army, but this is not probable for the reason before rendred, why hee is not put into this Catalogue at all, or according to others because his gists were sufficiently set forth before, and the purpose of the Spirit here was not to reckon up any, but such valiant men of David, as either had hitherto been passed over in silence, or without any hint giving of their valour, or although something were spoken hereof, yet not the gists most memorable: for so Sibbecai, whose killing of a Giant is spoken of Chap. 21. is here omitted, and Elhanan and Jonathan onely cursorily named, that wee might gather, when wee recount their valiant gists before set forth, what the rest of the 30. who are onely named were, but Abishai there spoken of is here againe commended for another most valiant act of his, viz. slaying 300. at once. Vers. 18. It seemeth to mee, that Sibbecai spoken of, Chap. 21. but here omitted, is also to be understood, who being added, as hee may well be from thence, maketh up the number of 37. and indeed without understanding him the second ternary is imperfect, there being in it but two expressed, Vers. 18, 19, 20. And for the former words, sitting in a chaire, they may best bee referred to David thus; these are the valiant men, which David sitting in the chaire of State had, and thus the Tygurin translation rendreth it: the Tachmonite, who was the chiefe of the three, hee was otherwise called Adino the Eznite, &c. That of Junius doth not arride me, because if Adino bee rendred gratum ei, the word נִינִי is redundant, and there is no reason to take the two first words for a proper name contrary to the streame of all interpreters. And for the making up of this number of 37. that Sibbecai is to bee understood may bee gathered from 1 Chron. 11. where hee is also named: but there are many more also named, so that the Catalogue here is imperfect, and these 37. were not all David's worthies, for there are named about 13. more, these were all, that it pleased the Spirit of God to set downe here, the rest being reserved to bee registred in that place, happily because they came not all unto him so soone as these 37. but when hee was in Hebron, and Ishobabeth Saul's sonne was now dead, for then many more of great valour of all the Tribes are also named, 1 Chron. 12. But 1 Chron. 11. 11. it is Jessebeam, the Hachmonite, who is first mentioned, but he is generally held to bee the same, although called by another name, and whereas there it is said, that hee slew 300. at once here 800. by Josephus 900. some thinke, that 300. of these 800. were slaine by his speare, the rest otherwise, but others better, that hee did that valiant act at another time. If any man shall thinke it incredible, that one man should in one day slay so many in a battell, he must remember, how Sampson alone slew 1000. men with the Jaw-bone of an Asse, and Jonathan and his Armorer alone set upon the whole Army of the Philistims and brought confusion to it, and Gideon with his 300. men overthrew the Army of the Midianites being as the Grasshoppers for multitude. The Lord promised to, such as served him, that one should chase a 1000. the enemy seeing the valour of this man might bee so astonishd through feare, as to become feeble and unable to resist, or to flee from him wounding and killing them, as the beasts are said to fall downe for feare before the Lion pursuing them neare. Now for the method here used in making this Catalogue. 1 Here are two ternaries of the most valiant, together with their most memorable gists. 2 An enumeration of the names of 30. more, and the same method is followed, 1 Chron. 11. Touching the two ternaries, the first three are said to bee superiour to the other three, and yet those other three of wonderfull valour also.

The second was Eleazar the sonne of Dodo, which word signifieth his uncle, and and so it is by some rendred, but it is more commonly and better taken for a proper name, hee is said to have been of that valour, that hee slew the Philistims till his sword did cleave to his hand, and then the people which before were fled from him for feare of the Philistims returned onely after him to take the spoyle.

The third was Shammah the sonne of Agee, who defended a piece of ground full of Lentiles against a troope of the Philistims, when all others fled from the Philistims for feare, and obtained a great victory. The history touching these two differeth much from this, 1 Chron. 11. 12, 13. where that is ascribed to Eleazar, which is here to Shammah, no mention being made of Shammah, but implicitly. Hee was with David in Padammim, and the Philistims were gathered together to battell, where there was a parcell of Barley, and whe the people fled from before the Philistims, they set themselves in the midst of the parcell and delivered it and slew the Philistims. To reconcile this difference some thinke, that the History of Shammah is quite omitted, 1 Chron. 11. rendring therefore the plurall, they stood in the midst of the parcell by the singular, hee stood, as the Septuagint, and Tostatus, and because it was in a parcell of a Barley field where Eleazar fought, but of Lentils, where Shammah, and it seemeth to bee onely a more full description of the valiant act of Eleazar, the occasion of his fight being but in part set forth here, but in the other part there, and the name of the place, where hee was, when hee entred into this fight, Padammim, which is here omitted. For the plurall used there, it may bee reconciled, that some of his men seeing him to defend that ground alone were gathered unto him againe, but it was his valour alone, by which this was done. Some others thinke, that the histories of both these are conjoynd in the Chronicles, and whereas Lentils are spoken of here, but there Barley, there might bee stalks of both, which the Philistims would have burned. Lyra saith, because Eleazar was the chiefe in defending that ground, hee onely is mentioned, but Shammah also implied in that the plurall number is used. And this is the more probable, because Verf. 15. it is spoken of three, that together did also another most valiant act in breaking through the hoast of the Philistims for water, when as two onely had beene expressly named before, intimating, that the third was left to bee understood from 2 King. 23. Whereas Verf. 9. it is said, when they defied the Philistims that were there gathered together, some thinke rather it should bee read, when the Philistims defied and objected cowardize unto them, but the word חרפו signifieth also their exposing of themselves to danger, as Pagninus hath it, and the word rendred the Philistims, is נפילסח against the Philistims; wherefore Junius, when they exposed their lives to danger against the Philistims, and this is best, because it is not likely, that they would reproach the Philistims, and then flee away from them, and the words agree not to the other reading, the Philistims reproached them.

And three of the thirty went downe to David, &c. here by thirty is to be understood the whole number of David's valiant men, who might bee so called although they were more, because happily so many were by David chosen at the first, and had the name of the thirtie worthies given unto them, and authoritie and command over others accordingly, but some others afterwards also shewing great valour were joynd unto them, but they were still called by the name of the thirty, as the 12. Apostles, when Paul and Barnabas were added, and Epaphroditus, Junius and Andronicus, of whom, Rom. 16. 7. it is said, that they were of note amongst the Apostles, were still called the 12. Apostles. These three came to David to the Cave of Odullam in the time when hee was persecuted by Saul, a Garrison of the Philistims being then at Bethlehem, and when David longed for some of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which was a well, that of old hee happily had used to drinke of, for hee was of that City and knew it to be very good, these three adventured to fetch him some water thence, &c. and this is noted to have beene done in the harvest time, when it was hot, and when it was brought hee would not drinke thereof, but considering that they with perill of their lives had fetcht it, hee poured it out for a drinke

V. 12.

1 Chron. 11. 12

Tostatus.

Peter Martyr.
Lyra.
Junius.

Junius.

V. 13.

2 Sam. 22.

*Pellican.
Peter Martyr.*

Note.

Glif. Ord.

Hugo Catd.

Lyra.

Iunius.

V. 18.

Pellican.

Sallianus.

V. 20.

Iosephus.

Theodoret.

Tostatus.

drinke offering to the Lord for the health and safetie of these three, saith Pellican: hee offered it for a drinke offering, saith Martyr, in way of thanksgiving to God, who had given him such worthy men, and preserved their lives in this great danger, and hee called it the blood of those men, because gotten with danger of their lives, as the wine in the Sacrament is also called blood figuratively: a notable example for Princes and Captaines to bee tender over the lives of their servants, to bee prodigall of their blood is tyranny. And their readinesse to give content to their Captaine serveth to commend ready obedience to all servants, although not in imitating desperately this example, when there is no such great need: but in time of necessitie for the safetie of the King, and the Commonwealth, subjects ought to put themselves upon apparent dangers. Some thinke, that David bade them fetch this water to try their valour, but his astonishment, when he saw, that they had done it, plainly manifesteth the contrary. Kimbi ascribeth this fact to the next three, but this is against the order of the history, yet Hugo will have these three to be Abishai, Sobbecai and Jonathan, following the vulgar Latine, Nec non ante descenderant tres, qui erant de 30. and following Jerom hee saith, that David being in the Cave of Odullam in Sauls time is not meant here, but after his sinne with Bathsheba, and that the water being brought, which hee so greatly desired, hee being thirsty yet would not drinke it, to teach his souldiers fortitude and constancy. Lyra contrariwise saith, that it cannot bee understood of any but of the first three, because it is concluded, these were the three most valiant, and hee saith, that David by sacrificing this water shewed, that who so indanger themselves by fighting against infidells, doe offer unto God a most acceptable sacrifice. Iunius illustrateth the fact of these three the more by saying, that the Garrison of the Philistims kept the way to this well. Hugo in affirming these three to bee the second followeth Jerom in Tradit. Hebr. So likewise doth Dionysius and Tostatus, but enough hath been said by Lyra already to confute this.

Abishai the brother of Joab was also chiefe among three. Thus it is said also, 1 Chron. 11. but here are two worthies onely named, hee and Benajah, how then shall this number of three be made up? Pellican thinketh, that hee is said to bee the chiefe of the three with relation to two more mentioned, Chap. 21. who also slew two Giants, thus also Lyra and Hugo annumerating to him Sobbecai and Jonathan; but so there will not bee three but foure. Wherefore Sobbecai or Sibbecai, as I said before, may most probably bee understood and not Jonathan, as some would have him, for hee is named afterwards, Vers. 32. unlesse that bee another Jonathan, because hee is called the sonne of Jashen, and not of Shammah, *David*s brother, as Ch. 21. 21.

And Benajah the sonne of Jebojada, the sonne of a valiant man of Kabzeel: Of Jebojada mention is made 1 Chron. 12. 27. that hee was Captaine of 3700. Aaronites, which came to David to helpe him, and of this Jebojada Benajah seemeth to bee the sonne, and so Iosephus accordingly calleth him a Priest, as all the Aaronites were: Cabzeel, of which hee was, was of the tribe of Judah, for which cause Theodoret will have him of that tribe and son to *David*s brother. Touching Benajah it is said, first, that he slew two Lionlike men of Moab, Hebr. two lions, but it is generally held, that they were men for their valour called Lions. 2. Hee slew a Lion in the time of Snow in a pit, the Lion, saith Iosephus, being deceived by the Snow that covered the pit fell into it, and roaring there so, as that the people neare were scared, hee went valiantly thither and slew the Lion. This by some is called in question, whether it were true valour or temerity, because although to slay a Lion, when a man is inforced to fight with him, be valour, as in Samson and David, yet when there is no necessitie to do it, it is rashnesse, and by the Roman Lawes such as fought with beasts causelessly onely for ostentation of their strength, were censured as infamous, and this they say was the case of Benaiab. But the commemoration of this in sacred writ to his praise doth sufficiently cleare him from all such calumnies, hee did it to deliver the country from that feare, in which they were, as

David

David do deliver his Lambe from the Lion caught him by the beard and slew him. 3. He slew an Egyptian, a goodly man, having a speare in his hand, 1 Chron. 11. 23. hee is said to have beene of great stature, and his speare like a Weaversbeame, but Benaiah had onely a staffe in his hand, and therefore plucking through his great valour his speare out of his hand hee slew him with his owne speare. This and the former fact of his are by the Hebrews expounded of Joab, who they say, was meant by the Lion; and Shimei meant by this Egyptian, for Benaiah slew them both: but neither the time nor circumstances doe agree, wherefore it is onely mentioned by expositors and rejected as a putid comment, and because Jerom hath it de tradit. Hebr. it is questioned, whether that booke were his or no. And for these his valiant gells David let him over his guard, that is, as hath been said before, over the Cherubims and Pelethites. Hebr. it is מַסְמַחֵם rendered in the vulg. Latine, auricularium a secreto, his Privy Counsellour, Martyr, ad auditum suum, that is, faith hee, over his Privy Counsell, but hee approveth rather of the other exposition, over his guard, who are set forth by his audience, because they were alwayes at hand to heare his commands to execute them.

Next followeth Asahel, who was before commended from his swiftnesse of foot, hee was slaine being but a young man by Abner, then Elhanan the sonne of Doda, Chap. 21. 19. the sonne of Jare Oregim, of which names see there; it is probable, that he is not set after Asahel, of whom no such famous exploit is commemorated, but onely for honours sake to Asahel, who was neare a kin to David.

The third Semmab, 1 Chron. 11. Sammoth: the fourth Elika, omitted 1 Chron. 11, &c.

Mystically by Davids longing after water out of the well of Belebem may bee understood his longing for the Messiah that should bee borne there, who was made a sacrifice for our sinnes, and by his blood, as by water poured out cleanseth us from them, so many as beleeve in his name: thus the Ordin. Glosse applying also morally his refusing to drinke of this water to his penitency for his unlawfull desiring of the wife of Uriah, for according to the Glosse following Josephus, hee is understood to have beene in Jerusalem at that time in the fort of Zion, after his sinne committed with Bathshebab, but this agreeth not with the Scripture, wherein he is said to have been then in the Cave of Odullam.

CHAP. XXIV.

Againe the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, that hee moved David to say, goe and number Israel and Judah, 1 Chron. 21. 1. Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel. By comparing these two together wee see, that by the fury of the Lord Satan is meant, whom hee used in his wrath to stirre up David to sinne, that hee might therefore bring a judgement upon the people, with whom hee was offended for their sinnes. Hee brought one judgement of a three years famine, 2 Sam. 21. for the sinne committed amongst them in the matter of the Gibeonites, now they had also greatly sinned otherwise, although it bee not here specified, for which hee brought the judgement of the Plague in this Chap. Martyr conjectureth, that after that famine plenty being restored, and the people living in peace they were much corrupted in their manners, as is usuall by such meanes: and wee may adde, that all their enemies being subdued, they most probably grew secure, and having such worthies, and they being so many, they trusted to their own strength, and hereby the Lord was provoked thus to abate their number. And whereas it may seem, that if their sinnes were the cause of this judgement, hee might have brought it upon them without Davids further stirring him up by numbring the people, it is true, but because they had greatly sinned against David also, whom he had chosen, by being so ready to follow other usurpers as Absalom and Shebab in rebelling against him; it seemed good unto the Lord to permit him thus

V. 21.

V. 24.

V. 25.

The Mystery.
Glos. Ordin.

V. 1.

1 Chron. 21,

Theodoret.
Lyra.

to Qu.

Josephus.

Exod. 30. 12.

Titus Livius.

R. Kimbi.
Testatus.

V. 2.

V. 3.

1 Chr. 21. 2.

V. 5, 6.

V. 7.

Testatus.

to offend, that through him they might be punished, who had alwayes forborn himself to take revenge upon them, that it might appeare, that God is the avenger of wrongs, and not avenge our selves, but commit it to him, as hee hath commanded. And that all may take notice, how farre stretching the sinne of a King is, and therefore pray for their wel-doing above all others, as 1 Tim. 2. 1. They were before judged for Sauls sinne, of which they were doubtlesse guilty by giving assent thereunto, and now they are judged againe for David sin, to which they were also accessary, by being together puffed up by their great multitudes, and invincible forces. But if it were a sin in David to command the people to bee numbred, it may justly both bee inquired, wherein that sin lay, and also how God is said to move him hereunto, seeing hee is the author of all good, but not of any evill? To the first of these it is generally answered, that pride was his sin, for being puffed up in beholding the catalogue of so many valiant men, which hee had, hee thought it would adde much to his glory to have a Register made of all his other men also throughout his whole kingdome. Some thinke that hee sinned, because in numbering the people, hee caused not the tribute to bee gathered of each man for the sanctuary, as was commanded to bee done, when the people were numbred, that no plague might bee sent amongst them; for the Lord would have this one end alwayes of numbring the people, that an oblation might bee made for them, for the reconciling of Gods favour towards them. And thus the heathen Romans, when the number of the people was taken, which was once in five years, ordained that a sacrifice should be offered for their health, of a sow, a sheep, and three bulls; and happily they learned this from the Hebrews. But David thought not upon this law, onely hee would have the people numbred for no other end, but that hee might know the number of them to bee lifted up the more. And if he had propounded this end, viz. to raise a tribute for the sanctuary, saith R. Kimbi, unlesse hee had had some other lawfull end of numbring, it had not been justifiable, for God would not have his people oppressed with tributes. To the second, that God is not the author of any evill, as it is simply evill, but he suffereth it sometime to bee done for a punishment of precedent sinnes: as here, Satan by his suggestion moved David to number the people, as 1 Chron. 20. but the anger of God is said to have done it in this place, because hee being offended with Israel for sinne, permitted Satan to work thus in David and gave him not the grace to withstand such a sinfull motion: but of this see more at large in my comment upon Rom. 9. Touching the number of the people, it is committed to Joab to bring it in, going through the whole land from Dan, which was north, to Beersebab, which was south. This hee was unwilling to, as knowing it to come from vaine-glory and therefore tending to the provoking of God to anger, but the King being resolute, hee did it, and in nine moneths brought in the number of all, that were able to goe to warre: whereby wee may gather, that none were numbred under 20. and none above 60. which happily might bee as many more. And that none under 20. were appointed to bee numbred is expressly said, 1 Chron. 27. 23. because the Lord had promised, that they should bee innumerable, as the starres of heaven. But it is said, that not onely Joab, but the rulers of the people also were appointed to goe and number them, of which rulers it seemeth to be spoken, 1 Chron. 27. 16. that they were 12. of each Tribe one; and 2 Sam. 24. 4. The Captaines of the host are said to have gone with Joab to number, which were 12. others, 1 Chron 27. 1, 2. The way that Joab went with the Captaines was first over Jordan to begin with the Reubenites and Gadites first, which were farthest off eastward, then they came to Dan Issachar, and Zidon north; and lastly, by the Cities of the Hivites and Canaanites westward to the south of Judab and Beersebab. And they finished their numbring and brought in the number of all Israel 800000. and of Judab 500000. at the end of nine moneths and twenty dayes to Jerusalem; but 1 Chron. 21. 5. of Israel 1100000, and of Judab 470000. For the reconciling of which difference, it is to bee understood, that the divers Rulers of the Tribes had their severall books, into which the people numbred were written, and out of them they were againe all written, or should have been written into one book for the King: but because the fact seemed abominable to Joab, hee brake off from setting down all the numbers into the Kings book, and no more came in to that, but 800000 of Israel, as in this place; but the Writer of the book of the Chron: gathering the whole number out of those severall books without cutting off any, set downe 1100000. And whereas hee maketh fewer by 30000 of the Tribe of Judah, then 2 Kings 24. Tostatus thinketh, that so many were left out, because they were unfit for war, being not so valiant; and this is the more probable, because 1 Chron. 21. 5. to the men of Judah, the number of whom is there set downe, it is added, which drew the sword, but not 2 Sam. 24. Or it may be thought, that not onely the men of Judah, which came of Judah, are numbred, 2 Sam. 24. but also Profelytes of other Countries dwelling amongst them and serving David, 1 Chro. 21. 5. they are left out, for there might be of these 30000, as Sallianus hath it. Peter Martyr thinketh, that Joab gave up a lesse number to David, because the Tribe of Levi was left out of the number, and it may bee Ierusalem was not yet numbred, nor the Kings bands. But if so, the number of Judah should rather have been increased, 1 Chron. 21. whereas it is made lesse, and it is said exprelly of Israel, that they were 1100000, Levi and Benjamin not being numbred. Some thinke the difference to bee nothing, because the lesser number is contained in the greater, but who so being asked what number such a man mentioned, shall say 8. for 11. cannot bee justified. Some thinke, that so many of the Tribe of Judah were smitten by the plague, and so were left out, 1 Chron. 21. and some, that 500000. are mentioned, 2 Sam. 24. although there lacked 30000. ob rotunditatem numeri. Jerom resolveth it, that Joab found a greater number, but gave up a lesse to the King, that hee might bee the lesse puffed up. And when I consider seriously that 1 Chron. 21. 6. The Tribe of Levi and of Benjamin bee numbred not, it seemeth to me to bee spoken in this sense, hee put not the number of them into the booke exhibited to the King, the number indeed of all Israel, as it was taken in divers bookes, was 1100000. and of Judah 470000. but he cut off the Levites in that account and all Benjamin, which together might well bee 270000. that is, 300000. more to Israel, but 30000. lesse to Judah, because so many of the tribe of Levi might bee numbred amongst them; 2 Sam. 24. but 1 Chron. 21. put in their proper place, that is, amongst those of Israel. And the rather may wee rest satisfied in this resolution, because 1 Chron. 27. 24. it is said, that Joab began to number, but left off because of the Plague, neither was the number put into the Kings Chronicles, that is, the full number, as it goeth in the booke of the Chronicles.

people

Afterwards Davids heart smote him, when hee had numbred the people, &c. Nine moneths and twenty dayes were first past, saith Martyr, wherein hee lay in this sinne, which was double; 1 of pride, 2 of forgetting the Law of levying a tribute for the sanctuary. But now it repenteth him greatly, by what meanes hee was brought to this is not said, but that his heart smote him, the Spirit of God doubtlesse working in his conscience to make him consider his great vanity and to bee humbled for it, which when hee was doing this thing hee considered not, as being a while left unto himselfe, to shew what the very best are, if they bee not continually assisted by the grace of God. In our new translation it is, Vers. 11. For when David was up in the morning the Prophet Gad came unto him, whereby it may bee gathered, that by his comming hee was put in minde of his sinne and repented. But in the Hebr. it is not for, but and. Some thinke, that hee was smitten by some inward terrour sent by the Lord to stirre him up. Howsoever, it is to bee noted, with what quietnesse of mind and immunitie from trouble and pleasure so ever, sinne is committed, trouble and perplexity will come for it afterwards, and this sweet will end in bitterness, for the conscience will not alwayes sleepe, but at length awake and smite the sinner, as it did our first parents also.

And David rose in the morning, and the word of the Lord came to Gad, Davids seer, &c. that is, at the same time that hee caused Davids heart to smite him, that night

R r

1 Chron. 27.
24.Sallianus.
Peter Martyr.Hieronymus, in tradit. hebr.V. 10, 11.
Peter Martyr.

Notes

Note.

V. 11.

Josephus.

night he spake thus by vision to Gad, who came unto him the morning following, and not before, by his admonitions to bring him to repentance, as Jesephus, who saith, that the Prophets admonished him of his sinne, and then hee repented, and prayed for forgiveness. And the Lord used Gad to speake unto him, and would not speake immediately to him, as before hee had used Nathan, although David also was a Prophet, to shew his anger the more, as a father being offended with his childe dealeth with him by interlocutors to humble him the more, when hee seeth his fatherly affection thus estranged from him. Whereas 1 Chron: 21. 7. it is said that God smote Israel and then David confessed his sinne, and Gad came to him, v. 8. it is Hysteron-proteron, or first in brieft it is shewed, that Israel was smitten, and then the order of Gods proceeding against them more at large.

V. 13.

Gad then offered to David to choose one of these three judgements, either to flee three months before his enemies, or to suffer by famin seven yeares, or by a pestilence of three dayes. Now this offer was made in mercy upon *David*s repentance, to lenise the suffering the more, because when wee are constrained to endure misery it is more grievous, then when wee voluntarily suffer it. For seven yeares famin, 1 Chron: 21. 11. it is three yeares famin, which is by Junius and others thus reconciled, here because three yeares of famin had lately beene cb: 21. and now it was most likely was the fourth, wherein although God beganne to send raine, yet presently there followed not fruitfulness, seven yeares are spoken of, as including these and three more: but there because no mention had beene made of those three yeares famin before going, three yeares onely are named. Martyr and Pellican say, that seven a certaine number is put for an uncertaine, many being meant hereby. I preferre that of Junius, because although no such exact reckoning bee made, yet if three yeares more of famin had beene sent now so soone after the other, it had beene of seven yeares continuance reckoning from the beginning to the end. Moreover for a three dayes pestilence, 1 Chron: 21. 12. it is, three dayes the sword of the Lord, even the pestilence in the land, the angell of the Lord destroying throughout all the Coasts of Israel, more expressly noting, of what nature the pestilence was, as in the execution of this judgement, is further declared, viz: destruction coming from the immediate hand of God and his Angels.

Junius.

Peter Martyr.
Pellican.

1 Chr. 21. 12.

V. 14.

David being thus put to it, answereth, Let mee fall into the bands of God, for his mercies are great, and not into the bands of man, and hereby, as expositours generally hold, hee meant, let us be smitten with three dayes pestilence, and not with famin or sword of the enemy, because although even destruction by enemies may bee said to be Gods hand, yet it is not so immediate, but men are used, as instruments; and although famins are sent by God, yet hereby occasion is given to seeke to men of other countries for reliefe, amongst whom the Jewes were likely to bee misused, as being of a religion differing from other Nations, and to heare their God reproachfully spoken of, as not able now any longer to sustaine them in the country, to which he had brought them. In answering thus, David is thought by Martyr to have shewed both piety towards God, and love to his country. For by any of the other two judgements there could not but bee danger of great dishonour to redound to God, by the blaspheming of enemies, and Kings commonly can provide well enough for the feeding of themselves in the time of famin, and for the safety of their owne persons in time of warre, and their Subjects onely for the most part, and that the meaner sort are swept away by either of these judgements. But when the immediate hand of God smiteth, as in pestilences, the King is in danger as well as the Begger. Wherefore although his choice were given him, hee conceiving his sinne to be the cause, voluntarily submitted himselfe to such a judgement, as whereby he might be endangered as well as his people, a certaine token of a true penitent, patiently to beare even to the losse of life the Lords chastisement. And hee shewed also a great deale of confidence in Gods goodness, although hee had offended him, that wee might learne to trust in Gods mercy, and hereby comfort our selves in our greatest miseries, for he preferred falling into Gods hands although

Peter Martyr.

Note.

although hee saw that hee saw him, to be full of wrath against him.

But how doth this saying agree with that 1 Sam. 2. 25. if a man sinne against God, who shall plead for him, and Heb. 10. 31. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of God? Answer: it is meant when God punisheth in wrath the obstinate sinner against the knowne will of God, not when the end of his punishing is mercy, as it is alwayes to the penitent, and this was Dauids case.

So the Lord sent a pestilence, and there dyed from the morning to the time appointed 70000 men. Here because it is not said in three dayes expressly, but from the morning to the time appointed, some gather, that it is meant, till the evening sacrifice, because the word ערבו is commonly used to set forth that time, so the Hebrewes, and Varablm, Rupertus, Comestor, Sa, Testatus saith it is the common opinion, that although a pestilence of three dayes was propounded, yet out of Gods mercy to the penitent it continued but one day, so likewise Martyr, and Lyra, yea some make the time lesse, saying that it continued but till dinner time, which was meant by the appointed time, so Josephus, and after him Origen, Theodoret and Ambrose, hereby extolling the mercy of God, who abridged a plague of three dayes into six houres, which was but the 24 part thereof. But Junius will have three dayes meant by the appointed time, because that was the time set for this destruction, and Sallianus argueth strongly for this, and by our Collect for a time of plague it seemeth, that this appointed time was so understood by the compilers thereof.

For my part, I cannot but assent rather to the most, 1. Because at the treaty of David God commanded the destroying Angel to stay his hand, therefore he suffered not the plague to destroy all the time that was set, for without bidding, the Angell would then have ceased. 2. Because Gad came to David the same day to bid him build an Altar, and to sacrifice, 2: 18. that the plague might cease. For the shorter time stood for by Josephus, &c. there is no reason, because the word here used is never found to set forth any such time. If it bee urged against the other, and for the three yeares continuance, this was the time set, and if God varied herefrom, he is mutable. Lyra answereth well, in all threatnings it is to bee understood, that it shall be so, unlesse by repentance Gods wrath bee lenified, as towards Nineveh, yet alwayes temporall punishments are not averted, although there be repentance, as in another case of Dauids sinning, 2 Sam: 12. Moreover here was no absolute decree propounded of a pestilence to endure three dayes, but onely it was put to Dauids choice, and because he so humbly submitted to the stroke of God, and shewed himselfe to have so great confidence in his mercy, it was none other like, but that God would deal with him in mercy in abridging the time of this judgement. Now for the manner how the people were destroyed by this pestilence, Josephus saith, they were consumed divers wayes, some dying with vehement paine and bitter torment, some with lesse paine even in the hands of the Physicians, who went about to cure them, others, as it were, being choaked, and darknesse coming upon their eyes, and others, even as they were burying their dead suddenly. It is said indeed, that an Angel was seene with a sword in his hand, but this vision or apparition, was only for a signe, to shew that they who died were slaine by Gods Angel, but not through the smiting of any visible sword, but of some mortiferous poison injected to their hearts, and presently killing them, as if they had bene thrust into the heart by a sword. So that this pestilence was not like other plagues, which come from the infection of the aire, but killed immediately by the ministry of Gods Angel.

For the number of 70000 said here to be slaine, the Hebrewes have 270000 to make good that their reconciliation of the different numbers before spoken of, there being so many missing in Samuel of the number 1 Chro., that the cause of this difference was, that in Samuel such as dyed are left out, but in Chro: reckoned also, but they are herein contrary to all scripture, wherein, it is but 70000. And all these were men destroyed all over Israel, from Dan to Beerseheba, as the numbring had gone. The Hebrewes except Benjamin and Levi, of which Tribes, they say none were smitten, because they were not numbered, but

R r 2

Qu.

V. 15.

Varablm.
Rupertus.
Testatus.

Joseph. 1. 7. 10.
Orig. Hom: 16. in Numer: Theodor: qu: ult: in 2 Reg: Amb:
in Psal: 37.
Junius.

Lyra.

Joseph. lib: 7.
c. 10.

Peter Martyr.

but seeing the numbring alone was not the cause of this evill, but the peoples finnes, as was before shewed, it is not to be doubted, but that if these Tribes were guilty, some of them were destroyed also. If it be demanded, whether any besides wicked men were now destroyed? Martyr answereth, that happily some who fell amongst others, were not of the wicked, because all are subject to the stroake of death, but because Ezek. 9. the godly are marked to be spared, when Gods Angels destroyed others, I thinke it more probable, that the Angell was also now directed so, as that they were spared. And if it bee demanded whether all these were men onely that fell, it is answered, yes, for both men onely were numbred, and not women or children, and they onely had formerly rebelled against their King.

V. 16.
1 Chron. 21.
15.

1 Sam. 25.

And when the Angell stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem to destroy it, the Lord repented him of the evill, &c. 1 Chr. 21. 15. And God sent an Angell to Jerusalem to destroy it, and as hee was destroying, the Lord beheld, and repented, &c. Here it is not properly to bee understood, that God repented, for repentance is not incident unto him, 1 Sam. 15. 29. but it is said thus, after the manner of men, because when a man saith, that hee will doe any thing and doth it not, it is because he repenteth, as David against Nabal, so when God altereth his purpose upon the repentance of men, hee is said to repent per anthropopaθειam, and this sheweth, that the pestilence threatned for three dayes continued not so long, but determined the first day, for otherwise how could God be said to repent of the evill, but that he suffered not the destruction to extend so long as he had threatned? Whereas it may seeme by the words here, that at the first comming of the Angell to Jerusalem to destroy, the judgement ceased and so Jerusalem escaped without any destruction, it is made plaine, 1 Chr. 21. 15. that the pestilence destroyed there also, for it is said, as the Angell was destroying there, the Lord repented of the evill, that is, to see so many cut off so suddenly, and although the men of Jerusalem rebelled not with Sheba, yet they rebelled with Absalom, and so were as worthy to bee punished. And it is added, v. 17. David spake unto the Lord when hee saw the Angell smite the people, so that the people in Jerusalem were smitten also, 1 Chron. 21. 16. it is said before this. David saw the Angell of the Lord standing betwene heaven and earth with a sword stretched over Jerusalem, and hee and the elders of Israel being clothed with sackcloth fell upon their faces, v. 17. then David said, Is it not I that commanded the people to be numbred? it is I that have sinned, but these sheepe what have they done? let thy hand be against me, &c. He thought that God smote them onely for his finnes, and therefore hee speaketh thus of the people, as being innocent, but, as was shewed before, God tooke occasion onely upon his numbring to send this judgement, but hee had bene provoked before to wrath by their finnes which he now thus punished. It shewed Davids great love and tender affection over the people committed to his government, that he spake thus for them, and all Kings should from him take example to belikewise affected with the grievances and miseries of their people. But what is it, that he prayeth that Gods hand might bee against him and his fathers house? was not his fathers house nearest of all unto him? Ans. He meant if the striking of him would not suffice, his punishment should be aggravated in cutting off his kindred also, who being about him, were more accessary to this sinne then others; or he speake by an Hyperbole.

V. 18.

Numb. 16. 47.

And Gad came that day to David, 1 Chron. 21. 18 The Angell of the Lord commanded Gad to goe to David, and he came and said, Goe to the threshing floore of Ornan, here it is Araunah the Jebusite, and set up an Altar there, &c. the difference is nothing, God commanded by his Angell, or the Angell of God commanded, and the same man was called Araunah and Ornan. David must set up an Altar and sacrifice thereon, that the pestilence might cease, a propitiation for sinne being thus made, as sometime a plague consuming the people, Aaron tooke incense and went and stood with his censer betwene the living and the dead, and so the plague ceased. The Hebrewes say, that Zadok offered upon this Altar, but it is rather to bee thought, that it was Abiathar, because Zadok ministred before the Tabernacle in Gibeon, but Abiathar before the Arke at Jerusalem. But what need was there of sacrificing now, when as the Lord had bidden the Angell before to stay his hand? Ans. It is to bee understood, the humiliation of David and the Elders being premised, this direction being first given and sacrifices being offered, then the destroying Angell was forbidden to smite any more; and not before, although it bee first placed, the historiographer making hast to write of the compassion wherewith God was moved, and then shewing by what meanes, and in what order.

at

But why must David goe to the possession of a Jebusite, an heathen, and one of the seven nations appointed to bee destroyed before Israel? Kimbi contendeth, that hee was none of these Jebusites, but of the kindred of Abimelech; howsoever, it seemeth that hee was a faithfull person, and a true hearted subject to David, and one, as some thinke, that holpe him to get the possession of Zion. Davids being sent to his floore, figured out the faith amongst the Gentiles to whom the Jewes must come by beleiving in like manner, if ever they will be saved, for he that beleeveth with the Gentiles in Christ, sets up an Altar amongst them, seeing the Altar served to figure out Christ, so Martyr, & the place, where Araunah his threshing floore was, being mount Moriab, the Lord did now shew, that hee would have his house built there, and that this was the place chosen for the Arke to rest in perpetually, 2 Chro. 3. 1. before David came to set up his Altar, 1 Chro. 21. 20. it is said, that Ornan saw the Angell of God, and his foure sons with him hid themselves. Of the people of Israel it is not said, that any saw the Angell but David, only Ornans eyes and his sonnes were opened to see him, to shew, that the Gentiles should be inlightned to see the Angell of the new Covenant, Christ Jesus, but the eyes of the Jewes should be held from seeing, except some few selected ones. His sonnes being terrified with the vision hid themselves, but it is said, that hee was threshing Wheat, and seeing David to come towards him hee went out of the floore to meet him; although some say, that both hee and his sonnes hid themselves; David then telling him the cause of his coming, viz. to buy the floore of him to build an Altar upon it to offer sacrifice thereon, that the Plague might bee stayed, hee offered to give it him, and Oxen for sacrifice, as a King. Hebr. Araunah, a King, whereupon Vatablus and others gather, that hee was King of the Jebusites, and now a tributary to David, and a Profelyte imbracing the true Religion. Some Hebrewes gather from this that David would not build an Altar upon his floore, but being first bought of him, that hee was an Idolater of the heathen, and this was the cause why he would needs buy it. But it is more probable, as was said before, that having lived so neare unto David now about 30. yeers hee was a convert, or otherwise, David would not have suffered him; moreover his liberall offer shewed his goodnesse and desire to further this service of God, which David came about for the good of the people, unto whom hee was united by imbracing the same Religion. And because David knew, that this floore must be perpetually used for the service of God and for the building of a Temple there, and not at this time onely, there was good reason that hee should buy it. Moreover it is said, Prov. 3. 7. Honour God with thy substance, and Eccles. 34. 24. bee that sacrificeth of the substance of the poore, is as one that sacrificeth the sonne before the father. And it was for Davids sin and the peoples, that sacrifice was now to bee made, therefore it must bee his cost, and not a strangers. And it is said, that Araunah offered not onely the floore, but the Oxen, that is, saith Junius, the Oxen, which troad out the Corne which were at hand, and the threshing instruments, and other instruments of Oxen for wood, that is, the wood workes, wherewith the Corne was threshed; and which were used about the Oxen in this labour, for wood to burne the sacrifice withall, because they were both there ready and most apt to burne as being dry and seare, 1 Chro. 21. 23. it is added, and Wheat for the meat-offering, for besides burnt-offerings there were peace offerings, in which fine flowre was used.

So David bought the floore and the Oxen for 50. shekels of silver, therefore Vers. 23. these words, All these Araunah as a King did give unto the King, are to bee understood thus, hee offered to give them, 1 Chro. 21. 25. Hee is said to have given

Peter Martyr.

1 Chron. 21.
20.

Sallianus.

Vatablus.

Junius.

V. 24.
Lyra.

Tostatus.
Schol. hist.
Barradius, Arias Montanus.
Kimhi.
Villalpandus.

H. Bunting Patriarchi tra-vails.

V. 25.

1 Chron. 21.
26.

1 Joh. 1. 1.

Gen. 22.

1 Chron. 21.
28.

V. 29.

V. 30.

Lyra.

given for the floore 600. shekels of gold. This by Lyra is thus reconciled, the price of the floore is not spoken of, 2 Sam. 24. but onely of the Oxen, and 1 Chron. 21. the price paid for the floore onely; so likewise Comestor, and Tostatus, who saith, it is the common opinion of all expositors; yet some say, that the Oxen and floore, which were first bought to set up an Altar onely, cost but 50. shekels, but afterwards all the ground about it for the Temple and Court was bought at 600. shekels of Gold. Some that the Tribes paid all but 50. shekels. And lastly some plainly against the Text, that the shekels, 2 Sam. 24. were shekels of Gold, and those, 1 Chron. 21. shekels of Silver, whereof 600. were no more then 50. of Gold. But I rest in the first and most commonly received. For the value of 50. shekels in our money counting 15 d. to the shekel, it was 3 l. 2 s 6 d. and 600. shekels, the shekel being counted 15. s. were in our money 450 l. all this money was given both for the floore and all the ground about it, which must needs bee very spacious for the Temple and all things pertaining to it.

Then an Altar being set up, David offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, and the Lord was entreated for the land and the Plague was stayed, 1 Chron. 21. 26, 27. he offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, and called upon the name of the Lord, and hee answered him by fire upon the Altar, and the Lord commanded the Angel to put up his sword into the sheath; all things being more fully set forth then before. Gods anger was pacified by sacrifice, which alwayes had reference to Christ, who is the true propitiation for our sinnes. Of Gods acceptance of this service hee gave a signe by fire from heaven, as also afterwards when Solomon sacrificed in the Temple, which he had built. And hereby this place was declared to bee the place, which God had chosen to have an house built for his service, as David gathered, 1 Chron. 22. 1. and was long before intimated, when Abraham was called in this place to offer up his sonne Isaac in sacrifice. Moreover, 1 Chron. 21. 28. it is added, When David saw that the Lord had answered him in the threshing floore of Ornan, hee sacrificed there. For the Tabernacle, &c. was in Gibeon. And David could not goe thither to inquire, for he feared the sword of the Angel. Hee used now this altar and place for sacrificing and offering more oblations, for he was so weakened through feare of the Angels sword, whom hee had seene, that hee was not thenceforth able to goe to Gibeon any more, so Lyra. But I thinke rather, that the meaning is, hee having begun upon the occasion before said to offer sacrifice here, and finding it by the miraculous coming downe of fire and by divine direction to bee the place which God had chosen, continued to offer in this place onely from thence forward, and went no more to Gibeon, which is also further confirmed, 1 Chron. 22. 1.

2

A COMMENTARY UPON
The first Book of the KINGS.

This Booke as Iunius noteth, containeth an historie of 118 yeares, wherein reigned Salomon 40. and foure Kings of Iudah, Rehoboam 17. Abijam 3. Asa 41. and Ichoshaphat 17. in whose times reigned 8 Kings of Israel, Ieroboam 21. Nadab 1. Baashah 23. Elah 1. Zimri 7. daies. Omri 11. Ahab 21. and with Omri sometime Tibni.

CHAP. I.

NOW King David waxed old, and they covered him with clothes, but he gat no heate. [1 Chron. 22. this being omitted and what else followeth in this chapter, it is shewed, how David provided for the building of the Lords house, and spake of the youth of Salomon his sonne and of the greatnesse of this worke, &c: for all related in that chapter and thenceforth to the end of 1 Chron. must needs be yeelded to have been done after the inauguration of Salomon to the Kingdome, because David speaketh of Salomon building the Temple, which was not made known to the people till after the said inauguration, the manner of which is set forth here. For although David had long before determined, and God had so appointed, that Salomon should reigne after him, yet hereby it appeareth, that the very Princes knew not of it, because Ioth and Abiathar went with Adonijah to make him King, as thinking that of right it belonged to him, as to *David*s eldest sonne then living, and not knowing any thing to the contrary.

To begin then with the history of this chapter, as being first in order, David is here said to have been old, viz. 70. as may be gathered from 2 Sam. 5. 4. 5. But touching his coldnes at this age, because it was extraordinary, divers conjecture diversly. The Rabbins say, that it was a punishment layd upon him, that no clothes could keepe him hot, because he once cut off the lap of *Saul*s garment. Tostatus, that he had the palse; some that this coldnesse came upon him, when he saw the Angel with his sword stretched over Ierusalem: others impute it to the losse of his blood in warre, and some to the old age of his parents, when he was begotten. But the true cause indeed was partly his great paines taken in his youth, and the hardship which he endured in body, when he fled from Saul, and lived sometime in one place, and sometime in another ten yeeres together, enduring the brunts of many warres; partly the trouble of his minde being often in great streights, and much perplexed for his childrens wickednesse; partly many sicknesses, as we may gather from divers of his Psalmes, all which together wasted and dried up his radical heat, whereupon this coldnesse ensued. But though he were cold in body, his understanding continued good still, as appeareth by his wisely ordering of every thing about the Temple, and the speeches made by him to his sonne Salomon and to his Princes before his death, although the coldnesse of old age is generally observed by the Physitians to be a duller of the wit, whereby they, that are very aged become foolish and doting. But as Martyr noteth, not onely David was kept from this, but also many others, who were very wise and judicious in age. Plato wrote at 80 yeares of age, and Isocrates at 95. and Pythagoras, Xenocrates, and Democritus, and Sophocles, likewise Themistocles in his old age grieved that he must dye, when he began to be wise.

V. 1.

Tostatus.
R. Samuel.
Lyra yeeldeth
3. of these reasons, his losse of blood, when in warre he received many wounds. 2. his feare at the sight of the angel. 3. his offence in cutting off his Lords garment in the cave.

V. 2, 3.

Hieronym.

Lyræ. Martyr.

V. 5.

V. 6.

P. Martyr.

V. 7.

Lyræ.

His servants seeing that no clothes could heat him, propounded another way that is, a young Virgin to be brought unto him to lye in his bosom, and so Abisnag a faire Virgin was brought unto him, and shee ministred unto him, &c. These his servants are generally held to be his Physitians, who being carefull of his good, would have this remedy provided against his extraordinary coldnesse. If it be demanded, whether it were lawfull? It is answered, that without doubt he took her to wife, for he had put away his concubines ever since Abshaloms defiling of them, and his wife Bathshebah and others, whom he had formerly taken, were probably too old to supply this his defect by lying with him. Yet Jerom holding it absurd to understand this to bee done according to the letter, expoundeth it altogether allegorically, of wisdom, which in his old age hee had, and the heat of zeal warming him, when his body was so cold. But both Lyræ, and Martyr and other Expositours confute this, because Adonijah afterwards desired this woman to wife. And it is added, the King knew her not, to shew that although she lay in his bosom and cherished him, yet nature being now spent, he had no carnall knowledge of her, but only he took her for his necessitie to wife, and this sheweth, that she was a true woman according to the letter. That he took her to wife is the opinion of all Expositours, but onely of Tostatus, who seemeth to be of another minde, but whether this fact be justifiable in David is doubted: because it was an injury to the woman, forasmuch as he was not now able to do the office of an husband. Martyr saith, that if she knowing the case consented, she was not injured, and it might be thought, that by physicall helps having her he might come to more heat and strength. Lastly, it was for the good of the kingdom.

Then Adonijah the son of Haggith advanced himself, and said, I will be king, and prepared him chariots and horsemen and 50. men to run before him. He trod in the very steps of Abshalom, and accordingly was soon cut off, as he was well worthy for his ambition. The thing that put him on to this ambition, was his fathers indulgence, who it is said never reprov'd him, v. 6. and his priority in age, for he was the eldest now living, being next to Abshalom, and beautifull as he. When Ely was thus indulgent to his sonnes, the Lord dealt more severely with him, but their wickednesse indeed was greater to the bringing of Gods service into contempt. But it was doubtlesse a sinne in David to wink at his sonnes wickednesse, for he could not be ignorant of his ambitious proceedings, although some think that he knew not of it, because v. 11. Nathan said to Bathshebah, Adonijah reigneth and David is ignorant of it. But although he knew not of that particular, it proveth not, that he was ignorant of his preparations of chariots and horsemen, &c. For although he came not abroad, it is most probable that some about him told him of it. Whereas some excuse David, although he knew of it, saying, that being his eldest son he might permit him this pomp, not suspecting to what it tended: for so soon as he heard of his usurping the kingdom, he opposed him. It is answered by Martyr, and others, that he should have called him in question about it, especially seeing that Abshalom had made the like preparations before to the same end. The assistants of Adonijah were chiefly Joab, and Abiathar; Joab the Captain of the Host took part with him, because he feared, if he stayed, till David appointed his successor in the Kingdom, it would go ill with him in respect of his great wickednesse against the will of the King in slaying Abner, Abshalom and Amasa, to prevent which he thought it his wisest way to provide for his own safetie by setting up another King, whose favour he might by this means make sure unto him. But on Gods part, he permitted it, that Joab at length might come to the punishment which he had deserved. Abiathar the high priest also took part with him, because, as the He brews say, since the time of Abshaloms conspiracie, the Lord had not given answer by him, wherefore he feared that he should be put down from the high-priesthood, if another King were made without him. But on Gods part, he permitted it, that his threatening against the family of Ely, of which he was, might be fulfilled; occasion being hereby taken to remove the priesthood from him to Zadok. Moreover they saw that David was now so feeble, that they thought he could make no resistance to their proceedings, and Solomon, if they knew of the Kings determination tion to make him King was so young, that they feared not him, he being now, as the Hebrews say but 12. years old. Yet by Gods providence there was a division amongst the great ones of the land, for Nathan the Prophet, and Zadok and Benaiah, and other mightie men of David were not for Adonijah with them, and so they were disappointed of their purpose, as hereafter is shewed.

And Adonijah sacrificed oxen and sheep, and other fat things by the stone of *Zohel*eth near to En Rogel, and he invited all his brethren the kings sons, and the men of Judah the kings servants; except Nathan, &c. and Solomon. Of En Rogel see before, 2 Sam. 17. 17. it was not farre from Ierusalem. Adonijah for the more prosperous beginning of his raigñ pretended pietie by sacrificing, but God abhorreth such sacrificing, and by feasting the people with him he sought to win the more love. But such as he suspected would not consent to his proceedings, he invited not unto it, as Zadok, Nathan, Benaiah, &c.

And Nathan said to Bathsheba *Solomon*s mother, &c. Here follow the means, whereby God overthrew all the preparations of ambitious Adonijah, and advanced Solomon the sooner to the Kingdom, which he had promised him. It was not by the means of men of might, but by Nathan a prophet and Bathsheba, a woman, weak instruments, and such as he and his companie doubtlesse contemned, accounting her no better then an adulteresse, and Solomon for whom she and the prophet stood, no better, then the son of one infamous for whoredom and unworthy to reign over them. But they knew well enough, that they did but kick against the pricks, in seeking to frustrate Gods determination, of which it appeareth, that they were not ignorant, because amongst all his brethren Adonijah left Solomon alone out, as a competitor of the kingdom, when, he invited them; for the appointing of Solomon to be King is expressly mentioned, 1 Chron. 22. 9. See here as Martyr observeth, how God by weak means confoundeth the mightie, and worketh for the accomplishment of his own will, and the more the wicked enemies of such as God loveth labour to hinder their advancement, by his over-ruling power their contrary endeavours are made to work for the hastening thereof. But what did Nathan say to Bathsheba? he counselled her to go in to the King, and to tell him of Adonijah his usurping the kingdome, and to urge him with his oath, whereby he had sworn unto her, that her son Solomon should be king after him. When David took this oath, it is no where said, but it is plain, that he did, for he acknowledgeth it v. 30. Of the Rabbins conceit hereupon see before, 2 Sam. 12. 24. The reason why Nathan was so carefull for Solomon, was because he knew it to be the will of God, that he should be king, and happily Bathsheba had told him of *David*s oath made unto her, and it is thought, that Solomon was by David committed to his tuition, that he might by the instructions of so holy a man be the better fitted to manage such weightie affairs, as he was destined unto. Pellican thinketh that he having fore-told unto the King, that Solomon, whom he was sent to call Iedidiah, should reign after him and build God an house, David the King thereupon making that oath, was now sent to remember him of these things, that he might do accordingly.

Bathsheba then going in to the King, after due reverence done speaks unto him, as Nathan had directed her, and hereupon Nathan also came in and seconded her, so as that the king sware again, that Solomon should reign. Then Bathsheba doing low reverence the second time prayed, that the king might live for ever, that is, as Pellican, in the world to come, for she saw that he could not live long in this; for although the everlasting life be but little spoken of in the old Testament, yet it is not to be doubted, but that the faithfull then had the hope thereof, as we now have.

Then the King commanded to call unto him Zadok, Nathan, and Benaiah, and he said, take the servants of your Lord, and set Solomon my sonne upon my mule, &c. By the servants of their Lord he meant the Cherethites and Pelethites, which were his guard, of whom Benaiah was Captain, 2 Sam. 8. 18. and therefore when they went according to *David*s direction to anoint Solomon King, it is said, Then went Zadok, Nathan, Benaiah, and the Cherethites and Pelethites, vers. 38. see the same phrase also, 2 Sam. 20. 7. The place, to which he would have them bring

V. 8.

V. 9.

V. 10.

Prov. 15. 8.

V. 11.

P. Martyr.
Note.

V. 12, 13.

Pellican.

V. 15.

V. 22, 23,
24, &c.

V. 32.

33.

Pellican.
The Call. calls it Siloah.

P. Martyr.

V. 38, 39.

Hieronym. epist. ad Vitalem.
1 Chron. 29. 1.

Tostatus.
Lyra.

Josephus.

Solomon to anoint him, was Gihon, and the same, saith Pellican, was also called Shiloh, where waters ran continually, and to this place he would have him brought to be anointed, to shew the perpetuities of his kingdom, as the waters there did run perpetually; and he must be anointed by the priest and the Prophet, as Samuel had before anointed Saul and David, both to shew the graces of the spirit, with which the king must be indued, and also that he should be subject and ready to hearken to the priests and prophets instructions, who could best inform him of the will of God. And he would have him to ride upon his own mule, and to be guarded by his servants to shew, that it was done by his authority, that all the people might take notice of it, and the more readily obey and follow him; for it was unlawfull for any man to ride upon the Kings mule, but onely for the King. And to the same end he would have the trumpet sounded, and lastly acclamations added, God save King Solomon; The grace of God which was needfull for him for the good of the kingdom, being thus desired by all. Martyr by his anointing in this place, where the waters come from the foot of mount Sion, and are said to run softly, understandeth the condition of a King to be set forth, he should govern mildly as much as may be. And for the anointing of Kings, he saith, it was a sacrament instituted of God, and when it was rightly used, hereby gifts were given, whereby Kings were the better enabled to their office. None were anointed, that we read of amongst the Jews before Saul, and after him David; but there had been no need, saith R. Kimbi, and Levi, that his son should have been anointed also, had it not been for Adonijah, the competitor of the kingdom, because the father was anointed not onely for himself, but for his posteritie, but this is onely their conceit.

According to the Kings directions they did; and Solomon was made King and sat upon David's throne. But of what age he then was, is not agreed amongst Expositours. The Hebrews, whom many follow, say that he was but 12. and to this Ierom seemeth to assent, because David said of him, that he was young and tender. And whereas it is objected, then he must have begotten Rehobobam at 10. or 11. years of age, because he was 40. when Solomon died; and Solomon by this account was at his death but 52. He answereth, that although in the common course of nature one cannot beget a childe so young, yet extraordinarily at some time it may be so done, when God will have it; as he saith in his time a Nurse was gotten with childe by a boy of 10. years old, whom shee lasciviously provoked unto it, for the discovering of her so great wickednes. Others yet hold, that Solomon was not so young, when he entred upon this royall dignity, but 18. or 20. years old: for Tostatus upon that speech of David to him, 1 King. 2. g. thou art a wise man, saith that Solomon was now 17. or 18. years old; Lyra that he was 20; some that he was 24. In the sacred history there is nothing said of his age, when he began to reign, or when he died, but onely that he reigned 40. years, and that in his old age, his wives turned his heart away so as that he served idols; which implieth, that he was an old man, before he died, and therefore certainly 60. at the least. And Josephus saith nothing of his age when he was made King, but most erroneously of his age, when he died, that he was 80. But we may well conjecture, that he could not be so little as 12. when he began his reign, although both Ierom held so, and Euseb. ex Enpolemo, Isidor. de vita sanctor. Ignatius Epist. ad Magnes. &c. for they all took it from the Rabbins, and did not so duly examine it: First, because, as was said before, other wise he could not have been said by his father to be a wise man, and one that of himself knew what was best to be done. 2. Because he was old some years before he died. 3. Because he begat Rehobobam 41. yeares before the end of his reign, which if it had been at 11. it could not bee without a miracle, and it agreed not with the discretion of his father to marry him so young, or with his sanctimony to be then so libidinous. Lastly, the course of the history from the time of his birth hitherto evinceth, that he was much above 12. For Amnon was hated of Absalom for the abuse offered to Thamar 2. years after his birth; then he slew him and fled and stayed at Geshur 3. yeares, after that he lived apart at Ierusalem 2. yeares, then by Joab being brought to David he must needs have have 2 yeares at the least for preparation before his rebellion; lastly his rebellion and being subdued, and the Kings returning again to Ierusalem could not be lesse then 1 yeare, which altogether make 10 yeares. After this followed Shebah his rebelling and being subdued and a famine of 3 yeares; then 4 battels and victories over the Philistines 4 yeares: after which, David being at rest, compiled a song unto God, and made great preparations for the temple in 2 yeares at the least; then the people were numbred and plagued; after all which he being old and cold, for a time his servants sought to heat him otherwise, but at length brought Abishag to him, and when he had kept in thus a year, Adonijah rebelled, and Solomon was set up against him, being by this computation full 20. whereas it is objected that he was young and tender, it is answered, he was so indeed, although of this age, in respect of that office, which he now came unto, and the weighty businesse to be done of building the Temple. When Solomon was anointed King, there being great shouting & rejoycing, and the sound of trumpets, Joab & they with Adonijah heard it; and enquiring the reason, and understanding, that David had made Solomon King, they were afraid, and fled every man to his own and left Adonijah, who also fled and laid hold upon the horns of the Altar. He that brought the newes to Adonijah and his company, was Jonathan the sonne of Abiathar, the same man that was used as an intelligencer before for David, 2 Sam. 17. 17. He was most probably left behind by his Father, if there were any occasion, to come after and certify; as he now did. Then Joab whom it concerned most to hearken after any tumult arising, because he was the generall, entertained Jonathan with flattering words saying, that he was a good man and brought good newes; wherein he spake, as he hoped, and would have had it, remembring also the good newes brought by him in times past unto David. But Jonathan denyed that hee came with good newes, and then he told all that had been done; whereupon they were so dismayed, that they fled, and Adonijah fled to Gibeah, for there the tabernacle was, and the altar, so taking sanctuary for feare of Solomon, in danger to be cut off; by whom he knew, that he was for his usurping of the Kingdome. This altar was not that of incense, to which the Priests onely might come: but the other which was for sacrifices, whereunto the people might come sometimes. Hee that being in danger fled hither was sometimes protected, as in a city of refuge: as we may gather, Exod. 21. 14. wherefore Adonijah, his case growing desperate, sought to this place, but in vain, had not Solomon the King in some other respect spared him; for he caused him to be brought from thence, and Joab afterwards who fled thither also and slew him, not fearing to doe so to a guilty person for the sanctimony of the place, seeing holy places were for the protection of such as offended unwittingly, but not otherwise: as hath been before shewed upon Exod. 21. 14. Adonijah in flying to Gods house in time of danger, but without benefit; doth not unaptly set forth such as come to God by prayer at such times, whom to serve they never regard at other times, but it is to be feared, that they all shall speed no better then he did and Joab. Solomon hearing where Adonijah was, sent to fetch him thence, and he requiring that the King would sweare unto him, that he would not slay him, Solomon promised by his messengers that if hee would shew himselfe a worthy man, there should not one haire of him fall to the ground; but contrariwise, if wickednesse were thenceforth found in him: for so it must be understood, because he desired saying, Let King Solomon sweare unto me this day; that is, say the Hebrewes, remitting what hath been passed before this day, that hee will not slay me for that. The new King was easily intreated, as being willing to begin his reign with the wing mercy, and promised, that not a haire of him should fall to the ground; that is, that he should not have the least hurt for his former ambition, so that hee restrained from all ambitious courses for time to come. And thus Adonijah was brought from the altar, not by force, but by perswasion; and came and did Homage to Solomon, the elder brother to the younger, as Iosephs elder brethren had worshipped him, the submission of the greatest in the world unto Christ, who was at the first neglected and contemned, (as Solomon had been) being herein typified. And hereby Martyr will have the Popes defection at the last figured out; when the

V. 41.

Lyra.

1 King. 2. 30.

Note.

V. 51.

P. Martyr.

V. 53.

The mystery.

trumpet of the Archangell shall sound, who hath usurped the Kingdome, and feasted with his flatterers and followers, not regarding Gods faithfull servants, but neglecting them, as hereticks, as Adoniah did Zadok, Nathan, and Benniah. Then Solomon said, goe to thine house, meaning, that he should thenceforth lead a private life, and not intermeddle with state matters, or should hold such pompe of horses and chariots, and men to run before him as formerly he had done.

CHAP. II.

Here is set forth first the death of David and his exhortation made to his son Solomon before his death. But before this and after Solomons Coronation, there are divers other memorable passages recorded. 1 Chron. 22. &c. which because they are wanting here, bee there supplied; as 1. His providing of workmen and materials for the building of the house of God, v. 2, 3, 4, 5. The chapter beginneth with these words, then David said, this is the house of the Lord and the altar of burnt offrings for Israel, and he commanded to gather together the strangers that were in the land of Israel, &c. To whom said he thus? doubtlesse to his Princes and Elders of the people assembled together after Solomons inauguration, that they might take notice of his succeeding his Father in the Kingdome and be obedient unto him, although this bee not expresse; for verse 6. hee called for Solomon and spake unto him, and v. 17. to the Princes, and ch. 23. 1, 2. it is expressly said, that he gathered together all the Princes, Priests, and Levites, after that he had made Solomon King; and they spake to him and to them, ch. 28. and 29. and that which is spoken in this chapter, could not be before he was made King, because nothing was known thereof, till the day that it was done. It was then most probably at that time, all the ceremonies about Solomons inauguration being ended, and many comming voluntarily upon this occasion to the Court, that David spake so unto them: after which, there was an assembling of all the Princes generally, as ch. 23. He being ascertained, as was before said, that the threshing floore of Arnanah was the place chosen of God, signified the same to all about him; and he called it the house of God because his house should be built there. Some think that this was spoken before Solomons Coronation, immediately after the signe given there by fire from heaven, and after he spake; as v. 5, 6. &c. and immediately prepared for the building of the Temple there, gathering together for this purpose workmen in abundance, even all the strangers in the land, of whom the Masons only are here spoken of, but chap. 28. 21. all manner of skilfull workmen, and 2 Chron. 2. 17. their number is set downe 150000. and 3000. who these strangers were, see 1 Kings 9. 20. 21. the children of the Amorites, Canaanites, and Perizzites, &c. whom the children of Israel could not cast out, a poore and contemptible sort of people, these were employed in the work of Gods house to figure out the despised Gentiles gathered together under the Gospell to make the spirituall Temple, none of the Jewes being set to this work, but made men of warre, Princes, Rulers of his Chariots, and Captaines, &c. And he prepared yron in abundance, and brasse without weight, to make the brazen sea and other vessels of brasse, and it is said to be without weight by an hyperbole, to shew the wonderfull great abundance thereof, and abundance of Cedar wood, and v. 5. it is said paravit omnes impensas, vulg. lat. yet 2 Chron. 2. 8. Solomon sends to Hiram for Cedar trees. Sol. Hugo saith, that it is meant, that David provided of all sorts of things, and mony to beare the charge of all, but Hebr. it is לרב copiose, as Iunius renders it, he prepared copiously; and v. 14. having spoken of timber that he had prepared, he saith, and thou shalt adde thereto: hereby it appeareth, that the number of Cedars used about the Temple was exceeding great, seeing when David had provided so many, Solomon yet had need to provide many more. And he would have the Temple built with Cedars, because it was a wood incorruptible, to shew the incorruption of the Church.

Then

1 Chron. 22. 2.
3, 4, 5.

The Mystery.
Lyr.

V. 3.

Hugo Cardin.

Iunius.

Then David said, Solomon my son is young and tender, &c. And he called Solomon his son and commanded him to build the house of God and said, that he had a purpose once to have done it, but was not permitted, because hee had shed much blood, &c. of which see 2 Sam. 7. 9. and then it was promised, that he should have a sonne, who should live in peace, and be therefore called Solomon, as is here remembered, v. 9. but there omitted; and that he should build him an house. And indeed nothing is there spoken of the foresaid reason, why David might not build, but it was left to be recorded here, yet it being fetcht from hence is there expounded. And he doth not only command him to build, but prayeth God to bee with him, and chargeth him to feare God and to keep his law and to governe righteously, and then he promisseth prosperity unto him, and biddeth him not to feare: whereby is intimated, that this is the chiefe thing, that every one should apply his mind unto, that he might be blessed of God, and not trust without this in any cost done to the honour of God, or most ample sacrifices; see Pf. 50. Mich. 6. 6. Esay 1. 12. Out of my poverty I have prepared 100000 talents of gold, and 1000000 talents of silver, and brasse, without weight; &c. For what use all this gold and silver, brasse and iron should serve; he further sheweth, *chap. 28. 14. viz. the gold to make vessels and candlesticks of gold, and the silver for vessels of silver; &c. and he gave the just weight for every particular thing, and the patterne and forme of the Temple, and all things about it; wherein he saith, that he had received direction in writing from the Lord, v. 19. Moreover unto this great treasure of gold and silver, he addeth, ch. 29. 3. 3000 talents of gold more, and 7000 talents of silver of his peculiar substance, and verse 2. all manner of precious stones and marble. And this hee calleth his peculiar substance, because the treasures spoken of before were long agoe dedicated out of the spoiles, which he had taken from divers nations, whom hee subdued, 2 Sam. 8. 11. 12. The gold, if wee reckon it by the talent of the sanctuary, which was 4500l. amounted to four hundred and fifty millions of pounds, the silver to three hundred seventy five millions of pounds, reckoning to a talent 375l. Thus much of the fore-dedicated gold and silver, and of his peculiar 135000l. in fine gold, and 2625000l. in silver. And whereas David saith, that out of his poverty he had given all this, Lyra saith it is spoken comparatively in respect of God, to whom it was dedicated, in comparison of whose inestimable rich treasures, all that the richest men have, is but poverty; or in respect of his poore beginning. Pellican, in respect of true spirituall riches of grace and glory; with which, if all the wealth in the world be compared, it is but poverty. Iosephus fearing that the report of such excessive treasures would never be credited by the heathen to whom he wrot, hath deducted the tenth part, whereby we may see how little he is to be credited. This wonderfull great treasure which David had now gathered together, sheweth how easily God can enrich those whom he pleaseth, to those that seek his Kingdome and the righteousnesse thereof, adding all other things in this world. Thou hast also many artificers, cutters of stone, and masons, skilfull in all arts, and in gold and silver, &c. So that Solomon having both materials and workmen, might now after his death without any delay set upon this great work, and perfect it. For he would have it, as God had directed him, both for matter and curious working, to excell all other buildings, that by the outward beauty thereof, the rude people might be drawne from the temples of Idols, and the high places to worship here.*

Then David exhorted the Princes of the people to help his son Solomon in this work, &c. Notwithstanding the great preparations which he had made, the work was so great and sumptuous, that he thought not all this sufficient for it, but required the Princes to aid Solomon with their cost, seeing it was for the honour of God, and the good of the whole nation. How they satisfied this his desire, and what they contributed, see ch. 29. 6. 7. And he omitted not to warne them also to feare God and to keep his lawes, as being the thing that would most conduce to their welfare.

Mystically by the temple is to be understood the Church of God, by the gold the governours, by the silver the preachers, who are most excellent, that make

V. 5.

V. 9.

V. 11, 12, 13.

Pellican.

V. 14.

H. B. Patriarchs travels.

Lyra.

Pellican.

Ioseph.

Note.

V. 15, 16.

Pellican.

V. 17.

The Mystery.
Lyra.

a silver found; by the brasse other meaner preachers; by the yron; such as protect and fight in the defence of the Church; by the Cedars which are high, such as lead a contemplative life, and by the stones, such as lead an active life, sustaining others; thus Lyra out of Greg.

V. 1. 2.

1 Chr. ch. 23. David growing nearer and nearer to his end, after the coronation of Solomon, having before spoken somewhat touching the intended building of an house for God, now causeth all the Princes, Priests, and Levites to be assembled together unto him, that he might appoint to every one his office about this house, and the things thereof; and that the Princes being before prepared might bring in their contributions toward this work, that every one knowing what he was to doe, might be ready to performe it: and so without delay after his death, this building might goe forwards. And first they who are named last, were numbred; viz. the Levites, and their offices distinguished; then the Priests, ch. 24. and lastly, the Princes; ch. 27. The Levites are said to be numbred from 30 yeares and upward, yet v. 24. and 27. from 20 yeares old. For the reconciling of which difference, some say that there was a fault in the writer, 30 being put for 20. some, that to these words from 30 yeares old and upward, is to be understood olim, in times past; but now by a new way of numbring, to which David was directed by divine inspiration, they were numbred from 20, as then from 30, Num. 4. 30. The Vul. lat. followed by Lyra and Hugo hath it in both places, from 20 yeares old and upwards. I doe not think it safe to yeild, that there was any corruption in the text, but rather the meaning is, that being numbred as was of old appointed from 30. their number was 38000 but now after the building of the temple, the labour of carrying the Ark from place to place being no more imposed upon them, to which they were thought unfit, before they attained to the age of 30, David appointed that they should hereafter be numbred from 20. and come in to helpe in this service. Of this number 24000

V. 3.
Pellican.

Sallianus.

V. 4.

Lyra.

Dionis. Caieran.
Tostatus.

Pellican.

Lyra.

Ioseph: antiq. l. 4.
c. 8.

were appointed to the ministry of the house of the Lord; 6000 to be Rulers and Iudges, 4000 doore-keepers, and 4000 singers. The service about the house of God, wherein these 24000 were imployed, was as Lyra hath it, the excoiating and washing of beasts for sacrifice, and divers other things; so likewise Dionis. and Caieran. But Tostatus better; they were to take the sacrifices to wash and bring them to the Preists, they were also to prepare floure, wine, oyle, salt, and frankincense, and to see that wood and water might never be wanting, when the Gibeonites had first hewed the wood and drawne the water, according to the office appointed unto them, and to be at hand to serve the Preists in their ministry, as they should require them. For the excoiating of beasts belonged properly to the Preists, and not unto the Levites; but when extraordinarily necessity required their help herein, as we may gather from 2 Chron. 29. 34. the Preists were few, so as that they could not excoiate the beasts, but the Levites helped them herein. Touching the 6000 Rulers and iudges, these Pellican will have to be as Rectours of Churches throughout the kingdome, instructours of the people in the lawes and ordinances of God, and some of them instructours of the junior Levites, and some as Iudges to resolve the right according to the law in divers cases: Lyra saith, that some will have the Rulers, or Prepositi, to be such as were set over the holy vessels or treasures, to keep them; and the Iudges teachers of the people: but according to others, they were both one. Viz. Teachers, and more probably the Porters were some of them keepers of the treasures of the temple, locking up and making fast the doores wherein they lay, and opening them as occasion served. Iosephus saith, that these Rulers and Iudges were the same, the first word setting forth the dignity, and the other the office; and they were joyned two to every Iudge in lesser causes, in every city of Israel; that by their assistance, they telling what the law of God was, hee might proceed in judgement rightly, which is not improbable, but withall it is to be understood, that they were teachers of the people in their Synagogues also. Touching the 4000 Porters, they were not only to watch and ward at the gates and doors of the temple, to keep unclean persons from comming in, and to open and shut them, but also, as was said before, to keep the treasures, holy vessels, end vestiments. And whereas so great numbers might seem too many, it is to be understood, that the Porters

Porters and others, that ministred about the temple, served there by course, some retiring home to their own houses, and others coming in their roomes continually, wherefore, v. 6. David is said to have distributed them by their courses.

Touching the 4000 singers, it is said that they should stand morning and evening to sing praises to God at the times of sacrificing; and on the Sabbaths and new Moones, &c. v. 30, 31, 32. and to play upon instruments of musick, ch. 25. 6. and they were divided by their courses, v. 9. which were 24. This singing and musick whilst the sacrifices were offering, was to stirre up mens minds to praise God, and to grace this part of Gods worship, which otherwise might seeme to have been but a butchering and dressing of meats. Over the shew-bread, and the sacrifice of fine flour and unleavened bread; and every weight and measure. The Vulg. lat. before these words hath it, But the Priests over the shew-bread, and v. 30. but the Levites to stand and sing. Which words Tostatus saith, were added for further explication; becaute to offer the shew-bread, belonged to the Priests. Levit. 21. 6. least it should be thought now contrary to the law to be otherwise appointed. But without this addition it may well be understood, that the Levites were to make this bread and to bring it to the Priest to be set before the Lord, and to take them away when new was to be set on; and to let that the fine flour were pure, and the just weight and measure: bringing it also to the Priest, that he might offer it. See chap. 9. 32. Here are 5 sorts of Levites set forth, Ministers, Judges and Rulers, Porters, Singers, and Priests, which served about the temple: in imitation whereof, there are in the Church of Rome. 1. Priests, that offer the bread and wine in the Sacrament. 2. Deacons, who carry it to the people. 3. Sub-deacons, who prepare it, by putting it into the holy vessels. 4. Acolithites, who make it. 5. Exorcists, who cast out evil spirits, as Judges do malefactours. 6. Doore-keepers, who keep out unbelievers and excommunicated persons out of the Church. 7. Readers. Thus Lyra; but for all these we read only in the new Testament, of Priests, and Deacons.

V. 29.

Tostatus.Lyra.

I CHRON. 24.

The Levites being distinguished, as before, ch. 23. into Ministers, Judges, Porters and Singers; and touching those that ministred about the sacrifices, vvho vv ere 24000, it being shewed only in generall, that they vv ere distinguished by their courses, v. 6. Now followveth the distinction of the Priests by their courses in particular, and of some principall Levites, vvho vv ere next in honour to the Priests in generall, and over all the rest. v. 20. The Priests were distinguished by Eleazar and Ishamar, the two sonnes of Aaron, the eldest of each family being from generation to generation, the cheifest of all the Priests of that family; and at this present Zadok was the cheifest of Eleazars, and Abiathar, or Abimelech (for one and the same man was set forth by both these names) of Ishamars. Now because there vv ere many more of the family of Eleazar then of Ishamar, that had 16 courses, and Ishamars 8. And the names of the cheife of every of these courses are set dovne, it being left to be understood, that all the other Priests served in their courses under them, a like number being assigned to each one in his course to assist him in the execution of his Priestly office, respect being still had, that they onely were appointed to serve in the courses of those of the family of Eleazar, that vv ere of his familie, and they in the courses of the family of Ishamar, that vv ere of his familie. Touching the meanes used to distinguish these courses vvho should have the first, vvho the second and third, &c. It is said to have been done by lots, the names of all the cheife of their houses being written in 24 severall pieces of paper and put in one vessell by themselves, and the courses being vvritten in 24 papers and put in another vessell, then they being shaken together, one was appointed to put one hand into one vessell and to draw a name vvithout seeing, and another into the other vessell, and to draw a course likewise; and looke what number was written upon it, that was his course, whose name was drawne together with it. And the Priests of the first course were to serve but one week at a time beginning at the Sabbath in the evening and continuing about the Temple till the evening of the next Sabbath; at what time they departed to their own houses, and the next course came and served likewise, and then the third and fourth; till that all the 24 having 1 Chr. 9. 25.

24 having

V. 20.

24 having served in their courses, they began again. And during the time of their service, there were chambers about the courts of the Lords house, wherein they lodged.

For the Levites next named, it is to be understood, that they were not of the common sort, but Princes as is expressly said of Iefias, Prince Iefias, v. 21. and they were of 2 families, Kobath, and Merari, and had their courses also by lot, v. 31. Of these it is not said, what the office was, but most probably they were cheife next unto the Preists of whom one was alwayes about the temple, as Prince of that course, which served them according to the order wherein they were placed.

CHAP. 25.

Here followeth the distinction of the Levites, who were to serve in the temple by singing and playing upon instruments of musick, the cheif fathers of whom were 3. Asaph, Iduthun, &c. Heman, who came of the three sons of Levi. Heman of Kobath, Asaph of Gershon, and Iduthun of Merari, as is most probable from 1 Chron. 6. 33, 34. &c. where Heman and Asaph are expressly said to be of Kobath & Gershon, and for Iduthun Ethan of Merari, whereby it seemeth that these were two names of one and the same man. Of these some were so famous for wisdom, that Ethan and Heman are spoken of in comparing the wisdom of Solomon. The Sons of these 3 were 24 according to which number the courses of the singing Levites were distinguished, as the Preists were, and these 24 were appointed one to be the cheife in one course, and another in another; so that the first course came in and went out with the first course of the Preists, and likewise the other in their order. The cheife of these did both direct the rest, and by the spirit composed some divine songs to be sung to the praise of God. The cheife are said to be 288. that is, 12 to every course of the 24. for 24 times 12 make 288. Now for the use of singing and musick in the temple, it was to stirre up mens minds to praise God, and when they did sing and play, a sacrifice of praise was offered.

CHAP. 26.

Next unto the singers the Porters are distinguished by the 4 gates of the temple, East, West, North, and South, and one Prince is appointed to be over one gate, and one over another, 4 over all, that kept the 4 gates by course, v. 14. For it is not to be doubted, but that the Porters being 4000. were distinguished into 24 courses as well as the singers and Preists, coming and going upon every Sabbath, as they did which is also expressed; 1 Chron. 9. 24. And therefore here are 24 named in the beginning of the chapter, which may well be understood to be the cheife of these 24 courses. And of Obed Edom, it is noted in speciall, that there were more of his house, then of any other; because the Lord blessed him, v. 5. wherein Expositours generally think, that respect is had to the time, when the Arke abode at his house, 2 Sam. 6. For then it is said God blessed Obed Edom, and all that he had, one way of which blessing was by encreasing his house, and giving him many children. And the 24 hitherto named were of the posterity of Kobath and Merari. Now besides these and their brethren of their courses there were some Levites of Gershon, that were set over the treasures of the temple, and the spoiles of the enemy, which were dedicated by David, Samuel, Saul, Abner, and Joab, &c. See before, ch. 9. 28. Lastly, for works without, they are named who were over the 6000 that were appointed to be rulers and Iudges of the people in matters concerning God and the King, that is, in teaching and instructing the people in their Synagogues, and sitting with the Iudges in particular cities to judge in criminall causes.

CHAP. 27.

After the distinction of the Preists and Levites, here followeth the distinction of the Princes, and first of those, that were over the men of warre, who are distinguished by the 12 months of the year, each one having under him 24000 valiant men; of these one with his 24000 attended upon the King one month, and the other another; so as that each Prince with his men was at liberty to return and attend upon their own domestick affairs eleven months in the year, except extraordinary occasion of warre required the service of them altogether. The end seemeth to be for the safety of the King, and the appeasing of tumults, if any should arise, and that so great a num-

1 Kings 4. 31.

V. 29.

a number being exercised in armes at the least one month in the year (for we must not think that they lived idly about the court in the month of their attendance, but were exercised in military discipline) the King might never be unprovided of a sufficient Army upon short warning to fight against his enemies. And by this meanes it is not unlikely, that Solomon came to enjoy so peaceable a reigne all his dayes, there being no enemy, that durst stirre against him, who was continually so well provided of men and munition to quell his proudest enemies. And whatsoever King shall take the same course, it is not to be doubted, but with Gods help he should have a very safe kingdome.

Then the Princes are named, who were over the severall tribes, there being of each tribe one, but over the Levites and Preists, two and two, over the two halfe tribes of Manasseh, because of their separated dwellings.

But David numbred not them that were under 20 years, because the Lord had said, that he would multiply the Israelites, as the starres of heaven. Ioab had begun to number, but he finished it not &c.

It was said before that the Levites were numbred from 20 years old and upward. Now in speaking of others that were of the other tribes & of the numbers that were under the 12. Princes of Davids Armies, because nothing hath bin said hitherto from whatage they were numbred, that is here inserted, that according to the law, Numb. 1. 3. they also were numbred from 20 years old and upward, but not under; a generall reason being yeilded, why they under 20 were not reckoned from Gen. 15. viz. the promise of God to Abraham that his children should be as the stars in multitude, that is, innumerable; if all without exception of any age should be numbred, the numbers would be so great, as that it would exceed all count. Wherefore to attempt a numbring of them thus, could not but be a great sin, both decause it was against the law of God, and a presuming to goe about the disproving of that which God had so confidently affirmed, who most probably to prevent it, had limited the age from which at any time they might be numbred. Thus much for Davids not numbring of any under 20. now it is further added, that Ioab had begun to number by Davids command, and finished it not, because wrath therefore fell upon Israel; it being meant, that although David had been most cautelous, and his Captain Ioab not to number, but according to the law; yet when this was done, God sent a plague of pestilence, ch. 21 whereby it came to passe, that neither then the numbers were perfected, nor now when the number of all the Levites was taken, durst they adventure to number all Israel also for feare of Gods wrath again to break out against them; and therefore the sinne of the children of Israel is not set downe as of Levi here; and this was the cause of commemorating this thing in this place.

Now besides the Princes of the tribes before mentioned, there were others also set over the goods and chattels of the King, as over his treasures in Zion and Ierusalem. 2. In the villages, fields, cities, and towers. 3. Over his husbandry. 4. His vineyards. 5. His wines. 6. Over his olives and figges. 7. His oyles. 8. His heards. 9. His Oxen. 10. His Cammels; over which was an Ishmaelite, because the Ishmaelites had most skill about these. 11. His asses. 12. His sheep, over which was an Agaren, one of that nation, which used to dwell in tents, which might be removed from place to place.

Lastly, his Counsellours are named, whereof two are said to have been with the Kings sonnes; that is, according to the Hebrèwes, to instruct them, then Achitophal is named, into whose place, when he had hanged himselfe, Benaiah came, and Ioab was generall of all the Armies. Whereby it appeareth, not onely what a well ordered common wealth this was, but well also the Kings peculiar estate was ordered and managed.

CHAP. 28.

The numbring of the Princes, Preists and Levites, being ended, here followeth the oration which David made unto them standing up, that he might be the better heard. And herein he sheweth what his intent was about building an house to the Lord, and how he had prepared; but God had appointed Salomon his son to do this great work and denied it unto him, as sometime Moses was denied to enter into the

V. 16.

V. 23.

V. 25.

Lyra.

V. 32.

V. 4, 5, 6. the land of Canaan, which he much desired; and Ioshuah was set up to lead the people in thither. Some think that his rising up was from his throne; but according to other more probably it was from his bed, and he called the house which he would have built, the house for the Arke, and his footstool, that is, the mercy seat which was, as it were, the seat of God. Concerning his intent, and the Lords holding him from building, see before, ch. 22. 7, 8. And to make them the more willing to submit themselves to Solomon, as their King, hee commemorateth 1. Gods electing of the tribe of Judah before all others. 2. Of his Fathers house before all the families in Judah. 3. Of him before any other in that house. 4. Of Solomon before all his other sonnes, together with Gods speech touching Solomon, he shall build me an house, and I will be to him a Father, and I will establish his throne for ever, if he continueth stedfast in my precepts; &c. whereupon he exhorteth both them and Solomon his sonne so to do, threatening him, if he did otherwise, that God would reject him for ever, which is not to be understood of reprobating him to perish in hell for ever, because 2 Sam. 7. 14. 15. he had promised if he sinned against him, to correct him; but not take his mercy from him for ever: but what should be done for the continuing of the kingdome to his posterity, should not be out of respect unto him, but unto David; with whom he had made a covenant unalterable, and upon him there should remain a blot for ever; shewing Gods estranging of his fatherly affection from him, when for his sinnes 10 tribes should be rent away from his heires, and so his kingdome should be irreparably diminished unto them for ever.

V. 11.

Pellican.

Lyra.

Cajetan.

Tostatus.

Then David gave unto Solomon the pattern of the Porch and Temple, &c. saying, that all came written to him with the hand of the Lord, which according to some Hebrewes, is to be understood, saith Pellican, by the direction of Samuel, by others, of Nathan the Prophet; Lyra saith, that it may be he had all revealed unto him by God. Cajetan, that these things were by God written in his mind, and not in a book; but he described them by writing unto Solomon for his direction. Tostatus contrarily that he had them delivered unto him by God ready written, as Moses had the commandments. That of Cajetan seemeth more probable, because v. 12. it is said, which David thought in his heart, so that Gods writing of this form was in his mind by internall revelation. And David spake thus to Solomon, that he might not adventure to varie from this pattern, and to commend the fabrick as being of Gods devising, and not of mans; and he might not feare to goe about this great work, to the devising of the doing whereof rightly, all the wit of man would not suffice, because the platforme was set by God himselfe in every thing.

CHAP. 29.

V. 1.

And David spake to all the congregation, &c. Happily the congregation being awhile dissolved, and then meeting againe, because the Kings strength would not suffice to say any more at that time, he spake again in commending the building of the temple unto them, setting forth the greatnesse of the work, as whereunto all that he had hitherto spoken of would not suffice. Wherefore he both addeth 3000 talents of most pure gold, and 7000 talents of silver to cover and guild over the wals of the most holy place, and exhorteth the Princes to a liberall contribution. The reason, why he would have them also to contribute, when as he alone had provided all things sufficiently, was according to some, that their treasures being exhaust, they might be the lesse able to rebell against Solomon, if any of them were so minded, but this had been to make a gaine of godlinesse; a better reason therefore hath been already yeilded, ch. 22. 17. and it is to be noted, that in exhorting them to a liberal contribution, he useth the phrase of filling their hands and offering, which used to be spoken of sacrificing, to shew that it was a sacrifice most acceptable unto God to give of their goods to this work.

V. 6.

Then the Princes and Nobles, &c. offered willingly 5000. talents of gold, and 10000. drachmaes, whereof 12000. saith Iunius, make a talent, and of silver 10000. talents, &c. that is, they set down each man so much to be given, as together amounted to these sums to be afterwards gathered by collectors appointed by the King. All which if it be compared with *David*s gifts Ch. 22. 14. is nothing, for he gave 100000. talents of gold, and 1000000. of silver. Then

Then David seeing their cheerfulnesse in offering, blessed God therefore, and acknowledged all, which he and they had offered, to come from God, beseeching him to continue this minde in them, as knowing the mutability of men; and lastly, he prayeth for Solomon his sonne, that God would give him a perfect heart, that he might do all things commanded, and having exhorted them to blesse God, likewise they did it by bowing themselves, and then bowing to the King they gave him thanks for all the benefits, which they had enjoyed under his government; although Innus will have their worshipping of the King to be understood of Solomon.

Then the day following in token of their thankfulnesse to God, they sacrificed 1000. bullocks, 1000. rams, and 1000. lambs, and they feasted together and made and anointed Solomon King the second time. The sacrifices, saith Ioseph. were holocausts, & after these ended were many thousands more slain for peace-offerings, wherewith the people feasted, but because no more are here spoken of, it is rather to be thought, that some of these only were holocausts & the rest peace-offerings, for we never read of so many beasts, or near so many, wholly burnt at one time, in any age. When Solomon sacrificed afterwards in Gibeon, a most ample sacrifice, he offered but 1000 burnt offerings, and Hezekiah but 70. Bullockes, 100. Rams and 200. Lambs. And now they anointed not only Solomon King, but also Zadok for Priest, that is, high Priest in the room of Abiathar, who had conspired with Adonijah: and thus the word of the Lord against Ely's family began to be fulfilled; how the Priest was anointed, see Levit. 8.

And all the Princes and sonnes of the King gave their hand to Solomon, &c. ] that is, sware fidelity unto him, and this was the cause why he was anointed for King the second time, that it being done by the consent of all the Princes, he might the more peaceably reign over them, and peace being thus settled, he might the better go on in building the temple: for when he was anointed before, they were divided. For those that anointed him, because Zadok the Priest and Nathan the Prophet did it before, it is not to be doubted, but that they anointed him now again. And here Iosephus bringeth in David speaking again to his sonnes, and exhorting them to be obedient to Solomon, and not to envie him, although a younger brother, because God had chosen him to be King, as he did before himself, before his brethren, who were elder, yet none of them envied him this honour.

Here the Author of the Chronicles hasteneth to set forth the death of David, and how long he had reigned over Israel and Iudah, but because 1 King. 2. from which we have hitherto digressed, doth more fully declare his death, and speeches used before it to his sonne Solomon, let us now look back to the said 1 King. 2. 1.

When the dayes of David drew near, that he should die, he commanded his sonne Solomon, saying, &c. ] The charge, which he gave him, was to keep Gods laws, that his throne might be established, to which effect he was brought in speaking before, 1 Chron. 28. 9. and 1 Chron. 22. 12, 13. Onely here is a charge added, first touching Ioab, v. 5.

Then knowest, saith he, what he did unto me, and to the two Captains of Israel, Abner and Amasa, &c. ] The Hebrews, saith Pellican, think by that, which he did unto him, was meant the shewing of his letters to others, which he wrote for the bringing of Vriah to his death, which was greatly to his disgrace, so that he was not faithfull to him, and how treacherously he slew Abner and Amasa, when he pretended friendship, was notoriously known. Wherefore David spake of him, as a man, that ought not to be suffered to live, because, if he were suffered, he might unawares slay Solomon also, and thus interrupt his peaceable reign. The conceit of the Rabbins is uncertain; but that he disobeyed David's expresse charge about Absalom, and imperiously threatned him to cause him to come forth and to cease mourning when he had slain Absalom, is certain; for which his disloyaltie to his sovereign, he was worthy to die. Theodoret also addeth, for his taking part with Adonijah, whom David could not be without all fear, that he would seek to set up again, and so to make a division in the Kingdom. And the rather, because he being privie to David's dealing with Vriah, that he might obtain Bashshebab, of

V. 10.

V. 21.

Iosephus.1 Ki 8. 3.
2 Chron. 29.

V. 24.

Lyra.
Comest.
Tostatus.Iosephus.

V. 26.

1 King. 2. 1.

V. 5.

Pellican.Theod.

whom Solomon came, never loved Solomon, as thinking him unworthy to reign for his scandalous birth. Whereas David did not himself execute justice against Iob before, it seemeth to have been, because Iob being Captain of the Host had been hitherto too powerfull; but now he being aged, and Iobaiadab being of great power, by reason that he was over the Cherethites and Pelethites, and Iobaiadab's power being weakened by the Armies falling from him, as it seemeth, because he fled to the horns of the Altar and not to his souldiers, David wisely thought it a fit time to execute justice upon him, which had been hitherto deferred.

V. 7.

1 Sam. 17.

But to the sonnes of Barzillai shew kindnesse, &c. ] Because it is the part of a good King to be no lesse carefull to shew thankfulness to such, as deserve well of him, then to punish evill doers, David provideth this for the requital of Barzillai: what he did for Maachir and Zob, who also shewed him the like kindnesse, is not said; what is to be thought hereof, see 2 Sam. 19. 40.

V. 8.

Pellican.

Thou hast also with thee Shimei, &c. ] How David could without prejudice to his oath appoint Solomon his son to provide, that he might not come in peace to his grave, see 2 Sam. 19. 23. And Davids oath bound him no longer then he lived; his successour in the kingdome was free, notwithstanding this oath to do justice upon him according to his discretion. Moreover David doubtlesse still perceived, that he was ill-affected to his house, and adhered to the house of Saul, and so might afterwards become troublesome to the State, wherefore he justly committed him to be dealt withall by Solomon according to his wisdom.

V. 10.

Chron. 29. 28.

Isidor.

Josephus l. 7.

Then David slept with his fathers; &c. and the time that he reigned over Israel was 40 years, &c. ] Of these times of his reign and his age, when he began to reign and when he died, see before upon 2 Sam. 5. 5. and 2 King. 1. 1. For the place of his buriall it is said to be in his own city, that is, not Bethlehem, as some have thought, but Zion, where the Kings his successours might afterwards be buried also. Josephus saith, that his sonne Solomon buried him magnificently in Ierusalem; and that into his Sepulchre were put very great riches: for out of it 3000. years after Hyrcanus took 3000. talents to give to Antiochus to remove his siege; and after that Herod took out much money out of another Cell. And Benjamin a Jew in his Itinerary telleth of two workmen, who digging up the stones of an old wall espied a den, and entering into it, saw a Pallace with pillars of marble and a table of silver before it with a scepter and crown of gold upon it, but when they attempted to go into that pallace, they were smitten with a whirlwinde down dead, and having lien so till night they were revived again and then heard a voice saying, arise and go out of this place. Wherefore that hole was by the command of the Patriark stopp'd up again, none daring to enter into it any more. And here attend of David; who many wayes was a figure of Christ; first in his title Iudah and city Bethlehem. 2 In his favour, for Christ also was comely, vox suavis & factus decorus. 3 He chased away the evill spirit from Saul, killed a Lion and a Bear, so Christ cast out devils and destroyed their power. 4 He lived obscurely 30. years as Christ did. 5 He slew Goliath not by force of armes but with a sling. 6 His brethren envied him and Saul sought to slay him. 7 He having given a dowry of 100. fore-skins for Mirab had her not, but Michol; so Christ had not a Spouse of the Jewish Church but of the Gentiles. 8 David was thrice anointed King, so Christ had a three-fold right to reign; first, as God; second, as Davids successour in his love; third, because as God and man all power was given unto him. 9 He ordered the Priests and Levites, so Christ the Apostles. 10 He prepared matter for the Temple, &c.

Bern. serm.

V. 12.

Pellican.

Then Solomon sat upon the Throne of David his father; and his Kingdom was greatly confirmed. ] That is, after the slaughter of three Rebels hereafter spoken of, viz. Iob, Adonijah, and Shimei; for although they durst yet attempt nothing; yet afterwards some stir might have been made by them, but now were prevented.

V. 13.

And Adonijah the sonne of Haggish came to Bathshebah the mother of Solomon; &c. ] Here is shewed upon what occasion Adonijah the competitor of the Kingdome was cut off, and immediately after Iob, and Abiathar put down from the High-Priesthood. Adonijah as Expositours generally think, by their counsell sought to have Abiathar to wife, who was wife to his father David, which was both both contrary to the law of God, and as Pellican hath it, it was not lawfull for any in that Common-wealth to marry her, that had been the wife of a King, unless he himself were a King. Wherefore Adonijah in seeking this, sought to come as near to the kingdom, as he could, and having the chief captain Joab and the chief Priest Abiathar on his side, he was not without hope by this means to attain unto it, at the least his ambitious mind might be fed with such a conceit. This Solomon through his wisdom saw into, but his mother not; but when by his speech she perceived it, most probably she was content to have her request denied. Some call in question Solomon's justice for putting Adonijah to death upon this occasion, and that without being first tried, as Theodoret and Procopius; and Cajetan saith, that he knoweth not how it may be excused, and that it seemeth to have been done unjustly, seeing no treason against the King did evidently appear herein. But Lyra and Pellican and others, justifie Solomon in this fact, because he knew by his wisdom, that he went about thus to make a way to the kingdom, and in such evident cases it had been the manner of David before, without further proceedings to give sentence immediately against offenders; as against him, that brought him Saul's crown, and against Rechab and Baanah. And Adonijah his former ambitious causing of himself to be made King made it plain, that he had still the same minde within him, for which it was just with Solomon now to cut him off, although he had spared him hitherto, seeing it was but upon condition, if he did shew himselfe worthy.

Ch. 1. 52.

And to Abiathar the Priest, the King said, go to Anathoth thy field, for thou art worthy to die, &c. ] Anathoth was a city of the sonnes of Aaron, Iosb. 21. 18. here the family of Abiathar dwelt, and to this place he was now confined, and not permitted any more to remain or to come to the city of David; that being removed from the Court, there might not be any danger after wards of his conspiring against the King any more. In that he was thus censured at this time, it appeareth, that he was guilty of a second conspiracy with Adonijah, as also Joab, whose judgement followeth next. God suffered them both to fall again, that Solomon might have just occasion of proceeding against them; both that the word of God against Ely's family might be fulfilled; as is noted in the next words, v. 27. and so great wickednesses as Joab had formerly committed might not go unpunished. Here some make a question, how the King, could censure the high-Priest, seeing he was not subject unto him? Tostatus answereth, that under the old Testament he was subject, because the spirituall and temporall powers were not then distinguished. But Sallianus according to Theodoret, that the ordinance of God did intervene, of which Solomon was onely the executer; and it is probable saith Sallianus, that it was done with the consent of Zadok, for in the case of life and death, the Priest onely hath power to judge of the Priest, and to punish him; because Pashur the chief Priest committed Jeremiah to prison, thus he. But let every soul be subject to the higher powers, and let these powers be described by bearing the sword, as Rom. 13. and then this question falleth utterly to the ground; not onely temporall but spirituall persons, have been and now are subject to the King: and if the chief Priest had power over Jeremiah to commit him, it was but a power derived from the King, as they that have commissions from him in our land have power.

When Joab heard this, he fled to the Tabernacle of the Lord, and took hold of the horns of the Altar, &c. ] Because he knew himself to be guilty of the same conspiracy with Adonijah and Abiathar, he, hearing how the King had dealt with them, feared his own life and therefore took Sanctuary as Adonijah had done before, ch. 1. 50. where I have shewed, who were to be protected there and who not. About the former words of this verse, there is a difference from the Hebrew in the vulgar Latin. For whereas it is Hebr. The report came to Joab, for he had gone after Adonijah, although he went not after Abshalom. The vulgar Latin hath it, A messenger came to Solomon, that Joab went after Adonijah, but not after Solomon; thus in the translation followed by Lyra: but in others it is corrected, in the last place there being Abshalom for Solomon. But it was not Solomon, that heard now of Joab's conspiring with Adonijah, for he knew that long before, but Joab heard

Pellican.

Theodor.
Procopius.
Cajetan.
Lyra.
Pellican.

V. 26.

Tostatus.

Sallianus.
Theodoret.

Jer. 20.

V. 18.

what Solomon had done to the man, that he sought to advance, plotting now the second time for him, and finding by his proceedings against Abiathar, that it was not hidden from Solomon, he despaired of all favour, because he thought, that the King would easily gather, that his heart was quite estranged from him, seeing that in Dauids time, when Abfalom sought to be King he would not take part with him but slew him; but now Adonijah seeking the kingdom and to put down Solomon, not once but twice, he conspired both these times with him.

V. 29.

Lyra.

And when it was told King Solomon, that Ioab was fled to the Tabernacle, &c. Solomon sent Benaiah, saying, fall upon him, &c. ] Here by anticipation is set forth, what Solomon lastly commanded Benaiah to do. For first, as is shewed in the next words, he went to Ioab and said, thus saith the King, come forth; and when he refused, the King being certified bad slay him there. Lyra saith, that Rab. Solomon yeildeth this reason, why Benaiah slew him not at the first: viz. Because Ioab said unto him, that when he had slain Abner, David cursed him to suffer by the Leprosie, the Gout in his feet, and the want of bread; wherefore if now he were punished by death, it would be unjust, unless Solomon would take these curses upon himself and his posterity. Then Benaiah returning this answer to the King, he took these curses upon him, and sent again and slew Ioab there; that is, as is most probable, being taken away by violence from the Altar, as is commanded, Exod. 21. 14. and accordingly, he saith, it fell out: for Veziah had the Leprosie, Asa the Gout in his feet, and Hezekiah being besieged, wanted bread. But this is so vain, that it is not worth the naming; for those Kings were thus punished for other faults; and Ioab deserved to die also for slaying Amasa: and it cannot be imagined that Solomon would take curses upon himself. Lastly, David had given Solomon a charge to slay Ioab: therefore it is not to be doubted, but justly, seeing that charge came from so holy a King. Of all Expositours, Pellican onely justifies Ioab to have been a most faithfull servant to David, and seemeth to take it, as a point of ingratitude in David towards him to appoint him to be slain; by his example warning all Courtiers of their uncertain condition. But Ioab certainly now received according to his deserts for his bloud-shed and faction, which must not go unpunished. Whereas it is said, v. 34. that he was buried in his own house in the desert, the Hebrews say that this house was an Hospitall, which he built in the way for the harbouring of poor passengers; and because he did such a deed of charity, they gather that although he was punished in this world, yet his soul was saved. But as P. Martyr saith, of this we cannot judge, because the Scripture saith nothing of it, and therefore it is to be left unto God. For his house in the desert he noteth out of Kimbi, that it is not onely called a desert, which is uninhabited, but also which is not tilled but used for forrests and pastures, and in such a place most probably Ioab had an house, where he kept cattle.

Pellican.

P. Martyr.

V. 35.

Abiathar being put down from the high-Priesthood, and Ioab slain, Zadok is put into the place of the one, and Benaiah of the other. Of his commendation that was now made high Priest see before, 1 Sam. 2. 35. where he who should be advanced thus in Ely's stead is described, but not named.

V. 36.

Then the King sent and called Shimei, and said unto him, build thee an house in Jerusalem, and dwell there, and go not out, for the day that thou goest out & passest the brook Kedron, thou shalt surely dye. ] Shimei was the third man, touching whom David gave a charge unto Solomon for his cursing and railing upon him, when he fled from Abfalom, not to suffer him to come to the grave in peace. But because he could not justly slay him for that, seeing David had promised him that he should not die, the wise King beginneth with him, as reason required, by confining him to Jerusalem, and restraining him from going to his own city Bahurim, to come unto which a man must go over the Brook Kedron; because if he were permitted to dwell amongst those of his own tribe of Benjamin, there might be some danger of his exciting to rebellion, forso much as he had formerly declared himself to be ill-affectd to the house of David, which danger would be avoided by keeping him to Jerusalem. The proposition of the King Shimei liked well, as one that feared that that he should have been dealt worse withall, and therefore, as it appeareth afterwards, this decree was confirmed by oath, Shimei approving it. And so he came and dwelt in Jerusalem three yeares without going forth. But after this, his servants running away from him, and he hearing that they were in Gath, persued them thither, and returning suffered death therefore. But forsomuch as the brook Kedron lay eastward from the city and Gath west, how could Shimei be condemned to dye, seeing he went not over contrary to the Kings charge? Ans. The meaning was not precisely, that he should not passe over that brook onely, but no way else go out of the city: and he was expressly commanded, dwell in Jerusalem and go not out either hither or thither, and Kedron onely was mentioned as the way, that he would most probably go, because his lands and possessions lay in Bahurim, and this was the way thither. Thus by a singular providence it was brought about, that Shimei did bear the punishment of his wickednesse at the last, although he escaped long, and so shall all the wicked.

CHAP. III.

IN the last verse of the former chapter, having said, that the kingdom was established to Solomon after the death of Ioab, Adonijah, and Shimei, and the putting down of Abiathar from the high Priesthood, so that no enemies now remained to the endangering of his estate; here it is added, that he sought further to establish his kingdom by contracting affinity with Pharaoh, a mighty neighbour king, by marrying his daughter. He was sure faith Pellican, by the promises of God, that his kingdom should stand firm, yet humane means were not to be neglected, and without doubt he being so zealously affected to the true God, did not take her but to instruct and convert her. And Martyr saith, that Expositours agree, that a covenant of her embracing the true religion did intervene, and so she was a type of a Church to be gathered out of the Gentiles to become the spouse of Christ: yet entering upon a long dispute, whether a marriage may be made betwixt those, that are of divers religions, and having brought reasons pro and contra, he concludeth, that Solomon had done better, if he had not married an Egyptian daughter, because Pharaoh King of Egypt was not better then Abah, with whose daughter yet when Ioram the sonne of Jehoshaphat married, it was reprov'd, and he was thereby corrupted; and such kinde of marriages are rather snares then marriages. In his dispute, he handleth two questions; first, whether a beleever may marry with an infidell? Secondly, whether one that holds the true faith with an heretic? To the first he saith, that infidels are either of Canaan or of other nations: with the daughters of Canaan, no marriages might be made for fear of being corrupted, Exod. 23. Deut. 7. and ch. 12. and because they all were adjudged to destruction without sparing any, for their great abominations. But with the daughters of other nations, some circumstances observed they might sometime marry, as when one was in love with a fair woman taken captive, she having first her hair shaved, &c. by deforming her thus, if it might be, the heat of his love being cooled towards her. And with the Ammonites or Moabites in the tenth generation, with the Edomites and Egyptians in the third. Yet because we reade of Salmon marrying Rahab a Canaanite, and Boaz Ruth a Moabite, and David the daughter of the King of Geshur, he determineth, that if any heathen woman did turn and embrace the true religion, she might by a particular dispensation be taken to wife; otherwise it was to yoke an ox and an asse together, which was unlawfull. Cyprian lamented this detestable vice in Christians, saying, that the Members of Christ were thus prostituted to the Gentiles. And Jerom, that thus Christian parents did prostitute their members to idels; and that Christian women were thus made ribs of the devil. Ambrose bringeth two arguments against these marriages; first, because the married should receive their blessing under the sacred otall veil, which, if one were heathen, they could not do. Secondly, because they should often-

V. 1.
Pellican.P. Martyr.Deut. 21. 11.Deut. 23. 3.
V. 7.Cyprian Epist.
de lapsis.
Hieron. contra Iovin. l. 1. 1.
Ambros. epist. ad
Vigilius.

Lib. de Abrah.
cap. 9.
Tertull. de corona militis.

Iudg. 14. 4.
Lyra.

V. 2.

I. nius.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

Pellian.

oftentimes pray together, and therefore he affirmeth that it is no marriage, which is against the decree of God. Tertullian against such marriages alledgeth the saying of the Apostle, let her marry in the Lord, and affirmeth them to be nullities, and therefore that they who marry so, are guilty of whoredome. Moreover he saith, that no good subject will be familiar with his Kings enemy, therefore the enemy of God is not to be placed in ones bosome. And by the old law a servant might not marry without the consent of his master, and if any woman married a servant, she came hereby into the same condition to be his servant also; likewise christians may not marry but according to their Lords will, and if they do with those of another religion, who are the devils servants, they are hereby made the devils servants also. In other things the saying is, tu tibi sume parem, therefore in marrying it should be done like wise. For the second Councilium Agathense forbade not onely marrying with infidels, but also with Hereticks; Likewise Councilium Urbanense & Laodicense, and Tit. 3. 10. it is said, Avoid an heretick after one or two admonitions, and Iob. 4. the Jews meddled not with the Samaritans. Thus farre Martyr. But I do think with the common stream of interpreters, that Solomon offended not in this marriage; both because he is commended here v. 3. for walking in the statutes of God, and Psal. 45. Pharaohs daughter is set forth, as a type of the Church, and in the song of Solomon; wherefore she did doubtlesse embrace the true religion, and the motion to take her to wife came of God, as before it is said of Solomon taking a Philistinians daughter. Nicholaus de Lyra justifying this marriage of Solomon, answereth these objections. First, that an Hebrew might not marry with one of another nation, saying, that this is indeed to be understood of all strange nations, and not of the Canaanites onely; because Exra 10. he caused them that had married so, to put away their wives. But this was the difference between the Canaanites and those of other nations, these might be taken if they left their superstition, those not only in this case, but upon some other singular cause added to this, as Rahab was taken by Salmon to wife, because she had so well merited of the Hebrews by saving their spies. Secondly, that Solomon is blamed for loving women of other nations, ch. 11. 1. and in particular Pharaohs daughter, saying, that this is not a thing recited there by way of reproofe, but his marrying strangers, that turned him to idolatry: shee being onely reckoned up first, because his love was chiefly to her; and therefore when it is said, v. 8. that he built abominations to all his strange wives, it is not to be understood without exception, for it was onely so such, as offered incense to idols, as is there expressed; and therefore Pharaohs daughter being before converted, was none of them.

Only the people sacrificed in high places, because the house was not yet built in the name of the Lord. That is, saith Iunius, in that at Gibeon, the reason whereof is rendered; 2 Chron. 1. 3. and in Zion where the Ark was, v. 17. For Solomon loved the Lord, v. 3. wherefore he would not suffer the people to sacrifice elsewhere, but in the places where David his Father had sacrificed. Lyra contrarywise following the vulg. lat. but the people sacrificed in the high places, v. 3. but Solomon loved the Lord, saith, that this is mentioned as a fault in Solomon, wherein he came short of David: for although it was lawfull till the building of the Temple; yet he should rather have followed the example of David in restraining the sacrifices onely to the threshing floore of Arannah in Zion, where the Ark was; seeing God had shewed unto David that this was the place which he had chosen; P. Martyr agreeth with Lyra, holding that they sacrificed in any high place, and not only where the Ark and Tabernacle were, which yet he denieth not to have been lawfull before the building of the Temple. Pellian agreeth with Iunius, and I with them, that nothing is here spoken to detract from Solomon, for he is immediately commended for his love to the Lord, and said to have walked in all the precepts of David, except his sacrificing in the high place, which is not mentioned as a fault in him, but because in this particular he varied from him, who after he had begun in the threshing floore of Arannah, never sacrificed any where else. For to Gibeon where the Tabernacle of Moses was, and the Altar, Solomon came purposely in greatest devotion, to honour God, and God shewed how well he liked thereof, because he appeared there unto him. But it may seem strange that three yeares being now expired since the death of David, Solomon did not yet begin to build the Temple, seeing all things were before prepared by David, for he began not to build it, till the 4 yeare of his reigne, ch. 6. 1. For this it may be conceived, that still more preparation of materials was to be made, as is shewed, ch. 5. about which so many thousands are there said to have been imployed, and sent over into the countrey of Tyrus to work there, that the levying of men, sending Embassadors to that King, the cutting down of Cedars and Firre-trees, and making the stiffe ready, that no knocking or hewing might be at the building, and the transporting thereof, could not take up lesse time; and happily because the work was so great, and required extraordinary wisdom in him that should undertake it, hee thought himselfe not yet sufficient for it, and therefore stayed till that he had obtaine wisdome of God, as is shewed that he did in this chapter.
of,

Then the King went to Gibeon, to sacrifice there, for that was the great high place, and there he offered 1000 burnt offerings. 2 Chron. 1. 3. Hee went with all the multitude to the high place at Gibeon, where was the Tabernacle which Moses the servant of God made in the wilderness, v. 5. &c. and the brazen Altar which Bezaleel made, &c. Come star following Iosephus saith; that by Gibeon no particular high place was to be understood, but onely an high place, as the word signifieth; and that the high place to which Solomon now went was in Hebron; but the Chronicles make it plaine that Gibeon is a proper name here, both because it is said the high place at Gibeon, and described by the Tabernacle there; and the Altar, which was the reason why Solomon was drawne thither, to offer sacrifice; and Zadok who was made high Priest instead of Abiathar, ministred there. The thousand burnt offerings which he offered here, were according to the Hebrewes, either offered in divers dayes, or which he offered there in all his time, but the first is most probable. Although this his going to Gibeon to sacrifice be spoken of after his marrying of Pharaohs daughter, yet some think that it was before, because so holy a man would not doe any other act of great consequence before that he had sought wisdom, whereby to be directed. And in the book of Wisdom he saith, that he sought wisdom in his youth, ch. 8. and as it seemeth, ch. 9. at the beginning of his reign. To this, that hee sought wisdom in the first yeare of his reigne, I assent, although the relation hereof cometh after Shimei his death, which was when Solomon had reigned 3 yeares, and it is not improbable, but that he married Pharaohs daughter in the first year also. For to the end, that all the history of the destruction of *David*s enemies might be set forth together, the destruction of Shimei also was set forth before this marriage, although it hapned after. But that his sacrificing at Gibeon was before this marriage, I can yet see no reason of force to perfwade, and both the text and Iosephus are for another order, placing the marriage before his sacrificing. He went then after this marriage solemnized to Gibeon to sacrifice, that he might the better prosper in this estate, by thus seeking Gods blessing, and to be the better prepared to the great work of building the temple, to which hee thought it now time to addresse himselfe.

In Gibeon the Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream by night and said, aske what I shall give thee, 2 Chron. 1. 7. That night the Lord appeared to Solomon, &c. When Solomon had presented the Lord so liberally with sacrifices, thus earnestly seeking his favour, the Lord did him this grace to appeare unto him, and then he discovered the end of his so great devotion to be to obtaine wisdom, and herein he prevailed; and for worldly riches and glory also, so that there is nothing lost by being profuse in honouring God, but much gained.

Then Solomon said, thou hast shewed mercy to thy servant David my Father, as he walked before thee in truth and righteousness, and uprightness of heart. Hee knowing saith Lyra, that God made him this offer for *David*s sake, spake thus: the truth whereby he commends David, is by Marys expounded of the uprightness of his heart, the righteousness of his just dealing, and the uprightness of his true care in all things to walk according to the commandments, for which he is said to be righteous before God, because he was by him accepted for such, although he sometime sinned greatly.

V. 4.

Schol. histor.

Pined.
Sallianm.

V. 5.

Note.
Prov. 3. 9.
Laves 1. 5.

V. 6.

Lyra.
P. Martyr.

And

V. 7.

And now thou hast made me to reign, who am a child, &c.] of what age Solomon was when he began to reign, hath been before discussed upon ch. 1. 19. and hee saith, that he knew not how to go in and out, that is, to mannage the weighty busineses of the Kingdome. He craveth therefore an understanding heart, and this is necessary for all Kings, because that if any King wanteth wisdom, although his counsell be wise, there will be great danger of being misled to his owne, and the hurt of his subjects. And it is not Solomons case alone to aske this wisdom and obtaine it, but whosoever asketh it in faith, hath a certaine promise, 1 Sam. 1. 5. that he shall obtaine it. The prayer of Solomon for wisdom is more largely set forth in the book of wisdom, ch. 9. see also Ecclesiast. 51. 18. 19. &c. With this petition of Solomon God was so pleased, that he gave him both wisdom exceeding that of all others before and after him, and riches and honour, and promised him long life also, if he continued to walk in his commandements. But is it meant, that in wisdom he should excell all other men? Was he wiser then Adam, Moses, the Prophets and Apostles, and then Christ Iesus? And did he excell all Kings without exception, in riches and glory, as Craesus, Xerxes, Alexander, and Nebuchadnezzar? Sol. Iesus Christ was not onely man but God, and therefore he cannot come in question in this comparison: as for Adam also before his fall, without doubt he was as wise as Solomon both in naturall and divine things: the comparison therefore is made between Solomon and all other meer men, since the fall. In things naturall none was ever so suddainly made so wise as he in youth; for Ecclesiast. 7. he saith, that it was given unto him to know the constitution of the world and elements, and the nature of beasts, trees, plants, &c. but in divine things no doubt, but the Prophets and Apostles excelled him. It is meant therefore, first for naturall and politick wisdom enabling to govern, there was none like unto him: secondly, for all kinde of wisdom no King was ever comparable to him, and the comparison is expressly made betwixt him and all other Kings: lastly, for riches and glory no King of Israel was ever like him; and for other Kings, taking all three together, wisdom, riches and glory, there was never any, that might be compared unto him in any countrey. For although one might have a larger dominion, and more riches, yet he came short of Solomon in wisdom, which is the greatest glory. Whereas long life is promised him, if he kept the commandements: herein it seemeth; that God fore-seeing his foul falling into idolatry, spake thus; and the event answered the prediction, for he died before he was very old, viz. about 60. according to the Hebrews, at 52.

And whereas he promiseth nothing of victories over his enemies, and power to destroy them, it may be thought also, that this was omitted, because God foresaw the rebellion of Ieroboam, who escaped his hands. Some think, that Solomon asked all kinde of wisdom not onely to govern, but also to understand all divine mysteries and all naturall things, because his understanding was enlarged herein, and yet in the grant God doth not expresse this, but other things, which he asked not he expresseth; whereby is intimated, that this was asked. But the text is plain, that he asked onely wisdom to govern, and to manage the great affairs committed unto him; but God, who is wont to give more to his faithfull servants, then they ask, gave him a most large understanding in all other things also. Yet it is not to be thought, that he had such a knowledge of heavenly mysteries, but that others especially under the Gospell were more enlightened herein, for these were hidden in times past, but now revealed: And therefore most Expositours subscribe to this. As Dionys. Tostatus, Caietan, &c.

*Dionys.
Tostatus.
Caietan.*

V. 19.

And when Solomon awaked, behold it was a dream, &c.] But by the spirit of God, which sent it, he knew that it came from God, and was no illusion, as dreams commonly are, and he found it to be true by experience, for that his heart was by and by enlarged with understanding, and hereof a proof was given, at his return to Ierusalem, v. 16. 17. &c. Thus Martyr. Lyra, he knew that it was a dream, that is, that it was true, because God used to reveale himselfe by dreames. And immediately he returned to Ierusalem, and offered more sacrifices before the Arke in way of thankfulness for this singular mercy, and with part of the peace-offerings he made a royall feast.

Then

Then came there two harlots and stood before the King, &c.] Varabius for harlots hath victuallers, because the word signifieth either, and it is not likely, that they were harlots, because either such conceived not, or if they did, they desired rather the death, then the life of their children. But Iosephus saith, that they were women that made a gaine of playing the harlots, and both the Sept. and Vulg. lat. render it harlots. But the Chalde paraphrast, victuallers, and Peter Martyr, either victuallers or washers of clothes, holding it improbable that they were harlots, because so godly a King would never have suffered a whore to live in Jerusalem contrary to the law of God, so likewise Pellican. Iunius saith, that they were victuallers, and such as secretly played the whores, because it is not probable that they durst in the time of so godly a King make publick profession of such wickednesse, or as harlots to have appeared before him, and to this do I subscribe. A case most difficult is by Gods providence now brought before the King to try his wisdom for none but a most wise man could judge rightly of it, both plead for one infant, the one affirming it to be hers, the other hers, and that another infant which dyed by being overlaid in the night, belonged to neither of them. What the truth was, there was no witness to prove their ages, one being born but 3 dayes before the other, could not distinguish them, and it seemeth that there was no mark to doe it, that any neighbours took notice of. The wise King therefore having a while heard them both began to consider that a true mother who loveth her child, as it seemeth either of these did, through her naturall affection would not suffer any hurt to be done unto it. Wherefore he called for a sword, and commanded the living child to be divided between them, and then it soon appeared which was the true mother of the child, and it was given unto her. And agreeably to this it is said, Wisdom 7. that by the wisdom given unto him, he knew the thoughts of men. Iosephus saith, that he commanded the dead child to be divided also, but because it exceeds the relation of the holy Scripture, this is not to be beleaved, and because there was no reason why it should be divided, seeing they did neither of them desire any part in it. If it shall seem to have been a matter too mean to be brought before the King; happily saith Martyr it was first brought before some other judge, but he for the difficulty not being able to decide it, it came before the King, as matters most difficult sometime before Moses. When Solomon began to enter into this way of exploration, to finde out the true mother, it is supposed that the Courtiers standing by, first derided him in their hearts, as being about to do childishly, but in fine they perceived the depth of his understanding, and feared him; that is, the just revered him for his singular endowments, conceiving that they should have justice done them, although they had to deal with subtle adversaries; and the wicked feared him, as conceiving they could not lye hid, but should surely be found out having a King of such sagacity, and so bear the punishment of their evill doings.

V. 16.
Varabius.Iosephus.Chald. paraph.
P. Martyr.Pellican.
Iunius.Iosephus.P. Martyr.Exod. 18.

V. 28.

C H A P. IIII.

HAVING shewed a proof of Solomons wisdom in the case of the two Harlots in the former Chapter, this is spent in shewing his riches and glory, his gift of wisdom being further amplified also, that it might appear to be so done unto him, as the Lord had there promised. For to his Kingly glory pertained this, that he reigned over all Israel, v. 1. and had so many noble Princes under him, v. 2, 3, &c. the multitude of his subjects, v. 20. the extent of his dominion, v. 21. and the large provision spent daily in his court, v. 22, 23. together with the great multitude of his chariots, and horses, v. 26. 2 Chron. 1. 14. Touching his riches, what here is omitted, is shewed 2 Chron. 1. 15. they were so great, that gold and silver were as plentiful as stones in the street in his dayes. Lastly, that his wisdom might the more appear, it is extolled v. 29, 30. above the wisdom of all the wise of the East and of the Egyptians, &c. And for a further proof, it is shewed v. 31. his great number of proverbs and songs, and discourses of the nature of all things are mentioned.

And

V. 1.

And Solomon was King over all Israel.] That is, there being no division of Iudah from the rest, as had been in Dauids time; nor conspiratours to trouble his universall reigne.

V. 2.

Dyonisius.

Iunius.

P. Martyr.

These are the Princes which he had, Azariah the sonne of Zadok the Priest.] Here because no office is ascribed to Azariah, as is to all that are named after him, some have thought that the word Priest is to bee understood of him, as if it had been said, Azariah the Priest the sonne of Zadok holding him to have been the Kings household Chaplaine, and this reading is followed by Lyra, Verſio aldina, & Regia; and in 8 manuscripts, as saith Francis Lucas. But both the Vulg. Lat. Pagnin, and Vatablus joine it to Zadok thus, Zadok Sacerdotis. Iunius rendereth the word translated Priest, president; and saith, that he was the son of some other Zadok, and not of the Priest Zadok. Toſtatius and Cajetan think that he was one of the Kings scribes, and therefore reſerre the word scribes both to him, and to the other two named next after him. But I hold with P. Martyr that he was not one of his Scribes, for David had but one; and therefore if Solomon had two, it is not to be thought that he had more, and the verſe wherein he is named, is distinguished from that wherein the other two are named. Moreover the word כֹּהֵן doth plainly ſhew that he was his Priest, for ſo it moſt commonly ſignifieth; and not a president, as Iunius would have it: and this is plaine alſo, becauſe his father was a Priest; neither can I ſee any reaſon why he ſhould ſay that it was ſome other Zadok, ſeeing we read of none of this name before, but the high Priest only: yet with the Hebrew Expoſitour it is to be held that he was not his immediate ſonne, but the ſonne of his ſonne Abimaaz. He would have a peculiar Priest ſaith Martyr, to offer prayers dayly for him, and when he came before the Lord in publick to offer his ſacrifices by themſelves, and not amongſt thoſe of the people.

V. 3.

P. Martyr.

Elihoſeph, and Ahijah the ſonnes of Siſa Scribes.] What the Scribes office was, ſee before 2 Sam. 20. 25. where Seſiah is ſaid to be Dauids ſcribe, whom Martyr thinketh to be the ſame with this Siſa; and if ſo, his ſonnes continued in the ſame office in Solomons time. Touching the offices of Iehoſaphat alſo, and of Benajah who are named next; ſee 2 Sam. 20. 25. But whereas Zadok and Abiathar are ſaid to be Prieſts, when as Abiathar was at the beginning of Solomons reign put down from the Prieſthood; occaſion is given hereby of divers conjectures, ſome thinking that he ſerved ſtill upon requeſt made to the King as an ordinary Priest, ſome that he at ſometimes executed the office of the high Priest when he was unclean; as R. L. Ben Gerson: ſome that he was another man of the ſame name, as Kimhi. Others that he is ſo called ſtill, and had onely the title, but executed not the office; and this laſt I think with Martyr to be moſt probable. For if he had been employed as an ordinary Priest, why ſhould he be named with the high Priest Zadok more then any of the reſt? and if in the caſe of uncleaneſſe happening at any time unto Zadok, he executed the high Prieſts office; why was there not one provided from the beginning in the like caſe to doe the like: and touching another of the ſame name, it is a meer conjecture.

V. 5.

And Azariah the ſonne of Nathan was over thoſe that attended upon the King.] That is, thoſe of his houſhold, but whether he were the ſonne of Nathan the Prophet, or of Nathan the Kings brother is uncertain, but moſt think, that he was the prophet *Nathan*ſon, with whom Solomon had been brought up, and therefore he favoured him ſo much, as to preferre him before others, that were about him. And Zabud the ſonne of Nathan the Priest, the kings friend. This man alſo is by the moſt held to be the ſonne of Nathan the prophet, by his familiarity with Solomon in his youth, with whom he was brought up in his fathers houſe, attaining to this friendſhip; whereas he is called a prieſt, it is not to be underſtood, as if he were of the tribe of Levi, but as other princes are ſometimes called by this name כֹּהֵן, which ſignifieth a prieſt or prince, 2 Sam. 9. 4. as Iunius divideth the chapter, but according to the common dividing, 2 Sam. 8. 18.

V. 6.

Abiſhar was over his houſe, and Adoniram the ſon of Abda over the tribute.] Of Adoram, who was over the tribute in Dauids time ſee before, 2 Sam. 20. 24.

V. 7.

And Solomon had 12. Princes over all Iſrael, who made proviſion for the King and and his house, every one a month in the year.] These twelve were so seated, as may be gathered from the description of their countries here following, as that each one of them might most conveniently furnish the King from his country with provision for his month, and it was abundance which was spent in his court every month, as will afterwards appear v. 22, 23. so as that there was need to gather it from all parts of his kingdom. But it is not to be thought, saith Martyr, that this provision was taken up without paying a just price: therefore, seeing if other wise the people had been exacted upon, they would have groaned under the burden whereas now they are said to have bin eating and drinking and rejoicing, v. 20. If any man shall wonder, how such abundance of provision should be spent daily in Solomon's court, it is to be understood that he had not onely his household servants to maintain, but many men for the warres, and to defend his kingdomes; and the retinue of wives and concubines with their attendants, was excessive. Whereas two amongst these Princes are said to have married two of Solomons daughters, it is to be understood as spoken by anticipation, because hee could not yet have daughters marriageable being himself so young, but it is meant, that afterwards when they were grown up, they took them for their wives.

Judah and Israel were many as the sand upon the sea shore.] This is spoken hyperbolically to set forth their excessive number to the greater glory of their King, to whom it is a glory to have a multitude of subjects.

Solomon reigned over all kingdomes from the river to the land of the Philistines, and to the border of Egypt.] By this river Tannus understandeth Euphrates, from whence to the Philistines land which lay South, seemeth to be the latitude of the country; or if Palestine lay West, the longitude: and then the latitude was from Egypt South, to mount Libanus, North. P. Martyr.

And the provision for Solomons house for one day, was 30. Cores of fine flower, and 60. Cores of bread-corn.] A Core was 10. Ephas or bushels, but according to Budens, an Ephah was a bushel and a peck, according to others, a bushell wanting a pottle. If it be taken for a bushell and a Core was 10. then 30. Cores amounted to 300. bushels, and 60 to 600. all together 900. And forasmuch as an Ephah contained 10. Omers, and an Omer was allowed for one person for a day, when they were fed with Manna and nothing else, but with other meat, as now they were fed, half so much would suffice, there could not be fewer then 20. fed with an Ephah, and with 900. Ephas then were fed eighteen thousand at the least, which sheweth the greatnesse of Solomons court. Lyra makes these measures a great deal lesse, that it may seeme the more credible, saying, that a core was but 30. measures, and that a measure was but a little quantity, seeing Rash carryed away from Beas his threshing floor 6. measures of barley. And Sallianus, who acknowledged that a Core containeth 10. Ephas, addeth, or 30. measures, saying that a measure sufficed a day for one person, and therefore 90. cores being 2700. measures, there were no more persons fed with this provision but 2700. But it being granted, that a Core contained 10. Ephas, not 3. but 20. persons might well be fed with an Ephah and other meat together, seeing it is plain, that an Ephah was 10. Omers, and then the whole number must needs be 18000. at the least, as was said before. Now in these large daily expences of provision, it is not to be thought, as Martyr saith, that Solomon sinned by excesse, for it is spoken to his commendation and the setting forth of his glory; and God by his example would teach that the riches of this world are at his disposing; and when it seemeth good unto him, he can extraordinarily enrich his servants; and naturall men will not be taught this but by example; for when in the primitive Church christians were poore, the heathen said surely their God was a weak and poore God, because otherwise he would have enriched them. And that in all this expence there was no excesse may be gathered, because there is no mention made amongst all his provisions of wine, which amongst those that exceed is wont to be most plentiful. Other great Princes are noted in histories to have been unreasonably profuse in their feasting, as Lucius Verus a Roman the sonne of Marcus Antoninus, who spent at one feast 8000 Sesteritii, and one Sestertertium was 7 pound 16 shillings 3 pence, which Antoninus hearing said, that

P. Martyr.

V. 20.

V. 21.

V. 22.

H. B. Patriarchs travels.

Exod. 16. 36.

Lyra.

Sallianus.

P. Martyr.

V. 24.

Hieronym. de
loc. s. H. br.
Iunius.
Chron. 9. 26.

Pellican.

that the common wealth of Rome should susteine great losse if another such feast were made. Caligula would have his bread guilded to spend the more, and M. Antonius contended with Cleopatra, in prodigall spending upon a banquet.

For he reigned over every place beyond the river from Thizpah to Azrah, &c.] Here the extent of Solomons kingdome is set forth in other termes then before, v. 21. for there it was bounded by the river at one end, and the Philistines countrey at the other, but thereby was meant onely the kingdome inhabited by Iudah and Israel in the land of Canaan, here the whole length is set forth beyond the river Iordan also, where not onely Israelites but other nations inhabited to Azza or Gaza, which was of the Philistines, and this Thizpah saith Ierom, lay Eastward, and Azrah Westward; although Tostatus saith, North and South. Thizpah, saith Iunius is other wise by historians called Taphach lying at the river Euphrates, being since called Amphipolis. Plin. lib. 5. nat. hist. c. 24. so that hereby we may gather his kingdome to have been exceeding great. The Hebrewes, saith Pellican, will have by these two the uttermost parts of the world meant, holding that Solomon reigned over all countries of the whole world. This indeed is true touching Christ, who was by Solomon figured out, but his limits were not so large, and as the people of Israel then enjoyed peace, which is set forth in the next words.

V. 25.

Iunius.

V. 26.
See also ch. 10.
26.

Lyra.

Iunius.
Pellican.

V. 29.

P. Martyr.

Iudah and Israel dwelt safely every one under his own vine and figtree, from Dan to Beerseba.] so by Christ commeth to all the subjects of his kingdome the greatest peace of all, the peace of conscience and everlasting rest. For the limits here named, Dan lay farthest North of all the land of Israel, and Beerseba farthest South.

And Solomon had 40000 stables of horses, and 12000 horses.] 2 Chron. 1. 14: it is said, he had 1400 Chariots, and 12000 horsemen. It is to be understood, that many of the horses before spoken of were for these chariots, and the rest for others of his retinue to ride upon. 2 Chron. 9. 25, It is said, that Solomon had 4000. stables of horses, here 40000. This difference may thus be reconciled, here the partitions in the stables are to be understood, there standing in one but one horse, as is the manner in the stables of many great persons; there the whole stables, whereof every one contained 10. such partitions, so Lyra and Iunius. If any man shall ask what Solomon did with so many horses, it is answered, that he used some of them for the defence of his kingdome, some for carriages and some for his servants to ride upon; they being placed for these ends in severall parts of the kingdom.

But God gave Solomon very much wisdom and understanding, and largenesse of heart, as the sand upon the sea shore.] Some, saith Martyr, will have the largenesse of Solomons heart compared to the sea-shore, because as that comprehends innumerable grains of sand, so his heart comprehended innumerable notions of all sorts; others, because the most vast sea is terminated with the shore, so all knowledge was contained within the heart of Solomon. But he saith, that the comparison is made in respect of the largenesse of the sea shore, it being a spacious plain, that compasseth the sea round about. I think, that nothing else is meant, but that as the sea-shore abounds with innumerable sands, so did his heart abound with all kindes of knowledge, none that lived abounding herein like unto him, which is further expressed in the comparisons and declarations here following, as no place abounds with sands like the sea-shore: Thus also Pellican, who applying this to the true Solomon Christ Iesus, saith, it was abundantly verified in him, because in in him were hid all the treasures of wisdom.

Pellican.

V. 20.

And the wisdom of Solomon excelled the wisdom of all the men of the East, and of the Egyptians.] By the wise men of the East are meant the Magitians, Chaldeans and Astrologers, and all that were the finders out of the nature of things: for to attain this knowledge many travailed farre, as Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, Plato, &c. And to shew that the East was the place, where wise men, who were seen into greatest secrets, were, it is said Matth. 2. that when Christ was born there came wise men out of the East. For the wise men of Egypt here also were Magitians, whom Pharaoh called for, to do by their skill such wonders as Moses did. These were greatly seen into the secrets of nature, and if there were any skill in picture-making aptly to represent things, they had it. But Solomon excelled

excelled all these, as being of more exquisite understanding, then they, as Daniel afterwards excelled the Chaldeans of the king of Babylon, and herein chiefly he excelled them all, because his knowledge was joyned with the knowledge of the true God, and with the fear of him, as theirs was not. Thus saith Pellican. He was wiser, saith Lyra, then the men of the East, who studied the course of the stars and then the Egyptians, who studied Philosophy. Martyr in speaking of this comparison saith, that the wise men of the East did first finde out the course of the stars, for which and other rare knowledge they were most famous, and that Abraham and Job and his friends had this skill, but afterwards they degenerated into the study of evill arts, south-saints, divinations and execrations, for which the Israelites were reprov'd by Esay in these words, They have filled themselves more then the children of the east, with vain sciences, &c. Some because Solomon is compared unto them, not considering this distinction of times have held Solomon to have been such, as they were since, viz. one that knew and exercised these evill arts, and Exorcismes, and Iosephus followeth this opinion, telling a story of one Eleazarus, who before Vespasian the Emperour putting a ring with a certain root therein to the nostrils of a man possessed, drove out the evill spirit. But forasmuch as God gave unto Solomon his wisdome, it cannot be, that he should exercise it in such evill arts as are by him condemned. And for the effect wrought by a root, it was by collusion of the evill spirit with that exorcist.

Also, hee was wiser then any man, yea then Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman and Chalcol, and Darda the sonnes of Mahol, &c.] This, saith Martyr, is to be restrained to the men of those times, or rather in respect of his knowledge in things naturall. But for this see before, ch. 3. 12. Touching the wise men here named, they were Israelites, who because some of them were inspired of God were wiser then any of other nations. Of Ethan it is spoken Psal. 89. as endited, by him. And of Heman Psal. 88. who is also called there the Ezrahite; it seemeth that they were chief singers, and inditers of Psalms to the praise of God, being of the sonnes of Chorah of the tribe of Levi, and therefore they had a most excellent spirit of wisdome in them, and such as they, were also the other two their brethren. And it is most probable, that all these foure were the sonnes of one man, although it may seem that Ethan was not, because he alone is here called the Ezrahite, for so is Heman also called, Psal. 88. many therefore hold Mahol to have bin other wise called the Ezrahite, having the name Mahol from Chorus a dance, as the word signifieth, because he instructed his daughters in musick and dancing. Thus Martyr and R. L. Ben Gerison, but Pellican writeth thus; the Hebrews say that these four were the sonnes of Serah the sonne of Iudab, others by them understand Adam, Abraham, Moses, and David, but upon what ground I cannot see; and for Heman, one of these four he is reckoned up as a Levite, 1 Chron. 25. 4. and therefore Lyra followeth this opinion also, that they were Levites and Singers in the house of God. Yet Iunius is for the other, that they were all the sonnes of Zerah, whom Iudab had by Thamar, because 1 Chron. 2. 6. four bearing these names are reckoned up in enumerating the sonnes of Zarah or Zerah, from whom might come the name Ezrahite, but for Darda there is Dorah, and it was so long agoe since they lived, that it is not likely that they should be meant but some living about the time of Solomon, and famous then for divine wisdome; wherein it is certain that Ethan and Heman excelled both by the Psalmes which were of their inditing, and because one of them is expressly said to be a seer, 1 Chron. 25. 5. wherefore I hold with them rather, that take them to be Levites.

He spake 3000 proverbs, and his songs were 5000.] Lyra observeth that in all the book of the proverbs there 915 verses, and sometimes 2 verses or more make but one proverb, therefore all that he spake, are not recorded. He uttered them at divers times and in divers places, but wrot them not, onely others that were about him wrot them, as memorable sayings; and afterwards the chiefe and more sacred of them were gathered together, the rest being left out, and the like is to be held touching his verses or songs: so like wise Iunius who thinketh that all the rest were also written and kept amongst his monuments, as is intimated chap. 11. 41. but afterwards

Cc

Lyra.
P. Martyr.

V. 31.

P. Martyr.
Pellican.

Lyra.
Iunius.

V. 32.
Lyra.

Iunius.

V. 24.

Hieronym. de
loc. s. H. br.
Iunius.
Chron. 9. 26.

Pellican.

that the common wealth of Rome should susteine great losse if another such feast were made. Caligula would have his bread guilded to spend the more, and M. Antonius contended with Cleopatra, in prodigall spending upon a banquet.

For he reigned over every place beyond the river from Thizpab to Azrah, &c.] Here the extent of Solomon's kingdome is set forth in other termes then before, v. 21. for there it was bounded by the river at one end, and the Philistines countrey at the other, but thereby was meant onely the kingdomes inhabited by Judah and Israel in the land of Canaan, here the whole length is set forth beyond the river Jordan also, where not onely Israelites but other nations inhabited to Azza or Gaza, which was of the Philistines, and this Thizpab saith Ierom, lay Eastward, and Azrah Westward; although Tostatus saith, North and South. Thizpab, saith Iunius is other wise by historians called Taphach lying at the river Euphrates, being since called Amphipolis. Plin. lib. 5. nat. hist. c. 24. so that hereby we may gather his kingdome to have been exceeding great. The Hebrewes, saith Pellican, will have by these two the uttermost parts of the world meant, holding that Solomon reigned over all countries of the whole world. This indeed is true touching Christ, who was by Solomon figured out, but his limits were not so large, and as the people of Israel then enjoyed peace, which is set forth in the next words.

V. 25.

Iunius.

V. 26.
See also ch. 10.
26.

Lyra.

Iunius.
Pellican.

V. 29.

P. Martyr.

Judah and Israel dwell safely every one under his own vine and figtree from Dan to Beerseba.] so by Christ commeth to all the subjects of his kingdome the greatest peace of all, the peace of conscience and everlasting rest. For the limits here named, Dan lay farthest North of all the land of Israel, and Beerseba farthest South.

And Solomon had 40000 stables of horses, and 12000 horses.] 2 Chron. 1. 14: it is said, he had 1400 Chariots, and 12000 horsemen. It is to be understood, that many of the horses before spoken of were for these chariots, and the rest for others of his retinue to ride upon. 2 Chron. 9. 25, It is said, that Solomon had 4000. stables of horses, here 40000. This difference may thus be reconciled, here the partitions in the stables are to be understood, there standing in one but one horse, as is the manner in the stables of many great persons; there the whole stables, whereof every one contained 10. such partitions, so Lyra and Iunius. If any man shall ask what Solomon did with so many horses, it is answered, that he used some of them for the defence of his kingdome, some for carriages and some for his servants to ride upon; they being placed for these ends in severall parts of the kingdom.

But God gave Solomon very much wisdom and understanding, and largeness of heart, as the sand upon the sea shore.] Some, saith Martyr, will have the largeness of Solomon's heart compared to the sea-shore, because as that comprehends innumerable grains of sand, so his heart comprehended innumerable notions of all sorts; others, because the most vast sea is terminated with the shore, so all knowledge was contained within the heart of Solomon. But he saith, that the comparison is made in respect of the largeness of the sea shore, it being a spacious plain, that compasseth the sea round about. I think, that nothing else is meant, but that as the sea-shore abounds with innumerable sands, so did his heart abound with all kindes of knowledge, none that lived abounding herein like unto him, which is further exprest in the comparisons and declarations here following, as no place abounds with sands like the sea-shore: Thus also Pellican, who applying this to the true Solomon Christ Iesus, saith, it was abundantly verified in him, because in in him were hid all the treasures of wisdom.

Pellican.

V. 30.

And the wisdom of Solomon excelled the wisdom of all the men of the East, and of the Egyptians.] By the wise men of the East are meant the Magitians, Chaldeans and Astrologers, and all that were the finders out of the nature of things: for to attain this knowledge many travailed farre, as Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, Plato, &c. And to shew that the East was the place, where wise men, who were seen into greatest secrets, were, it is said Matth. 2. that when Christ was born there came wise men out of the East. For the wise men of Egypt here also were Magitians, whom Pharaoh called for, to do by their skill such wonders as Moses did. These were greatly seen into the secrets of nature, and if there were any skill in picture-making aptly to represent things, they had it. But Solomon excelled

excelled all these, as being of more exquisite understanding, then they, as Daniel afterwards excelled the Chaldeans of the king of Babylon, and herein chiefly he excelled them all, because his knowledge was joyned with the knowledge of the true God, and with the fear of him, as theirs was not. Thus saith Pellican. He was wiser, saith Lyra, then the men of the East, who studied the course of the stars and then the Egyptians, who studied Philosophy. Martyr in speaking of this comparison saith, that the wise men of the East did first finde out the course of the stars, for which and other rare knowledge they were most famous, and that Abraham and Job and his friends had this skill, but afterwards they degenerated into the study of evill arts, fourth-faints, divinations and execrations, for which the Israelites were reprov'd by Esay in these words, They have filled themselves more then the children of the east, with vain sciences, &c. Some because Solomon is compared unto them, not considering this distinction of times have held Solomon to have been such, as they were since, viz. one that knew and exercised these evill arts, and Exorcismes, and Iosephus followeth this opinion, telling a story of one Eleazarus, who before Vespasian the Emperour putting a ring with a certain root therein to the nostrils of a man possessed, drave out the evill spirit. But forasmuch as God gave unto Solomon his wisdome, it cannot be, that he should exercise it in such evill arts as are by him condemned. And for the effect wrought by a root, it was by collusion of the evill spirit with that exorcist.

Also, hee was wiser then any man, yea then Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman and Chalcol, and Darda the sonnes of Mabol, &c.] This, saith Martyr, is to be restrained to the men of those times, or rather in respect of his knowledge in things naturall. But for this see before, ch. 3. 12. Touching the wise men here named, they were Israelites, who because some of them were inspired of God were wiser then any of other nations. Of Ethan it is spoken Psal. 89. asendited, by him. And of Heman Psal. 88. who is also called there the Ezrahite; it seemeth that they were chief singers, and inditers of Psalmes to the praise of God, being of the sonnes of Chorab of the tribe of Levi, and therefore they had a most excellent spirit of wisdome in them, and such as they, were also the other two their brethren. And it is most probable, that all these foure were the sonnes of one man, although it may seem that Ethan was not, because he alone is here called the Ezrahite, for so is Heman also called, Psal. 88. many therefore hold Mabol to have bin other wise called the Ezrahite, having the name Mabol from Chorus a dance, as the word signifieth, because he instructed his daughters in musick and dancing. Thus Martyr and R. L. Ben Gerison, but Pellican writeth thus; the Hebrews say that these foure were the sonnes of Serah the sonne of Iudab, others by them understand Adam, Abraham, Moses, and David, but upon what ground I cannot see; and for Heman, one of these four he is reckoned up as a Levite, 1 Chron. 25. 4. and therefore Lyra followeth this opinion also, that they were Levites and Singers in the house of God. Yet Iunius is for the other, that they were all the sonnes of Zerah, whom Iudab had by Thamar, because 1 Chron. 2. 6. four bearing these names are reckoned up in enumerating the sonnes of Zarah or Zerah, from whom might come the name Ezrahite, but for Darda there is Dorab, and it was so long agoe since they lived, that it is not likely that they should be meant but some living about the time of Solomon, and famous then for divine wisdome; wherein it is certain that Ethan and Heman excelled both by the Psalmes which were of their inditing, and because one of them is expressly said to be a seer, 1 Chron. 25. 5. wherefore I hold with them rather, that take them to be Levites.

He spake 3000 proverbes, and his songs were 5000.] Lyra observeth that in all the book of the proverbes there 915 verses, and sometimes 2 verses or more make but one proverb, therefore all that he spake, are not recorded. He uttered them at divers times and in divers places, but wrot them not, onely others that were about him wrot them, as memorable sayings; and afterwards the chiefe and more sacred of them were gathered together, the rest being left out, and the like is to be held touching his verses or songs: so likewise Iunius who thinketh that all the rest were also written and kept amongst his monuments, as is intimated chap. 11. 41. but afterwards

Lyra.
P. Martyr.

V. 31.

P. Martyr.
Pellican.

Lyra.
Iunius.

V. 32.
Lyra.

Iunius.

P. Martyr.

terwards they perished; as Lyra thinketh in the time of the Babylonian captivity under Nebuchadnezzar. For 3000 songs in the Greek and Vulg. Lat. the Hebrew verity hath it 1005. and Martyr hath observed, that in the book of songs called a song of songs, which only is now extant there are but 117 verses, and for his sentences or wise sayings, which are here said to be 3000. besides 915 verses numbered in the book of the proverbs, Ecclesiastes hath only 222. These sayings and songs of his faith he also, that were lost, were not lost without a providence; for a sparrow falleth not to the ground without the will of our heavenly father, he doubtlesse saw them to be profitable for those times, but not for ours; and the like he saith of the book of Ezech. and of the warres of the Lord, which are lost also.

V. 33.

Pellican.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

And he spake of trees from the Cedar of Libanon, even to the hyssop, that groweth out of the wall, &c.] that is, saith Pellican, from the greatest unto the least, both of trees and plants; and of all kinds of beasts, to wles, fishes and creeping things, but what he spake of them was either not written, or perished. Hee spake saith Lyra, of their natures and qualities, and of what use they were for men. And from hence Martyr gathereth, that the study and knowledge of naturall things agreeth well with divine knowledge. And for other sciences of Mathematicks, Grammar, Rhetorick, and Logick; although nothing be said hereof, yet it is not to be doubted, but that he had the knowledge of these also: forasmuch as in discourses and arguings, there is so much use of the three last; and to perfection of knowledge, the first is requisite also.

V. 34.

Note.

And they came from all kingdomes to heare the wisdom of Solomon, and from all Kings of the earth, who had heard of his wisdom.] The fame of his extraordinary wisdom was soon spread abroad into all parts, and hereby many desirous to learn of him came from all countries about to his court, as to a most famous schoole, and Kings that could not come in person, sent to learn of him, that their knowledge being thus improved, they might be the better able to govern and instruct their people. From whence Martyr rightly gathereth, what a good thing it is for Kings to be learned, and that it is commendable to travell into foreign parts to get knowledge & learning, for thus of old they did who were desirous of wisdom; and lastly, that Solomon hid not his light under a bushell, but communicated it unto all comers, teaching all such as excell in knowledge to doe the like, remembering that saying, Scire sumus nihil est nisi te scire hoc sciat alter. And to his Antitype Christ, they did also flock from all parts to heare and learne of him, and so must all such as would be indued with wisdom to salvation, to the Preachers of his Gospell. For that which is added more of the plenty of silver, &c. 2 Chron. 1. 15, 16, 17. see 1 King. 10, 27, 28.

CHAP. V.

V. 1.

2 Chron. 2. 3.

P. Martyr.

And Hiram the King of Tyre sent his servants to Solomon for he had heard that they appointed him King over Israel, &c.] 2 Chron. 2. 3. this being omitted; it is said that Solomon sent to Hiram to desire Cedars of him for the building of the house of God, but it is to be understood, that Solomon's sending to him was the same with that here commemorated, v. 2. after that Hiram had sent unto him to congratulate his inauguration to the kingdom. Iosephus saith that Solomon sent unto Hiram by the same messengers. Touching this King, there was both Tyrus and Sidon, two rich cities; over both which he reigned saith Martyr, they stood near unto the land of Israel, and upon the Sea coast, whereby their riches were so greatly increased, their situation being rocky and barren. Hiram is said here to have been a freind unto David all his dayes, but Pf. 83. 8. the men of Tyre are numbered amongst the enemies of Israel. It seemeth therefore that this freindship between them began after that, and that which is here said is then to be understood, after that they had contracted freindship, it continued as long as David lived. Or rather that Plinius was propheticall being compiled by Asaph, to shew the combinations of the enemies to come against Israel, and how they should therefore be destroyed, as they were in the dayes of Iehosaphat; 2 Chron. 20. thus Martyr: but because there is no mention of the men of Tyre there but of other nations, it is rather to be referred to some other time, when the Assyrians also came against Israel. It is most probable also saith Martyr, that this King Hiram had the knowledge of the true

true God; which he might attaine unto by his familiarity with David, and accordingly he speaketh most piously in his answer to David, v. 7. Touching the time of *Hiram*s sending to David, it is to be understood, that he being a neare neighbour deferred not long this his sending, but did it at the beginning of *Solomon*s reigne, onely it is here commemorated occasionally, the intercourse between these two Kings being set forth, and therefore Iunius rendreth it, Miserat Hiram, Hiram had sent. The reasons why Solomon sought to him for Cedars rather then to any other King, are manifest; as 1. The great freindship between them, and between Hiram and his father before. 2. This embassage sent by Hiram unto him. 3. The skilfulnesse of the Tyrians in working curious works beyond those of other nations. And it is to be held, that God disposed so of it, that the Tyrians, Gentiles, should be employed about the work of this Temple, to prefigure the vocation of the Gentiles, and their future helping to build up the spirituall temple. In which allegory Pellican goeth further, noting that the Sidonians and Profelites amongst the Jewes being the workmen, but the rulers of the work Israelites, did figuratively shew that the spirituall temple should be built by Disciples amongst the Gentiles, but the Apostles who were Israelites, should be the cheife workmen and governours therein. And *Hiram*s voluntary sending to Solomon to seek his freindship, foreshewed the ready comming of the Gentiles to the knowledge and religion of the true God. And there is good ground for this allegory, seeing that the faithfull are called the temple of God, 1 Cor. 6. Eph. 2. 20. And Christ speaketh of his body, as of a Temple; saying, destroy this Temple, he was therefore saith Beda figured out by *Solomon*s Temple also; for he was the Temple of God, because the Godhead dwelt in him bodily; we, because the spirit of God dwelleth in us.

And Solomon sent to Hiram saying, thou knowest that David my Father could not build an house to the name of the Lord his God, for the warres, &c.] Vnto v. 6. which being omitted, 2 Chron. 2. 3. he saith onely in his message unto him; As thou didst by David my father, and sentest unto him Cedar wood to build him an house to dwell in; so doe to me, that I may build an house to the name of the Lord my God, and consecrate it to burn incense before him, &c. The house that I mean to build is great, for great is our God above all Gods, therefore who is able to build him an house, if the heaven, and heaven of heavens cannot contain him; &c.] unto v. 10. The sending of Solomon to Hiram was by letters, as it seemeth by the copy of a letter still extant amongst other ancient monuments, as Enpolemus hath it thus, King Solomon to Suron, the King of Tyre and Sidon, and Phenice greeting. Know thou that I have received the kingdome from David my father, by the benefit of the great God, who hath also commanded that I should build a Temple to God who hath made heaven and earth, and that I should also write to thee that thou shouldst send to me of thy people, who may be with me whilst the work of God is perfected, as he hath commanded me. I have written also to Galilee, Samaritis, Moabitis, and Ammonitis; to send in necessities: &c. Thus, there the name Suron being put for Hiram. There is also a copy of Surons letters to Solomon, and of *Solomon*s letters to Paphra King of Egypt, to the same effect; and of his answer to Solomon. In *Solomon*s writing to Hiram, both the histories considered together, both that 1 King. 5. and 2 Chron. 2. he maketh no mention of *David*s shedding of blood, which elsewhere is spoken of, as an impediment to his building of an house unto God, but onely that because he had continuall warres, he wanted time and leisure to doe it, and indeed God had otherwise disposed of it, that not he, but his sonne should build this house. But now he by Gods blessing injoying peace, entended to build: for he ascribeth not this peace to *David*s subduing of all his enemies, but unto God by whose power it so came to passe. Hereby was shewed that the spirituall Temple is not built in dissention and bloodshed, but in peace, neither are bloody persons fit instruments for this work, but the peaceable and meek. Wherefore Satan laboureth what he can to hinder this building, by stirring up discord in the Church of God, and he that is a true freind unto it, should labour what he can to beat it down, and to make peace. The trees, which Solomon desired of Hiram to build the Temple withall were Cedars, and 2 Chron. 2. 8. Firre-trees, and Almong

Pellican.

Beda.

V. 3.

2 Chr. 2. 3.

V. 6.

2 Chron. 2. 8.

P. Martyr.

1 King. 6. 9, 10.

Junius.

2 Chron. 2. 3.

V. 4.

V. 10.

V. 9, 10, 11.

V. 13.

2 Chron. 2. 17.
Junius.

Pellican.

gum trees. P. Martyr for fire-trees, saith, that some have the pine and the cypresse tree, and some the ash, as Forsterus. But he following Vitruius, will neither have fire meant, because that is a light kinde of wood and apt to take fire, and breeds worms and moths, neither is it durable; nor pines nor cypresses, because they are weak and bowing, and therefore are unapt to bear any burthen, yet they may be cut into boards, and serve to cover the inward parts of an house; but because Solomon covered this house with cedar boards, it is not to be thought that these trees were used for this purpose, and ash is not profitable for building. Wherefore he subscribeth to them, that understand hereby a lesser cedar, which is much like unto juniper. But whereas he excepteth against pines and cypresses, in this respect, that they will not bear any weight; and for seiling within there was no use of them, because that was done with cedar, 1 King. 6. 10. it is to be understood, that 2 Chron. 3. 5. it is said, that the house was covered within with boards of fire carved, and therefore the seiling of cedar spoken of 1 King. 6. 10. was of the chambers above the great house. For the Almuggum trees also spoken of 2 Chron. 2. 3. they are by Iunius rendred Thyine trees, both here, and 1 King. 10. 11. it is a wood, that is unknown unto us, but most pretious.

The message of Solomon to Hiram here laid down briefly, that he would send his servants to be with Solomon to cut him down Cedars in Lybanus, because none of the Israelites could cut them like the Zidonians, is more large 2 Chron. 2. 3, 4. &c. As thou didst unto David my father, sending him Cedars to build him an house, so do by me, that I may build an house unto the name of the Lord my God and consecrate it to burn incense before him, and for shew bread, & for burnt offerings morning & evening, &c. unto V. 10. where he promisseth to prepare for the Sidonians for their labour, bread, corn, wine and oyl abundantly, for Lybanus, the Forrest where these Cedars grew, was within the land of Israel, so that he needed not to give any satisfaction for the timber.

Hiram first desireth food for his men, and then it is said, that Solomon granted unto him to give 20000. measures of wheat, and 20000. measures of beaten oyl, but 2 Chron. 2. 10. there is supplied more in Solomon's voluntary offer 20000. of barley, and 20000. of wine: these measures are set forth by the name of Cori in Hebrew, of the quantity of which see before ch. 4. 22.

And King Solomon took a tribute out of all Israel of 30000. men. These were employed, 10000. a moneth in cutting down timber, together with the Sidonians in Lebanon, and preparing it; as for other workmen, that wrought in stone and in carrying burthens, the number of them was farre greater, viz. 70000. bearers of burthens and 80000. stone-cutters, and rulers in these works 3300. all which were not Israelites, but proselytes, that is strangers dwelling amongst them, 2 Chron. 2. 17. the rulers are said to be 3600. This is by Iunius reconciled thus, there were 300. to whom the 3000. gave accounts, who are numbred here, but 2 Chron. 2. 3000 more, who supplied their places in their absence. P. Martyr saith, that some reconcile this difference thus, 300. were afterwards added, who were above all the rest; and some, that 3300. were over the stone-cutters and bearers of burthens, and 300. over those that cut timber in Lebanon.

CHAP. VI.

V. 1.

Junius.

ANALIS came to passe, that in the 480. year after the coming out of the children of Israel from Egypt, the fourth year of the reign of Solomon in the moneth Zif, which is the second moneth, he began to build the house of the Lord. Iunius reckoneth these years thus; 40. in the wilderness, under Iosuah 17. the other Judges 299. Heb 40. Samuel and Saul 40. David 40. Solomon 4. for all these together make 480. Pellican ascribeth no yeares to Iosuah, because they are not set down; not to Samuel, but saith, they are included in the yeares of others, Iosuah's in Osbo-wicks, and Samuels in Sauls. Touching the speech of Iosuah, which may seem to make make against it, see before upon Judg. 11. and what is to be thought of the time, that Iosabab ruled, Iosh. 23. and Iosh. 24. 32. Vnto this reckoning agreeth Lyra, P. Martyr, and others. Onely Iosephus differing from the holy history here, as in many other places, for 480 hath 500. yeares, and according to some interpreters of his more, reckoning the yeares of the Israelites servitudes, besides the yeares of their judges. But they are all included within the yeares of their judges, as was before shewed, Iosh. 24. 32. Now this computation of the time is made here, saith Pelican, because after this the reckoning was to be made from the building of the Temple, to the destruction thereof, which Iosephus saith was 470. yeares, 6. moneths, and 10. dayes after. The cause, why Solomon began to build the temple no sooner, hath been already shewed to be for that so great preparation was made before. For the moneth Ziph, which is said to be the second moneth, it is not to be understood, according to some, of the second moneth of Solomon's fourth year, but of the second moneth of the year; and that not, as some would have it, beginning the year in Autuinn, according to the first common reckoning, but as the civill year is appointed to be begun, Exod. 12. 2. c. 13. 4. in the moneth Abib or Nisan, which answereth to April, and Ziph to May. And the building began not till the second moneth, because the Pascheover was kept in the first. Some determine also the day, as Scaliger the 29, Capellus the 8, Serbus the 6. But to leave this, as uncertain, the place, where, which is not here spoken of, is said 2 Chr. 3. 1. to be mount Moriah, in the threshing-floor of Araunah; which was shewed to David. This mount, according to Adricionius, stood on the East side of the city Ierusalem near unto the wall, and was rocky, saith Iosephus; towards the West of it, was mount Zion, Northward mount Bezetha, and Southward mount Acra, and mount Calvary. And it seemeth, that all together was called Moriah at the first, because the Lord bad Abraham go into the land of Moriah and sacrifice his sonne upon one of the mountains, that he would shew him there; but after the Lords appearing to Abraham there, this mount onely carried this name of Moriah or vision. And it was within the tribe of Benjamin according to some, but according to others of Iudah, the reason of which difference is, because sometimes it is spoken of in holy Scripture, as being in the one tribe and sometime in the other. Some therefore hold, that this mount was divided by a line between these two tribes, and so part of the temple stood in the one tribe, and part in the other. Whereas the temple is sometime spoken of, as standing upon mount Zion, it is because mount Moriah was contiguous unto it, and it was more known, and therefore under that name Moriah is to be understood as an appurtenance to it.

And the house which King Solomon built unto the Lord, was 60. cubits long, 20. cubits broad, and 30. cubits high, v. 3. and the porch before it was 20. cubits long, and 10. broad. ] The height of it here omitted, is said 2 Chron. 3. 4. to be 120. cubits, so that the porch stood as an high tower farre above the temple; wherein, saith Pelican, there were chambers to keep the treasures of the temple. This porch stood Eastward, and the most holy place; towards which they prayed, West: which was so ordered, saith Martyr, that they might not in praying be like unto heathen idolaters, who worshipped Eastwards the Sun rising, for which cause they amongst the Israelites, who worshipped with their faces to the East are taxed, Ezek. 8. 16. and Cicero and Vitruvius do testifie, that the heathen worshipped towards the East. But christians have alwayes their temples so built, that they might worship towards the East, and herein they were so farre from being blame-worthy, as that Basil saith, he thinketh, that they were directed thus to do by the tradition of the Apostles; first, to shew their desire to come into Paradiſe, and secondly, to shew that the God whom they worshipped, was Lord of the Sun, which riseth there. For the dimensions of this house, Martyr saith, it held a proportion with the tabernacle, and yet speaking of them in particular, he saith, that the most holy place in it was but 10. cubits long, the holy place 20. but this is said to be 60. And who so shall look back to Exod. 26. shall finde, that in every dimension the tabernacle was much lesse; as indeed the necessity of that time required, when it was to be carried from place to place. Whereas the porch is said to be 120. cubits high, and the Ioseph. antiq.

1. 8. c. 2.

Pelican.

Mercator.
Genebrard.
Lyra.

2 Sam. 24. 18.

Gen. 22.

V. 2, 3.

2 Chron. 3. 4.

Pelican.

P. Martyr.

Sallianus.

Jofeph. antiq.

L. 8. c. 2.

Lyra.

V. 17.

V. 20.

2 Chron. 3. 8.

V. 4.

Pagnin.
Furnus.

V. 5. 6.

P. Martyr.

V. 7.

P. Martyr.

Pellican.

house but 30, some will have this to be understood of the first story, affirming it to be so high within, but without upwards 20. cubits more; which together make 50. and another story above that forty, and a third thirty, being all together 120. likewise. Iosephus saith, that the temple was 60. cubits high, and above that another building of 60. cubits, making together 120. But that of Lyra is more probable, that next unto the first story of 30. cubits, there was another of 30. and a third above it of 60. cubits; the two upper buildings serving to lay up the holy vestments and treasures of the temple. And to shew this to be the height of the whole building, both of the porch and holy place, he alledgeth 2 Chron. 3. where the height of the temple is not mentioned severally, but onely the length and breadth; and then speaking of the porch, the text saith it was 20. cubits long, and then is added in the vulgar Latin, moreover the height was 120. cubits, and Hebr. and the height 120. which may be referred to the porch and temple also. And the temple was 40. cubits long and 20. cubits broad unto the most holy place; which was 20. cubits broad, 20. long, and 20. high. So that, as was said at the first, when the height of the temple is said to be 30. cubits, but afterwards 120, the first is to be understood of the lowest story, where incense was burnt, the last of the whole fabrick comprehending both it and the chambers above, of which nothing is said, but onely of the lower story, because those upper rooms were not for any religious use, but for stowage onely. But I rest in the first, as Pellican.

And he made windows in the house, ] But because v. 5. 6. galleries are spoken of, which were made against the wall of the house, round about; that is, on the North and South sides and the East end, and of these there were three stories, each one being 5. cubits high. The windowes of the Lords house could not but be above 15. cubits high, from the pavement to the nethermost part, and these windowes were broad within and narrow without; although Hebrew Expositours affirm the contrary, because the temple had no need of the light to come in by the windowes, seeing there were in it lights alwayes burning. Pagninus rendreth it open within and shut without, that is, narrow. Iunius shur, that is, with glasse, according to R. Ischuda, a most ancient Writer. Wherefore he rendreth it prospeltus ad commodas clausas, according to the signification of the word, פֶּסְלוֹת.

Touching the galleries made round about against all the parts of the temple, but onely the East end where the entrance was, there were of them three stories, each one being in height 5. cubits, and for the breadth of the lowest it was 5. cubits, the middlemost sixe, and the highest seven, which might so be made; as is conceived by making the wall of the temple, which was six cubits broad, one cubit narrower against the middle story, and two against the highest, and these galleries were divided into 30. chambers, twelve on the South side, twelve on the North, and sixe on the East. But some, saith Martyr, imagine, that between the lowest and the middle story, there was a space of 7. cubits and an half, and likewise between the middle and the highest, in which space there being open galleries to walk in, the windowes of the temple stood, and so the top of the highest story, was equall with the top of the temple; but he disliketh this, and holdeth rather, that this whole building was but 15. cubits high; and that the windowes were all made above it, because the sacred history saith nothing of such spaces, and if there had been such, the light could not have come into the temple, so well. Thus Martyr, who yet justly maketh a question whether any chambers were built at the West end, where the most holy place stood, because Ezekiel speaketh only of chambers on the two sides, the south and the north, placing 15. on the one side, and 15. on the other.

Here is one thing most remarkable in the building of this house set forth, the stone-work was all so prepared, that when they came to be joyned together to make the walls, neither hammer nor hatchet nor any iron tool was heard, that is, saith Martyr, either in sawing, or polishing, or carving, for otherwise it was impossible; that all things should be put and fastened together, without knocking; this served mystically to shew, that there should be no contentions in the church of God, but peace, and consent. Pellican and others think, that the stone-work onely onely is meant, which was with such skill prepared in the mountains, that there was no noise made by knocking when they were joyned together in the wals, to shew, that although here the spirituall temple in the living stones thereof be pierced with the sawes and iron tools of afflictions, yet hereafter we shall be disposed according, to grace and mercy, all afflictions ceasing.

The door of the middle chamber was on the right side of the banse, unto which they ascended by staires, and from thence to the third. ] Here the history returneth again to speak more of the galleries on the side of the Temple, on the right side, that is the South, there was a doore by which they entred into the lowest story, and from thence ascended by staires to both the stories above, so as that there was no passage through the Temple into them, nor door into the Temple but at the East end only, where the porch stood; as Martyr gathereth. But Lyra saith that this doore was through the South side of the wall of the Temple from whence they ascended to the middle story above it, and so to the highest; but forasmuch as no mention hath been made hitherto of any chambers above the Temple, it is not probable that this hath any reference to such, but onely to those that were before spoken of on the sides of the Temple.

Thus Solomon finished this house and covered it with Cedar beams arch-wise, and Cedar boards, which roof within is said v. 22. to have been covered with gold, and the walls likewise being first covered with Cedar, were overlaid with gold, v. 15. 21. 22. and the pavement being covered with firre, was overlaid with gold, v. 30. which sheweth the magnificence of this, farre surpassing all other houses of former ages, although since a Temple was built unto Diana in Ephesus much longer and broader, for the length was 425 feet, and the breadth 220; and it had 127 pillars, each one 60 foot high, and for bright shining within it was so glorious, that it dazzled the eyes of the beholders; for which it was written at the entrance to such as went in, teneis oculos.

But the word of the Lord came to Solomon, &c. ] Before the declaration of the ornaments of this house, here is shewed, what encouragement God gave unto Solomon, when he was in building it: for so Martyr thinketh that this passage comes in in the proper place, now the work not being yet perfected; but in that forwardnesse which was before spoken of, this word came to Solomon, and that most probably by a Prophet; yet some think that it was after all the works finished, and is here inserted by anticipation. But the verb here used of the present tense, the house which thou buildest, and not, hast built, sheweth the contrary. The speech here used is imperfect, the house which thou buildest, if thou keepest my Commandement; Innius supplyeth it thus. this which thou buildest is the house of which I spake unto David, Martyr, shall stand. But I think rather it may be supplied thus, the house which thou buildest will not establish my favour towards thee, although a work that I do greatly accept of, but if thou wilt keep my statutes, then I will doe as I promised to David thy father; that is, make thy kingdome prosperous and stable to thy seed after thee; so that meere building of Temples will not procure Gods favour, but when such builders are godly, and persist in holy obedience alwayes. And I will saith the Lord dwell among the children of Israel; which is so promised, because commonly like Prince-like People, and dwelling amongst them is meant nothing else, but with his favour, and being ready to hear the prayers made in that house, and ordinances and oracles and blessings, whereby they should become more famous than any other nation, otherwise God is every where.

And he built the wals of the house within with Cedar boards, &c. ] All the house within both roof and walls were covered first with Cedar, and the floore with Firre, then all was overlaid with gold; 2 Chron. 3. 5. it is said that the greater house was covered with Firre boards, unto which plates of gold were fixed, and the pavement was spread with marble. Thus indeed the Vulg. Lat. but the Hebr. which Innius followeth is, and he covered the house with precious stones for ornaments, expounding the covering with Firre of the floore, as 1 King. and this with precious stones of the spaces between the plates of gold.

He built also on the sides of the house 20 cubits with Cedar, ] This place is obscure,

V. 28.

P. Martyr.
Lyra.

V. 9.

V. 11.
P. Martyr.

V. 15.

Innius.

V. 16.

Lyra. Scholast. bistor.

obscure, because he had said before, that he covered the walles with cedar boards, and these were 30. cubits high, but here it is said 20. cubits high. Lyra and Comestor clear it thus, the West wall which was next unto the most holy place, is hereby meant, and this it is to be thought, was but 20. cubits high, the ten cubits above being left void for the fume of the incense to passe through into the most holy place. Others think, that so much of the walles was set with precious stones, Martyr followeth Lyra, and that indeed is most probable. If it be objected v. 20. the height of the most holy place was but 20. cubits, so that if the wall next unto it were 20. cubits high, there could be no space above that for the fume to passe through; Martyr answereth, that the whole house is said at the first to be 30. cubits high and 60. long, wherefore the most holy place being a part of that 60, was certainly 30. cubits high also, and whereas v. 20. it is said to be 20. as the breadth and the length was, Martyr saith, it is to be understood of the East part next unto the temple onely, which was built up no higher for the reason before said.

V. 17, 18.

V. 20, 21.

V. 19.

The house was 40. cubits long, and the cedar boards wherewith the walles were covered, were carved with pictures of wilde cucumbers and flowers, v. 29. and of cherubims and palmes. And all the house was finally over-laid with gold, and all things therein, and the most holy place with the finest gold. And in the most holy place were two cherubims made of olive wood, the height of each cherubim being 10 cubits, and they had wings extending 20 cubits from one side of the house to the other, that is, the two wings of one 10 cubits, with one of which it touched the wing of the other, and with the other the wall on one side, and the wings of the other likewise on the other side; and their faces stood towards the Temple, 2 Chr. 3. 13. wherein they differed from the cherubims set up by Moses; for they looked with their faces towards one another, Exod. 25. 20. what manner of faces they had is not here said; but Martyr saith, in the book of the Chron. it is said, that they had faces like young men, but Josephus saith it is uncertain what they were like, and they were covered with gold. If it be doubted how their wings could extend 20 cubits, seeing this was the breadth of the house, what roome was left then for their bodies? Kimbi answereth, that their wings covered their bodies behind, and so their bodies took up no room, but their wings onely in the houses breadth. Touching these cherubims and their forme and signification of the word I say no more here, because I have said enough already upon Exod. 25. 19. 20. If any shall make a question, whether Solomon did well in making such images in any part of the Temple, Moses his doing the like before him, justifieth him. Besides, it is to be held, that as of other things about the Temple, so of these he had a pattern from David, and he from God. Touching the matter of which they were made; viz. olive, it is a poore doubt, that is moved and answered by P. Martyr, how Solomon could lawfully cut down olives to make them, seeing that even in besieging a city it is forbidden to cut down such trees. For no man can conceive that hereby it was meant, that it should be alwayes unlawfull to cut down such trees, but only that no wall should be made of them for buildings or making of instruments of warre, as of other trees that bare no fruit. But here was a speciall occasion to take some of them for the use of the Sanctuary, for which use nothing was to be thought too precious, and such wood is observed to be most hard and durable, and so fit for this purpose; besides for the figure that might be herein, this wood might specially be taken.

V. 29.

V. 30.

Iunius.

V. 31.

And he made the walls of this house carved cherubims and palmes, and flowers both within and without; that is, upon that wall which was next unto the Temple.

Likewise he is said to have covered the floore of the house within and without with gold, that is, both in this inner part called the most holy place, and in that which was called the Temple or holy place, thus Iunius. But the Vulg. lat. agreeing onely about the floore, touching the walls, renders it thus; and divers pictures hanging over, and as it were going out: but the first is most agreeable to the Hebrew text.

Touching the doores of the most holy place, it is said that the upper post and the side side posts were of five sides, that is, as is most probable, with five angles according to the form of the doores, which were neither square nor round, as two leaved doores commonly are, but of a different form for greater beauty, thus Lyra; and Pellican, who also mentioneth another exposition of some, that it is meant, that this was the fifth gate; the first being of the peoples court, the second of the Priests, the third of the porch, and the fourth of the temple; and this Martyr seemeth to favour, because in speaking of the doores into the temple, it is said, he made them of four sides. But Iunius renders it: Were the fifth part of the wall; that is, the wall being 30. cubits high, and 20. broad, four cubits high, and four broad, which seemeth to be too little; but Iosephus exceeds as much when he saith, that the doores were the whole breadth and heighth of the wall, v. 33. the doores of the temple are also said to have been with four sides, the vulgar Latin, with four corners: as the other doores were with five. And all these doores were carved with cherubims, palms and flowers, being done over with gold.

Then he made the inner Court. ] 2 Chron. 4. 9. the Priests court, Which is called the inner, because it was next unto the temple before the porch; and beyond that Eastward was another Court, into which came the people; and of the inner court the walles were but three cubits high, that the people might look over into it, and see the Altar which stood there, and the Priests offering of their sacrifices thereupon; the outer was called the great court, this, saith Martyr, was so spacious, that it compassed the inner court and the temple round about, having a wall 30. cubits high, unto which galleries were adjoynd within, wherein the people might stand, and be sheltered in rainy weather, and from the heat of the Sun, and thence behold both what was done in the inner court and see the temple and worship towards it: for into the inner court they might not come, but onely the Priests and Levites to execute their office by preparing and offering their sacrifices upon the Altar, that stood there, and by washing them in the brazen sea, which stood there also, and cutting them out upon tables, of which eight stood there, and washing themselves in ten lavers, placed there also. For this court and the other did both bear the name of the temple, and therefore when as ch. 7. 39. the brazen sea and these are said to have been placed on the sides of the temple, it is to be understood, in this court; And when Iesus is said to have taught in the temple, it was in the outer court. Again, of this there were three parts; first, for men of Israel to come into, that were clean; secondly, for women, which were clean likewise; thirdly, for the unclean and for the Gentiles, which came thither to worship. And forasmuch as the temple stood upon a mount, unto which they ascended by degrees; they which were in any of these courts, might from thence see into the temple, and worship towards it. These distinctions indeed are not here mentioned; but because they were in the temple built by Herod afterwards, it is most probable, that they were now also, seeing that Solomons temple was a pattern propounded in the building of it, and if it had varied herefrom, it would not have been accepted of by the Iewes, whom to please Herod built that so costly.

In the fourth yeare in the month, Ziph this house was begun, and in the eleventh yeare in the month Bull, it was finished with all things pertaining unto it. ] The month Ziph was the 2. month of the yeare, as was shewed upon v. 1. Bull the eighth month, as is expressed in the text, that is October; so all this great work was ended in 7 yeares and 7 months. Thus the writer of this history, before he hath set forth all the things pertaining to the Temple, concludeth it with the account of the time, & then setting forth the building of Solomons own house, 6. 7. to v. 15. he returneth to the ornaments of the Temple, but 2 Chr. 3. 15. the history of making these is continued, and then briefly the building of his own house touched ch. 8. 1. after the bringing in of the vessels and dedicated things, and the dedication also ended. But because we are in the Kings, I will proceed according to the order here followed; that is, make some conclusion about the fabrick of the Temple, then speak of the house which Solomon built for himselfe, and lastly of the other appurtenances and ornaments of the Temple. And for conclusion about this magnificent building, it

Lyra.
Pellican.

P. Martyr.

V. 33.

V. 36.

P. Martyr.

V. 37.

Lyra.
The Allegory.

is

is to be understood that it was figurative, as the Tabernacle set up by Moses, figured out the old Church of the Jewes; so this house the Church of the Gentiles, which was built long after in the dayes of Christ the true Solomon, upon mount Moriab in a parcell of ground belonging to Araunah a Gentile; and it was set upon a mount, because this Church was most conspicuous, and there were of it three parts, the doores of which stood all East wards towards the rising of the Sun, that it might shine into them; beginning first in the porch, to shew that the heavenly light whereby the Church is enlightened shone first to those of the primitive times, who lived in the dayes of Christ and his Apostles. Secondly to such as lived in the times immediately succeeding by the ministry of those that were raised up after the Apostles in the times of those greivous persecutions. Thirdly to those that lived in the dayes of Constantine the great, and afterwards; when this Church enjoyed peace. And this house had windowes narrow without, and within wider; to shew the light of teaching, which encreaseth more and more. And all the walls, and all things about it were covered with gold, and set with precious stones; and adorned with divers pictures, to shew the divers vertues which shine in the faithfull. The galleries about the Temple of three stories figured out the divers degrees of the faithfull, and the doore on the right side of the Temple, by which they ascended into all these galleries, the side of Christ pierced with a speare, out of which flowed water and blood, figures of both our Sacraments, whereby wee ascend to everlasting blessednesse. The pavement of marble covered with fire did set forth faith in the heart, and an heavenly conversation outwardly; which the fire tree aptly signifieth by the streight and high growth thereof, and the plates of gold above all these, love. The partition between the Temple and the most holy place 20 cubits high; through which none might enter, but the high Priest only once a yeare, yet the fume of the incense went daily through the void room above this wall into it, and filled it; this shewed that although no man can enter into heaven till death, yet his prayers as a sweet perfume doe continually enter even whilst he liveth here, and are accepted before God.

C H A P. VII.

But Solomon built his owne house in 13 yeares, and the house of the Forrest of Libanus, &c. Here are 3 buildings more mentioned. 1. Dauids owne house. 2. The Forrest house. 3. The house of Pharaohs daughter his wife; touching all which it is to be understood, that he was in building them 13 yeares; not that he bestowed more cost upon these buildings then upon the house of the Lord, but partly because all things about these were to be prepared now, whereas for the house of the Lord, they were prepared before, and partly because here were three houses for one; and lastly because all Israel did help, and more diligently the builders followed that work then this.

The house of the Forrest of Libanus, is thought to have been so called, for the orchards and trees about it, and that therein was his armory, and to this both the King and Queen came for their recreation. Iosephus saith, that it was the hall of the Kings pallace, then which the Queen of the South admired nothing more. Theodoret thinketh, that it was called the Forrest of Libanus, not because this house was built there, for it stood upon a part of mount Sion, but because as in Libanus many Cedars grew, so here were many pillars of Cedar standing; or according to some, because it stood upon that part of Sion, which was woody like Libanus. Pellican saith, it was so called, because it was made all of wood, and that by the Hebrews it was called domus refrigerii, and that it stood near the temple, in which happily the King and his courtiers stood at the time of sacrificing, when the common people stood in the Court made for them, and the porch which hee also built, he supposeth was for women to stand in, and the two lesser porches saith Lyra, were, the one for Solomons throne, when he would sit in most royall state, the other

V. I.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

1 King. 10. 17.

Theodoret.

Pellican.

other for his Iudges to sit in and to hear common causes.

All these are said to have been made of pretious stones, that is, stones, which cost a great price, as being very great and costly to be transported, for they were stones of 8. cubits, and stones of 10. cubits sawn and polished.

And Solomon sent and took Hiram out of Tyre, he was the sonne of a widow of the tribe of Naphtali ] 2 Chron. 2. 14. the sonne of a woman of the posterity of Dan; that is, saith Iunius a widow of Naphtali by the fathers side, and of Dan by the mothers, and this mans father was a Tyrian, because he had skill to do any work in brasle. 2 Chron. 2. 14. in gold, silver, brasle and iron, wood and stone, in purple, silk and shales, and to grave any graving. Here the history returneth again to the temple, and to set forth the ornaments thereof made by Hiram. But it is to be understood, that he did not now first come into Iudea to do these works following, but came, when they first went about the building of the temple, and had an hand in all the curious works about it hitherto described, as is plainly shewed 2 Chron. 2. 14. &c. and ch. 3. 15. after the other curious works before commemorated, done by him, it is said as here v. 15. that he made two pillars of brasle to stand before the temple, and here v. 14. he is said to have done all Solomon's work; but here either of them is said to be onely 18. cubits high, there 35. cubits, which Iunius doth thus reconcile; here sacred cubits are meant, there common, and it is to be known, that the sacred measure was twice as great as the common: But thus the height should not be 35. but 36. cubits, to this he saith, that the basis might be a cubit, which because it was but half a sacred one, is not here left out, but counted with the body of the pillar, but there it is. Pellican saith, that they both together were 35. cubits high, which is there meant, and each one almost 18. for which it is said to be 18. cubits. Lyra reckoneth 35. cubits height thus; 18. in the body of the pillar, 5. the chapter upon the top of it, and 4. the head put upon that, and then the basis below must needs be 8. cubits, although it be not spoken of; and all these together make 35. This of Lyra is followed by P. Martyr, that of Pellican by Patablus and Ribera, onely herein they differ, that they say, the half cubit in the basis of each pillar was hidden in the hollow of the pillar, and therefore is not mentioned in Chron. The resolution given by Iunius I cannot subscribe unto, because it is not said in Chron. 36. but 35. and for the supposed basis, seeing no mention is made in the text of any, it is onely imaginary. And therefore, I think not that of Lyra to be received neither, and because he would make up the number of 35. here, partly by adding the cubits of the chapter, which in the Chronicles are expressly put by themselves over and above the number of 35. I subscribe therefore to Pellican, whose will soon appear to be the truest, if this and that in Chron. be compared together, for here the length of one pillar is spoken of, thereof both together, and that more exactly, there being in each pillar somewhat wanting of 18. cubits, but it is said to be so much, because it was about that length, and what it wanted was not worth the speaking of, unlesse we shall say with Patablus, that some part of the pillars being set up, was hid, and the reckoning in the Chron. is onely of the length, which appeared. The bignesse of each pillar was such, that a threed of 12. cubits did compass it. So Ier. 52. 21. where it is also said to be hollow, and that the thicknesse was 4. fingers.

And he made two Chapiters, each one five cubits high, and set them upon the pillars, &c ] These are called crowns, Ier. 52. 22. that is, saith R. Levi, not like unto Kings crowns, but like globes, of a just and proportionable bignesse to the pillars, and these were fixed into the pillars, being set one against another like two caps, and upon these two were set two other lesser heads rising up, as Lyra saith, from the midle of them with a narrower compass four cubits high, so that the whole crown and ornament above it standing upon the pillar, was nine cubits high, being most curiously wrought all over in the brasle, of which they were made with rowes of net-works, and 200. pomegranats to each head, that is, 100. above and as many beneath, artificially hanged round about it. Martyr saith, that these pillars did resemble a man, the nether part setting forth his feet, the second the trunk of his body, the third his head, and the fourth his hat, and that the use of them

V. 9.
V. 10.

V. 13.

2 Chron. 3. 15
V. 15.

Iunius.

Pellican.

Lyra.

V. 16.

V. 17, 18.

P. Martyr.

was

was the ornament, signifying Gods protection over this house, as of old the pillar of fire and the pillar of smoke, shewed his protection over them in the wilderness. And whereas they had names given them, which happily were engraven in them, the one being named Iachim and the other Bauz, signifying firmness and fortitude, this shewed the stability of this house, and of the spirituall temple for ever figured out hereby, the Rabbins say, of the house of David.

V. 23.

He made also a molten sea of 10 cubits from brim to brim round, in the circuit, the height 5 cubits, and a shroud of 30 cubits did compass it about. &c.] The use of this brazen sea is not here set down, but Exod. 30. 17, 18. it said, that a vessell of brass was made for the Tabernacle, in which Aaron and his sonnes might wash their hands and feet, and for the like use was made, yet not for them to goe into, as Lyra hath it. But that they might wash with the water which issued out of it by rocks round about, for which cause Martyr thinketh that the heads of the bulls served, whereof there are said to be 12. which did beare up this sea, 3 towards the East, 3 to the West, 3 to the North, and 3 to the South. The capacity of this sea is said to be of 2000 baths, that is, such measures of liquid things, as an Ephah is of dry, of which see Exod. 16. but Iosephus saith, that a bath was 62 sextaries, that is, 93 pints, which make 11 gallons, and 5 pints. 2000 Baths, 22250 Gallons; whereas 2 Chron. 4. 5. it is 3000 baths, Iunius reconciles it thus, there were commonly put into it 2000. but it could contain 3000. Lyra following the Vulg. Lat. hath it, 2000 baths here, and 3000 measures there, saying that a bath was a measure and a halfe, and so 3000 measures are no more then 2000 baths, yea in this place the Vulg. Lat. hath both, 2000 Baths, that is, 3000 measures; but he confesseth that it crept into the text by the ignorance of the writer. But it is to be understood, that neither here, nor 2 Cron. 4. 5. any other word is used but baths, so that Lyra his solution cannot hold, unless, as some, he will have baths and measures to be all one, but a distinction between baths, one sort being lesse by the third part then the other. Cajetan, Ribera, and Sextarius follow Iunius, but this is rather to be preferred, if there were any such difference of baths. It is called a sea, because it was usuall amongst the Hebrewes, to call the gathering together of much water seas.

2 Chron. 4. 5.
Lyra.
P. Martyr.

Iunius.
Lyra.

V. 27.

And he made 10 brazen bases, the length of each one 4 cubits, and the breadth 4 cubits, and the height 3 cubits.] Much is here spoken in describing these bases which yet were nothing else, but frames to set the lavers upon, of which v. 38. and they were to hold water to wash the flesh of the sacrifices, each one containing 40 baths, and these were placed 5 on one side of the Preills Court, and 5 on the other; the brazen sea being nearest to the sacrifices; it is to be understood that they were first washed at the poole described, John 5. by the Nethinims. And for the forme of the bases, it is generally held, saith Lyra, that they were four square standing upon four wheeles, whereupon they might be removed, and their height said to be 3 cubits, is to be understood of the bases and wheel together, and the square of each basis about was made into a round but one cubit and an halfe over, fit for the lance to stand upon, being of the same measure downward, but at the top of it was but one cubit over, yet in the midst it swelled out into 4 cubits according to the square of the basis, and outwardly both above and beneath, were divers pictures made of Lions and Cherubims for ornament, and four shoulders or pillars went out from the basis above to stay the laver, when it was set on. And the belly of the laver must needs be conceived to be in extent answerable to the basis that is, 4 cubits; because otherwise it would not have contained 40 baths, yea the Hebrewes holding that so it could not contain thus much, say that it was not narrow, but broad at the top, being thus also more fit to wash any thing in, and this is most probable, thus also Martyr. The 4 cubits therefore spoken of in text are to be attributed to the Diameter above, and not according to the height, which must not be conceived to be above one cubit, because otherwise it would have been too high to reach unto to wash any thing therein. And if each laver contained 40 baths, they altogether contained 2000 as the brazen sea did.

2 Chron. 4. 6.
V. 38, 39.

Lyra.

2 Chron. 4. 6.
P. Martyr.

V. 40.
Lyra.

Martyr. Lyra made chaldrons, fire shovels, and basons. The chaldrons are thought by Lyra to have been to put the ashes of the Altar into to be carried away, but but by Martyr, to seethe the flesh of the peace-offerings in, where with they feasted, that brought these offerings, but the Priests had part of it also, and in the time of Ely's sonnes, one came with a flesh-hook and thrust it into a chaldron, and whatsoever it brought up was the Priests, 1 Sam. 2. But the word כִּירֹרֶת here used, which in the vulgar Latin is rendred Lebetes, is by Martyr rendred conche, as the ten lavers before spoken, because the word which setteth the forth & these is the same. And it is an other word, סִירָרֶת which is used v. 45. and is by him rendred chaldrons, although the vulgar Latin hath it lebetes, in both places. But because they are two divers words, the first happily may set forth some brazen vessell to put ashes into, the other a chaldron or pot to boyl meat in. The fire-shovels were to gather up the ashes, and to carry coals from the altar to put into the censers in the temple for the incense, and the basons to receive the blood of the sacrifices, and the drink-offerings. These things being thus distinctly mentioned, v. 41, 42, 43, 44, 45. there is a capitulation of them all together, and v. 46. it is shewed, that they were all cast in the plain of Iordan. He made also an altar of gold, and a table of gold for the shew-bread. 2 Chron. 4. 19. It is said Tables; and v. 8. he made 10. tables, placing five on the right side, and five on the left, whereas then a table is there spoken of, Martyr thinketh, that it is meant of one more eminent then the rest, which was for the shew-bread to be set upon, and that the other tables were for basons and vials of gold and silver to stand upon, according to Iosephus, who saith, that Solomon made 2000. basons, and 4000. vials. But it is not only said 2 Chron. 4. 19. that he made tables, but tables for the shew-bread; and Lysa thinketh, that whereas upon the table made by Moses, there were set 12. breads, that there were 12. upon every one of these tables, but haply one was more excellent then the rest, and this only is spoken of here. The golden Altar was for incense, it stood in the temple nigh to the most holy place, into which the fume might enter above, where it was open, and be as a cloud above the Oracle. Of the shew-bread and mystery therein, and the golden table made by Moses, whereupon it stood, which was then but one, see before Exod. 25. 23. where also is shewed of what it was made, viz. of cedar, and overlaid with gold, and what was the height, length, and breadth thereof.

And candlesticks, five on the right side, and five on the left before the oracle, of most pure gold. Moses made but one only, unto which Solomon added 10 more, which if they were like unto that of Moses, each candlestick held many lights, and an whole talent of gold went to it; the number of lights and tables for shew-bread thus multiplyed under Solomon, who was a figure of Christ did figuratively foreshew that under the Gospell the light should be much more then under the law, and the spirituall food of the word of God, by the accession of the books of the new Testament, to these of the old: whereas it is said, five on the right side, and five on the left; this is by the Hebrewes saith Pellican, understood of the candlestick made by Moses, these stood five on the right side of it, and five on the left, and that in the midst on the South side of the temple; & the 10 tables likewise were placed about the table made by Moses on the North side, when these and all other utensils were made for the Temple, Solomon brought in all the things which were dedicated by David, whereupon the Rabbins saith Pellican, observe, that he made all things with the treasure which he had gathered in 4 years, but none of them with the treasure gathered by David as being not worthy to be put to this use, but how truly, let the reader judge.

For the mylticall signification of the two pillars, enough hath been said before upon v. 23. The brazen sea figured out Baptisme, wherein all the Priests, that is, the elect wash themselves, and are cleansed, that they may appear acceptably before God. And well is it called a sea, because a naturall sea, that is, the red sea first figured out Baptisme, 1 Cor. 10. 1. now this sea made by art.

The 12. oxen, which did bear up this sea, did figure out the 12. Apostles, who went into all parts of the world teaching and baptizing, as these looked three towards the East, three to the West, &c. for that oxen do apply resemble preachers, is shewed 1 Cor. 9. where it is said, thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox which treadeth out the corn.

P. Martyr.

V. 46.

V. 48.

P. Martyr.

Lysa.

V. 49.

Pellican.

V. 51.

The Mystery.

This sea contained 2000. baths, to shew, that to the baptism figured out hereby, come two peoples, the Jewes and the Gentiles; so Beda.

The ten bales bearing up the lavers, in which the sacrifices were washed, and afterwards put upon the Altar to be burnt with fire, did also figure out the preachers of the word, by whose ministry as the elect are washed in baptism, as Priests to serve God at his Altar, so they are washed, as holocausts, that by the imposition of hands, the holy Ghost as fire might come upon them, and make them sacrifices unto God, which is, when they are filled with his gifts, the accomplishment of which is most notably to be seen in the believing Samaritans, baptized by Philip, but afterwards by the imposition of the hands of Peter receiving the holy Ghost. The four wheels which each of these bales had, did set forth the four Evangelists, upon which they did run into all parts, and their answering to one another in all things, the harmony betwixt the Evangelists. The lavers set upon these bales containing each one 40. baths, saith Beda, shewed, that such as are truly baptized, believe the faith set forth in the 4. Evangelists and keep the ten commandments, because ten multiplied by four make forty. And to shew, that baptism was hereby figured out, all these vessels were made near unto Jordan, where Christ was baptized. For the figure in the golden Altar, the tables and shewbread and candle-sticks, enough hath been said before, and upon Exod. 25.

CHAP. VIII.

V. 1.

Then Solomon called all the Elders of Israel and the heads of the tribes, and the Princes of the fathers of the children of Israel to Jerusalem, to carry the ark from the Ark from the city of David, &c. ] At what time this was done, is shewed v. 2. in the month Ethanan in the solemnity, the 7. month, and upon what day it began and ended, 2 Chron. 7. 9. viz. the 8. day of the 7. month, counting from thence 14. dayes, unto which 8. being added make 22, and upon the 23. day the people were dismissed; that is, as Innis hath it, at the end of that day, for it was the last of the feast of tabernacles, which began the 15. day of this month, and lasted 8. dayes, the first and the 8. being dayes of rest, wherein no servile work might be done. And the King chose this time, that the people might be spared from the trouble of taking this journey purposely, for now they came hither to celebrate the feast of tabernacles before their return home. Wherefore Pellican crieth, who saith, that this solemnity was the 10. day, which was the day of expiation, neither did this meeting, which was to feast and to rejoice agree to that, seeing it was a day of fasting. And whereas ch. 6. 38. it is said that all things belonging to the temple were finished in the 8. month, it appeareth, that this dedication was made before the finishing of all things, the great abundance of implements for greater glory being made afterwards, but this opportunity taken, before in the month, which was fittest, being a month of many festivals, as appeareth, Levit. 23. For the name of the month Ethanan, it is most probably so called from עָתָנָה to come, because both then all the fruits of the earth were come in, and sacrifices came plentifully to the Tabernacle, in way of thankfulness: but some derive it from עֲתָנָה strength, because the fruits of the earth where with their garners were filled now, were the staffe and strength of the land. They, which were now gathered together, were the Princes and heads of families, who brought the people with them, as Iosephus saith.

V. 3.

Then the Priests bare the Ark into the most holy place, &c. ] That holy signe of Gods presence, which had hitherto been divers times carried from place to place, as having no settled place to rest in, now cometh to one, and is after this never carried out by the Priests any more, therefore it is said, there it is to this day. But whereas the Priests are said here to carry it, 2 Chron. 5. 4. the Levites are said to carry it, and indeed to them this work was appointed, Numb. 4. This is by Martyr reconciled thus, the Priests, who carried it, were of the tribe of Levi, and therefore might by a general name be called Levites, and although the Levites ordinarily carried the Ark, when they travelled far in the wilderness, yet at some speciall times, such as this was, when God would work miracles by the Ark, the Priests

Alt. 8.

Funim.

Pellican.

P. Martyr.

Folb 3.
Folb 6.

Priests were for more honour to carry it. And if by Levites a distinct order from the Priests of that tribe be understood in the Chronicles, it is to be thought, that the Priests took the Ark of the Levites, when they came at the Temple and had brought it thither, and so carried it into the most holy place, into which the Levites might not enter, and thus both the Priests carried it, as is here said, and the Levites, as there. But it is to be noted, that they are not onely said to have carried the Ark, but also the Tabernacle and the vessels thereof, both Priests and Levites carried them, the one receiving them at the hands of the other, that is, the Levites first of the Priests, when they had prepared them and brought them forth, and the Priests of them again, at the Temple. For hither God in his providence would have them now both brought, which had a long time been disjoyned, by this means, two places being sanctified for divine worship and sacrifice, that after this, there might be no more two places, but one onely, prefiguring the conjoyning of two peoples, Jewes and Gentiles in one Christian Church, under the true Solomon. Now the Ark was brought from Zion, and the Tabernacle from Gibeon, where it long abode: yet some hold it most probable, that by the Tabernacle at this time brought into the temple is meant the Tabernacle which David made, although the other was brought thither also afterwards, because no mention is made of any other place, from whence, but onely of Zion.

And King Solomon and all the congregation of Israel was with him before the Ark sacrificing sheep and oxen, which could not be numbered. ] As when the Ark was carried before to the Tabernacle prepared by David, the King and people went before, and the Priests having gone 6. paces stayed, and then sacrifices were offered, so at this time it is to be conceived, that King Solomon, with his train going before, upon a stay made of the Ark, these sacrifices being many more were offered, and they are said to be without number, because their number was so great, that it could not well be counted.

Then the Ark was by the Priests carried into the most holy place and set there, under the wings of the Cherubims, and they drew out the barres thereof, the heads whereof appeared out of the Sanctuary before the Oracle, and did not appear without. Iosephus relateth a miracle here, which the Rabbins say was wrought now, viz. that the doors of the Sanctuary opened of themselves to give way to the Ark; but seeing the sacred History, which omitteth not other miracles at this time, saith nothing of this, it is rather to be rejected, as an invention of theirs, then received. For the appearing of the heads of these barres, and not appearing without, R. Solomon, as Lyra hath it, saith, that they were drawn out so farre, as that they did a little bear out the veil, as a womans dug doth her breast-piece, whereby a man might see that they were so farre extended, but seen they could not be by any in the Temple, no more then a mans hand having a glove upon it; and this is followed by Martyr, yet Lyra holds another solution more probable, which he saith, is the solution of the Doctours, viz. that the ends or heads of the bars might be seen without by such as were near, but not by those that were farther off, and this he confirmeth by disproving the other, in saying, that besides the veil there was a wall, which parted the most holy place from the temple; and therefore the barres could not be seen by bearing out the veil. But this is by Martyr well answered, that the doores against which the barres were drawn out, stood always open, the veil hanging before it, as appeareth, for that at the passion of Christ the veil being rent, the way into the most holy place was laid open, and he conjectureth this to be the end of the barres being drawn out and standing so continually, that the passage of the high Priest, when he entred once a year, might be on both sides fenced hereby. And there they are to this day, that is, till the time of the captivity of Babylon. Iunius, There it is to this day, that is, the Ark, but the word used is of the plurall number and not of the singular.

There was nothing in the Ark, but onely the two tables, &c. ] This seemeth to disagree with Hebr. 9. 4. where it is said, that in the Ark were these two tables and the pot of Manna, and Aarons rod; but Iunius reconcileth it thus, these were laid up about the Ark, but not within it, for there onely the tables were, and these

V. 4.

V. 5.

V. 6, 7, 8.

Iosephus.Lyra.Iunius.

V. 9.

Iunius.

Lyra.

before the testimony, Exod. 16. 35. Numb. 17. and therefore he expounds opening of the tabernacle; and this is one solution of Lyra and some others, but he hath another, viz. That the two tables onely were first laid there, as the most precious thing, to hold which the ark was made, and that the other two were laid up there afterwards only occasionally. Things might be diversly ordered in the time of Moses and afterwards, then these three things being in the Ark, but now only the two tables of the Law, or the pot and rod were put in afterwards by Jeremiah, see my Expos. Heb. 9. 4.

V. 10.
2 Chron. 5. 11.

And it came to passe, that when the Priests went out of the sanctuary, a cloud filled the house of the Lord, &c. ] 2 Chron. 5. 11. This is more largely related, for all the Priests were present and not those four onely, who carried the Ark in, the distributions into courses not being at this time observed, and the Levites were also present with instruments of musick, and Priests with trumpets, 120. praising the Lord, then the cloud filled the house, neither could the Priests stand to minister for the cloud. Hereby God manifested his presence, and acceptance of this house for his own, as when the Tabernacle was newly set up he had done the like, Numb. 9. 15. And this meanes of manifesting his presence, he used from the first coming of the children of Israel out of Egypt, Exod. 13. 21. and especially upon Sinai at the giving of the law, and speaketh of it Levit. 16. 2. Thus almost Martyr, who also addeth, the cloud was bright, and yet dark upward, as a fire newly beginning to flame with a black cloud upon the top. But some, saith Lyra, hold, that it was a cloud shining so brightly, as that Marth. 17. at the transfiguration of Christ, as that the Priests were forced to go farther off, as not able to stand nigh unto it to behold it; but he rather holdeth with Martyr, that it was both bright and darknesse, because of a passage in Solomons speech, v. 11.

P. Martyr.

Lyra.

V. 12.
Pellican.

The Lord hath said, that he would dwell in the dark. ] And that the Priests retired further out of reverence. Pellican saith, by the Priests being driven out by this cloud appearing, was shewed, that the time should come, when this Priesthood should minister no more by carnall rights in Gods house. Comestor following Josephus saith, that the darknesse of this cloud was such, that the Priests could not see to minister, and therefore it is said, they could not stand to minister: so likewise

Schol. histor.

Tostatus.

Hugo Cardinalis. Now because the place where the Priests stood to minister was in the Priests court, where was the brazen Altar, and abundance of sacrifices were now offered, Tostatus thinketh, that the clouds filling of the house, is to be understood of that court also. I hold with Lyra, that when the cloud filled the house they could not stand to minister, because they durst not presume to stand, where the glory of the Lord supplied the room, and indeed what place could they have there, where Gods glory filled all?

V. 13.

Then Solomon said the Lord hath said, that he would dwell in the darknesse. ] That is, Levit. 16. 1. when he said unto Moses, that he would appear in a cloud, so Isidore and Lyra also, but he thinketh that it may bee moreover expounded of his fact, in that he went before the children of Israel in a cloud in the wilderness, and was in a cloud upon mount Sinai, and the tabernacle for his doing thus from time to time, was in effect saying, that he would dwell in it. And hereby Solomon both gathered, and would have the people understand that God was now present in this cloud; which was as it were, his common habitation.

Junius.
Lyra.

And a cloud saith Martyr, was most aptly used to shew Gods glory to men, because we cannot in this life see him, but darkly, and as it were, through a cloud. 1 Cor. 13. 12. but the time shall come, that we shall see him clearly, and know as we are known; where Solomon was he spake this, is expressed v. 22. 6. viz. before the brazen Altar; whereupon some think that he was in the Priests court, for there that Altar stood. But this is by others rejected, because none but the Priests might come in there; to which we may adde, that the Priests could not stand there now to minister by reason of the cloud, and therefore neither could the King be there to make this speech and prayer. It is then to be held that he stood not there, but in the Israelites court, turning his face to the Altar when he prayed; for which the scaffold upon which he stood, is said to have been set in the court; and because this was before the Altar, to which he first looked, and again after that, his face being turned to the people, he spake unto them; he turned himselfe again to pray, he is said to have stood by or before the Altar.

2 Chron. 3. 13.

was

Then Solomon turned his face and blessed all the congregation of Israel, and all the congregation of Israel stood. They stood, saith Ben Gerson, for none might sit in that court, but the King only for his great dignity, because it was a place of adoration. What the King said when he blessed them is not set down, but it is to be understood, that he prayed for all good unto them.

Then he blessed God for fulfilling what he had promised to David his father in granting him his son to build him an house, which was in Davids mind, and approved before, although God in his providence had otherwise appointed it. Whence Martyr gathereth, that a man may sometimes lawfully will that, which God willeth not; viz. before that he hath revealed it, being then ready to submit to his blessed will, as David was in this matter; and Christ when he had prayed, that that cup might passe from him. 2 Chr. 6. 5. he chose not a man to rule, that is a man & his posterity after him.

Then Solomon stood before the Lord in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and stretching out his hands to heaven he said, &c. 2 Chron. 6. 13. He set up a brazen scaffold, and kneeling down thereupon, he stretched out his hands to heaven, and said; and v. 54. he is said to have kneeled upon both his knees. This scaffold was set up that he might be seen and heard the better by the people round about him. He bowed his knees for reverence to God, as we ought also to doe, especially in our publick prayers, because this gesture is specially commended unto us in the holy scriptures, although it is not to be doubted, but that devout and humble prayers made in faith are accepted of, whatsoever position of body a man bee in; standing, walking, riding, lying, or sitting: And in praying we must lift up our hands to shew that we look for all our help and comfort from heaven.

O Lord God of Israel, there is no God like unto thee. Hee beginneth his prayer with ascribing all praise and glory to God for his excellency and sure performing of his promises, especially which he made to David. In saying there is no God like unto thee, he meaneth not any person in the Trinity, as the Arrians have objected it; but amongst those that the superstitious world accounted Gods, for the Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost are one God, to whom this praise is given. Then he prayeth for the constant performance of the promise made to David; not that hee doubted thereof, but for so much as it was upon condition of his posterities perseverance in obedience to his lawes, that this grace might be given unto them continually.

Thirdly, he sheweth that the end of his building this house was not for God to dwell in it; for the heaven of heavens could not contain him, who is infinite; but that the people resorting to this house to pray, which was built to the honour of his name, might the rather be heard, and have their petitions granted.

Fourthly, he beseecheth God to heare the prayers made there in divers particular cases, as 1. if any man that had wronged his neighbour came to sweare there; that is, saith Lysa, some goods of his neighbour being committed to his custody, if when his neighbour came to require them againe, they could not bee found, and hee to whom they were committed, came to the Temple to sweare his own innocency about the conveying of them away: for in this case he was appointed to cleare himselfe by oath, Exod. 22. that God would lay some judgement upon him, whereby it might be manifest, that he was perjured, and to deale so with the innocent, that his innocency might plainly appeare; and so in other like cases. 2. If the people of Israel for their finnes should fall before their enemies, but return and pray in this house, &c. A case is here put which was frequent in the time of the Judges, for sin to be given into the hands of their enemies, and upon their repentance and praying again, to be delivered. But how is it said, if they come and pray in this house, pardon thou their sinne and bring them back into the land; if they were carried out of the land, how could they come to pray in that house? Kimbi resolveth this well, the case is of some being carried away, others slaine, and some still remaining; now the meaning is, if these that remain shall hum-

V. 14.
P. Martyr.

V. 15.

V. 22.
2 Chron. 6. 13.

V. 23.

V. 25, 26.

V. 27, 28, 29.

V. 31, 32.
Lysa.

V. 33, 34.

R. Kimbi.

ble themselves in this house, then bring back those that were carried away captive, they also turning to thee by true repentance.

3.
V. 35.

P. Martyr.

3. If the heavens be shut that it raineth not, &c. ] Here by heavens, saith Martyr, some understand the middle region of the aire, where the clouds are ingendred, but he understandeth rather the higher heavens, where the starres are, by the influence whereof rain cometh; and when this is stopped, they may be said to be shut. I rather think according to the common opinion that the parts from whence the rain commeth immediately are meant, or both these and the other also: and it is here intimated, that it is shut by sin, and opened by penitent prayer, whereby we may see of what extent the power of sin is, to shut the heavens from raining, and to shut out of the kingdome of heaven. There is also a judgement sometimes by too much rain, but those dry parts were seldom annoyed so; he therefore directs his petition as their necessity most required, whose punishment was by drought, and not by rain.

V. 37.
4.

Lyr.
Junius.

Pagninus.

And he prayeth not only that God would pardon their sin, but also shew them the good way and make them to walk in it, and so to send rain; whereby is intimated that to come into favour with God, it is necessary not only to be sorry for our finnes past, but also to walk righteously before him for time to come.

If famine arise in the land, if pestilence, a corrupt ayre, if blasting, the locust, or mil-dew, &c. ] Here is a 4th. case, wherein many judgements are put together, which also come for sin. A corrupt ayre is that which causeth many diseases, saith Lyr.; Martyr hath it, drynesse; whereby the corn is dried away, so as that the eare seeming full hath nothing in it when it is rubbed; Junius, Vredo a burning, by the immoderate heat of the Sun. The word is רדף a smiting by the East wind according to Pagninus. The next word רדף is indifferently rendered arugo, or rubigo, blasting, or mil-dew; and the next unto the locust, חפץ bruchus, a kind of locust. There are divers wayes of annoying the corne, either by sharp winds, or calme weather, and hot gleames of the Sun comming upon the corne, having a dew upon it, and corrupting it; or the enemy besieging them: all which tend to famine, and come not by chance; but the divine Majesty being provoked by sin, as the very heathen acknowledged; for Numa Pompilius instituted the feasts called rubigalia to be kept in May for the pacifying of the gods; as Pliny saith, lib. 18. and the feasts called Floralia were appointed by the oracles of a Sybill for the same purpose; and Theophrastus and others call it a divine force, as Martyr noteth. When any of these judgements are sent, and prayers be here made by them that know the plague of their own heart, &c. for he saith, God only knoweth the hearts of all men. So that the ground of all plagues is the plague and infection of sin in a mans heart, and therefore must be healed by turning therefrom. And to God only here it is shewed, that wee must pray in all times of our misery, and not to Saints or Angels, because he only knoweth the heart, and the affections thereof; and so how to deale with every one accordingly, and not as he desireth, who hath in him an evill heart.

V. 38.
V. 39.

V. 41.
5.

Moreover for strangers, which are not of thy people Israel, &c. ] Here is a fifth particular case of a strangers comming to the Temple to pray, that is, one who was not of the seed of Abraham, for a court was made, as for the Iewes that were cleane to come into to pray, so for those that were not yet cleansed, into which the Gentiles also might come. And this was thus done to allure the Gentiles to the worship of the true God, and that not in vain, because many did come thither to worship, and to learn the knowledge of God, as the Steward of Candaces Queen of Ethiopia, Act. 8. and many of all nations, Act. 2. And it is not to be doubted, but that this passage is propheticall of the nations flowing to the mountain of the Lord, and comming up unto it, as Esa. 2. Whereas v. 43. he prayeth that the Lord would heare and doe according to all things that strangers should there pray for: but before in speaking of Israel that he would deale with every one according to his wayes, the Rabbins note, that hee prayed more for the Gentiles then for the Israelies, because to have all granted, that a man desireth is a greater thing, then to be deale withall according to his wayes. But they say, he prayed thus for them, them, because they were ignorant of the lawes of God, and therefore if God should have done for them but according to their wayes, none of their petitions could have been granted, but from the Israelites who knew the law and were instructed in it, living accordingly was expected: or if they had erred herefrom, a turning to it again, or else there could be none expectance of a grant to their desires.

The 6 particular case, v. 44, 45. &c. is, when God should send them to warre against their enemies, as he had done Saul against the Amalekites, & Phinees against the Midianites; then if they should pray in or towards this house, hee beseecheth God to judge their cause; that is, to give them victory who goe not out of their own minds, being lead by covetousnesse or ambition, but being sent of God to execute his judgements against the wicked enemies of his people. And hereby is intimated, that alwayes in making warre preparation should be made unto it by prayer, because that even when they were sure of victory, for so much as God sent them, they were to pray to him for successe.

The 7 particular case, v. 46, 47. &c. is, when for sinne they should be delivered into the hands of their enemies, and be carried away captive into a strange land; if they repent and pray towards this house: hee beseecheth God to move their enemies hearts to pity them; and thus Daniel prayed in the Babylonish captivity, and the people captived, found great favour there.

In conclusion, he argueth from Gods separating of the children of Israel to be his peculiar people, as he spake by Moses; Deut. 7. 2 Chron. 6. there is the same prayer, but with some difference of words; and the words of v. 51. and v. 53. are wholly omitted, but this is added more v. 41, 42, Arise now (O Lord God) to thy rest, thou and the arke of thy strength, let thy Priests be clothed with health, and let thy chosen people rejoyce. Turn not away thy face from thine anointed, &c. And at the end of these words, say the Rabbins, the doores of the most holy place opened alone. But I passe this over, as the Scripture doth, as an invention of their owne. For the words, the meaning is, remove not (O Lord) the Arke, the signe of thy presence any more from hence, but let it rest in the most holy place which I have built for it for ever, to the comfort of thy people. And hee calleth it the Arke of his strength, because hereby he had shewed his strength in working wonders.

Let thy Priests be clothed with health or safety, that is, preserve them, that they may never again be destroyed, as sometime they were in Nob, and let thy Saints rejoyce for the safety of this place, being alwayes kept from doing any thing, whereby thou shouldst be provoked against it, to lay it wast. And never turn away thy face from me thine anointed, but if I sin, as I and all men are subject to sin: yet remember thy promises to David, and be propitious unto me, and to my posterity for ever: to this effect Pellican.

Solomon having ended his prayer made upon his knees, rose up and blessed all the congregation of Israel with a loud voice, &c. His blessing was a praying for all good unto them. But, which is here omitted, 2 Chron. 7. 1. It is said, when Solomon had done praying, fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt offerings and sacrifices, and the majesty of the Lord filled the house. A cloud is said before to have filled the house, which is called the glory of the Lord, v. 6, 7. and the sacrifices of beeves and sheep offered, are said to be innumerable, but here 22000. beeves and 100000. sheep, v. 63. which we must not conceive to have been offered all in one day, but in divers dayes, viz. in 14. according to the time, that this feast lasted, v. 65. and upon the 8. day, the people were dismissed, v. 66. that is, the 8. after the second 7. kept for the feast of tabernacles, as the first 7. were kept for the feast of dedication. The fire coming down upon the sacrifices, was to shew Gods gracious acceptance. And by reason of the great multitude of sacrifices, which the brazen Altar could not contain, he sanctified the middle of the Priests court, that is, saith Lyra, he caused the high Priest to sanctifie the pavement of that court near unto the Altar, that thereupon sacrifices might be offered also.

CHAP.

Note.

6.
V. 44, 45.

Note.

7.
V. 46, 47, 48.

V. 53.
2 Chron. 6.

Pellican.

V. 54.
2 Chron. 7. 1.

See before upon verse 1.

Lyra.

C H A P. IX.

V. 2.

THe Lord appeared to Solomon the second time. 2 Chron. 7. 12. He appeared unto him in the night, so he did also the first time in Gibeon in a dream. And now he told him that he had heard his prayer, and had sanctified this house to put his name there for ever, and if he and his posterity did walk in his wayes, he promised that his kingdome should be perpetuall; but otherwise, if they degenerated, he threatned to cast of Israel and this house, &c. 2 Chron. 7. 13, 14, 15. I have chosen this house for sacrifice, and if the heavens be shut, or the locust devoureth, &c. and then followeth, I will put my name here for ever, &c. His sanctifying of that house, was his setting it apart for divine worship, as is further expressed by saying, I will put my name here, that is, to be called upon, and thus my benefits may be distributed amongst such, as worship me in this place. Whereas it is added, for ever, this is to be understood, as the word לעולם is often used, to a long period of time, which is unto men unknown; for the ever of legall rites and ceremonies, till the coming of the Messiah, who was figured out by this temple, for then the use of that temple was at an end, although the children of Israel had not by their sinnes provoked God to destroy it.

V. 10.

At the end of 20. yeares, when Solomon had built the house of the Lord and his own house Here, by his own house, all other his buildings before commemorated, which he made in 13. yeares are meant, for every one was the Kings house and built to shew his magnificence, for unto the time of building of these, 7. yeares, which he spent in building the Lords house being added, they together make 20.

V. 11.

V. 12, 13.

Pellican.
P. Martyr.

Then Solomon gave to King Hiram for all the cedars and firre-trees and gold received of him towards his buildings, 20. towns in the land of Galilee. But when he saw them, he not being pleased with them, called them the land of Cabul, which as Pellican hath it, signifieth, sandy and barren; according to Martyr, displeasing; so likewise Iunius, alledging Iosephus, who saith that it is a Phœnician word, signifying that, which pleaseth not: whereas some expound it dirty, that is not so probable, because those grounds were all generally dry, and such as lay lowest and were wettest, were most fruitfull. These 20. towns or cities were given to Hiram in way of recompence for all his bounty towards Solomon, in not onely supplying him with timber, but also abundance of gold towards his buildings, viz. 120. talents, as is more expressly set down v. 14. Hiram had sent unto the King 120. talents of gold which amounted, according to Budens to 92400. crowns, reckoning to every talent 770. Touching the timber given by Hiram to Solomon, it is said before to have been cut down in Lebanon, which lay within the Land of Canaan; that is, within Solomons kingdom; his giving of this therefore is to be expounded of his cutting it down by his Tyrians, and transporting it for his use, but the gold; where-with he abounded, as being brought from Ophir by his ships, it is to be thought, that he gave out of his piety towards the building of the Lords house. Although Martyr seemeth sometime to hold, that his giving is to be understood of his giving for a price; of which there is no probability, for then it had not been thank-worthy. But Solomon to recompence it, gave him these 20. townes, as to recompence the labour of his servants about the timber; he had before given him abundance of corn and oyl.

But was it justifiable in Solomon to give away to a heathen King any part of the Lords inheritance appropriated to the children of Israel? for although the present King were godly, yet his successors might be idolaters again, as he at the first was by the testimony of Iosephus, before his acquaintance with David, and then there would be danger by this meanes of corrupting the people of Israel that dwelt there. Some answer, that he did not give them to as that the children of Israel lost any land hereby, for Hiram gave him as many cities in his countrey, 1 Chron. 8. 2. but the text there saith not, either that he gave him so many, or in his countrey; but onely, that Solomon built the cities, which Hiram gave unto him, and caused the children children of Israel to dwell in them. Others, that Hiram disliking the cities given him by Solomon, gave him them again, and so by the providence of God it fell out, that none of the holy land was alienated: but against this maketh that circumstance, he caused the children of Israel to dwell in them, for in those townes of Galilee they dwelt before. Some say that Solomon cannot be justified herein no more then other holy men of old, in all their actions. Others justifie this fact, by saying that it was done in a figure of the conversion of the Gentiles, and making one people of Jewes and Gentiles, not doubting but that he was by the instinct of the spirit moved, thus to doe. And some, that Solomon gave not these townes to Hiram for ever, but for certain yeares the profits arising out of them to requite him for the gold that he sent him, but seeing it is said that he gave him them, this is but a light conjecture. It seemeth to me that he gave him these towns for his life-time, but not to his heys after him, which he might well do out of his love unto him so good a friend, & so great a wel-willer to the children of Israel; & I exclude not the mystical signification before spoken of, but do think, that it may be taken in also. Now for the cities which Hiram gave unto Solomon, it is uncertain how many they were, or where they stood, onely it is said, that when they were given unto Solomon, he built them, and put Israelites into them, happily they were cities decayed for want of inhabitants, the countrey of the King of Tyre not being so full of people, and upon Solomons giving the benefit of certain cities to Hiram, most probably he gave him them, as one striving with Solomon in courtships.

Rabbini.

Iosephus writing of Hiram bringeth in Menander and Dinnus, who wrot the Tyrian Chronicles, commending Hiram for building the temple of Iupiter Olympius, Hercules, and Astartee, but that is to be conceived to have been done in former times, now it seemeth that he was turned a worshipper of the true God onely. And he saith, that Galilee, the Province in which these cities stood, lay Northward near unto Hirams country, for which it is called Galilee of the Gentiles, Esa. 9. Mat. 4. and because before Dauids time inhabited by the Gentiles, and now given by Solomon to the Gentiles.

And this was the cause why King Solomon exalted tribute, namely to build the house of the Lord and his own house, &c.] Having spoken of Solomons sumptuous buildings, and being to speak of more, it is here intimated that he took tribute of his subjects for this cause, all the treasure that David left him, and Hiram sent him not being sufficient. Martyr will have not only mony, but also men to come under the name of tribute here, and suppoeth that both Israelites and strangers yeelded him both the one tribute and the other, but with this difference; the strangers under his dominion were employed in the works that were servile, but the Israelites in a better service joynd with dignity, as is further expressed, v. 20, 21, 22.

Pellican thinketh that the Israelites paid no tribute of mony, but onely were made overseers of his works, and appointed to other higher offices, but of this see before ch. 5. 13. The Vulg. lat. hath it, this is the summe of the expences, as if the 120 talents of gold before spoken of were meant, & that a distribution hereof were made amongst the workmen. So Lyrus; but Hebr. it is tribute as he acknowledgeth, and hath reference to the words following, v. 20. and includeth happily a tribute of mony also, as hath been said. And here besides the Temple and the Kings house, which he is said to have built, is added Millo, and the wall of Ierusalem and Hazor and Megiddo and Gezer. Millo is added, because it was a part of the Kings house built before by David, but now made more beautifull by Solomon, and likewise the building of the wall of Ierusalem is to be understood, as Iosephus saith; and of the adding of towers to it for defence, seeing it was not without a wall before in Dauids time; and it is to be thought, because Ierusalem was afterwards compassed with 3 walls, that Solomon made one wall new to increase the strength of that city. The towers upon all the walls saith Iosephus, were 164. and there was a space of 300 cubits between tower and tower, but Kilalpandus numbeth onely 90. and makes the whole compasse of the wall 49 furlongs, that is, 6 miles and a furlong. Hazor was a city in the tribe of Naphtali, Iosh. 19. 36. and it was a head city, Martyr. Junius.

Cajetan.
P. Martyr.Tostatus.
Sallianus.

Iosephus.

De bello jud.
lib. 2. c. 3.

V. 15.

P. Martyr.

Pellican.

Lyrus.

Iosephus.

city of divers kingdomes, and therefore of great consequence to fortifie it. Iosh. 11. 1. Megiddo in Manasseh, Iosh. 17. 11. it was a frontier town next the Philistines, and Gezer in Ephraim, Iosh. 11. 11. What the strength of Gezer was we may gather, because Iosh. 16. 10. it is said that the Ephraimites could not expell the Cananites thence, and the like is said of Megiddo, Iosh. 17. 11.

V. 16.

And here v. 16. it is further added, that this Gezer was taken by Pharaoh and given to his daughter, Solomons wife; and it is said that he built and strengthened Bethoron and many other places, even all that he would, see also, 2 Chron. 8. 2, 3.

V. 24.

But the daughter of Pharaoh went up from the city of David to her own house, &c.] 2 Chron. 8. 11. it is said Solomon removed her, for he said, my wife shall not dwell in my house, which is sanctified, since the coming of the Ark into it.

P. Martyr.

This faith Martyr, is spoken according to the lawes in force then, whereby women were unclean by their monthly courses, and by puerpery; and so unfit to be in the house, where the Arke was: whereas shee had been in this house hitherto, it was said Lyra, but for a time, whilst her house was in preparing.

Lyra.

V. 25.

And Solomon offered whole burnt offerings and peace-offerings, 3 times in the year, &c.] That is, as is commonly held, at the Paschever, Pentecost, and feast of Tabernacles; and this is expressed, 2 Chron. 8. 13. and not only was his piety exercised at those times, when all males were required to appeare before the Lord, and went empty; but he provided, that upon the Sabbaths and new Moones also, sacrifices should be offered according to the law of Moses, and confirmed the distribution of Priests and Levites into their courses made by David.

2 Chr. 8. 13, 14.

V. 26.

And Solomon made ships in Eziongeber, near Eloth, &c.] 2 Chron. 8. 19. It is said, that he went to Eziongeber in Edom. Which is expounded by some, as if by his going, his going by his Messengers were meant, but by others of his going and subduing this place; but neither rightly; not the first, for the writer of the Chronicles alwayes supplieth things missing in the Kings and maketh them plainer, but if his going by his Messengers had been meant, it had been more obscure: nor the second, because Solomon was alwayes peaceable and made no warre, and Edom was before subdued by David. Of Eloth and Eziongeber, see before Deut. 2. 7. For his going to Eziongeber, it was most probably to see his ships before their going out, and to give some instructions, according to his wisdom, about the preparing and directing of them. And it is not to be thought, that he set forth these ships out of covetousnesse, but that he might the better provide to defray his great charges, and so be the lesse burthen some to his subjects. Eziongeber was 176. miles from Jerusalem, and from thence his ships went to Ophir, that is, to India to fetch gold, from whence were brought unto him 420. talents. 2 Chron. 8. 18. it is said 450. talents: so that it is true which is here said, but all not spoken of. Iunius thinketh, that 420. talents came in clearly, and that 30. were spent upon the Navie. This journey was finisht in 3. yeares, and was 4800. miles; neither did he send out thus once only, but once in 3. years from time to time, 2 Chron. 9. 21. It is thought by some, that this countrey had the name of India and Ophir from two brethren, by others, India from the river Indus. And Pomponius saith, it hath in it 5000. cities. Ophir saith Rabanus, is a province in India, taking the name from one of the posterity of Heber, there be mountains of gold, and it is inhabited by most fierce lions and other wilde beasts, so that none dare go into it, but near unto their ships there gathering up the gold, which they finde digged out of the earth, by the wilde beasts, they carry it to their ships. Solomons ships figure out Christ his ministers, who gather together the treasures of wisdom and knowledge and other vertues, and in this work are employed the servants of Hiram with the servants of Solomon, when they that are learned in secular wisdom are joynd in the unity of faith with those, that are skillfull in the law of Moses; and the gold is brought to Solomon, when all the glory is given to Christ onely. And Solomons building of divers cities and fortifying them, figured out *Christ*s building of his Church in divers places, and compassing them about by his providence as with strong wals.

Patriarchs travels.

V. 28.

F. Seph. lib. 8.

Amiq. c. 7.

Rabanus Maurus.

The Mystery.

CHAP. X.

BUt the Queen of Saba hearing of the fame of Solomon, in the name of the Lord, came, &c.* ] Who this Queen was, is not agreed amongst Expositours. Comestor, whom many follow, saith, that she was Queen of Saba in Ethiopia, and he that wrote the Patriarchs travels, saith the same, describing that Saba as the Metropolitan city of the kingdome, shewing also the great heat of that countrey, as lying in a torrid zone under the signe Taurus, being 954. miles from Ierusalem. He also alledgeth Pliny, saying, that this kingdome was sometime ruled by Kings, but since by Queens, whereof this was one, and Candaces, Act. 8. called the Queen of Ethiopia another. And the writers of the Ethiopian history do not only affirm, that she was the Queen of Ethiopia, but also that she was gotten with child by Solomon, and had a sonne first called Melech or Meiler, then David, who was the first King of the Abyssins, which kingdome is called the kingdome of Prestor-Iohn, from whom all the rest ever since descended, and that she had a train of 12000. Israelites sent home with her by Solomon, who dwelt in that countrey thenceforth, of every tribe 1000. Of these the Ethiopians hold themselves to have descended, and accordingly are circumcised, not for any necessity, which they hold to bee heretofore unto salvation, but for distinction from other nations, and to shew the stock of which they came. Iosephus saith, that shee was Queen of Ethiopia and Egypt, and that before her for 1300. yeeres, 330. Kings reigned successively in Egypt after Minasi the builder of Memphis, being every one called by the name of Pharaoh, which signifieth a King in the Egyptian tongue; and herein he saith, that he followed Herodorus, saying, that after these, a Queen called Nicaule reigned, next unto that Pharaoh, who was father in law to Solomon, and that after him none was called Pharaoh more, as he saith, that he found in Hebrew commenters. But neither doth Herodorus call her Nicaule, but Nitacris and Genebrard, Makeda. And Pliny saith, that a Queen reigned in Meroe in the time of Nero called Candace, which had a long time been the common name of the Queens of Ethiopia, which countrey was anciently governed by Queens. And it is manifestly false, that he saith of none called by the name of Pharaoh, after Solomons time, because we read of Pharaoh Necho after this a long time, who slew Ishab, and of Pharaoh in the dayes of Hezekiah, by whom Sennacherib upbraided him, see also, Esa. 9. 2. 30. 2. Jer. 4. Ezek. 31. 38. P. Martyr assenteth rather to them, who think that by this Saba is meant the country of the Sabaeans; that is, Arabia Felix because that is farre South from Ierusalem, and alone yeeldeth frankincense and other most sweet spices according to Virgil, India mirtis Obor, molles sua thura Sabai, and Solis est thura virga Sabai. And this country is thought to have been called Seba in the Scriptures from worshipping, because sweet perfumes were used in the worship of God; and this Queen is said to have brought upon Camels much sweet odours. By others it is thought to have had the name from Seba the son of Cham, who built this city, being the Metropolitan of Arabia Felix, and lyeth Southeast from Ierusalem, much farther then Saba in Ethiopia, viz. 1248 miles, according to Orellius, 12000 miles; and this Queen is said by Christ to have come from the South to hear the wisdom of Solomon, calling her the Queen of the South, and from the farthest part of the earth, and Herodorus saith, that Arabia is the farthest of all the countries that is inhabited Southward, wherein only Frankincense, Myrrhe, Cinamon, and Cassia, grow; and herein they doe so abound, that the fragrant smell thereof extends to such as travaile farre of from it upon the sea. And whereas this may seem to make against it, that shee brought with her abundance of gold which Ethiopia yeeldeth, and not Arabia: the same Herodorus farther describeth this as the richest of all countries, affirming that there groweth in it gold which is called aurum, that is, without fire, because it is pure without trying in the fire; and it is of the bigness of chestnuts, and to shew the riches of the country, they abound especially in Saba with golden and silver vessels, both cups and pots; and the very feet of their beds are of silver

V. 1.

Scholast. hist.

Genebrard. Bar-rius.Ioseph. antiq. lib.
8. c. 2.

Plin. lib. 6. c. 25.

P. Martyr.

Patriarchs travels.
Gen. 10.

Herodorus lib. 3.

silver, and great pillars supporting galleries, are headed some with gold, and some with silver. And Strabo setteth forth this country as most rich in gold and silver and precious stones, in so much that the very walls of the dwelling houses of the inhabitants are covered with them as with a crust. Whereas Kings are said to have reigned in Arabia, and not Queens; this being a thing peculiar to Ethiopia to be governed by the Queens. It may be answered, that the Queen who came to Solomon might be the wife of the King of Arabia, who of all Kings is reported to be most miserable for this, that he may never goe out of his palace, and if he at any time doth, the people are ready to stone him; wherefore the Queen with his permission might doe that which he could not: viz. come to Ierusalem, to see Solomon, of whose incomparable wisdom and magnificence, they had heard so much. These objections thus answered, and the reasons brought before considered, this last opinion seemeth to me rather to be preferred. And whereas the first goeth on with a colourable history of this Queens having a child by Solomon, whose race continueth to this day; it is most improbable, because this Queen is said to have come to Ierusalem in the name of the Lord, intimating her to be godly, and her blessing of God, when she saw Solomons magnificence shewed no lesse: and lastly Christs praising of her, and therefore doubtlesse shee would not consent to so great a wickednesse, neither would such a King being yet godly, offer it to her a stranger, to the great scandall of the true religion, being enough to breed a distast thereof in all her followers. But what was it that drew this Queen from so farre a country; the same of Solomon in the name of the Lord, of which there are divers expositions of divers, as of Dionysius, according to the will of the Lord. Hugo, being inspired by the Spirit of God. Varabian, Hearing of those things which he did by the helpe of God and not of Idols. Cassian, That he attained to so great wisdom by the singular gift of God and not by humane help of study. To spare the alleading of more, I think nothing else is meant, but his fame for divine knowledge extraordinarily by the Lord conferred upon him. For although he excelled in all manner of knowledge, yet this was it which moved a godly Queen to come so farre unto him, and not so much to heare him speaking of things naturall, in the knowledge of which shee had doubtlesse many Philosophers about her, that were excellent. Now this Queen is said to have come with a great traine, and to have brought with her very much gold, sweet odours and precious stones to give, as is by and by said, that shee did to Solomon, when he had satisfied her in all her questions, and shee had been ravished both with his wisdom and magnificence, viz. 120 talents of gold, and so much sweet odours, as were never more brought thither after. Comefort saith also that shee gave him the root of balsam which the wicked Queen of Egypt, Cleopatra, afterwards took away; ex Iosepho. Iosephus telleth out of one Dio an historian, that which no way agreeth with the sacred histories viz. that one Abemdon, a Tyrian, propounded some questions to Solomon, at which he stuck. And on the other side this is as little to be credited, which Codrenus reporteth of this Queens trying of King Solomon after all her questions resolved; by apparelling some boyes and girles alike, and requiring him to distinguish between the sexes, which he did by causing water to be brought, and them to wash their faces with it; which the boyes did roughly and stoutly, but the girles tenderly and fearfully. In what yeare of Solomons reign shee came to Ierusalem is not set down, and therefore divers conjecture diversly; some as Marinus Victorinus in the fourth: some as Genebrard, in the forty one, others in the twenty, or twenty four, or twenty eight. But if things be set down in order, as I see not any reason why we should think otherwise, it must needs be after the 24. year; because he did not begin to build, till the 4. year of his reign; and 20 yeares were expired, before his buildings were all finished; and after this ships were built in Eziongeber, and thither the King went to see their setting forth, and they returned again laden with gold after 3 yeares; and after all this it is said that this Queene came, wherefore it must needs be in the 28. year at the least. And what stay shee made in Ierusalem is likewise uncertain; although some say a yeare. But in all that time it is not to be doubted, but that Solomon entertained her most royally, and v. 13. it is said that he gave her all that she desired, and moreover out of his kingly bounty, which

V. 23, &amp;c.

which what it was is not easie to conjecture, but it may be conceived, that he was not behinde stand with her in royall munificence, he being the richest of all kings. If then we shall measure his gifts by those, that some other Princes have given, they exceeded. Socrates Rhodius reporteth of Cleopatra Queen, that when she went to meet Anthony in Cilicia, she entertained him and his followers with a most sumptuous feast, in a room, where the walles were hanged with purple and gold hangings, and all the vessels were gold, adorned with pretious stones most curiously wrought; and 12. sumptuous tables admirably furnisht, so that Anthony and his friends wondred at the richnesse thereof, she smiling said, that she would give him all. And the next day entertained him and his captains where all things were much more costly, so that the first seemed nothing in comparison of this, but all those riches were likewise by her given to him and them, and when they departed, she gave to his captains horse-litters and horses to carry them, and to the rest of his followers, horses trapped with silver. Mystically, by this Queen understand the Church, which hearing of Christs wisdom and miracles, commeth to him from farre, and having a taste thereof doth more admire him, and giveth to the honour of him abundance of most pretious things, and receiveth according to all her desire of him againe, so Rab. Maurus. Now in speaking of the treasure given by the Queen of Saba to Solomon, lest it should be thought, saith Martyr, that these and the gifts brought him by others were his onely riches, the sacred history saith, v. 11. 12. that he had a Navie, which brought gold from Ophir, and Almuggum trees, and pretious stones. But what these Almuggums were being so called in the Hebrew, is not agreed amongst Expositours. Some render the word corall, as R. Solomon and Kimhi. And whereas this seemeth to make against it that corall is no wood, but stone, they answer, that whilst it is in the water it branches and berries, as a tree, but being taken out turneth into a stone. And whereas it seemeth improbable, because he made thereof not onely props or pillars for the house of the Lord, and the kings house, but also instruments of musick, they answer, that seeing such instruments have been made of Alabaster in later times, it is not improbable, that they should then be made of corall.

P. Martyr.

V. 11, 12.

Some by Almuggum understand some extraordinary Pine wood, which shined, as the Greek translatours; some ligna hebeni, which grew onely in India, and is very hard, some the Tyne tree, as Iunius, who saith, it is a most excellent wood, as appeareth, Apoec. 18. 12. Plin. l. 13. c. 19. And he rejecteth that of corall, because it is unfit for such uses, neither was there any need to fetch it so farre off; seeing it grew abundantly in the Mediterranean and red sea, which were near.

Lastly, some think them to be ligna praslica, which are of a pumy colour, and most durable. That of Iunius is followed by the vulgar Latin, and Pelican, and Hugo, who saith, that it was a kinde of wood like a white thorn, that would not putrifie, round and white, that of the Greeks by Iosephus. And Lyra saith, that of these were made not onely props for strength, but stairs to go up to the house of the Lord, and props, whereby they were supported. Let the Reader understand by these Almuggums which of the before nominated he pleaseth, for my part I think, no man hath guessed rightly, for the text saith, that there were no more such Almuggums seen unto this day, but the particulars before commemorated are by some seen and well known to this day, my judgement therefore is, that it was an excellent kinde of wood found in India by a speciall providence for service about the temple, but although some of the same kinde continue still, yet they could never be found out more, so that it is vain to expound them by the names of other trees, which are found in divers places. For the fable mentioned by Comestor here of this Queens writing back to Solomon, it is so palpable an invention, that it is not worth the naming, that she feared to tell him of one thing by word of mouth, which she saw in the temple; viz. a piece of wood, upon which one should one day be hanged, which would turn to the ruine of the Iewish nation, wherefore Solomon took it away and hid it in the ground; but afterwards, no man knowes how, it was seen swimming in the pool of Bethesda, and gave a sanative vertue to those waters, to heal all manner of diseases, and lastly, of it was made the crosse; upon which Christ was hanged.

Schol. bistor.

E c

Where-

V. 14.

Whereas before Solomons treasure, which came in yearly in gold was spoken of, and before that, ch. 9. ult. 420. talents at one time; here all his revenues in gold put together, are said to be 666. talents, besides that which came in from Merchants and the Kings and Lords of Arabia: and then is shewed, to what use he put some of this gold, viz. to make shields 200. putting 600. shekels in each one of them, and 300. lesser, putting 3. pounds in each of them, that is, 300. shekels, and these he placed in the Forrest of Lebanon, not for any service in warre, but for ornament and state.

V. 18.
P. Martyr.Rabanus.
Pellican.

Moreover King Solomon made an Ivory throne, and covered it with pure gold. There were 6. steps up to it, and it was round behinde, &c. Martyr thinketh, that it was not all covered with gold, but so as that the ivory might be seen between for the greater lustre, and he will have all the parts figurative; the ivory and gold shewing the incorruption, that should be in Kings. Rabanus and Pellican by the ivory understand chastity and discretion, because the elephant, of whose bones it is made, is the most understanding of all other beasts, and so chaste, as that he coupleth not, but with his own female; and is a great enemy to incontinency in others, and when his female is great with young, he coupleth no more with her, till she hath brought forth. The 6. steps up to the throne also, saith Martyr, shewed, that as the King is lifted up above others in dignity, so he should excell them all in vertue, the round figure above his head, the perfection and single meaning of the King free from all fraud and guile, the two staves for his armes, that he by encouraging the good on the right side and punishing the evil on the left, should uphold the common-wealth, the two lions there his strength and courage to execute what he decreeth, and the 6. and 6. lions on either side of the steps, his ministers, who should like wise be courageous in the said execution. And this is by Rabanus applied unto the Church, in which Christ sitteth, shining by his miracles as with gold and ivory, being also chaste and incorruptible, ascended unto by the doctrine of the 12. Apostles, set forth by 12. lions, and because the Church doth herein excell all other sects, it is said there was not the like in any other nation. 2 Chron. 9. 16. there is further supplied a foot-stool of gold, to shew that the Church treadeth worldly riches under her foot, by lightly esteeming them, and so should Kings do, and not covetously by oppressing their subjects, gather worldly riches, or to set forth their pomp.

V. 21.

Junius.

P. Martyr.

Moreover all the drinking vessels of King Solomon were of gold, &c. for the kings navie of Tarshish went with Hiram's navie, which came once in three yeares, &c. 2 Chron. 9. 21. it is said, the kings navie went to Tarshish with Hiram's servants, &c. Junius, for Tarshish, hath the ocean, according to the signification of the word, for hereby is sometime set forth a pretious stone of the colour of an Hyacinth, that is, sky-coloured, of which colour the ocean is. But this is rejected by Martyr, (who yet acknowledgeth, that this word Tarshish is sometime put for the sea) because Tarshish is twice in one verse, and if it should be expounded by the Sea, it is in the first place, redundant, there being the word ים went to sea. Wherefore he rather thinketh, that by Tarshish is meant some place in India, or Ophir, which was before spoken of, and the rather, because this voyage is of the same time, viz. three yeares, and this I embrace as most probable, although there be a Tarshish also in Cilicia, not farre from Palestine, which some think is meant, and the Chald. Paraphr. expounds it by Africa, but the one was too near to require so long a time of travell, neither did it naturally yeild such treasures, and the other is not famous for yeilding so much gold neither, and the sea is not so great between it and Asia, that ships should need to be so long in that voyage. And these ships are said to have brought not onely gold and silver, but also ivory, apes and peacocks for ornament and delight. Of Ophir and Tarshish see more upon 1 King. 22. 49. 50.

V. 23.

Here the wisdom of Solomon is extoll'd above that of all other men, as Chron. 4. 31, 32. and it is said, that all sought unto him therefore, and brought him gifts therefore from year to year, that is, not as some think by way of tribute, for that is a due and no gift, but out of their great affection towards him, and the good and pleasure, which they reaped by him, there were every year some comming unto him from all parts round about with such gifts, and it is to be thought, that the same princes came oftner with their presents. Whereas it is said, All the earth sought to hear the wisdom of Solomon, it is to be understood of parts far and near, and not of every part without exception. And herein Solomon typified Christ, to whom the people resorted in great frequency, going after him to hear him into wildernesses and desert places, and so should we by resorting to hear his ministers, and we should bring our gifts, that is, give almes to his poor members and communicate of our goods to his ministers, and use our worldly goods to his glory.

So that Solomon had 1400. chariots, and 12000. horsemen.] But of this see before ch. 4. 26.

And Solomon made silver in Ierusalem as the stones in the street, and cedars as sycamores.] This is spoken hyperbolically to shew the great abundance. The wood of sycamores, according to Theophrastus is of much use, being black and hard, and partakes of the fig and the mulbery, having therefore this compound name. Galen saith, the fruit hath a taste partaking of both, Cornel. Celsus, that the fruit groweth not upon the boughs, but upon the body of the tree, and never ripeneth, but being cut with iron, then it ripeneth within four dayes, and being taken off, other fruit groweth four times in the year, and being cut this tree is always green, neither becometh it seare, but by covering it with water.

And the going out of horses, which Solomon had, was out of Egypt, and the congregation of Merchants of the king received the congregation at a price. And a chariot ascended and came out of Egypt at 600. pieces of silver, and so to all the kings of the Hittites and Aramites, they came by their hand.] Thus word for word out of the Hebrew. Here is shewed, how Solomon came to abound in horses, although his own country brought forth none, yet Egypt the country of his father in law abounded with them, and Martyr thinketh it is here meant, that he had the profit of the encrease of horses there by his gift, not only for his own use, but also to sell them by his Merchants to other Princes, whereby much silver also came in. Innius, that he took a tribute for horses of all that carried them between Syria and the red Sea, because that way lay through his dominions. And the word expounded, congregation, he expoundeth silks and other merchandize, for which also he took a tribute upon the same occasion. The vulgar Latin, agreeably also to the Hebrew, renders the words other wise thus. And horses were brought to Solomon out of Egypt and Choah, the Merchants of the king took them from Choah at a price, and a quadriga, that is, a chariot drawn by 4. came and ascended out of Egypt at 600. shekles, an horse at 150. Onely the last words differ from the Hebrew. After this manner, all the kings of the Hittites and Aramites sold them. For Hebr. it is as before, so they came to all the kings of the Hittites and Aramites by their hand. Here the word Choah, as Lyra hath it, is taken for the proper name of a place which signifieth a congregation. But the sense is better, if it be taken properly, and we understand not here, either as Martyr, that Solomon had the horses of Egypt by the gift of Pharaoh, or as Innius, a tribute out of them for their passage, but only his merchants had the sole buying of them both for his use, and to vend them for his benefit to other Princes, and this benefit was not small, seeing they were sold at 150. shekles an horse, that is, according to Budans, at 60. crownes.

Thus it is commonly held, but forasmuch as the kings merchants took them at this great price, and so put them off again; I cannot see, how any such benefit should redound unto him, but rather, that it is meant, his horses were none of the meanest sort, but most excellent, being so high prized and the choice of all in the land of Egypt, seeing they came first into the hands of his Merchants, and so the drift of this place, is to set forth his royall magnificence, as in other things, so in his horses. Touching the silks, of which Innius, readred in our new translation linnen, seeing the scope of this place, is to speak of the place from whence Solomon's horses came, and of linnen or silk nothing is said before or after, neither is any price thereof mentioned, it doth not agree to expound the word thus, as if Solomon had the benefit of all the chief Merchandize in Egypt, which it availed

V. 26.

V. 27.

V. 28.

P. Martyr.

Innius.

Pharaoh much to keepe to maintaine his owne state, but rather as was before said.

CHAP. XI.

V. 1.

2 Chron. 9. 27.

V. 3.

BY King Solomon loved many strange women, the daughter of Pharaoh, and Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. After the excellencies of Solomon, here follow his vices, whereby God was provoked to anger against him, 2 Chron. 9. 27. All this is omitted, and we are referred for that which concerned him more to the words of Nathan the Prophet, of Abijah and Iddo, which as Eyras saith, are not now extant either amongst us, or the Hebrews, but, as Pellican saith, are lost by the injury of time and negligence of the Iewes. But I see no reason why we may not hold the Bookes of the Kings to have been written by these men, and then we shall not need here to speake of their bookes being lost, but that hereby the Bookes of the Kings are meant. Solomon enjoying all worldly felicitie above other kings of the earth, as hath been shewed, is here set forth as a patterne of humane weaknesse, that we may neither dote upon worldly things, which are so dangerous to corrupt us, nor be confident of our standing in grace, but with feare and trembling alwaies worke out our salvation, seeing Solomon that stood so long, fell so foulely in his old age, and that we may flie marrying with idolaters, in whom there is so great and so irretrievable danger to the wisest that ever was. Now because the outlandish women here spoken of are said to be Pharaohs daughter, women of Moab and Ammon, &c. a question may be mooved, whether Pharaohs daughter was one of them which drew him to Idolatry, because also, vers. 8. it is said, thus he did for all his wives that were strangers, which offered incense to their gods. But this hath been already discussed at large upon Ch. 3. 1. and with what heathens it was unlawfull to marry, and in what case lawfull, onely because Pharaohs daughter is here mentioned amongst these women, in the loving of whom Solomon offended, it may justly be doubted whether she fell not to Idolatry againe at the last, and were not one of them that drew him to it. Yet I thinke rather that she did not, because if so, some Idol of Egypt should no lesse have been mentioned then of Ammon and Moab in particular, seeing Egypt was a kingdome then superiour to any of them. For the number of his wives, they are said to have been 700. and his concubines 300. And herein he sinned greatly, in that he multiplied his wives so exceedingly, contrary to the charge given to kings, Deut. 17. 17. where this is not onely forbidden, but to fetch horses out of Egypt, and to multiply them, and likewise to multiply silver and gold, as tending all to the corrupting of the heart with pride and luxurie, and in all these he went beyond his charge, and now are set forth the evils that ensued hereupon. It is most probable as Expositours thinke, that this was the occasion of his stupendious multiplying of wives, he walking in wealth, and pampering his body, and living in all ease, after all his workes ended, and bookes written, grew in his elder years most libidinous, and when ever he saw any Princess or noble mans daughter that pleased his eye, he desired to have his carnall pleasure of her, but she not consenting unlesse he would take her for his wife, he did so, and others of inferiour ranke also after the same manner for his concubines, that is, wives of servile condition, and because his lust, to which he had given himselfe over was insatiable, he sent abroad for more wives into other countries, being nothing deterred by the contrarietie of their religion, who yet happily to enjoy so honourable a marriage, made shew at the first of turning proselites, although they soone fell from it to their old Idolatry, and drew him together with them. And thus Solomon to his great shame and dishonour exceeded in the multiplicity of his wives all that ever lived before or after him. Whereas Cant. 6. sixty wives and eighty concubines are spoken of, some reconcile it with this number thus, he had so many, that were most beautifull, and some most beloved, and some that he had no more when he wrote that song. Isseus thinking that it would would be most incredible that he had so many wives, for 700 hath set down 70. And it is to be noted, that by all his wives he had the fewest children that we read of, of all other Kings of those times; viz. but one unhappy sonne Rehoboam by an Ammonitess, and two daughters.

When Solomon was old, he followed Ashteroth the abominations of the Ammonites, and Milcom, &c. The age of which Solomon now was, is thought by Tostatus and others to have been 54. the 34 of his reigne; and that he lived in this foule sin of idolatry 6 yeares; and some but 3, some two, and some one. But the building of so many Temples to idols, which cannot but be thought to have been done magnificently, could not but take up much time. He is said at 54 to be old, because he had wasted his body so much with divers women, so that it was wonderful, that he lived so long; but that most probably according to that skill which he had, he took such things from time to time, as he knew were preservative.

But as much weakened as he was, it may justly be questioned whether he could be so weak in understanding as to worship idols any more then in shew to please his wives, he knowing still in his heart that there were no more Gods but one, that idols were but the work of mens hands.

To this Martyr answereth, that all Expositours think indeed that he committed idolatry, as other idolatrous kings did after him, but this, he saith, seemeth to him not likely to be true, because if he had done so, he would have brought those idols into the Temple at Jerusalem; wherefore he thinketh that he did no other wise herein, then as Adam in eating of the forbidden fruits in gratiam uxoris. But it is not without just ground that the whole stream of Expositours hold the contrary, because it is said v. 4. his Wives inclined his heart after other gods, neither was his heart perfect with the Lord, and v. 9. his heart declined from the Lord God of Israel, so that his idolatry was not for small only and outward, but inward, and of the heart; even as of other idolatrous kings, who are spoken of in like manner; that their hearts were not perfect, that they set up abominations to idols, &c. so Josephus saith also, waxing older he grew weak in understanding, and being forgetfull of his country religion, he neglected the worship of his God, and injured himselfe to the rites of his wives. And Augustine saith, he fell into the depth of idolatry; when of Isidiah, a lover of the Lord, he turned a lover of women. Prosper Aquin. saith, that he fornicated both in body and soule, the Lord forsaking him. Basill saith, that he became sottish and fell into idolatry. Theodoret upon this place, hereby it is plain, that he worshipped idols. August. indeed and Tostatus grant, that he did not so at the first, but when as he to please his wives had made a shew hereof; God forsaking him, and giving him over to blindness of mind, he worshipped idols as they did; wherefore when August. lib. de Genes. ad lit. c. ult. saith, is it to be believed, that Solomon a man of to great wisdom thought, that there was any profit in the worshiping of idols, or that he could not resist the love of women drawing him to this evill: doing that which he knew was not to be done, lest he should grieve them? he is to be understood as speaking of him, as the case was with him at the first, and likewise that Lib. de civit. 14. 11. It is not credible that Solomon thought idols were to be served through error, but that he was compelled to those sacrileges, by the flatteries of women. Again because Solomon is said to have set up an high place, Excelsus, to the idol, not an house, it may be questioned whether he built up a Temple to it. Sol. An high place indeed is commonly put for a pleasant place well set up with trees upon some mountainous place to the honour of some idol; in which men performed their idolatrous rites: but it may be gathered both from the word here used, signifying he built. And ch. 13. 32. where the houses of the high places were spoken of, when Jeroboam was threatened, that the high places here spoken of, comprehended both the grove and the idols temple and altars, about which the trees planted, must have a time to grow. But how many such houses he built, is diversly conjectured by divers, yet none exceed the number of six, and so many Tostatus thinketh that he built, but upon a weak ground; viz. because v. 1. He loved women of 6 idolatrous nations; for it is most probable, as was shewed before, that he set up none to any Egyptian idol, because it is not parti-

V. 5.

Tostatus.

Qu.

P. Martyr.

Josephus.

Aug. lib. 22.
Contra Faust.
c. 81. Solom. qui uxore habuit ad
l. bidinem magis, quam ad propagandum in probarum est, & inde ad profundum idolatriæ lapsus atque demersus.

Nec credibile est Solomon erro-rante idola esse servandum, sed blanditiis femine ad illa sacrilegia fuisse compulsam.

Tostatus

Scholast. hist.

P. Martyr.

V. 7.

Apol. 2. David.
6. 6.

F. G. Georgius.

cularly mentioned, and yet the daughter of Egypt was the cheife of his wives. Some, that hee built onely one, wherein were divers altars for the worshipping of divers gods, as sometime one common Temple called Pantheon, was by the Gentiles built to all the Gods. Comestor, 3. to the 3 idols here mentioned; Astarte Chamos and Moloch, and this is most probable; for two are expressly named, v. 7. and v. 5. that he followed a third, and therefore doubtlesse set up a temple to that idoll. And this is further confirmed, v. 3. where he is charged only with 3 idols. Yet some think that more are implied in that it is said, he did in like manner for all his strange wives that sacrificed to their gods; that is, not setting up a temple for every particular one, but according to the diversity of the gods which they served; happily not being above five or six amongst them all, according to the diversity of their nations; and if none were set up to any Egyptian idoll, the whole number was but five. But if there were so many idols to whom Altars were set up, or more then three; we know not by what names the rest were called. One of these was Astarte, that is, as most commonly is held, Inno, whom the Sidonians worshipped in the form of a sheep, and Iupiter in the form of a ramme. The next Malcom, signifying their King; whereby it is thought that Saturn is understood who was held to bee King above all the rest of the gods of the Ammonites. But as they set him forth by a glorious title, and offered their dearest children unto him, to shew in what esteem they had him; so God, to shew how base he was indeed, called him the abomination of the Ammonites. The third Chamos, an idoll, as it seemeth common to the Moabites and Ammonites, because Iudg. 11. 26. it is called the Ammonites God, here the abomination of the Moabites, but Malcom was the cheife God of the Ammonites, and Chamos another, whom they worshipped also, but the cheife of the Moabites. It is thought that he was Pluto, the God of hell, thus Mariyr: but others take him for Bacchus, and Astarte for Venus, or Luna.

The place where these high places were built, or one for all, was the mount over against Ierusalem, 2 Kings 23. 13. it is said more particularly to have been on the right side of the mountaine corrupting; that is saith Iamius, of mount Olivet; and the right side is put for the South. Pagninus therefore and the Chaldees, for the mountain corrupting have the mount Olivet, being so called, for the idolatry there committed. Thus we read of Solomons foule falling into idolatry, whereupon it is thought, that his admirable wisdom before given him, whereby all were drawne to love and honour him, was by the just judgement of God taken from him, and he as an ignorant beast grevly contemptible; to Ambrose saith. Neither had Solomon wisdom in the beginning, neither did he possesse it in the end, for turning from the worship of God he fell, not as a wise man, but as a fool, that he might offend: and he offended so much, that he lost what he had received. Eusebius, Theodoret, and other Fathers say. He whose beginnings did burn with the desire of wisdom, which with his spirituall love he got, he lost with his carnall love, Prosper Aquitan. saith, that when in his old age he declined, he lost both his life and wisdom together. So likewise Isidor and Gregory.

And it is thought by some, that unto his idolatry he joyned the art magick also; so Franciscus Georgius following the Rabbins saith, that not being content with the wisdom given him by the most high, he would get him serpentine wisdom and subtilty by calling to him, Asmodens, Astarte, Chamos, and Malchom, and other unclean formes, to which he erected statues; whence it came to passe, that God willing it, he was by them deceived. And out of one Zohar he saith, that Solomon was delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved. Viz. To Asmodens, who held him certain yeares, being cast out of his kingdom in the desert, as Nebuchadnezzar was driven from his; then Asmodens putting upon him the likeness and ornaments of the King reigned for him; and hence it was, that he said in Ecclesi. I was King in Ierusalem, for hee made that book in that time of his exile. Thus he; but to passe this over as a Rabbins invention, it is not improbable, but that Solomon was thus tainted, both because Iosephus saith, that he shewed a certain roote by the force whereof being inclosed in a ring devils were cast cast out; and 2 King. 21. 6. Manasse turning to idolatry turned to witchcraft also, and Gal. 5. 19. idolatry and witchcraft are joyned together, as if the one went not without the other. Yet seeing the holy Scripture layeth not this sinne to his charge, I think rather that he was not guilty of it: but onely that such, as from him would countenance this wicked and divellish art, have devised this, and others to free him from it before his fall, have referred it to the time following after.

In Solomons example we may see the mutability of Princes, how he that is most excellent at the first, may afterwards grow most corrupt and vile, so likewise Nero in the first five years of his Empire being excellent, proved afterwards a most beastly and cruell tyrant. Tiberius the successeur of Augustus, who made all men at the first to hope well of him, proved most impure and tyrannicall. Alexander the great, at the first valiant and temperate, being afterwards mollified with the Persian delights proved intemperate, libidinous and cruell, so as that his Macedonians could hardly endure him. Constantine the great who was so famous for piety, by the means of his sister Constantia, in his latter time was a friend to Arrianus, and banished Athanasius. Theodosius the younger, at the first a godly Emperour, afterwards by the means of Eudocia his wife, became a favourer of the Eutichian heresie and countenanced that infamous Councell of Ephesus called λειτουργικη, from robbers. And Mauritius governed at the first godlyly and happily, but afterwards grew covetous and cruell, and so was hated of his subjects, and slain by his Captain Phocas. Wherefore let him, that standeth, take heed lest he fall, and let subjects pray for their prince continually, that he may be kept upright unto the end. But whether Solomon thus falling did ever rise again by repentance, is a great question, and much controverted among divines, some affirming and some denying it. The Hebrews and Ierom following them affirm, that he repented, and wrot the book called Coboleth or Ecclesiastes, to shew his repentance; and Irenaeus likewise alledgeth the testimony of a certain Presbyter before him, affirming, that he repented, though not here, yet in another world, which is a dangerous assertion; In the Hebrews greater Chronology ch. 15. it is said, that Solomon repented in his old age and received the holy Ghost, whereby he dictated the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs. And Ierom alledgeth the Septuagint. when comparing Solomons temple with Ezechiels he saith, the very builder of the temple Solomon sinned, although afterwards he repented writing the Proverbs, wherein hee saith, novissimè ego egi penitentiam, &c. lastly I repented, and I had respect to chuse discipline, but these words are not in the Proverbs in the Hebrew, but in the Sept. ordin. Sixti c. 24. 30. But there are other words, which imply penitency, if this were written after his fall. I went by the field of the sluggard, and by the vine-yard of the foolishman, and behold it was over-grown with nettles, &c. which I seeing, applyed my minde and reaped instruction. The Hebrews also have a tradition, that Solomon was drawn 5. times through the streets of Ierusalem, after the manner of penitents, unto the temple, and five rods bound unto him; wherewith he desired the Priests to beat him for his sinnes, but they refusing to do it to him the Lords anointed, he beat himself. * Ambrose is also brought by Sallianus for his repentance, because he saith, David said, have mercy upon me for I am weak; If David were weak, art thou strong? If Solomon fell, shalt thou stand unmoveable? If Paul be the first of sinners, canst thou be first of Saints? Therefore if the just have erred, they have erred as men, but confessed it as just men, and if the just have received the sentence of most grievous punishment, how do'st thou propound unto thy selfe the hope of impunity? In that he speaketh of him together with others that repented as just, he inferreth, that he also was for his repenting. But P. Martyr contrariwise citeth Ambrose, saying, Christ had native wisdom; but Solomon noe, only he asked wisdom and obtained it at the first, but at the last he possessed it not.

Hilary in Ps. 136. calleth him a Saint, and numbrell him with Moses and Peter, who having sinned, repented and obtained pardon. Cyrill after the manner of Ierom speaketh of his repentance also out of the Septuagint: Irenaeus also lib. 4. c. 45. and Gregor. Thaumaturgus, and Neocesariensis, Th. Aquinas, Bonaventura, Vinton-

N. 18.

Hieron. in Ezech. 24.

* Ambros. apol.
David. c. 3.
Si David infir-
mus, tu fortis?
Si Solomon lap- sus est, tu immo- bilis es? Si Pe- trus primus fuit
peccatorum, tu potes primus esse
sanctorum; &c.
Si j. sit pana a- troctoris exce- ptus sententiam, tu quemadmo- dum tibi spem impunitatis pro- ponis.

In Ps. 52.

1 Reason.

2.

2 Sam. 7. 14.

3.

4.

5.

6.

Chrysost. in 2 Cor. hom. 24.

August.

Lib. 2. moral. c. 2
Theodoret.

Prosper.

Reason 1.

2.

2 King. 23. 13.

3.

4.

1 Chron. 28. 9.

5.

Eccles. 47. 14,
15, 16, & 6.

rius in speculo. Albinus, Dionysius, Genebrardus, &c. and their reasons are strong. First, from Prov. 24. 30. which place is expounded by many, of a man overgrown and defaced by sinne, and Solomon applying it thus to himself, turned by repentance to the cleansing away of these noisome weeds, thus Gregory and Ierom, Cyriel and Isidor or Beda. Secondly, from Gods promises, I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a sonne, &c. for which cause he sent to call him Jedidiah, the beloved of the Lord and promised, that if he sinned, hee would correct him, but not take his mercy for ever from him, as from Saul. Thirdly, because when he died, he was buried in the Sepulchre of the kings of Israel, and it is said that he slept with his fathers, as it is not of any that died wicked. Fourthly, because Rehoboam is said for 3. years to have walked in the wayes of David and Solomon, whereas if Solomon had not repented, he should never have been set forth, as an example of walking in the right way. Fifthly, Bonaventure argueth from this, that he was a pen-man of holy Scripture, and there is no president of any one such that is damned. Sixthly, because he was a type of Christ, and so zealously often prayed for by David his father.

Contrariwise, some hold that Solomon most probably repented not after this foul falling, as Chrysostom, who comparing David and him together saith, Solomon received a deadly wound; David indeed fell and rose again by repentance, he fought and received the crown: but his son did no such thing. Augustine also upon that Pf. which beginneth thus, except the Lord build the city, in his prologue saith, that Solomon was rejected of God. What Ambrose saith, see before. Gregory numbred him with Indus, Dives, and the Sodomites, who were damned. Theodorus with Saul and the unbelieving Jews, who for their ingratitude were deprived of grace, and that finally. Prosper Aquitan. Solomon being puffed up in his old age fornicated both in body and minde, and the Lord forsaking him made an evill end, so likewise Eucherius, Rabanus and Angelomus, and Tostatus, &c.

Their reasons are; First, because it is no where recorded, that he repented, but of all others, that fell and rose again by repentance, so much is recorded of them, as of David, Manasseh, Peter, Paul, &c. Secondly, because as Eucherius and some others reason, he destroyed not again the idolatrous houses, which he had set up, as appeared in that they continued to the time of Iosiah, who demolished them. Thirdly, because he was the first author of idolatry amongst the kings of Israel, and so an occasion of ruine to many, as an arch idolater, therefore it is to doubted, that he was rejected, as Ieroboam that made Israel to sinne. Fourthly, although God sometime promised David not to take his mercy from his son for ever, if he should sin, but to correct him, yet David understanding well without doubt, that his meaning was not certainly to give him grace to repent, that hee might be eternally saved, but onely as is expressed, that he would not take his mercy from him, as from Saul (as he did not indeed, for his posterity reigned still generation after generation) threatned him, that if he should forsake the Lord, he would take his mercy from him for ever. Fifthly, because in Ecclesiasticus where all the laudable and discommendable things in Solomon are spoken of, no word is spoken of his repentance, and whereas Gedeon and Sampson, that fell and their rising again is passed over in silence, yet that wee might not doubt of their being again received to mercy an honourable mention is made of them, Heb. 11. amongst other most faithfull persons, but no where of Solomon: And for the reasons brought to prove the contrary, that taken from Gods promise made to David touching his son, hath been answered already, and is further answered by St. Augustine, expounding it of Christ and the faithfull, for although he were without sinne in himself, yet as is said, Esa. 53. He bare the finnes of all. Likewise his calling him Jedidiah is to be referred to Christ chiefly, and to Solomon in respect of the temporall good things vouchsafed unto him. Neither can an argument be drawn from this, that he wrote some books of holy Scripture: for as Augustine saith, Balaam likewise being evill, uttered good and salutiferous oracles; we beleeve not those writings of Solomon and esteem highly of them, because they came from him, but because from God through him. Therefore whatsoever good he wrote,

let

let it be ascribed to God, and sinne left to the man, neither doth it prove any thing that there is none example like it to be found, for the thief upon the crosse repenting at the last and being saved, is without another parallel. Whereas his being a type of Christ is insisted upon, that is nothing to prove his repentance, for God hath made other things which were not capable of salvation types of Christ, as the brazen serpent, the rock, manna, and divers beasts offered in sacrifice, and if every type of Christ must needs be saved, then every high Priest, which I think none will affirm. For the earnest praying of David for him, it is not to be doubted, but that he did the like for Abshalom, and Abraham for Ishmael, but prevailed not. Lastly, for the traditions alledged, they favour of the Rabbins invention, and it is uncertain, whether he wrote any thing after his fall, or all before, which last is most probable, because so many proverbs, songs and writings, are before ascribed unto him, 1 King. 4. 32. For my part, all the premises considered, I think it most probable that he repented not, but because nothing certainly is revealed pro or contra, I leave the certain judging of this to the Judge of all. And for one thing before alledged on Solomons behalf, I have passed it over as not worth the answering, viz. that he is said to have slept with his fathers, and to have been buried in the Sepulchers of Kings: for the like is said of Rehoboam, 1 King. 14. 31.

Therefore the Lord was angry with Solomon because his heart was turned away from the Lord, who had appeared to him twice. [The Lord is said to be angry after the manner of man being offended, because he determined not to let the injury done him by Solomon to goe unrevengeed. He had appeared to him twice; that is, once in Gibeon, and after that when he had built the Temple, and that in great mercy, thus most strongly obliging him unto him, which aggravated his sin the more. And his word came unto him another time also, 1 Kings 6. 11, 12. to encourage him in building the Temple, but because that was by a Prophet or Angel sent to speak so unto him, it is not reckoned amongst his appearances. Now because the Lord having used him so familiarly, he yet ungratefully went from him after Idols, being so seriously warned of this also before, hee threatneth to take away his kingdome from him, yet not all because of his father David, but all the tribes except one, viz. Judah, with which the tribe of Benjamin was so joyned, that they were but as one tribe together, and therefore as Martyr noteth, it was called by the name of that tribe only the kingdome of Judah, who also observeth the justice of Gods dealing in punishing him, as he had divided between God and idols, so God divides his kingdome. But according to some others, when he saith, he would leave him one tribe, he meant one besides that of which he was. How the Lord speaks thus unto Solomon is not expressed, but generally by most it is held, that it was by a Prophet, either Nathan or Abijah, who also was sent to Ieroboam. Yet some think, because no mention is made of any messenger from God unto him; and it would not have been safe for any man to have done this message, that God said thus unto him immediately. But contrariwise it is more probable, that he did not, because it is a great favour for God to appear to a man, and therefore, except in Cains time, when there was no prophet to speak by, we do not read, that he ever spake immediately to any sinner, but by his messenger. How this wrought upon Solomon is not related, some think, that he was so stricken, that he repented; but the contrary seemeth rather to be true, because he sought to slay Ieroboam, to prevent the renting away of his kingdome threatned, as Saul did to slay David. Instead of being moved with penitency, then he was afflicted onely with worldly sorrow and indignation, and when he could not come by Ieroboam, he was oppressed the more with grief, and thus his death was the sooner hastened. Whereas some Hebrews invent another cause of renting away part of the kingdome from Solomon's posterity, and of this division, viz. David's dividing unjustly sometime of Mephiboshus land betwixt him and Ziba, being hereby followed by Ierem, Lira, and Hugo, it is most improbable, because the Lord himself declares the cause to be Solomons apostasie, and that some part of the kingdome was still reserved because of his singular love to David.

Therefore the Lord stirred up an adversary to Solomon Hadaad an Edomite, &c.

Although

V. 9.

P. Martyr.

1 King. 11. 46.

V. 14.

V. 15, 16.

P. Martyr.

V. 21.

V. 24.

Lyra.

Although the great punishment of renting a great part of the kingdome away was deferred, till after Solomons death, yet Gods anger against him for his sins began to work immediately. He stirred up three enemies against him to vex and molest him, the first Hadad of Edom, the second Rezon, v. 23. who joyned with Hadad against him, the third Ieroboam one of his own subjects, v. 26. Now these men out of an old grudge against the house of David, exercised hostility against him in his old dayes, but because God made them herein to serve his providence for the punishment of Solomon, he is said to have stirred them up, not that he infused this malice into them, but because he used it to punish his wickednesse by them, even as a workman worketh by tools that another made. In describing Hadad the sacred history is large, shewing whereby he was first provoked, viz. because David and his captain Ioab sometime attempted the rooting out of all the males in Edom, he then being a little one, was carried away by his fathers servants into Egypt, taking more men with them, as they went by Paran for more safeties sake, and that he might be the more honourably attended. And in Egypt he found favour with Pharaoh, who harboured him, and when he was grown up to mans estate, gave him his wives sister to wife, who bare him a sonne, &c. Touching the occasion of Davids severity against the Edomites, nothing else is here said, but that Ioab went up to bury the slain, and then he continued in Edom six moneths, and slew every male in Edom. But some Expositours say, that the Edomites slew the garison, which David had placed there, and these Ioab went up to bury, and in revenge he with all Israel made this destruction amongst them, conceiving certainly, that if the children had been spared, an in-bred hatred against Israel for this would have stirred them up in time to come, to seek revenge upon Israel. But Lyra saith, that he permitted the Edomites to bury their dead, by which kindness he got him a name. The king of Egypt out of a consideration of the mutability of worldly estates, and consequently of his own, takes pity upon this royall orphan and dealeth most kindly with him, as some others are noted by Martyr to have done upon the like consideration, as Sesostrius sometime king of Egypt, who having four kings in his power, made them draw his chariot at the first, but when he espyed one of them look often back to the wheels of the chariot, he asked him why he did so? he answered, to note, how those parts of the wheels, which were now up, by and by went down; This when he had heard, considering this to be the case of men also in highest dignity, he presently dismissed them all four, and set them at liberty again. Likewise Charles the 5. received and nourished Tunetanus a king, being expelled out of his kingdome by his son. This Hadad, whom the king of Egypt shewed such kindness to, when he heard that David and Ioab were dead, for fear of whose puissance, whilest they lived, he contained himself in Egypt, returned with Pharaohs leave, and together with Rezon, went to Damascus; as it seemeth, and having taken it, they together reigned there, and as is to be conceived, annoyed by their excursions the kingdome of Solomon, for it is said, they went to Damascus and dwelt there, and they reigned there.

This Rezon is said to have been the Prince of an army, when David smote Hadadzer, King of Zobah, of which, and of the Sirians coming from Damascus to help him, see: 2 Samp. 8. But of Ioabs cutting off of every male in Edom, and going up to bury the dead; nothing is said before. Lyra saith that this Rezon having in those dayes offended his matter, the King of Zobah, fled from him and became a captain of robbers, and thus annoyed him, as he might well doe, that King being then so weakened by David. And now because Hadad was unable of himselfe to get the kingdome of Edom, he first joyned with Rezon and holp him to be King of Damascus, the head city of Syria, that he might afterwards help him to recover the kingdome of Edom; both which kingdomes were tributaries to Solomon, and therefore in thus joyning together to take them, they were enemies to Solomon, yet it is not to be thought that Hadad did this immediately after Davids death, for till Solomon fell to idolatry, he reigned over all his dominions in peace, but now hee becoming contemptible for his basenesse, they thus lifted up their hands against him. Where-as then v. 25. Hadad is said to have been an enemy to Solomon all his dayes; it is to be understood not from the beginning of his reigne, but from the time that he was stirred up against him. Iosephus saith, that Hadad coming up from Egypt towards the end of Solomon's reigne, and attempting Idumaea, could not prevail with his countrymen for that kingdome, because Solomon had there so many strong holds; wherefore he went into Syria, and by the help of Rezon who had depopulated that country much by robberies he obtained that kingdom, and by many irruptions from thence filled the Israelites land with rapines, whilst Solomon lived. Thus he; but the Sept. contrary to the originall, conclude this history thus, and he reigned in the land of Edom, v. 25. whereas in the Hebrew original it is, in Syria, justifying that of Iosephus. This history through the brevity thereof is so obscure, that this hath been the occasion of difference amongst Expositours, some holding that Hadad reigned in Syria, and some Rezon. For having spoken of Hadad, and how he asked leave of Pharaoh to depart, it is not said whether he departed or not; or what hee did against Solomon, but onely the prosecution of the story touching him being left, v. 23. God also stirred him up an adversary, Rezon who fled from Hadadazer, and gathered men unto him, and was the Prince of an army when David slew them; and they went to Damascus and dwelt and reigned there. And he was an enemy to Israel, &c. and that besides the evill which Hadad did, and he defied Israel and reigned in Syria. From whence we may gather certainly only that Hadad did evill to Solomon and his people, but whether he reigned in Edom or in Syria cannot be gathered; but only by the Septuagint, in whose translation he is affirmed to bee King of Edom. For these words, and he reigned in Syria, have reference rather to Rezon before spoken of, and of whom it is said that he with his then went and reigned in Damascus, the cheife city of Syria. It is to be held then with Lyra, that Rezon attained the kingdome of Syria, and because Hadad could not otherwise so much annoy the Israelites, that he got the kingdome of Edom; which the Sept. thought necessary to expresse, leaving out those words of reigning in Syria, as being a thing sufficiently set forth before of Rezon with his men; where it is said, they reigned in Damascus. And if we understand it thus, the case of Solomon and his countrey was now greivous, he being invaded on the South by the Edomites, and on the North by the Syrians. It was long that these two enemies had waited for this opportunity to get these two kingdomes, and they must needs now bee both of them very aged. Rezon, who was a Captain at the least 20 yeares before David dyed, and at least 20 when he was first Captain; and Hadad, who was at his death 25, for adde unto the one the yeares of Solomon's reigne 36. and hee must now be aged 76. and to the other 36. and he must be 61. But Solomon's exactions most probably being now more greivous, these nations who before might have been sollicit in vain, were easily drawn to rebell and to admit of these for their Princes, and under them and at their direction to make excursions upon his kingdome of Israel.

be

Neither had Solomon these two enemies onely, but also another in his own kingdome; viz. Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, who had been formerly advanced by Solomon for his valour to bee over the whole house of Ioseph, but now by Abijah a Prophet, he was stirred up by telling him that God would make him King over 10 tribes of Israel, leaving unto Solomon's sonne one onely, &c. This Nebat saith Lyra, the father of Ieroboam was Shimei, whom Solomon slew, according to the opinion of some; and he being by his mother nourished up after his death was often by her put in mind of Solomon's severity towards his father, thus stirring up an hatred in his mind against him: but how frivolous this is, appeareth, because his name differs, and Shimei was not of Ephraim, but of Benjamin. It is therefore more probable, which followeth in Lyra following Iosephus, that Solomon first employed Ieroboam about the work of Millo, and hereupon observing his industry, preferred him to bee Ruler over the whole house of Ioseph; that is, Ephraim of which he was, and Manasseh; now he having attained this great dignity, as he went out of Jerusalem to take this principality upon him, Abijah was sent by the Lord unto him to appoint him unto a farre greater dignity, viz. to be a King over 10 tribes, a way to which was made by that prefectureship, over the

V. 26.

Lyra.

Iosephus.

the most populous and potent family in Israel already conferred upon him. He being by this animated, began to speak privately against Solomon, that thus he might draw the hearts of the people from him to himself; for which Solomon hearing it sought to slay him. For to this effect the sacred history saith.

V. 27.

This was the thing, for which he lifted up his hand against Solomon, he built Millo, and filled up the breach of the city of David his father. Then Ieroboam being a mighty man, and Solomon seeing him to be industrious set him over the whole house of Joseph, and at that time Abijah found him going out of Jerusalem having a new garment, &c. ] In which words no cause can be found why Ieroboam rebelled against Solomon, or why Solomon's building of Millo is mentioned, unless a supply be made, which is partly implied in the words, viz. to shew, by what means Ieroboam began first to rise, it was upon his employment in Millo, and for his lifting up of his hand against him, there was no cause in that, or in his being set over the house of Joseph, but onely in the message of the Prophet unto him, this his advancement by the King being spoken of only as a preparative and means, the better to attain the kingdom, to which God would raise him for Solomon's punishment. Wherefore they both vent their own inventions, of whom Lyra speaketh, as R. Solomon, who saith, that he reproved Solomon for filling up and stopping the passage, which David had left open for men to come to the house of the Lord, which he did by repairing Millo, and for this Solomon being angry expelled him the city; and others, who say, that he being first set over the house of Joseph, was removed down to a lower office to be over the work of Millo, at which he took indignation and rebelled. But this last is plainly contradicted in the text, for the work of Millo was the occasion of his rise, and the first is meerly imaginary. Yet, as Martyr hath it, Kimbi also findeth a cause in the building of Millo of discontent, both to Ieroboam and to the people; for that in times past it was so built that a postern door was left, and passage for the kings of Israel in case of danger to flee away, which Solomon now also stopt up, and because hereby he shewed a contempt of the citizens, as though he feared no danger from that which they could do at any time, through which he should have any need to flee. And some also, he saith, hold this to be a cause of Ieroboam's and the peoples discontent, that by setting buildings upon Millo, all passage to the court was stopt up, that men could not so easily come to the king with any suite, as in times past; and against these things Ieroboam was most ready to speak, and upon these occasions to stir up the people to rebell against him. And to these or some of these he seemeth to assent. But if there had been any preparatives in Ieroboam to rebell against his master before the Prophets coming to him, the sacred history would not have spared certainly to relate it; no more then Abisalom's practises, when he aspired to his fathers kingdom. Seeing therefore here is no cause set down, but onely the prophesying of Abijah unto him, I conclude, that this was the only thing that first gave him occasion to attempt any thing against Solomon, as we may gather certainly, that he did, because it is said, that he lifted up his hand against him, and yet he had no reason to do so upon that prophesie, in Solomon's life-time, seeing he was told, that no part of the kingdom should be taken from him whilst he lived, but in his sonnes time. The reason then, why the building of Millo and Ieroboam's industry about that work are first mentioned, was because here was the beginning of Ieroboam's rising to dignity, making him the more capable of a kingdom afterwards, as in speaking before of Hadad, his history is set forth from the beginning, and likewise of Rezon: neither doth Iosephus speak of any other occasion of his rebelling, but this prophesie. Yet Tostatus, as Lyra, will have an occasion in the building of Millo, viz. it being a work of great cost, a tribute was raised to maintain the charge, and Ieroboam being appointed over this, finding the people hereat discontented, took this opportunity to speak against the king also: but how then came he after this to a greater dignity by the kings favour?

Iosephus.
Tostatus.

V. 29.

At that time when Ieroboam went out of Jerusalem, Abijah the Shilonite found him; and he was glad with a new garment, &c. ] It is most probable, that by his going out of Jerusalem, is meant his going out towards Ephraim to execute his office fice, till now thinking nothing lesse then of a kingdome, but apt enough, as God knew, upon just occasion offered, to aspire after it. For the tribe of Ephraim, of which he was, in times past affronted Iephthab, and slew the 70. sonnes of Gedeon; and Micah of Ephraim was a ringleader to idolatry in Israel, and Sheba the sonne of Bikri an Ephraimite, lifted up his hand against David next after Abshalom, and so did Ieroboam now against Solomon. Him, being come out, Abijah the Prophet found in the field, and they two are said to have been there alone, which may seeme strange, that he being a man so highly promoted, should travell without any attendants; but it is most likely, that the Prophet called him aside in secret to do his errand unto him, as Samuel in times past did Saul, to avoid the danger of Solomon's knowing of it. Touching the new garment, it is so spoken of, as that it is uncertain, whether Abijah or Ieroboam were clad with it, but it is most commonly taken, and that most rightly, that this garment was the Prophets, because it is likely that Ieroboam would not have suffered him to take and rend his garment, before hee knew the reason, and it had been a strange thing in the Prophet to offer it, and it had not been so fit a signe to give him part of his own, to signifie the rending away, and giving to him that which was another mans, but the garment being the Prophets, who came as a messenger from God, and giving part unto him, did most aptly signifie the thing intended. The cause, why the Prophet did not onely foretell, but by a figure and signe fore-shew the taking away of ten tribes from Solomon's posterity, to give them to Ieroboam, by rending his garment into 12. parts and giving ten of them to Ieroboam, was both to stir him up to be more intent to the thing prophesied, and to make the deeper impression in his minde by the sense, not onely of hearing, but also of seeing, as other Prophets also were directed afterwards to do, both Esay, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. For when Ieroboam saw him to take his own new garment and to tear it in pieces, he could not but conceive, that this was not done for nothing, but upon some serious and weighty consideration. And it is worth the noting, that as ten tribes were rent from Solomon's house and given to Ieroboam, set forth by ten pieces given to him, so the kings of the ten tribes were changed according to this number ten times, till that as a garment rent in pieces they were quite consumed. The kingdome of Israel was new, as a new and whole garment under Solomon, and therefore most aptly set forth by a new garment, but after this rending, it soon began to decay. First, under Ieroboam by warres with Rehoboam, and by his idolatry, for which God began to loath Israel, and he and all his were soon consumed, the kingdome continuing but two yeares in his family after his death. Secondly, under Baasha, who slew Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, and reigned in his stead; by warres also with Asa, and idolatry, for which he and his also were destroyed, in the second year of his sonne Elah, who reigned after him. Thirdly, under Zimri, who was the executioner of Gods wrath against the family of Baasha but stood not above seven dayes. Fourthly, under Omri, who was set up against Zimri, after whom his son Ahab succeeded, and after him Abaziah, and lastly Iehoram of the same family. Fifthly, Under Iehu who slew Iehoram and all Ahabs posterity, and in his house the kingdome remained to the fourth generation. Sixthly, under Shallum, by whom the posterity of Iehu was cut off in Zechariah, but he continued onely one moneth. Seventhly, under Menahem who slew Shallum, and his sonne Pekaiab after him, but in Menahems dayes that kingdome began to be pilled by Pal, the king of Assyria, to avert whose invasion it was drained of 1000. talents of silver. Eightly, under Pekah the sonne of Remaliab, who slew Pekaiab, in his dayes came Tiglatpileser king of Assyria, and subdued and carried away many of this kingdome into Assyria. Ninthly, under Hosheah the sonne of Elah, who slew Pekah, in whose dayes Salmansar the king of Assyria came against Israel, and Hosheah became his servant, and so he reigned in another condition, viz. of a tributary a while, and so may be counted for a tenth king. But then treason being found in him, hee was taken and imprisoned, and the whole kingdome destroyed. But to return to the Prophet Abijah, he gave to Ieroboam ten pieces of the twelve, into which he had rent his garment, fore telling him, that he should reign over ten tribes, but for David's sake, Rupertus.

1 King. 14. 30.

1 King. 15. 27.

1 King. 16. 10.

1 King. 16. 15.

1 King. 16. 23.

2 Kin. 10.

2 King. 15. 13.

V. 14.

V. 25.

V. 30.

2 Kin. 17. 3.

V. 36.

one tribe ſhould be left ſtill to Solomons ſonne: by one tribe underſtanding, as hath been noted before, Judah together with Benjamin lying mixed with it, to expreſſe which the Sept. have it, ſun duntet iſortau duto, he ſhall have two tribes, becauſe that 10 peices being given away, there remained two ſtill. But he telleth him that this ſhould not be done in Solomons dayes; but in his ſons dayes, to whom (though unworthy for Solomons great wickedneſſe, two tribes ſhould remain) that David might not want a light in Israel, that is, a Kingly poſterity comming of David, ſet up as a light by Kingly glory ſhining in that land; and it is ſaid a light, ſaith Martyr, becauſe David himſelfe reigning over all was as the Sun; but henceforth the Kings comming of him ſhould be but as a light, the beames of their Kingly glory extending nothing ſo faire. The cauſe why God would rend away ſo much of the kingdome, is ſet down v. 33. Because they have forſaken me and worſhipped Aſtarte, &c. It is ſaid not he, but they in the plurall number, to intimate that Solomons wickedneſſe ſpread it ſelfe amongſt his people, who were drawne by his example to commit the ſame idolatry: his ſin being thus aggravated, and made the more provocative.

P. Martyr.

V. 33.

V. 34.

Joſephus.

Scholaſt. hiſt.
Toſtatus.

But I will not take away any part of the Kingdome out of his hand, &c. 35. but out of his ſonnes hands, &c.] Here Ieroboam is expreſſly directed not to attempt any thing in Solomons life time, as David being held by the feare of God without any expreſſion reſtrained himſelfe from attempting any thing againſt Saul during his life, although he were by Samuel annointed king in his ſtead. Yet Joſephus ſaith, that he being by this prophetic lifted up to great hopes, began ſo ſoone as he came amongſt his contribules, over whom he was ſet, to move them to ſedition, and helpe him to this kingdome. Comeſtor and Toſtatus thinke, that he ſought to ſtirre them up before. That of Joſephus ſeemeth not to diſagree from the ſacred hiſtory, in which it is ſaid, that he lifted up his hand againſt him, v. 26. for what is this elſe but to rebell? and for his ſeeking the kingdome before, it ſeemeth to be intimated in this ſpeech of the Prophet unto him, Thou ſhalt reigne according to all that thy heart deſireth] for hence ſome gather that he deſired before to attaine the kingdome. But this is a weak ground, ſeeing the meaning of that ſaying might be nothing elſe, but that when he ſhould be made king over the ten tribes according to this prophetic, as he ſhould deſire after the manner of all kings, ſo he ſhould continue Lord and King over all thoſe parts, none being able to put him downe againe. I conclude then; that moſt probably Ieroboam thought of nothing leſſe before, then of a kingdome, but when he had heard the Prophet, he began to ſhew the wickedneſſe of his heart preſently in aſſaying to get the kingdome in Solomons life time, which was expreſſely denied unto him, and yet the providence of God wrought alſo herein to afflict Solomon the more for his ſinnes, who knoweth how to uſe wicked men as inſtruments to puniſh the wicked, although that which they doe againſt them proceedeth meerely from their owne evill diſpoſition.

V. 39.

P. Martyr.

And I will afflict the ſeed of David for this, but not for ever] Becauſe theſe words are added after theſe, v. 38. I will build thee a firme houſe, &c. ſome to make them to cohere with them, underſtand them, as if that were the afflicting of David's houſe meant, when they ſhould not ſee the ten tribes to returne any more unto them, but to continue ſeparated, as a contrary kingdome. But this pleaſeth not Martyr, who thinketh rather and that rightly, that they have reference to that which was ſaid before, viz. the renting away of the ten tribes for their ſinnes, ſeeing if it had been meant of the continuing of this rent, it ſhould have been ſaid, I will afflict them in this, and not for this. Touching the laſt words but not for ever, ſome underſtand them, as if it were meant, that the kingdome of Israel now to be divided from the kingdome of Judah ſhould not ſtand alwaies, but returne at length and be under the houſe of David againe, which they thinke was fulfilled, when Israel was carryed away captive by Salmannaſar, and Iſiah ſome time after poſſeſſed Samaritania, and the countries pertaining to the ten tribes, and when after the captivity of Judah into Babylon and returne againe in the dayes of the Aſſamonei, the Jewes obtained the whole kingdome. But this ſaith Martyr cannot ſtand, becauſe although they poſſeſſed the land againe, yet the ten tribes never returned to be reduced under the obedience of the house of David. It is better therefore saith he, to understand it of the Messiah, in whom the kingdom of David is much more enlarged, then ever before, in that all the ends of the earth are given unto him. And this is acknowledged by R. Solomon, but he crieth miserably in that he holdeth the kingdom of the Messiah to be a kingdom in this world, under the obedience whereof the other ten tribes shall one day be brought againe. Pellican agreeth with Martyr, who saith, that the glory was restored to Dauids house in the Messiah, as never was to any mortall king; and Lyra, Tostatus, and Dionysius likewise. They were not say they, afflicted any more by the kingdom of Israel consisting of ten tribes after 250. yeares, because that kingdom then ceased, by reason whereof the kingdom of Iudah could never be quiet long together before: but their affliction was wholly at an end, when the Messiah came and reduced all nations under his obedience by his Gospel.

to

Whereas the Lord spake so kindly to Ieroboam by his Prophet v. 38. If thou wilt walke in my wayes, &c. I will be with thee, &c. when as he knew that he would be a most grosse Idolatour, and did by him punish Solomon, when as he knew that he would be much worse, he did it out of his generall goodnesse, that diffuseth it self to all alike, to the good and the bad, to the just and unjust, that when he should prove so bad, he might the more justly be most severely punished, as indeed he was in his posterity, none being spared, but all cut off, thus also was Saul before advanced, and Iehu, and Hazael after. And he spake thus, and set him up to punish idolatry, that whatsoever he should prove after wards, it might yet bee manifest hereby, that God was not the authour of it, but that it sprung from his own corruption most violently carrying him on against the most effectuell premonitions and promises that the Lord could make unto him, and that we might learn hereby not to charge God with our sinnes, as some doe, saying; I am such, because God hath made me such.

But Solomon sought to slay Ieroboam, wherefore he fled into Egypt to Sesback, &c.] Hitherto hath been shewed what promises were made to Ieroboam, neither is it expressly said, that he attempted any thing against Solomon hereupon, but because this is said before, that he lifted up his hand against him; whereof the Prophets coming to him is said to be the cause, and here that Solomon sought to slay him (which he would not doubtlesse have done meerly for that prediction; for both it was secret, and he might as well and rather have sought to kill the Prophet for that: neither is it to be thought that Solomon was so farre gone in wickednesse as to oppose the knowne will of God in any thing) it is to be held that he began now as was touched before, like a proud and ungratefull man, to seek to get away part of his masters kingdom, and therefore he sought to cut him off. But if by any meanes the prophesy came to Solomons care, and hereupon hee were moved the more against him, that Gods purpose might be prevented; he sinned greatly herein, and it argueth his finall impenitency, as Sauls; and his seeking to slay him was but a kicking against the pricks, and fighting against God; all whose decrees shall stand unalterable against the machinations of the greatest Potentates in the world. Sesback, the King of Egypt, to whom Ieroboam fled, was most probably the sonne of Pharaoh, the father in law of Solomon; who now his father being dead, reigned there: but it seemeth that although hee were neare unto Solomon by his marriage with his sister, yet the freindship continued not, as before; for then hee would not have harboured his rebellious subject, but delivered him to him to bee punished. And this is a thing common to other Kings, the band of affinity proveth oftentimes no tie unto them, but that the brother in law will be against the brother in law, for his owne ends.

The rest of Solomons acts, &c. are written in the book of the acts of Solomon.] That is, saith Martyr in a Chronicle, in which all notable things were set downe from time to time, that happened in any Kings reigne; as in the Chronicles of other kingdoms: but because many things were therein set down, which it concerneth not the Church in generall to know, for instruction and edification in matters pertaining to God; such onely were excerpted, and set forth in the two books of Chronicles.

Pellican.

V. 38.

Matt. 5. 45.

V. 40.

V. 41.

P. Martyr.

Lyra.
Bibliotheca patrum.

V. 42.

V. 43.
Ch. 14. 11.
Note.

nicles here following, and those former writings being none of the canonicall Scripture, perish; Lyra saith, that these writings of the acts of these Kings, were burnt by Nebuzardan steward to the King of Babylon; so likewise Sextus Senensis, 2 Chron. 9. 27. Solomon's other acts are said to be written by Ahijah the Shilonite, Nathan and Iddo, who it seemeth were writers successively of Solomon's acts, as others were in their times before and after of other Kings of Judah and Israel.

The time that Solomon reigned over all Israel was 40 years, but at what age he began, it is not said, but of this what may be most probably conjectured, for before ch. 1. 38. 39. and it may be, that he reigned sometime whilst David yet lived, which cometh not into this account, in which time he begat Rehoboam, who is said to have been 40 when he dyed, and then he began to reign in his stead. And it is to be noted that Solomon fell so soon in his old age, that no word is spoken in his commendation at his death, as of David; as that he dyed in a good old age, full of riches and glory, that all men may be warned by him not to fall from the favour and love of God, but to persevere herein to the last gaspe, lest they fall from that which is the greatest comfort in the world in their death, the praise of God.

CHAP. XII.

V. 1.

AND Rehoboam came to Sichem, where all the people assembled to make him King. ] That which was said in generall before ch. 11. 43. that Rehoboam reigned in his stead, is here more particularly declared, for the manner of proceeding about his reign; not as other kings afterwards, who being heires apparant to the kingdom expected not the peoples consent, but the father being dead, the sonne and heir immediatly reigned in his stead. But Rehoboam most foolishly deferred to do so, that in time he might by the consent of the people, be made King, not considering what danger there is in delays in matters of this nature. And as he shewed folly in this, so in that he was drawn to Sichem about this businesse, in the midst of Ephraim, where Ieroboam was so powerfull, who had also attempted before to set up himself there, and from these he proceeded to a third degree of folly, in forsaking the counsell of the ancients, & following the counsell of young men as is hereafter shewed. Neither did Salomon wisely, but as one that towards his end had his understanding taken from him, in that he neglected in his life-time to set his son upon the throne, which he saw was otherwise likely to be hazarded by Ieroboam, especially seeing his father David had herein given him an example of kingly providence, when as he yet living had caused him to be crowned King. But happily he saw into his sonnes foolishnesse, and therefore was carelesse, or thought it not fit to give him occasion of insolency by preferring him so, whilst he lived: for Eccles. 47. 24. he is said to be a most foolish man. But in all these things, we must look to a higher hand, which moderated herein, to effect what he had decreed for the punishment of Solomon.

V. 2.

Whilst the assembly was coming together to Sichem, Ieroboam hearing that Solomon was dead, returned from Egypt, but whether sent for by his contribules to this assembly, or to what place he came, or whether immediatly upon the news of Solomon's death, it is not said: yet we may hence gather, that he returned of his own minde, because his sending for is not spoken of untill v. 3. and it is most likely, that he being ambitious enough of the honour promised him, would not now slack the time to come and seek for it, much more then formerly he had done. The Sept. transl. according to Aldus saith, when he heard these things in Egypt, he came straight way to his city to the land of Saris in the mount of Ephraim.

V. 3.

And they sent and called him, &c. ] Because he was a man of great note amongst them, as being in times past by Solomon made a Prince over them, they sent for him as the fittest man to speak for them to Rehoboam touching their grievance, making account as the sequel shewed, that if by petition they could have no redresse, to revolt unto him, and altogether to shake off the rule of the house of David by his help, help, he being by them set up for King. And it is not to be thought, but they had heard of the prophesie of Ahijah, who was of the same tribe, touching Gods purpose of thus advancing Ieroboam, which made them the rather to seek to have him with them, and to be their spoken man to Rehoboam. And what was their grievance?

Thy father made our yoke heaueie, but now make thee it lighter, &c. ] This yoke is thought most probably to have been, not as some Hebrews conjecture, the sending of 24000. a moneth into Lebanon, of which it hath been spoken before, for this was done by David, but rather a tax that was laid upon the people, for the building of the temple, which held not onely whilest that was in building, but also for the building of the Kings house, the Forrest of Lebanon, and Millo, &c. which being once imposed upon an occasion of building the temple, with which they were willing, was continued forth on for other buildings, and from thence forward as long as Solomon lived, there being wayes enough to spend a Myne of money, to him that had so many wives and concubines to maintain and humour. And this is the course of other kings also, commonly to continue tributes and taxes once imposed, although the occasion ceaseth; but how justly will he one day judge, before whom alone all the doings even of the greatest shall come then to be judged? And that this was the burthen, of which they complained appeareth, because immediatly after this assemblies departure, Adoram was sent to gather the tribute, and stoned to death, and Ieroboam who is thought to have been formerly set over the house of Ioseph to gather this tribute, was for this cause the fittest man, that could be chosen to treat with Rehoboam about it. Yet it is to be thought, as Martyr saith, that the people were never grieved at Solomons taxes, till towards the end of his reign, when he exacted upon them for the building of temples to idols, &c. because they lived alwayes before in great felicity under him. R. L. ben Gerson saith, that they began first to be grieved at his taxes, when they saw by Hadaads and Rezons invasions, that new charges came upon them, towards the maintaining of those warres. Rehoboam having heard their request, taketh three days respite to give answer, wherein, saith Pellican, he did foolishly, because in this time they might consult about a defection, whatsoever answer he should make, so likewise Martyr. But some others, that he did wisely to take counsell, before he made them answer, as is advised, Eccles. 32. 24. my sonne do nothing without counsell: and Prov. 29. 10. a man rash to speak is condemned. Yet in this case, the people being already exasperated, it had been more wisely, done to lenifie their mindes with some gentle answer at that time. For this is a generall principle amongst Kings, by no meanes to shew rigour in the beginning of their reign, but all humanity to the winning of the hearts of their subjects. It is strange, saith Martyr, that the people being assembled together, shewed no distast at the idolatry lately set up, neither spake any thing for the redresse thereof, but onely to have their burthens eased, that concerned their worldly profit. But this is common to worldly men, they are not sensible of the evill corruption in religion, but only of worldly damages.

The people being dismissed, Rehoboam began rightly to consult with the ancients, who had been counsellors in his fathers time, that is, saith Ierome, and after him Comestor, Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiadah, and Iahiel the sonne of Achimoni, otherwise called Chilab. But whereas they countelled him most wisely to speake kindly to the people, he contrariwise consulting also with young men, that had been brought up with him, answered them roughly, as they advised him. Here it is to be understood, that these men were not young in yeares, seeing they had been brought up together with Rehoboam, who was now forty one yeares of age, but children in understanding and experience in affaires of the common-wealth. They counsell'd him to say, my little finger shall be greater then my fathers loynes, my father made your burthen heavy, but I will adde unto it, he did beat you with rods, but I will beat you with scorpions. whereby they meant, that his father ruled over them and put upon them what tribute he pleased, when he was very young, therefore he being much older, for this their relucting against him would make them know

V. 4.

1 King. 9. 15.

V. 5.
Pellican.

P. Martyr.

V. 6.
Hieron. intradit.
Hebr.

V. 8.

V. 10, 11.

Lyra.

his puissance to be greater, and com pell that subjection and service from them, about which they now made question. So that his aggravating of the burthen upon them should be as a beating with scorpions; which, saith Lyra, is a kinde of most hard whip having pieces of lead or iron tyed at the end of the cords, and is called a scorpion because as it stingeth with the taile and the torment of the scorpions stinging is most grievous, so is the scourging with this kinde of whip. This counsell although without all ground of truth, pleased greatly this foolish man, because he thought that in saying thus he should speake more like a king, that had power and command over the people, but to speake otherwise were to abase himselfe to his subjects. But as I said before, without all ground of truth; for neither was Rehoboam more, but lesse powerfull then Solomon, who was the wisest and richest amongst men, and Rehoboam foolish and poore to him-ward; neither did Solomon a long time burthen them, but they enjoying much happinesse under him, rejoyced and praised God. But the cause why Rehoboam was thus cruelly bent and foolishly lead, was the hand of the highest, which was herein for the punishment of Solomon in his posterity, that his word spoken by Ahijah might take effect. He did not give the wisdom to Rehoboam to discern the best counsell from the worst, whereby he might have been kept from this pride and cruelty, but in his just judgement infatuated him, and stirred up Ieroboam and the people to take this occasion to revolt from him, that is, not by putting into them a spirit of rebellion, but permitting them to be carryed on by the bitterness of their own mindes thus exasperated, leaving him, to set up another king over them.

V. 15.

V. 16.

What portion have we in David, or what inheritance in the sonne of Ishai? As Rehoboam had spoken contemptuously to them, so they here reply contemptuously, not as to their king, but to some private person of an obscure family, as Saul in times past had done, when he would disgrace David, calling him the sonne of Ishai; to thy rents O Israel, and looke thou to thy house O David, that is, to thy own matters, and to those that will adhere unto thee, for we will be no longer thy Subjects. The exposition of these words [thy house] in Iosephus, understanding hereby the Temple, is most strange, and contrary to all others; and to the Chaldee paraphrase, who hath it, reigne over thy house (O David;) neither was the Temple called by the name of David, but of Solomon, and it came not from the people afterwards to leave the Temple, but from Ieroboams wicked policy. Thus Israel went from Rehoboam and made Ieroboam their king, which act of theirs was not justifiable, although God had decreed that thus it should be; because it proceeded from an evill fountain, a rebellious and impatient minde in them, neither had they yet order from God thus to do, although he had foreshewed by his Prophet that thus it should be. But from Rehoboams example using his Subjects like slaves, all other kings may take warning, as they desire to reigne in peace and not to hazzard the losing of all.

Note.

V. 17.
Pellican.

But Rehoboam reigned over the children of Israel, that dwell in the cities of Iudab. That is, saith Pellican, Iudab, Benjamin, and Simeon, and to make the other tribes ten he saith, that Manasseh because of the division into two parts, one on the other side of Jordan, and the other on this, might be counted for two. And indeed Simeon must needs be part of his kingdome, because he is said to have reigned over all the children of Israel that dwell in the cities of Iudab, seeing the lot of the tribe of Simeon fell within Iudab, Iosh. 19. 1, 2. Wherefore the one tribe of Iudab over which Rehoboam is said to continue King still, v. 20. comprehended two more. So likewise Martyr, but some oppose this alleadging Adricomus, who divideth Simeon from Iudab in his description of the holy land, and urging the prophesie against it of 10 tribes to Ieroboam; and hereunto may be added, that in all the levying of armies by the Kings of Iudab, the tribe of Iudab onely, and the tribe of Benjamin are spoken of both in Rehoboams time, and in the time of his successors; no word being spoken of the tribe of Simeon, out of which also men should doubtlesse have been raised, if it had been under this King. Moreover it is expressly said, that many of Ephraim and Manasseh, and of Simeon, came and dwell in Iudab in the dayes of Asa; 2 Chr. n. 15. 9. being altogether called Israelites, which arguch

argueth that they were of the kingdome of Israel, as the Ephraimites were, but then through the feare of God turned to Judah. In which kingdome, when the Simoonites increased, they being straightened in the dayes of Hezekiah, are said to have gone out and conquered more land for their enlargement, 1 Chron. 4. 41.

Then the King sent Adoram who was over the tribute, but they stoned him to death. He is thought by Expositours to have sent him being a wise man and an ancient, by good words to lenifie their minds again; to likewise Iosephus; but they being once exasperated were so farre from returning, that they were the more enraged, and both slew him and tumultuated so against Rehoboam himselfe, that hee fled away in his chariot to save his own life, neither could their minds ever after be reconciled to his so, as to return unto that house againe. But to shew how displeasing this their rebellion was to God, they were alwayes left under the government of Idolatrous kings, untill that the measure of their wickednesses being made up to the full they were destroyed, and came into the hands of forreign enemies. If any shall think that Adoram was sent not to pacify the people, but to exact tribute according to his office; this cannot be, seeing Rehoboam was not yet accepted for King, and the people now being from home, and so most probably unprovided of mony to pay, this was no place to require it in. Lyra saith, that they suspected Adoram to be one of them, who gave the King counsell to make them so harsh an answer, and therefore they raged so much against him, seeing it is the manner of men in this office commonly to encrease the Kings tribute as much as they can, that they may be with him in the more favour; but it turneth sometimes to their own destruction, which would be thought upon by all projectours, who for their own ends against law and equity, procure heavy burthens to be laid upon the people.

And when all Israel heard that Ieroboam was returned, they sent and called him, and made him King. It is said, v. 2. 3. that Ieroboam being returned out of Egypt was sent for, and together with the people demanded a relaxation of their heavy burthens, how then is it now said, that they heard of his return, and sent for him? Pellican thinketh that he was now gone home, when it was cryed, To your tents (O Israel) modestly expecting the event of this tumult, and not ambitiously seeking the kingdome.

But Lyra, all the people now heard in all places, that he was returned out of Egypt, by those that had been at the former assembly; but v. 1. they that had been there, are said to be all Israel, therefore this cannot stand, and much lesse that of Pellican, that by his return is meant his return to his own house, from whence they sent to call him, for his practices past do shew, that he was too greedy of comming to this honour. These words then are nothing else but a repetition of that which was said v. 3. these words onely being supplied more, which were wanting there, when all the people heard that he was returned, as if it had been said, they sent for him to be their fore-man in speaking to Rehoboam, and now their request being so contemptuously rejected, and menaces of greater burthens added, they straightway make him their king, whilest they were together in Shechem. For although they cryed, to your tents (O Israel) yet it is not probable that they went any further, then to some tents they had for the time pitcht up for themselves about that place, because the houses in Shechem could not contain them: for unto them, their assembly not yet being dissolved, came Adoram, whom they stoned and immediately proceeded to the constitution of this new King, and it had been a great toil, and no policy, to go away and return again after a time, from all parts of the kingdome to do it, because Rehoboam might so easily have come upon them, being severed and without an head and taken revenge for their rebellion. Thus a new kingdome came to be set up, called sometime the kingdome of Israel, as the other of Judah, sometime of Ephraim, or Samaria, or of Iezrael, and because Ieroboam was of the tribe of Ephraim, it is thought that the prophesie of Isaac was now fulfilled, who in blessing the two sonnes of Ioseph, preferred Ephraim before Manassah, Gen. 48.

V. 18.

1 K 12. 4. 6. he is called Adoram.
Ioseph lib. 8.
Amiq. 6. 3.

V. 20.

Pellican.
Lyra.

Rehoboam

V. 21, 22.
23, 24.

Rehoboam being returned to Ierusalem, gathereth an army out of Iudah and Benjamin of 180000. to go against Israel, to bring the people back again to his obedience. But God sent Benaiah a prophet unto him to forbid him, because their revolting and setting up of a new King over them came from him, and thus hee was stayed from these proceedings, wherein the great power of God appeared in ruling and turning mens hearts, in that the King being so greatly incensed, and having now so strong an army about him, was by a message brought by a poore Prophet so soone turned from his purpose and made to dissolve his forces. Whereas then it is said Ch. 14. 30. That there was warre between Rehoboam and Ieroboam all their dayes, it is to be understood not of any warres to get the kingdome one from the other, but of skirmishes to revenge wrongs mutually done by the one to the other upon their borders.

V. 25.
Judg. 9. 45.

And Ieroboam built Sychem in mount Ephraim, and dwelt there, and going from thence he built Penuel.] Sychem was about two hundred yeares before this destroyed by Abimelech, but it is not to be thought, as Expositours generally hold, that it remained waste till this time, but was rebuilt againe long before, yet haply it wanted walls and towers for strength, which this new king intending to make it the chiefe citie of his kingdome, and his royall seat, thought now needfull to have about it, and a pallace and other stately buildings for ornament, and therefore he immediately after his inauguration to the kingdome thus built it, that he might from hence the better rule over his subjects about, and because part of his dominion was on the other side of Jordan, where dwelt the tribes of Gad and Reuben, and the half tribe of Manasseh, he built Penuel which stood there, and strengthened it likewise, that he might the better keep his subjects thereabout in awe. For of this city we read also, that it was destroyed by Gedeon the father of Abimelech, a few yeares before Sychem.

Judg. 8. 17.

2 Chr. 8. 11. 5,
6, 7, 8.

Touching the other king Rehoboam, that which is here wanting of his buildings and fortifications, is supplied 2 Chron. 11. 5, 6, &c. He dwelt in Ierusalem, and built fenced cities in Iudah, Bethlehem, Etham, Tekoa, &c. Solomon his father had bestowed great cost this way before, but his fortifications were upon the frontiers of his kingdome, the cities that were within the land remaining unfortified, but now the kingdome being divided into two, it was necessary to fortifie those cities, that stood next unto the kingdome of Israel for fear of Ieroboam, if he at any time should attempt to get more from him, wherefore he strengthened these cities being 15. in number, and furnished them with victuals and armour, shields and spears.

V. 26.

Then Ieroboam said in his heart, the kingdome will now return to the house of David, if the people go up to Ierusalem to sacrifice, &c. ] Now Ieroboam beginneth to shew the wickednesse of his heart, and what little faith he had in God, who had made him king, and had promised to establish him, if he would walk in his wayes, and given him already a taste of his providence over him, in averting the danger by Rehoboams mighty army from him. For leaving God, he trusted in his own policy, devising a meanes to keep the people from Ierusalem, and so from all danger of being drawn to the obedience of Rehoboam again. And this was by setting up two golden calves, one in Bethel and the other in Dan, where he built temples and instituted a new priesthood, and a new feast the 15. day of the 8. moneth, and offered sacrifices to them, as at Ierusalem by divine institution the 15. day of the 7. moneth was kept for the feast of tabernacles. This idolatry with golden calves, he may well be thought to have learned in Egypt, whilst he lived there with Sisak, whose daughter he is also said by some to have married, for so the Hebrews coming out of Egypt, when Moses was gone from them 40. dayes, caused Aaron to make them a golden calf, Exod. 32. and he said, these are thy gods (O Israel) which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, go no more up to Ierusalem. 2 Chron. 11. 15. he is said to have made him Priests of high places, and of devils, and of the calves, which he had made. Whereby his intimated, that having once gone from the Lord in setting up some idols, or visible signes of Gods presence, and presuming upon his own head, to alter both the priest-hood, and place, and time of his worship, he was fore-given over contrary to that, which happily he intended at the first, to all the abominations of the Gentiles. Which should be a warning to all to take heed, how for any ends of their own, they go from Gods holy word in divine worship, as the Papists have also done, and the Gentiles did long ago, Roman. 1. 9. and were therefore given over to a reprobate sense, and the Papists to equall the Gentiles in their superstitions. Bethel and Dan, where he placed these calves, were the one the farthest city South, which was famous for Gods appearing to Jacob there, whereupon he called it Bethel; that is, the house of God, but now it became Bethaven the house of iniquity, and so it is afterwards by the Prophets called: the other was the farthest city of the kingdom North, where the Idol of Michab was by the Danites set up before; so that such tribes as lay Northward, might with more ease goe to that city to sacrifice, then to Jerusalem; and such as lay Southward, to Bethel.

V. 28, 29.

was

But the people being carried with blind superstition went even from the most remote parts South to Dan, as superstition is commonly more patient of labour, then true piety in the most. And in what esteem the Idol in Dan was amongst them, appeareth; Amos 8. 14. where they are threatened, that swear by the God in Dan. And it is probable on the other side, that they who dwelt about Dan, went to Bethel; supposing still, that greatest vertue was in the God that was farthest off from them. And this is said to have turned to sin, that is, the very setting up of an image to represent God, although not of any heathen god; as we may gather from Ieroboams speech. These are thy gods, that brought thee out of Egypt. And from that which was said upon the like occasion by Aaron before; as hath been already noted, which plainly confuteth that interpretation made upon the second commandment by papalls, saying that the images onely of heathen gods are there forbidden, as if it had been said, thou shalt have none other gods but me, neither shalt thou make any images of them. Wherefore vaine and presumptuous is that fiction of Ambrose Politi, as Martyr noteth, who inquiring into the reason why God at the first giving of the Law forbad images, but afterwards directed Solomon to set up divers images in his house, saith, that it was because the people were rude and ignorant at the first, and so there might have been danger in making images, but afterwards, when they were better instructed, this danger ceasing, because they knew then, how to use them, and that there was no diety in them, he appointed images to be made, and mystically hereby intimated the use of images in times to come in the Church under the Gospell. But this bold figment of his is plainly confuted by this very place, wherein after Solomons time images made for divine worship are censured as a cause of sinne. And if images which should bee in the Church under the Gospell, were prefigured by these in Solomons temple, it is a marvaile that the holy Apostles and Doctours of the Church had no perceivance hereof for 600 yeares, all which times images were kept out of the Church, and then first brought in, when learning and piety was most decayed. If any man shall wonder how Ieroboam could perswade the people to accept again of a golden calfe, when as Gods wrath had been before declared by Moses to be so great against their forefathers for the like; it may be conceived that Solomon had already made way to idolatry in his latter time, whereby they were for the most part corrupted, and knew little of the sacred history, and they were of themselves most prone to idolatry; and therefore having now a new King of their owne setting up to lead them, it is no marvaile that they were taken with this device of his, except the Priests and Levites who had more knowledge, and some others of the people who being more religious, and so more conversant in the word of God, detested it, and were ready rather to leave their possessions to goe from the kingdome wherein such abominations were committed to serve God, according to his ordinance at Jerusalem, as is shewed that they did, 2 Chron. 11. 13. 16. And happily as Martyr confuteth, Ieroboam justified his proceedings herein, by saying, that the people of old set up a golden calfe of their owne head without the authority of their Governor, and therefore God was offended with them; but now it being done by the King, the case differed; and so there was no feare of Gods displeasure: and for the

Note.

Iudg. 18.

V. 30.

P. Martyr.

V. 31.
Martyr.

Numb. 16. ch.
17.

Note.

V. 32.

Hos. 7.

Lyra.

the place, as Solomon was a King set up by God, and built his temple; so was he, and therefore might use the like liberty to set up others, &c.

He made also in houses of high places, and he appointed Priests of the extremities of the people, which were not of the families of Aaron. That is, saith Martyr, besides the idols set up by him in Bethel and Dan, he appointed sacrificing in divers other high places in the land after the manner of the heathen. And whereas God had tyed the Priesthood to Aaron and his sonnes, confirming his decree herein by miracle, after the rebellion of Chorah about it, and his destruction with his complices by fire from heaven, Ieroboam nothing dreading the judgements of God, when as Aarons sons would not consent to his wickednes, as is most probable, made others Priests in their stead, of such as he could get from the uttermost parts of his domination out of any of the tribes, who being men of corrupt mindes, and ambitious of the honour readily accepted of it. For there were two dignities, the one Kingly, and the other Priestly; about which, to take away all contention the Kingly was setled upon the tribe of Judah, the Priestly upon the tribe of Levi; and more particularly upon Aarons family, to figure out the Priesthood to come, viz. of Christ, by whom alone the sacrifices of praises and prayers can be acceptably offered unto God. For as of the Kingly, so of the Priestly office men were ambitious; as histories both sacred and prophane doe shew. This was the cause of the rebellion of Chorah; and after the peoples return from their captivity, much contention there was about the high Priesthood. And of Julius Caesar Suetonius writeth, that when his mother dissuaded him from seeking the high Priesthood, he shewed himselfe to be most eagerly set upon it in that he answered her, thou shalt this day either have me a banished man or a high Priest. And as Ieroboam, so superstitious men and hereticall have from time to time deposed and deprived true Presbyters of the Church, which would not consent to their superstitions and errors, and set up others in their stead; but that God who soon shewed his dislike of Ieroboams wicked doings, by his judgements against his house, will not certainly suffer them to goe unpunished.

Moreover Ieroboam instituted a solemnity in the eighth month the fifteenth day and offered upon the Altar; &c. v. 33. He went up to the Altar, and offered incense. Ieroboam not content to alter the place of divine worship, & the form & Priesthood presumed yet further to alter the feast of Tabernacles, which God had appointed to be kept the 15 day of the 7th. month; which Martyr thinketh that he did, because the autumnall fruits were then more perfectly gathered in and the work done about them; so that the people might now the better intend to the keeping of a solemnity, and happily because he could not so well have held the people from going up to Ierusalem at the first to the feast kept there, if hee had held one at the same in Bethel. But I rather assent to the first reason, seeing his ayth was not to let them goe first to Ierusalem, and then to call them to Bethel; but to keep them altogether from going up to Ierusalem for feare of revolting from him. And this new festivall time he is said to have appointed of his own head, wherein saith Augustine, he made God a lyer, not beleiving him to be constant in the maintenance of his lawes once made, although he beleived him in his word touching his own advancement to the kingdom. And this new day is by Hosea called the day of the King, because it was not of Gods, but his appointing. And his offering incense shewed, that he took the Priests office upon himselfe also, that by his example he might teach them, that it was lawfull for any man that was consecrated by the offering in the law appointed, as was Aaron, to be a Priest, as Lyra hath it; who also speaking of the house in the high places expounds it of one upon a mount in Dan, and another in Bethel; which is more probable then that of Martyr before, because wee read not of any more places appointed by him.

Touching the feast the 15 day of the 8. moneth instituted by him, although by Iosephus and Lyra and others following him, it be thought to be the feast of Tabernacles, yet Theodoret, Dionysius, and Adricomius do think it to have been a feast of the dedication of the temples or calves, which he had set up, but because it is said to be like the feast kept in Judah, it is rather to be held, that it was a feast of tabernacles, tabernacles, to which the people had been long accustomed, although the time differed. By Rehoboam we may with the ordinary glossie understand worldly minded rectors of the Church, who leaving the way of the ancient fathers, give occasion of schisme in the Church. And by Ieroboam, the most advanced in the Church, who do ill requite God by bringing in idolatry, being thus a cause of great sinning to the people.

CHAP. XIII.

Behold a man of God came from Judah to Bethel, and Ieroboam stood by the altar to offer incense, &c. ] Ieroboam having fallen into such grosse idolatry, and many other sins, the Lord, who had set him up to be King, left him not, but sent his Prophet to him to reprove and threaten him, if by any meanes he might be humbled for it and reformed. And he is said to have come out of Judah, because, saith Martyr, none in his kingdome durst oppose him in his wicked proceedings, from whence he gathereth, how cold their love and zeal for the truth was grown; if we compare it with their zeal of old in Ioshuabs time, when for an Altar set up by the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, all the rest were ready to go to fight against them. But the most godly in those parts were all gone to Judah out of a dislike of Ieroboams doings, as was said before, and therefore from thence, if from any place, one must needs come upon this message of the Lord. And if there had been true prophets still remaining in Israel, yet none of them could have come, but being particularly stirred up by the spirit of God, in which case only at all other times, the prophets of God have gone forth to reprove kings, as is commonly said, the spirit of God came upon such or such a prophet, and then he went and said, &c. as 2 Chron. 20. 14. and this man of God came not, but by the word of the Lord. Who this prophet was is not certainly known, but he is thought by Expositours to be that Iddo, of whom it is spoken 2 Chron. 9. 29. in the latter end of Solomons reign; but against this maketh 2 Chron. 13. 22. where he is said to have written the acts of Abijam the sonne of Rehoboam, whereas this prophet was the same day slain by a lion. Iosephus calleth him Iadon, Hugo Cardinalis Ado or Gad, Ierom Iaddo, meaning, as he expresseth himself, the same man, that wrot Solomons acts. Epiphanius calshim Ioom, born in Samaria. Tertullian thinketh him to have been Semeis, who was another prophet, that wrot of Solomons acts, so likewise Clemens Alexandrinus Semea the sonne of Amame. And he cried out, not to the king but to the altar, saying, O altar, altar, &c. not for reverence to the king forbearing to speak to him, as some think, for the men of God feared not to speak to the greatest tyrants, when they were so directed, as we may see in the example of Samuel to Saul, Elijah to Ahab, Elishah to Iehoram, &c. but he speaketh to the altar and threatneth it, meaning the idolatrous worship there set up, that by crying out unto the altar he might be terrified, that erected it, and all they that served about it, seeing he prophesied of their destruction and burning upon it, as of beasts at this time to the honour of idols, which God so much abhorred, and of the utter overthrow of all that idolatrous worship. And he nameth the man, that should burn men hereupon, viz. Iosiah, in whom this was accomplished 340. yeares after, or according to Iunius 330. Neither did he prophesie of a thing to come onely, but gave a present signe, that he might be beleevd, viz. that the altar should cleave in sunder and the ashes run out, which followed immediately, so as that they, which were present, could not but acknowledge God, hereby attesting, that he was sent of him, which should have made them all to tremble, and to repent of this abominable wickednesse. But the king was so obstinately set upon his idolatry, that in steed of repenting he stretched out his hand, commanding to apprehend the prophet, but he was smitten by the hand of God so, as that his hand withered, and all strength was so taken from his arm, that it still extended, and could not be drawn in again. Yet when he entreated the prophet to pray to his God

V. I.

P. Martyr.

Jesh. 22.

Hieron. in Chro.
13. 22.
Epiphani. lib. de vita proph.
Tertul. de jejun.
c. 16.
Clem. Alex. l. 1.
strom. c. 11.
P. Martyr.

2 King. 23. 25.

God

God for him, it was again restored, so ready are the servants of God to passe by injuries done unto them, and for the evill attempted against them to pray for their persecuters. This kindnesse of the prophet, although Ieroboam could not, but in humanity requite by inviting him home to dine with him, yet neither by the miraculous smiting of his arm, nor by the miraculous sanation thereof, nor by the prodigious present renting of the altar, nor by the judgement befalling the prophet for doing contrary to the charge given him, as here followeth, nor by the old prophets confirming, what this had fore-told, was he moved to any repentance, or to turn from his evill wayes, till his house was destroyed therefore, as is noted v. 34, 35. Whereas in speaking to the altar he doubleth the word [ O altar, altar ] some think, he meant both it and the altar at Dan, but this is too curious, he rather ingeminates the word out of zeal and earnestnesse. His signe giving was according to the direction Dent. 23. to approve himself to be a true prophet of God. And it is to be noted, that Ieroboam was not affected with the signe or the thing threatned, but onely with the stroke, which he felt upon himself, neither did he hereupon desire to be prayed for, that his sinnes might be forgiven him, but onely that his head might be healed, and he spake of God as the prophets, not his God [ pray to the Lord thy God. ] Whence we may gather, how far from any sense of true piety reprobates are, even when they are humbled for judgements, their humiliation is not for their sinnes, but for bodily sufferings, as Ahabs and Pharaohs.

Note.

V. 8.

Tostatus.

Cyprian.
Rupert. lib. 5.
Reg. c. 6.
2 King. 5.

V. 9.

V. 11, 12.

P. Martyr.

The prophet although desired, would not go to Ieroboam's house, no not for a reward also promised him, because the Lord had commanded him, neither to eat bread nor drink water in that place, eating bread and drinking water being put for all other provision, as 2 King. 6. 22, 23. But as Tostatus puts the case, what if he had been imprisoned and kept there many dayes, should hee rather have suffered himself to be starved, then to have eaten there? and answereth, that having a particular charge to abstain, he should, though to the endangering of his life. He was to put his trust in God, who could have miraculously preserved him, as he did Elijah. This interdicting him to eat and drink in that place, was in detestation of the idolatry there committed, and figured out, as Cyprian and Rupertus have it, the censure of the Church against hereticks and other notorious wicked persons, being excommunicated, with whom it is unlawfull to eat, that they being shunned of all men, might be confounded and brought to repentance. And for receiving gifts, that the prophets did generally abhor from any in those cases, lest the favour of God should seeme to be purchase-able with money, which cometh freely.

But what meaneth that which is further added, neither shalt thou return by the way whereby thou wentest? Hereby was intimated, that the place, where idolatry is committed is made so abominable, as that the way thither also is hereby polluted, and therefore to shew the greater detestation of this place, he must not tread in the way that led to it any more, and hereby we are taught to eschew coming where the wicked come, but onely to reprove them.

And there was an old prophet dwelling in Bethel, &c. ] This prophet hearing by his sonnes, who it may be were present at Ieroboam's sacrificing, that a man of God came from Judah and shewed such signes, but departed thence without eating or drinking, because he was by God forbidden to eat there, rode after him to fetch him back to his house to eat with him, lyingly telling him, that it was to him revealed, that he should return and eat and drink with him, but therein hee dissembled. 2 Kings 23. 18. this old Prophet is said to have come from Samaria, so that he was not of Bethel by birth, as Martyr noteth, but of Samaria; only he now dwelt in Bethel. And whereas Samaria was not built till long after his time by Omri, 1 King. 16. 24 he saith, it is either sayed so by anticipation, or that there was a city so called before, but by Omri increased and beautified with more buildings. Touching this old Prophet some hold him to have been a false Prophet, and a worshipper of Ieroboams calves, and an encourager of him in that wickednesse, and that he sought to intrap the man of God in subtilty, that he being provoked against him, he might bee destroyed; and when he had effected it, that hee went to the King and perswaded him that he was a vain and wicked man, as appeared by the judgement befalling him. Wherefore hee said there was not any cause why hee should be troubled at his speeches or signes shewed by him, seeing the Altar being new made might well be cleaved in sunder by the many sacrifices wherewith it was overwhelmed, and the strength of his arme might faile him through wearinesse in standing and holding the center of incense so long. Thus Iosephus in many more words, and after him Comestor, and Rupertus, and Lyra, Dionysius, Hugb, and Cajetan, Vatablus and the Chaldee paraphrast calling him a lying Prophet, Michal by name. And Lyra saith that he came from Samaria to Bethel for the worship of the calves; and some, saith Martyr, that he was Amasiah their high Priest. But both Martyr and Pellican hold him to have been a true Prophet of God, but frigid and without zeal to oppose Ieroboam in his idolatry; yet they say hee was glad that one came to reprove it, and earnestly desired to doe him any good office therefore, and to be acquainted with him. Wherefore not being otherwise able to reduce him back to his house, hee feigned a revelation made unto him from God. And Theoderes long before saith, that hereby he appears to have been a true Prophet, that he foretold truly the judgement to come upon this Prophet, and believed and confirmed his word touching the Altar at Bethel, and added a prophesie against all other high places; and lastly gave a charge to his sonnes to bury him in the same sepulcher with this Prophet, being assured that the time should come that mens bones should be taken up and burnt in Bethel, but thus he hoped that his should rest in quiet; so like wise Procopius saying, that hee was no otherwise a false Prophet, but in that he falsly pretended a revelation at this time, and to them a greath Tobias and some others, because he is called here only a Prophet; but not a false Prophet. And whereas it is objected, that he said, because thou hast not obeyed the voyces of the Lord thy God, as if he served other Gods; for thus Ieroboam also spake, 6. 6. and Pharaoh to Moses. It is answered that this phrase doth not always imply a strangeness in the speaker from the true God, but sometimes the peculiar favour of God towards him; to whom it is spoken, as the woman of Techon spake to David, and Moses to Israel; Hear the voyces of the Lord thy God. Upon the foresaid reasons then, and because in the sacred history he is called no otherwise but an old Prophet. I conclude that he was no false Prophet that stood for Idolatry, as Iosephus pretends, or a wicked wizzard, as Balaam, but a Prophet of the Lord, yet subject to be overwayed by a good intention to shew kindnesse to the man of God, so as that he dissembled with him, but sought again afterwards by repentance to doe away this his sin; and doing unto him the best offices of love that he could in burying him honourably, lamenting his death, confirming his word, and lying in the same sepulchre with him after his death. As for Iosephus, whom others that are of a contrary opinion follow, it appears how little credit is in this matter to be given unto him, because in that long narration that he maketh of this Prophet, he erreth palpably in divers things; in that he saith that Ieroboam fell to this idolatry by his perswasion: whereas the Scripture saith hee did it of his own head, and that whilst they were doing, the word of the Lord threatening him came to Idon, whereas it came to this old Prophet; and that it was told him that he should be destroyed by a Lion in that journey, whereas it was only said, that he should not come to the sepulchers of his fathers; and lastly, that this man of God was a vain fellow, neither was his prophesie true, whereas he confirmed it to the uttermost; yet he was as Gregory saith, an evil Prophet to him, when he lyed unto him, and deceiving him, made him to sinne; whereupon he hath these words, He well received the sentence of death out of the mouth of an evil Prophet, by whose seducing he declined from the precepts of life, that from thence he might receive punishment truly, from whence he contracted guilt negligently. Yet it is not to be doubted, but that this man of God was saved, his error being punished onely with death corporall, as is said of the Corinthians, 1 Cor. 11. 32. that he might not be Judged with judgements eternall.

King

But by his example we are taught not to goe from the certain word of God in any thing, no not by the perswasion of an Angell from heaven; as the Galatians are charged

Iosephus.

Cald. paraphrast.
Lyra.

Pellican.

Theoder. in 3.
Reg. 94. 42.

Gregor. bene ore mali prophete sententiam mor-tis accepit, cuius seductione a preceptis v. m. declinavit, ut inde postea ve-raciter sanaretur unde culpam negligenter admisso.

Augst. 44 in 3
Reg. 13.

Angelomus quod
peccatum inobedi-entia in ipso fuerit morte lazarum. quia idem
Leo, qui vivemtem presumpit occidere non ausus est occi-
sum contrahere.
Gregorius Magnus.

P. Martyr.

Note.

angelomus quod
peccatum inobedi-entia in ipso
fuerit morte lazarum. quia idem
Leo, qui vivemtem presumpit occidere non ausus est occi-
sum contrahere.
Gregorius Mag-
nus.

charged, Gal. 1. 8. Touching his exemption from future punishments, S. Augustine saith, Thus God would punish his servant who despised not to obey his precept by his own contumacy, but being deceived by anothers fallacy, believing that he obeyed, when he obeyed not. For it is not to be thought that he was so killed by a beast, as that his soule was snatcht away to tartarean punishments, seeing the same Lion that slew him, kept his very body, the beast which carried him being also unhurt, and standing by his masters body without feare, in the presence of that savage wild beast even to his funerall; by which marvellous sign it appears, that the man was rather chastised temporally unto death, then punished eternally after death. And hereby saith Angelomus, it manifestly appeareth that his sin of disobedience was in death released, because the same Lion which presumed to kill him living, durst not touch him being slaine. Eusebius saith the same, with Augustine and Tostatus likewise, and others. Although hee sinned saith Martyr, and was therefore punished with death, yet it was meerly by being deceived, because although God had before forbidden him to eat in that place, yet he thought now he might countermaund it, as to Abraham, whom he had bidden to offer his sonne Isaac in sacrifice, but afterwards he spake to the contrary; and Balaam being first forbidden to goe with Balaaks messengers, was afterwards bidden to goe; and this extenuateth his sinne, although it freeth him not from it. And happily as Gregory noteth, hee was selfe-conceited at his precedent doings and good successes: wherefore to humble him the Lord suffered him to fall, and happily saith Martyr, he was offended with him, because he stayed by the way and made no more haste back again, or the occasion of his error by this device of the old Prophet, might be his propensity to hearken to a motion of refreshing, he being now hungry and thirsty, and so he might not so seriously consider before hee yielded to return; or lastly, because he sought not to God by prayer again to direct him. Wherefore that wee may by no pretence of the truth be deceived, as some are by the Popish; let us first cleave unmovably to that which we certainly know to be the word of God, not being carryed by any pretended revelations, and feigned miracles; and if the case be so doubtfull, as that we cannot other wise know the truth, let us lye to God by prayer, and bee no whit more prone to be swayed on way then another by any worldly respect, but by his glory; having alwayes an heart ready to obey his known will in every thing, and alwayes be humble. Yet the same Martyr saith, that this man of God is to be hoped well of, according to the opinion of others before, and giving him thus to death for one offence, into which he fell only by being too facile; he gave occasion to the people of Israel to be terrified by thinking what grievous judgements they were exposed unto by their wilfull abominable idolatries, and like wise all other obstinate sinners. In that the old Prophet denounced this as a judgement unto him, that he should not come to the sepulchers of his fathers, we learn that to want a buriall, or not to be buried at home, but in a strange place, was of old counted ignominious: for although a dead corps hath no soule herof, yet when this is threatned to a man living, through the love that he beareth to his own flesh, he is sensible of it. But for Gods cause to suffer, as many Martyrs have done, and to have the dead body exposed to wild beasts, as the body of Ignatius was, and devoured; or otherwise to lye unburied is not ignominious, but glorious. The old Prophets going himselfe in person, when he heard what had happened to the man of God, was to recompence as much as he could; the injury which hee had done unto him, and shew his penitency, that he might obtain pardon. The lions standing by, and neither tearing the body nor the asse, showed the speciall hand of God here in, and that he was not slaine by chance; when he would for a punishment, he opened the lions mouth against his servant, and when he would he sent it both towards his body and the asse, making him his keeper, and holding the asse there to carry him back to the buriall, shewing hereby that all even the fiercest creatures are at his beck. If any shall marvelle why this man of God was so soon punished, who sinned least, but the old Prophet, who was for his dying shore in fault; was not; nor Ieroboam, who was worst of all, till many yeares after in his heade; Martyr answereth that God punisheth those soonest, whom he loveth best, and deserveth

reth the punishments of the most wicked, that at length they may come more heavily upon them, and this is according to that saying, if judgement begin at Gods house, what shall their end be that obey not the Gospel? even as a king that is a father chasteneth his sonne betimes, but destroyeth rebels though long suffered. But because this satisfieth not us touching the old prophet, whom we may not for one act number amongst the wicked, it is further to be added, that it is at the will of the Lord, to punish one of his servants sinning lesse, and to let another sinning more upon his repentance to go free, or it may be held, that this old prophet committed not so great a sin as the other, because he went not from the expresse particular command of God, as he did, which to do hath alwayes brought judgement not to be reversed, as in our first parents, in Saul, and in Ionah, &c.

After this Ieroboam returned not from his evil way, but he turned and made Priests of the high places of the meanest of the people, who so would filled his hand, &c. ] Hitherto have been related so many wonderfull accidents, that a man would think, were sufficient to turn any heart from his sinne, but such was the obdurate obstinacy of Ieroboam, that nothing would move him to repentance. The cause (Martyr thinketh) to be, and that truly, his desire of holding the kingdome which he had obtained, and to keep the people alwayes from revolting. For to reign, ambitious men are bent to do any thing, yea to run into the horrible sinne of perjury, as Julius Caesar, who said, si pejerandum, regnandi causa pejerandum, and Harold here in England is said to have broken his oath to William Duke of Normandy for the same cause. And Basiliscus to get unto himself the Constantinopolitan Empire alone, Zeno being put down, disannulled the councill of Chalcedon, to win divers Princes and Bishops to his side, that were against it, and the popish Hierarchy likewise will not turn from their errours, although palpably manifested, through the desire of holding their Empire still. But turned and made priests ] ch. 12. 31. he is said to have made such Priests before, of the high places in Dan and Bethel, but now being more hardened, as they are, that are not made to relent by such powerfull meanes, he proceeded to make more such priests of all other high places throughout his kingdome. Who so would filled his hand ] That is spoken according to the manner of consecrating the Priests at the first by Gods institution, Levit. 8. 27. 28. as the hands of Aaron and his sonnes were filled with offerings. Expofitors also mention another sense, as if by filling his hand were meant Ieroboams, by giving him money to be made priests, but I prefer the first.

And this turned to sinne to the house of Ieroboam, &c. ] That is, after the example of the father, the sonnes went on in abominable idolatry, and erecting and maintaining a priesthood promiscuously of any tribe, or of any base condition, thus bringing ruine upon themselves at last, as it shall be also to all such, as putting down the most faithfull ministers of Gods word, because they will not agree to their superstitions, do indifferently put any, that will into their places.

CHAP. XIII.

AT that time Abijah the sonne of Ieroboam fell sick and he said unto his wife, arise change thy attire, that thou mayest not be known to be the wife of Ieroboam, &c. ] This wicked king, saith Pellican, not being moved to repent by all the signes, which he had seen, beginneth now to be punished in his best sonne Abia, who is smitten with sicknesse. And he knowing, that the idols, whom he served, had no power to help him, but onely the true God, he sendeth to his servant Abia the prophet, that by his meanes he might obtain favour; of whom he had experience before, when he fore-told him, that he should reigne over Israel, that he was a true prophet. But being conscious to himself of his grosse idolatry he was ashamed, that his sending to him should be known, and therefore causeth his wife to disguise herself. Thus they are confounded in time of trouble, when they would, but durst not seek to the true God; of whose help they despair, because they have formerly 1 Pet. 4. 17.

V. 33.

P. Martyr.

V. 34.

V. 1.

Pellican.

2000.

G g a Augst. 44 in 3

Reg. 13.

*Angelomus quod
peccatum inobedi-entia in ip/a fuerit moris lazarum. quia idem
Leo, qui vivemtem presumptione occidere non ausus est occi-
sum consuevit.
Gregorius Magnus.*

P. Martyr.

Note.

procedit ad audire quod fuerit moris lazarum. quia idem
Leo, qui vivemtem presumptione occidere non ausus est occi-
sum consuevit.
Gregorius Mag-
nus.

charged, Gal. 1. 8. Touching his exemption from future punishments, S. Augustine saith, Thus God would punish his servant who despised not to obey his precept by his own contumacy, but being deceived by another's fallacy, believing that he obeyed, when he obeyed not. For it is not to be thought that he was so killed by a beast, as that his soule was snatched away to tartarean punishments, seeing the same Lion that slew him, kept his very body, the beast which carried him being also unhurt, and standing by his masters body without feare, in the presence of that savage wild beast even to his funerall; by which marvellous sign it appeares, that the man was rather chastised temporally unto death, then punished eternally after death. And hereby saith Angelomus, it manifestly appeareth that his sin of disobedience was in death released, because the same Lion which presumed to kill him living, durst not touch him being slaine. Eucherius saith the same, with Augustine and Tostatus likewise, and others. Although hee sinned saith Martyr, and was therefore punished with death, yet it was merely by being deceived, because although God had before forbidden him to eat in that place, yet he thought now he might countermand it, as to Abraham, whom he had bidden to offer his sonne Isaac in sacrifice, but afterwards he spake to the contrary; and Balaam being first forbidden to goe with Balaaks messengers, was afterwards bidden to goe; and this extenuateth his sinne, although it freeth him not from it. And happily as Gregory noteth, hee was selfe-conceited at his precedent doings and good success; wherefore to humble him the Lord suffered him to fall, and happily saith Martyr, he was offended with him, because he stayed by the way and made no more haste back again, or the occasion of his error by this device of the old Prophet, might be his propensity to hearken to a motion of refreshing, he being now hungry and thirsty, and so he might not so seriously consider before hee yielded to return; or lastly, because he sought not to God by prayer again to direct him. Wherefore that wee may by no pretence of the truth be deceived, as some are by the Popish; let us first cleave unmoveably to that which we certainly know to be the word of God, not being carried by any pretended revelations, and feigned miracles; and if the case be so doubtfull, as that we cannot otherwise know the truth, let us flye to God by prayer, and hee no whit more prone to be swayed on way then another by any worldly respect, but by his glory; having alwayes an heart ready to obey his known will in every thing, and alwayes be humble. Yet the same Martyr saith, that this man of God is to be hoped well of, according to the opinion of others before, and giving him thus to death for one offence, into which he fell easily by being too facile; he gave occasion to the people of Israel to be terrified by thinking what grievous judgements they were exposed unto by their wilfull abominable idolatry, and likewise all other obstinate sinners. In that the old Prophet denounceth this as a judgement unto him, that he should not come to the sepulchers of his fathers, we learn that to want a buriall, or not to be buried at home, but in a strange place, was of old counted ignominious: for although a dead corps hath no soule heretofore, yet when this is threatned to a man living, through the love that he becometh to his own flesh, he is sensible of it. But for Gods cause to suffer, as many Martyrs have done, and to have the dead body exposed to wild beasts, as the body of Agathus was, and devoured; or otherwise to lye unburied is not ignominious, but glorious. The old Prophet going himselfe in person, when he heard what had happened to the man of God, was to recompence as much as he could, the injury, which hee had done unto him, and so shew his penitency, that he might obtain pardon. The lions standing by, and neither tearing the body nor the asse, showed the speciall hand of God herein, and that he was not slaine by chance, when he would for a punishment, he opened the lions mouth against his servant, and when he would he shut it both towards his body and the asse, making him his keeper, and holding the asse there to carry him back to the buriall, shewing hereby that all even the fiercest creatures are at his beck. If any shall enquire why this man of God was so soon punished, who sinned least; but the old Prophet, who waited for his dying shore in faith, was not; nor Jeroboam, who was worst of all, till many yeares after in his house; Martyr answereth that God punisheth those soonest, whom he loveth best, and de-recth

reth the punishments of the most wicked, that at length they may come more heavily upon them, and this is according to that saying, if judgement begin at Gods house, what shall their end be that obey not the Gospel? even as a king that is a father chasteneth his sonne betimes, but destroyeth rebels though long suffered. But because this satisfieth not us touching the old prophet, whom we may not for one act number amongst the wicked, it is further to be added, that it is at the will of the Lord, to punish one of his servants sinning lesse, and to let another sinning more upon his repentance to go free, or it may be held, that this old prophet committed not so great a sin as the other, because he went not from the expresse particular command of God, as he did, which to do hath alwayes brought judgement not to be reversed, as in our first parents, in Saul, and in Ionah, &c.

After this Ieroboam returned not from his evil way, but he turned and made Priests of the high places of the meanest of the people, who so would filled his hand, &c. ] Hitherto have been related so many wonderfull accidents, that a man would think, were sufficient to turn any heart from his sinne, but such was the obdurate obstinacy of Ieroboam, that nothing would move him to repentance. The cause (Martyr thinketh) to be, and that truly, his desire of holding the kingdom which he had obtained, and to keep the people alwayes from revolting. For to reign, ambitious men are bent to do any thing, yea to run into the horrible sinne of perjury, as Julius Caesar, who said, si pejerandum, regnandi causa pejerandum, and Harold here in England is said to have broken his oath to William Duke of Normandy for the same cause. And Basiliscus to get unto himself the Constantinopolitan Empire alone, Zeno being put down, disanulled the councill of Chalcedon, to win divers Princes and Bishops to his side, that were against it, and the popish Hierarchy likewise will not turn from their errors, although palpably manifested, through the desire of holding their Empire still. But turned and made priests ] ch. 12. 31. he is said to have made such Priests before, of the high places in Dan and Bethel, but now being more hardened, as they are, that are not made to relent by such powerfull meanes, he proceeded to make more such priests of all other high places throughout his kingdom. Who so would filled his hand ] That is spoken according to the manner of consecrating the Priests at the first by Gods institution, Levis. 8. 27. 28. as the hands of Aaron and his sonnes were filled with offerings. Expositours also mention another sense, as if by filling his hand were meant Ieroboams, by giving him money to be made priests, but I prefer the first.

And this turned to sinne to the house of Ieroboam, &c. ] That is, after the example of the father, the sonnes went on in abominable idolatry, and erecting and maintaining a priesthood promiscuously of any tribe, or of any base condition, thus bringing ruine upon themselves at last, as it shall be also to all such, as putting down the most faithfull ministers of Gods word, because they will not agree to their superstitions, do indifferently put any, that will into their places.

CHAP. XIII.

AT that time Abijah the sonne of Ieroboam fell sick and he said unto his wife, Arise change thy attire, that thou mayest not be known to be the wife of Ieroboam, &c. ] This wicked king, saith Pellican, not being moved to repent by all the signes, which he had seen, beginneth now to be punished in his best sonne Abia, who is smitten with sicknesse. And he knowing, that the idols, whom he served, had no power to help him, but onely the true God, he sendeth to his servant Abia the prophet, that by his meanes he might obtain favour, of whom he had experience before, when he fore-told him, that he should reign over Israel, that he was a true prophet. But being conscious to himself of his grosse idolatry he was ashamed, that his sending to him should be known, and therefore causeth his wife to disguise herself. Thus they are confounded in time of trouble, when they would, but durst not seek to the true God, of whose help they despair, because they have formerly forsaken

1 Pet. 4. 17.

V. 33.

P. Martyr.

V. 34.

V. 1.

Pellican.

2000.

P. Martyr.

forfaken him, who caſt away his fear, and give his worſhip to creatures; and this is the caſe of all the wicked, they feel at length the hurt that cometh by their ſins, and ſeek to God being miſery enforced too late.

Ieroboam, ſaith Martyr, had been ſmitten before in his arm by withering and repented not, now he is ſmitten in his ſon, moſt probably, the eldeſt, which did much affect him, but yet he looketh not to the cauſe, to amend, which if he had done, his ſonne doubtleſſe ſhould have been healed. Yet he beleeveth that his ſickneſſe was ſent of God, as appeareth by his ſending to his prophet, and that the idols, whom he ſerved and their prieſts were not able to help him, becauſe he ſent not to them. But whereas Martyr ſaith, he ſent not, that we can gather from the holy Scripture for help, but onely to know what the event ſhould be: I think rather with Musculus, that his ſending was to ſeek help alſo, this being implied alwayes in ſending to an oracle to enquire, forſomuch as it is an honour done to that oracle, and an implicit profeſſion of faith and truſt put therein. For his wives diſguiſing of her ſelf, he ſaith rightly, that it was, leſt the prophet knowing her, ſhould either reſuſe to give her anſwer, or ſpeak bitter words againſt Ieroboam, who knew himſelf to be hated by the prophet for his abominations; as ſome conceive, becauſe he thought he would be afraid, if he knew who ſhe was, to ſpeak the truth, leſt the king ſhould be hereby exasperated, if it were diſpleaſing to him, for the prophets of God never feared to ſpeak what God would have them ſay, whatſoever they ſuffered for ſo doing. Whereas he ſent his wife and not any other meſſenger, it was becauſe he would have his ſending to the man of God kept ſecret, leſt others by his example ſhould be moved leaving his idols, to ſeek to be true to God alſo, ſeeing he had no confidence in them or their prieſts; that they could tell any thing or afford him any help. This prophet dwelt now in Shiloh, ſometime a place famous for the Ark, but now deſolate, for he was a Shilohite, ch. 11. 29. although Martyr thinketh, that he retired himſelf thither, becauſe hee was irked at the abominations of the king. And to him Ieroboam directed his wife to go, with a poore preſent of bread and honey, that by means of this and by going alone ſhe might be the more concealed. The journey from Thirza to Shiloh was 24. miles, H. B. Parliarks travels. In carrying a preſent to him, ſhe did after the manner in thoſe times, wherein they were not wont to go to conſult with a prophet without giving him ſomething, as appeareth by the example of Saul and his ſervant going to Samuel about his fathers loſt aſſes, not that hereby the prophet might be enriched (for when great guiſts were offered by Naaman to Eliſhab he utterly reſuſed them) but that they might have ſomething coming in by their office to live upon. The Sept. tranſlat. hath more here then is in the Hebrew, for there Ieroboams wives name is ſet down [Ano] and (to theſe words cakes, and a cruſe of honey are added theſe, for his children and grapes. Ieroboam would not go himſelf, becauſe howſoever he had been diſguiſed yet he thought the prophet would know him by his voice, neither could he well have been gone ſo long, without being miſſed and ſought after by his courtiers. But it may be demanded, how Ieroboam could think to be reſolved touching the recovery or death of his ſonne, when as he would not have the party enquired of to be diſcovered to the prophet, who he was? It is moſt probable, that when any came to enquire, they did only propound the queſtion in generall, as thus, I have a ſonne at home very ſick, tell me, whether he ſhall recover; the party inquiring never declaring himſelf, or what he was. But herein the folly of Ieroboam declared it ſelf, that he thought Ahiab could ſee what ſhould become of the young man inquired of, but not who it was that ſent to enquire.

V. 4.

When Ieroboams wife came to the prophets houſe, it is ſaid, that he being before inſtructed by the Lord knew her, and calling her by her name, bade her come in, and challenged her for diſguiſing her ſelf: for by ſeeing her he could not know her or that ſhe was diſguiſed, becauſe his eyes were dim with age, and he could not ſee. From which circumſtance of his old age it is gathered by ſome, that this was done not long before Ieroboams death, about 10. years of his reign being now expired, and he dyed when he had reigned 22. becauſe Ahiab the prophet was not not aged when he first fore-told unto Ieroboam, that he should be king, for he could then see and walk abroad, ch. 11. 29. but who knoweth not, that he who now seeth, may in two or three years become blinde through age. Yet although it cannot hence be evinced, it is most probable, that this was done towards his end, because v. 14. it is said, [the Lord shall cut off the house of Ieroboam this day, even now.] Which words are understood by all, as intimating a suddain execution of this prediction. And therefore although this history be placed here before the defection of Rehoboam, and his castigation by Shishach king of Egypt, and his death, and his son Abijah's reign, and his famous victory obtained over Ieroboam, set forth 2 Chr. 13. yet it followed in time after all these, it but two yeares before Ieroboam's death, seeing Rehoboam reigned but to the 17. year, and Abiah to the 20. of his reign, for he reigned but three yeares. Yet it is set forth before them, that we might have the whole history of Ieroboam to his death, and then the history of Rehoboam and his race till after his death unto the raising up of another king in Judah, before which again the history of the kings of Israel by an intercourse is fetcht up so farre, and then that of the kings of Judah prosecuted. Again, for this circumstance of the present history, the prophet called her by her name, and told her of her disguising her self, that she might be the more assured of the truth of that, which he should further say unto her for Ieroboam's greater terror.

And what is it that he said? Go and tell Ieroboam, thus saith the Lord, &c. The answer sent by the prophet to Ieroboam is a grievous accusation, that being extraordinarily advanced by God to the kingdome of Israel, whom he still calleth his people, although now polluted by idolatry; for the covenant made with their fathers, which kingdome was also taken away from David's posterity for their sine, and therefore he might well understand, that he should have been by this favour of the Lord towards him stirred up with all his power to purge the land from idolatry, and to preserve the worship of God pure and uncorrupt, as David had formerly done: yet he most ungratefully contrariwise was the authour of more grosse idolatry, God and his pure worship being utterly neglected, yea opposed by him. Whereas in commending David he saith, that he kept his law with his whole heart, doing nothing but that which was right in his eyes, I understand it with Martyr; of the thing now spoken of, and not generally of the whole course of his life, that is, of his freedom from all error about the worship of God, and if it be generally understood, it may be said, that it was thus spoken, because his sine of adultery and murder upon his repentance were done away, as Nathan told him, 2 Sam. 12.

And whereas it is said, that he did worse then all that were before him, this is to be understood of Saul, Solomon, Rehoboam & Abijah, after the end of the reign of the last of which kings this was spoken: for Saul did not set up any Idolatry, Solomon, notwithstanding the idolatries in his time hindred not the worship of God in the place and after the manner by him appointed, Rehoboam having sinned by idolatry, repented when he was chastised by Shishach king of Egypt, and Abijah his son likewise turned to the Lord, when he was endangered by the armies of Ieroboam; neither did he ever presume to alter any thing in the worship of God, as Ieroboam had done. But Ieroboam would not be moved by any meanes to repent, and appointed new places and Priests and feasts of his own head, most presumptuously keeping his Subjects from the old ordained by God. Tostatus extendeth the comparison further, even to the Idolatrous kings of the heathen, all whom he exceeded, because they were ignorant, but he had knowledge.

Behold I will bring evill against the house of Ieroboam, and I will smite him of Ieroboam that pisseth against a wall, both the shut up and the left in Israel; and I will cleave away the remainder, &c. as dung useth to be cleansed away.] that is, saith Pellican, I will so utterly destroy the house of Ieroboam, that not so much as a dog thereof shall be left, nor any though never so carefully shut up and hidden in any part of the land; yea so sweeping a judgement will I bring, that if any remaine, although but the refuse of that stocke, and as vile as dung, they shall also be swept away. Martyr distinguishing those that are threatned here, will have by the first

V. 7.

V. 8.
P. Martyr.
See more of Davids commendation & gain, 1 King.
15. 5.

V. 9.

V. 10.

Martyr.

Pellican.

up, and left in Israel understood either treasures closely laid up and cattell in the field, or men in strong holds and in the countrey abroad, or lastly men in walled townes, who shall be taken by the enemy, and such as being left at the first, shall after wards be sought out and destroyed. And for the comparison used, as one removeth dung, he saith, some by the word dog translated dog understand grinding teeth, as if it were meant, that they should be ground as meat by the teeth some, a while wind carrying dung away; but the commonest and best is, that his posterity should be cast out as a man casteth out all dung and filth out of his house when he cleareth it. And it is to be noted, that the same word is here used for dog, which significth idols, to shew their basenesse and the basenesse of those that serve them. I hold with Martyr, that judgement against Israel for being polluted with Ieroboams idolatry, is here mixtly denounced under these words [the Lord shall set him up and left in Israel] being meant such as were fortified against their enemies, whom they should first destroy and take away, and then others, whom as left out of these defended places they first let passe; and for the last clause touching Ieroboams posterity, I subscribe to the common interpretation. The judgement against Israel being but touched here in a word, is further amplified ver. 15, 16.

V. 11.

V. 12, 13.

These of Ieroboam that dye in the City the dogges shall eat, &c. v. 14. This is shewed by whom the execution should be done, viz. by another king that should be set up in his stead, as ch. 15. 2. is shewed, that it was done by Bascha. Only it is said v. 12, 13. that Abia alone, that was now sick, of all the house of Ieroboam should have a buriall, because there was some goodnesse found in him, but that he should never see him alive more, for he saith, that at her entrance into the city he should dye. This goodnesse the Rabbins say, was, that he took away the impediments whereby his father sought to hinder the passage of the Israelites to Jerusalem to worship; and R. Solomon saith, that his father had set armed men in the way, but he removed them, his father not knowing it. But this is improbable, because v. 3. he is called a childe, and therefore he was unfit for any such exploit, and it is to be thought rather, that by the goodnesse in him was meant his towardnesse and forwardnesse in vertuous wayes, which made all Israel to love and hope well of him, and when he was taken away by death, to lament it. The words in Hebrew are, [there was found in him a good word towards the Lord] the vulgar Latine [there was found a good word from the Lord upon him] that is, saith Sallianus contrary to all others, not any goodnesse; although Iosephus and many after him stand for that, but only, it seemed good unto God to forgive him, which he did not to any other. But a good word is commonly put for a good thing in the Hebrew tongue, and so I doubt not but it is here meant; and so Lyn and Pellican understand it, who follow the Latine translation.

V. 14.

Junius.

Tostatus.

P. Martyr.

But the Lord shall set him up a king who shall roate out the house of Ieroboam this day, and what, even now v. 14. so are the last words in the Hebrew, word for word, the meaning being according to Junius, He shall cut off Ieroboams house the same day that he entreth upon the kingdome; nay what did I say, the Lord will set him up a king? he is even now in the kingdome who shall doe this. The speedy execution is here certainly set forth, and happily, as Tostatus hath it, Bascha began even then to worke and make way for the attaining of the kingdome, although he could not effect it in lesse then two or three yeares: the vulgar Latine hath it, [this day and at this time]. Martyr, who followeth the Hebrew, saith, that these words are added, lest by [this day] a longer time should be thought to be meant; and therefore he saith, what do I speak of a day, it shall even now be done. Some others, he saith, understand it as spoken interrogatively, what is it that shall happen even now in comparison of that, which shall come afterwards; to the declaring of which he in the next words proceedeth v. 15, 16. But I rest in the first, as most genuine, to say nothing of Caietans understanding by [now] the now living, for they now lived, upon whom this judgement should fall.

V. 15.

And the Lord shall smite Israel as a reed is shaken in the water, &c. Here are two punishments threatened against Israel. First, that that kingdome should alwayes be unstable as a reed shaken to and fro, being sometime under one King and and sometime under another of a divers tribe, so soone as one was set up and had reigned a while, another working his destruction, and so taking the kingdome to himselfe; not like the kingdome under David's posterity, which was settled in his race, and therefore stood, as a cedar in comparison of it. 2. That it should after certaine yeares bee quite destroyed, Israel being carried captive beyond the river, that is, Euphrates; into Babylon, and from Assyria which was under the King of Babylon, people being brought to inhabit that land in their stead; as is shewed, 2 Kings 17. that it fell out. Thus for their idolatry, whereof Ieroboam was author to them, they were made to change a most fruitfull countrey for a barren, which change saith Martyr, was like the change made between Glucens and Dionedes of golden armour for brazen.

P. Martyr.

V. 17.

Thent he wife of Ieroboam arose and went away and came to Thirza, &c. ch. 12. 25. Ieroboam is said to have dwelt in Shechem in Ephraim, but Thirza saith Martyr, was an head city in Manasse, and happily he had another house there, in which he dwelt sometimes, and here at this time his child lay sick, and at the return of his mother when she entred the house, he dyed. But how doth this agree with v. 12. When thou shalt enter into the city, he shall dye. Ans. The Kings house most probably stood at the entrance of the city, and so the entring into the house was the entring into the city. And whereas a question may be made, what if his mother had not returned thither, should he not have dyed? I answer, he that foretold this, knew that these should return forthwith, and therefore this is but the putting of case impossible. v. 19. The rest of the acts of Ieroboam how he fought and reigned, they are written in the book of the Chronicles. Many saith Martyr think this book to bee that which is contained in the Bible called by this name, but against this maketh, 1. That the Chronicles were written by *Esdra*s, who was not born, till many yeares after the writing of this. 2. Many things are said to bee set forth in that book of Chronicles, which are not to be found in this. It seemeth that the prophets wrot the geste of the Kings of their times more largely, calling their books so written, Dibri hajamim; and out of this *Esdra*s took that which he wrot, leaving out many things which he thought not so necessary; see before ch. 11. 41. The time that Ieroboam reigned was 22 yeares, and then he dyed, not long after that the Lord had so threatned him by his Prophet, and Nadab his sonne reigned in his stead; the prosecution of whose history is intermitted, untill ch. 15. 25. and the acts of Rehoboam the King of Iudah, and his successors are next set down.

P. Martyr.

V. 20.

V. 21.

Rehoboam the sonne of Solomon reigned in Iudah, 41 yeares old was he when he began to reigne, and he reigned 17 yeares, &c. The thing most remarkable in this King is, that he came of a mother an Ammonitess, which is not certainly without cause set down, but to intimate the evill that commeth of such prohibited marriages. For the children of Israel were forbidden to marry with the daughters of Ammon or Moab to the tenth generation; and it is most probable, that this woman was one of those that turned away Solomons heart to idolatry, seeing he is noted to have set up the abomination of the children of Ammon, ch. 11. 7. And now see what came of this marriage; an insolent and foolish sonne, who by his pride and folly lost the greatest part of his fathers kingdome, and was a grosse Idolater also; and Iudah together with him, as is shewed 2 Chron. 12. 1. although here v. 22. Iudah only be named, as doing evill in the sight of the Lord. But neither he nor Iudah fell to so soale sinning in the first of his reigne, but at the end of 3 yeares, 2 Chron. 11. 17. before which it is shewed there, but here omitted, that he fortified many cities, viz. Bethlehem, Etam, and Tekoah, Beitbur, Socante, &c. being 15 in number, and situated in Iudah, and Benjamin. These he fortified and furnished both with armour and victuals for the better defence of his kingdome against any new attempts of his enemies, thinking happily also as Pellican hath it, that he might afterwards use those armes to reduce again the ten tribes to his obedience. And to strengthen him the more, the Priests and Levites came from all parts unto him, because Ieroboam had cast them off, and made other Priests, as hath been already touched: 1 Kings 12. 31. For the Priests and Levites being dispersed amongst the tribes from whence they were to come up at certain times to doe their

Deut. 23. 3.

2 Chron. 11. 5, 6, 7.
V. 10, 11, 12.
Pellican.

V. 13, 14, 15.

V. 16.

V. 17.

V. 18. 19.

V. 22.

V. 23.

their service at the Temple, and commonly to instruct the people where they lived in the lawes of God, were now debarred from both these by Ieroboam, who would neither permit any to go to Ierusalem to worship, nor the instructing in the lawes, the knowledge whereof he desired should be abolished amongst the people. Wherefore the zealous Ministers of God chose rather by abandoning his kingdome to leave their houses and lands, then by staying still to be any way guilty of his wickednesse. And not only they, but other godly persons from those parts flocked to Rehoboam to dwell in his kingdome, where they might be free from the like danger, and enjoy the comfort of Gods ordinances, which they could not doe in their own places. Indeed no more is said, but that they went up to Ierusalem to sacrifice, but it must needs be understood, that they left their houses and possessions also, as the Levites did to goe and dwell in that kingdome, because if they had remained in the kingdome of Israel still, they could not have had liberty to go up to Ierusalem at festivall times to sacrifice, as it is said that they did. Now by means of some coming thus from all tribes into the kingdome of Iudah, it became much more populous and stronger, and although Rehoboam had lost the 10 tribes, yet whilst he cleaved unto the Lord, he began again to reigne over them in part, for he is said to have walked in the wayes of David and Solomon 3 yeares, which is to be understood of *Solomon*s former yeares; but this happy time lasted not above three yeares. Then saith Pellican, his hypocritic, by which he had made a shew of fearing God in worldly respects, viz. to draw more subjects to him was discovered. Now, more ceasing to come unto him, the wickednesse that lay hid in his heart brake out, and he fell to the open practice of idolatry as well as Ieroboam, 2 Chron. 12. 1. and 1 King. 14. 22, 23, 24. But before this his multiplying of wives is recorded, and his begetting of many children. He had 18 wives and 60 concubines, and begat of them 28 sonnes and 60 daughters. And in particular, how he sought especially to match with *David*s house; for the estimation wherein he was had amongst the people, to this end taking Mahalath the daughter of *David*s sonne Ierimoth, and Abihail the daughter Eliab, *David*s brother; and Maacho the daughter of Ab-salom, whose children are also named Abin, Ethai, Zizah, and Solemish, because the first of these reigned after him, although the sonne of the last 3 wives, and so most probably younger, then some other of his sonnes.

But as David had formerly preferred a yonger son Solomon, because wisest; so he made Abiah captain over all his brethren, thus making way for him to reign after him, because he was both wiser and mightier than any of the rest.

And he is said v. 23. to have desired many wives, which was contrary to the charge given Deut. 17. herein following his father Solomon, and probably by this means he was drawn also to follow him in idolatry, for which he is here commemorated.

To return now again to his fall into idolatry, into the fourth year of his reign, when his kingdome was strengthened, [he left the law of the Lord and all Israel with him] and more largely, 1 King. 14. 22.

And Iudah did evill before the Lord, and provoked him above all that their fathers had done through their finnes. 23. For they built also high places, and images, and groves, &c. v. 24. there were Whoremongers in the land.] P. Martyr hath it, male whores, lunius, meritarii. Hebr. שְׂכֵרִים scortum masculinum, according to Pagninus. Or Cinadu, that is, such as sinned after the manner of the Sodomites, and this was suffered to go unpunished, yea whatsoever abominations else were practised amongst the heathen, were practised there also. Rehoboam enjoying a prosperous estate, knew not how to use it, but now fell from God, who had thus blessed him, whereby the danger of prosperity and wealth appeareth: wherefore that of Pindarus is true, as Martyr observeth, nothing is so hard to be concealed as prosperity. God had chosen Ierusalem to set up his name there, but he as it were to despight God, set up idols there, and by this means Iudah was now also corrupted more then in *Solomon*s or in any of their fore-fathers times, because idolatry was more generally followed, then at any time before. Their sinning in Iudah is not aggravated by comparing it with Israels sinning under Ieroboam, but with the finnes

2 Chron. 12.

1 King. 14. 22.

P. Martyr.

sinnes of former ages, for Israel sinned yet more then they, both because Ieroboam began at the first with idolatry, and also interdicted the peoples coming to the temple at Ierusalem to worship, which Rehoboam did not, seeing there was free liberty still to sacrifice according to the law. The particular thing, wherein they exceeded their fore-fathers in sinning, was in that males were prostituted at their idolatrous feasts, and in other abominations they did like the heathen, whom the Lord had cast out before them. And indeed this is noted to be a judgement, unto which the heathen were given over for their idolatry, Rom. 1. and it is to be imputed to the like judgement, that the people of Iudah sinned likewise. R. Solomon indeed, because he would free his countrey men from so foul a sinne, expounds it by adulteries, but other Hebrews, as hath been already said, so Pellican. This wickednesse the Lord suffered not long to go unpunished: for in the fifth year of Rehoboams reign, Shishack the king of Egypt came up to Ierusalem. 2 Chron. 12. 2, 3, 4. He is said to have come becaufe they sinned, and that with 1200 chariots and 60000 horsemen, and innumerable others, and took the most defended cities of Iudah, &c. There also it is said, that Semeiah a prophet came to Rehoboams and the princes of Iudah, when they were gathered together in Ierusalem, fleeing from Shishack, saying, unto them, thus saith the Lord, ye have left me and I have therefore left you, &c.

Then they confessed their sins and by the same prophet had comfort, that they should not be destroyed utterly, but serve the king of Egypt, that they might know the difference between the service of God and of other kings. The king and princes humbled themselves at the hearing of the prophet, but from their wickednesse they turned not, but only in hypocrisy, because v. 13. Rehoboam is said again to have done evil, and not to have prepared his heart to seek the Lord. Yet this shew of repentance for fear, to which they were brought by Semeiah, prevailed for the preventing of utter destruction at this time, as Ahab's humiliation also did, 1 King. 21. 29. that all may learn to humble themselves before God in times of publike calamities and dangers. But Shishack was permitted to rife the Lords house and the kings house, and to carry away the treasures found there, and the golden shields that Solomon made. Iosephus saith, that the king for fear let open the gates of Ierusalem unto him, upon agreement to spare these things, but the Egyptian king kept not this covenant. And this seemeth to have been done after that little comfort, which the prophet gave them, because after that he is said to have gone into Ierusalem, and to have done this v. 9. They were not then wholly delivered, but so as that thenceforth they lived in misery, they were taught by experience how sweet and comfortable the service of God is in comparison of the service of other kings. For to be made servants and tributaries to kings is so grievous, as that the Israelites formerly serving such, groaned under the oppression thereof and were delivered, and when the Romans destroyed Ierusalem, some, saith Iosephus, killed themselves by running through one anothers sides with their swords, rather then they would come into the servitude of the Romans; yet so pusillanimous, saith Lyra, was Rehoboam, as that he was comforted in this, that he enjoyed his life and kingdome still, although in such a servile condition upon these words, 2 Chron. 12. 13. He comforted or confirmed himself in Ierusalem. And for the golden shields, which were carried away he made brazen, thus the golden time, which was before when they served God, was turned into brazen, when they forsook him and served idols, and this and greater be the miseries of such as apostatize from good to evil.

The conclusion of the history of Rehoboam is, that the rest of his acts and all that he did, were written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Iudah, as the history of Ieroboam was before concluded, v. 19. where see, what is to be thought of such books, as unto which reference is thus made. In that Rehoboam had brazen shields carried before him when he went into the house of the Lord, it is to be noted, that although he were an idolater, yet he served God still at the temple, where the Priests and Levites attended, as in Dauids time. And for his pusillanimity Herodotus noteth, that he yielded his countrey to the king of Egypt, whom he calleth by another name, without fighting, for which, to the shame of that kingdom, he set up stones there for monuments, containing both inscriptions of this conquest,

Pellican.

V. 25.

2 Chron. 12. 3, 4.

V. 5.

V. 6.

V. 7, 8.

Note.

1 King. 14. 26.

Lyra.

1 King. 14. 29.

conquest and womans privities annexed, to shew the woman-like timorousnesse which was in them. But this is that which is threatned to the wicked, that they shall have a fearfull and trembling heart. Whereas Rehoboam is said to have reigned still in Ierusalem, it is intimated, that the Egyptian king did no more but take away treasures and impose a tribute, but otherwise the state of that kingdome remained under Rehoboam, as before, that it might appear, what regard God had unto David according to his promise.

CHAP. XV.

Amongst other things touching the acts of Rehoboam it is particularly mentioned in the Chapter before going v. 30. And the warre between Ieroboam and Rehoboam all their dayes. And this chapter v. 6. it is said, There was war between Rehoboam and Ieroboam all the dayes of their lives. Although at the first dividing of the kingdom God restrained Rehoboam from war, whilst he served him, not suffering so great an evill to rage in that kingdome, yet when he and his kingdome were corrupted also with idolatry, he suffered warres to begin again, and to go on without ceasing, one seeking to recover his tribes lost, and the other to hold them. it being thus verified, which was spoken by the prophet Esa. 57. There is no peace to the wicked, saith my God. Having gone from God, he went from them, leaving them to teare and to destroy one anothers kingdom without end, which may alwayes bee expected in any kingdome or state, to bee the issue of wickednesse.

V. 1.

2 Chron. 13. 2.

Pellican.
Ioseph. antiq. lib.
8. c. 3.

Hieronym.
Lyra.
Tostatus.

2 Chron. 13.

Sallianus.

In the 18 yeare of Ieroboam began Abijam to reign over Iudab. He reigned three yeares in Ierusalem, and his mothers name was Maachab the daughter of Absalom, and he walked in all the sinnes of his father, &c. 2 Chron. 13. 2. His mothers name was Michaiab the daughter of Vriël of Gibeah. But 2 Chron. 12. 20. shee is named Maachab the daughter of Absalom. To reconcile this difference some say, that Maachab was Absaloms daughters daughter, for his only daughter was Thamar, neither is it unusuall in holy Scripture to call the grand-child the daughter. Vriël then of Gibeah a Benjamite, to whom Thamar, Absaloms daughter was married, was father to Maachab and Absalom her Grand-father, for which shee is here called the daughter of Vriël, there of Absalom. But Ierom and Lyra and Tostatus say, that by Absalom is not meant *David*s sonne; but some other, because he was of Gibeah, Absalom of Ierusalem, or Hebron, or Bethlechem; to approve which they say that it is not Absalom in the Hebrew, but Abeßalom; and to make that name and Vriël to agree, that either the same man was of two names, or else Abeßalom was the Grand-father, and Vriël the Father. But who so shall look into the Hebrew text, shall find no difference between this name and Absalom, and although no marriages ought to have been made out of the tribe, yet who can think that any scruple was made of this, by such as sinned so fouly against other more weighty commandments of God? Wherefore I conclude, that most probably, Maachab or Michaiab, was Absaloms Grand-child, and properly the daughter of Vriël, who was the sonne of Absaloms daughter; for which cause shee is the daughter: as Obed, who came of Ruth, a sonne borne to Naomi, her mother. Now his mothers name is set down in making way to relate of his wickednesse, because shee bappily being a grosse idolatresse was the chiefe cause thereof; of her idolatry, see 2 Chron 15. 16.

But because v. 10. Abijam saith, The Lord our God is ours, neither doe we forsake him, &c. A doubt ariseth, how that agreeth with this, telling of his sinnes, wherein he followed Rehoboam? Ans. Either he spake so in dissimulation, according to some, or rather when he went forth to this battell, he was godly; it being the first entrance upon his kingdome: but being past up by this great victory, after pride all other wickednesse followed in him; especially having a mother to put him on herein. For if he had spoken dissemblingly, he should not certainly have found such help from God. And because he continued in the way of piety so short a time, that is passed over, as not worth the naming; and his great wickednesse only is mentioned, yet Martyr thinketh that he was wicked at the first, but being in danger by Ieroboams great Army, repented; and sought unto God, as his Father being chastised by the King of Egypt, had done. But Pellican that hee was wicked even now, only the worship of God was by him externally maintained, and magnified; wherewith because God was well pleased, it being of his owne ordaining, hee now took part with him. And for this the time of his reigne was made short, for it was only 3 yeares. v. 3. His heart was not perfect like David, yet for *David*s sake the Lord gave him a light in Ierusalem, because David did that which was right, &c. Of the like commendation given to David, see before, 1 Kings 14. 8. onely here is excepted the matter touching Vriah; not as Martyr saith, because this was his only sin, but because so foul, that whatsoever he did amisse before or after it, was nothing in comparison of it.

a time

There was warre between Rehoboam and Ieroboam, all their dayes.] This may seem to be set down there out of place, but the writer of this history did it, that wee might take speciall notice, that warres were not only begun when Kings were left of God for their wickednesse, but continued without end in the fathers time, who never turned, and then v. 7. in the sonnes time, betwixt whom yet, and Ieroboam it is only said, that there was warre, viz. one great battell described more largely, 2 Chron. 13. 2, 3. wherein Abijam obtained a famous victory, neither was he any more molested, which seemeth to favour the exposition of Martyr before going, that Abijam was wicked at the first; and hereby Ieroboam was emboldened to raise such forces against him, but hee being in danger, turned and besought the Lord for aid and so prevailed, but his heart being not right, after this hee was not suffered to continue long, but dyed at the end of 3 yeares. Touching this battell, it is uncertain whether of them provoked the other, but almost all men conjecture, that Ieroboam took the opportunity of Rehoboams death, and first provoked unto it in the beginning of Abijams reign, when he was scarce settled in his kingdom, and but young and unexpert in martiall matters. Yet if we consider his reign only of 3 yeares, and his sonne Asa left behind him then fit for government, hee cannot be thought to have been so young; and because Abijams entering the battell is first spoken of, and the number of his men, and the place where the battell was fought, was in Ephraim, which was within the kingdom of Ieroboam, it is most probable, that Abijam was first in armes, thinking to recover that part of the kingdom again, which his father had lost; and to this doth best agree the tenour of his speech, which was to move them to forsake Ieroboam, as a rebell against the house of David, and a perverter of religion, and now to return to the obedience of that house, let up of God to rule and reign for ever. Wherefore Seamus Calvin saith, that Abijam rashly offering warre to Ieroboam, yet obtained the victory, when he called upon God. He began then, as his father by force to seek to recover the kingdom taken from his house, but by more wise perswasions added. But did not he know that God had given Ieroboam that part, and taken it from the house of David? Ans. Doubtlesse he did, but whether for Rehoboams time only, or for ever he knew not; or to how long time this punishment of Solomons idolatry should be extended. Certain it is, that he favoured his proceedings by giving him the victory miraculously, he having in his army but 400000, but Ieroboam 800000. For although men going out to warre, sometimes unjustly are suffered to prevaile, yet never are they extraordinarily assisted, as Abijam was; And the reason may easily be conceived, viz. the incorrigible wickednes of Ieroboam, and of the men of Israel here mentioned, whereas Abijam maintained the true worship and service of God, and both he and the men of Iudah called upon God, and put their trust in him only. To shew therefore how wel pleasing to God this is, & contrariwise how displeasing to forsake God & to serve images, he wrought thus miraculously for them, although he favoured them not in seeking contrary to his decree, to bring all Israel again to the house of David, so that after this great victory Abijam could not yet prevaile for that, but only took some cities of Israel, that kingdom remaining to Ieroboam still. The place from whence Abijam spake before the battell began, was mount Semeraim, so

V. 2.

V. 3.

P. Martyr.

V. 6.

V. 7.

*Iosephus. P. M.
Zonaras in an-
nal. Lyræ, &c.*

2 Chron. 13. 3.
V. 4.

Seamus Calvin.

Note.

In 8. 9. 7.
V. 5.

2 Sam. 7. 14.
V. 6, 7.

V. 8, 9.

V. 16.

Lyranus.
Tostatus.
V. 12.

V. 13, 14, 15,
16, 17.

V. 18, 19, 20.

Pellican.

Lyra.

V. 20.

so placing himselfe doubtlesse, that he might be heard by a great part of Ieroboams army, as sometime Iotham the sonne of Gedeon went up to a mount to speak likewise to the Shechemites. The occasion that he made beginneth first with Dauid and his sons right to the kingdom over all Israel, for ever; for he saith that God gave to them by a covenant of salt, that is, either confirming it by sacrifice, in which alwayes there was salt, or because salt keepeth flesh from corrupting; it is thus spoken to shew that this covenant should never be altered, thus this phrase is used also before, Numb. 18, 19. And for Ieroboam hee saith, that hee was but a servant that rebelled against his Lord, and gathering vain fellowes to him, he prevailed against Rehoboam, as a timorous and unexpert man only, that thus he might move their minds if he could possibly without warre to leave Ieroboam againe, intimating by this speech that the fault was only in his father, that Ieroboam thus prevailed; but now another man being made King, who had more courage, the case would be altered. And because it was commonly knowne against this, that God set up Ieroboam, and Rehoboam lost not those tribes under him for want of courage, for hee gathered a great army to bring back the kingdome to himselfe, only God restrained him from fighting; he added, that Ieroboam was to them the authour of idolatry, and of casting off Gods Priests, and making others in their stead, even of the basest condition; so that they had whilst they followed him, God for their enemy, and therefore if they trusted in their great multitudes, they should certainly be deceived, because there is no strength against God.

In the kingdome of Judah contrariwise he sheweth, that there were lawfull priests and sacrificing, and lights burning, and shew-bread, &c. Neither had they forsaken God, because although there was idolatry there also, yet none was compelled to it, but all men were left free to repair to the service done in the temple, according to the law of Moses. Whereas he speaketh of the golden candlestick, it is per immolationem numeri, one being put for more, according to some, yet others think, there was but one left, the rest being taken away haply by the king of Egypt. In concluding, he dissuades them therefore from fighting against God, threatening that if they did, they should not prosper, as indeed it fell out. For whilst he spake thus, although Ieroboam closely divided his army, causing one part to wheel about and to come upon their backs, and the other to set upon them before, thinking by his great multitudes thus to confound and overcome them, yet the priests sounding with trumpets, and the men of Judah crying to the Lord for help, gave them the overthrow, killing 500000. of them, such a slaughter as no history almost relates the like in any age, as Iosephus also noteth, and therefore the version of his history made by Rassinus is false, wherein it is 50000. Then Abijah and the men of Judah pursued Ieroboams men, and took from him three cities, with their daughters, that is, the villages belonging to them; viz. Bethel, Ieshana, and Hephraim, then Ieroboam died being smitten by the Lord, so Tostatus and some others understand it. Pellican speaking of the number slain, calleth it an incredible number, saying, that a certain number is put for an uncertain, the meaning being, that more then half the army perished, but I see no reason, why the precise number should be called in question, seeing the Lord at the sounding of the silver trumpets, according to his ordinance, gave such courage to Judah, and strook such fear into Israel, that one of them was able now to chase an hundred, for the heart being surprized with fear, the outward members, saith the Philosophers, languish and are without strength. Touching him that is said now to be smitten; Lyra will not have Ieroboam understood, but Abijah, who according to some, having taken Bethel where a golden calf was, became by this means an idolater, for which God smote him, that he died. The words are, Neither could Ieroboam prevail any more in the dayes of Abijah, and the Lord smote him that he died, where the word [him] may be referred to either, but to Ieroboam it seemeth, that it cannot be referred, because he lived still, when Abijah was dead, for Asa is said to have begun to reign in the 20. year of his reign, 1 King. 15. 9. and he fulfilled 22. before that he died. And because it is immediately here subjoynd touching Abijah, that he was confirmed and married 14 wives, and begat 22 sonnes, v. 21. it is as improbable, that it is spoken of him, and and yet because Abijahs death is presently spoken of, v. 22. and Ieroboams living & reigning after that 2. yeares, I hold with Lyra, that it is to be understood of Abijah turning wicked and idolatrous after this victory, as was touched before. That which followeth of him, v. 21. being meant of his posterity, & whereas it is said, he married, &c. it is best read by Iunius in the preterpluperfect tense, he had married, this being spoken by way of recapitulation. And to this exposition consenteth Diony. Hugo, & Iosephus, & Hebr. major Chron. alledging yet another reason, viz. because when he had taken Bethel, he destroyed not the golden calf. Abijah after this victory turning wicked is smitten, that he died in a short time; whose acts are said to be written in the book of the Chron. of the kings of Iudah, as Rehoboams before, 1 Kin. 14. 29. but 2 Chr. 13. 22. in the book of the Prophet Iddo; of both which enough 1 Kin. 14. 19.

To returne again to the history of the Kings. Abijah being dead, Asa his sonne began to reign, anno 20. of Ieroboam, and he reigned 41. yeares, and did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, his mothers name was Maacha, &c. The same history is also set forth, 2 Chron. 14. 1. 2. where it is supplied which is here wanting, the land had rest 10. yeares. And in describing his righteousness it is said, that he beat down the altars of strange Gods, and their high places, and brake their images, and cut down their groves, saying to the Jews, that they should require the Lord, he built also cities of defence, &c. v. 6. 7. And his armies are said to be 300000. of Iudah, and 280000. of Benjamin. v. 8. And when Zerach the Ethiopian came against him with 1000000. he called upon the Lord and so overcame them, &c. v. 9, 10, 11, 12. Here it is only said v. 12. he took the masculine harlots out of the land, and removed their dung-hill gods, of which see before ch. 14. 24. There also is shewed, what encouragement he had by Hazariah, a prophet, and how he then proceeded yet more to purge the land from idolatry, and to offer sacrifices abundantly, making a covenant together with his people to seek the Lord, and this was done anno 15. of his reign. Maachab said here to be his mother was his grandmother, as may be gathered by that which went before, as she being called the daughter of Abisalom was his grandchilde, wherefore Iunius rendreth it, his grandmothers name was Maacha. And she is mentioned, saith Pellican, for the greater commendation of Asa, who although he came of so wicked a strain, yet feared God, and would not by her be corrupted, as his father had been, which his goodness was rewarded with rest and quietnesse of 10. yeares, which was a blessing remarkable in those times, because not enjoyed either by his father or grandfather, for there were alwayes warre between them and Ieroboam. Whereas he is said to have beaten down the altars and high places of idols, but 2 Chron. 15. 17. and 1 King. 15. 14. the high places are said to have remained still in his time, I understand it with Lyra of those high places, upon which they sacrificed to the Lord, according to the manner of old, before that the Ark had a settled abode in the temple, and not of any high places made to idols, for all such he beat down, except that built by Solomon upon mount Olivet, which Iosiah afterwards destroyed, as Martyr noteth, of which see 2 King. 23. 15. And these, although the temple was now the onely place, to which all their sacrifices were to be brought, he tolerated to avoid a greater evil, viz. their sacrificing to idols upon such places, from which he saw, that they could not be kept, unlesse these had been permitted unto them. But whereas Lyra illustrates this by a simile, saying, as whores are now tolerated, that all places might not confusedly be filled with whoredomes, such a toleration is intolerable, for to sacrifice to God upon high places, although it were an error, yet it was no spirituall whoredom, but such, as that it was upon speciall occasion sometimes done by holy prophets, as by Elijah upon mount Carmel. Wherefore this is no justification of his holy father, the Pope, tolerating stews in Rome and taking rents therefor. And indeed Asa his tolerating of some high places was a blemish to him, and to such other godly kings after him, as did the like: for the utter overthrow of all high places in the dayes of Hezekiah is commended afterwards, ch. 31. 1. For those that sinned after the manner of the Sodomites, males with males committing filthinesse; whereas he is said v. 12. to have taken them out of the land, it is to be understood by putting them

Hh

1 King. 15. 8.

V. 9, 10.

2 Chron. 14. 1, 2, 3.

2 C<sup>h</sup>ron. 15. 1, 2, unto v. 16.Iunius.
Pellican.Lyra

2 King. 23. 15.

1 King. 15. 12.

2 Chron. 14. 6, 7.

putting them to death, as the phraſe is uſed touching Rechab and Baanab two traitours, who ſlew Iſhbobaſeth, 2 Sam. 4. 11. The cities of defence which he built in this time of peace are not thought to be new, but ſuch as were cities of defence before in Rehoboams time, but becauſe they were by warres ruinated, they were now rebuilt and ſtrengthened.

V. 8, 9.

His armies are here alſo mentioned, becauſe the Ethiopian King came to warre againſt him, that we may underſtand with what forces he went againſt him. Not that immediately after the expiration of ten yeares the king of Ethiopia with ſo mighty forces invaded his land: for his thankſgiving and offering ſacrifices for this, was anno 15. of his reign, 2 Chron. 13. 10. the third moneth, whereby is intimated, that the king of Ethiopia was not the firſt enemy, that made warre upon him, when he had enjoyed peace ſo long, but ſome time in the 14. of his reign he came againſt Judah. And before that, moſt probably, Baſhab king of Iſrael, both becauſe he is ſaid to have lived in peace from the beginning of his reign onely ten yeares together, therefore there muſt needs be ſome to diſturb it before Zerach the Ethiopian king, and becauſe 2 Chron. 15. 8. it is ſpoken of the cities, which Aſa took in Ephraim, which was part of the kingdome of Baſhab, and this could not be without war, and 1 King. 15. 16. it is ſaid, that warre was between Aſa and Baſhab all their dayes, therefore not anno 36. onely of his reign, 2 Chron. 16. 1. but ſundry times before, viz. between his tenth and fifteenth year, the cauſe happily being, for that Baſhab would ſeek to recover the cities, which Ieroboam loſt from the kingdome of Iſrael to Abijah, but inſtead of recovering he added more loſſe to the former. Whereas Baſhab came againſt Aſa anno 36. of his reign, 2 Chron. 16. when as Baſhab his time extended onely to anno 27. ſee the ſolution after.

V. 9, 10.

Touching the king of Ethiopia it is ſaid, When Zerach the Ethiopian came againſt them with 100000. men, and 300. chariots, and came to Mareſhab, Aſa went out againſt them with his armies, &c. Theſe Ethiopians came from beyond Egypt and Lybia in Africa, as appears 2 Chron. 16. 8. where the Lybians are ſaid to have come with them, and therefore they were not of the Ethiopians in Arabia in Aſia, as ſome think. Zerach reigned over Ethiopia and Lybia, where he reigneth at this day, who is called Preſbyter Iohn a mighty Emperour, and being a warlike prince, he took this long journey (with this huge hoſte) of 1200. miles, thinking to ſubdue the kingdome of Judah. The cauſe of their coming ſo far againſt this kingdome is not ſet down, but moſt probably the ſucceſſe which the King of Egypt had in coming againſt it in Rehoboams time, getting ſo much treaſure there with ſuch facility, induced him to this attempt, hoping to have the like ſucceſſe. But God turned it out of his mercy to ſuch as fear him, the clean contrary way, he loſt by this expedition both great treaſures, and many of his mens lives. For Aſa prayed, and the Ethiopians were terrified, as before Iſrael had been in Abijah his time, and fled before they joyned battle, and were purſued unto Gerar in the countrey of the Philiftims, which from Mareſhab is diſtant 22. miles, and Mareſhab being a city in the tribe of Judah from Ieruſalem 16. miles, and ſituated upon the borders of Judah and Dan, according to St. Ierom. Yea ſo many of them are ſaid to have ſaln before the Lord and his army, that is, the army of his people of Judah (although ſome underſtand the heavenly hoſte) that this loſſe could no more be repaired, and the men of Judah carried away much prey, and ſmote all the inhabitants of the cities about Gerar, which ſome ſay, were Ethiopians, but that is improbable, ſeeing Ethiopia was ſo many hundreth miles off: others therefore better ſay, that they were Philiftims, who took part with the Ethiopians againſt Judah.

H. B. P. 1. trav.

V. 12, 13, 14.

Patriarchs travels.
Job. 15. 44.

H. B.

2 Chron. 15. 1, 2, 3.

Touching the prophesying of Azariah for his encouragement after this v. 1. Then the ſpirit of God came upon Azariah, the ſon of Oded, who went out to meet Aſa and ſaid, &c. It is a tradition of the Hebrews, ſaith Ierom. that this Oded, otherwiſe called Adon, whoſe ſonne Azariah is ſaid to be, was the prophet ſent formerly to Ieroboam, to threaten him for his idolatry at Bethel. [He went out] that is, as Iofephus hath it, a little before the kings returning to Ieruſalem, when he with his army and ſpoiles was now come near, he went out of the city to meet him, him, and then spake by the spirit unto them, as followeth, the Lord hath been with you, whilst you were with him, and if ye will seek unto him, he will be nigh unto you, but if ye leave him, he will leave you. And many dayes Israel without the true God, without a priest teaching, and without law. And he shall turn in affliction, coming to him to the Lord, &c. and shall seek him, and he shall be found of them. And in those dayes no peace to him, that goeth out and in, for great vexations upon all the inhabitants of those lands. And nation strikes at nation, and city at city, because God vexeth them with every affliction. Thus it is in the Hebrew text word for word, and because, here is no verb in the beginning of this prophecie to shew the time, it is diversly understood by divers, as Lyra sheweth. For our Expositours, saith he, understand it generally of the time to come, when the people were to be caried away captive into Babylon, and therefore the vulgar Latin supplieth a verb thus. Israel shall be many days without the true God, and Priest, &c. for then many turned to idols, and all ceased to sacrifice to God, because they could not come to the proper place of sacrificing, neither had they a priest executing his office, nor the law, the books whereof were burnt. But then Israel turned to the Lord, and was delivered from this captivity by Cyrus king of the Persians, who gave them leave to return into their own country and to build the Temple again, yet even in that time there was no peace, because the enemies of Israel did many years seek to hinder them in their buildings, as is shewed in Nehemiah, and nation fought against nation, both then and much more in the dayes of Titus and Vespasian, when the vexations of Israel grew to the greatest height. But Hebrew Expositours understand all of the times past in the dayes of Rehoboam and Abijam, for then they fell from God to idolatry, and so regarded little the priest or the law. But in the dayes of Asa they fought the Lord, especially being in a strait by the coming of the Ethiopian king, and he help them, but in the dayes past, viz. of Rehoboam, and Abijam, after there was a beginning to decline to idolatry, there was no peace, because Ieroboam was alwayes making warre upon them, till that great overthrow given him by Abijam, and Sihon also the king of Egypt came against them. And thus this was verified, nation fought against nation, &c. ] And this is followed by Iunius, and Pellican generally understandeth it either of that, which happened unto them then, or in the time of the judges, when they fell from God to idolatry, neglecting his priests and law, they had no peace, but were greatly oppressed, so that they could not go or come safe any where, yet when being afflicted they cried unto the Lord he delivered them, but sinning again, their troubles were renewed, all which was spoken to shew, that God had now in like manner proceeded with Iudah, hearing and helping them in their strait, but if they should again forsake him, the times would be full of calamity as they were before. And to this also Martyr seemeth to assent, because he speaketh of these things as past and not to come. But Iosephus contrariwise, having shewed, how the prophet encouraged Asa and his people, addeth, that if they should fall from their religion, he said, that the time should come, wherein there should neither be a true prophet found amongst the people, nor a priest righteous, and that then their cities should be overthrown, and their nation dispersed into all countryes, &c. Tostatus also expounds it of the time to come. And Ierom saith, the Hebrews affirm this to have been fulfilled 52. years after the destruction of the temple, in which neither bird did flee, nor beast passe through Ierusalem, and Israel was without hope, and all nations in trouble. And Sallianus argueth against the former exposition, both because the latter part of the prophecie is in the future tense, and because they were not without priests sacrificing to the Lord in the dayes of Abijam, as appeareth 2 Chron. 13. 10, 11. and most probably in the dayes of his father Rehoboam, the service of God was maintained at the temple, as in Solomons dayes, although idolatries also then abounded in the land. Lastly, it had been no prophecie, if onely things past had been commemorated, and so no more then any other man could have said. Wherefore I think, that the most common and ancient exposition, referring it to future times, as prophetically, is to be preferred, according to Iosephus, although it be against our translation, which rendreth it in the preterperfect tense.

V. 2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

Lyra.

Iunius.
Pellican.P. Martyr.
Ioseph. Antiq. 2.
8. c. 6.Hieron. de dis. Hebr.

V. 8.

When Aſa heard theſe words, &c. he ſtrengthened himſelf and took away other abominable gods out of all the land of Judah, &c.] ch. 14. 3. 4. he is ſaid to have done this in the beginning of his reign in Judah, but now if there were any idols ſet up again ſince in that land, and the idols in Benjamin and the cities of Ephraim, which he had ſubdued, they were all deſtroyed, ſo did the prophetic aforegoing comfort and encourage him to put down whatſoever he knew to be an abomination to God, all fear of other princes about, that favoured ſuch idols, being caſt away.

V. 11.

And he repaired the altar of the Lord ] the vulgar Latin [he dedicated the altar] but the word ſignifieth to renew, or repair, neither is it probable, when ſo godly a king had reigned thus long a time (for it was now his 15. year) that the altar for burnt offerings (for that muſt be here underſtood) was ſtill to be dedicated, but it being decayed, might have need now of repair, eſpecially ſo great ſacrifices being ready to be offered thereupon in way of thankfulneſſe for ſo great a victory, and ſpoiles obtained, as is ſhewed v. 11. even ſo great, as that the like had not been offered ſince Solomons time. Toſtatus following the vulgar Latin [dedicated] will have no renovation meant here, but only a dedication-like feaſt, and ſacrificing, for which onely he is ſaid to have dedicated it: but it is plainly ſaid to have been renewed, and therefore that conjecture is vain.

V. 9, 10.

And he gathered together all Judah and Benjamin, &c. And they being gathered together the third moneth, the fifteenth year of Aſa his reign, offered ſacrifices, &c.

V. 13.

This time was moſt probably at the feaſt of Whitſontide or Pentecoſt, becauſe that was in the third moneth alwaies, ſeeing it was ſeven weeks after the paſſeover, which was celebrated the firſt moneth the fourteenth day, from which to the third day of the third moneth are ſeven weeks. And then they entered into a covenant to ſeek the Lord, that is, to ſerve him, and him onely, all idolatry being had in abomination, and whatſoever man or woman would not thus ſeek the Lord, but practice idolatry, ſhould be put to death, according to the law, Deut. 17. And all this was done in way of thankfulneſſe for the preceding victory. But the Vulg. hath it: Et intravit ex more ad corroborandum fœdus: whereas in the Hebrew it is onely, they went into a covenant: ſo that it is not neceſſary to grant, that it was a cuſtomary thing to ſwear this covenant, as ſome from that tranſlation gather, but rather it may be held to have beene a fact extraordinary, to which they were ſtirred up in zeale after ſo extraordinary a favour done unto them. And this they are ſaid to have done from their hearts with great expreſſions of joy by their lowd acclamations, congratulating mutually their unanimous conſents to ſo pious a vow. And this their piety went not without a bleſſing, for they had reſt from their enemies round about, and ſuch a vow was now held neceſſary, becauſe ſo great idolatries had been lately committed in Abijams time, and Rehoboams and Solomons alſo, and now in Iſrael idolatry infected all places. And yet it is to be noted againſt our neighbours, the covenanters of Scotland, that they went not to this covenant without their King, but being by him aſſembled, and lead herein as by their head, neither in the time of any other King, of Moſes or Joſhua, was any ſolemn covenant publicly entered into, but the king or the Judge for the time being was the firſt and the chiefe in this act.

V. 16.

1 King. 15. 30.

Furnius.

Lyra.

Moreover he put down Maacah his mother from being Queen, becauſe ſhe had made an idol with a grove, &c.] 1 King. 15. 13. How Maacha is ſaid to be his mother ſee before, 1 King. 15. 9. 10. The word commonly rendered Queen, or Augusta, is in Hebrew, Domina, Lady, or Miſtreſſe, it being meant as Iunius hath it, from having any imperiall power, as the Kings mother. But Lyra following the Vulgar Latine, upon 1 King. 15. ne eſſet princeps in ſacris Priapi et in Laco eius, quem conſecraverat: and here, ex anguſto depoſuit imperio, he put her down from her ſtreight Empire, ſaith, that Maacah made a grove and an idol called Priapus there, which was worſhipped, and over this worſhip ſhe was, but when King Aſa took it away, ſhe was put down from this her ſtreight Empire, ſo called becauſe it was over ſo little a place. And touching Priapus he ſaith, 1 Reg. 15. that he was a certain young man of Hellespont, who for the extraordinary greatneſſe of his privy members was revered as a god, and an image was ſet up unto him, and worſhipped shipped, and at such festivals, as were kept in the honour of him, adulteries and whoredoms were committed in the grove where this idol stood and a den adjoyning, where they might be more secret; and as another saith, a matron, that was chief amongst the women then assembled did put a crown upon this abominable idol, which office this wicked woman Maacah had hitherto most probably executed. Thus Lyra. But it is to be understood, that in Hebrew there is no difference between 1 Kings 15. and 2 Chron. 15. in the relation of this, in both places there being no more said, but that he put her down from being Lady or Mistresse, the other words being added by the interpreter for further explication. And accordingly Pellican saith, he deposed her from the mistresship, which she had usurped in the worshipping of idols, and the execrable superstition which she had erected together with the grove & filthy idol, which the Hebrews cognominate from trembling and amazement, because it was not worshipped, but by men stupid and mad: for they call it מורע horrendum. Ierome, saith Martyr, turneth it Priapum, who according to Diodorus, was called Osiris and was sometime a mighty King in Egypt, but by his brother Typhon conspiring against him by the aid of many Giants, slain and cut in pieces, every one taking unto him a part of his body, but all refusing to have his privy member cast that into the river Nilus. Isis his wife after this by the help of Hercules overcame Typhon and those giants, and taking from them her husbands parts she honourably buried them, and because his privy member could not be had, she made an image thereof and caused divine honour to be given thereunto. And this obscene idolatry spread afterwards into divers other countreys, and into Iudah, where he thinketh, that Maacah was a principle about it, but will not have her putting down from this principality here meant, but in the kingdome, where the Kings mother used to have great authority. Thus Martyr and some of ours say; but because I cannot finde, that the Kings mother had ever any such authority, I rather subscribe to antiquity, that her being put down in her magestery about this idol only is meant here. Some, saith Martyr also, will have Pan meant by this idol, because he struck terrour into his worshippers, according to the signification of the word here used, whence the phrase came, a panicall fear. The high places indeed were not removed out of Israel, but the heart of Asa was upright all his days. How this is to be understood see before, 1 King. 15. 9, 10. And so his heart being upright all his days, I understand it with Martyr, not that he never fell into sin, but that he maintained the worship of the true God onely, and opposed idolatry to the end, although he fell otherwise and was punished therefore, as is afterward shewed. Lyra saith, his heart was perfect, till he fell, as is shewed, chap. 16. which was the greatest part of his time, but how the greatest part can be understood by all his days, I see not.

And he brought into the house of the Lord the things which his father had dedicated, &c.] This is not to be understood, as if he did it not till the 15 yeare of his reign, after which it is here set down; for it cannot be thought, that being so godly a King, he would deferre so long the rendring unto God the things of God. But happily he now brought in of the spoyles that he had taken from the Ethiopians, and dedicated in way of thankfulness, after the repairing of the house, and the things dedicated by his father, he brought in before, but both are spoken of together without regard of the time for brevities sake: and in like manner it may be thought, that although the destruction of Maacha her idolatry be not mentioned till now, yet he did it sooner, even in the beginning of his reign, seeing no godly King would so long permit so great an abomination so near unto him.

Touching the things dedicated by his father Abijah, it seemeth that although he were a wicked King, yet there was sometime some goodnesse in him, wherein he dedicated to God, as was touched upon 1 Kings 15. 2.

For there was no warre untill the 35 year of the reign of Asa.] The vulgar latine not till the 30 year by a manifest error, as Lyra noteth, for ch. 16. 1. it followeth. And in the 36 year, &c. But considering that Baashab is said to bee the King that made warre upon him, and he began his reign the third year of Asa, and reigned only 24. that is, to the 27th. of Asa; how could he be said in his 36 yeare to have vit. l. 7. c. 21.*

*Aug. de ci-

Pellican.

P. Martyr.

2 Chro. 15. 17.
1 King. 15. 14.

Lyra.

V. 18.

V. 19.

Lyra.

Lyra.

come against him? Ans. Lyra, whom Katablus and Gembard follow, saith, that when Baasbāh is said to have begun to reign the third year of Aśa, it is meant the third year of his reign after the great victory obtained against the Ethiopians, from which time he began to be more potent then before by farre; and so the third is indeed the thirteenth year from the beginning of his reign. And to make this the more probable, he proveth it by the like in the history of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 2. who is said to have done thus and thus the second year of his reign, whereas indeed it was the 25. but the second of his Monarchyall nations being now subdued unto him.

Adricomius.
Melch. Canus.
Chron. Heb.
Junius.

Adricomius in his Chronology, Melchior Canus, Cajetan, Johannes Luvius, and Annius say, that this place is corrupted by the fault of the writer, 35 being put for 25. But the Hebrew Chronicle which Junius followeth, saith, that by the 35. year of Aśa his reign, is meant the year of that kingdome, over which he reigned, since the division of Judah from Israel; for Rehoboam reigned seventeen, Ahijah three, unto which, if 16 in Aśa his time be added, we come to 36. Thus also Pellican; against every of those, something may be objected. Against the first, the victory over the Ethiopians was after the 13 year of his reign, and if it be granted, that the 3 be put for the 13, all the accounts of the times hereafter, will be uncertaīn. Against the second, admit an error in the writing especially all copies consenting, the authority of the holy scripture is hereby weakned, and it is contrary to that saying, Not one jot or tittle of the law shall faile. Against the third it is expressly said in the thirty six year of the reign of Aśa: and afterwards in the 39 he fell sick, and ch. 16. 13. he died Anno 41 after he began to reign. Amongst these yet, I preferre the first, only whereas Lyra understandeth by the third year, the thirteenth, I would rather understand the seventeenth, which was truly the third after the Ethiopian victory, when he returned to Jerusalem and reigned in greater glory, and then the 36 year will be but the 12. from the beginning of his reign so reckoned, but indeed the 36. and so the yeares of account remain certain; notwithstanding for the kings of Judah, but for the kings of Israel, an interregnum must be granted, before Baasbāh; of 14 yeares; Martyr seeing these difficulties saith, that the account must begin when Aśa his reign began to be troubled with warre, viz. after the tenth year, and when Baasbāh began to reign over all Israel, which he did but in part. Wherefore there was warre between Aśa and Baasbāh king of Israel all their dayes. This as Pellican hath it, is to be understood only, as long as Baasbāh lived, after that he began to warre against Aśa, Anno 36. of the kingdome of Judah, over which Aśa reigned; and this was the sixteenth of Aśa, the thirteenth of Baasbāh, and continued eleven yeares; but according to the former account five yeares. And whereas it is said, Wherefore there was warre, it is to be understood because Aśa was zealous in beating down idolatry, and prospered, & hereby many more were drawn to him out of Israel; 2 Chr. 15. 9. Baasbāh to stop their passage built Ramab, and fought against him. Now after this in generall, a particular relation followeth, v. 17, 18. &c. How Baasbāh began his warre; but more fully, 2 Chron. 16. 1. In the 36 year of the reign of Aśa, Baasbāh the king of Israel came up against Judah and built Ramab, that none might goe in or out to Aśa. This Ramab belonged to Benjamin, and as Iosephus saith, was taken by Baasbāh first, and then he fortified it, that from thence he might annoy the rest of Aśa his kingdom; and lastly saith hee, Baasbāh did set upon Ramab, no ignoble city, and took it, being 40 furlongs from Jerusalem: and it being taken, he fortified, that he might make it the seat of the warre, from whence his souldiers might waite with their excursions the kingdome of Aśa. And by this means he kept the inhabitants thereof, that they could not go out to Aśa, and the rest of Aśa his subjects, that they could have no passage; that, or else none of all the kingdome of Judah could goe in or out in safety, such advantage had he against them by reason of this fortification. Aśa being thus streightened, did not put his trust in God, as formerly hee had done, nor in this confidence goe out with his army against him, as he should have done; and so he should have been sure to prosper: as in warring against the Acthiopians. But being afraid, he basely beggeth help of Benbadad the king of Syria, an idolater, and our enemy to the true religion;

2 Kg. 15. 16.
Pellican.

V. 17, 18.
2 Chron. 16. 1.

Ioseph. Antiq. l.
8. c. 6.

V. 2.

gion; ſending unto him all the gold and ſilver in the Lords houſe, and in the kings, to make him break his league with Baſhab, and to come and help him by invading Baſhab his dominions. Shiſhac the king of Egypt had come once before and taken away theſe treaſures in Rehoboams time, but ſince that Ahijah had a great victory over Iſrael, and without doubt great ſpoyles, whereof hee dedicated much to the Lords houſe, and with part filled his own coffers. And afterwards Aſa obtained a notable victory over the Ethiopians, and then enriched both with the ſpoyles much more, but now all this is lent away to Benhadad. And herein Aſa ſinned divers wayes. 1. In that hee fell from his faith, and confidence in God. 2. Robbed his houſe of the pretious things thereof, when no neceſſity urged him unto it. 3. Sought help of an idolatour. 4. Was an occaſion of Benhadads truce-breaking with Baſhab, which was doubtleſſe confirmed by oath, which is ſacred and inviolable amongſt all nations. If the queſtion be whether a league with an idolatrous king be lawfull, I anſwer with Martyr, ſome league for peace-ſake, which we muſt ſeek as much as in us lyeth, with all men may be made, as between Jacob and Leban, the Venetians and the Turks, the Polonians and Tartars; but a league to help and to fight one for and together with another, is altogether unlawfull; for when Jehoſaphat did ſo, he was reprov'd; and it is written, be not unequally yoked with Infidels, ſeparate your ſelves and come from amongſt them. The king of Syria is eaſily moved by gifts contrary to his league with Baſhab to goe againſt Iſrael, and ſmiteth divers cities, whereby hee was forced to retire from Ramah. But Toſtatus thinketh that there was ſome colour of reaſon ſo to doe, ſeeing as Aſa ſaid by his Embaſſadours unto him, there was a league alſo between Aſa and Benhadad; wherefore ſeeing Baſhab ſo unjuſtly moleſted him, he might aid Aſa againſt him. But both being his confederates, he ought not certainly to goe from his oath to either of them.

Baſhab being thus cauſed to retire from Ramah, king Aſa ſoon aſſembled all Judah, and carryed away the materials from Ramah, both ſtone and timber, and built, that is, repayed and fortified there with, Gibeah and Mizpha, two other cities in the confines of his kingdome for the more ſtrengthening thereof againſt future incurſions. But Hanani the ſeer came then unto him and ſaid, Be cauſe thou haſt truſted to the king of Syria and not to the Lord, therefore are his forces eſcaped out of thy hand. That is, according to Lyra and others, whereas if thou hadſt truſted in God, and gone to warre againſt Baſhab thou ſhouldeſt have prevailed, yea although the king of Syria his forces had joyned with him, and ſo both their armies ſhould have been ſubdued by thee, to the greater ſafety of thy kingdome for a long time. But now they are out of that danger, and remain ſtrong to annoy thee hereafter, as is further intimated v. 9.

Then he put him in minde of his victory againſt the Ethiopians, when he truſted in God, and told him, that he had done fooliſhly, as he did indeed to empty his treaſures to hire one to help him; who did bear ſuch a mercenary minde, that he would be for him that ſhould give him the greateſt guiſts, and therefore if afterwards the king of Iſrael did wage him with greater guiſts, he would moſt probably do as much for him. If it be demanded, may not a king, then, who feareth God, if greater forces then his come againſt him, ſeek help of another king, but put his truſt in God onely for ayd? Admit, that the other king who cometh againſt him, ſuppoſing his cauſe to be juſt putteth his truſt in God alſo, will he be aſſiſtant to them both? This queſtion is moved by Toſtatus, becauſe by the prophets ſpeech it is intimated, that Aſa ſhould have truſted in God, as he had formerly done, and not have ſought the help of another, and answered thus obſcurely, God doth for the moſt part leave to common prudence thoſe things, which he hath decreed to do by the comming between of ſecondary cauſes, but ſometime peculiarly ſhew, that he will effect ſomething altogether by them, and then there is no place for humane prudence, but a certain truſt in him is required, which was the caſe of Aſa. His meaning, as I take it, is, that now it could not be ſo, as is put in the queſtion, for Aſa onely had a ſure ground of confidence; his former ſucceſſe and a promiſe from the man of God; but Baſhab not, when there is no ſuch

P. Martyr.

2 Cor. 6. 16.

V. 3. 4.
Toſtatus.

V. 6.

V. 7.
Of Hanani, ſee
Job. 19. 1.
1 Kings 16. 1.
Ljra.V. 8.
V. 6.

Toſophus.

such ground, and both parties trust in God, they may on both sides use such means as humane prudence doth dictate, but he, who to his trust in God hath indeed a just cause, shall by his assistance most probably prevail. In reprovng Asa, the prophet concludeth thus, The eyes of the Lord run through the whole earth, that he may be firm to them that trust in him, thou hast done foolishly, and for this, warres shall now rise against thee. Whereby he intimateth the fickleness of the king of Syria, in whom he now trusted, and that in way of revenge, warres should be made against him by Baashab continually, of which although nothing be spoken particularly, yet it is said, there was warre between Asa and Baashab all their dayes.

V. 10.
Junius.

Then Asa was wroth with the Seer and committed him to prison, and he oppressed certain of the people at that time ] Junius hath it, in carcerem cippi, he set him in the stocks, he took it so heinously, that he had so much disgraced him. Because he was angry with him for this matter, the vulgar Latin, for the Lord was very angry for this matter, and slew very many of the people. That is, saith Lyra, because the people did many of them haply agree with the king against the prophet, the Lord therefore slew them in the wars, which he caused to be raised against them. But in the Hebrew it is plainly said, Asa oppressed of the people. And it is meant as plainly that he, and not the Lord was wroth for the speech of the prophet, inasmuch that when some godly affected spake against this his tyranny, he committed them also. Wherefore I marvel, that Pellican should also apply it to the Lord almost as Lyra doth, but he was deceived by the vulgar Latin, and for want of looking into the Hebrew text.

Pellican.

V. 11.

But behold the matters of Asa first and last are written in the booke of Iudab, &c.] of which see before, ch. 9. 29. 1 Kings 15. 23.

V. 12.

But Asa was diseased in his feet the thirty ninth yeare of his reigne, &c.] Vengeance slept not long after his sin, Anno, 36. he hired Benhadad against Baashab, and it is most probable, that in carrying away the materials from Ramah to Gibeon, and Mizpa, and building those cities, he spent a year or two, and then the Prophet came to reprove him most probably in the 38 year, and he was punished suitably to his sin in his feet with most tormenting pangs, as he had set the Prophet by his feet in the stocks. And to shew that this sin went not alone, it is added, that he sought not the Lord, but trusted to the Physicians, that we by his example might be warned both to flye all sin, because if we commit one, as a link of a chain it drawes in more after it, and in time of sicknesse, first and chiefly to seek to God, and Physicians only, as a means under him of recovering our health. But Asa seemeth to be taxed for seeking to Physicians, because this disease was sent by God as a punishment, and therefore he ought in this case to have sought to him only, and not natural means; which now could doe him no good.

V. 13.

Then Asa slept with his fathers the forty one year after he began to reigne, &c.] His torments continued, and he was never healed of them to his death, because he took not the right way; but being dead, he was buried like a noble king, in a sumptuous sepulcher prepared by himselfe, and filled with sweet odours, which they burned to make a sweet perfume; whereby as Lyra saith, the stink of the dead body was taken away.

Lyra.

Pellican.

And this is reckoned by Pellican as another sinne of Asa, his vanity in being so profuse about his dead body, after the manner of the heathen, and not of the holy Patriarchs who were before him. And he noteth, that when any cost is spoken of about dead bodies, there is nothing in any place said of any cost bestowed for prayers to be said for the soule, whereby it is evident, that they believed not a purgatory, but that the soule went immediately to the place where it must abide for ever, either of weale or woe. This last of his is good, but in reckoning this, as another sin in Asa, I cannot subscribe unto him. For the laying of a dead body in a fit sepulcher is every where spoken of as an honour; and likewise the burning of sweet odours, that they in whom the fragrant smell of vertue was in their life time, might be kept from stinking, when they were dead, as having still a sweet savour amongst the living, by their good name left behind them. And for the custome to doe thus to the dead bodies of kings worthy, see in the history of Ierem. ch. 21. 19. of whom it

it is said, that because he was wicked, the people made no burning at his funerals, according to the manner of his ancestours. And for the Patriarks, although we read not of any burning of sweet odours about them when they were dead, yet Iacob was embalmed, and sweet ointments were prepared, and spices for the body of Christ being dead, which sheweth that it was a custome amongst the faithfull, till that time, to bestow this kind of cost upon their dead: and it seemeth by our Lord to be approved, when he rebuked Judas for finding fault with her, that bestowed a boxe of very pretious ointment upon him, and praised her, saying, she anointed him to the buriall, and that this should be spoken of to her praise wherefoever the Gospel should be preached.

Asa being dead and buried, Iehoshaphat his sonne began his reign. 25. But Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam reigned over Israel the 2. year of Asa king of Judah, and reigned two years.] The history of the kings of Israel being hitherto intermitted from ch. 14. 20. is now entred upon again and continued unto ch. 22. 41. during the reign of 6. kings, Nadab, Baashah, Elah, Zimri, Omri, and Ahab, and then the history of the kings of Judah followeth again according to their time. Touching Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, he was also wicked, as his father had been, and therefore was soon cut off by Gods just judgement, and then the rest of Ahabs house by Baashah, as had been before threatned; and he is said to have smitten him in Gibbethon of the Philistims, as he and all Israel were besieging it. This Gibbethon, saith Martyr, was scituated in the tribe of Dan, and possessed by Israel in the dayes of David and Solomon, but for the finnes of the people it came into the hands of the Philistims, and so is said to bee of the Philistims, but now Nadab sought to recover it to Israel again. Pellican saith, it was within the inheritance of Judah, but most probably possessed by the Philistims, as also some other cities in some other tribes. But Innius proveth it to be within the inheritance of the tribe of Dan, Iosh. 19. 44. and H. B. saith, that it was a city of the Levites not farre from Ekron of the Philistims, scituated in the tribe of Dan, 16. miles from Ierusalem, and 36. from Thirza, from whence Nadab went.

Baashah one of his captains ambitious of the kingdome, conspired against him near this city and slew him, and reigned in his stead; wherein although there was a divine providence for the punishment of Ieroboams wicked family, yet he sinned by murther and ambition, as Martyr noteth, and proved no better afterwards, but worse when he was king. Yet he was made an instrument to execute Gods judgement upon Ieroboams house, by cutting them all off. Whereas ch. 16. 2. the Lord said unto him by his prophet, I made thee captain over my people. His usurping of the kingdome is not hereby justified, God made him king because he suffered him to come to the kingdome, but approved not the way, whereby, seeing he gave him no calling to it, and streightly forbiddeth murther, especially of kings, to whom every soul should be subject. If it be demanded, but did not God know, whē he threatned Ieroboam, that Baasha should be the instrument to cut off his posterity, & if he meant that he should shed all this blood, & in so doing he did but his wil, how can sin be laid to his charge? Ans. God knew, that thus it should be done long before it came to passe, but his fore-knowing of a thing to be done, and decreeing it in judgement is no justification of the doer, if he doth it without particular warrant from him against his generall lawes, seeking himself and not the accomplishing of Gods decree. This Baashah is here called the sonne of Abiah of the tribe of Issachar, but by Iosephus, one of his domestick friends Basanes the sonne of Machelus, who slew him by treachery, and he was the first king-murderer, that hitherto we read of, thus opening the way to this foul sinne, and therefore it was in him most detestable, and he afterward had his reward accordingly, being first suffered to fall in to other grosse finnes, as we read ch. 16. Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam being thus murdered, it is most likely, that his dead body was exposed to the devouring of the dogs, as had been formerly threatned to Ieroboams posterity, and therefore we reade of no buriall thereof.

1 Kings 15. 24.

V. 25, 26, 27.

P. Martyr.

Pellican.

Junius.

H. B. Patriarks travels.

V. 28.

V. 29, 30.

CHAP. XVI.

V. 1. 2.

Hieron. in Ze-phan.

BY* the word of the Lord came to Iehu the sonne of Hanani against Baashah, saying, because I have exalted thee out of the dust, &c. ] Hanani the father of this Iehu was also a prophet sent before to Asa, 2 Chron. 16. 7. and this very saying, Iehu the sonne of Hanani, according to the tradition of the Iews, intimateth him to be a prophet, for they say, that when any prophet is named together with his father, his father was also a prophet. Of this Iehu, sent long after this to Iehosaphat, see more 2 Chron. 19. 2. although some think him to have been another man. The prophet putteth Baasha in minde of his former mean condition, out of which he was raised by God, or else he could never have attained to this regall dignity, as hath been formerly touched. It is not necessary because of this saying, to hold with Sallianus, that some message was formerly brought unto him, that he should reign, by the same Iehu, as had been to Ieroboam, to whom he was so like; first, in coming to the kingdome, being taken from another for idolatry; secondly, in idolatry; thirdly, in having a son to reign after him but two years only, being then slain; fourthly, in the cutting off of all his posterity and the manner of it. For if any message had come unto him before it would have been expressed, as that to Ieroboam, neither would his sin against his master in slaying him and his posterity have been so great. For he did not out of obedience to God, but out of ambition and barbarous cruelty, unwittingly working the will of God herein. To put which out of doubt this is reckoned, as one point of Baashah his wickednesse, that he slew Nadab, v. 7. in these words.

V. 7.

P. Martyr.

Lyra.

And by Iehu the prophet, the sonne of Hanani, the word of the Lord came against Baasha and against his house, for all the evill which he did in the eyes of the Lord, because he provoked him with the works of his hands, that he should be like the house of Ieroboam, and because that he slew him. ] For thus these words [ he slew him ] are expounded by Martyr, who saith that in the vulg. Lat. indeed, these words [ he slew him ] are expounded, that is, the prophet Iehu, but erroneously, because Iehu lived still to speake to Iehosaphat divers years after Baasha his death, as hath been already touched. And Lyra confesseth, that some expositour wrote these words in the vulgar Latin, [ that is, Iehu the prophet ] for explication, and afterwards by corruption they crept into the text, for R. Solomon saith, that it ought to be referred to Nadab, in slaying whom Baasha greatly sinned, seeing he was his master, and although he were wicked, yet Baasha was worse, and had no authority given him to strike him. If it be objected, it was the will of God, that he should be thus smitten, it hath been already sufficiently answered, the fulfilling of his will unwittingly herein, did no more iustifie Baasha, then the Iews fulfilling of what was by God before determined, their bloody crucifying of our Lord Iesus. So then here is a repetition made in this verse of things past, not idly, but to shew one cause more of Gods severity against Baasha and his house, that he might be punished in his kinde, the same measure being meted to him, that he had measured to others. And the Hebrews say, that God was the more offended with Baasha for killing Nadab so treacherously at that time, when he was besieging Gibbethon, because the taking thereof from the Philistims was hereby hindered. Touching the prophet Iehu, that it is not meant that he was slain by Baasha is the more probable also, because Iosephus makes no mention of his death, nor yet the sacred history, as it doth commonly, when any prophet is slain for doing the message, about which God sendeth him.

V. 3.

V. 6.

To proceed now again, in the prophesie of Iehu, he threatneth Baashah from the Lord, that his posterity should be cut off, as Ieroboams, and not have any buriall, but be eaten up by the dogs, and fowles of the ayre, because he followed him in idolatry, which sheweth, that he did not destroy Ieroboams posterity in any zeal to God, but out of his own malice. Whereas Baashah is said to have slept with his fathers, and to have been buried in Thirza, it is to be understood, that the threatning before-going of being devoured with dogs and fowles is to be restrained ned ned onely to his posterity, and not extended to his person only.

In the 26 year of Asa began Elah, the sonne of Baashah to reign over Israel in Thirza, &c.] How Baashah is said to warre against him, and 36 of Asa his reign; 2 Chr. 16. seeing he was dead, and his son set up for King 10 yeares before that time hath been resolved upon that place. Of Elah is nothing commemorated, but that he was slain by Zimri a Captain of halfe his chariots, when he was drunken in the second year of his reign, and he reigned in his steed; that all, men by his example might learn to beware of drunkenesse, which hath been the overthrow of kings and great men, Benhadad, Belshazzar, Holofernes, Alexander, and Cyrus, Ammon, and Nabal, &c. The idolatry of Elah, wherein he followed his father is not here mentioned, but v. 13. they are both put together, as making Israel to sin; for which, both he and the whole house of Baashah were destroyed by Zimri and their friends and kinsmen, which was doubtlesse done on his part to make the kingdome the more sure to himselfe; but on Gods part one wicked man was used as an instrument to punish another, and to fulfill his word. Neither did his taking away of all, that might endanger him, any thing conduce to his establishment upon the throne, which he had usurped; for he was again put down, and slain in seven dayes by the army lying still against Gibbethon of the Philistines. Whereby it appeareth that although Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam fought against it, yet in all Baashah his time, which was 24 yeares, it was not taken, nor in Elah his time: viz. two yeares more. It is to be conceived, that Baashah by reason of his warres with Asa, did nothing against it all his time; but the siege was again begun by Elah, and continued till he was slaine. For the manner of Zimri that usurpers death, the army before Gibbethon hearing of his treachery in killing the king, immediately made Omri Captain of the army, king; who forthwith marched with his army to Thirza, where Zimri had usurped, which was distant from Gibbethon 36 miles, and took the city; which Zimri seeing, entred the kings palace, and setting it on fire, burnt it and himselfe together, which is set forth as a judgement befalling him for his sinnes; wherein he was like unto Baashah: not so much after his coming to the kingdome, for that time was too short, being but seven dayes; but before, when he was a private man, Omri being made king, could not at the first enjoy this dignity quietly, for part of the people set up Tibni to bee king, but within a few yeares he dyed, and then Omri reigned twelve yeares; that is, saith Iunius, counting the time that he had a competitor, and the time that he reigned alone; for he began to reign immediately after the death of Elah was heard of, that is, Anno 28. of Asa, seeing Elah began his reign, Anno 26. and was slain in his second year; and in the 31 of Asa he began to reigne in quiet, Tibni being dead; and v. 29. his sonne Abah began to reigne the 38 of Asa. Which times being counted together, doe indeed make but 19 yeares. Wherefore Expositours say, that his time began the 27th of Asa, and *Elah*s two yeares, one yeare before his father Baashah dyed, he being made king together with him in his life time; and touching Abah, the like may be conceived, that he reigned also a year with his father, who attained to the 39 of Asa by this account, reigning still with his sonne one year, after his coronation; or else his 12 year being incompleat when he dyed, is counted both to him, and his sonne Abah also. Whereas Tibni is said to have dyed, and then Omri began to reign the 31 of Asa; it is to be understood, not by a naturall, but a violent death; as is intimated in these words. The people that followed Omri prevailed over them that followed Tibni, That is, in warre, wherein most probably he was slaine; and thus also saith Iosephus: and then Omri is said to begin to reign, that is, to enjoy the whole kingdome of Israel, which he had before but in part, it being yet uncertain, to whom the whole would fall,

Omri being established in the kingdom, bought the mountain Someron of one Semir for two talents of silver, and built it, and called the name of the city Samaria, after the name of the Lord thereof; and so this city was thenceforth made the state of the kingdome of Israel; and it is most probable, that occasion was given unto him to leave Thirza, and to build his palace here, because the kings house at Thirza was burnt by Zimri, that he might not enjoy it, nor the goods therein,

V. 8.

V. 9.

V. 15, 16.

V. 17, 18.

V. 19.

V. 21.

V. 24.

This place was Shechem, where Jacob dwelt sometime, for his Wel was there, Ioh. 4. here Iero-boam began to reign, although he removed to Thirza, & here Abimelech long before him, was made king.

V. 25.
Note.
P. Martyr.

therein. Two talents of silver are by some computed to be 3000 crownes.

Of this Omri it is said, that hee did worse before the Lord, then all that were before him, &c. that is, as Martyr expoundeth it, because being warned in their examples, yet hee without fear of Gods judgements followed them in the same abominations. And thus we that live in these times, wherein we see so many made examples of Gods judgement for their sins, if we sinne likewise, shall be judged as worse then any of them, and be punished accordingly. But Omri is thought to have done worse, not only by persifiting without all feare in the same wickednesse, but by adding some things more to their idolatries and superstitions.

V. 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33.

P. Martyr.

Then Omri died, and Ahab his son reigned in his stead, who is said to have done worse then all that were before him; which may be expounded as the like said before touching Omri, for he took Iezabel a Sidonian to wife, and set up her gods also, and sinned in the very taking of her contrary to Gods lawes, and in killing the Prophets of God, as is afterwards noted, which none of his predecessours durst do. Iezabel is said to be the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians, their very names, saith Martyr, being taken from Bell & Baal, shewing how greatly they were addicted to idolatry. And herein he was to be condemned more then Ieroboam, for that he as it seemed to him, was by necessity compelled to set up his golden calves, to keep the people from revolting from him by going to Ierusalem, and had some pretence of representing the true God hereby: but Ahab quietly enjoying his kingdom, and being by no necessity urged, was the first that brought in other strange gods of the heathen also, and built a temple; and planted a grove unto them in Samaria, intending happily to make Samaria, as Ierusalem, the place to which all the kingdom should resort to worship those strange gods with him. And lastly, hee proceedeth most unjustly against Naboth, and murdered him to get his vineyard. For the time, the 22 yeares, see more upon ch. 22. 40.

V. 34.
Ios. uab 6. 29.
P. Martyr.

In his dayes Hiel the Bethelite built Iericho, hee laid the foundation thereof in his first borne Abiram, and set up the gates thereof in his young sonne Segub, according to the word of the Lord which he had spoken by Iosua.] This is thought by Martyr and some others, to be inserted here to aggravate the more the sinnes of Ahab, in that he suffered this to be done; the doing whereof had been so solemnly interdicted under a curse. But forasmuch as Iericho belonged to Benjamin, and so was not within Ahabs kingdom, but Iehosaphats who now reigned over Iudah; it may be doubted, how it could be mentioned as a fault in Ahab to suffer it, and not rather in Iehosaphat? Martyr answereth, that Hiel being of Bethel, which was within Ahabs kingdom, Iericho was most probably at that time a part of his kingdom also, seeing it was in the possession of a subject of his. And touching Iehosaphat the king of Iudah, it is not likely, that he being so holy a man would have suffered the building hereof, if it had been under him. Yet some think, that this is not commemorated as a fault in Ahab, but only that this was done against the will of God in the time of his reigne; and that he who presumed to doe it, was punished in his posterity, by seeing their destruction from the eldest to the youngest, as Iosua had prophesied; so that Ahab, in whose time it was done, might see in this example the truth of the threatnings of Gods Prophets; and consequently of the Prophet Elijah, against him and his posterity as it followeth; ch. 21. 21. And they who make this exposition, wil not have Hiel called a Bethelite because of Bethel, but from Beth, an house or family, and Ahab cursing, as if it had been said, Hiel of the house of cursing. For the meaning of these words all Expositours agree, that it is meant, that when he laid the foundation of Iericho, his eldest sonne should dye; and as he proceeded in building, all the rest unto the youngest, who should dye immediately after a full end made thereof, in setting up the gates. And it is to be thought that his posterity was so to bee cut off as that hee should never have any child more to continue his memoriall, who in building this city sought to bring it to have a name againe after so solemn a binding of all men from attempting it, whereas the children are punished for the fathers sinne, and the father is suffered to escape; wee must not call in question the justice of God herein, who is Lord over all, and against whom all are sinners; as hath been shewed in the like cases before of Ieroboams, and

Ios. uab 6. 26.

and Baalshab his posterity. And it is not improbable, but that they had an hand in this sin also; in that they were well pleased in this work, and furthered it. If it be demanded why the Lord layd by Ioshuah such a penalty upon the builder of Iericho? Martyr answereth, that it was the first city which was destroyed, and that by the immediate hand of God in all the land of Canaan, and therefore it was to lye upon ruinous heapes for ever, to terrifie all wicked and idolatrous persons that should see it, as Sodom. Vnto which we may adde, it was intollerable presumption in a creature to goe about the setting up of that again, which God had so miraculously overthrowne for the glory of his justice and power, as being a seeking to bury in oblivion his dreadfull and mighty works. If it be demanded what moved Hiel to build it? It is answered, his pride and ambition to get him a name, by rearing up that city again, which had lyeen waste now 536 yeares; but by this presumption his name was put out by the cutting off of his children. Pellican draweth this to an allegory in the destruction of Hiel's house, the curse of God being set forth, that shall come upon all such as enrich themselves out of the house of God, and divine businesses; and then entangle themselves in secular affaires, their function being neglected. He restoreth the walls of Iericho also, who resumeth the sinnes which he renounced in baptism, that reneweth the pompe of the world by riotous living, or inserteth erroneous opinions, or heathenish fables, into Ecclesiasticall verity. See more of this before, Ioshuah 6. 26. St. Ierom touching this Iericho faith, that Osa of Bethel in the tribe of Ephraim built it, putting Osa for Hiel; as also some Greeks doe, and many call him Achiel. But he saith, that it was at the time of the destruction of Ierusalem destroyed by the Romans; and after that being built again, it remained to his time: the ruines of the former two buildings still remaining.

Pellican.

Hieron. de locis hebr.

CHAP. XVII.

BUt Elijah the Thishbite of the inhabitants of Gilead said to Ahab, as the Lord God of Israel liveth, there shall be neither dew nor raine, these yeares, &c.* Here is the first mention made of Elijah that great Prophet, in whose spirit, Iohn greater then any Prophet, is said to have come. And he is spoken of, as not now first beginning to be famous, but as one well known in those dayes, because it is not shewed of what parentage or tribe he was. Whereupon some Rabbins will have him to be Phinees, but without any colour of probability; for then hee must now have been 700 yeares old, and what reason is there, why he is called by a new name. It must suffice us to know that he was of Gilead, as is here said, which was the tribe of Manasseh; seeing Gilead, who gave the name to it, was the son of Machir, the sonne of Manasseh. Yet because part of Gilead belonged to Gad, some say that hee was of that tribe, and some following Iohan. Hierosol. and Epiphanius, that he was of the tribe of Levi, and a Priest; yea Epiph. hares. 5. 5. goes further saying, that he was brother to Iodens the Priest, and sonne to Achimaam; but Iohan. Hierosol. calls his father Salachab. And although he were of Thishbe, a city in Gilead, yet he might be of Levi, because the Levites and Priests were dispersed into all the tribes. Touching this prophesie, some say that it was then a great drought, and least this should be thought to come to passe by nature or chance, Elijah telleth how long it should last, and in what manner it should be, that so it might appeare to be sent of God for sin and idolatry, which did then so much abound; and foretold this to Ahab, as the author of those abominations. But because Iam. 5. Elijah is said to have prayed that it might not rain, this is a groundles conjecture. The truth is, that a judgement being shewed upon Hiel's family, and yet no reformatinn following, Elijah comes forth and threatens Ahab with a greater judgement, of which both he and all Israel should be more sensible. And the Rabbins bold to invent any thing, make a perfect history of it thus; Elijah seeing the judgment of God upon Hiel in his posterity, sought hereby to deterre Ahab from going on in his rebellious way. But Ahab contrariwise made a mock of this warning, asking him whether Moses or Ioshuah was the

V. I.

*Lyra.
P. Martyr.
Pellican.*

greater Prophet; and when he answered Moses, Ahab replied, how then happened it that the word of Ishuah against Hiel was fulfilled, but the word of Moses threatening, that for transgression the heaven should become as brass, and the earth as iron, was never fulfilled; no not now, when as he said, iniquity did so abound in him and his people; then Elijah answered as in this text, and obtained of the Lord, that it fell out accordingly; so Lyra, Martyr, and Pellican.

But the foresaid Johan. Hierosol. determineth not onely the parentage of Elijah, but as he was himself a man of a monasticall life, before he came to be bishop of Jerusalem, so (he saith) Elijah was the first of men, that lived alwayes in chastity, and the Virgin Mary amongst women. It is most probable, that when he came to Ahab, he came out of some desert place, where he retired himself from the society of the common sort, to converse with God, out of a detestation of the wickednesse of those times, for Iohn the Baptist, whose type he was, did so, and the sudden bringing in of his history here, intimateth him to have been formerly unknown to the world, but now his zeal for God would not suffer him to lye hid any longer, but he must come forth to declare that judgement which he had prayed might come, that it might appear, how greatly the Lord was incensed by the wickednesse of those times, to move Ahab and his to repentance. And it is to be noted, that he determineth not the number of yeares, that the drought should continue, but only saith, if there shall be dew or rain these yeares, but according to my word. That is, till I shall say that it shall rain again, which most probably he himself then knew not, when it should be, but was to depend upon the Lord for further direction. For accordingly the word of the Lord came to Elijah, when he should go and speak of rain to Ahab, ch. 18. 1. Yet St. James saith, that he prayed, that it might rain, and then it rained, but this was done as he was moved by the spirit. Iosephus relating this history saith, that he threatned, that there should be neither rain nor dew, till he appeared again, and then he went immediatly and hid himself southward, wherein he was certainly deceived, because the Scripture saith expressly, v. 3. that he went towards the east. For it is said, Turn thee towards the East, and hide thee at the brook Cherith, which is over against Iordan. There was a cave there, saith Jerome, beyond Iordan, Adrichomius on this side, in a most desolate place, to which there was no way leading, and in that Elias was to hide himself, and to drink of the brook in that time of drought. This river Cherith, saith H. B. runneth between Bethel and Jericho, from mount Ephraim towards the north, and so passing along towards the east, falleth into Iordan, being eight miles from Jerusalem. But one passage more is diversly expounded. [As the Lord God liveth, before whom I stand.] Some taking it to be meant of his ready standing to go about whatsoever message the Lord would send him, some, whose servant I am and by whom I was sent, but others, before whom I have prayed for this, as Martyr, grounding upon that of St. James, who saith, that he prayed that it might not rain. But the second seemeth to me most genuine, because it is an apt description of a servant, and thus the servants of Solomon were described by the Queen of the south [Blessed are thy servants, that stand alwayes before thee.] And thus much for the explication of this.

But a doubt may here further arise, because Elias is said to have prayed, that it might not rain, how he may be justified in calling for so great a judgement against the king and people, seeing it is the duty of prophets not to pray against but for them, 1 Tim. 2. Let supplications be made for all men, &c. 1 Sam. 12. God forbid, saith Samuel, that I should sinne against God and not pray for you.

Charity indeed requireth that we should pray for all men, but the prophets of God knowing by the spirit, which they have, what conduceth most for conversion and salvation, see that judgements are sometimes necessary for this purpose, and so pray for them, not out of malice, or for any end of their own, but to bring them to God, and then they pray again for the removal of these judgements, as also Elias did, and it was not altogether without effect in the people, who being thus prepared, and seeing a further miracle of fire coming down from heaven upon Elijah his sacrifice, acknowledged Iehovah to be the onely true God, whereas they had served Baal before. And Samuel proceeded also in like manner, first calling

*J. m. s. 18.
Iosephus.*

V. 3.

*Hieronym.
Adrichom.*

Ob.

Sol.

Chap. 18.

ling for thunder and rain in wheat-harvest, and then for fair weather, and Moses did the like towards Pharaoh in the land of Egypt.

But to return now again to Elijah his hiding of himself, where Ahab might not finde him, who the Lord knew, would bee enraged against him, when hee should begin to suffer by this drought. It may seem strange both that Ahab laid not hold upon Elijah, when he was before him, and also, that the Lord should bid him go and hide himself, when he was able to protect him unhidden. But to the first it may be said, that Ahab haply contemned his threatening, as coming from an idle and distempered brain of one, who was not to be regarded; and to the second, that the Lord in his example, would teach us to use means of preservation in time of danger, by fleeing and hiding our selves, and not to trust to his immediate providence, when there is any other lawfull way of escaping; so Martyr.

And thou shalt drinke of the brooke, and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there.] This is spoken, lest Elijah should doubt, when he came into so desert a place, that he should be destitute of necessary food. And it was a strange way of feeding him, but served to set forth the power of God the more, whereby he can make any of his creatures to serve for the good of his, although against their nature; and Martyr noteth particularly, that the ravens especially did owe the Lord this service for the benefit which they singularly above other fowles enjoy by his providence, when they are young; according to Pf. 14. 7. Who feedeth the young ravens, that call upon him. And Iob 39. 3. For being newly hatched, as some observe the dam forsakes them, till they be feathered, and in all that time they are by an extraordinary providence sustained; and they determin also the means, viz. by little wormes, bred about their nest. And as the Lord promised it was performed to his Prophet: the ravens brought him bread, and flesh morning and evening, and this the Rabbins are bold to say, they took out of Ahab's kitchen. But certainly no man knoweth where they had it, only it is certain that he who employed them about this carriage, could provide it any where at his pleasure, and he could also have sent it him by his Angels, but it was his will at this time rather to make this use of these fowles, so singularly obliged unto him, to teach men to be ready to doe him service for his goodness: extraordinary towards them, in feeding the hungry, as he commands, out of that which they have to feed themselves withall: according to that, He that hath meat let him give to him that hath none. But seeing the raven is an unclean bird, why would the Lord have meat brought to Elijah by ravens, or how could he eat it without being defiled? Martyr answereth, the same Lord, who would have the raven generally counted unclean, by appointing the ravens now to bring him meat dispensed with that law, and indeed in case of necessity Christ teacheth, that a ceremoniall law need not to be kept, but that a mans necessity for the preservation of his life is alwayes a dispensation to it, when hee justified his Disciples plucking of eares of corn upon the Sabbath being hungry, saying, man is not made for the Sabbath, but the Sabbath for man, Thus Martyr; but it is to be noted, that although the raven was unclean, and they that did eat of it, or touch the carcasie of it being dead, were hereby indeed made unclean for a time, yet no uncleanness was by it contracted whilst it lived, and therefore no dispensation was now needfull. Allegorically by the ravens, the ordinary glosse understandeth the Gentiles black by sinne and idolatry, but they bring meat, as it were, unto Christ, when they turn to the faith; according to that saying of his, when the Samaritans came out to heare him, and believed, I have meat to eat, that yee know not of; for that meat was their faith, and herewith Christ is fed morning and evening, when the Gentiles embrace the faith in the beginning of the Gospell, and continue in it unto the end. The Papiſts to countenance the superstition of Anchorites, parallel this of Elias, with the like done to Paul the first Eremit, who they say had bread brought unto him once a day by the ravens, herein making him to be of a more perfect life then Elias, because he eat but one meale a day, and bread onely, without flesh; hereupon commending this course of life as most perfect, when as by this example of Elijah it is plaine, that it well agreeth with the holiest man living ordinarily to eat flesh as well as fish, and two meales a day as well as one, so that gluttony

P. Martyr.

V. 4.

Luk. 3. 12.

P. Martyr.

Marth. 12.

Levit. 11.

The Allegory.

Job. 4.

and drunkenness be avoided, and abstinence from all meat be used at times of fasting. Only where abstinence from flesh upon some dayes is by the law of the land enjoyed for the good of the common wealth, obedience herein out of the case of necessity, is to be yielded by all men.

V. 7.

But after certain dayes the brook was dried up, &c. Then the word of the Lord came to him saying, arise go to Sareptah, &c. [Heb. it is, at the end of dayes, well rendered by Iun. at the end of a year, as also the same phrase is used, Gen. 4. 3. The drought was now grown very great even to the drying up of water springs. God indeed could have caused that the water should still have continued here for the use of his servant, but it seemed good unto him rather to work now another miracle, & in providing for him the residue of the famine, to provide for a poor faithfull widow also, who must otherwise have perished together with her son through hunger, and that not in the land of Israel, but of Sidon, in Sareptah a city of the Gentiles, which was done as we may gather from the application of Christ made hereof, Luke 4. to figure out the rejection of the Jewes, and the vocation of the Gentiles; yet the Rabbins, as Martyr hath it, will some of them have this city to be in Israel, because they would not have it thought that such a miracle was wrought out of their land; and some in France, but most erroneously, as may appear by that which hath been said; how Elijah spent his time when he lived alone by the brook, it is not said, but we may easily conjecture, that he spent it in prayer, and divine meditations. Ioh. Hieros. saith, that he was there taught of God a form of living solitarily, wherein he afterwards instructed others, making this the originall of a monasticall life. And he addeth, that other godly persons came thither to him by the guidance of Angels, who were by him confirmed against idolatry, and taught to live such a life, &c. When Elijah came to the gate of the city, he saw a widdow woman gathering up sticks, whom happily he knew to be a widdow by her habit, but whether the Lord had yet declared unto him, that this was she to whom he was sent, is by some doubted, holding that he asked first a little water of her, as Abrahams servant sometime had done of Rebecca, praying before, that her readinesse in giving it to him, might be a signe to assure him, that shee was the woman. But I rather think, that by a divine instinct he knew her so soon as he saw her; because he presently declared the word of the Lord unto her, and Prophets were of that sagacity generally, that they knew others extraordinarily, when they came near unto them, although another man could not; as Abijah the Prophet knew the wife of Ieroboam, when her feet did but sound at his door, before he heard her speak; although she were also disguised to deceive him, that could not see. He then asked her first, as the thing which he first stood in need of being dry and thirsty, and then calling to her again, would have a little cake brought him also. The journey of the Prophet from the brook Cherith to Sareptah, saith H. B. was 100 miles, and his former journey from Samaria to Cherith 24 miles. Hee might well then, when hee had taken so long a journey, bee both very thirsty and hungry, and so weary, as that he might gladly sit down and rest and refresh himself there, before he went to the widdows house; neither could he without an extraordinary spirit, wherewith he was endued, travaile so far without food. But what his ability was in this kind, we may gather from ch. 18. where he is said to have girded himselfe, and run before Ahab's chariot, when hee made all the haste that hee could from mount Carmel to Iezreel, which was 16 miles. But now he was doubtlesse weary and hungry, as our Lord when he had fasted 40 dayes, is said afterwards to have begun to bee hungry. Who this widdow was, is not otherwise expressed, but that shee was gathering up sticks to make a fire; whereby it appeareth, that shee was poore. So God chooseth the poore in this world: And by her speech it appeareth, that shee was one rich in her faith, and by her present believing the word of the Lord, which the Prophet spake unto her; For shee said, as the Lord thy God liveth, and called not gods to record after a heathenish manner; and although shee had only meale enough to make one cake, and then was likely to dye with famine; yet at this word she imparted thereof to Elijah for his necessity, believing to be supplied again miraculously, as he had said. It cannot hence be gathered, as Martyr noteth, that one ought to give to a Prophet in his need, before that hee giveth to his childe,

R. Sole n.
Lyra.

2 Kings 14.

H. B. P. t. trav.

Matth. 4.

Iam. 2. 5.

P. Martyr.

child, or himselfe, or parents. For charity beginneth at home, and a man must first and chiefly provide for his own family, and honour father and mother by supplying their wants, and if he hath any thing to spare, then give to others; and chiefly to Prophets in want. For when the Pharisees taught, that in giving to the Priest, a man did so highly please God, that he needed not thus to honour his parents; they are censured as overthrowing Gods command by their traditions. Neither did this widow give the prophet a cake first to diminish her necessary provision, which was for the sustentation of her and her sonnes life, but to have it increased, as it is said indeed that it was.

For whereas she had onely meal and oyl enough for once to feed her and her sonne, it was now so increased from thenceforth as she spent of it, that both he and she and her house, which was not spoken of before, lived upon it many dayes, neither was it thus diminished, till the earth returned to her former fertility. In the text it is said, till God sent rain upon the earth, not meaning, that then immediately it ceased, for after the rain it was divers moneths, before the earth could yield any fruit, but so soon as this was done, the miracle of encreasing the meal and oyl ceased, and that was two yeares and an half, as will appear by comparing herewith vers. 7. How this was done is not to be enquired, for he that promised it, could as easily do it by his almighty power, as cause the earth ordinarily to bring forth corn and oyl by his blessing. Yet the Rabbins are bold to set down the way, viz. by causing the aire about the oyl to turn into oyl, and that about the meal into meal, as in the caverns of the earth, from whence the water-springs come, the circumambient aire is by the coldnes & moisture of the place turned into water, whereby no want followeth the running out of the water, but the same current continueth still. It may be noted here, that the famine brought upon Israel by the wickednes of king Ahab, extended to some forreign countries also, but herein it is probable, that there was a speciall hand of providence directing it to the country of the Sidonians for the punishment of their idolatry, who were authours to Israel of sinning thus in their daughter Iezabel, the wife of Ahab, who sprung from their king, the land of Iudah under good king Iehosaphat, being in the mean season free from this judgement, and all other countries also, as may well be supposed, because no history maketh mention of any such famine in all the world, and Tostatus argueth against it both from naturall causes, which never are of a famine in all parts together, seeing the constitution of divers clymates are divers, and from supernatural, seeing God doth not at any time punish all countries in one kinde. But amongst the Sidonians and Tyrians that this famine was, Menander testifieth, saying, in the time of Ishobaal king of the Tyrians, there was such a defect of rain from the moneth Hyperberetens unto the Hyperberetens of the year following, that none fell in all that time, but when he had appointed supplications to be made, a great deal of thunder followed, wherein yet he goeth from the sacred history, which speaketh not of a year only, but of three yeares and six moneths. If it be asked, why the prophet was not sent at the first to this widow? Tostatus answereth rightly, that Ahab making enquiry after him, when he began first to be vexed with the famine, in all kingdomes about, as Obadiab afterwards told him, it had been hard for him to be hidden in a populous city, but now having searched in all places as much as he could after him, and hearing no where of him, he did most probably give it over, resolving that either he was dead, or else taken away so by the spirit, as that he could not be found.

After these things it happened, that the womans sonne fell sick, and his sickness was so sore, that no breath was left in him, &c. That is, whilest Elijah yet sojourned with her, the Lord did thus exercise and further confirm her faith. She seeing her sonne dead, expostulateth with the prophet, as calling her sinne to remembrance before God, for which she thought that her sonne was thus taken away from her. Therefore he carrieth the childe into his chamber and prayeth again, and again; and stretcheth himself upon him three times, and he was restored to life again, and she was more confirmed in her faith. The meaning of her expostulation was, as if she had said, what have I offended against thee that I am now thus

1 Tim. 5.

Math. 15.

V. 15, 16.

Tostatus.

Menander l. 8. c. 7.

Tostatus.

V. 17.

punished? and if not, this is come upon me for my former sins and present impurity, which appears to be the more foul, now that I have so holy a man with me. Thus P. Martyr and Pellican. But Lyra rejecteth it in the last part, which is the exposition of the Hebrews, because none fare the worse for their sinnes, for having such as are more holy with them, but rather the better for their sakes, wherefore he confirmeth the former, she seeing him to be a man zealous against sinne in Ahab, thought that he had also called for this judgement against her for her sinnes, of which being a godly woman she could not but be most sensible, and this I take to be the true meaning. She out of her grieved and troubled minde spake unto him, as if he were the cause. But to clear himself, he took her sonne to him and prayed, &c.

For Elijah his strange gesture in stretching himself upon the body of the childe three times, which the Chaldee rendreth he streightned himself, the Septuagint he breathed upon him, he did this as an instrument of God, and so did Elisab in imitation of him, thus helping by the spirit, that was extraordinarily in him, the body to wax warm, and so to be the more fit to be again enlived by the souls returning, as God at the first breathed into Adam the breath of life and he became a living soul, and he did thus and prayed thrice, to intimate his praying to the blessed Trinity, and not, because God could not have raised him without such means, but God directed him so to do, in a myserie, according to Lyra, Christs coverting or streightning of himself upon a humane body being set forth hereby, when he took flesh upon him in the womb of the Virgin Mary, and again when he lay in the manger, and lastly, when he hung upon the crosse, whereby man dead in sinnes and trespasses is quickened, coming once by faith to be united unto him. And such means were also used then, to shew the imperfection of the law in comparison of the Gospel, when with lesse ado Christ and his Apostles raised some from the dead. But as Martyr noteth, this is the first, amongst those that were raised up from the dead since the creation of the world, but after two were raised from the dead by Elisab, three by Christ, one by Peter, and one by Paul, to say nothing of those, that rose out of their graves at the time of Christs resurrection, and this is held rightly to be the greatest of all miracles, and therefore this widow, who had scene the great miracle of the meale and oyle before, said, Now I know that thou art a man of God, &c. That is, I am more confirmed in it, which I indeed beleevd before, as the Samaritans, to her that told them of Christ, Now we belevee, not because of thy saying, but we have heard him our selves, and know, &c. Touching him that was raised, some, whom Ierom followeth, hold, that it was Jonah, who is therefore called the son of Amittai, that is, of truth in alluding to the saying of his mother, I know that the word of God in thy mouth is true. Hebr. אֱמִיתִי Amith. But this may well be passed over as a Rabbicall invention. For Jonah was of Gath Hopher a citie in Zebulun, Iosh. 19. 14. 1 King. 14. 25. and not of Sareptah, and his fathers name was Amittai, neither he so called, because of the word used by his mother upon this miracle. And the time doth not well agree, seeing more then 59. years passed from this time to the beginning of the reign of Ieroboam the second, two in the time of Ahaziah the son of Ahab, twelve of Ioram, 28. of Iehu, and 17. of his son, after which Ieroboam reigneth and corrupteth all things, and yet by Jonah a prophesie is uttered, that then much, which had been lost from the kingdome of Israel, should be recovered out of a commiseration, which God had of their long continued affliction. But although the times may agree to this childe, yet for the reasons before going, he cannot be that Jonah.

CHAP. XVIII.

V. I.

AFTER many dayes the word of the Lord came to Elijah in the third year, &c. ] A doubt may here be made how the drought continued three yeares, and six months, according to St. James, when as an end was put unto it the third year?

year? P. Martyr giveth a double solution. 1. That the 6 months are not here counted, but the whole years only; but if it were 6 months after 3 years expired, I cannot see how it can be said in the third year, but rather in the fourth. 2. That he abode 6 months in the land of Israel, which are not here reckoned, but only 3 years of his abode with the widow of Sareptah, and therefore it is to be understood, as if it had been said, at the end of 3 years after his coming to Sareptah, which was last spoken of, the time of the drought before this not being determined in the sacred history, but only spoken of generally, till that Luke 4. 25. Christ speaketh hereof, and after that Iam. 5. 17. to this effect, Martyr. But Iunius better having set down the time of the drought, when he went from the brook Cherith, to be a year, rendereth the words here; many dayes after the third year: that is, 6 months. Neither doth the Hebrew so disagree, but that his translation may be justified, seeing it is, and there were many dayes; and the word of the Lord came to Elijah the third year, that is, many dayes of the drought before his coming to Sareptah, and after his coming thither in the third year, about the midst of the year, this word came unto him that he should goe to Abab, and tell him that now it should raise again, and this judgement should cease; which was not thus taken away for their penitency in Israel, but out of Gods mercy to verifie the saying of Elijah, that it should not rain, but according to his word. For Abab went on still in his wickedness, neither doe we read of any repentance in the people; onely there were scattered amongst them some who feared God, and abhorred from that idolatry, even 7000. as is afterwards said, that bowed not the knee to Baal; which doubtlesse prayed earnestly to God for deliverance from this famine, and partly for their preservation, God would now send rain upon the earth. Whereas v. 2. the famine is now said to have been great in Samaria, it is not to be understood so, as if it were not great all over that kingdome, but Samaria the Metropolitan city, wherein most wickednesse was committed, suffered most hereby.

[Then Abab called Obadiab the Steward of his house, who feared God greatly, &c.] A wicked king had a godly servant, so Pharoah had Ioseph, and Laban Iacob, Saul David, wherefore he may be godly, that liveth in the house of the wicked, Naaman served the king of Syria a worshipper of Rimmon, and there were good christians whom St. Paul saluteth, of Cesar's house. And here in the providence of God appeares for the preservation of his faithfull servants in time of danger, by placing such about heathen kings, as Daniel also, and Nehemiah, and Hester, and Ebedmelech, who delivered Ieremiah out of the dungeon, and here Obadiab is said to be one, that shewed his piety in hiding and feeding the Prophets of God in time of persecution, in caves with bread and water, to the number of 100. which must be understood to be such, as were instructed by other Prophets in companies as their Disciples, being therefore sometime called somes of the Prophets, who laboured as their teachers in beating down sinne and upholding the service of the true God, and singing and setting forth his praises, and opposing idolatry; for which Iezabel sought their destruction. Of such it appeares by the example of Obadiab, that the godly have a speciall care, but the wicked maligne them most; yet as much maligne as they were, see the providence of God in upholding so many amongst a people so desperately wicked, for their more just condemnation, when they would not be reformed by them. And from amongst these Prophets God sometime sent forth one, and sometime another, as he pleased; and it is not unlikely, but that in the land there were many more provided for by other godly persons. As these by Obadiab, so Martyr.

Now this Obadiab so well approved of God, Abab it seemeth counted also most faithfull to him, and therefore in this great drought, in which the beasts which hee had, could find no grasse to sustein them about Samaria, he took a journey himselfe one way to search about halfe the kingdome for it, and sent Obadiab to doe the like about the other halfe, that the horses and mules at the least might be kept alive. A brutish and wicked king, that suffered the Prophets of God; the chiefe of his creatures to be persecuted, and took such care for brut beasts; and so to many christians, an horse or a dogge is more then the best servants of God. Neither did hee search into

P. Martyr.

Junius.

V. 2.

V. 3.
Note.

V. 4.

V. 5.

into the cause of this judgment to repent and turn, but his solicitude was to search out if there were any hay in any place, that it might be brought to Samaria for the sustentation of those beasts, in which his greatest delight and confidence was. And herein Obadiah served him, as was his duty, forasmuch as he knew, that hee was by God set up to be King and Lord, and therefore to be served and obeyed in these things.

And as Obadiah was upon the way, Elijah met him, and he fell upon his face, &c. ]

The Lord directed Elijah not to Ahab at the first, who was unworthy for his wickednesse, but to Obadiah a godly man and a servant to the Lords Prophets, saith Pellican, who shewed by his speech, calling him my Lord Elijah, and by his gesture in bowing to him down to the ground, how much in his godly heart he honoured so great a prophet, being here an example to others of giving double honour to Elders ruling well, that labour in the word. When Elijah heard him aske whether he were not Elijah, he both said that he was, and immediately bad him goe tell his Lord, that Elijah was there. But Obadiah fearing, that this might be dangerous to him, if the spirit of God should in this mean season carry Elijah away to another place, spake so as that he might not be sent to tell Ahab thus, unless the prophet were constantly resolved upon it, and to insinuate the more into his favour to deal well with him, he told him, that he greatly feared God from his youth, and was such a friend to the Lords prophets, that he hid and fed 100. of them in time of danger. That which he feared from Ahab, if he should come to him with false news, was killing, either for deceiving him when he reposed so much trust in him, or for that he laid not hands upon him to bring him unto him, for whom he had so long so anxiously sought, and if doubting whether Elijah would then indeed shew himself to Ahab, he should refrain from going upon this errand when the prophet bade him, there might also be danger that way from the hand of God, for his disobedience. Now in setting forth his own goodnesse in this necessary case he sinned not, although out of such a case in vain-glory to do so that a man may be praised, is not without sinne.

There is, as the Lord liveth, no nation or kingdome, to which my Lord hath not sent to seek thee, &c. ] This, as all expositours agree, is not to be understood strictly, as the words sound, as if Ahab had sent all over the world to seek Elijah, although the Hebrews hold so, affirming Ahab, but falsly, to have been Emperour over all, for he reigned not over Iudah which was nearest unto him. It is then to be understood of all the neighbour kingdoms, with which Ahab was in league, and by vertue thereof might require any of his subjects being fled thither, to be redelivered unto him, taking an oath of them to answer truly, whether they knew him to be there or not, as they might in the like case of him. And therefore he saith only, there is no nation or kingdom, not nation or kingdom in all the world. And thus almost P. Martyr at the first cleareth this place, but he resteth finally upon another, viz. that the land under Ahab is spoken of as it was in times past, consisting of many kingdoms, there was no nation or kingdome within his dominion, but he had sent unto it. But I think the first is rather to be preferred, seeing however that country was in times past divided, yet now it was all one kingdome. But if Ahab searched so narrowly for Elijah, it may be doubted, how he could in Sareptah be hidden from him, seeing his father in law reigned there? It is commonly answered according to the saying of Obadiah here, that the spirit of the Lord some time took him and carried him away, so that he could not be found: but I think it may better be answered, that Ahab had done making that inquisition, before the prophets coming to Sareptah, after that giving over the searching for him any more, as vain, supposing him to be carried away some whether by the spirit, and so not to be found, as was partly touched before.

Elijah seeing the fear, in which Obadiah was, assured him by oath, that hee would shew himselfe to Ahab that day, and so he did immediately after that Obadiah had told him. Then Ahab said unto Elijah, art thou he that troubleth Israel? But Elijah replied saying, not I, but thou and thy fathers house, &c. ] Tostatus thinketh, that when Ahab saw Elijah coming, he went to meet him for honours sake, 1 Tim. 5. 17.

V. 8.

V. 9, &c.

V. 10.

P. Martyr.

V. 15.

V. 16.

V. 17.

Tostatus.

take, but his salutation by upbraiding him for troubling Israel by that great drought, sheweth the contrary; that hee was angry with him, and now thought to be revenged on him, as the author of so great an evil, seeing he had made him in his power; whereas if his going to meet him had bin for honour, his words would have bin suitable, requesting his prayers, that an end might be put to the present judgment. I think therefore rather with Martyr, that he went to meet him that he might the sooner terrifie him, and compell him to seek for rain immediatly, with the want of which he and his people were now so greatly endangered. Thus wicked infidels impute the calamities, which come for sin, to the servants of God, as the cause thereof; so also the heathen in the dayes of Tertullian, if Nilus did not overflow, which was a cause of dearth, or Tyber overflowed, whereby the city was endangered, if there were famine or pestilence, they cried out, have the christians to the lions, as the cause of these evils.

Elijah nothing daunted by the kings angry speech, layeth the fault altogether upon him and his idolatrous father, by whom indeed God was provoked to this judgement, for that they left his commandements and served Baalim, that is, saith Pellican, the planets of heaven, chiefly the sun. But Judg. 2. 13. I have already shewed, that all the male gods of the heathen were called Baalim, whereof Jupiter was the chief. Elijah in thus reprovng the king, did as John who was like unto him afterwards did to King Herod, neither did he more then was justifiable. For although the ruler of the people may not be railed upon, yet he may be reprov'd for his sins. For the word troubling here used, Martyr noteth, that it is put for troubling, either in the out ward estate, as Achan is said to have troubled Israel; and Jacob said to his sonnes, that they had troubled him, when they had slain the Shechemites; or in things spirituall, as Gal. 1. St. Paul telleth the Galathians that there were some that troubled them. And both these wayes, this wicked King troubled Israel outwardly by this drought and famine, and spirituallly by setting up idolatry; after which followed a taylor of other grosse wickednesses, causing the foresaid judgement. But he contrariwise imputed both these wayes of troubling Israel to the prophet, seeing he sought as much as he could to hinder the people from idolatry, which hee counted piety, from whence this great judgement seemed to him to come, as the weakening and dissipation of the Roman empire after Constantines time was imputed by the heathen to the beating downe of the old religion, which they counted their idolatry to be.

But now send and gather to me all Israel unto Mount Carmel, and the Prophets of Baal, &c. It is generally held by all Expositours, that some others passed from Elijah to Ahab before these, tending to dissuade him from idolatry; so promising raine, and to induce him the more, he spoke of the vanity of idols, and of the power of God, a demonstration whereof he would make before all Israel, if they were assembled together; and therefore he willed him now to gather to him all Israel, &c. The prophets of Baal whom he would also have assembled, were 450. and the prophets of the groves 400. which were fed at Iezabels table. The first number Martyr thinketh to have lived all over the kingdome, but the other, as Chapleins to the Queen, about her; and that those 450 only were gathered together, the other company which attended upon Iezabels devotions, not being by her suffered to come. And to this also Pellican agreeth, because those 450 only are mentioned after this; but nothing more said of the other, and therefore most probably they came not. But I see no reason why we should not hold, that the King had his Chapleins as well as the Queen, and therefore I assent rather to them, who will have those 450 to bee Ahabs Chapleins, whom hee nourished, as Iezabel did the other 400, yet most probably so, as that they were sent out at some times into all parts to teach the people their idolatry, and then returned again. The place, to which Elijah would have all these gathered was mount Carmel, that is, saith Martyr, near mount Tabor in Ephraim, or Zabulon; and not that place in Judah called Carmel, where Nabal sometime dwelt. In which last he saith truly, for Nabals Carmel was but 12 miles from Jerusalem towards the South-west, this 60 or more towards the North. But whereas he saith in Ephraim or Zabulon, it was in Issachar,

Note.

Pellican.

P. Martyr.
Ios. 7.
Gen. 4.

V. 19.

P. Martyr.

Pellican.

H. B. Patriarch's travels.

V. 20.

char, being the place where Elijah and Elisabab dwelt, standing almost midway between Jerusalem & Sareptah, seeing from Sareptah to Carmel there were 60. miles, and from thence to Jerusalem 64. and from Jerusalem to Sareptah 112. and from this place the Frier Carmelites took their name, who built them a monastery there, so H. Bunting. And by this we may conceive, why he would have them gathered to Carmel, because there was his abode, towards which he was coming, when he met Ahab. To Samaria he would not have them gathered together, where Ahab dwelt, saith Martyr, because so Iezabel might have hindered it. According to the prophets desire, all Israel was soon gathered thither together, that is, most probably all the elders, princes, captains and officers, and not every one of the common people: for that would have required a long time and been a great trouble. If any man shall marvel, how Ahab was drawn so soon to yield to Elijah to do this, it is to be conceived, that partly for fear of greater judgements, if he should refuse, and partly out of hope, that in thus doing rain would fall again, and a desire to see what Elijah could do, God also who hath kings hearts in his hands, and turneth them as he pleaseth, moving his heart hereunto. And it is not to be doubted, but the people pressed with misery, would be very ready upon this occasion to come.

V. 21.

When they were all come together, Baal's prophets also being present, Elijah said unto them, How long halt ye between two opinions, &c. ] Iosephus saith, how long are ye divided in minde and in opinions, the Chaldees in two parts, the Septuagint into two knees, hereby is both intimated, that they were diversly affected, sometime acknowledging the Lord to be God, because his power was so great, that he had now shut the heaven above three years, and sometime drawn by Baal either for fear of the king, or through the persuasions of his prophets, being also fascinated by his pompous service with so many attendants, accommodated with costly apparell, stately altars, rich sacrifice and bewitching ceremonies: and that it is a sinne intollerable in any to be thus wavering in matters pertaining to God, which be of so great moment, flying like birds off one bough on to another, as the word ὑποκρίνομαι here used properly signifieth. For no man can serve two masters, much lesse two Gods so contrary, seeing neither will be herewith pleased, and it is taxed in the Samaritans, that they feared God and served idols, and St. Paul saith, What agreement betwixt the temple of God and idols? which may well be applied to the papists for their worshipping of images, and calling upon the dead. Some gather from hence, that there was a tripartite division, some worshipping Baal onely, as Iezabel, and her prophets and followers, some the Lord onely, as Obadiah and other godly persons, and some both, as Ahab and many more, who being worshippers of Baal, yet trembled at his judgements. The people being thus challenged, answered him not a word, for they suspended, till they saw what he would do to decide this controversie, and make it evidently appear whether of the two was the true God, about which the greatest part began now to stagger, although they had hitherto served Baal, because that in all this time of the drought they could have no help from him.

2 King. 17.
2 Cor. 6. 16.

V. 22.

Then Elijah said again unto the people, I alone remain a prophet of the Lord, but the prophets of Baal are 450. Let them now give us two bullocks, &c. ] Because he had said, if the Lord be God follow him, &c. he now propoundeth a means of triall, the Baalites should prepare one bullock for sacrifice, and he another, and the god that answered by sending down fire to burn it, should be acknowledged to be the true God. Whereas he saith that he alone remained a prophet of the Lord, the meaning, saith Martyr, is, that came forth to contend with the Baalites, for many were destroyed by Iezabel, and many remained hidden in caves, but Elijah entred these lists alone, which tended to the magnifying of Gods power the more, when by one a greater work was wrought then by many hundreds. But why did he flee to miracles and not to the holy Scriptures for the deciding of this controversie? Ans. Some think, because all the assembly could not have heard his voice, but the true reason is, because he had to do with many that regarded not the Scriptures, as their doings did declare, whom nothing could therefore convince but miracles, miracles which are for unbelievers. And the coming down of fire first, and then of water, was not without this Allegory, that the spirit to believe is first given, and then followeth baptizing. By fire sent down upon sacrifices God had divers times before approved his divine power, in Solomons time and Dauids, in the time of Moses and Aaron, and to Mammoth the father of Sampson, and as is held by many, to Abel he shewed his acceptation of his sacrifice in like manner. Wherefore Elijah by a divine instinct was moved to propound the same at this time, and not to give us an example at all times to seek to try out the truth by miracles, lest we tempt God. If any shall wonder at the Baalites accepting of this offer, seeing they could not hope to have fire sent upon the sacrifice by a dumbe and dead idol; it is to be understood that the Devill can sometimes send down fire from heaven, as upon Iobes cattell; and as is said of Antiehrift working by him, Revel. 13. But against God Elijah knew that now he should not be permitted so to doe; whereas Elijah biddeth them to call upon their gods, it is not to be understood, as if he would have them commit this idolatry, but he speaketh that, because he knew they would do so as if he had said, call upon your gods, if yee will, for I know that out of the vain confidence which yee have in them, yee will doe so. And in like manner it is to be understood, which he saith after this ironically, when he saw them to continue calling upon Baal till noon, without any answer, Cry aloud, for he is a god, either he is asleep, &c. for hereby he plainly derided them, who believed him to be a God, that they might be ashamed; although they being infatuated by Gods just judgement, understood him as speaking in earnest; hereupon extending their voyces more. If any shall doubt whether Elijah did well in this jeasting, seeing it is forbidden, Ephes. 5. 4. It is answered, obscene and scurrilous jeasting onely is there forbidden, which tendeth to the corruption of others, and sheweth nothing but vanity or malice in the heart of the speaker, and is not to the use of edifying; but this mocking of Elijah tended to edification to such as were present, the worshippers of Baal, and Baal himselfe being hereby declared to be most vaine, that all such as followed him might be ashamed, and repent.

P. Martyr.

The Prophets of Baal hearing him say so, did not onely cry lowder, but also cut themselves till the blood ran out, which they did to move their idol to the more pity. But the hand of the devill was doubtlesse herein to stirre them up to this madnesse, out of that delight which he taketh in shedding of humane blood, who was a murderer from the beginning; and not onely them, but others of their stamp also in other countries. The Sybils of France did cut themselves likewise in their sacrificing, and gold themselves. And the Popish in Italy doe not much differ from them; when as the week before Easter they whip and fetch blood out of their own bodies, so laborious is superstition to the destroying of the soule and pleasing of the devill, whereas true piety doth not teach a man thus to please God, but by fasting and prayer, and temperance, and flying of sin in the whole course of our lives; hitherin Martyr in these words or to this effect, neither doth nor needs any man to speak more for the clearing of all things in them.

When noone-side was past, and there was no voice that answered, &c. Elijah said to all the people, come to me, &c. There were two times of sacrificing, the morning and the evening, to the prophets of Baal the first time was given, and the choise of the bullock to be sacrificed, that they might have whatsoever advantage they could desire, and that they all together should joyn in calling upon their god against Elijah alone. Yet all this helped them not, and their time being now past, Elijah calleth the people to him that they might see, that hee used no deceit, and then he first repaired the altar of the Lord in that place, which Saul sometime built, but the Baalites had now destroyed, saith Pellican, as they did more in other places. Tostatus also understandeth this, of the altar set up by Saul, as he supposed in Carmel, when after his victory over the Amalekites he made his station there, 1 Sam. 15. 12. But neither is it said, that he made an altar there but in Ajalon, 1 Sam. 14. 36. after his victory over the Philistines, but from Carmel he passed on immediately to Gilgal to sacrifice there, neither doth the site of that Carmel agree to this, seeing it was in Judah, this in the tribe of Issachar, as was before shewed.

V. 28.

V. 29.

Tostatus that he took no fire with him.
Pellican.
Tostatus.

P. Martyr.

shewed. Wherefore Martyr thinketh, that it was some altar upon which the Patriarchs had anciently used to sacrifice. And some, he saith hold, that the godly thereabouts used to come thither to sacrifice, when they were kept from going to Ierusalem after the division of the kingdome, as they did also in other holy places of note, which the Baalites seeing did beat them all down. But this he rejecteth, because there was then onely one altar appointed for sacrifice at the temple of Solomon, yet he sheweth none other reason, why the Baalites did break down this and other altars of the Lord in the land, according to the complaint of Elijah here following, they have slain thy prophets, and broken down thine altars, &c.

And forasmuch as Elijah complained of this, and now erected one of them again to offer sacrifice thereon, it is plainly intimated, that in the time of that necessity the servants of God were dispensed withall, when they sacrificed in some other holy places besides at Ierusalem, and therefore I subscribe to the fore-cited opinion, as most probable. But it is to be noted, saith Martyr rightly, that Elijah would not use the same altar which the Baalites had built, to shew, that the servants of God should not use the rites or idolatrous vestments and instruments of those that served false gods, which he complaineth, that some did when they used those of the papists.

V. 31.

And he took twelve stones according to the number of the tribes of the children of Jacob, to whom the word of the Lord came, saying, Israel shall be thy name. With these stones he made up the altar, to shew, that all these tribes should be joynt together as one in the service of the same onely true God, and none of them worship idols; but be ashamed hereof, to intimate which he commemorateth also the name of Jacob their father, changed into Israel, that is, a prince of God, of whom they being descended did also partake of principality, which should have made them scorn to subject themselves to dumb idols. The like also was done before by Moses and by Isaiah, whose example Elijah doubtlesse followed herein.

P. Martyr.
Pellican.Exod. 24. 4.
Josh. 4. 4, 5, &c.V. 32.
Lyra.

22. 7

V. 33, 34.

Then he made a ditch as it were, of two measures of corn, the vulgar Latin bath it, as it were by two ploughings about the altar. But R. Solomon, saith Lyra, following the Hebrew text, expoundeth it of two furrowes drawn about so much ground, within the which this altar stood, as two measures of corn might be sown upon, which he saith was done in resemblance of the court compassing the tabernacle, as this is most probable, because as the tabernacle had, so he would have these furrowes as a boundary about the altar, over which the people might see the sacrificing, but not come within them. Then he caused the sacrifice upon the altar to be filled with waters, till they ran over into the ditch and filled it, for he caused waters to be powred on the first, second, and third time, all which he did, to make the miracle of fire coming down and consuming the sacrifice the more famous, that none might object any deceit herein, but all might be convinced of the almighty power of the Lord, and so turn to him, and from dumb and impotent idols. In causing water to be brought to wash the sacrifice, Elijah followed the rite prescribed Levit. 1. but in causing it to be powred out so abundantly upon the sacrifice laid upon the wood, which made it more unapt to burn, he respected the miraculous fire, that was to come down, which could as easily kindle, and as speedily burn up wet wood as dry, and the water also, as this is shewed by and by to have done. But whereas he caused 4. measures or firkins of water to be powred on, and this to be done three times, Martyr will have this mystery to be therein: The 12. measures of water did set forth, as the 12. stones did, the 12. tribes of Israel, and the powring of them on at three times, the three holy Patriarchs, from whom they were descended, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and from whom they had learned the right way of worshipping the Lord. If any man shall marvel at this abundance of water in so great a drought, and of so long continuance, Iosephus thinketh, that some Well nigh to that place, which was almost dry, was made by the power of God to abound again with water at this time. Some of the Rabbins have devised another new and strange way, of water dropping from Elisha his fingers, who ministered unto Elijah in preparing this sacrifice, applying hereunto, his supplying of Iehosaphat's army with water miraculously, 2 King. 3. But

P. Martyr.
The Mystery.ed edr dgeet est on deor min dnu mndly
Joseph. Antiq.

But leaving this as a vain figment, and that of Iosephus, as an humane conjecture; we may more probably hold that there was nigh some known well of water, not yet dried up; and from thence they fetched all this water, neither was there need of a miracle to provide it extraordinarily: for otherwise they that were bidden to powre on water might, and would doubtlesse have asked, where they should have it. Some say, that mount Carmel stood by the sea, and therefore from thence they would easily fetch water enough, viz. by the shore of the Mediterranean sea, not farre from Ptolomais.

All things being thus prepared, Elijah prayeth, that the Lord would shew himselfe by miracle to be the onely true God, and that he was his servant, and so make the people to know him, and with their hearts to turn unto him. For now they served Baal, and counted him an impostour, and so would not be moved by him to turn from their idolatry. This prayer being made, fire came immediately downe from heaven and consumed all the sacrifice, wood, stones, and water, round about; insomuch that all the people fell on their faces, and gave glory to God, by crying out again and again, that he was the Lord. Then Elijah took his opportunity to move for the slaying of all those prophets of Baal, which was done without delay at the brook Kishon, down to which they were carried, that is, not so farre as that part of this brook by mount Thabor, where king Iabins army fell, but that which extends it self, according to Adricomius, to the foot of this hill, for so he describeth this brook, and saith it runneth, and to this, saith Martyr, they were brought to be slain, that their bodies might be cast in thither, and so carried away of the stream. And this execution was iust, neither could the people without it have approved themselves for true converts, seeing these prophets were most notorious for seducing to idolatry, and who so did thus was by the law of God to be put to death, and it was not safe to defer it, because of Iezabel the queen, who doubtlesse would have been a means to save them. If it be doubted, how the fact of Elijah may be justified in giving sentence and not expecting it from the king, who was present there, and by his office was the supream judge? I answer, that at this time Elijah had a power above the king, as Samuel also had, when in the presence of king Saul, he gave sentence against Agag and hewed him in pieces. The king was an idolater, and therefore it was not to be expected, that he should now condemn them, neither was his sentence to be waited for. It sufficed that there was one, who was extraordinarily stirred up by the spirit to give this sentence, for what he said, God said by him, who is King of kings, and accordingly moved the peoples hearts so, that it was done by their assistance, and thus a well-pleasing sacrifice was offered unto him, for the averting of his wrath in the drought, and the procuring of his favour, as when Phinees was moved in like manner to slay Cosbi and Zimri. Some think, that Ahab seeing the miracle was convinced, and gave his consent to this slaughter, how ever, God so wrought in his heart, that he did not countermand, but gave way unto it.

For the fact of Elijah in slaying these men, it is not set forth, that we should imitate it, who are either prophets or private persons, but leave the sword of justice to be drawn against malefactours, by the publike Magistrate, who by commission from God beareth the sword, for this and the like cases were extraordinary, neither is any man of a private motion, but being extraordinarily stirred up by him that is highest in power to do likewise, and herein he must not deceive himself, but be able to prove his authority, as did Samuel and Elijah, of Phinees see before upon Numb. 25.

Then Elijah said to Ahab, arise and eat and drink, for there is a sound of much water, &c. It seems, that both the king and people continued fasting all this day, for they remained first expecting, what the prophets of Baal could do, till noon, then they waited to see, what could be done by the prophet of the Lord, till the evening, and immediatly after the miracle of fire descended, with Baals prophets to the brook, that they might bee slaine there. Now therefore it was time for them to take some repast, and it is not improbable, but that the king had an house or tent upon mount Carmel, wherein he might eat and drink, and to

H.B. Patriarchs travels.

V. 36.

V. 38.

V. 39. 40.

Judg. 4. 5. 21.

P. Martyr.

Deut. 13.

1 Sam. 15.

Numb. 25.

Rom. 13.

V. 41.

P. Martyr.

E. 6. 1.
Note.

Note.

Tostatus.

V. 44.

Lyra.

V. 45.

V. 46.

P. Martyr.

V.

this the prophet bade him ascend from the brook to this end, that after some rest taken, he might be the fitter to travell home to Iezreel. But Elijah for his own part not caring for food, went up to the top of Carmel to pray, as his gesture declared: for he fell down upon the ground after the manner of one praying, and put his face between his knees, that is, saith Martyr, he fell down to the ground so, as that he neither lay nor kneeled with his body erected, but his head bowed down towards the earth, as he kneeled, between his knees, which gesture he used in greatest humility, as unworthy to look up to heaven, like the Publican commended by our Lord for his humility, Luk. 18. so the cherubims covered their faces with two of their wings, from which examples we should learn to use the most humble gestures in prayer. And it is to be noted, that Elijah was so intent to praying, that he would not look up himself, but sent his man to see, whether any cloud did appear out of the sea, for this place, as was said before, was near unto it, and when he brought him word that none appeared, he notwithstanding persevered still in prayer, when he returned the second and third time, and so to the seventh, before any cloud could be seen. And all this he did, although he knew certainly that God would send rain, because it was the will of God, that he should thus earnestly seek it of him, for the making of it more manifest; that rain fell not now by naturall causes, but by Gods power, that he might yet further appear hereby to be the onely true God: That we might learn by prayer to seek all good things whereof we stand in need, and deliverance from evils, although the decrees of God shall stand without our praying, and to persevere in praying till we prevail; although we looking often for it see no signe of audience. Tostatus comparing the Lords former answering him without delay, when he prayed for fire to be sent down from heaven, with this deferring, when he prayed for rain, saith, that was before the people, whose believing would have been much hindered and Baals prophets not so much confounded, if there had been any long delay: but now Elijah being alone, there was no such danger, but this deferring to answer him, might be of good use to keep him from being possessed, to which he might otherwise have been subject; if alwayes so soon as he prayed, he had received answer; when his man had gone 7. times at the last he brought word, that he saw a cloud like to a mans hand rising out of the sea; the vulgar Latin; quasi vestigium hominis, as the step of a man, but erroneously, for both the Hebrew and Greek have it, a mans hand. He went till the seventh time, saith Lyra, before he could see this, seven being a number of universality, to shew the universality of the peoples finnes of all sorts, and overspreading all, to shew, that their finnes was the cause, why the heavens were hitherto shut up. But now they having confessed the true God to be the Lord, there was an appearance of an hand; shewing Gods hand stretched out to help them. Then Elijah sent to Ahab to hasten home; lest the waters should hinder him.

And whilest he turned himself hither and thither, the heavens grew black with clouds, &c. Hebr. And it was until this, and until this. An ellipticall speech, to expresse the suddain gathering of the clouds together, whilest Ahab gave order for the making ready of his chariot, and the horses were joynted together to draw it.

And the hand of the Lord was upon Elijah, and he girt up his loynes and ran before Ahab to Iezreel. For the hand of the Lord, the Chaldee paraphrast hath, the spirit of strength; he strengthened him thus to run, when Ahab rode, for reverence to the king, saith Martyr, and that being all the way in his sight the deeper impression might be made in his minde of the miracle which he had wrought, to move him thence to the Lord; and he ran even to Iezreel, where Iezabel was, and the 400. priests of the groves surviving, to shew his undaunted courage, and further to inform the people of the doings of the true God; and of the vanity of idols, by shewing how rain was at his praying withheld, and now again granted, when Baals prophets could do nothing, that they might now be stirred up to leave dumb idols, and become the servants of the Lord. The hand of the Lord is also said to have been upon Elijah, to shew, that he was carried on as by the hand, by the spirit

spirit of the most mighty. Some in yielding a reason, why Abab and Elijah went to Iezreel, not to Samaria, say that it was both nearer to Carmel, and that Iezabel was now at Samaria, and so it was not safe for Elijah to come further. But the foundation of this opinion is too weak, viz. that ch. 19. it is said, it was told Iezabel what Abab had done, and how he had slain, &c. whereas in truth it is said, Abab he told her, not what Abab, but Elijah had done.

Sallians.

CHAP. XIX.

I Iezabel the Queen hearing by her husband, King Abab, that the prophets of Baal were all slain, sent immediately to threaten Elijah with death, at the hearing of which he feared, and fled. If it be demanded, why shee first threatned him, and set the next day for the time of execution and did it not presently, nor laid hold upon him, that he might not escape, Lyra answereth, that forsomuch as he boldly shewed himself to the king, shee thought that he would not now flye for fear from her, being a woman. But it pleased God to leave him a while to his own weakness, and then all courage failed him, whereby the most faithfull may see what he is of himselfe, to be humbled; notwithstanding the great valour and constancie, which he hath formerly shewed, for all our courage to stand for God is from him, and if we be left to our selves, we presently fall. And touching Elijah, Gregory doubteth not to say, that because he began to be tickled with high conceits, of himselfe for the great acts which he had done, he was suffered thus to feare, to humble him.

V. 1.

Lyra.

Note.

Gregory.

P. Martyr.

P. Martyr having said the same with Lyra, imputeth it to the speciall providence of God, notwithstanding, that Iezabel went so openly about to kill Elijah, that he might have time to escape away. And yet he taketh it as a fault in Elijah to feare and to flye thus, when he should have kept his station; especially having no word now from the Lord to flye away. And he admireth his present weakness, comparing it with his confronting of Abab before, and alone opposing 450 prophets of Baal, saying, that it was strange, that he who had shewed so great magnanimity hitherto, and both shut and opened heaven for fire and raine, should now upon the sudden for the threats of a silly woman, prove so pusillanimous. But yet thus Peter was terrified also by a young maid, and made to deny his master Christ. For Iezabel, who after she had heard all things miraculously done by Elijah related, and yet hardened her heart to this great wickednesse, he saith, that shee was of the number of those that were so hardened in sin, as that they will by no means be made to relent, but rather are hereby more exasperated to do wickedly unto the end, where some wicked one are moved for the present, as Abab seemeth to have been, but soon fall againe. For Elijah had his favour now so farre, that he might have been safely in Iezreel with him, but hee was too much carryed away by his wicked wife; hitherto Martyr. And Ierom saith, for so much as this just man feared and was troubled in mind, who can say that this was without vice, seeing David saith, the Lord is on my side, I will not therefore feare, what man can doe unto me. The Lord himselfe indeed feared, when in the dayes of the flesh, he offered strong cryes unto God. But his feare proceeded not from diffidence, for he said that none had power to take away his life, and that he gave his life for his sheep, and that he could pray and have 12 Legions of Angels, when hee was in greatest danger; &c. His feare then was not for himselfe, nor his carefull seeking, that this cup might passe from him, but for his followers, least their faith should by his sufferings be shaken; and for his very enemies, least they should be the more hardened. And when he fled from one place to another, that he might escape danger, he did it not for feare of his own life, but because as he said, his houre was not yet come. It was not so with Elijah, for like another man hee now feared through weakness of faith, and fled. So likewise the ordinary glosse. Being lifted up most high by the spirit, he was repelled by temptations, when he feared death by the Hieron. l. 2. cont.

Pelag.

P. 56.

Heb. 5. 7.

Iohn 10. 18.

Ord. 6. 10.

P. Come, or.

H. B. Patriarchs
travels.

P. Martyr.

V. 4.

hand of a woman, but desired it at the hand of God.

And he came to Beersheba in Judah, and left his servant there.] That is, saith Lyræ, the sonne of the widow of Sareptah, whom he sometime revived; so likewise the master of the scholasticall history, but this is only conjecturall; the cause why he left him, which he assigneth, is more probable; viz. because he was to goe into the wilderness, where there was no food; and therefore if he would adventure himselfe into such a place, he thought it not fit to require his servant to goe into apparant want also. Beersheba was 84 miles from Iezreel, the very border of the kingdome of Judah, farthest from the kingdome of Ahab; yet because hee thought not himselfe safe there, happily, saith Martyr, because Iehosaphat the king of Judah had contracted affinity with king Ahab, he went from thence into the wilderness a dayes journey, that is, the wilderness of Paran, which, saith my author, was 20 miles from Beersheba; and being weary, he sate down under a juniper tree, for the shadow of this tree keepeth away serpents, as Pliny saith; wherefore a man might safely rest here. Some saith Martyr, for a Juniper, have Genita. But no such thing is written of that tree, and the word here used is rendred Juniper, Pf. 120. 4. the burning coales of Juniper which are said to exceed in heat, that being raked up in embers, they will keep fire an whole yeare together. Elijah being come hither, desired of God that he might dye; for he saith, he was not better then his fathers. Hereupon the Rabbins lay hold to confirme their opinion that Elijah was Phineas, upon which it was touched before. But it cannot necessarily be inferred hence, as they would have it, that he overlived all his fathers, if by them we understand Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, or Aaron who lived 120 yeares, but onely that he was an old man and at the yeares that he had attained to, or sooner, many of his progenitours had dyed, some by a naturall death, and some being prophets by a violent, in the Iezabelan persecution. Wherefore he growing weary of this life through his manifold troubles, desired now to dye also. If it be said, this is strange, that he fled for feare of being put to death, and yet desired to dye. It is answered, he feared onely the manner by the hands of persecuters, least they that stood for Baal should seem at the last to have gotten the day, and so the Lord to have been overcome by Baal, if he being his only champion, should have been cut off by the servants of Baal. It was his zeale then for the Lord, and feare, least some dishonour might redound unto his name, which made him first flye death, and then to desire it; his weaknesse was, that he did not believe, that the Lord could preserve him from the fury of Iezabel, if he had remained there; if we shall not say rather that he fled, seeing an opportunity by Gods providence insatuating Iezabel to threaten him first, that hee might not tempt the Lord in putting himselfe upon apparant danger, needlesly. To conclude, it is to be thought, that howsoever the spirit of zeale wrought with him to make him flye, yet it was not without some mixture of the fleshes weaknesse, which made him, when he was now come thus farre impatient of life, as Iob also was. But in desiring that he might die, he shewed that he believed a better life to come, after the bodily death, or else he would never have desired it; and that to lay violent hands upon himselfe, had been the way to have lost it. Wherefore he would not thus rid himselfe of this life, but sought unto the Lord to take it away, in whose hands alone is the power to give life and to take it away; and for a man in discontent or upon any other occasion to destroy his own life, is a presumptuous sinne, for which I cannot see, how there can be any remission. But why did Elijah desire to have his life cut off, seeing long life to the faithfull is the greatest blessing in this world? Ans. He might desire this, that he might see no more dishonour done to God by Iezabel and other obstinate idolaters, as St. Paul desired to be dissolved, that he might the sooner come to the fruition of Christs presence. But hee expressed himselfe, if God would; and his abiding here might more conduce to their benefit, that he was willing to live, and so Elijah did, but spake, as one carried by passion for the tediousnesse of this life, from which neither Moses was free, when he desired to dye, nor any of the best of Gods servants.

Elijah being weary with travaile, fell asleep here, but because he had fasted all the day, and had nothing after his journey to eat, that he might not faint through want,

Phil. 1. 23.

Numb. 11. 15.

V. 5.

want, the Lord sent his Angell with bread unto him, saying, arise Elijah and eat; then he looked and saw cakes baked upon the embers, and a pot of water, and did eat and drink and slept again, as is to be supposed all night; and then the Angell coming again bad him eat, because he had a great journey to goe, which he did, and went in the strength of that meat 40 daies and 40 nights, till he came to Horeb, the mount of God. The same God that provided for him miraculously in the time of drought by the ministry of ravens, now again fed him by the ministry of an Angell, and he that made the meale and oyle, which was enough only for one meale to last many daies, and to suffice for the feeding of him, the widow of Sareptah, her sonne and familie all that time, now by a new kind of miracle gave a meale unto him, that strengthened him without eating more 40 daies together, and that to labour in tedious travaile. How this could be we ought not to question, seeing the Almighty caused it so to be, that we might know, that he hath more waies then one to sustein such as trust in him. In times past he fed Elijah by miraculously supplying him from day to day, now he susteineth him many daies together eating nothing, but once or twice at the beginning of this time, bread miraculously prepared by an Angell. For it was not the Angels preparing it, that put this vertue into it, as it may seem. And the authour of the book de mirabil. S. Sacre, affirmeth saying, that by reason of the Angels preparing it, such vertue was in it, that it kept the nature of the body from consuming the naturall heat, by reason whereof the taking of meat is requisite for the repairing of that which was consumed. But Gods will, which caused the Angell to prepare such bread, that made it last in his stomack, that he felt no hunger all this time, but remained, as if he had eaten but a little before; no feeblenesse or languishing coming upon him through that long want. And this was done to prefigure Christs fast of 40 daies and 40 nights, in the same wilderness. But whereas he is said to have gone in the strength of this meal 40 daies and 40 nights; it is not to be understood, as though he had in all that time taken no rest, but that he went in the day time being fit for travaile, and rested at night, and happily in the heat of the day also. Neither was he all this time in the day going directly to mount Horeb, or Sinai, for it was but 80 miles thither, and so a journey that might well have been gone in 4 or 5 daies; but he made in this voyage many turnings, and fetched many bouts through invious places, least happily some pursuing him from Jezabel, should find him. And to Horeb he directed his course, as being a most desert place, thinking, as Iosephus conjectureth, to dwell there; till the Lord should further reveale his will unto him: for he is said by and by to have been there in a cave. Some hold that he fasted not only 40 daies, till he came to this mount, but also till he returned again; because this also was a desert place, and wee read not of any other food after this brought unto him. But for so much as the Scripture saith only, he went in the strength of it 40 daies and 40 nights, till he came to mount Horeb, it is rather to be thought, that he was there otherwise supplied with food, although no mention be made thereof, one includeth the time of his being there with in these 40 daies saying, by vertue of this meat he went to Horeb, & there continued 40 daies, &c. But the text admitteth of no such glosse, but as Martyr hath it, he ate nothing after in the 40 days wherein he was going thither. And he thinketh that Elijah came to Horeb being a part of mount Sinai where the law was given, because he conceived it the most fit place to receive instructions, what to doe now, that the law was so neglected & trodden under foot. The cave into which he went, saith R. Solomon, was that, in which Moses was, when the Lord passed by Exo. 34. 6. And here the word of the Lord came unto him saying, what doest thou here Elijah? which sheweth that he came not by any particular direction from the Lord, but of his own mind; happily, as hath been already said, supposing, that where the law was at the first given, he should receive some comfort, that was so zealous for the law. And the Lord did not aske him this question, saith Martyr, as if he were ignorant upon what occasion he came thither, but in way of reproof; as if he had said; doest thou thus for feare come to lurk in solitarie places, forsaking the place whereunto thou wert called to withstand idolatrie? hast thou therefore received the singular gifts of the spirit, to come and hide them here? And he dealeth with him by way

Note.

Patriarchs travels.

*Iosephus.*H. B. Patriarchs travels.
P. Martyr.

*Lyra.
Pellican.*

Rom. 11. 2.

V. 10.

*Deut. 16.
2 Sam. 24.*

*P. Martyr
Lyra.*

Hugo Cardin.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

V. 11.

Pellican.

of interrogation, that he might draw a confession from his own mouth. But he when he should have confessed his timorousnesse in seeing the danger of death, palliateth it with a pretext of zeal, and complaineth of the great wickednesse of the people of Israel, thus to move the Lord to take revenge upon them: thus he. But Lyra better. He asked him this, that upon his answer he might take occasion to comfort him, as indeed he did: and Pellican likewise, but onely he addeth, that he sought to draw an answer from him touching his zeal, that he might by and by teach him in his own example, patiently to expect their amendment, and not so suddenly seek their destruction. For in causing a mighty winde, and fire, &c. to go before him, and then a soft and still voice, he shewed, that he had power to confound them all in a moment, but he would deal more gently: first by admonitions and instructions. For seeing the Lord reproveth not Elijah for his fearfulness, how can any man do it? Indeed he concealeth not, but acknowledgeth this in part to be the cause of his coming hither now, when he said, they sought his life also, but it was his zeal for God, which brought him into that danger, for which he doubted not, but after this complaint made, as the Apostle calleth it, hee should heare of comfort.

To the Lords question, what do'it thou here? Elijah answereth, v. 10. I have been zealous for the Lord God of hosts, for the children of Israel have left thy covenant, broken down thine altars, &c. It may seem strange that he should complain of their breaking down his altars, when as there ought to be but one altar for sacrifice, at that particular place, which the Lord should chuse, and that was mount Moriah in Ierusalem, where Solomon by the direction of God had built him a temple. If there were any altars then in other parts of the land, it may seem not to be a fault to break them down, yea it is commended in godly princes, that they brake down the high places, where altars had sometime by the Patriarks been erected to God, that none might sinne by sacrificing after that the temple was built, in any other place; and if so, why doth Elijah complain of this? Martyr answereth, that idolaters brake them down in another minde, viz. out of enmity against God, that no remembrance of him might remain any more in the land. And Lyra saith, they destroyed them in contempt of God, and this he complaineth of, and not that they were any further usefull now for sacrifice, except upon speciall occasion; and sacrificing to God there was still tollerated by some godly kings, to keep the people from sacrificing to idols. They have killed thy prophets with the sword, and I am left alone. How could Elijah say thus, when as he had been certified by Obadiab lately, that there were 100. hidden by him in caves? Hugo Cardinalis saith, that because he did more in the Lords cause then all they, he accounted them as none of the Lords prophets, which he spake not without some elation of minde, to pull down which the Lord presently told him, that there were 7000. in Israel, which had not bowed the knee to Baal, but cleaved constantly to the Lord, as he did. Lyra saith, he was left alone, because there were but a very few, in comparison of the great multitude which followed Baal. Martyr, he was left alone to stand publicly for God, all others, which had done so in times past, were either slain, or lurked in secret places, he not knowing, where any one was to be found at that time. And hereunto we may adde, that for ought he knew, they were by that time cut off by raging Iezabel also.

And he said, go out and stand upon the mountain, and behold the Lord passed, and a mighty winde breaking the mountains and cleaving the rocks before the Lord, but the Lord was not in the winde. Here before the Lord said any thing to Elijah in answer, to his complaint, he made first a shew of his wonderfull great power by most strong windes, a most hot burning fire, and terrible earthquake, in each of which it is said, the Lord was not, and lastly there was heard a soft and still voice, shewing the Lords presence. But to what end this was thus done, is most difficult to declare. Pellican as hath been partly touched before, saith, that hereby he would teach the prophet, that although he had power presently to confound all his idolatrous enemies, yet he would not thus deal with them, but gently by teaching, seek to bring them into the right way, neither would he have him seek still their destruction

tion by judgements; but their reformation by placide and gentle teaching. Martyr saith, it may be referred either to the Lord, to persecuting tyrants, or to the prophet. Being referred to the Lord, hereby was shewed, that he could indeed use such meanes to confound his enemies, for by windes he brought locusts upon Egypt, by an earthquake he destroyed Chorab and his company, and also by fire Sodom, but he would proceed against them another more still and silent way, by bringing such enemies upon them, as they least feared. Being referred to persecuters, their rage against the servants of the Lord is hereby set forth, but the Lord is not with them in their attempts, so that they cannot bring to passe what they desire, but what God hath decreed shall stand; which is set forth in the soft and still voice. Being referred to Elijah, he was hereby taught, that his earnest seeking of the destruction of the idolatrous Israelites was not pleasing to the Lord; but rather, that after the judgement of drought, which he had formerly prayed for, he should now by gentle meanes seek their conversion and salvation. For it appeared by experience, that rigid means would do no good upon them, seeing they were not turned by that long continued drought, but when they saw a signe of the Lords power above Baal, they cried out, the Lord he is God. He addeth also some others, as first, that the Lord by these signes shewed his power for the comfort of his servant now full of fear; but it is said, the Lord was not in these; that is, the full knowledge of God is not by seeing such dreadfull effects of his power attained, but when in silence we give our mindes to divine contemplation. Secondly, it was hereby shewed, that when the Lord executeth judgements against the wicked, this is not his ultimus finis to destroy them, but the conversion of souls, and bringing the state of the Church to more quiet and tranquility at the last. Thirdly, Elijah was hereby taught, that God did nothing against the wicked being carried by violent passion, and yet all things were governed according to his will, and by his divine power he pierced into all. Lyra following the ordinary glosse, understandeth by the winde pride, by the earthquake covetousnesse, and by the fire fleshy lusts, all which it is shewed by this apparition, must be mortified in us, before that the Lord entreteth into our hearts by the still voice of the Gospel to sanctifie us, that we may be saved. Hugo agreeth with Lyra, but that he understandeth by the earthquake either covetousnesse, or fury and rage, and wrath, which worketh not the righteousness of God. And for a still voice having sibilus tinnis aurea, he expounds it of the Lords inspiring inwardly of the will to lead a new life, and it is called tinnis aurea, because in such there is a tender conscience. Amongst all these, I prefer that, which applieth it to the Lord, because it is said, the Lord passed by, shewing by these terrible signes, what he both could and would do to confound his idolatrous enemies, and for the comfort of the faithfull, which was the thing that Elijah sought to stir him up to. Elijah had complained of four things. First they have broken thy covenant, secondly cast down thine altars, thirdly slain thy prophets, fourthly seek my life. Therefore four signes are given him, three of which pretended judgments for this their rage by 3. severall means, and the fourth a quiet estate of all the faithfull after this. For the sequel of speaking after these signes, repeating again, What dost thou here Elijah? and bidding him to go and anoint Hazael, Iehu, and Elisbah, and threatening destruction by their swords, after which he addeth, I have reserved to my self 7000, &c. doth plainly shew, that these 3. terrible apparitions, did but serve to prefigure the destruction to come upon the idolaters by those three, and the soft voice a tranquill estate after that of the sincere worshippers of God. All which could not but abundantly comfort Elijah in the midst of his greatest troubles. Whereas the Lord is said not to have been in those signes that portended judgements, hereby we are given to understand, that he took no pleasure in thus dealing, but wicked men brought these destructions upon themselves, by going on obstinately and impenitently in their sinnes, in saying thus therefore it was shewed not to be his but [alienum opus] anothers work, as it were, as Esay calleth the like, the Lords work and anothers his, because he thus judgeth, but anothers, because others are the cause, he is not in it, that is, in respect of his will and nature, which is not to put to death, but to turn and save sinners. These

P. Martyr.

Lyra.

Hugo Carlin.

Esa. 28. 21.

Ezech. 18.

These

These things may also be applied metaphorically, according to Lyra, but I cannot see, how they should be taken, as a check given to Elijah for his earnestness against Israel, seeing the Lord immediately sent him to prepare for a revenge-taking upon the idolaters amongst them, as hath been said. Whereas Elijah is bidden to go out, that he might see this great sight, but yet he is said then first to have come and stood in the mouth of the cave, when the Lord had thus passed by, some take it to be thus set forth by a figure called hysteron proteron, and some, which I rather approve, that he was at the first called out, but being afraid at the rising of the tempest he abode still in the cave, and when these terrors were over, and the voice began to be heard, he went forth as he was bidden. If any man shall ask how the Lord is said not to have been in winde, &c. seeing he is every where? it is answered, that the meaning is to be taken, which hath been shewed, and not the words strictly to be insisted upon. Or as Martyr hath it, he was not in these in a peculiar manner, to speak unto and to deal with Elijah, as in the soft voice, and thus he was not in times past in other places, as in the sanctuary, to give answers to such as sought unto him.

P. Martyr.

V. 13.
Exod. 33. 23.

V. 14.
*Hugo Card.
Pellican.*

And when Elijah began to hear, he covered his face with a mantle, &c. ] Thus Moses before was covered with an hand, when the Lord passed by, as not able to endure the sight of his glory, as indeed he told him, that no man was. Wherefore Elijah remembring this, covered his face, but some (saith Martyr) hold, that he did it in humility and reverence, as the heavenly cherubims cover their faces, Esa. 6. and this reason he thinketh not unfit to take in also, but the first alone may suffice, because when Moses his pattern would shew his humble reverence he fell down bowing his head to the ground, and was covered his face onely, for that the best man living is so unworthy, that he cannot see God and live. When Elijah was thus prepared, the Lord asked him again as before, and he answered in the same words. He asked again, what he did there? that after his complaint renewed, he might give him comfort, yet secretly, saith Hugo, and Pellican, that he might be brought to see into his own weakness, in that he was now so timorous, who yet while had been so couragious, he was hereby reprov'd, as doing that which for fear of danger he ought not, viz. going from the company of men, to whom he might have done good by his instructions, to lurk in secret. For he, saith Gregory, that fleeth to a solitary life, is guilty of the destruction of so many souls, as he might have been a means to save, if he had done his endeavour amongst them, which is set fourth in the parable of him, that hid his talent in a napkin. Yet that he might make amends for this fault, by going forth again, as his office required, he giveth him all encouragement so to do, by saying unto him.

V. 15.

P. Martyr.

Go, return by the way of the desert to Damascus, and anoint Asahel king over Syria, and Iehu the son of Nimsbi for king over Israel, and Elishah the son of Shaphat, &c. ] Here are three men nominated to him, that should be to the idolaters in Israel, as a tempestuous winde, devouring fire and earthquake to terrifie and destroy them that would not turn: Therefore he saith, those that escape the sword of Asahel Iehu shall destroy, and those that escape the sword of Iehu shall Elishah destroy. For the ceremony of anointing, Martyr saith, it was used then to kings and to priests, to figure out the gifts of the spirit, wherewith they should be endued, as being most needfull for their high offices, but ended with the ceremoniall law, and therefore ought not now to be used, as it is amongst the papists at the inauguration of Princes and bishops, in baptisme, in confirmation, in consecration of Churches and bells, and in time of sickness, seeing this is a renewing of Judaisme, yea and an increasing of the rites thereof. And he saith, that it was not used in the Church of God under the new Testament, for many hundred yeares in the eastern parts, which he proveth by the rescript of Innocent the third, to the Patriark of Constantinople, touching the bishop of Baccharah, who he saith came unto him, and he found that he had not been anointed, and thereby gathered, that in those parts anointing was not yet used, and this was, anno Dom. 1000. And that Christian Emperours were anciently crowned by the Patriarks, but not anointed he saith, that he hath read, as Leo the succellour of Martian was by the Patriark of Constantinople cinople, not that he received his Empire of him, but thus acknowledged himself to belong to the Church, and that he assented to the truth therein taught and maintained. Hitherto of anointing in generall, touching the persons here nominated, because Elishah was also to be anointed for prophet extraordinary, as the necessity of those times required, it is gathered that prophets also were anointed, although it is not said after this, that Elijah did anoint him, but onely cast his mantle upon him, v. 19. For many things were done, which are not recorded in holy Scriptures, as neither his anointing of Asahel or of Iehu. Onely we read, that Asahel was told by Elishah that he should be king of Syria, and that he sent one to anoint Iehu, which he did doubtlesse at the direction of Elijah, to whom God had revealed this. When the Lord bade Elijah then to go and anoint these men, he meant nothing else, but that he should provide that this might be done by himself or some other, whom he should imploy in this service, and that neither precisely according to the word, by using the ceremonie of anointing to them all, but doing that which was instar, by declaring the Lords will herein unto them, whereupon they were immediately endued with the spirit fitting for those functions. For Christ was not anointed, neither are Christians exterpally, yet he is said to be anointed with the oyl of gladnesse because of the spirit, which descended upon him, and they to have an anointing for the spirit received, whereby they were taught divine mysteries. Thus, I say, Elijah fulfilled what he was commanded, although some of these were never anointed according to the letter, and yet happily he went in person and did it, although his declaring of Gods will to Elishah onely be commemorated, and that of anointing Asahel and Iehu passed over in silence, till they were dealt withall again by his instruments. Comestor saith, he anointed them no otherwise, but by declaring it to Asahel by Elishah, to Iehu by one sent by Elishah, and by casting his mantle upon Elishah. So likewise Iosephus, making no mention of his bidding to anoint, but to declare. But a great doubt ariseth here, how Elishah came last to slay those, that were left by Iehu, when as he slew none but 42. children, 2 King. 3. before Iehu was king, and how Iehu could be said to slay those, that were left by Asahel, when as Asahel destroyed not; till the declining time of Iehu, after that he had slain the prophets and servants of Baal, and Akabs house, and again in his wicked sonnes time? But this is answered, that the order is not to be insisted upon, as if it were precisely meant, that they should slay, Elishah after Iehu and Iehu after Asahel, but onely, as Comestor hath it, one should slay some and the other some, no respect being had to the time. For Iehu slew those that were left by Asahel, in that they whom he slew, fell not by the sword of Asahel, and the like may be said of Elishah. Thus also Martyr, who besides the children slain upon the cursing of Elishah, thinketh, that many perished by his means by the famine in Samaria called for by him, which Iehoram the king shewed to be his opinion, when for this he threatened to take away his head. But that famine came not but by the siege which the king of Syria laid against it, who was spared before by Elishah his means, when he had brought him into the king of Israels power. Tostatus thinketh, that besides the children, which were of Bethel an idolatrous place, whom Elishah slew; that many of the servants of Baal more were by him slain also, although it be passed over in silence; and this is not incredible, seeing the word of God spoken of him, and of his slaying some idolaters is undoubtedly true, and had the effect as well as that spoken of Asahel and Iehu. Hugo saith, that it is not meant, that Elishah should slay any with the materiall, but with the spirituall sword, and the glosse; Asahel and Iehu slew with the materiall sword, Elishah with the sword of the tongue, here in following Rabanus, and this he may be said to have done, when he cursed those children of Bethel, who as Lyra saith, were there to learn idolatry, and they were presently slain, as if they had been smitten by him, as Ananias and Saphyra afterwards were by Peter, Act. 5.

[Tat. I will reserve 7000. in Israel, even all the knees that have not bowed to Baal, and every mouth that hath not kissed him.] Lyra will have either the kissing of Baal for reverence meant, or kissing the hand for the like reason, in such as came before him, grounding upon Job. 31. where kissing of the hand in reverence to the

Sun

2 King. 8.
2 King. 9.Psal. 45.
1 Joh. 2. 20.2 King. 10. 32.
Chap. 13. 22.

Schol. histor.

P. Martyr

2 King. 6.
V. 31.

Tostatus.

Hugo Cardin.
Glos. ordin.

L. 7A.

V. 18.

Schol. hiflor.
P. Martyr

Noc.

V. 19.

Ruth. 3. 9.
1 Sam. 18. 4.

1 Sam. 23. 7.

V. 20.

P. Martyr.

Sun and Moon is spoken of as a great wickednesse. Come for, kissing of Baals hands for reverence, so like wife Martyr, saying yet with Lyra, that some idolaters kissed their own hand, for reverence to the Sun, as Iob speaketh, because they could not reach to it, but by the idolatrous papists of these times, who wear out idols by kissing them, we may easily gather that they kissed the image of Baal. And because the godly are described by these outward gestures, wherein they would not consort with idolaters, he noteth the error of those that will be present at the Masse, and do as others do outwardly, saying, that seeing their hearts are upright, this is no offence: but the godly of those times abhorred from so doing, and so do the truly godly in all times, he therefore censurcth all such as hypocrites, saying that they serve not Christ but the devill. Now of such a number of sincere worshippers of God in the midst of those idolatrous times, the Lord certifieth Elijah for his greater comfort, and to teach us, that God hath his true Church in all times, which keepeth her self pure from idolatrous pollutions, although hidden from the eyes of men, and so doubtlesse in the most corrupt times of popery, there were many that abhorred from image-worshipping, and ascribing infallibilitie and power to the Pope to forgive sins, even before Luther and Calvin, yea, and many such are nominated, as not altogether lying hid, in Catalogo testium veritatis.

And going thence he found Elishah the sonne of Shaphat, but he was ploughing, &c. and he cast his mantle upon him, &c. Elishah was of Abel-Mehol. h. v. 16. which was near unto Jordan in the tribe of Ephraim, according to Iunius, upon Iudg. 7. 22. And he is said by the Hebrews to have been the sonne of a very rich man, which is not improbable, seeing he ploughed with no lesse then 12. yokes of oxen. Vpon him Elijah cast his mantle, by this outward signe imparting the spirit of prophesie unto him: for so Iosephus saith, that he began to prophesie so soon as this was done. And it appeareth, that he felt such a change in himself, that he must forthwith leave his husbandry and follow the prophet, as being now of the same calling and profession, with him. For he asketh leave of Elijah to go home first to kisse his father and his mother, saying, that then hee would follow him. Which sheweth, that the spirit of God with the mantle came upon him so, as that he was enforced, immediatly leaving this, to betake himself to another course of life. Not, as Martyr saith, that there was any vertue in the mantle; but that it pleased God hereby to work in him singularly, so as wee read not in all the Scripture of any other called to this office of prophesying. Yet he saith, that anciently they used to put their coat upon one, that they joyned most nearly unto them, as Ruth desired Boaz to cast the skirt of his garment upon her, and Jonathan put his coat upon David, hereby unwittingly fore-shewing his attaining to the kingdome, to the which he was heir; but it appears, that he did it wittingly, because at another time he told him, he knew, that David should be king, and he next unto him. And in the primitive Church, such as were baptized had a white garment put upon them, to be worn eight dayes after, to shew the new kinde of pure living, to which they did now betake themselves. And in an apish imitation of this, a Monk hath the habit of the order into which he entred put upon him. But Elijah did not so put his garment upon Elishah, but by a divine instinct, as the sequel shewed, whereas Monks after this new habit put on, remain many of them most destitute of the spirit, and carnally minded. Elishah being thus invested with a propheticall habit, and thereupon coming after Elijah to ask leave, that he might first go home and salute his parents, as feeling now in himself a necessity of leaving his husbandry, to attend upon the propheticall function, Elijah bad him, go, returne, for what have I now done to thee? This speech is somewhat obscure, because having by this external signe called him from his worldly employments to go with him, he seemeth hereby to be ignorant of any necessity, that he thus imposed upon him so to do. Martyr giveth a double sense of the words; First, that he spake thus by way of admiration, to draw him to admire the goodnesse and work of God in him, that he might be thankfull therefore. Secondly by way of stirring him up to consider, who had now called him, and to what, that howsoever he returned, yet he might know, that he could not now lawfully follow husbandry businesse any more; but leaving it, must needs needs attend upon his new calling of a prophet. The vulgar Latin by ſupplying two words here, [quod enim meum erat feci tibi, I have done that which was my part unto thee] maketh the ſenſe eaſie, as if he had ſaid, return thou maiſt, for ſo ſhort a time as thou deſireſt, as filial duty bindeth thee, neither will I hold thee from ſo doing. For I was not ſo commanded, but in calling thee to this prophetical office, I have done what I was commanded, ſee thou therefore, that thou doſo, as is of thee required. And ſome conjecture, that Elijah did not onely caſt his mantle upon him to call him, but taking him aſide, told him the Lords will herein, and anointed him, then putting that garment upon him, after which he ſtanding ſtill awhile, as being amazed at the ſtrangenefſe of the thing (in which ſpace Elijah went away) began by and by to come to himſelf, and then running after him ſaid, as in the text. Sumus following the Hebrew [what have I done to thee?] ſaith, it is as if he had ſaid, be mindfull of thy calling by God, and that it permitteth of no delays. More fully holding to the words in the Originall, I think it is as if he had ſaid, what have I done to thee to hinder thee from going firſt and ſhewing thy duty to thy parents? in calling thee to the prophetical office I have done nothing in this kinde, but to tye thee, when thou haſt acquainted them with this thy calling, and taken thy leave of them, with ſpeed to leave wordly employments, and to attend upon this thy new calling. Whereas Elijah biddeth him, go, return, but one asking leave of Chriſt to go firſt and bury his father, he would not permit him. He did not herein go contrary to Chriſt, for that man ſought a longer delay, viz. to keep with his father till he was dead, and then to follow Chriſt, but this onely to ſalute him and come; again Chriſt knew, that the heart of that man was not right, and therefore gave no way unto him, whereas Elijah knew no ſuch thing by Eliſbah. Laſtly, Chriſt was Lord, and ſo above father and mother, but Elijah a fellow ſervant, and therefore would not take ſo much upon him to diſpenſe with Gods lawes. Hugo noteth herein, firſt the agreeing of the Law with the Goſpell, becauſe under both Diſciples were called, and immediatly obeyed. Secondly, the excellency of the Goſpel above the Law, becauſe now he that is called, is permitted that, which he is not under the Goſpel, in going about the preaching whereof there muſt be no delay. And morally, as Eliſbah having received a new habit, immediately left the world to come after Elijah, ſo he that is truly called to be a new creature, leaveth all worldly things, when he is to attend upon prophesying.

And when he returned, he took a yoke of oxen and killed them, and ſod the fleſh, and gave it to the people.] That is, ſaith Pellican, when he had been with his parents, for a farewell to his neighbours he made this proviſion, that they might eat with him before he departed, in teſtimony of his charity towards them. And he ſod the fleſh with a fire made of the plough, ſaith Martyr, becauſe he would not ſlay, whileſt other wood might be cut down and brought thither to make a fire, and he alſo thinketh, that they, to whom he made this feaſt, were many of his friends, who accompanied him out of the town as farre as the place where he had been ploughing, where alſo they took their leave of him. Others think, that beſides the haſte in which he was, there was another myſticall reaſon of his making a fire with the plough and appurtenances thereof, viz. to ſhew, that he now gave over worldly buſineſſe, and meant not to return to it any more, but conſtantly to follow Elijah. Of ſuch kinde of wood taken before for the uſe of ſacrificing wee read twice, 1 Sam. 6. 2 Sam. 24. This calling of friends together by Eliſbah to make merry with them before he departed, ſhewed, that he followed not his new calling heavily, but cheertully and willingly, as every one muſt do, that would be accepted of; although he be called from friends and wordly riches.

He then followed Elijah and miniſtered unto him.] Where Elijah now lived, it is not ſaid, nor how long before his paſſing up to heaven, but Iohan. Hieroſol. ſaith, that he dwelt in mount Carmel, and had many diſciples about him, whom he inſtructed, and built there a houſe of prayer called Seunon, continuing ſtill 16 years. And Benjamin in his itinerarium ſaith, that upon that mount there was a cave, called the cave of Elijah.

Junius.

Hugo Cardin.

V. 21.

Pellican.

P. Martyr.

Note.

CHAP. XX.

V. 1.

Tostatus.

P. Martyr.

Ios. 12. 24.

V. 3.

V. 4.

V. 5, 6.

V. 9.

Then Benhadad king of Syria gathered all his army, and 32 kings were with him, &c. ] Of Benhadad it is spoken before chap. 15. that at Asa his request he came and invaded the land of Israel, in the dayes of Baasba, and took divers cities therein, v. 20. from thence till this time was about 29. years. For it may be gathered from the history following, that Ahab had now reigned 17. years, and Omri his father fixe, Elab the sonne of Baasbah two, and four years passed between Elab and Omri, before that he could be quietly settled in the kingdome. Wherefore either Benhadad was now an old man, or it was another king of the same name succeeding him, that made this warre, and Tostatus thinketh, that it was his grandchilde. But that he was rather his son, may be gathered v. 34. the Chaldee as there, so here calleth him Barhadad, Iosephus, Adad, and sometime the sonne of Adad, the Septuagint the sonne of Ador. Of Adad see the history before upon ch. 11. 16, 17, &c. and of his quarrell against Israel which continued still in his posterity the kings of Syria. And therefore though no cause be assigned, why he made this war against the king of Israel, the inveterate hatred of that stock against Israel ever since Solomons time was cause enough, and the hire given unto him sometime by Asa king of Iudah to make warre here, when he had got footing in that land, put him on the more to seek to enlarge his conquest; by adding Samaria to those cities, as Martyr thinketh. However there was a divine hand in this his coming, both that Ahab might see into the wickednesse of his idolatry, which he might well think brought this judgement upon him, and be moved by Gods goodnesse in delivering him out of it to repent, which hitherto by famine and the miraculous coming down of fire from heaven he would not be moved to do. For Benhadad came against him and besieged him in Samaria, and with him 32. kings with their armies, which altogether made an huge host, to which the Israelites were no way comparable. In somuch, that Ahab despairing of his power to resist, yielded unto him in whatsoever he required, as touching treasure. But when all this would not satisfie, and he was like to endure the brunt of a bloody warre, he was comforted by a prophet, and directed so to fight against the Aramites, that he soon got the victory over them, as here in this chapter is more largely shewed. Whereas he had with him 32. kings, it is to be understood, that many kings then had but little territories: for in the land of Canaan alone were in times past 32. kings, and yet it was a countrey not much greater then Wales.

And sending Messengers to Ahab he said, thy silver and thy gold is mine, thy wives also and thy children, &c. ] The Syrian king being proud of his huge army, which he thought the king of Israel was no way able to resist, sendeth unto him such a message, as he thought that he would by no means consent unto, and so he should the more justly enter the battell, and get all that he had. But Ahab being filled with fear basely yeilded unto him, saying, I am thine, O Lord and king, and all that I have, not meaning yet, as the sequel sheweth, that he would be ready whensoever he required, to deliver himself, his wives and children, and all his goods unto him. But by giving these good words he thought to pacifie him, and paying for peace when he should require the tribute, that should be laid upon him. For when Benhadad sent again to explain himself, that to morrow he would send for all these things by his servants, giving him also to understand, that by his silver and gold he meant all the treasures in the city, which not onely he but his subjects had, he by their advice denied him, saying, that he would do all that was at the first required, but this thing he could not do; that is, he would be his servant and tributary; and so should his wives and children be, paying what should be imposed upon them to their power: but rather then suffer his Aramites to come and ravish their houses, ravish their wives, and carry away such of them as they pleased, and such children as taken captive by the sword, and that not onely his, but all his subjects, they would endure the brunt of the most bloody warre, that he could make upon upon them. To this effect almost P. Martyr speaketh, in giving the sense first, but then he mentioneth a second of some, who say, that he meant he would deliver his own both wives goods and children, for the safety of the city, but now that he sent moreover for his subjects goods, and according to his pleasure to spoil them of their wives and children also, he would not consent. And because he in this acquitted himself as a good king, preferring the good of his subjects before his own, God dealt so mercifully by him, to deliver the Aramites into his hands. But this is justly by him rejected, because if he should have given his own wives into Benhadads hands to be abused, or his children to be at his mercy, the sinne against God and against the common-wealth had been as great, as to suffer him to make a prey of his subjects. For thus the women should have been prostituted, and the common-wealth robbed of an heir to the crown, which might have been an occasion of great dissentions and much blood-shed, and the innocent, who were as dear unto him should unjustly have been exposed to a thousand hazards. Hugo thinketh, that he would have delivered all, but wives. Lyra, all his own things, but not his subjects. Iosephus, who speaketh nothing of his subjects, saith, that the difference between the king of Israels first grant, and the king of Arams second demand, was, that he would send servants to take, whereas Ahab meant, that what was given should be carried out of the city and delivered, more then which ought not by the law of nations to be required upon a composition for peace by any enemy. And this I think to be one difference betwixt the first challenge and the next demand, and a second might be, that he thought at the first, that he did not require his wives to be his any otherwise then as he spake of himself, saying, I am thine, and all that I have, that is, to be his vassals and to pay him tribute. A third, he made no mention at the first of the goods of his subjects, but onely of his own. The last difference was in the time, which was not set at the first, but now he would have all the next day, that he might return immediately with the spoils of the city, as if he had conquered it. And it was Benhadads pride encreased by Ahabs basenesse, that made him so insolent now in his demand. But this his pride and confidence in an arm of flesh went before his fall, which by the just judgement of God eft-soons followed, as the history doth immediately declare. For when he saw, that he was denied, he stormed and swore, that his power was so great, that it was no way resistable, making therefore no doubt, but soon to obtain what he required.

For he said, the gods do so to me and more also, if the dust of Samaria will suffice for all my foot-men to take every one an handfull. Iosephus differing much from this saith, that if the people that followed him, should bring but every one an handfull, it would suffice to raise mounts against the city, as high as the wals thereof.

King Ahab hearing this, taketh more courage to him, as thinking happily, that God would never suffer one so proud of his own forces to prevail, and answereth, Let not him that putteth on his armour boast, as he that putteth it off: That is, which preparoth to fight, as if he had already gotten the victory, and so had put it off again. And when this answer came to Benhadads ear, he commanded presently to assault the citie, but did nothing himself, nor the kings with him, for they sate drinking together, as did Belsazzar afterwards, when Babylon was taken, and E-lab before at the time of the siege of Gibbethon, and was slain in Thirza.

Then a prophet came to Ahab and said, thus saith the Lord, hast thou seen all this great multitude, &c. The Lord having shewed himself unto Ahab to be the onely true God, by fire and rain through the mediation of Elijah before: Now promisseth further to shew the same by making an innumerable company of enemies to fall before his people of Israel being few, by another prophet, who is not named, but by many supposed to be Michaiab; yet Martyr well opposeth this opinion, because he is said a while after, never to have prophesied good unto Ahab. And that this was the end, why the Lord would give so great a victory unto Ahab so unworthy, that he might know him to be the Lord, this is here expressed in the end of his prophesie, although one cause also might be the pride of Benhadad, which God would pull down. Touching this prophet, who he was by name no man can tell, but the Lord had prophets, as was before said, hidden in caves from the furie of

P. Martyr.

*Hugo Cardin.
Lyra.
Iosephus.*

V. 10.

V. 11.

*Dna. 5.
1 King. 16. 9.*

V. 13.

*Comestor.
Lyra.
Tostatus.
Sedar. Olam.
P. Martyr.*

Note.

V. 14.

Kimbi.
Iosephus.

Note.

P. Martyr.

V. 15.

Pellican.

V. 16.

V. 17.

V. 20, 21.

V. 22.

Iosephus.

Iezabel to the number of 100. from amongst whom he happily now sent out one for the comfort of Ahab in his distresse, if by any means he would be wenne to turne and favour and hearken to those, whom his Queen persecuted and sought to root out, that doing so, he might yet be saved. And it is to be noted, that God would not give him this great victory without telling him of it before, that he might not ascribe it to Baal or to fortune, but to the Lord onely; and therefore he setteth down the time when, this day. And he directeth him also in the manner of proceeding. For when Ahab asked the prophet by whom, he answered, by the children of the Princes of the provinces; that is, most probably, the noble mens sonnes which lived at the kings Court, and attended upon him for greater honour to him, and that they might there learn Princely behaviour, so Kimbi and Iosephus. Others suppose, that they might be the Princes servants, who lived at the Court with their sonnes, to teach them military matters; and some, that they were the Princes sonnes, who abode there as pledges in these dangerous times. The first is most probable, because kings used to keep about them noble mens sonnes, that they might be the more honourably attended: and if such were meant, they were most unfit for such an enterprize, by reason of their tender and delicate breeding, being also young and wanting experience in martiall affaires. And then we must inferre that God would by appointing such to be the instruments, and not old beaten hardy souldiers, magnifie his power the more to his greater glory. But why did Ahab ask, by whom? Ans. He thought happily that a power might come from his confederate Iehosaphat, or that God would by some miraculous means strike them, as in Ioshuah his time, he had done other enemies. Then he asked, Who shall begin the battell. Hebr. Who shall bind the battell. Chaldee, Who shall order it. Septuagint, Who shall joyne it. The meaning is, who shall lead them or set them forth together in that forme, wherein they shall fight; (Iosephus) se regente eorum imperitiam, and here it is answered; though Martyr saith, that some will have the meaning of the question to be, whether the Aramites should begin, they awaiting their coming, or they by making an irruption out of the city. But the former is to be preferred, seeing the word doth not properly signifie begin, but bind the battell.

Then he numbered the children of the Princes 232. and after them all the people, 7000. It may seem strange, that the people in so great a city, and so populous should be no more. But Martyr conjectureth, and that not improbably, that these, were the 7000. of whom the Lord spake before to Elijah, that had not bowed their knees to Baal, all others being for feare of the enemy fled away. Pellican likewise saith, that these were men fearing God, and believing the Prophet, who at his word were ready at an houre to goe forth to fight, all others drawing back, as having no confidence in the word of God.

The time when they went out, is noted to be at noon, Benbadad and his kings being then drunken, and so as Lyra observeth, it was a time most fit for this enterprize. The children of the Princes being come forth first and no more appearing yet; Benbadad had take them alive, as thinking that so few were not worth the fighting withall. But when the Syrians attempted to doe so, they contrary to their expectation fell upon those that came first unto them, and slew them. Then followed the rest of the army and holpe to pursue them, beginning already to turne their backs. And lastly Ahab seeing this came forth also most probably with his chariots and horsemen, and smote Benbadads horses and chariots with a great slaughter.

Then the Prophet came to the king of Israel and said, &c. That is, when he returned with victory, and laden with spoyle, for he pursued the Syrians far saith Iosephus; and returning took their tents rich with gold and silver. God prosecute the wicked king with evidences of his power and omniscience, that he might be without excuse; for he sendeth now again the second time to reveal a secret unto him, which none but the true God could yet certainly know: viz. That the king of Syria would come again the next year to renew the warre, willing him to consider of it, and so he leaveth him to make use of this premonition accordingly, supposing that this being added to the former, he would happily consider so of it, as that hee would turn from his idols to serve the Lord, conceiving that he could never otherwise be secure secure from his enemies, And hereby all Kings and Commanders may learn some military wisdom, not to grow secure, the enemy being once overcome, but to prepare for another encounter, because otherwise victory obtained may turn to greater destruction to the vanquisher. As the Prophet foretold, Benhadad and his servants consult about renewing the warre, saying, their gods are gods of the mountaines, &c. and accordingly Captains being set up instead of kings, they come to Aphek to battell in a plain place. A strange invention the Court parasites had to comfort their king, being troubled at his late great overthrow, they spake nothing of his drunkenness, or their own cowardise, but foolishly ascribe the power of the gods of Israel, prevailing to mountainous places. If it be demanded, why they said so? Martyr answereth, because Samaria was mountainous, and Jerusalem where the Temple stood, and their fathers of old worshipped in high places. And when they worshipped idols, it was in high places. Dan and Bethel and many more, as is complained in Ierem. 3. 6. But why mult Kings be turned into Captaines? Answ. Because they would better be ruled by the King, whereas kings being more high minded through their greatness would doe what they listed, which might be the cause of confusion in the army, and being used to live in pleasure, they were thought more unfit to endure the hardship of warre.

He came up to Aphek, which was a great plain according to Martyr lying in the tribe of Iudah, but taking it thus, he is troubled to resolve how the Syrians should come to pitch there, it being in the dominion of king Iehosaphat, and is forced to say that there was a league betwixt him and Benhadad, and had been with his father Asa, who begun it in the daies of Baashab king of Israel. But if so, how came it to passe that Iehosaphat yielded so readily to goe with Ahab against the Syrians to battell? It is better therefore to hold that which he rejecteth, viz. that it was in Asher, as Iunius also doth, proving it from Iosb. 19. 30. Aphek is a place much celebrated for battels formerly. For here the Philistines pitched when they took the Ark, although that Aphek be by Iunius referred to Iudah, according to Iosb. 15. 53. here again they pitched against Saul, 1 Sam. 29. 1. and at the city Megiddo standing upon this plain was Iosiah slain by Pharaoh Necho. Adricomius saith Aphek in Issachar which some hold to have been now in the possession of the Philistines, through whose friendship, being always enemies to Israel, the Syrians might well come and pitch there. But Lyra saith that Aphek was a strong city in Asher, taken from the Israelites by the Syrians, before which lay a great plain of the same name, and this I think to be most consonant to the sacred history, and to reason; and therefore worthy the rather to be followed: and Pellican, who is for Aphek in Iudah, yet conjectureth, that it might now be in the Syrians hands.

And the Israelites went out like two little flocks of goats, but the Aramites filled the land. This is here set down, that so great disparity appearing between the armies, the power of God might be the more magnified; when in the following part of this history it should be declared, that the army so much lesser overcame the greater by farre. But here a great doubt may be made, for so much as it is said, that the children of Israel were numbred, and all found. How it happend that they were so few, seeing the kingdome of Israel not long before this afforded 800000 men in Ieroboams time. Some say that the reason was, for that many of Israel revolted to the king of Iudah, and many cities were held by the Syrians from them. But it were strong, if by these meanes their number should be so greatly diminished. It is rather to be thought with R. Levi, Ben Gersom, whom Martyr mentioneth, that the men here said to be numbred, were the same that overthrew the Aramites the yeare before; viz. the children of the Princes, and the 7000 faithfull; and therefore they come out again in two companies, as then. In saying then that they were all found, it is meant, that they all who went out at that time were still alive, not one of them being slain by the enemies, against whom they fought, which was not without a miracle. Wherefore Ahab, although warned so long before, provided no other forces, but sent those out onely; believing, that they which so valiantly subdued the Syrians so lately, should now again have the like success, being heartned to the fight by that victory. And good cause had he thus to believe, seeing

V. 23.

V. 26.

P. Martyr.

1 King. 22. 4.

1 Sam. 4. 1.

2 Kings 24. 7.

Adricom.

Lyra.

Pellican.

V. 27.

Iunius. The children of Israel were numbred, and took their provision.
2 Chron. 13. 3.
Sallianus.
Ben Gersom.

V. 28.

V. 29.
H. B. Patriarchs
travels.
P. Martyr.

Tostatus.
Josephus.

V. 29.
V. 30.

P. Martyr.

Nova

V. 31.

he had a promise again from the same prophet, that they should fall before him, for that they had said, that God was God of the mountains; and not of the valleys.

For v. 28. it is said, The man of God had come, and had said, as Martyr rendereth it, and the Hebrew text may well bear, seeing the preterperfect tense in the Hebrew tongue, serveth for the preterpluperfect also.

They pitched their tents therefore over against them six days, &c. ] The way, that Ahabs army went to meet with their enemies, that is, from Samaria to Aphek was 14. miles. The reason why they stayed so long, before they entered the battle, saith Martyr, might be, that the Sabbath might first come. But this is not so probable, seeing that although in case of necessity they might fight upon the Sabbath day, yet that being a day of rest, was not to be chosen for this purpose. Tostatus saith, that they exercised themselves these six dayes, that they might be the more expert: but Josephus more agreeably with the Scripture, they rested in their tents. They stayed doubtlesse to see, whether the Aramites would assault them here, that they might have the more advantage by reason of their trenches. But when they saw, that they expected the coming on of their enemies in vain, they would defer no longer, but upon the seventh day, which might as well be another day as the Sabbath, they came forth to fight, remembring happily the victory obtained against Jericho, upon the seventh. Then the Syrians joyntly battle with them, and were slain to the number of 100000. foot the same day. And such as escaped fled into the city Aphek, where a wall fell upon 27000. and slew them. These most probably were horse-men and chariot men for the most part, because no mention is expressly made of them, whereas it is certain, by that which is said before, that there were such in the army. For the manner of their destruction, it is to be thought, that when they were come into the city, some gat up on to the wals to repell the Israelites pursuing them; and others stood close by, to be the better sheltered from the enemies arrowes or darts. But that God, whom they had so blasphemed in limiting his power to mountainous places, fought against them, and finally cast the wall of the city, which they made their refuge, down upon them to their utter destruction, that all the world might know him to be the Lord, and King over all parts of the earth. Some, saith Martyr, hold, that by trenching near the wall it was made to fall, others by being over-laden with buildings: but it was truly the weight of Gods wrath for their insolency against him, happily causing an earth-quake as Martyr conjectureth, to cast these wals down. Whence note, that such as blaspheme and dishonour God can no where be safe, but even that which they flee unto and have confidence in, shall turn to their ruine. For Benhadad their king, whilst they thus miserably lay basted under the city wall, he hid himself in the most secret place that he could finde; but it is to be understood, that he did so whilst the wall was yet standing, as thinking, that he could not be safe any where else, if the Israelites should break into the city. Now the wall being down, and the city by this means coming into Ahabs power, it was thought vain for him to lurk there any longer, and that it behoved him rather to seek some other means of safety. Wherefore he sendeth some to Ahab, as they had devised, with ropes about their heads to entreat for mercy, and when they had prevailed, Benhadad cometh also to him, and upon the offer of restoring to him cities formerly taken away, and the submitting of his chief city Damascus unto him, he let him depart. But this did greatly displease the Lord: for as some Hebrew expositours say, he was bidden before not to spare his life, yet of this we reade not, onely it is certain, that he ought by the law of God to put him to death, as a blasphemour of his divine power, and because he did not, the Lord was highly offended. But what was the ground, that Benhadads men went upon, when they offered to go to Ahab for him? The kings of Israel (said they) are mercifull. Of any notable example of mercy towards an enemy amongst them we read not, but as Martyr saith, either reference was had to David and Solomon, or it is to be held, that many things were done by them which were not recorded, amongst which were their acts of mercy. And mercy, when it should be shewed to the miserable, it is a great grace in a king, that serveth God, as wherein the vice-gerent is like his lord:

lord: and therefore most probably kings of Israel were not like the heathen kings about them for barbarous crueltie, but mercifull and pittifull. And happily religion did so far yet bear sway with Ahab, although greatly corrupted with idolatrie, that clemencie did shine in him still. And if this be a note of kings of Israel, that they are mercifull to the vanquished, that are in their power; Popish rulers are not of Israel, because they are most notorious for crueltie shewed both in the West Indies, and lately in Germanie; as the tears of Germanie do declare. But mercy now was not commendable in a king of Israel, no more then in Saul towards Agag, against whom God had made so plain a demonstration, that he was for the cutting of him off, by his miraculous fighting against him both in the field and citie, as in Ioshuah his time he did against Iericho and the five Ammorite kings, of whom he would not spare one, nor yet of all the other kings, whom God brought into his power. The servants of Benhadad presuming upon Ahabs mercie, come unto him with ropes about their heads, whereby some will have meant halters about their necks, in token of their subjection to be hanged up, if he pleased, and they hereby confessed themselves to have deserved, and sackcloth about their loines, most forcible motives to pitie, neither were they deceived, for they found mercie. But here by the way, see the mutabilitie of worldlie things, Benhadad who but the year before insulted over Ahab as without all power to resist him, is now brought down before him, that he humbleth sueth for his life, to make all potentates beware how they slight the highest power, and to teach them to feare and tremble before him, as they are admonished, Pf. 2. 11. and not to be lifted up for their worldlie greatnesse, which is so vain and transitorie.

Benhadads men being now with Ahab, and having made their petition, saying, thy servant Benhadad saith, &c. watched for some word of comfort, and hearing the king say, he is my brother: they replied, instead of servant, saying, thy brother Benhadad; and so he requiring it, brought him to the king, who used him with all courtesie; whereupon he offered to restore those cities to him, which his father had taken from his father, and that he should make him streets in Damascus. A doubt here ariseth, how Benhadad could say thus; seeing in Ahabs fathers time the king of Syria took nothing from him; but in the time of Baashab his predecesour, when he came against Israel at the instigation of Asa, king of Iudah. But by his fathers predecesour is to be understood, and therefore Iosephus relateth it thus; taken from thy Ancestours, whom he succeeded in the kingdom, as a sonne doth his father, being therefore not unaptly called his father. By streets in Damascus what is meant, all are not agreed; for some saith Martyr, understand a court of judgement, which Ahab should keep there, as superiour to Benhadad; for in making him supream judge in that his chief city, he submitted all unto him; others understand a market place, wherein there should be buying and selling under him, as the Lord thereof; and he accordingly taking the toll or tribute; others understand certain streets wherein his tribute gatherers should dwell, to receive them for his use. These two last are followed by most, resolving it thus thou shalt make a market place in Damascus, and take tributes there. Iosephus, thou shalt have liberty to goe to Damascus, but this is a poore offer, and therefore too frigid; when Benhadads father made him streets in Samaria, we doe not read; but Martyr conjectureth, that it was at the time when being hired by Asa, he came against Israel, vi. 10.

Thus the heathen king to save his life made large proffers, but meant, as the Rabbins say, not to perform them, but onely to deceive Ahab; and it is certain that he did not, although before his departure he bound himselfe by oath to doe it. For hereupon arose that warre against Ramoth Gilead, wherein Ahab lost his life. ch. 22. When Ahab had shewed this facility towards the blasphemous king, and entring into league with him dismissed him; a prophet came unto him to threaten him therefore with death, but first he procured one to strike and wound him, as if he had come out of the battell, that he might not be known to Ahab, till that he had given sentence against himselfe. But before he found a man that would strike him at his bidding in Gods name, he required one to doe it, who refused; and thereupon had his judgement to be slain by a Lion, as most think; Cald. Tostat. Ioseph. Theoderet. Procopius,

Note.

Non clementia fuit, sed demencia.

Lyra. 1 Sam. 15.

Pellican.

Note.

V. 33.

V. 34.

Iosephus.

P. Martyr.

Tostat. Lyra. Hu. o. Vatablus.

V. 35.

copius, &c. yet the text saith only that he was smitten by a Lion, because he would not smite when he was bidden in the word of the Lord. Theoderet setteth the whole passage more fully thus. A certain prophet, Michaiab by name came to a certain Israelite, and bad him smite and wound him on his face; adding that God would have him doe so. But when he would not obey, the prophet threatned him; and accordingly he perished by a Lion, that met him. And this may serve for a full exposition upon this place, seeing a Lion doth never smite but unto death; and hereby a reason may be conceived of the prophets disfiguring by his wound being upon his face, when he had also strewed dust upon it, as here followeth. And if this prophet were Michaiab, we may see some reason of Ahab's speech concerning him, ch. 22. that he never prophesied good unto him. And by the example of this man smitten by a Lion, because he would not smite a good man at the word of the Lord, saith Pellican, it was taught that a wicked man ought much lesse to be spared against his will, as Ahab had done by Benhadad. When the prophet was smitten and wounded by another, he came slurred and disguised to the king, feining himselfe first to be one that came out of the camps, where one taken prisoner was committed to his custody with a charge, that if he let him goe, his life should pay for his, &c. This the king hearing presently gave judgement, as David had done before to Nathan coming in like manner to him, and then the prophet wiping away the dust, manifested himselfe, and told him plainly, that he should die for suffering Benhadad to escape. If any man shall marvaile, why he thus by dissembling first came to threaten the king, and not plainly and directly. It is answered, that he learned of Nathan to come thus parabolically; for if he had dealt plainly, and come at the first like himselfe, Ahab being conscious that he came now for no good, would not have heard him, especially being puffed up by his great victory, or else he would have been enraged against him, whereas now he was brought to give sentence against himselfe before he knew it, and so when the prophet came to deale plainly with him, was filled with confusion instead of rage, and if he raged, it was but fretting inwardly at it.

Martyr expounding this parable, saith, that by the man, who committed one taken to him to keep, is to be understood the captaine who had power; by the wound given the prophet on the head, the blow that should be given to the head of Israel; and for this cause he would go wounded before the king and bleeding, to shew, that if he must dye for suffering an escape, when he was in this case, Ahab was much more worthy to dye, who being in such case, that he could more easily have held the man appointed to be kept, did yet let him go, and that not through negligence, but advisedly making a league with him, and that when a greater then any captain had adjudged him to death, and that Ahab should hold him being in his hands, and slay him, namely the Lord, as may be gathered, v. 42. Then hast thou go a man of my accusing, איש חרמי, therefore it was some way signified unto Ahab, that he must not be spared as the king of Jericho, who was accused before, might not be, nor any of his city. Some note that חרמי signifieth also [my nor] and going according to this, that Benhadad was taken by God, as in a net, and brought to Ahab to be slain, and not by his own power. But for him that was bidden in the word of the Lord to strike the prophet and would not, being therefore by and by judged, it may seem hard, because how could he tell, that the Lord would have it so done, for even prophets of God sometime dissemble, as the old prophet of Be-thel. To satisfie this quere, Martyr thinketh, that this man knew, that it was the Lords will, seeing he is said in the vulgar Latin to have been his fellow, and in the Hebrew [his near neighbour] according to others, his sinne was, that he enquired not further about this precept, but went away as not regarding it, but the former is to be preferred. And if it be demanded why the Lord would have the prophet wounded, when as he could have otherwise disguised him? Tostatus answereth well, that he did it to exercise his obedience, and to teach us in his example, to be ready to suffer willingly to wounds and to death, when he requireth. To conclude this of the prophets threatning death to him, and his people, for dismissing Benhadad, it may be a warning to all Iudges and Kings not to save the lives of those, that ought Pellican.

V. 38.

P. Martyr.

1 King. 23.

78

ought by the law of God to dye, when they are brought before them, lest the like judgement befall them therefore to that which befell Ahab. If it be doubted, how the people could be justly punished, when the king onely sinned? The like was resolved before, upon 2 Sam. 24. they had their sinnes also, which made them guilty of death before God, and therefore his striking of them upon this occasion could not be unjust. But it seemeth that the people were spared when Ahab perished, chap. 22. For Benhadad bade his men fight, against none but the king of Israel. Ans<sup>w</sup>. They could not fight against him being in the midst of them, but many of his men must needs be smitten also, yea it may plainly be gathered, that many fell with him, because v. 35. it is said, that the warre was grievous that day, and continued till the evening, at what time Ahab died. He was forced, although deadly wounded, to abide in the battle, lest others by his fleeing should be discouraged and by fleeing also give more advantage to the enemy, while therefore they fought fiercely on both sides, and Israel was put to the worse, it could not be, but many must perish, although Martyr saith, if not now, yet afterwards this prophesie was verified upon them, viz. in Asahels time. The Rabbins, as in many other things, so in this are ridiculous, that they say, this punishment threatned against Ahabs people, was remitted for the prophets wound, who was one of them.

Ahab hearing this repented not, but went away heavey, as fearing, that it would come thus to passe, seeing this prophet had hitherto spoken truly, and enraged so farre against him, as Iosephus saith, that he cast him into prison: so, many wicked men scorn at Gods judgements, when they are threatned, not having an heart to seek by repentance to prevent them, unlesse it be haply by repentance, arising out of a slavish fear, as in Ahab afterwards, when Elijah threatned him, who is said then to have put on sack-cloth and to humble himself.

Note.

43.
Iosephus.
Note.

CHAP. XXI.

[T fell out after this, that Naboth the Iezreelite had a vineyard in Iezreel near the houses of Ahab King of Samaria.] Iosephus relateth this as done before the two victories against the Syrians, but by these words it is plain, that this happened after. It is made doubtfull, where this vineyard lay, because the Sept. have it only. Naboth the Iezreelite had a certain vineyard near the floor or house of Ahab, without shewing where it lay. And Hebr. it is a vineyard was to Naboth the Iezreelite, which was in Iezreel; where a doubt may be made, whether the word, which, should be referred to the vineyard, or to him dwelling in Iezreel, but a vineyard he might have lying elsewhere; this hath given occasion to some to place it in Samaria, but to me it seemeth plain that it lay in Iezreel, both by the words of the text, and because he was a Iezreelite that ought it, and his fathers before him, being of the tribe of Issachar; and Samaria lay 16 miles from it, happily in another tribe: wherefore it is the more improbable that Naboth had any part of his inheritance lying there, and another reason appeareth besides this, that it was the inheritance of his fathers; why he would not sell it, viz. because inheritances ought not to passe from one tribe to another. But letting this passe, by the law of God it was forbidden to sell patrimonies so, as that they might never return again. For it is said, if a man by poverty were constrained to sell, he or a near kinsman for him might at any time redeem it again; and if not, it should return in the year of Iubilee. And the reason is rendred, because the land was the Lords, and all the Israelites were but as tenants to him, and a tenant cannot put away the ground of his Land-Lord any otherwise, then he alloweth. Now the Lord allowed not any of them to put away his inheritance, but in case of poverty driving him to it, and in this case Naboth was not; and he could not without sinning yield to this request: neither because Ahab would have had it in such a manner, that there should have been no liberty of redeeming it again. Some think that Naboth was to blame for answering the king so, and not rather declaring unto him the law of God against it, and putting him in mind, that he was to rule others

V. 1.
Iosephus.

Num. ult.
Levit. 25.

Deut. 17.

1 Sam. 8. 14.

P. Martyr.
Note.

V. 4.

V. 6, 7.

V. 8, 9.

Patablus.

Testatus.
L. 12.

P. Martyr.

Iosephus.
Joel 2. 15.

Esa. 58. 4.

others according to his lawes. But what else did his answer tend unto, when he said, God forbid that I should sell, &c. He was therefore without doubt a man that feared God, and abhorred greatly from doing against his law, and Ahabs very desiring of this contrary to Gods law was a great sinne, although he would have bought and paid for it. If it be objected, Samuel told the people, that this was the manner of a king to take their olives, and vine-yards, and fields, &c. It is answered, that he meant thus many kings would do, who were wicked and tyrannicall, and not that thus they might do, for it is contrary to the duty of a king, Dent. 17. 18, 19. We may note here with Martyr, that sometime a man hath possessions in this world to his hurt, for that his life is endangered hereby, that we be not so much taken with the love and desire hereof.

Ahab being denied the vine-yard, which he so earnestly desired, and upon so equall terms, for he offered either to give the full price, or a better vine-yard for it, was so stricken, that he fell sick upon this deniall. And herein he excelled many kings, who without price will take from their subjects what they please, or upon request being denied, will presently command them to be slain. Ahab was not so tyrannicall, but thinking now, that he could by no means attain this vine-yard, which lay so conveniently for him, and being vexed at Naboths obstinacie, as thinking it a great indignity to be denied that upon entreaty, which by his regall power he could command, he fell even sick for sorrow. Then Iezabel his wife, when she had learned of him the cause, presently meditated revenge by cutting off Naboth, in which kinde of divellish cruelty against the innocent, she had been a long practitioner. And it seemeth, that although the death of Naboth onely be spoken of by and by in this history, yet she meant not to be satisfied with that onely, but of his sonnes also, because 2 King. 9. 26. they are spoken of, as slain with their father. The devillish woman hearing the cause, sought to comfort him immediately, by telling him, that she would give him Naboths vine-yard. And then she wrote Letters to the Elders of Iezrael in the kings name, to proclaim a fast, and at the assembly to place Naboth on high in a chief place, &c. Why a fast must be appointed to bring her devillish intent about may well be a question. But it is answered by some, that they used at times of fasting, to enquire out notorious wicked men, and to punish them. By others, that when any notoriously wicked were to be censured and cut off, the Iudges kept a fast, that they might not seem to give sentence out of troubled affections, but maturely, the favour and direction of God being thus first sought for. Martyr, that when a capitall crime was committed in any place, a fast was appointed, to expiate and to avert the wrath of God from that place, and then the sin was enquired into and punished, which is the most probable. Yet he saith further, that R. Kimbi expounds the word עָרַם here used, an assembly, for so it also signifieth. And if it be so taken, nothing else is meant here, but that an assembly should be called together, before which Naboth should be accused and judged, and he thinketh it indifferent to follow this or the other. Iosephus hath both, and if there were a fast, it was not without an assembly, according to that, proclaim a fast, call a solemne assembly. The same Kimbi yet rendreth it both here, and Ier. 36. 6. an assembly. But the prophet Esay seemeth to allude unto their unjust proceedings against the innocent, as usual in their fasts, saying, ye fast unto strife and debate and to strike with the fist most wickedly, wherefore it is best to follow the common exposition. This wicked woman would have an assembly called to fast, and so to proceed against Naboth, as doing herein a thing acceptable unto God. For the place, where Naboth should be set, Iosephus thinketh, that it was the most honourable, according to the dignity of his house, in which she would have him placed, and then upon his conviction pluckt out again, and stript of his honour. Others better, will have the high place, in which he was to be set, to be a place higher then others, in which they used to place the guilty, that were to be tried, that they might be seen and heard of all men, Hebr. it is בְּרוֹשָׁהּ in the head of the people, that is, on high. Then she would have two tonnes of Belial, that is, two most desperately wicked set over against him; of the word Belial, see more Dent. 13. 13. and there she would have to testifie against him, that he had blasphemed God and the king, that that so he might be stoned to death. For this was the punishment of blaspheming God, but for the King it is only forbidden to blaspheme him, Exod. 22. 28. only as he is the father of the country, and to blaspheme father or mother was death; he might thus also be thought worthy of death. The word rendred blasphemie here is blesse, he hath blessed God, &c. but the same word which signifies blessing, is put also for cursing, because the Hebrews saith Martyr, did so farre abhorre from cursing, that they would not once name it, when the cursing of God was to be spoken of. Of the like use of this word, see also Iob. 2. and the cursed hunger of gold, is in latin called auri sacra famas. The vulgar Latin according to the proper signification of the Hebrew word hath it, he blessed God and the King. So likewise the Septuagint; but Theod. saith, that, he blessed, is put for he blasphemed; Lucifer Calaritamus rendreth it, he cursed; he spake vily of God, or detractingly as Pharao sometime did, and Sanneherib afterwards. For thus, or to lift up a mans selfe, as God, is said to be a blaspheming, as it was judged to be in our Lord, and his Martyr Steven, speaking of him, as at Gods right hand. Whereas the Scripture saith, two false witnesses; Iosephus erroneously hath three; and by these Naboth being convicted, must be stoned to death, wherein what blame could light upon the King or Queen; for no man could now think, but that Naboth suffered worthily, and the King might justly seize upon his vineyard, and all his other goods also, as forfeited to the King.

According to this devillish proposition of Iezabel, there were both elders and false witnesses ready in Iezabel to execute her will, which sheweth the miserable estate of those times, and whensoever the highest authority is corrupted; for then the wicked only rise and are promoted to the order of elders and senators, and they only have favour, who are more ready to observe the King or Queen then God. Of Naboths speaking for himselfe we read nothing, nor of any for him; for it was vain when the witnesses had spoken, for any to speak; and his silence shewed his patience in suffering to his greater glory. Ambrose to honour him the more, saith that he was a Martyr, and that not untruly, because he suffered for the law of God. Naboth being dead by stoning without the city, to shew a detestation of blasphemers, as unworthy to breath in that holy place, Iezabel is soon certified of it, because she and not Abah was knowne to be the plotter of it, although the letters were written in his name. For they knew well enough, that she ruled, and did what she listed. Then she told Abah, and she without enquiring; yea happily shee told him the manner also, went to take possession of his vineyard. For if he were dead, unlesse for some capital crime, whereby his estate was forfeited to the king, his kindred or nearest kinsman should have had the inheritance after him. Martyr saith, that some hold Naboth to have been Abahs uncle, which seemeth the more probable both for the honourable place, wherein he was set at the assembly; and because his vineyard lay so near Abahs house, and therefore he and his children being slain, which is here concealed, but remembered by Iehus, 2 Kings 9. 26. it now of right fell to him. And of rejecting this conjecture I see no cause, and if hee came not thus to the vineyard, it must either be because no other man durst challenge it, knowing that it was the Kings desire, and it would be dangerous to withstand him; or because the judges that condemned Naboth and his children, gave it to the king for the blasphemy, whereby Naboth was pretended to blaspheme him. For if they would without respect to Gods law, punish children for the sinne of the father, it is not to be thought incredible, that in other things they would also do what they pleased, to humour the king. And both these opinions saith Lyra, are of the Hebrew Rabbins, let the reader follow whither he pleaseth, but he subscribeth to the first as most probable.

Then the word of the Lord came to Elijah, &c.] Abah having committed such a crying sin, which was worthy the sharpest censure of the most thundering and courageous prophet, Elijah the most zealous father of the prophets, is again sent unto him to threaten him with death, and the licking of his blood by dogs, in the place where Naboths was licked; which maketh it manifest, that Abah was ignorant of Iezabels plot, but liked well of it, and so became as guilty as shee; for to him Eli- jab

Levit. 24. 16
Exod. 21. 17.
Levit. 20. 9.

82. 22. 23. 24.
Levit. 24. 16
Exod. 21. 17.
Levit. 20. 9.

V. 11.

Ambros.

V. 14.

In Ambrose and some Greek copies, it is said that Abah hearing it rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth, but the best Greek, Hebrew, Cald, and Latin, have no such words. P. Martyr.

Lyra.

V. 17.

Tostatus. 1 Kin. 21. 20.
Lyra.
 In this place,
 saith Hu, that is, in this countrey.

1 King. 22. 38.

Lyra.

In this place,
 saith Hu, that is, in this countrey.

V. 20.

Lyra.

Note.

V. 21.

Tostatus.
P. Martyr.

The vulgar
 Latin contrary to the Hebr. If Ahab shall dye in the city, the dogs
 shall eat him; &c.
 neither is it true
 by the history, because Ahab was buried.

* V. 24.

The vulgar
 Latin contrary to the Hebr. If Ahab shall dye in the city, the dogs
 shall eat him; &c.
 neither is it true
 by the history,
 because Ahab
 was buried.
 Whereas Tosta-
tus to save all faith, that for his penitency this was remitted, he is taxed by one of his own side, Sal- ustianus who goeth from the vulgar Lat. and followeth the Hebrew herein.

jab saith, thou hast killed, &c. Tostatus also noteth, that Elijah came unto Ahab the day after Naboths death, because 2 King. 9. 26. it is said, I have seen yester-day, &c. and the evening also is there added, for they avoided the light when they slew his sonnes, lest some uproare should have been among the people upon so heinous a fact. This indeed proveth, that Ahab delayed no time, but went to Iezreel the next day, and it is not unlike but that Elijah came upon him at the instant. Whereas he saith, [in the same place the dogs shall lick] the event sheweth, that it is not to be understood of Ahabs person but of his sonne. For his blood was licked at the pool of Samaria, and his sonnes in that place, 2 King. 9. 25. so Lyra. Or by that place, according to others, may be understood the place in common extending from Samaria to Iezreel, where this murder was plotted and acted. But by the speech of Iehu, the portion of Naboth seemeth to be meant in particular, and when his sonnes bleeding body was cast there, his blood was there to be licked; but then it must be yielded, that the licking of the blood of his person is not to be excluded, his blood should be licked by the dogs then it is meant, and his blood running in the veins of his son in that very vine-yard. Martyr and Iunius without rendring מקום by the word place, expound it onely [because that] and so hold, that the shedding of his blood onely is meant, and the licking of it by dogs, as he had done to Naboth. But why then did Iehu, who best knew the meaning, cause his sonne to be cast into the portion of Naboth, when he had slain him? Wherefore the place was particularly denoted in the prophesie, and not the thing onely.

Then Ahab said, hast thou found me (O mine enemy.) Lyra following the vulgar Latin, Hast thou found me an enemy to thee? As if it were meant, did I ever any enemy-like act against thee, that thou shouldst thus threaten me? But the Hebr. and Greek have it, O mine enemy. Wherefore Ahab did not expostulate with him, as rendering unto him evil, when he had not deserved it, but shewed the malice of his own heart against Elijah, as against one that he accounted his deadly enemy. And so do all desperate wicked men all the faithfull servants of God, which reprove and threaten them for their wickedness.

The prophet replied, I have found thee, for thou hast sold thy self to do wickedly in the sight of the Lord. Meaning, that he wholly gave himself to wickedness, as a thing sold for any purpose is wholly employed that way, and was altogether in the power of sin, as that is in the buyers power, so Tostatus and Martyr. Thus the Israelites are said to be sold to sinning Esa. 50. And St. Paul saith of himself, Sold under sin Rom. 7. In the sight of the Lord is added to shew, that all the evil which he did, was taken speciall notice of by the Lord, and therefore by him he should be judged accordingly.

I will bring evil upon thee, and cut off from Ahab him that pisseth, &c. For the meaning, see before upon the like threatening against Ieroboam, chap. 14. And the dogs shall eat Iezabel in the ditch or between the wales, or in the field of Iezreel, in the Hebr. it is בִּרְחֵי, which signifieth, according to Pagninus, a fore-wall, so called because it is a lesser before the greater, which Martyr followeth and Iunius, calling it præmunisio, or a ditch between wals, or compassing the wall of a city, or according to Ioseph Kimhi a field, for he will have it to come of חֵלֶק a field, the last letter being taken away. And this seemeth to be the best, because 2 King. 9. 36. Iehu recounting this prophesie, hath it, בִּרְחֵי חֵלֶק, and there it is shewed to have been fulfilled. And this was a greater punishment then that of Ahab, as her sinne was greater: for he had a buriall, she none, he fell in the warres, she by her own attendants, being thrown down through a window as most base, and trampled under the feet of horses, to deterre all from being authours and instigatours of others to evil. * That which followeth of the dogs eating such of his, as should dye in the citie, &c. is the same, that was threatned against Baasha, chap. 16. 4. and that which is added v. 25. of his sinning more then any, that went before him, was also spoken before chap. 16. 30. Onely it is made a question by Martyr, whether these be the words of the historian, or of Elijah? but concludeth them against many other Expositours, to be the words of Elijah, whereas it seemeth to me rather, according to other Expositours, to be plainly the speech of the historian, because

cause it is in the third person, but Elijah spake in the second, unto v. 23, 24. which these words follow as an inference justifying the Lord in his proceedings against him, made not Elijah, for then he should have repeated something spoken before, but by another man, who also compareth him in his idolatries to the Amorites, who were cast out of the land; intimating that like wife both he and all his should be but justly dealt withall in being thus spued out also.

VVhen Ahab heard this he rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth, and fasted, and went softly.] The Chaldee and vulgar Latin bare footed, others hanging his head. By his going softly as the Hebrew hath it, is meant, after the manner of mourners. It strook him more to hear of the cruel destruction of his wife & family, then of the loss of his own life before; or to feel the hand of God in the long continued drought, or to see the miracle of fire sent down upon Elijah his sacrifice, or any thing else, which the Lord did miraculously for him. For he was now even overcome with terrors, this being added to the rest, & he could not but believe that it should verily come thus to passe, because he threatened it, of the truth of whose propheties he had had experience formerly. Yet his wicked heart could not be moved to true repentance, only for the fear of these judgements he sorrowed, and humbled himselfe before the Lord, as is said, v. 29. whereby is intimated, that in this mournfull manner he sought mercy and pardon at his hands, or according to Martyr, believing what was threatened from the Lord by Elijah. For by his malice against Michaiah, a prophet of the Lord declared, ch. 22. he shewed that this sorrow was not godly to repentance never to be repented of, as it is called, 2 Cor. 7. 10. but worldly; not arising out of the love and feare of God, and hatred of his sinnes, for then he would not so soon have added more sinne to his former, by imprisoning Gods prophet for telling him the truth, but only from this, that he was now like to suffer most grievous things for his wickedness, which yet he thought happily might thus be prevented, so Theoderet, Procopius, and Martyr and Pellican, call it hypocrisie. Augustine a temporany repentance. Lyra, saith, it is commonly held, that it was only a sorrow arising from fear of judgements, and whereas it may seem true repentance, because God accepted of it so far as to deferre these judgements that were temporany, therefore he saith it was not, for then it would have been of force to exempt him from eternall. Others, amongst whom is S. Augustine, that it was true repentance, but temporany; and therefore prevailed only for the deferring, not the taking away of the punishments threatened. Gregory exhorting to repentaunce saith, if Ahab pleased God because he repented for temporall judgements threatened, how much more shall they please him, who repent for that they are threatened with eternall. But Chrysostome goeth further then any, saying, that for this he had all his sinnes pardoned; of which, there is no probability for the reason before going. Yet Tostatus following him, saith it was true repentance, although he soon returned to his former vomit. To conclude, Ambrose saith rightly, even in treacherous Ahab mourning had found grace, if envie remaining had not more heaped up sin; and Gratian saith, that by the instigation of his wife, he by and by returned to his old condition and wickednesses. De panis. distinct. 3.

For this his repentance arising from feare of judgements, which lasted not; the Lord was so moved, that he promised to deferre the calamities that should come upon his house till after his death, which sheweth his pronenesse to mercy, where there is sorrow for sin unto amendment of life. For other wise the benefit is little, as unto Ahab, a deferring, but not a taking away of future judgements. And if sorrow to amendment may be wrought upon terrours or any caule, they are happy terrours; as to the jaylour, Acts 16.

Naboth by interpretation is poss. sion; Iezreel, the seed of God, according to the ordinary gloss, figuring out the sonne of God. His vineyard the Church Ahab coveted, that is, the brother of the father, as the word signifieth; and by him the Jew the brother of Christ according to the flesh is set forth to make a garden of herbs, that is, to plant in it the weeds of traditions; & when Christ withstood this, Iezabel, that is, the Synagogue plotted his destruction; and then the Jew possessed the Church by extirping justification by faith, and planting that by the works of the law, thus far the

V. 27.

Theoderet.
Procopius.
Martyr.
Pellican.
Lyra.

Gregor. in Ezek. 10.
Chrysost. de re- par. la. 1.
Tostatus.
Ambros. in ipso
perido Ahab, gemitus invenit set gratiam, nisi
manens invidia cumula set offen-
sam.

V. 29.

The Allegory.

the Ord. Gloss. But their end therefore was, as of Ahab and Iezabel, to be rooted out of that land, and to be most ignominious, as sinning in this execrable fact of theirs, viz. murdering the Lord of life, more, then any that were before them, and this judgement stayed not here, but extended to their posterity also, from generation to generation. Morally, saith Lyra, mighty men with their evill counsellours are here taxed, which seek unjustly the possessions of others. Against such the preacher ought to inveigh, and this will be the ruine of their houses, yet such as repent shall have their punishment changed from eternall to temporall.

CHAP. XXII.

V. 1.

1 Kin. 22.18.

2 Chron. 18.1.

V. 5.

Iosephus.

P. Martyr.

But they were three years without warre, &c.*] That is, since the time that Ahab had dismissed Benhadad, but now judgement so long ago threatned, beginneth to work. There being an opportunity of *Iehosaphat*s coming to visit Ahab, betwixt whom some affinity had been contracted, by his taking of Ahabs daughter Athaliah to be wife unto his sonne Ioram, he now meditates upon the going up to Ramoth Gilead, with an army to take it out of the Syrians hands, who had unjustly hitherto held it from him, contrary to his covenant made with him, when being three years before in his power, he upon such conditions let him go, as may appear ch. 20. And accordingly he moveth Iehosaphat to joyn with him in this warre, who shewed all forwardnesse therein. 2 Chron. 18. 1. Iehosaphat his contracting of this affinitie with Ahab is first spoken of, and then how that after certain years he went down to Samaria, to Ahab; the vulgar Latin more particularly hath it, after two yeares, at whose coming he killed sheep and oxen very many, &c. and then perswaded him to go up to Ramoth Gilead with him. This good king therefore having already committed one error, in contracting affinitie with wicked Ahab, now by his flattery and kindnesse to him and his followers, is drawn in to another, viz. to joyn with him in fighting against the Syrians, as being all one with him: for that he sinned herein, see ch. 19. 1, 2.

But whereas Ahab would have gone to this warre without seeking to the Lord first, Iehosaphat desireth him to enquire by a prophet, before they went forth, of the successe. Yet Iosephus saith, that this was not done till their armies were met at Samaria, and having received their pay from both the kings, were ready to march on. And if it were so, as probably it was, for having heard by the Lords prophet, that this expedition should be to Ahabs destruction, they went on notwithstanding. Iehosaphat was herein to blame also, as enquiring pro forma tantum, but intending to proceed howsoever. Some there are, saith Martyr, that lay another fault upon him, that he brake the league made by his father Asa with the king of Syria, to gratifie Ahab; and some lately blame him for not bringing some Prophets or Priests of his own with him, when hee came down to Samaria; with whom he might have consulted: for kings, saith Martyr, should alwayes have such about them, both to perform holy duties at their courts, and to advise with about things pertaining to piety. But to the first of these it may be said, that he was not tied by any league made by his father with an idolatrous king, and an enemy to the people of God. To the second, that Iehosaphat knew not of this warre, when he took his journey to Samaria, and therefore brought no prophet with him, yet it is not to be thought, but that he had some priests attending upon him, who could not yet give answer to this quere, unless the Ephod had bin there, or some one, by whom God used to reveal his will and purpose, in doubtful matters. And there are that justifie Iehosaphat in his contracting of the affinitie aforesaid, because Ahab had repented, and he thinking it to be in truth, did not now take him to be one, with whom he might not joyn in affinitie, but thought it most convenient, for the settling of peace between their two kingdoms thus to do. And presuming upon this, that he had by repentance made his peace with God, he doubted not of the lawfulness of joyning with him in a just warre, such as this was, viz. for the the recovering of a city belonging to Israel out of the hands of the heathen. But because this is censured, 2 Chron. 19. 1, 2. and Ahab is there called the wicked, and enemy to God, it is plain, that Iehosaphat faulted, neither was he moved by any other consideration but in humane policie to joyn thus with Ahabs house, but the ill successe hereof may be a warning to all godly kings, that none of them ever do the like.

Vpon Iehosaphats motion to enquire, Ahab calleth together 400. prophets, which most probably were those prophets of Baal, who did eat bread at Iezabels table, and escaped, when as many more, yea a greater number by 50. were cut off by Elijah. Yet Iehosaphat doubtlesse thought them to be prophets of the Lord, because they used his name, and were brought before him as his prophets, for such he enquired after, and when he suspected them as consenting to flatter Ahab, he asked, whether there were not one prophet of the Lord more. And if they had not made a shew of being such, certainly this good king would never have heard them. Of these Ahab enquired, whether he should goe up to Ramoth Gilead, that is, Ramoth a city in Gilead belonging to the tribe of Gad, on the other side of Iordan, bordering upon the Syrians; and therefore it was a city, which Benhadad was most unwilling to part of all others that he held in the land of Israel; howsoever say, that he restored not this unto Ahab, because it was not taken away by his father, but had bin long before his time in the possession of the Syrians, & it was a city of refuge, and belonged to the Priestrs, being called Ramoth Gilead, to distinguish it from another Ramah, which lay in Issachar. And Iosephus saith, that it was taken from Amri Ahabs father, by the father of this Benhadad. But seeing the Syrians were mightier then Israel, and could raise farre greater armies, as may be gathered from the premises; what was it that Ahab trusted to, that he adventured to move war now against them? Ans. Both his good successe in two precedent battels, and the accession of Iehosb. army, who was a most mighty King. The false prophets answer al with one consent, go up and prosper for the Lord wil deliver it into the kings hand. Wherein Lyra and after him Martyr taxeth them for ambiguous speaking, like unto the Oracle to the king of the Epirots, Pirrhus, that went against the Romans; Aio te Acida Romanos vincere posse: and that to Chræsus, that if he passed over the river Haly, he should overthrow a very great kingdome, which might bee understood as well of his own, as of another man. But the answer of these false prophets was nothing like these, seeing they first spake prosperity unto him. 2. By the king, into whose hand it should be delivered was plainly meant Ahab, and not the king of Syria, because it was in his hand already. Iehosaphat not being satisfied with this answer, as one suspecting these of sycophancy, asketh after some other prophet of the Lord, or happily knowing by this time, as Pellican hath it, that they were no prophets of the Lord, but of Baal, although they used the Lords name, he required a Prophet of the Lord indeed to be brought before him, who would give a true answer, upon which he might depend. Ahab said that there was one, but whom he hated, because he alwayes prophesied evill to him; yet at the importunity of Iehosaphat he was brought, and inquired of the messenger that went for him, advising him by the way to speak good, as the other Prophets had done; and Zedechiab especially, who made him iron hornes saying, with these thou shalt push the Aramites, untill thou hast destroyed them. But Michaiab nothing moved hereby, professed to speak only that, which God should put into his mouth. In that Ahab saith of Michaiab, that he never spake good unto him; some gather, that it was he as hath been before said, that in a disguise had threatned Ahab 3 yeares before, that his life should goe for Benhadads, whom he had spared. And therefore now he verily expected to heare the like again, from which he was most averse; being willing rather to rest in the counsell of such, as spake pleasing things to him, although to his destruction, then to heare one speaking the truth, whereby he might have been preserved. And yet, as Pellican and some others have it, he had twice before prophesied good unto him, for they would have him to have been the Prophet, that told him, that the Syrians should be given into his hands; but because he once threatned him, after that he hated him. So if the servants of God do not alwayes speak good unto

M m

V. 6.

Lyra.
P. Martyr.V. 7.
V. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.

Pellican.

the Ord. Gloss. But their end therefore was, as of Ahab and Iezabel, to be rooted out of that land, and to be most ignominious, as sinning in this execrable fact of theirs, viz. murdering the Lord of life, more, then any that were before them, and this judgement stayed not here, but extended to their posterity also, from generation to generation. Morally, saith Lyra, mighty men with their evill counsellours are here taxed, which seek unjustly the possessions of others. Against such the preacher ought to inveigh, and this will be the ruine of their houses, yet such as repent shall have their punishment changed from eternall to temporall.

CHAP. XXII.

V. 1.

1 Kin. 22.18.

2 Chron. 18.1.

But they were three years without warre, &c.*] That is, since the time that Ahab had dismissed Benhadad, but now judgement so long ago threatned, begetteth to work. There being an opportunity of *Iehosaphat*s coming to visit Ahab, betwixt whom some affinity had been contracted, by his taking of Ahabs daughter Athaliah to be wife unto his sonne Ioram, he now meditates upon the going up to Ramoth Gilead, with an army to take it out of the Syrians hands, who had unjustly hitherto held it from him, contrary to his covenant made with him, when being three years before in his power, he upon such conditions let him go, as may appear ch. 20. And accordingly he moveth Iehosaphat to joyn with him in this warre, who shewed all forwardnesse therein. 2 Chron. 18. 1. Iehosaphat his contracting of this affinity with Ahab is first spoken of, and then how that after certain years he went down to Samaria, to Ahab; the vulgar Latin more particularly hath it, after two yeares, at whose coming he killed sheep and oxen very many, &c. and then perswaded him to go up to Ramoth Gilead with him. This good king therefore having already committed one errour, in contracting affinity with wicked Ahab, now by his flattery and kindnesse to him and his followers, is drawn into another, viz. to joyn with him in fighting against the Syrians, as being all one with him: for that he sinned herein, see ch. 19. 1, 2.

V. 5.

Iosephus.

P. Martyr.

But whereas Ahab would have gone to this warre without seeking to the Lord first, Iehosaphat desireth him to enquire by a prophet, before they went forth, of the successe. Yet Iosephus saith, that this was not done till their armies were met at Samaria, and having received their pay from both the kings, were ready to march on. And if it were so, as probably it was, for having heard by the Lords prophet, that this expedition should be to Ahabs destruction, they went on notwithstanding. Iehosaphat was herein to blame also, as enquiring pro forma sanctorum, but intending to proceed howsoever. Some there are, saith Martyr, that lay another fault upon him, that he brake the league made by his father Asa with the king of Syria, to gratifie Ahab; and some lastly blame him for not bringing some Prophets or Priests of his own with him, when hee came down to Samaria; with whom he might have consulted: for kings, saith Martyr, should alwayes have such about them, both to perform holy duties at their courts, and to advise with about things pertaining to piety. But to the first of these it may be said, that he was not tied by any league made by his father with an idolatrous king, and an enemy to the people of God. To the second, that Iehosaphat knew not of this warre, when he took his journey to Samaria, and therefore brought no prophet with him, yet it is not to be thought, but that he had some priests attending upon him, who could not yet give answer to this quere, unless the Ephod had bin there, or some one, by whom God used to reveal his will and purpose, in doubtfull matters. And there are that justifie Iehosaphat in his contracting of the affinity aforesaid, because Ahab had repented, and he thinking it to be in truth, did not now take him to be one, with whom he might not joyn in affinity, but thought it most convenient, for the settling of peace between their two kingdoms thus to do. And presuming upon this, that he had by repentance made his peace with God, he doubted not of the lawfulness of joyning with him in a just warre, such as this was, viz. for the

the recovering of a city belonging to Israel out of the hands of the heathen. But because this is censured, 2 Chron. 19. 1, 2. and Ahab is there called the wicked, and enemy to God, it is plain, that Iehoshaphat faulted, neither was he moved by any other consideration but in humane policie to joyn thus with Ahabs house, but the ill successe hereof may be a warning to all godly kings, that none of them ever do the like.

Vpon Iehoshaphats motion to enquire, Ahab calleth together 400. prophets, which most probably were those prophets of Baal, who did eat bread at Iezabels table, and escaped, when as many more, yea a greater number by 50. were cut off by Elijah. Yet Iehoshaphat doubtlesse thought them to be prophets of the Lord, because they used his name, and were brought before him as his prophets, for such he enquired after, and when he suspected them as consenting to flatter Ahab, he asked, whether there were not one prophet of the Lord more. And if they had not made a shew of being such, certainly this good king would never have heard them. Of these Ahab enquired, whether he should goe up to Ramoth Gilead, that is, Ramoth a city in Gilead belonging to the tribe of Gad, on the other side of Iordan, bordering upon the Syrians; and therefore it was a city, which Benhadad was most unwilling to part of all others that he held in the land of Israel; howsoever say, that he restored not this unto Ahab, because it was not taken away by his father, but had bin long before his time in the possession of the Syrians, & it was a city of refuge, and belonged to the Piestrs, being called Ramoth Gilead, to distinguish it from another Ramah, which lay in Issachar. And Iosephus saith, that it was taken from Amri Ahabs father, by the father of this Benhadad. But seeing the Syrians were mightier then Israel, and could raise farre greater armies, as may be gathered from the premises; what was it that Ahab trusted to, that he adventured to move war now against them? Ans. Both his good successe in two precedent battels, and the accession of Iehosb. army, who was a most mighty King. The false prophets answered all with one consent, go up and prosper for the Lord wil deliver it into the kings hand. Wherein Lyra and after him Martyr taxeth them for ambiguous speaking, like unto the Oracle to the king of the Epirots, Pirrhus, that went against the Romans; Aio te Eacida Romanos vincere posse: and that to Chresus, that if he passed over the river Haly, he should overthrow a very great kingdome, which might bee understood as well of his own, as of another man. But the answer of these false prophets was nothing like these, seeing they first spake prosperity unto him. 2. By the king, into whose hand it should be delivered was plainly meant Ahab, and not the king of Syria, because it was in his hand already. Iehosaphat not being satisfied with this answer, as one suspecting these of sycophancy, asketh after some other prophet of the Lord, or happily knowing by this time, as Pellican hath it, that they were no prophets of the Lord, but of Baal, although they used the Lords name, he required a Prophet of the Lord indeed to be brought before him, who would give a true answer, upon which he might depend. Ahab said that there was one, but whom he hated, because he alwayes prophesied evill to him; yet at the importunity of Iehosaphat he was brought, and inquired of the messenger that went for him, advising him by the way to speak good, as the other Prophets had done; and Zedechiab especially, who made him iron hornes saying, with these thou shalt push the Aramites, untill thou hast destroyed them. But Michaiab nothing moved hereby, professed to speak only that, which God should put into his mouth. In that Ahab saith of Michaiab, that he never spake good unto him; some gather, that it was he as hath been before said, that in a disguise had threatned Ahab 3 yeares before, that his life should goe for Benhadads, whom he had spared. And therefore now he verily expected to heare the like again, from which he was most averse; being willing rather to rest in the counsell of such, as spake pleasing things to him, although to his destruction, then to heare one speaking the truth, whereby he might have been preserved. And yet, as Pellican and some others have it, he had twice before prophesied good unto him, for they would have him to have been the Prophet, that told him, that the Syrians should be given into his hands; but because he once threatned him, after that he hated him. So if the servants of God do not alwayes speak good unto

Mm

V. 6.

Lyra.
*P. Martyr.*V. 7.
V. 8, 9, 10, 11,
12, 13.Pellican.

2<sup>o</sup> 12.

unto the wicked, they are by them accounted, as never speaking good, and therefore hated of them. The good king Iehosaphat hearing Ahab say, that he hated him because he never spake good unto him; thought that no just cause of hatred, because Prophets must speak what God putteth into their mouthes, be it good or evil; and therefore he said, Let not the king say so. whereas Ahab spake of Michaiah, as if he were the only Prophet that remained, it is to be understood, that none but he was near, viz. as dwelling in Samaria, for Elijah was still living, and many Prophets more in Israel; but it is most probable, that he knew not where to find them, as being hid from the rage of Iezabel. Only by a singular providence Michaiah was preserved near unto him, and was endued with such courage, as that no fear could make him to hide his head, or to refrain from speaking against Ahab in his wickedness. And in that now, after his humiliation he saith, that he never spake good unto him; it appeareth, that Ahab's repentance was not true, but that he persisted in his wickedness unto the end, seeing the Prophet would not certainly have spoken evil to him alwayes, but because he alwayes did evil.

Lyra.

Touching the iron hornes of Zedekiah, he imitated in this the true prophets of God, saith Lyra, who to move men the more, added unto the word which they spake, outward sensible signes sometimes, as Jeremiah, a yoke put about his neck.

V. 15.

Michaiah being brought unto the king answered first, as the other false prophets had done; goe up and prosper, &c. But uttering these words in such an ironical manner, that it might easily be perceived, that he meant nothing lesse. Some hold, saith Martyr, that he spake thus, as a man, and lead only by his private opinion, it being not yet revealed unto him what to answer; as it was not to Nathan, when David first enquired of him about building a temple: others, that he spake by way of wishing, but he preferreth the first, as truest. For an irony is not perceived so much by the words spoken, as by the manner of speaking; as when Elijah said to Baals prophets, cry a loud, surely he is a God, &c. The unanimous consent of 400, did nothing move Michaiah to goe against the truth, as it ought not to move us, that many hundreds sometimes assembled in councell by the Pope or wicked Rulers, have consented together to determine falsehoods; for if there be but one only that can speak the contrary in the word of the Lord, it is rather to be embraced, then the consenting determinations of many hundreds speaking against it.

P. Martyr.

V. 16.

The King said unto him, how oft shall I adjure thee, to speak nothing but the truth, &c. Here it is manifest, that Ahab well perceived that Michaiah had hitherto only repeated the words of the false prophets, and not spoken any thing as from the Lord, that they might ground upon; for when any prophet did so, he used to say, thus saith the Lord. wherefore, he adjured him to tell him the truth, whatsoever it was; and not to delay him with his mocks. For he apprehended him speaking, as if he had said, seeing you would have me say, as these 400 prophets; I say so too, but your expedition shall be never a whit the more prosperous for this. Whereas he speaketh of adjuring him often; Martyr thinketh that he did it once, but then the prophet had his vision, which he by and by declareth; for as he was coming, it seemeth that it was not revealed unto him, in that he said, whatsoever the Lord shall speak unto me, that will I say. Being for a while then taken up with the vision, he did forbear to answer the king, although he happily adjured him once or twice in that time to speak. Wherefore he said now again, how oft shall I adjure thee. The vulgar Latin leaveth no doubt at all here; rendering it; iterum atque iterum, adjuro te. But in the Hebrew it is, as before; the meaning yet happily being, as the Latin translation hath it by an Hebrew Idiom: the Septuagint, ἐν δεσποσύνῃ σου, but trans. Ald. ποσύνῃ σου.

V. 17.

Then he said, I saw all Israel dispersed, &c. as sheep having no shepherd, &c. Mystically the death of Ahab was by this vision set forth, and the flying of his people before the Syrians, as overcome by them. For the king was their shepherd, of whom it is said, that they had none; that is, because he was wounded deadly, and could lead them no more, the army was the sheep scattered on the mountaines, when they fled upon those montanous places of Ramoth, and they were chased by their their enemies the Syrians, and they were bidden to return home, when by proclamation thus much was said, v. 30. Iunius rendereth it in the future tense, vidi omnem Iherusalem dispersum iri.] But whereas it is said, Let them return home in peace; a question is moved, how it could be said thus of a people overcome, many of them being cut off, as was noted before, upon ch. 20, 38, 39, &c. Iunius saith, letting passe all further thought of warre; Martyr, the people did not now perish, but Ahab onely; so likewise, Pellican, Lyra, &c. therefore saith Lyra, when it was threatned, ch. 20. Thy life shall goe for his life, and thy people for his people; it is not said, the life of thy people, but thy life only; and the people for his people, by being made shamefully to flye, terrified, and dispersed. If it be understood according to the exposition going before, upon ch. 20. although many were slain with Ahab, the rest might be said to return in peace, because the death of Ahab being knowne, against whom only the Syrians fought, they pursued not his army flying, but let them goe, as if they were no longer enemies to them; so that although whilst they were in battell, they went by the worst, yet now all fighting being at an end, they returned as in a time of peace, every man to his own place.

Ahab hearing this was offended, as presently apprehending the meaning, and said unto Iehosaphat, did not I tell thee, that he never prophesieth good, but evil unto me? Thus perswading the good king, that he prophesied not truly, but out of malice against him so Lyra. And hereby Iehosaphat was also lead, to the endangering of his own life, which was another fault in him, as Martyr noteth; and Ahab by the judgement of God was carried on headlong against the knowne truth to his owne destruction, who might happily, if he had harkened to the Prophet, have escaped longer. But by this it appeareth, that Gods threatnings shall take effect, and rather then not, the wicked shall be authors to themselves of their own ruine.

Again, Michaiah said, heare the word of the Lord, I saw the Lord sitting upon his throne, and all the hoste of heaven, &c.] The meaning is, that he saw him in some similitude thus represented to his phantalic, as Esai. 6. it is like wise said, and by Amos, for no man can see God and live; but in some representation made to Michaiah of Gods sitting upon his throne, and all the host of heaven standing about him on the right hand, and on the left.] Per Anthropopatheian, for God properly sitteth not, neither hath the right hand or left, as men; but herein he applyeth himselfe to our understanding, as also in his consulting with them, which followeth, v. 20. Who shall deceive Ahab, that he may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead, &c. For in saying thus, he did but as our Lord afterwards consulted with Philip, how he should doe to feed the people that followed him in the wilderness, who knew well enough before he asked, what he would doe, For God needs no counsellours, which argueth want of understanding, but he said thus, to shew that all his doings are guided by counsell, and so shall certainly attain their end propounded. And in shewing himselfe sitting upon a throne with his host about him, he gave the kings to understand his supream power over all earthly Princes; they sate each one upon his throne, but here was a throne of farre greater Majesty, ruling over all, and judging other thrones at his pleasure, and having about him an hoste sufficient to execute his will, whatsoever it should be. In saying that this hoste stood on his right hand and on his left, it is not meant that they were good and evill Angels; for it was onely the hoste of heaven that stood thus, and to stand on either side to minister to the Lord, as here is meant, is an honour, as is intimated by the saying of Christ to the two sons of Zebedee, to sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, but my Fathers.

The evill spirit then, which is said to have come forth and stood before the Lord, is none of that hoste, but Satan, who appeareth sometimes amongst the holy Angels,

Iunius.
Omissa belli co- gitatione.
Pellican.
Lyra.

V. 18.

Lyra.
P. Martyr.

Note.

V. 19.

Ahab 7.

V. 20.

Matth. 20. 23.

V. 22.

Job. 8. 44.

V. 22.

Qu.

Theoderet.
Procopius.
Tostatus.

as a jaylour or hangman, at the court to execute the kings will. For although he be not here called an evil spirit, yet because he said he would be a lying spirit in the mouth of Ahabs prophets, we may certainly gather, that he was none of the heavenly hoste, to whom lying agreeth not, but the devill, who also came and stood amongst the good angels, Iob. 1. 6. and is said to have been a lyer and murtherer from the beginning.

This lyer then was he, that said, he would be a lying spirit in their mouth, which the Lord also bade him do and prevail. Vpon this a great question ariseth, whether God be not then the authour of sin, seeing he biddeth the evil spirit, to cause Ahabs prophets to speak lies, which to do was sinne both in him and them? To this Theoderet and Procopius and after them Tostatus answer, that Gods bidding here is to be understood of nothing else but his permitting him, that was ready enough and offered without bidding, to do it, as the thing, that he longeth always to be practising. If it shall seem that his bidding and promising successe, seemeth to imply more then a permission, for no judge doth so commit a malefactor to his executioner, but charging and commanding it to be done. It is answered, that this circumlocution is made onely to set forth the certainty of Ahabs destruction, and the means of effecting it, as surely, as if God, who hath all power and cannot be frustrated in any designe of his, had commanded it thus to be done. How farre forth god worketh in sin, see my exposition on Rom. 9. The conceit of R. Solomon here, that this spirit was the spirit of Naboth is vain, and therefore well rejected by Lyra, because it belongeth to the evil spirit to utter lies, by the mouth of false prophets, and not to the spirits of the just, such as Naboth was. Of which, and of the souls of the faithfull departed out of this life, that they wander not about upon earth, but that such apparitions are diabolical delusions, see Martyr more largely upon this place.

V. 24.

Zidkiah one of the false prophets and a chief, as it seemeth amongst them, took it most heinously, that he, who had expressed himself not onely by word, but by signe, should now be accounted a lyar, and therefore he smote Michaiah on the cheek. Iosephus saith, that he added two arguments to disprove the prophesie of Michaiah; first, because Elijah had fore-told, that the dogs should lick Ahabs bloud, where they had licked Naboths, that is, in Iezreel, which was farre from Ramoth Gilead. Secondly, because he had smitten Michaiah with his hand, and yet it withered not, as it would have done, if Michaiah had been a true prophet of God, seeing the hand of Ieroboam being but stretched out against a prophet of God, withered immediatly.

V. 25.

P. Martyr.

Michaiah guided by the spirit, replied; Behold, thou shalt see the day, when thou shalt go from chamber to chamber, to hide thee. Which was, as Martyr saith, according to some, when Ahabs sonne returning from the warre after his fathers death, sought to slay him, and yet he could not so escape neither; according to others, the kings friends sought him to kill him for his vain prophesying, whereby he had stirred up the king to hasten to his own ruine.

V. 26.

Iosephus.

2 Chron. 18. 20.

Then Ahab said, take Michaiah, and carry him back to Amon prince of the city, &c. By this it seemeth, that Michaiah was in prison before, ever since he threatned Ahab with death, for letting Benhadad the king of Syria go. Thus also Iosephus saith, and that when the king sent for him, he was fetcht out of prison to come before him. And now Ahab being offended at his prophesying, sendeth him thither again, and biddeth to feed him with a little bread and water, to sustain his life, that he might be preserved unto greater misery at his return, and yet be kept hungry all that time: for which, this little bread and water, is here called bread and water of affliction. For [Ioas the kings sonne] which was one of them, to whom Michaiah was sent back, the vulgar Latin hath [Ioas the sonne of Amaleck] rendering the word המלך as a proper name; and this seemeth to be best, both because if Ioas had been the kings sonne, he should have been named first, as the chief, and because of a Ioas sonne to Ahab, we read not after wards, but onely of Ahaziah and Ioram. Yet the Septuagint render it also the kings sonne, and Iuminus, Martyr, &c.

Michaiah

Michaiab nothing danted by his punishment and the kings threats implied, when he should return in peace, answered, If thou return in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me adding moreover, [Hear all ye people.] As if he had said, mark what I say, and if it falleth out accordingly, know these to be all false prophets, and me to be the true prophet of the Lord. For when that which a prophet threatneth cometh to passe, he is approved to be a true prophet of the Lord, if there be an adverse party promising the contrary, as also it was in the dayes of Jeremiah, when Hamani prophesied against him, and in the dayes of Moses, when Chorab conspired against him. For out of this case sometime the prophesying of true Prophets hath not taken effect, as when Esay prophesied the death of Hezekiah, and Ionab the destruction of Niniveh within 40. dayes; and contrariwise the prophesying of a false prophet may come to passe, as the case is put Deut. 13. and then a false prophet may be known onely by this, that he seeketh to set up idolatry.

V. 28.

Jerem. 28.

The two kings, notwithstanding the threats of the Prophet, go up to Ramoth Gilead, and there the king of Israel useth a policie, according to Martyr, to frustrate the prophesie of Michaiab, viz. by changing his habit, and entering into the battle like a common souldier. For he conceived, that not the souldiers, who went with him, but he alone should perish, according to this prophesie, but being disguised he should by no means be known to the enemy, and so hoped to escape. Others, he saith, suppose, that he heard that Benhadad had bent his forces against him onely, therefore he would not be known, but Iehoshaphat not being so much hated of him, might safely enough be in the battle in his kingly ornaments: and some, that he did thus for honours sake unto Iehoshaphat, and that both the armies might be as one fighting under one king, that their forces might be the more united, but the first or second seem most probable.

V. 29, 30.
P. Martyr.

Howsoever, by this means Iehoshaphat was endangered, when the captains of the chariots did bend all their forces against him, as they were commanded, supposing him to be the king of Israel, against whom alone they were bidden to fight, untill that by his crying out they perceived that he was not the king of Israel. 2 Chron. 18. 31. it is said, that He cried and the Lord did help him. Whereby is intimated, that he cried to the Lord, and hereby the Lord made the Syrians to understand, that he was not the king whose life they sought, that they might cease from pursuing him, and this was doubtlesse by making them to gather from his calling upon the Lord, that he was not Ahab, seeing he was not a worshipper of the Lord, but of idols. But why did Benhadad, whom Ahab had formerly saved, when he was in his power, thus earnestly seek his destruction? R. Solomon, whom Lyra followeth, saith, he had secret intelligencers, who informed him of Michaiab his prophesie, and therefore he conceived, that Ahab being cut off, this battle would soon be at an end, and that he might not escape, he thought it necessary not to let his souldiers fight against the whole army of Israel indifferently, but to command them to joyn all their forces together against Ahab alone, lest while they were busied in fighting against others he should escape. Pellican yieldeth none other reason, but the providence of God, which he makes the mightiest kings and all men to serve, although they know it not. For as if the king of Syria had been particularly directed by God, he gave this charge to his captaines against Ahab; and thus also a righteous king, whose life was endangered, was saved, the Lord contenting himself onely to put him in fear of death for his chastisement, for joyning with a wicked king in fight, and before that in affinity and amity. Martyr also resteth, onely in this of Gods providence, and certainly that of the Rabbin is onely a conjecture; and to ascribe it wholly to the divine providence, is to attribute more to God, and to make his working in mens hearts the more admirable; then to yield a reason, whereby Benhadad was moved to give this charge. Yet besides the divine providence working secretly, Benhadad certainly had his reason, viz. to be revenged for the shame, that Ahab had put him to, when he had been three times before beaten by him, and specially the last, to the compelling of him basely to beg for his life, and to yield to ignoble termes, that it might be spared. For disgraces do work more upon a naturall heart to stirre up to revenge, then the very saving

V. 32.

Lyra.

Pellican.

P. Martyr.

V. 34.

Note.

Iosephus.

V. 35.

V. 36.

V. 39.

V. 41.

2 Chron. 20. 31.

1 Kin. 15.

of life to be thankfull. Whilest Gods providence wrought to the saving of Iehoshaphat's life; who was most exposed to danger; Ahab, who thought himself by the changing of his habit out of danger, was accidentally wounded unto death, by an arrow from a Syrians bow; to shew, that no policie can save him from death, whom for his sinnes God hath adjudged to it, or keep the predictions of God from taking effect. So Pharaoh king of Egypt laboured in vain to keep the Hebrews continually under, who, he understood by prophesie, should be the ruine of his country; and Ioseph's brethren to keep him from rising, which God had fore-shewed; & Saul to keep David from being king. Thus Ahab's threats against Michaiab were at an end, as afterwards Julians against Christians, who threatned, that at his return from an expedition against the Persians, he would root them all out, but he also was slain by a dart in that warre, which wounded him mortally, it being not known from what hand it came. Iosephus saith, that he who wounded Ahab, was Amannus by name, one of the servants of Adad, for so he calleth Benhadad. Then he commanded the driver of his chariot to drive him out of the battle, but he abode still in the field that his army might not be discouraged, till the going down of the sun, at what time, his strength being spent by the abundance of blood which ran from him, he died. Thus Iosephus; who also saith, that the arrow pierced him to his lungs, not without ground from the sacred history. But whereas he saith, that Ahab told Iehoshaphat, that he had before committed Michaiab to prison for prophesying against his going up to Ramoth Gilead, is an addition boldly made of his own head.

For the time when Ahab died, it is said to have been in the evening, but 1 Chr. 18. 34. He stood in his chariot untill the evening, and died at the going down of the sun. And here it followeth, about the sun-setting proclamation was made, that every man should return to his city, &c. that is, immediatly after his departure; which must therefore needs be somewhat before the sun-setting. And thus both parts of Michaiab's prophesie were fulfilled; Ahab, the shepherd fell, and the people, that followed him to warre, were scattered as sheep, and bidden to return home in peace: seeing they were neither beaten home by the Syrians, nor pursued by them in their return. And the prophesie of Elijah was fulfilled, when his bloody chariot being washed in the pool of Samaria, the dogs licked it: for how the prophesie, that in the place, where the dogs licked Naboth's blood, they should lick Ahab's also, was thus fulfilled (seeing Naboth's was licked in Iezreel, this means in Samaria) was before shewed in explaining that prophesie: although Iosephus to prevent this doubt, saith, that it was done at the pool in Iezreel.

What Ahab did more, and the ivory house which he built, and the cities, are they not written, &c. The bookes of the Chronicles of the kings of Iudah and Israel, wherein these things are said to have been written, are not now extant, neither were they any part of the sacred history, which was written by divine inspiration; that we might believe, but onely annals of those kingdomes, as there be almost of all others.

The history of the kings of Iudah being hitherto intermitted, from ch. 13. 24. all but so much as concerned Iehoshaphat joyntly with Ahab, is now entered upon again, v. 41. Iehoshaphat the sonne of Asa began to reign over Iudah, the 4. year of Ahab, &c. A good sonne of a good father, but yet as he was not, so neither was Iehoshaphat without his faults; he hearts of them both were upright and they did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and both took away the masculine whores in the land, but the sonne exceeded the father, in that he suffered none to remain. Yet some, saith Martyr, think that Asa took them not all away, because he was prevented by death. Their faults were, that they suffered the people to sacrifice in the high places, and as the father in his need entered into a league with the king of Syria an idolater, that he might help him against the king of Israel, so the son made a league with the idolatrous king of Israel, Ahab, and help him against the king of Syria. What the high places were, and the masculine harlots, see before, upon the history of Asa, and how the son excelled the father in that he repented, when he was reprov'd for his league with the wicked, 2 Chron. 19. but the father was wroth when he was reprov'd, and put the prophet in prison.

The

The history of Iehosaphat here briefly delivered, is more largely set forth, 2 Chron. 17. 1. only it is here said, when he began his reign, which is not there, viz. the 4th. year of Ahab, and at what age, viz. 35. and how long he reigned; viz. 25. and what his mothers name was: viz. Azubah the daughter of Salai.] Yet all this is set forth, 2 Chron. 20. 31. and also some more of that, which is here briefly said of him, unto which more is added towards the end of his reign. For the time set forth by Ahabs 4th year, it may be doubted, seeing he reigned 22. and therefore Iehosaphat 18. with him, and yet Ioram, betwixt whom, and Ahab came Ahaziah, began the 18. Iehosaphat; 2 King. 3. 1. Sol. Ahabs 4th was even then at end, and his 22 not compleat, and Ahaziah reigned, together with his father so long, that although he dyed not till the second year, yet it was the same, wherein his father was slain. In the Chronicles then is set forth the full history of Iehosaphat, this brieft in the Kings, and his going forth with Ahab to warre against Ramoth Gilead, not being omitted.

And here he is said first to have confirmed himselfe over Israel, the vulgar Latine invaluit contra Israel.] The meaning is, that his kingdome soone after his coming to it grew farre mightier then that of Israel. And how this was is shewed, v. 2. he placed souldiers in all the cities of Iudab, &c. and thus hee strengthened them after the manner of Rehoboam, 2 Chron. 11. 11. Neither did his might consist in this alone, but he laid a better foundation, then the king of Israel, for he walked in the wayes of David his father, and trusted not in Baal, but in the God of his father, and so God was with him, &c. And from the people of Iudab he had many gifts given him, and waxed very rich and glorious; And he took away the high places and groves out of Iudab.] Contrary to this it is said, ch. 20. 33. They took not away the high places, for the people had not yet directed their heart to the God of their fathers.

But the like contradiction to this hath been reconciled before upon ch. 14. 3. unto which it may be added, that the fault was not in the good king, that any high places stood still, but in the people, who are said not to have taken away the high places, because their hearts were not right. The king was reputed to have taken them away, because he endeavoured and gave order, that it should so be done; but the corruption of the people permitted it not, they were so wedded to their old customes, and without his subjects and officers, how can a king actually perform any such great work? in such cases he must rather wisely beare with the people, then strive against them to the endangering of the whole kingdome.

And in the third year of his reign, he sent of his Princes Benbail, &c. to teach in the cities of Iudab, and with them Levites and Priests.] These words do shew, that not only Levites and Priests were sent to teach the people, but also some Princes; whereas it is conceived by Expositours generally, that these Princes went not forth to teach, but by their authority to move the people the more to obey the teaching of the Priests and Levites, and to come to hear them. Only Tostatus, as the words doe sound, saith, that other men being not of the tribe of Levi, who had learning, might also teach in those dayes. But because of hereticks, the office of teaching since was by Christ tyed to certain men, who are particularly called hereunto. And Sallianus following him instanceth in the prophets which taught, who were not of the tribe of Levi. I hold with the common stream of interpreters, that it is not meant that these Princes were sent out to teach in their own persons, but by those whom they carried with them, to make which plain, Iunius rendreth the words thus. He sent with his Princes, &c, these Levites I say with them. Although the Hebrew text, I confesse, will not beare this translation, because it is not עם שרי but שרי but yet the word following, [so teach] wil bear this translation; for the teaching, that is, that they might see them taught. For the Priests slips must preserve knowledge, and they must enquire the law at his mouth, saith the prophet, and if any, that were not of the tribe of Levi taught; it was not, because it was free for any that had learning so to doe, but because they were extraordinarily stirred up by the spirit of prophesie, so as we never read of many Princes, but of some rare ones onely, as David and Solomon; and therefore here being many named together, it is not probable, that they were such, but onely godly Princes, like Theophilus,

1 Chron. 17.

V. 2.

V. 3. 4.

V. 5.

V. 6.

V. 7.

Tostatus.

Iunius.

Mal. 2. 7.

Theophilus,

V. 9.

philus, whom the king thought fit to send out for the furthering of the teaching. And it is to be noted, that they taught only out of the book of the law of God, not mixing any other herewith as grounds of their teaching, as traditions or decrees of Popes or Councils, or Legends, as the Popish doe. And they went about teaching in every city, where all both men and women might come together to heare and learn the will of God, as it alike concerned them all.

V. 10.

V. 11.

Now the king sent these men out to teach, as is to be conceived, because the people were so addicted to worship in high places, that it being made by this means to appear unto them, how contrary this was to the law of God, who appointed one place only for sacrifice, they might be brought, if it were possible, to consent to beat them down, and to leave all their old superstition. And howsoever this succeeded not, for some sacrifice in the high places still, as was shewed before, yet this godly endeavour of Iehoshaphat wanted not a blessing, for the fear of the Lord fell upon all the kingdomes of the earth round about Iudah, so that none durst warre against him. But contrariwise, the Philistines and Arabians submitted themselves to become tributaries to him, bringing him great gifts.

Pellican.

Tostatus.

They seeing him to grow so mighty, saith Pellican, and so good a king, thought that they could not better provide for their own safety, then by putting themselves under his protection, and making themselves tributaries to him. Tostatus thinketh, that by some warre made by Iehoshaphat upon them not here commemorated, they were brought to this, but the text speaketh plainly to the contrary, that it was by the fear which fell upon them from the Lord, when Iehoshaphat lived quietly within his own kingdom. They were formerly made tributaries by David, and how they were since exempted we doe not read, only it is probable, that when in Rehoboam's time the kingdome was weakned by dividing, they adventured to withhold there tribute, and likewise in the dayes of Abijah and Asa, who had warres with Israel. But now fearing the forces of Iehoshaphat, they thought it not safe to withhold their tribute any longer, and therefore they paid it, and sent gifts also, that no offence might be taken at their former neglect. And by this means Iehoshaphat grew also more wealthy and mighty, so that he erected strong and goodly buildings in Iudah like towers, that if the enemy should come into the city, saith Lyra, they might thence be fought against and slain, and he built walls about his cities. Neither did he so only, but also placed garisons in them, v. 19. And besides this, his forces are set forth to be wonderfully great, even 1160000 under five Captaines, Princes of Iudah, which were alwayes at hand in Ierusalem, that is, waiting by turns there monthly, saith Lyra. But seeing their number was so great, that if they had been divided into 12 parts, there must alwayes have been near 100000 at Ierusalem, which were too many to attend alwayes upon any one king in the world, I hold rather with others, that the Captaines and some of this company attended continually upon the king, the rest being at hand and ready to come also for his service, whensoever the king would.

V. 12.

Lyra.

V. 14, 15, 16,
17, 18.

V. 19.

Pellican.

And this is the meaning of these words, all these were at the kings hand.] Neither is it to be thought as Pellican hath it, that so great a number of men were kept only for warre, but that they were registred and mustered sometimes, the following of their particular vocations & businesses, not being in the time of peace much interrupted hereby. But it is not to be conceived, that all these forces were in Iudah alone, but in Iudah and Benjamin, of which two tribes his kingdome consisted, but Iudah only is named, because it was commonly called the kingdome of Iudah; yea it is expressly said, v. 17. that Eliadab and his men were of Benjamin, although in the vulgar Latin Benjamin be not mentioned. If we compare these numbers with those of Asa his father ch. 14. 8. it will appear, that they farre exceeded them, for they were but 300000 of Iudah, and 280000 of Benjamin. Wherefore the more a Prince excelleth in godlinesse, the more by farre will God make him to excell in riches, power, and glory, that every christian king may be stirred up to seek to promote Religion in all parts of his kingdom to the uttermost of all his power, as Iehoshaphat did.

Note.

And hitherto chap. 17. the history of Iehoshaphat joyning affinity with Ahab, and and helping him in his warre at Ramoth Gilead against the Syrians, set forth chap. 18, hath been already explained. Now Ahab being slain in that warre, Iehoshaphat, howsoever in great perill of his life also, yet was so preserved by that God, whom he served, that he returned to Jerusalem again in safety and peace; the Syrians, whom he had justly provoked against him by his part-taking, being held from attempting any thing hostile against him. But Iehu the sonne of Hanani a prophet, was sent of God to reprove him at his return, for helping the wicked, for which he told him, that he was worthy to bear the heave wrath of God, but forso much as good things were found in him, and he did from his heart seek the Lord, it was withheld, and this his sinne was pardoned, as it must needs be understood. Wherefore in uprightnesse of heart to seek to glorifie God, and to beat down that which is against his glory, is so highly accepted of before him, that therefore in mercy he passeth over and pardoneth that which is done amisse, being notwithstanding to his servants a protectour and saviour in time of greatest dangers, that we all may be stirred up to seek zealously Gods glory, as Iehoshaphat did.

When the King had been thus reprov'd, but yet for his seeking of the Lord and the beating down of idolatry approved, he renewed his care for the Lord, and went forth from Beerseba even to mount Ephraim, to bring them back to the Lord. That is, according to Pellican, from one end of his kingdome to the other. And Lyra saith, that Beerseba was furthest south, and mount Ephraim north, which although it belonged to the kingdome of Israel, yet he held some cities thereof, as being formerly taken by his father. For as weeds being destroyed, will grow again, and therefore must again be weeded up, that the ground may be kept clear; so idolatry being beaten down in the kingdom of Iudah, began, it seemeth, to grow againe through a pronesse, that is in naturall men thereunto, especially if there be any to bear them out herein, or they be joyned in friendship with idolaters, and converse amongst them, as the subjects of this kingdome now did: for they were in league with the Israelites, and joyned with them in their wars, and navigations, as is afterwards shewed; and they had amongst them an Ashtabab, the daughter of an idolatrous king and queen, Ahab and Iezabel, who was married to Iehoshaphat's sonne, upon whom they might bear themselves, and so waxe the bolder to return with the dog to their vomit. But the good king Iehoshaphat perceiving this, went out again to visit his uttermost parts, and to beat down regrowing evil.

And he set Iudges in all defended cities of Iudah to do justice to every one that was wronged, or had any grievance in civill matters, and he did most godly charge them to do, as those, that exercised not their own but the judgement of the Lord, and expected therefore to be called to account, that is, having no respect of persons, nor receiving bribes to be moved to go out of the way of justice hereby, v. 8. Also in Jerusalem Iehoshaphat set Priests and Levites, and Princes of families, &c. The Iudges before spoken of, were placed in all cities to judge common matters, saith Lyra, that the people might not be forced to travell farre for judgement, and these at Jerusalem to judge in causes more difficult, both in things pertaining to the Lord, and to the king, and therefore the Iudges were both spirituall and secular, and of either sort there was a president; of the spirituall, Amarias the high priest, over things pertaining to the Lord, and Zabudias, a prince in Iudah, of the secular, in things pertaining to the king. And this placing of the highest court of judgement at Jerusalem, in cases most intricate, was grounded upon Dent. 17. 8, 9.

After these things so worthily done by Iehoshaphat, that it might appear the more, in what high account he was before God, many enemies were suffered to come against him, uniting all their forces together, for the destroying of him and his kingdome, viz. the children of Ammon, and of Moab, and some beyond the Ammonites, as Iunius reads it, and v. 2. makes it plain, where it is said, there cometh a great multitude against thee, from the places beyond the sea, that is, the dead sea, and from Syria; although the words may be rendred, and are commonly, the children of Ammon and Moab, and with them of the Ammonites. These then that came with them were Syrians, who most probably were willing to take this opportu-

2 Chron. 19.

V. 2.

V. 3.

V. 4.

V. 4.

Pellican.

V. 5.

V. 6.

V. 7.

V. 8.

Lyra.

V. 11.

2 Chron. 20.

V. 1.

V. 3, 4, 5.

- V. 3, 4, 5. opportunity to be revenged upon him for his helping Ahab against them, and as appeareth v. 10. Edomites. Lyra saith, and that most probably, that by the last Ammonites, v. 1. are meant Idumeans, who came under their colours. And this he had from Ierom, lib. de Hebr. quest. saying, that they disguised themselves and put on the habit of Ammonites, because they were ashamed otherwise to fight against the Israelites, being their brethren, or rather because they feared Iehoshaphat if they were known, as being tributaries to him, although to get free they now joyned with the Ammonites against him. Iehoshaphat hearing of them at the first feared, but then he did flye to the Lord by prayer, and fasting, assembling all Iudah together to seek the Lord, his prayer also which he made, is set forth v. 6, 7, 8 &c. The enemies remaining in the mean season at Engaddi, which is a place near unto the dead sea, v. 2. He grounds his prayer upon the power of God, and his interest in speciall in his people, and former gifts towards them, and his promise when the Temple was built by Solomon. And all Iudah is said to have been present with their wives and little ones, to move the Lord to compassion the more, seeing, if hee did not help, not onely the men, but this weak multitude also, whom all are wont to commiserate, would be in danger of destruction. The Lord being thus sought, deferred not to give a comfortable answer, for Iehaziel the sonne of Zabbariah, &c. being stirred up by the spirit of God, prophesied victory unto them without their fighting, which was meant, when he said, fear not, the battell is not yours, but the Lords. And he telleth them what way the enemies will come, viz. by the rock called Ziz, and they should find them at the brook of Ieruel; this rock saith Innius, was between the wilderness of Tekoah, and the wilderness of Ieruel. Hugo saith, that Ierom de Hebr. qui, affirmeth the place to be called by both these names from the event, the terrour of the Lord stricken into the nations about, by that which was done here. For Ieruel saith the glosse, signifieth the terrour of God, and Ziz, a cauldron or pot, because in this place they were cut in pieces and made meat, as it were, for the pot.
- V. 18, 19. When Iehoshaphat and the men of Iudah heard this, they worshipped, and the Levites sang praises unto God, as if the victory had been already obtained.
- V. 20. The next morning they went out by the wilderness of Tekoah, and then Iehoshaphat exhorted them to trust in God and to believe his prophets, which he spake for their sakes, that were pusillanimous, least any not believing should flye away. And for so much as the victory was promised without their fighting, Iehoshaphat thought it fittest to proceed with singing praises to God, and so the enemies were moved to fight one nation against another, Ammonites, and Moabites against the Edomites, till the place was all filled with dead carcases, so that Iudah had nothing to doe, but to take and carry away the spoiles, which they did 3 daies together, and that the 4th day the whole congregation blessed God in such manner, that the place was from hence called alwayes after, the valley of blessing.
- V. 27, 28. Here because no mention is made of the Syrians, some think that there were no Syrians in this battell, but Edomites onely, with the Ammonites; and whereas it is said before, that this armie came from Syria, that by Syria there the whole tract of ground containing mount Seir, and Syrians is to be understood; but for so much as mount Seir is no where set forth under this name, it is to be thought either that Syrians and Edomites were in this company, according to Innius, but the Syrians happily being but few, were no more spoken of. Whereas v. 22. it is said God turned their ambushes against themselves. The meaning is, that they did not purposefully fight one against another, but they that were laid in ambush against Iudah, when their own armie came on; God disposing it so that they came before their time, thinking them to be enemies, fell upon them, and slew them, who it seemeth, were that part of the armie, which consisted of Edomites. And when the rest being Ammonites and Moabites, saw what they had done, they quarrelled about it amongst themselves, and fought one against another, till few or none of all that great multitude remained alive.

For the cause of these peoples coming against Iehoshaphat, none is here assigned, but Sallianus will have Iehoshaphat helping Ioram against Moab spoken of, 2 King 3.

2 King. 3. the cause of their coming, and Ammonites being confederates, might easily be drawn to come with them, and Edomites, that if Iehoshaphat had been overcome, they might have been freed from his obedience. But seeing v. 31. Iehoshaphat is said after this to have associated himself with Abaziah, who died before Ioram was king, it is plain, that as it is placed, so that expedition against Moab was after these things. None other cause then can be assigned, but on Gods part to try Iehoshaphat, and on their envie at his prosperity and great power and glory for which they might fear, that he would ere long bring all the nations about under his obedience.

And when Iehoshaphat was come again to Ierusalem, they did the like in the house of the Lord with instruments of Musick. As for the nations about, when they heard of it, they were taken with a feare, which kept them alwayes after from banding against Iehoshaphat, so that from thence forward he lived alwayes in quiet. v. 31. is the same with 1 King. 22. 41. &c. unto v. 34. where the rest of Iehoshaphats acts are said to be written in the words of Iehu the sonne of Hanani, who wrote the Book of the Kings, 1 King. 22. 46. in the Book of the kings of Iudab.

There was then no King in Edom, &c. ] This is here commemorated, that it might appear, that the Edomites were kept under ever since Dauids time, till after the death of Iehoshaphat, who fought the Lord. For when Ioram his sonne reigned, who was an idolater, and murtherer of his own brethren, as is shewed 2 Chron. 21. 4. 6. they revolted from his obedience, 2 King. 8. 20. neither could they be subdued any more.

Here it is also recorded, that Iehoshaphat made him ships to go to Ophir for gold, but they were broken in Aziongaber, and that Ochosias the king of Israel, the wicked sonne of wicked Ahab, spake to him, that his servants might go with his, but he would not. 2 Chron. 20. 35. Iehoshaphat is said to have made friendship with Ochosias, and to have been partner with him in making ships to go to Tharsis, and that they were made in Aziongaber. But Eliezer a prophet threatned him, because he joynd with Ochosias, that they should be broken, and they were broken and went not.

Where Aziongaber lyeth, see before 2 Chron. 8. 17. viz. in Edom. Which argueth, that the Edomites were yet under the kings of Iudah; and from hence it may be gathered, wherefore it is said v. 48. that there was no king in Edom, but a deposite to govern in stead of a king, viz. to declare, how it came to passe, that Iehoshaphat built ships there, it was part of his dominions, and a place most fit for the purpose, as appeareth by Solomons doing the like before, to send also to Ophir; the description whereof, see upon 2 Chron. 9. And it is said here that there was no king in Edom, that we might know the first revolting of the Edomites from the obedience of the kings of Iudah, to have been occasioned by their wickedness.

For in Iehoshaphats time they continued subject, although even then they were permitted to have a king, as appeareth 2 King. 3. But when Ioram his sonne reigned, who was an idolater, they revolted, and could be brought under no more. 2 King. 8. 20. But seeing these ships were made to go to Ophir, how is it said, 2 Chron. 20. 35. to go to Tharsis? For the clearing of this, see upon 1 King. 10. 22. the like said of Solomons navie. Tharsis was a place in Ophir, although some say, that they were as farre asunder as the East and West. But against this maketh, that this being granted, the same navie could not have gone to two places so farre distant, in the three years there spoken of, and it had been no point of wisdom to carry about treasure gotten in one place to another so remote from it; and lastly, although the West India be famous for gold, yet the East is not, as is well known at this day, but for pepper and other spices; wherefore it is best to rest in the first.

Whereas it is said that he would not be partner with Abaziah, it is to be understood, after admonition given him by the prophet, he would not joyn with him any more in repairing the ships, which were broken in the very haven by some mighty

V. 27. 28.

V. 30.

V. 34.

1 King. 22. 46.

V. 48.

2 Sam. 8. 14.

V. 49.

V. 50.

2 Chron. 20. 35.

V. 51.

V. 52.

Pellican.

V. 53, 54.

mighty tempest sent of God, before their going forth, although the king of Israel entreated him to joyn again.

And Jehoshaphat died with his fathers and was buried, &c. Here the writer of the Kings, concludeth the history of Jehoshaphat, who yet died not before Ahaziah king of Israel, but lived and reigned long after, as appeareth v. 52. where Ahaziah is said to have begun his reign the 17. year of Jehoshaphat, and to have reigned but two years, whereas Jehoshaphat made up the time of his reign 25. years v. 42. and therefore died not till 6. years after him. Moreover, 2 King. 3. he is found again joyning with Ioram the king of Israel against Moab. His death then is here spoken of, that the history of the kings of Israel may be again taken up and prosecuted, which the writer of the Kings chiefly intended, that one thing more, which he had to set forth touching Jehoshaphat, being reserved to be brought in, in the proper time, together with the gifts of the kings of Israel, to whom he was but an helper therein. But 2 Chron. 21. 1. after that he is said to have died, he is no more spoken of, but the history of his sonne Ioram thence forward onely prosecuted. Whereas Ahaziah is said to have begun his reign the 17. year of Jehoshaphat, and Jehoshaphat the fourth year of Ahab, v. 41. and the time of Ahabs reign was 22. years, 1 King. 16. 29. but 17. and 4. make no more then 21. It is to be thought, that Ahaziah began to reign even whilest Ahab lived together with him, at the least one year, or else Ahabs 4. yeares and 22. yeares are not to be taken for compleat, neither is there any need with Pellican so dangerously to lay the fault upon the copier out of the history, as putting 17. for 19. of Jehoshaphat. Ahaziah followed his father Ahab in sinning, and therefore was cut off betimes, and left no heir.

THE

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE KINGS.

CHAP. I.

He history of Ahaziah king of Israel, begun in the first Book, is here continued to his death, which followed shortly after, viz. within two yeares; and as is probably thought, the very next year after his father, with whom he had reigned one, and in the second he died. For as he was exceeding wicked, so he was pursued with judgement after judgement in this short time of his reign. First, as was before shewed, his ships which he made together with Iehoshaphat, were broken. Secondly, Moab rebelled against him immediatly after his fathers death, v. 1. Thirdly, he fell out of a window and was sore bruised, v. 2. Fourthly, going on in his wickednesse and sending to enquire of Baalzebub, whether he should recover, he lost some companies of his men by fire from heaven. Fifthly, he heard the dreadfull newes of death from the prophet Elijah, and then he died, when by all these calamities he had been moved to repentance, but in vain.

Touching his fall, of which his mortall sicknesse came, it was most probably through a window upon the battlement of his house, where he walked for his recreation, for the Jews built their houses with flat tops to walk upon, and thus his pleasure, by the just judgement of God, was turned to his ruine for his sinnes: for as all things shall work together for good to the faithfull, so to the wicked all shall work to bring them to destruction. For the god, to whom he sent for help in this case, viz. Baalzebub the god of Ekron or Accharen, as the vulgar Latin hath it, the same in the Gospel is called Belzebub, signifying the lord of flies, because that country being much annoyed by flies, they held that by his help they were driven away, so Vasabius. The Septuagint and Iosephus render it, the one, the lord the flye, the other, the god the flye. And accordingly Theodore writeth of it, as if it were the image of a flye, saying, they deified not onely greater creatures, but even the least and vilest. For what is more vile, then a flye? and yet they called the image thereof a god; and leaving the true living God, sought to it for life, yea they called the dead image of that a god, which they drove away with flye-flaps being alive. Procopius saith, that the devill was called Belzebub, or rather a certain little old woman, whom they put into the number of goddesses. Pausanias saith, that Hercules the sonne of Alcmena, when he could not drive away the flies that molested him, sacrificed to Iupiter, and imploring his help, and then they flew all away immediatly beyond Alpheus. Hence the Elians took occasion to continue the like sacrificing. And this I rather take to be the truth touching this idol, that it was the image of Iupiter, thus called, because of him help was sought against the annoyance by

N n

V. 1.

V. 2.

Note.

Vasabius
Theodore.Procopius.Pausan. in Elia- ci. l. 5.

by flies, then that of Theoderet, and because he was the chiefe of the heathen gods, which were devils, Belzebub was by the Iewes called the Prince of devils. And by Accaron, where his shrine was, hell is set forth amongst the Poets, as that saying,
Flectere cum superos nequeo, Acharonta movebo.

But the same Bel or Baal was now served in Israel, as well as in Accaron of the Philistins, why then did the king of Israel send thither? It may be conceived that the prophets of the idoll whom he served, had deceived his father, and lied unto him to his destruction at Ramoth Gilcad, and therefore though he served him as his father had done, and his mother, yet he thought it not safe to trust to him, but rather to send out of the land to another Baal. But why sent he not to Michaiab, or to Elijah, whom he knew to be true Prophets? Ans. Hee was doubtlesse of the same mind with his wicked father, he hated them, as being against him and such as hee was, and therefore not likely to speak any comfort, but terrour unto him.

P. Martyr.

Martyr saith, that some hold that idol to be called Belzebub by the godly in contempt; but he approveth rather the former reason, because even by Ahaziah, he was so called. And he addeth, that idolaters used to send in time of sicknesse, both to enquire, and for help to idols; and sometime, that they might be the more dedded, obtained it, as some that sent to the temples of Esculapius,

V. 3.

To these messengers of Ahaziah when they were on the way to Baalzebub, was Elijah sent by an Angell to threaten death unto him, because hee sent to an idol out of the land, this being derogatory from the God of Israel. But seeing by his fall he was mortally bruised some make a quere, how his sending to enquire of Baalzebub, could be said to be the cause. Tostatus answereth well to this, that either his hurt was such, as would not have caused such, and then the turning of it to be the cause of death, was manifestly by the hand of God offended at his sending, or else it was mortall, and then his sending is said to be the cause, for so much as God happily would otherwife have healed him, if he had been sought unto, as he did Hezekiah afterwards of his deadly sicknesse. Where Elijah was, when the Angell sent him forth to meet these messengers, it is not said; but v. 9. it appeareth, Tostatus.

Adricom.

that the place to which he returned, was the top of mount Carmel, at the foot whereof he had a cave, in which he dwelt, and Elishah after him, saith Adricomius, and there also was a spring. But how happened it then, that the Angell had him ascend or goe up to meet the messengers? Ans. Herein respect was had to the way, in which he was to meet them, which was from Samaria, that stood upon a mountain, so that he must needs goe up to meet them coming from thence, although he first descended to the foot of mount Carmel. The messengers hearing him, soon returned to the King without going further on their intended journey, as appeareth by the kings asking of them why they are returned, v. 5. At which if any man shall marvaile, seeing Elijah was to them unknown, and in appearance but a mean and poor man; it is to be considered, that his very speech discovered him to be a prophet of the Lord, in that he shewed hereby, that he knew whether they were going, and to what end. For he said, is it because there is no God in Israel, that yet send to enquire of the god of Ekron? and that the king lay then sick upon his bed, in that he said, thou shalt not come down from thy bed, &c. For how should any other, but a prophet of God, know all these secrets? Being then hereby convinced, that hee was a prophet of God, and that he gave them a true answer, they thought it but vain to goe further to enquire about the same thing, and happily they feared that they might be in danger of death also; if contemning that, which a prophet of the Lord said unto them, they had presumed still to goe on their way to enquire of another god. Martyr saith, that there are by some assigned two other reasons, why they presently returned, because they gathered from his speech that he was an Angell, seeing he knew whether they were going, &c. 2. Because they gathered no lesse from the manner of his departure, he vanished. But it is not so said of the prophet, but that he went away.

V. 4.

P. Martyr.

V. 8.

When these messengers had related the saying of the prophet unto him, he enquired what manner of man he was, they answered, an hairy man, and girt about with a lether girdle, then he knew that it was Elijah the Tishbrite, and sent immediately dia tely to have him fetcht unto him. The king might well so readily gather who it was, because he had doubtlesse sometime seen him in the dayes of Ahab his father, and being a prophet most famous for his zeale and courage to speak against any, how great soever, he could not but conjecture, before he heard him described, that it was he. He is said to be hairy according to some, because his body, hands and face were hairy; according to * others, because his garments were hairie and course, as Iohn the Baptist, the most probable is, that he was hairie both wayes. And they were thus apparelled, saith Martyr, because they preached repentance, which in those dayes was in sack or haire cloth, that they might by outward sign as well as by word move men to repent; contrary to which is done now by chiefe preachers, Bishops and Cardinals, whose apparell and ornaments are most costly, but preachers should indeed by their example learn to flye such worldly pompe, and not to wear so much as gold chain or ring, but that which may shew and teach others humility. For the kings sending to have him brought unto him, it was by a Captain over fifty, who went with his fifty men by force to bring the Prophet to him, happily that he might make him reverse his sentence, or otherwise put him first to death, who was so bold to threaten him with death. This Captain found him sitting upon the top of mount Carmell, to which place saith Vatablus, he ascended for fear of Ahaziah; but seeing the top of a mount is no place for a man to hide himself in but rather some cave in a lower place, and more hidden from mens eyes; I cannot think that to be the reason of his ascent, but rather to pray, as sometime before hee had done, 1 King. 18. The Capt. having found him biddeh him in the kings name to come down saying, [O man of God, &c.] which Procopius and Vatablus think, was spoken ironically by him & in scorn, as slieghting him and the Lord whom he served, as if his Lord were of more power to fetch him to him, then God to hold and keep him out of his hands. And this seemeth to be true by the Prophets answer, If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven and consume thee and thy fifty. For it is not to be thought, that meerly for obeying the king, and coming to fetch him to him, when he was sent, that the Prophet was so much incensed against him; but for his pride and prophane insolency, which shewed him to be a man according to the kings own heart, a wicked idolater, and one that regarded not the true God, nor his servants, but rather rejoyced to be an instrument of persecuting them, and like unto him most probably were his souldiers also; wherefore Theodoret saith well, it is manifest that these two Captaines and their fifties went out with the same scope and purpose that he had, who sent them, and therefore they suffered these punishments. And Procopius following him addeth, that because they mocked at the Prophet, they were destroyed for example, and to teach others not to raile and mock at the righteous. So that if any call this proceeding of the Prophet tyrannical, as some doe saith Theodoret; they sharpen their tongues against God, who moved Elijah by his spirit to call for this fire, and when he called for it, sent it, and destroyed them therewith. If any shall wonder why one Captain was sent thus after another, and how it happened, that he took not warning by his fellow, but came and called to the Prophet in the like insolent manner? It is conceived, that Carmel being farre from Samaria, from whence they were sent, viz. as Adrichomius saith, two dayes journey, neither the King nor he knew what had befallne the first Captain, therefore the king impatient of further delay, seeing that he returned not again, sent out this second; that if the other with his men could not bring him, they might doe it with their forces joyned together, or if he could not find him that was first sent out, but was gone to seek him one way, this might go another. And when he came to the place of the Prophets abode and found him there, but no Captain or souldiers, for the fire had consumed them, supposing that he with his men were delayed upon some occasion, as they went another way, he began to speak tauntingly to Elijah, as the first had done, and was together with his men horribly consumed by fire coming down from heaven also. Martyr, who agreeth with that, which hath been said touching their calling of Elijah [thou man of God] in scorn, yet differeth, in that he thinketh it to have been known to the King and the second Captain, what had befallne the first and his 50 men, and that the king hearing such news

V. 9.

Cald. paraph. prælitus capillis.
S. Capillo ob- longo & horrido.
Sept. Joseph pi-
losus ut Esau.
\ Tostat Jo Hi-* erol. clothed with Badgers skinner.
Lyra.
P. Martyr.

Vatablus.

Procopius.

V. 10.

Theodoret per- spicuum est eos quinguenarios & qui eis pare- bant convenisse cum scopo & instituto cum qui eos misit, &c.

V. 11, 12.
P. Martyr.

sent not again immediately; but being terrified, desisted for a time; but that hardening himselfe he sent again, and that the second Captain commended himselfe to his gods to be protected, so as he supposed that the former happily did not, and then adventured to goe, to this effect also Pellican. But seeing no man would be so foolhardy to adventure himselfe upon so apparant deadly danger; neither is there any thing said in the text, which implyeth any delay in the king, or newes brought of the first Captaines destruction, or this Captaines taking of a better course, as being warned by his fellowes example. I rather think with others, that neither King nor Captain knew what had been done, and this made him so bold, not onely to bid the prophet in the kings name to come down, but in hast in such an imperious manner, as that he would have him know, he both could and would fetch him down by force, if he descended not immediately. If it be demanded, why Christ would not have the like done to a city of the Samaritans, which would not receive him, when two of his Disciples requested it, but rebuked them saying, ye know not of what spirit ye are; Martyr answereth well, that this was done not only to shew the lenity of the Gospell and the rigour and severity of the law, according to many; for Peter also smote Ananias and Saphyra with death, Acts 5. and Paul, Elimas, with blindness; but because they were moved by their own, Elijah by the spirit of God to doe this execution upon grosse idolaters and contempters of the true God, and of his servants. A like example of revenge taken by fire from heaven, were Chorah, Dathan, and Abiram made, when they envied at Moses and Aaron, and stirred up others against them. The revenging of the wrongs done to Gods Prophets should be a warning to all men, not to touch his annointed, nor to doe his Prophets any harme; and the revenge by fire intimated the last revenge upon all the wicked by fire at the day of judgement, according to 2 Thes. 1. 8. For as fire now came down from heaven and consumed some, so then it shall come down for the destruction of all Gods enemies, and the enemies of his servants, that none may remaine incredulous; but being assured, that he who sent down fire now in one part, both can and will send it down in all places of the world, according to his word, repent, that they may escape this dreadfull judgement of the Lord.

To proceed in the history, the mad king nothing moved to desist from his furious enterprize against Elijah, by their not returning, whom he had sent one after another with so great power to fetch him (although it might have moved any man to suspect some judgement befalling them, and happily by this time newes was come to the Court how they were destroyed, as may be gathered from the speech of him, that was next sent) calls in haste for another Captain, and his 50 men, and sendeth them to fetch Elijah to him. Now he knowing what had been done to his two predecessours, instead of commanding, humbled himselfe to Elijah, praying him that his life might be precious in his sight, & confessing in effect, that the judgement sent upon the former two, and their men was just, because they came as armed with a greater power from a king, a mortall man, then that of Almighty God; with, that other wise they would never have so insolently behaved themselves; He therefore contrariwise believing Gods power to be above all, and that Elijah was truly the man of God, came to him in another way, viz. by entreaty, and not bearing himselfe upon his power of men which he brought with him, neither meaning to use any violence, but if he would goe voluntarily, as he had sometime done to king Ahab, he and his men were ready only to wait upon him thither, but not by any means to lay hands upon him. And this Captain, say the Hebrewes and Lyra, Comestor, and Hugo after them, was Obadiab, who had before found him, when none else could, and foreshewed to king Ahab his coming to him. And this is not improbable, for he then fell upon his face before him, as now upon his knees; and if Ahaziah had yet heard of the destruction of his two former Captains, it is not to be thought that he was so tyrannicall, that he would put another upon the same danger with 50 men more, and therefore now chose one who was gracious with the Prophet, and knew how to deale so with him, as that he would bring him with him; and who could thus more probably be, then Obadiab? Certainly it was either he; or some other of like condition to him, that revered Gods Prophets, that

Acts 5.
Acts 13. 11.

Numb. 16.

Note.

V. 13.

So likewise Johan. Hiero- sol. and that he turned Disciple to Elijah, and had the gift of prophecy bestowed upon him.

that the king made now choice of to send out, seeing another an idolatrous wicked Captain, would have scorned thus to bow and crouch to a poor prophet, although he had dyed for it.

With this captain the Angel of the Lord biddeth Elijah to go, and fear nothing, and so he came and spake to his face, as he had done before to his messengers, neither do we reade of any revenge, that he attempted therefore against the prophet, but that he died according to his word. God, who hath the hearts of kings in his hands, so strook him, when he heard the sentence of death against him denounced from the prophets own mouth, that he had no further courage to attempt any thing against him, but languished and soon after this died.

And Iehoram reigned in his stead, for he had no sonne, the second year of Iehoram the sonne of Iehoshaphat king of Iudah. ] Here a molt difficult question ariseth, how it could be the second year of Iehoram of Iudah, when as Iehoshaphat was still living and reigning, for he reigned 25. years, Ahaziah was made King in his 17. year, and reigned but two years, therefore unlesse there were an inter-regnum, Iehoram began to reign the 19. or 20. of Iehoshaphat, and 5. or 6. yeares before his son Iehoram; yea, it is exprelly said chap. 3. 1. that he began his reign the 18. of Iehoshaphat, and that king Iehoshaphat help him in his war against Moab. And 2 King. 8. 16. that Iehoram of Iudah began his reign the fifth year of Iehoram king of Israel, how then can he be said to have begun his reign in the second of Iehoram king of Iudah? I finde two wayes, that Expositours labour to reconcile these differences, either by saying, that Iehoram the king of Israel was not of full age, when his brother Ahaziah died, and therefore although he were immediately made king, yet the kingdom was under the government of a protectour certain years, even till the second of Iehoram king of Iudah, at whose entrance upon his reign he had been king four years, and was then upon the fifth, and yet his father made him king, together with himself some years before he died; for which cause it is said, 2 King. 8. 16. that he began to reign, whilest Iehoshaphat his father yet reigned: Or, they reconcile it by saying, that Iehoshaphat made his sonne Iehoram King, 7. years before his death, to avoid contention betwixt him and his brethren, for he had many, for whom their father otherwise provided, that every one might be content, although it fell out otherwise through the bloud-thirstinesse of idolatrous Iehoram, as is shewed, 2 Chron. 21. 4. And if this be received, it is to be understood here, that Iehoram of Israel began to reign the second year of Iehorams reigning together with his father, and that this Iehoram began to reign alone, his father being now dead the fifth year of Iehoram king of Israel, thus the Hebrew expositours, and after them Lyra. But against this make two things, although it be followed also by Iunius and some other learned expositours; first, that Iehoshaphat is said yet to be living and reigning; secondly, that Iehoram of Israel began his reign the 18. year of Iehoshaphat, which was not according to this account the second, but the first of Iehoram of Iudah, and when he began to reign alone, was not the fift, but the seventh of Iehorams of Israel. There is a necessitie then of leaving this way of reconciliation and looking back again to the former, which together with the other is mentioned by Martyr, but neither preferred, but only after the mentioning left to the readers choice. According to that, if we say that Iehoram of Iudah began his reign the 17. year of his fathers reign; the other Iehorams reign will begin the second year of his, and 18. of Iehoshaphats, and if Iehoram of Israel, although king, reigned not by reason of his minority, but the kingdom was administered by a protectour, till three years after, then Iehoram of Iudah came to reign alone in the fifth of Iehoram of Israel, and so all differences will be reconciled. Onely whereas this may seem to make against us in this way, that Iehoshaphats 18. year was the last of Abahs, for he began the fourth of Abahs reign, understanding it to be even now at an end, and so his first was Abahs fifth, who is said to have reigned 22. because he was entring upon 23. when he was cut off, as hath been shewed upon 2 King. 22. 41. And if Abah died the 18. of Iehoshaphat, and Ahaziah succeeded before Iehoram reigning two years, he, that is Iehoram, could not then begin till the 19. or 20. It is answered, that Ahaziah was made king, whilest his father lived, as the

V. 15.

V. 17.

Hebraei.
Lyra.
Iunius.

P. Martyr.

other Iehoram, whilest Iehoshaphat his father lived, and so died the same year with his father. And if this shall seem to make against it, that Iehoram of Iudah his beginning to reign the fifth year of Iehoram of Israel, is said to have been whilest Iehoshaphat reigned, 2 King. 8. 16. For if it be meant of his beginning to reign alone after his fathers death, here seemeth to be a manifest contradiction: but if the text be well considered, there is not, for there is no more said, but this, and Iehoshaphat king of Iudah, it being left to be supplied from that, which was said before 1 King. 22. 17. And Iehoshaphat king of Iudah having reigned hitherto with his sonne, from the beginning of that Iehorams reign over Israel, and two years also before that having made him consort with him in his kingdome, whereupon it was there said, that this Iehoram began in the second year of his reign, now the said son of Iehoshaphat, Iehoram began his reign over Iudah alone, his father being dead. For this must needs either be yielded to, to be the meaning, or the writer of the sacred history to be very forgetfull of what he had formerly written, which is not without blasphemy to be suffered to enter into any mans minde. Or to make all yet more plain, it may be said, that Iehoram of Israel came not to the kingdome, till anno 18. of Iehoshaphat, and the time spoken of here was anno 23. when Iehoram his sonne began to reign alone, and so the meaning of these words [and Iehoshaphat king of Iudah] is, Iehoshaphat king of Iudah still living. For haply he now waxing old, desired to spend the rest of his time in devotion, and so gave all over to his sonne before his death, as David to Solomon, and the rather, that before his death he and the rest being settled, might live together the more peacefully after. Pellican maketh short work of that which we have dwelt thus long upon, saying, that either there was a fault in the coppier out of this history, or else he confesseth himself plainly to be ignorant how it may be reconciled. But it is not safe to yield to any error in copying out the Scriptures, except some true copie remained whereby the erring might be corrected. Let the judicious reader consider, and if he cannot finde a better way of reconciling, follow this with me, which is the most without all exception.

Pellican.

CHAP. II.

V. 1.

BYt it came to passe, when God would lift up Elijah by a whirl-winde into heaven, Elijah and Elifshah went from Gilgal.* God having revealed to Elijah, as it seemeth, that he would take him away alive into heaven, and upon what day, he went with Elifshah, who ministred unto him, and in the prophetick office was to succeed him, from Gilgal, a place famous for a generall circumcision of all the males amongst the children of Israel, at their first coming over Iordan into the land of Canaan, and near unto that river, and now, as expositours hold, a School or Colledge of prophets, whose chiefe instructour Elijah was, it being thought fit the rather for such an holy order of men to abide in. because it was famous for the children of Israel first pitching their tents there, when they came to take possession of the land. From hence then, as from a place where he used much to be amongst those his schollers that lived there, he went before his departure to Bethel, where hee had more Disciples, called sonnes of the prophets, v. 3. to instruct and confirm them. For Bethel was a place of note also for Jacobs vision, and his sacrificing there; thus making it as he professed to doe, and the name signifieth the house of God. From Bethel he went to Iericho, where were more sonnes of the prophets for the like end, v. 5. for Iericho was also a place of note, for the great miracle wrought there, Iosh. 6. from thence he returned to Iordan, to go over the place where God would take him up. And all this he might well doe in one day, seeing from Gilgal to Bethel was but six miles, from thence to Iericho foure, and from Iericho to Iordan six. Gilgal indeed was farre from the place where he dwelt, that is, Carmel; viz. 52 miles, so that he could not ordinarily be there amongst his schollers, but onely came sometimes as their chief master, substituting in each place another over them.

Josh. 5.

Gen. 28.

H.B. Patriarchs travels.

as the father of the sons of that place. Two questions here offer themselves. 1. Why Elijah must be taken away thus extraordinarily. 2. To what place, whether to the highest heaven called the Empyrean, where Christ now is, and the souls of the faithfull departing hence, or to some other place set forth by this word heaven? To the first, it was, saith Martyr, done for the honouring of the prophet, after so great and extraordinary zeal shewed for God and against idolatry, in the time of such a king and queen, as persecuted to the death all the prophets of God, that they could finde. For who ever before, being but a private man and a subject, durst do, as Elijah did? Twice he threatned Ahab, once with a drought of three years and sixe moneths; second, with destruction both of him and his family. Once he sharply reproved him as a troubler of Israel, and put to death 400. prophets of Baal. And to king Ahaziah he threatned death for his idolatry, and consumed with fire 100. of his men. As then great king Ahashuerosh would honour Mordecai for special service done unto him, by making him ride upon his own horse, so God would now honour Elijah, by making him to ride in a chariot up to heaven, that his doctrine might be the more regarded, from the turning of men from idols to serve the true God, at the least now after his departure. Elijah was herein a figure of Christ also, who ascended visibly into heaven, and of the taking up of the faithfull, that shall be living at the last day, according to that 1 Thes. 4. 17. To the second, it is generally held, that Enoch and Elijah were both taken away into one place, but to what place is not agreed, but divers conjecture diversly, see my exposition upon Heb. 11. 5. Only because I am there very brief, understand now thus much more touching the same. It pleased God to take away two to himself before the coming of Christ, one under the law of nature, or of the old world before the flood, and one under the law-written; and under the Gospel Christ ascended visibly into heaven, that no age might want some testimony of the faithfulls being taken up into heaven at the last day. Touching the place, I finde divers opinions. First, of Cyprian, de Sancti & Sion, and of Tertullian, Epiphanius, and Hyppolitus Martyr, that God onely knoweth, and not man. Secondly, of Irenaeus, Athanasius, Isidorus, Procopius, and Eccles. 44. 16. into that paradise, out of which Adam was cast. And yet in the Greek copies of Ecclesiasticus, the place is not named, but only in the vulgar Latin, which, since the council of Trent making it authentick, may not by any Roman Catholike be questioned. Thirdly, of Gregory, and Rupertus, into some secret part of the earth, where he and Enoch live, in all tranquility of the flesh and spirit, after the manner of our first parents in paradise. Fourthly, of Ambrose and Ierom, into heaven, so Ambrose plainly and Ierom calling it paradise, is easie to be understood, that he meant heaven thereby. So likewise Eugubinus, and why this should be doubted I cannot see, for in the text it is plain into heaven, which Eugubinus explaineth of the heaven, to which Christ ascended. This, I confesse, is impugned by many, of whom some hold, that Elias and Enoch are still living in some other place, till the time of Antichrist, against whom they shall then come forth; and some that they are not living, expounding that Heb. 11. of their not seeing death after the manner of other men, a change being unto them in stead of death, as it shall be to the faithfull at the time of the resurrection. But for the first, it hath been sufficiently confuted in my exposition upon Revel. 11. and for the second, if they died not after the manner of other men, viz. the soul departing out of the body, but were changed, it followeth, that as the faithfull being changed at the last day, in a moment are taken up into heaven, both in body and soul, so they were, and yet Christ onely, and not Enoch or Elijah, opened the way into that most holy place, because his ascension had vertue to make us ascend also, but theirs not. Or when he saith, the way into the most holy was not yet opened, understand, it was not yet made manifest, how we might attain to the kingdome of heaven viz. by Christ, but onely set forth obscurely by types and figures, and accordingly Tremelius rendreth it, Non manifestat a suis adhuc via sanctorum. Therefore this maketh not against their receiving into heaven before, nor yet Heb. 11. 40. that they without us should not be perfect. For this is meant, in that Christ, in whom our perfect felicity lyeth, and who was therefore by them desired, came not in the flesh, untill these our times. Lastly, Martyr thinketh, that they were

P. Martyr.

Opinion 1.
Cyprian. Tertull.
Epiphanius.
Opinion 2.
Irenaeus, Athanasius.
Isidorus. Procopius.

Opinion 3.
Gregorius.
Rupertus.
Opinion 4.
Ambrosius.
Hieronymus.

1 Cor. 15.

Heb. 9. 8.

P. Martyr.

were were caried into some place above, but not into the highest heaven, where together with the holy Patriarks they remained, till Christ his ascension, and then were altogetther caried up into the highest heaven with him.

V. 2.

The Prophet Elijah knowing that he should now be taken up, offered to leave Elijah at Gilgal, and to goe to Bethel alone, and likewise at Bethel and at Iericho, but he cleaved unseparably to him, even to his taking up, swearing that he would not leave him, although he often urged him so to doe. Why Elijah urged Elishah so much to stay behind and not to goe with him, all doe not yield the same reason, but some, that he did thus out of his modesty, that none might see his glorious departure. Some least Elishah seeing him caried away should be the more overwhelmed with grief, out of that extraordinary love which he bare unto him, & some, that he moved him to stay to try his constancy in cleaving to him, as Naomi did Ruths in often moving her to leave her to return alone into the land of Israel. But we read, 1 Kings 19. 3. that when he fled from Iezabel into the wilderness, and so to mount Horeb, a long journey through desert places, where no food was, making none other account, but that the Lord would then take him away, for that was his desire, he left his servant behind and went alone, as thinking it unequall to carry him with him into so great dangers, and indeed desiring to be solitary without any other company but God at such a time, and I think, that in like manner at this time he desired to leave his follower Elishah, that he might be found alone, when the Lord should take him up, as not knowing but that the Lord would have him goe alone; for hee said still, as he journeyed from one place to another, the Lord hath sent me. And because the journey was great, which he was to goe from place to place, yea it was uncertain to how many places he should be sent, he did thus to spare Elishah this labour. Yet Elishah out of his most earnest affection and observance towards him, not out of any disobedience, would follow him to the end, seeing he heard not from him of any such charge given by the Lord to dismiss him. He found so great comfort in his presence, that he was most unwilling to lose it, till necessitie enforced him. And as may be conjectured, the Lord who had revealed to him the taking away of Elijah, as appeareth v. 3. had withall enjoined him not to leave him, to the end, as knowing well what he meant then to do for him, and how. Martyr thinketh, that it was revealed to Elishah, what should be done unto him, if he cleaved to Elijah to the time of his departure, but not to Elijah. But this seemeth improbable, seeing he had no spirit of prophesie or revelation, but that before said, till the spirit of Elijah rested upon him, neither was he anointed to be prophet but after him; it is more likely then, that afterwards this came first into the minde of Elijah by the spirit, wherewith he was endued, to offer to Elishah his request, being moved by his constant adhering and dutifulnesse towards him. He knew indeed before, that he should be an excellent prophet after himself, for so God had shewed him long ago, that he should be prophet in his stead, 1 King. 19. but the way and meanes how he should attain to this, was not revealed unto him, till he came at the very place of his rapture, viz. by asking to have his spirit doubled upon him, and by his first offering to do for him, whatsoever he should desire, and fulfilling the condition (of seeing him at his departure) propounded.

P. Martyr.

V. 3.

When they came to Bethel, the sonnes of the prophets there, came forth and said to Elishah, [Knowest thou not, that the Lord will take thy master from thy head this day? he said unto them, I know it, hold yee your peace.] These sonnes of the Prophets, were prophets, saith Theodore, as the sonnes of men are men, and hereby it appeareth, that they also knew by the spirit, that Elijah should then be taken up into heaven. Their coming out was to meet him for honours sake, and Elishah his bidding them hold their peace was, that Elijah might not by their speaking of it together, know, that they knew it, because he perceived, that he was unwilling that it should be known or seen by any, in that he had so much urged him to leave him to go alone.

Theodore.

V. 4. 5.

V. 7.

And the like was done at Iericho, where more prophets lived together, for not they, who dwell at Iericho, were cursed by Ioshuah, but he that built it. And these prophets although being warned by Elishah they held their peace, yet they followed.

lowed Elijah and him going to Jordan as farre off, as desirous to see the Prophets departure, fearing that if they had been near, he that was unwilling to have one go with him, would much more have forbidden them, being fifty men. And yet it was not without a divine providence, as Martyr noteth, that they went to see, that there might be many witnesses of this his ascent (making so much for the confirmation of our faith, touching our future being taken up, to remain alwayes with the Lord) as there were many witnesses of Christs resurrection. Then Elijah took his mantle and therewith smote the waters of Jordan, when he had wrapt it together in a fitting form, and they were divided so, that they both went over upon dry ground. This was not done by any vertue in his mantle, but it pleased God inwardly to move him to use this as an instrument, and hereby to work this great miracle, as by the rod of Moses to divide the red sea. For, that the vertue was not in the mantle appeareth, because when Elishab returning used it, at the first, no effect followed, till he said, where is the God of Elijah? v. 14. as Tostatus reasoneth.

When they were passed over, Elijah biddeth Elishab ask what he would, and he asked that his spirit might be doubled upon him. This was a great offer, and such as one would think, passed the power of any man to grant. But it is to be understood, that he made not this motion without God suggesting it unto him, neither did Elishab ask without the like instinct of the spirit. By the double portion of his spirit, as the Hebrew word פִּי שְׁנַיִם signifieth, some understand twice so much thereof, as was in Elijah, which they prove by the event, because he did twice so many miracles: for whereas Elijah did eight, he did 16. Some, a double portion in respect of other prophets, as the first born had a double portion to the rest of his brethren, that he might be the more fit to succeed him in the propheticall office, who was the father and chief of all the rest. Others lastly, the two parts of his spirit, which were knowledge to understand and foresee things secret and hidden, and power to do miraculously for the confirmation of the truth, and the beating down of idolatry; And to this Martyr doth most incline. And for this St. Cyprian seemeth to be, where he saith, Elishab received the double spirit of Elijah, not that the spirit is divided into two substances, but because to the Christian, of whom Elishab was a type, a double power was given both in work and word, when they received the holy Ghost, and having prosecuted Christ most earnestly to his very ascension, as Elishab did Elijah, they shone in faith and understanding, in life, and signes, and miracles, and examples. Thus also Tostatus. But besides these three, Vatablus hath another, viz. that Elishab asked onely two parts of three of the spirit of Elijah, and so to have one part of three lesse then he. But for this I see no ground, for if the words be rendred verbatim, they are a part of two, or portion of two of thy spirit, not two parts of three. Moreover, if this had been the meaning, Elijah would never have said, that he asked an hard thing, seeing what had been granted to one prophet, although most excellent, might easily be granted to his successour, in a degree somewhat inferiour. And upon the same ground, I cannot but reject the third also, and the second exposition, seeing it was not an hard request, to be like his predecessour, having as hard a task as he; or to be superior in propheticall endowments to others, to whom he was called to be as a father and instructour. Wherefore I rest upon the first, and commonly received, he desired a portion of two, that is, a double portion of the spirit, or the spirit which was in Elijah to be doubled upon him; according to the Septuagint and Tertullian, he desired to take unto him the portion of Elijah double. The authour of the book de mirab. script. he desired to have the spirit doubled, not out of pride, but that with the more power he might oppose idolatry, to beat down which, he saw that the spirit of Elijah sufficed not: for if he had asked this with a minde to lift up himself, neither Elijah nor the Lord would have granted his request. So likewise Augustine, Theodoret, and Procopius, and Damianus saith, he asked that the spirit of Elijah might be doubled upon him in the signes of miracles, not in the excellencie of merits, and accordingly we may observe, that whereas Elijah did twelve miracles, Elishab did 24. though some reckon but seven done by one, and fourteen by the other. This then was Elishab his desire, and this was his end, although he prevailed no more by all

V. 8.

Tostatus.
V. 9.

P. Martyr.
Cyp. de spir. sanct. Elise spiritum duplicem recepit Elish. non quod in duas substantias idem spir. sit divisus, sed quod populo christiano, cujus typum Elif. gerebat accepto Sp. sancto data est potestas in opere & sermone, &c.
Vatablus.

Tertull. lib. 3. con. Marcionem.
De Mirab. S. Scriptura.
Aug. tract. in Joban.
Damianus; in signis miraculorum, non in excellentia meritorum.

V. 10.

2 King. 5.
P. Martyr.

Note.

V. 11, 12.

1 Cor. 4. 15.

V. 13.

1 King. 19. 19.

P. Martyr.

all that he did for the conversion of the people, but they were hereby made the more inexcusable.

Elijah hearing the request of Elisab granted it not, but upon condition if he should see him, when he was taken up. How this should be available to help Elisab to such an extraordinary gift, I cannot see. Wherefore it was not propounded as a meanes, that had any vertue in it, but onely God would by this meanes, as Elijah well understood, confer this great gift upon him, but without it not, as afterwards Elisab promised Naaman, that if he washed seven times in Iordan, he should be clean. Martyr saith, that this condition made him the more intent to look after Elijah, and so to pray the more earnestly, when he was taken away. And he well noteth, that Elijah would have him ask, what he desired of him, before his taking away, to intimate, that who so will desire any thing of any Saint, must do it before his departure, for after, there is no asking of any thing of them.

Whilest Elijah and Elisab were thus talking, a fiery chariot, came with a whirlwinde, and took up Elijah, then Elisab looking after him said, My father, my father! the chariots of Israel, and the horsemen thereof; that is, the greatest strength and defence against their enemies. For whilest he lived in Israel, no enemy prevailed against them, but onely God corrected them by famine; and when their enemies came against them, they were alwayes overcome, till for the murdering of Naboth, the Syrians were futtered to prevail against Abab, and to slay him in the field. Elisab therefore out of his great grief for the losse of such a champion, crieth out, and for his own losse of one, that had been, as a father to him, carefully to instruct and teach him; such a father was St. Paul afterwards to the Corinthians. And he rent his clothes for sorrow after the manner of those times, and he mentioned a chariot, which he saw, being doubtlesse Angels in that likenesse. For it is said, Psal. 68. The chariots of God are 20000. of Angels. And whereas they were said to be fiery, He maketh his ministers a flame of fire, Heb. 1. 7. The Angels then came in this likenesse to carry up Elijah to heaven, that there he might henceforth be one of their company, for which also he is now called the chariot, &c. But if he were caried away in a chariot, how is it said, Elijah ascended by a whirlwinde into heaven? Ans. The whirlwinde, which was also Angels in this appearance, caried the chariot wherein he rode, and so he ascended by a whirlewinde: for as it is said, he maketh his ministers a flame of fire, so likewise in the same place, he maketh his Angels windes, as Baza rendreth it. Thus he departed out of this world, who not onely in his ascent, but also many other wayes was a most eminent type of Christ. First, in that he is brought in, as another Melchisedek, without father or mother, no mention being made, as of other prophets, of his father. Secondly, He lived obscurely a long time, and then suddainly began to shew himself to the king of Israel, as Christ did himself at 30. years of age. Thirdly, he was fed by a widow, whose sonne not withstanding died, but he raised him to life again, so Christ having been entertained by Mary and Martha, yet their brother Lazarus died, but he was by him raised up again, but not without much ado, as that widowes sonne by Elijah. Fourthly, Elijah brought fire from heaven to destroy sinners, Christ sent downe the holy Ghost, as fire to destroy sinne. Fifthly, Elijah being full of heaviness and alone in the wilderness was comforted by an Angel, so Christ in the garden before his passion. Sixthly, Elijah fasted forty days, so Christ. Seventhly, the spirit of Elijah rested upon Elisab after his ascent, so the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles.

Elijah being taken away, Elisab took up the mantle, which fell from him and went and stood by the river Iordan. This may seem to be too small a matter to be remembered, but seeing this mantle was the ensigne of his prophetical office, and hereby so great a miracle had been then wrought, in dividing the waters of Iordan, it was by a speciall providence, that it was left him, that he wearing the habit of Elias, might be known to be his successeur in the prophetical office, and so be the more readily obeyed, and the rather, when they should see that the same spirit of power accompanied this mantle in Elisab by his dividing therewith the same waters again. Men of high and eminent place, saith Martyr, as kings, do put on the same famerobes which their predecessours did weare, so Elishah the mantle of Elijah. And Chrysostome he saith, will have this mantle to be a figure of the body and blood of Christ, which he left unto his Church upon earth, when he ascended up into heaven, making yet this difference; Christ left us this mantle of his, and yet hath it with him in heaven, Elijah not. From hence the Papists inferre, that Chrysostome held the reall presence, but the meaning of that father is not, that the bread and wine in the Sacrament are the very substantiall body and blood of Christ to be corporally received, but spiritually, and by faith. For he further addeth, that there was double Elijah, one in heaven above, another in the earth beneath; thus calling his mantle, left upon earth. Elijah because of the spirit, and vertue of Elijah accompanying it, when it was in the hands of Elishah. In calling the sacrament Christs body and blood, then he meant doubtlesse virtually, and spiritually.

Then Elishah that he might have a way to passe over, smote the river with the mantle as Elijah had done, but the waters not being thus divided, he prayed and said, where is the God of Elijah? and then smote them again, and they were divided. God would not presently make the Disciple equall to his master, but after a while, least he should be too much puffed up, nor would he meely by striking the waters with the mantle have the waters divided, least the power and vertue should seem to lay in it. But he must first call upon God, that it might be acknowledged to be his act, and that the mantle was only an instrument. By saying, where is the God of Elijah, he meant, where is the promise of doubling the spirit upon me made in Gods name by Elijah, or [oh thou God of Elijah] make good this promise unto me, in causing the waters of this river to divide at my striking, as thou diddest when they were stricken by him. The Cald. paraph. receive my petition (O Lord God of Elijah) even thou. He said not, where is the Lord, &c. out of diffidence, as Ambrose hath it, but as desirous to be made partaker of his benefits, or as desiring his presence thereby. For if he had doubted, he should not have prevailed at another smiting; for he that doubteth, is like a wave of the sea, Iam. 1. 5. In the vulgar Latin these words are supplied, and they were not divided [to make the sense the more full, for they are not in the Hebrew, but must be understood, because they were not then divided; as appeareth by his calling upon God, and striking the waters of Iordan again.

But the sonnes of the Prophets which were in Iericho, on the other side, seeing him said, the spirit of Elijah, resteth upon Elishah, &c.] This is not so to be understood, as if they being in Iericho had seen Elishah at Iordan, for Iericho was about 6 miles off, but 50 men of them are said v. 7. to have followed him, and Elijah going towards Iordan, and to have stood afar off, and of these it is to be understood. These sons of the Prophets who dwelt in Iericho, having placed themselves conveniently upon some high place, from whence, although it were as farre off, they might see what was done; these I say, seeing what Elishah had done, came forth to meet him, and did reverence to him, as the undoubted successour of Elijah, by whom they were now to be governed.

Then they offered to goe and seek up Elijah, if happily the spirit of God had taken him and cast him into some valley or mountain, and although Elishah denied, they importuned him till they prevailed, and so went 3 dayes, but all in vain. And these 50 men that went, are said to be valiant men, or strong, that is, to endure travaile, not to fetch back Elijah by force. If any man shall wonder, why they would take so great paines to seek him, seeing they knew before by the spirit, that he was then to be taken away, and if they knew not, that he should be taken away, and return no more, but thought that he was only transported, as he had formerly sometimes been, why should they now goe to seek him more then in times past, when as the same spirit which then transported him, brought him back again without any mans seeking in his good time and by the speech of Obadiab we may gather, that it was vain to seek him, when the spirit had carried him away, seeing Ahab sent into all lands about in vain to seek him? No reason can be rendred, but that God would have it thus to be done, the more to make manifest this miraculous departure of his Prophet, not from one part of the earth to another, but into heaven.

Whereas

Chrysost. Hom.
2. ad populum
Antioch.

V. 4.

Tostatus.
Ne novus propheta
S. propheti- co recens accepto,
alicui vanitati
vel inani laetitia succubere, sed ut
ad Deum in ora- tione recurreret,
&c.
Cald. paraph.
Ambros. in Ps.
37.

V. 15.

V. 16. 17.

Pellican saith, that they would goe to seek him out of their curiosity.

V. 18.

V. 19.

Pellican.
P. Martyr.

Iosephus.
De bel. Jud. l. 5.
c. 4.
Hunc fontem al-liquando ferunt non solum terra at quo lignorum fructus, sed eti-am seminarum partum abundere olivum, cuiusque pariter morbo & peste corrumpere.

Junius.

quidam autem dicunt orogoniam hanc esse fontem

Whereas Elishah withstood the motion, it was, because he knew more then they did, that he should return no more; and yet for their importunity he yielded to let them goe, least he should be thought to be unwilling with his return, that he might govern over the sonnes of the Prophets now alone.

When they returned to Elishah, he is said to have dwelt at Iericho, because he stayed there the time of their going to search, not because he abode constantly in that place, for v. 23. he went from thence to Bethel, and from Bethel to Carmel, where he had dwelt before with his master Elijah v. 25. and that most probably was his dwelling place. But in that little time of his stay in Iericho, there was an occasion offered to work a great miracle, whereby it further appeared that the spirit of God was in him, as he had been in Elijah. The waters of Iericho were naught, and the earth barren, wherefore at the request of the inhabitants there, he healeth them with salt, which properly maketh water unfit to drink, and ground barren. How the water here came to be corrupted, is not known, but Pellican imputeth it to the sinnes of the inhabitants, since the rebuilding of this city. Martyr saith, some conjecture this punishment to have been laid upon it, because it was rebuilt by Hiel in Abahs time, contrary to the interdiction under a curse, and some that it was thus ever since the time that Ioshuah cursed it, that it might not be rebuilt. But Martyr subscribeth neither to the one conjecture, nor the other. Only because the land of Canaan generally was very fruitfull, he thinketh, that these waters had not this ill quality from the beginning, but that it was laid as a punishment upon the inhabitants for their sins, as the land of Sodom and Gomorrah came to be tainted with the mare mortuum, and since the land of Iudeah was all made barren, as travellers report; and it is threatned, Ps. 107. a fruitfull land is turn'd into barrenesse for the sins of those that dwell therein. Some yet saith he, hold it to have come from the dead sea of Sodom, which was not farre from Iericho. But then it must be granted to have been so before the coming of that cutte by building there, yea it was the fruitfulness of the ground, if we will believe Iosephus, that allured him unto it. Wherefore it must needs follow, that God being offended with the building, corrupted the waters, and made the earth thus barren, by their washing thereupon in no small quantity of ground, as was said before out of Iosephus, whom I have thought it not amisse to bring in here speaking upon this place. There is a most large fountain here, and most fruitfull in watering the fields, of which it is reported, that sometime it was wont to make abortive the soile of the earth, the fruit of trees, and the great bellies of women, and to corrupt all things with sicknesse and plague. But afterwards it was made most wholesome and fattening to the ground by Elishah the Prophet, when being courteously entertained by the inhabitants, hee remunerated them with this perpetuall favour, by casting into it a cruce full of salt. And hee prayed the heavens, that is, God, to temper the rivers with more fruitfull ayre, &c. By these prayers having also wrought many things with his hands, he so changed the fountain, that whereas it had formerly caused abortion and famine, now it was the authour of fruitfulness and living; For now it is of such vertue, that if it doth but touch the ground, it is made a long time after the more savory, &c. According to this, Ambrose, & after him Innius, Martyr and some others expound the word, as indeed it signifieth, which is commonly rendered barren laboriosa, Regio facit abortum, (saith Innius) that is, suffreth neither the young of men or of living creatures, nor the fruits of the earth to come to maturity. It it be said, how then could that place be inhabited, and much more how can that be true v. 19. The habitation of this place is good?

Ans. It is meant, that there were good buildings and a good ayre, and had it not been for the ill quality of the water, the soil fruitfull enough, but yet howsoever much much detriment was hereby suffered, it is not to be thought that the whole tract of ground about the city was thus tainted, but onely where the waters commonly washed it, and therefore as they abounded more or lesse, it was more or lesse ph-noxious to them. However now, by casting in a cruse of salt into them these wa-ters were healed of this ill quality, which plainly shewed the hand of God; that wrought by Elisbah, there being no aptnesse in salt to work such an effect in wa-ter, and if there were for some kinde of corruption in water, yet not for so great a quantity so little being cast in, nor for so long a time, that is, ever after. And this great miracle, was without doubt wrought for the conversion of the men of Ieri-cho from idolatry to the true God, and to make both them and all others, that should hear of it, to magnifie his power and goodnesse, and to serve him, that worketh such wonders with all constancy.

Then Elisbah went to Bethel, where he had been with Elijah, next before their coming to Iericho, where was also a Colledge of prophets, as was before said. But as he went, little children came out and mocked him, saying, come up bald-pate. Then he cursed them in the name of the Lord, and two Beares coming out of the wood, tore 40. of them. Herein the prophet may seem to have been too impatient, but it is to be understood, that Bethel was a place tainted with idolatry. For as there was a Colledge of prophets, so a golden Calf was there set up by Ieroboam, which doubtlesse was still worshipped by most, and therefore the prophets of God were nothing acceptable unto them, when they came thither, but derided and scorned, and as they saw older ones do, even their little children did now to Elisbah. Wherefore for the punishment of their idolatrous parents, and the deter-ring of all men from condemning the holy servants of God, which is to his dispa-ragement and of his truth, it was just in Elisbah to curse them, as being stirred up hereunto not by impatience, but by the spirit of God; and it was just in God to take this miraculous revenge upon them, and the rather, because it might happily turn to an occasion of drawing some from idolatry unto him. Thus August. serm. 204. faith, that the parents were corrected in the punishment of their children, who in-sulted over the prophet at the instigation of their parents; that the little ones being smitten, the greater might receive discipline, and learn to fear the prophet doing wonders, whom they would not be hereby drawn to love. And Procopius saith, it was for the great benefit both of childe and parents; to them, because it inhibited their malice growing greater in time; to these, by teaching them to bring up their children better in the fear of God, and the reverence of good men. And it is well noted by Martyr here, that this reproach laid upon Elisbah by such as would say the worst of him that they could by way of exprobration, did make much for his cre-dit, seeing baldnesse is no vice, but a small naturall blemish, and hereby it seemeth, that they could object no worse thing against him. And in like manner, they of the reformed religion, whilst the papists object unto them, the want of vestments and ceremonies in divine service, and of imposition of bishops hands in ordination, &c. do not discredit, but credit them, as being acknowledged thus to be free from no-torious faults, of which otherwise they should be sure to hear. For baldnesse, men are generally ashamed of it, neither could the Emperour Domitian, who was bald himself, endure to hear any other man upbraided by his bald-head; and Julius Caesar as being ashamed to have this seen in him, used never to come forth without a gar-land upon his head, and others commonly hide it with periwigs at this day. Elisbah therefore took it as a great disgrace put upon him, and consequently upon his God, and so called for this judgement.

But having done thus, he stayed not at Bethel, but passed away immediately to Carmel, the place of his dwelling, as not doubting, but that the men of Bethel would be by this fact greatly exasperated against him, although through the fear which fell upon them, none durst pursue him, and from Carmel he went to Sama-ria, which was a place most infected with idolatry, as being the metropolis there-of, by reason of the idolatrous kings residing there, as ch. 3. 1. sheweth. And to this place, it is to be thought, that he came to instruct and stay the people, as much as might be, from idolatry; and to this end, he followed the camp when Ishoram

Note.

V. 22.

V. 23.

P. Martyr.
Note.

Suetonius.

V. 24.

The Allegory.

Glos. ordin.

went forth with his army against Moab; and that he might be at hand to work another great miracle, when need required, to move them the more, as the following history sheweth.

In the children mocking at Elishab and bidding him, ascende calve, Augustine will have the Jews, who are compared to children sitting in the market-place figured out; for the place where they crucified Christ, was Calvary, and in mocking him they said, descend from the crosse, &c. wherefore two Beates Titus and Vespasian destroyed them, about 43. yeares after Christ his passion. Thus also the Ordinar. Glosse, adding, that as Elishab, so Christ was thus mocked, when he went up to Bethel, that is, heaven, the house of God. And here touching the ascent of Elijab it is said, that he was taken up in a fiery chariot, but Christ figured by him, without; because the one was a meer man and so needed an help to carry him up, but the other by his own vertue ascended. And that there were three in three ages of the world taken up into heaven, Enoch begotten and begetting, Elijab begotten but not begetting, Christ neither begotten as man, nor begetting, to shew, that the faithfull of all sorts and of all times are received thither.

Touching Elishab desiring the spirit to be doubled upon him, he is also by the Glosse made herein the figure of the Church. For the Church being emboldened to ask by the Lords invitation, desireth also a double portion of the spirit to that, which Christ had, viz. the gift of miraculous operations and remission of sinnes, which he needed not; and as Elishab had his request granted upon condition, if he did see Elijab in his ascension, so the faithfull which see, that is, believe not onely the incarnation and passion, but also the resurrection and ascension of Christ into heaven, obtain their request, yea do greater things through the spirit, then Christ did, as he promised that they should, and it may be noted that the Apostles did. Lastly as Elishab used the name of Elijab to work that miracle at Jordan, so in the name of Christ the Apostles did miracles, and in this name he must come that would prevail for any thing. Morally Elijab his ascent in a fiery chariot, signified, that the fierie heat of love availeth more to carry a man to the highest, then the splendour of knowledge: and the fiery chariot accompanied with a whirlwinde, that where the greatest light of grace is in this life, there is yet some darknesse. Also the waters, upon which Elishab wrought his miracle, signifie divine doctrine, which becometh naught, when errours are mixed therewith, but by the salt of discretion, that which is corrupt being separated from the sound, it is healed, and the sonnes of the prophets may safely drink thereof, that is, reade and meditate upon it.

CHAP. III.

V. 1.

V. 2, 3.

Pellican.

Pellican.

B For Ioram, the sonne of Ahab, began to reign in Samaria anno 18. of Iehoshaphat, &c. Of the time of Ioram beginning to reign, enough hath been said already, upon ch. 1. 17. And from the time of his beginning, to his cutting off by Rehob were 10. yeares. All which time he was spared, not because he was good, but not altogether so bad as his father. For although he departed not from the sinne of Iehoshaphat, in worshipping the golden calves, yet he put down Baal, whom his father had set up; but because nothing is said of his mother, Pellican saith, that he touched not her groves, noting, that women are more stiffe in their errours, but here seems to be no ground for this. How Ioram was moved to put down Baal is not said, but because Iehoshaphat is by and by spoken of, as a confederate whom he sought to for help in his warre with Moab; and so readily yielded to go with him, as before with Ahab, notwithstanding his ill successe and check given him from God therefore; it is conceived by some, that Ioram was drawn to this by Iehoshaphat, who would not other wise help him, but now did, and was never reproved therefore, but graced with a miracle, for his sake wrought by Elishab. For it was no small work in Ioram to do this, both because his father had set up the worship worship of Baal, whose act he would not lightly reverse, especially being without the grace of turning from idolatry, and because his mother Iezabel still lived, who was stiffly addicted unto this idolatry. Wherefore it must be granted, that he was drawn to this by some other, who had great power with him, and who could this be, but Iehoshaphat? But why did he not move him to put down all other idolatry also? Ans<sup>w</sup>. He hoped probably, that being brought by his perswasion to do this, he might afterwards be drawn to put down Ieroboams idolatry also.

Thus much being set forth in generall, touching Ioram, now followeth his warring against Moab. Mesa the king of Moab, who had been a tributary to the kings of Israel ever since David's time, who subdued Moab and made them his servants, 2 Sam. 8. 2. paying yearly 100000. lambs, and 100000. rams with their wooll to the king of Israel (to whom it seemeth, after the division of the kingdome Moab fell, as Edom to Iudah) now Abah being dead, refused to pay it any longer. This wrong Abaziah that succeeded his father Abah next, revenged not, although it be spoken of Moabs revolt at his coming to the crown, 2 King. 1. 1. for both his reign was short after his fathers death, and in that short time sicknesse hindered him, but Iehoram his brother no sooner attained to the kingdome, but he gathered an army together to reduce Moab into this servitude again. And to make himself the stronger, he sent to Iehoshaphat to joyn with him, who was very ready so to do, partly for the cause before assigned, which Martyr mentioneth, as the opinion of some, and partly because it did in some sort concern him to help to subdue a tributary king, revolting from the obedience of his sovereign, for if this were suffered, he might fear, that other nations under his obedience, would offer the like injury to him: and lastly, he could not, but have still in his minde the attempt of the Moabites with others against him, 2 Chron. 20. 1. and therefore took this opportunity to pay them in their own coyn. All which reasons notwithstanding, Martyr censureth his joyning with wicked Ioram in this warre. But the premises considered, and especially Gods forbearing to reprove him, which he used not to do in case of his doing unlawfully in any thing, I dare not say, that Iehoshaphat sinned herein, but did justly and wisely. Iosephus relating this history, saith, that Ioram solicited Iehoshaphat by his messengers, to joyn with him in this warre, and that Iehoshaphat promised not onely so to do, but also to draw the king of Moab to be a party in it, whereupon Ioram went to him to Ierusalem, and being royally entertained, by common counsell they went the way of Edom, most probably to call the Edomites with them; And because it was not expected, that an army could come upon them that way, so that they were likely to be the more unprepared to resist. But when they had travelled this way seven dayes, the Edomite army being with them, they were in a great strait for want of water, and then Iehoshaphat enquireth for a prophet; and hearing of Elishah they went unto him, &c. Elishah is described here by powring water upon the hands of Elijah, because he waited upon him, and not for any miraculous dropping of water from his fingers, according to the Rabbins fiction mentioned before, 1 King. 18. 32. Ioram in this streight did nothing but cry out and complain. as a man in despair, but godly Iehoshaphat sought to the Lord. For, as Lyra hath it, he enquired after a prophet of the Lord, that he might entreat the Lord for them, that they might be supplied with water in this their great want. Elishah seeing the king of Israel, upbraided him by the prophets of his father and mother, bidding him to go to them, as being the men, that ministred to the idol, whom he served rather then the true God, and not to seek to Gods prophets, whom he hated, and his parents had persecuted so lately to death. For it is not to be expected, that they, who hate the servants of God, and will not hearken to them to amend their lives, should have comfort from them in time of necessity, but be left to perish comfortlesse in their distresses. If necessity had not enforced Ioram to it, he would never have deigned to come to such a poor man as Elishah, which he knowing well enough, greeteth him accordingly, yet not by way of insulting over him in his misery, but as deeming it a fit time to reprove him thus, that he might be ashamed of his former idolatry, & observance of such prophets, as could yield him no help in time of his need, & so grow henceforth

V. 4.

V. 7.

P. Martyr.

Iosephus

V. 9, 10
V. 11, 12.

Lyra.

V. 13.

to a contempt of them. But why did he upbraid him now by idolatrous prophets, when as he had put down Baal, whom his father had set up? v. 2. Ans. Happily he being a servitor of Ieroboams calves, still used the same prophets, as ministering indifferently to them both, and of his putting down the prophets of his mother, which were the prophets of the groves, nothing is said before, so that he might well have them still objected to him to his disgrace, as being nothing acceptable to the Lord in putting down some idolatry, but retaining some still.

V. 13.

The king being thus upbraided by Elifha, as his urgent necessity required, gave him no reprehensive answer, but said, No, for the Lord hath called these three kings together, that he might deliver them into the hands of Moab. The meaning is, no, I will not go to the prophets of my father or mother, for neither by Baal nor any other god am I brought into this streight, or can be holpen out of it but by the Lord. He it is, that by his just judgment hath brought us into this danger, therefore I flee to thee, as his servant; let these exprobrations then passe for this time, & apply thy self rather by seeking to the Lord, that we may be succoured and not suffered to perish for want of water. Elifhab seeing Iorams pride thus pulled down, saith Theodoret, thought it a fit opportunity to go on to shew him how contemptible his sinne had made him, therefore without speaking to his answer, he proceeded saying, As the Lord of hosts liveth, in whose sight I stand, but that I respect the face of Iehoshaphat, I would not have looked towards thee, that is, but that Iehoshaphats danger is now inseparably linked with thine, who is a godly king, and therefore worthy of all honourable respect from the servants of the Lord, I would not have done any thing at thy request, but let thee have gone with contempt into destruction, as thou hast at other times contemned the Lord and me. And this he spake, not to teach a sleighting of kings that reign over us, although wicked, but to shew, that such as will not hearken to good admonitions in their prosperity, shall seek in their extremities for help at Gods hands, and be neglected, and if the wicked have any help in this case, it is not for their own, but for their sakes that fear God, Whom whilst he delivereth, they being in the same common danger are delivered also.

Theodoret.

Note.

V. 15.

Then he said, bring me a Minstrell, &c. The vulgar Latin, a singer of Psalmes, but the word is מְנַחֵם signifying a striker upon a muscical instrument; and therefore it is better rendred, a minstrell, that playeth and maketh melody with his hand. But why the prophet would thus prepare to his prophesying of comfort to the distressed, divers, saith Martyr, speak diversly; some, that his minde irritated by Ieroboams wickednesse, might be pacified, and so he might be more fit for divine revelations, which were not wont to be made, when the affections were troubled, but calm and quiet; some, that the people present might be lifted up in their languishing minds, and so made more fit to receive comfort, both which are by Iunius, joyned together. Some because the spirit of God will not enter into a sad mind, but into the cheerful; for which cause at times of sacrificing, they were bidden to cheer up themselves by eating and drinking of the best, and Isaack to prepare himselfe to a propheticall blessing, would first have venison provided him. But Martyr not resting in these reasons addeth another. viz. That he would have musick to invite the spirit of God to speak comfort by him by reciting in some sweet and heavenly tune the most memorable doings of the Lord formerly towards his people, and praising him therefore, and praying for present help. And this seemeth indeed to be the main reason, why Elijah called now for a minstrell, the other not being excluded. He had been somewhat stirred in his mind against Ieroboams wickednesse, and therefore partly to bring his mind into a calmer temper, and partly, that whilst musick was made to the praise of God, he praying together might receive direction from the spirit, how to provide against the present evill, he called for one skilfull in striking the instrument thus; not any indifferently, but a levite or godly man trained up in this way. Thus also Theodoret and Procopius, conjecturing that the minstrell was a levite, and played, and sung some Psalm of David. And in imitation of this, happily it is now a custome in our Church to sing a Psalm before a Sermon to invite the spirit to come amongst us, and inspire us to speak to his glory, and our mutual

P. Martyr.Iunius.

Theodoret.
Procopius.
Note.

tuall comfort. For this is not obscurely intimated to be the way of being filled with the spirit, Eph. 5. 18, 19. where it is said, Be fulfilled with the spirit singing to your selves in Hymnes and Psalmes and spirituall songs, &c. and therefore this way is not only then to be followed, but at other times and places also by all such, as would be made partakers of divine and spirituall light and comfort.

And the hand of the Lord was upon him, and he said, thus saith the Lord, make ditches, ditches, &c. That is, many ditches. By the hand is meant the spirit, which told him, that ditches being made, they should have great store of water without seeing any rain, wherewith both they and their cattell might all be refreshed. And not only so, but that Moab should be delivered into their hands, and that they should smite every choise city, and cast down every good tree, and stop up every fountain of water, &c. which began to come to passe accordingly, for in the morning, at the time of sacrificing, waters coming by the way of Edom, filled the land; and the time is described by the offering of sacrifice, to shew that the supplications offered to God at Iernusalem were regarded in this miraculous succouring of the army abroad. The prophet saith Lyra, forelaw by the spirit, that abundance of raine should fall in places not farre off, which by the brook that was now dry, should run thither, and pits being made ready be filled therewith, let them make as many as they could, and thus not only for the present, but the water being here held, they should be supplied many dayes after.

Iosephus saith, that this rain fell in the higher parts of Idumea, three dayes journey from thence, and by Gods providence came running along to the place where they had digged.

For their destroying of good fruit-bearing trees, it may seem to be against the law of God, Dent. 20. But it is commonly answered, that Moab was for their extraordinary wickednesse particularly excepted from the benefit of that law, and yet further by the said Lyra, that the law there concerned not other countries, but the land of Canaan only, where the Israelites were to dwell, and to have the benefit of fruit-bearing trees afterwards. Martyr seemeth to incline to this, that the cutting down of fruit-bearing trees any where was forbidden, but for this time the Lord dispensed with this law in Moab for their greater punishment.

He mentioneth also another Exposition, that the law forbidding the cutting down of such trees was made only in case that they besieged a city and lay long before it in which time they might have need of the fruit to eat. But in the land of Moab there being no such occasion, they were not by this law tyed from cutting them down. But I rest in the last of Lyra, and so Martyr also finally doth. For the sins of the Moabites, for which God would have their country thus spoiled, they were many and great. For first they were worshippers of Baal Peor, and sought in times past to draw Israel to the like idolatry, to the provoking of the Lord greatly against them. Secondly they hired Baalam to curse Israel. 3. They were now grown proud and would no longer be subject to the king of Israel, neither pay him any tribute, and therefore it was just, that they should be thus spoiled, although one of the instruments now used, that is, the king of Israel and his people were little better; for they were not regarded in this no more then in the miracle of water wrought, but Iehoshaphat a godly king only.

They hearing of these kings coming, gathered themselves altogether, that were able to beare armes, and stood at their borders; where, according to Lyra, the entrance of the land was narrow, and therefore might be best defended. And when they saw the confluence of waters coming down through the hoast look red, they deeming it to be blood flowing from the slain, conceived, that the three kings had fallen out, and that their armies had shed the blood of one another, and therefore they go on disorderly to take the spoile, and so were unexpectedly smitten by the Israelitish army, and immediately after their cities were destroyed, &c. as was prophesied. There might be a naturall cause saith Martyr, of the waters seeming red at the rising of the sun through the reflexion of the beames thereof, shewing the more red by means of thick vapours, whereupon they being apt to believe, that it had fallen out as they would have it, resolved that their enemies had slain one another,

V. 16.

V. 18, 19.

V. 20.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

V. 21.

Lyra.

V. 22, 23.

24, 25.

P. Martyr.

Note.

ther, neither were reasons wanting to this their conjecture; viz. the king of Edoms unwilling being amongst them, who favoured rather the Moabites, and the streight in which they were for want of water, which might breed a quarrell against those, that were the authours of going that way. But God did plainly infatuate them, in that the appearance of blood, before they knew, whether it were blood or no, or had sent out to be better assured, drew them out of their borders where they were strongest; disorderly to expose themselves to the danger of their potent, and well prepared enemies. This teacheth, that when God hath a judgement to bring upon a land for sin, they shall be so farre unable to withstand it, as that they shall rather by their own rash and foolish doings hasten it upon themselves.

Whereas in shewing that all things were done, as the Prophet had foretold to the Moabites cities, fields, fountaines, and trees; it is finally said, so that they onely left the stones in Kirharseth. Iunius till at Kirharseth, the Moabites left the stones thereof. [The vulgar Latin, ita ut muri tantum fistiles remanerent] earthen walls onely remained. It is to be understood, that Kir signifieth a city, and Harseth an earthen vessell, and is here put for a wall of brick, from whence cometh the proper name Kirharseth; but being expounded as an appellative, there is some colour for the vulgar Latin Expositours; yet it must needs be granted to be imperfect, seeing קִיר the stones thereof, and קִיר a city are not mentioned herein, but are in the original. The true reading is, till a leaving of the stones thereof the city Harseth. That is, the stones of every cities walls being pulled down were cast upon their best fields, till they came at this city, to which the king of Moab was fled, where the wall made of stone stood still for a defence to such as escaped. But why the Moabites should be brought in by Iunius, as causing it to stand, I cannot see. It stood indeed the last of all their cities, and no doubt, but many fled thither for refuge, it being their strongest hold, but the intent of the history is not to shew who upheld it, but only that hitherto it stood, as being that, which the Israelites left to bee assaulted last, and therefore the stones of the wall of that city were not broken down according to the generall prophesie, and now is shewed the occasion when the slingers of stones with engines had compassed it, and beaten the Moabites off, so that the Israelites were now ready to be masters of the city, happily some great breaches being made in the walls, for which it is said they smote it. The king of Moab desperately attempted with 700 men to come forth on that side where the Edomites were, but could not, then he took his eldest sonne, and sacrificed him upon the wall, which being seen, there was great indignation against the Israelites, so that they presently departed. The king of Moab when all other meanes failed him, sought to move his God to help him by offering the dearest sacrifice that he could, which the Israelites seeing, compassionated him so farre, that they could not goe forth on in the siege, but immediately broke it up.

V. 26, 27.

Lyra.
Iosephus first broached it,
and is followed by Theodore,
Tostatus, and favoured by the Septuagint;
where it is,
there was great repentance in Israel, instead of great indignation.

This saith Lyra, is the common exposition, but he rejecteth it because they sought the destruction of the king of Moab, and his posterity, therefore seeing his eldest son sacrificed, they would rather have bin animated to hold on the siege, conceiving that shortly the king, and city, and all would come into their power, their case appearing hereby to be desperate, if there had been no other reason of their now departing. And they might have been the more exasperated to revenge for this grosse idolatry, then moved to desist from assaulting the city. Wherefore he rather followeth, R. Solomon saying, that the king of Moab asked his prophets, where- by the Israelites came into so great favour with God, that they obtained miraculously so many famous victories? they said, that Abraham their father in obedience unto him sacrificed his only sonne, which he so highly accepted of, that ever since his favour was singularly to his posterity.

The king hearing this immediatly sacrificed his sonne, and then the Angel, which was set over Moab, put the Lord in minde of as great wickednesse done by the Israelites, in that they sacrificed their sonnes and daughters unto devils, as is complained, Pf. 104. or 105. and for this the Lord sent a plague into the campe of Israel, whereby many being destroyed they were forced to depart, for it is not said, as in the vulgar Latin, there was great indignation in Israel, but Hebr. against Israel, so

Lyra,

Lyra. Iunius saith, that the kings sonne being offered, the Edomites were moved with indignation against Israel, as the cause, and so falling out with them departed, and then the Israelites, their forces being by this means weakned departed, as unable to prevail any further. Maryr saith, that some think the king of Edoms son is meant, whom the king of Moab having taken sacrificed; others, that the king of Moabs sonne being taken by the king of Edom, was thus served by him. But to passe these over as frivolous conjectures, that which he hath last, arideth me most, there was great indignation upon Israel, they being likewise superstitious would not proceed in the siege any further, as thinking, that if they should, so great a sacrifice being offered, it would cost them dear; but others in the army not being hereby moved, were filled with wrath against them for this their fear, and so being disunited in their affections, they disbanded and went away, thus through their own default loosing the opportunity of doing all to the Moabites, which was prophesied, and of reducing them to their former tributary condition. And this, that they were moved at the sight of such a sacrifice, is not improbable, considering that it was an errour, which overspread many nations, that the Gods must be pacified, and help of them is obtained, when things be most desperate by humane sacrifice. The occasion whereof might first be Gods commanding Abraham to sacrifice his son, then the Oracle of Apollo being consulted with, when a great plague raged amongst the Lacedemonians, how it might be made to cease, answered, if a virgin of noble condition were sacrificed, and like wise to the Phereans. Polyxena also the daughter of Priamus was sacrificed, and Iphigenia the daughter of Agememnon. If any shall wonder why God would suffer any good event to follow upon such an abomination, as here the siege to be broken up, seeing this tended to confirm men more in their horrible idolatry, it is answered, that none are moved hereby, but they that are given over to strong delusions to beleve lies, because they obeyed not the truth. For others are not wrought upon by signes, unlesse the thing to confirm which they are shewed, be faith and adhering to the true God, and worshipping him in that way, which he hath appointed. To what god this king offered his son, it is not said, some, Rabbins think to the true, but ours, to his idol Chamos, or the Sunne.

Junius.P. Maryr.Plutarch. paral. c. 66.Deut. 13.

CHAP. III.

Here other miracles wrought by Elisbah also are set forth, to prove his God to be the onely true God, as the necessity of those times and of the estate of Israel being drowned in idolatry especially required. And first, the widow of a certain prophet being left in debt, seeking unto him had her oyl encreased to so great a quantity, that she therewith both paid her debts, and lived with her children upon the residue; a like miracle unto which, had been wrought before by Elisjah for a widow in Sareptah. The Prophet, whose widow this was, is thought by the Rabbins to be Obadiah, who had fed 100. prophets, hiding them in caves from the fury of Iezabel, by which means he spent his estate, & became indebted to Ioram the king, steward to whose father he had been. Thus also Iosephus, whom Theodoret followeth, and Procopius, and Comestor, &c. But this is most improbable, seeing Obadiah was none of the sonnes of the prophets, as this man is here called, but of another condition, viz. a noble man, that was a benefactour to the Lords prophets, and therefore not likely by so small expences, as by feeding sparingly 100. prophets with bread and water a certain time, to be brought in debt. It must then suffice us to know onely, that she was the widow of a prophet, and not in particular who this prophet was. But what moved her to seek to Elisbah in this her streight? Answe. She had heard, what he had done for the whole army in their necessitie, and therefore she beleaved, that he could help her in her need, and in this confidence, because her husband also was well known unto him, and approved of by him, and of the same calling with himselfe, for which she hoped, that he would

V. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.Iosephus. Theodoret.

Note.

would be willing, she came to lay her case open unto him thus; The creditour is come to take my two sons for servants. Here was a man that feared God, and a prophet, and yet died in debt, not leaving where withall to pay it, so that it is not alwayes a badge of the wicked to borrow and not to pay again. For into such a case the best may fall by worldly crosses, or by the iniquity of the times, through oppressions of persecuting tyrants against them, whereby their estates are weakened. But if any by spending in prodigality and excess, or by negligence and improvidence cometh to decay, so as that the creditour cannot be paid, he may justly be branded for wicked, and much more, if any fraudulently conceal their goods, or hide themselves to defeat him of his due. For the law of debts, if any man ow'd so much, that he was not able to pay it, he was taken for a servant by the creditour, both he and his children, the ground whereof seemeth to be, Exod. 22. 3. where it is ordained, that he, who had stoln and had not where withall to make restitution, should be sold, that this debt might be paid; and Levit. 25. 39. where mention is made of an Hebrew indebted, that selleth himself. From hence it was gathered, that this was one way of paying debts, and in case a man indebted would not voluntarily do thus, he was sold to be a servant, or made to serve the creditour in way of satisfaction, and because as the condition of the father is, such is the condition of the children, when the father was made a servant to any man, his children were his servants also, the creditour took not onely the father, but also his children, as appeareth by the parable, Matth. 18. 25. In like manner at this time when the father was dead, the creditour came to take the debtours children. But the law of the Lord in this case favoured so much the Israelites, that if they could after this pay, they should be freed again, if not, yet in the year of jubilee (which was every seventh) without paying, and in the mean season they must be well entreated. Martyr here amplifieth this of debtors, by bringing in the lawes of other nations, as of the twelve tables of the Romans, whereby liberty was given to the debtor by the Iudges, before whom he was brought for thirty dayes, and if in that time he could not or would not pay, then he was delivered bound to his creditour, who compelled him to serve him by hard labour. But this causing sedition amongst the people, it was decreed afterwards, that the debtor should satisfie his creditours with all his goods, which if he would not or used fraud, then he was committed to prison till payment was made.

Levit. 25. 39.
P. Martyr.

Aul. Gellius lib.
20. c. 1.

Touching the present history, this widow was much grieved, that her sonnes should be taken for servants, because haply the creditour who came to take them, was cruell, and would not use them according to the law of God, which was little regarded in those idolatrous times, and therefore she sought to the prophet, who having not of his own where with to help her, enquired, what she had towards the paying of her debts, intimating, that if she had any thing to the valew, she should sell and pay. But hearing that she had onely a little oyl, which was of daily use in those times, either for food, or to anoint the body, (the vulgar Latin bath it, parum oile quo ungar) he willed her to borrow many vessels, and then being in her house and the doors shut to her, to pour out the oyle, and not that so famous a miracle, able to convert many to the true God should be concealed, but with the greater admiration made known by her borrowing of vessels, selling the oyl out, and paying the creditour. For if there had been any intention that it should not be known, the Lord could either have miraculously furnished her with vessels, and not have sent her about to borrow, or else with money, this meanes not being used. Lyra saith, that when miracles are wrought to confirm and comfort many, they were done publicly, but when for the comfort of some one, privately, as when Iesus raised the daughter of Jairus he suffered very few to be present. According to some, he willed her to shut out others from seeing this miracle for their unbelieve, that it might be no hinderance hereunto, for it is said of Christ, that he would do no great matters because of their unbelieve.

Lyra.

The widowes oyle being thus miraculously increased, the prophet biddeth her to sell so much as would pay the creditour, and live of the rest; teaching that debts must be paid, although he to whom be rich, and the debtor poore, and when hee bath hath paid, hath litle or nothing left; for it is by Gods providence, that some are rich, and some poor, neither may the poor take or withhold any thing from the rich, which is his; but deale justly with every one, and if in so doing he be destitute of means, he must remember that he hath still a father to provide for him, that will not suffer such as fear him to want any thing that is good, and therefore trust in him, and cry to him, who feedeth the very ravens that cry unto him. In that, somewhat was left for her and her children to live upon, who was the widow of a Prophet; it served to shew in speciall, that the widowes and children of faithfull Ministers of Gods word, are not to be suffered to want for their fathers sake, but to be provided for by those, that have power in the place where they lived, and ministred spirituall things.

Moreover it fell out upon a certain day, that as Elifhab passed to Shunem, there was a great woman, that stayed him to eat bread therefore as he passed that way, &c. Shunem, saith Martyr, was in the tribe of Issachar on the East side of mount Carmel, the dwelling place of Elifhab, and therefore as he went out to teach others, and to confirm them in the truth, and to visit the colledges of the Prophets, over which he was the superintendent, or to the king of Israels court, where it seemeth by that which here followeth, that now he was gracious, he often passed through this city. It was 16 miles from Carmel. And R. Solomon saith, that this woman was daughter to the sister of Abisbag the Shunamite, whom David took for his concubine in his old age, but this is to be taken rather for a bold conjecture upon a slender ground then for a matter of truth. And much more to be slighted even as ridiculous is that of his, that she knew Elifhab to be an holy man, because no flies would come to the dishes, of which he ate; neither was there any uncleanness upon his table, as Lyra addeth. It is more probable, that she gathered this from his holy carriage and holy speeches, which came from his mouth, and happily shee had heard somewhat of his miracles, although Martyr thinketh otherwise; but how they should be hid from her being one of such quality, and frequented by strangers, I cannot see. Therefore shee was desirous, that in his travaile he might alwayes be entertained in her house, moving her husband to this end, that he might have a chamber made him, and furnished. Being a woman of great wealth shee passed not for the cost, and being great in vertue, as the Chald. understands her greatnesse. Shee desired as oft, as might be, to use hospitality towards so holy a servant of God, being assured, that this was good and acceptable before him. And if he were thus accommodated with a private chamber, where he might not be troubled with other company, shee thought, that he would the rather be induced to come often thither, and shee moved her husband in this matter as her head, shewing that shee thought a wife might not doe any such act without her husbands consent, so a chamber was prepared for him, with his allowance. Elifhab desirous to shew thankfulness for this kindnesse caused his servannt Gebezi to call the Shunamite unto him one day above the rest, when he had retired himselfe thither and when shee was come to the door, as is most probable, for so it is expressed, v. 15. that at the next calling shee came no further; he said to Gebezi, which he would not have done, if shee had been in the chamber, tell her, behold thou hast been carefull for us, what wilt thou, that I doe now for thee, &c.] Her modesty was such, that shee would not enter into the bed-chamber of a man whilst he was there, because we must eschue not only evill, but all appearance of evill. The prophet thought to gratifie her by speaking to the King or Captain for her, because since his miraculous supplying of the kings army with water, in their greatest need, he was in great grace with him. But shee answered, [I dwell in the midst of my people.] That is, saith Lyra, I live amongst none but friends, who doe me no injury, so that I have no need of the Kings or Captains help against any. Martyr addeth, if I had need, I have friends and kinsfolks of good rank and quality, that would be ready to speak for me, and he observeth it, as a singular providence of God over her and her husband, that dwelling in an idolatrous kingdom, they were so free from injuries, they being so godly, neither did Elifhab think it could have been so, which caused him to make this offer. As evill as the times were, it is to be conceived, that some whole cities cleaved to the truth,

Note.

1 f. 34
Pl. 14. 7.
Note.V. 8.
P. Martyr.Patriarchs travels.

Lyra.

V. 10.

V. 11. 12.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

Note.

V. 15.

Note.

Gen 15. 11.

V. 16.

Lyræ.

Procop. declarat ipsum conditorem universi per os ipsius locutum fuisse, & ob hanc causam certam promissionem fecit.

V. 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22,
23, 24, 25.

P. Martyr.

truth, and so most probably did this of Shunem, by which meanes they lived quietly amongst themselves, and she in speciall for her goodnesse and courteous behaviour towards all, had the love of all about her, an example worthy the imitation of all both men and women. Having said thus, as the text implieth, she departed: for Gebezi was bidden to call her again, and then she came and stood at the door, as before, after that he had told his Master, that she had no childe and that her husband was old, v. 14. The prophet was still desirous some way to requite her kindnesse shewed in her hospitality, teaching all men gratitude for any benefit received, and because he would do something for her, that might be most acceptable, he was ready to hearken out, what that might be. Gebezi, who was more conversant in the family then he, told him, that she had no childe, and was now out of hope, because her husband was old. And indeed this could not but be accounted a thing most desirable to a barren woman, if by his prayers she might obtain a sonne, especially being rich, that not a stranger, but he might inherit this wealth. For even Abraham in the same case complained, saying, what wilt thou do for me, seeing I go childelesse and a stranger must inherit? When the Shunamite was come, the prophet promised her, saying, At this same season according to the time of life, thou shalt embrace a sonne. Gen. 18. 14. see the like phrase, setting forth that time twelve moneth. The vulgar Latin by turning it [ At this time, this very hour, if thou livest thou shalt conceive a sonne ] perverts the sense, as if the promise had depended upon her living, whereas according to Lyræ, and the Hebrew, by which he expoundeth it after R. Solomon, both a sonne and life is promised her within the compass of a year. But it is not necessary to expound these words, according to the time of life, of her living, because that is implied in the promise, seeing otherwise she could not have embraced a sonne. She being much affected with this joyfull news, answered, Nay my Lord, do not lye unto thy handmaid, the Hebrew word here used, saith Lyræ, signifieth either to lye, or to fail, and R. Solomon turneth it fail, it being meant, let me not be illuded by having a sonne, and then losing him soon again, but when I have brought him forth, let not his life fail, whereby I should have more sorrow by losing him, then joy in bringing him forth, and this is favoured by that, which she said by way of challenge to Elishab after his death, v. 8. The prophet in promising her a sonne, spake by inspiration, as the Oracle of God, and therefore delivered her this promise himself, and not by his servant, as before he had spoken to her. In making so certain a promise, saith Procopius, he declared, that the creatour himself spake by his mouth. And this was speedily verified by the event, for she conceived so, that she brought forth at the same season of the year, at the very time concerning which he spake unto her. But after a while the childe died, at which his mother being greatly troubled, laid him upon Elishab his bed, and hastened to the prophet at mount Carmel, &c. To make Elishab more famous yet by this childe, God smote him with sickness, and pain in his head, and death. But his mother full of faith, laid him upon the prophets bed, beleeving, that by his prayers he should be revived again. The meanes of the childes death, may be conceived to be the vehement heat of that time smiting his head, for it is said, that he went into the field to his father, being with the reapers, and then cried out, my head, my head. It was therefore harvest time, and then commonly it was exceeding hot, and did strike not onely children, but sometimes men, as Manasseh the husband of Indith, who is said to have died at such a time of like grief. Indith 8. 2. For her carrying of the childe up into Elishab his chamber and shutting him in there, Martyr saith, it was done to conceal his death from the family, that there might be no trouble about it, and it seemeth, that it was kept so close, that her husband knew not of it, seeing he would have stayed her from going to the man of God, and enquired the cause, as being ignorant of it, v. 23. And this shewed the great confidence, which she had of his being revived by Elishab, neither was she herein without all ground, seeing Elijah had lately done a like miracle upon the sonne of the widow of Sareptah, 1 King 17. 21. partly therefore to prevent sorrow in some, and partly detraction in others, who if they had known it, would have been ready to mock at the benefit obtained by Elishab, which so soon vanished again, she concealed it, till

till she had been with him for help in this her distresse, Tofatius saith, that she bid him, that her husband might not know of it, least he should hinder her from going through his unbelief. Having therefore obtained of her husband a servant, and an asse for the journey, shee hastened to Carmel, being as was said before, 16 miles off, and Adrichomius makes it 8 or 9 hours journey upon a swift going horle, which cannot be, seeing she spake of it, as one that would goe and return speedily again, yea, it being in the afternoon, when she went out, and not upon an horse, but a slow going asse; if it had been so farre off, shee could not have gone thither that night, whereas it is most probable, that she both went and returned, although very late. Her husband wondering at her hast, asked why she would goe to the man of God at that time, it being neither new moon, nor Sabbath, These times he named, because religious persons used then, some to go to the Prophets, where they taught the word of God, and some to the Synagogues, and it implyeth, that she had used to goe also in times past, and yet not upon the very day, when it was so farre off, and the travaile stood not with the rest of a Sabbath, but the day before, returning home the day after. She answered not to his question, but in one word, peace, which Tofatius rendreth, vale, as being unwilling to disclose the matter unto him, or to delay any time. It was a word usuall in salutations, a wishing of good to the person spoken to, and therefore no cause to enquire here as Martyr doth, whether she lyed unto him. The vulgar Latin rendreth it, [ I will goe ] very untruly and unbecoming to godly a woman, who would doe nothing without her husbands consent, as being her head; for which cause she asked leave of him, neither did he deny, but delay her, and so with his leave she went on her journey. And that she might come the sooner to Elifhab, she hastened her servant. Lead and goe, and make no stay for me in riding, unlesse I bid thee. The vulgar Latin, mina & propera, ne mihi moram facias in eundo sed hoc age, quod precipio tibi. Martyr for these words, in riding, that I may get up or ride, and indeed the word may be indifferently expounded both wayes. But whereas some upon this ground, as Martyr hath it, say that the woman followed the servant on foot, sending him away with the asse before to find out Elifhab, and to certifie him of her coming, commanding him not to stay for her, unlesse she spake unto him; and some, that the woman riding, the servant followed on foot, to beat the asse forward, and this she bad him not to forbear to doe, as thinking that she could not endure to ride so fast, unlesse she spake unto him. (For both these he saith, are brought by D. Kimhi, and the first followed by the Chald. paraphrast.) I cannot see how that can stand, because if shee had gone a foot, the way being so long, he should soon have been so farre from her, that shee could not speak unto him to stay, though she would, neither would the ordering of the journey thus have furthered, but hindered and delayed her much in going, neither was it seemly for a woman of her condition to travell on foot through that desolate way alone; neither is it likely, that the servant went a foot, for this would not have made for expedition, neither doth the word agree whether it be rendred, that I may get up, or in riding, according to Iunius; for if she bad him hasten in riding, he was not a foot, neither if she bad him not stay for her to get up; seeing this implyeth, that she went not up at the first; and therefore if he rode not neither, the asse went empty, and so he could not drive the beast with her upon his back with the most celerity, to say nothing of the word [ lead and goe ] implying that he lead the way, and therefore could not follow on foot to drive. It is most probable therefore, that either they rode both upon the asse, and in putting on as fast as he could, she would not that any respect should be had of her because of the hast, or although no mention be made but of one asse, yet she had happily one ready alwayes in the stable to use, when she pleased, and would have a servant with another asse to come and ride with her, and to lead the way.

She went therefore and came to the man of God to mount Carmel, &c. That is, not yet into his house where he dwelt, but to the mount, where his house was. For her nearer coming to him, is related v. 27. but she being now come to the foot of the mount, he espied her being a good distance off, and sent Gebeai to meet her, and to ask whether all went well with her, her husband and childe? and she answered

V. 23.

V. 24.

P. Martyr.

V. 25.

P.Martyr.
Pellican.
Note.

Lyra.

V. 27.

P.Martyr.
Lyra.

Pellican.

V. 28.

V. 29.

Junius.

answered [well.] The prophet conjectured so soon as he saw her at such an extraordinary time, that all was not well with her, and therefore he sent to ask this question, and as Martyr and Pellican have it, in his sending so courteously to meet her, hee gave us an example of humanity towards persons of worth, and well deserving of us, and condemned the severity of the Anabaptists and some others, that will have no respects or complements used towards any. For her answer [well] Hebr. שלום peace, by which word also he spake unto her, repeating it 3 times, as he was bidden; it is not to be doubted, whether she were herein taxable, as lying, to which Lyra somewhat inclineth, and yet excuseth her as saying so in hope of the raising of her child again, for she answered him so, as denying to tell how it was with her, till she came at his master, as if she had said, interrupt me not, for I will make none other answer to thee, but as the Echo resound thy own word Shalom, for my purpose now is to speak with thy master mouth to mouth, to whom only I will open my case. And she said thus, that she might not be put off by an interloquoutour, as fearing, that thus shee should receive no good according to the earnest desire of her soule.

Then she came to the man of God and held him by the feet, but Gehazi came to put her away, &c.] The women, which came to seek Christ at his sepulcher, when they met him, did likewise hold his feet and worship him, Matth. 28. 9. so this Shunamite fell down at Elisbah his feet holding them, and happily kissing them for reverence, as another woman did the feet of Christ at another time, when she was full of sorrow, as this woman now was. And this was by Elisbah now permitted, because she was transported with passion, as he perceived, although the cause was yet hidden from him, but not to give example to others, to doe like-wise. Gehazi thinking it an indigne thing, that so great a woman should thus humble her selfe to his master, according to some, or that a woman should come so near him and embrace him, which he knew that his chaste master liked not of, according to others, began to put her away, which Elisbah forbade him to do, because she did thus, being inwardly troubled for some grievous thing, which had befallen her; by her thus laying hold on his feet, saith Pellican, shewing that she would not let him go, but the benefit being first obtained by his prayers, which she so earnestly desired. Elisbah now expecting to hear what was the matter, she did not plainly open her case, but spake so as that it might well be perceived, saying, Did not I desire a sonne of my Lord, and did I not say, deceive me not? The Prophet presently understanding the case, sent Gehazi away in haste with his staffe to be laid upon the face of the child, bidding him for the more expedition to gird his loynes, and to salute no man by the way, to avoid all occasion of delay, as Christ afterwards said unto his Disciples, when he sent them out to preach the Gospell, Luke 10. 4. But it may seem strange, that the Prophet should send his man to doe such a miracle with his staffe. Indeed by the rod of Moses great things were done, but it was in his own hand, and not in the hand of another. He sent him with his staffe, saith Junius, as a signe of his presence in spirit, praying for the child for the strengthening of his faith, when he applyed it, and the reason why it took not effect, was the womans importunity with the Prophet to goe in person, not believing otherwise that her child could be raised up to life, and happily Gehazi his vain glory, staying by the way contrary to the charge given him, to tell such as he met, that he was going with that staffe to raise up a child that was dead, according to some Rabbins. And indeed it seemeth that it was through some fault in others, that it took not effect, because Elisbah being a prophet would not certainly use a means to work a miracle, unlesse he knew, that it was effectual. Yet after that he had sent away Gehazi, it seemeth also, that he suspected the validity of it, and therefore followed with the Shunamite, before that his man returned; but this suspicion probably arose, not for that he now thought this means insufficient, which he thought not before, but that it might be frustrated by the evill managing of Gehazi, or through want of faith in her, whom it most nearly concerned. It would I suppose have taken effect, if the mother had believed it, but shee having no faith in this means, but in the prophets own act, it wrought nothing. Martyr thinketh, that Elisbah erred in sending his man with his staffe, as doing it of of his own minde, not by divine inspiration, wherely he was moved afterwards, when he came, where the dead childe was; but to me it seemeth not safe, to impeach any action done by so great a prophet, in a prophetical way. Other notions he hath here touching salutations at large, because Gebazi is bidden to salute no man by the way, which I omit, as more proper to the instruction given by Christ to his Apostles, when he sent them forth, bidding them to salute the house, to which they should come. Touching the charge given to Gebazi, not to salute any in the way, he saith rightly, that it was given him to keep his minde intent onely to the great work, about which he was sent.

Elishah being importuned by the Shunamite, who sware that she would not leave holding him by the feet till he went himself with her, yielded soon to go, and meeting his servant by the way, and hearing, that his staffe had been applied without effect, he went into the chamber, and prayed, and lay upon the dead body, his face to the face thereof, &c. and thus it first began to be warm, then at his second stretching of himself it sneezed, and opened the eyes, as one awaked out of a sleep. The like unto which, because it was done before by Elijah, 1. King. 17. 21. I spare to make any further exposition here upon it. Onely whereas Elijah stretched himself three times upon the dead, Elishah did it but twice, it may be understood, as serving to confirm the promise before going, that the spirit of Elijah should be doubled upon Elishah, for by reason of the spirit of power to do miracles in a greater measure in him, then in Elijah, he sooner wrought this great work. And whereas Elishah did one thing singular, that Elijah did not, viz. cause his staffe first to be used, and this being without effect, came himself and revived the dead, it was hereby allegorically signified, that the law was used before the coming of Christ, to revive men dead in sinne by doing it in vain; but afterwards Christ came with his spirit, and gave life unto them that beleeve. And the law, saith Martyr, was aptly set forth by a staffe, which supporteth and beateh. And as Elishah revived this childe by applying his own mouth to his, and eyes to his eyes, &c. so Christ giveth life to the faithfull by condescending to be made like unto us in his incarnation. For the childes being revived by degrees, first waxing warm, secondly sneezing seven times and opening his eyes, like unto which was the restoring of that blinde man to his sight, who first saw dimly men walking like trees, then all things plainly. This was not done, because it was hard with God to revive the dead, but to make the prophet continue in prayer: for as Tostatus noteth, both Elishah and Elijah did great and hard works by the spirit presently, when they were in publike, that the faith of the spectators might without delay be confirmed, but in private they both were longer in doing to exercise their own faith, and to shew the property of it to be to persevere in praying and expecting, till God pleaseth to answer. Moreover, the work now to be done, was greater then any before, viz. to raise the dead, and therefore wrought with more difficulty and by degrees, and hereby was mystically shewed, how hard it is to raise one dead in sinne, and that about this, much labour must be bestowed, both before any life beginneth to come, and after it is begun, that it may encrease, and more effects of it may be shewed forth, as in this childe reviving again. And lastly, the prophets applying of his mouth to the childe, &c. served to shew, how the preacher should condescend to the weaknesse of every one, that he might raise him from the death of sinne, to the life of righteousness, as St. Paul became all things to all men, that he might win some, 1 Cor. 9. 21. That is, bearing with every one as much as he might, the better to insinuate into him for his conversion and salvation. The childe being thus revived, the mother was called, and having bowed her self to the ground (in way of thankfulness) she took him and went away (without doubt) very joyfull.

And Elijah returned to Gilgal, but there was a famine in the land, &c. ] From Shunem to Gilgal are 36. miles. To this place he went say some, when he had done that great miracle of raising the dead, to decline the praise, and thanks, and admiration of the father, and friends, and neighbours, who hearing of it, would doubtlesse be ready to come about him. But because they suffered by famine then in Gilgal, a place where many sonnes of the prophets lived under his government, it is rather

P. Martyr.

V. 30.

The Allegory.

Tostatus.

Note.

V. 37.

V. 38.
Patriarchs travels.

V. 39.
V. 40.

V. 41.

P. Martyr.

Vallesi sacra Philosophia.

Pellican.

Lyra.
The Allegory.

V. 42.

V. 43.
Lyra.

to be thought, that he went to comfort and help them in this their necessity. Or, there being four places of students in divinity, Carmel, Bethel, Gilgal and Jericho, he according to his wonted manner, having been at the other three before, went now of force to Gilgal to visit the Colledge there, and to provide for their good. Therefore seeing the great want, in which they were, he caused a great pot to be set on to make pottage for them, and when hearbs were gathered and shred and and put unwittingly into the pot which were unwholesome, and made the pottage to have such an ill taste, that they could not eat thereof, yea they cried out, that death was in the pot, he made it good again by putting meal into it. The great pot set on argued, that there were many to be fed; even an 100. persons, as may be gathered, v. 43. the making ready of nothing else for them, shewed, with what slender diet they were content. The gourds, which were gathered unwittingly to be put into the pot, were a drug used to purge choller and phlegme, but being taken caused great pain in the stomach, the liver, and the whole body, saith Martyr, according to Galen and Dioscorides. There is a kinde of gourds, which is usuall for the pot, but these were wilde and bitter, called, therefore by the Greeks, τὸ λυτὴ ἀγρὴ or πικρα. Some of the pottage thus made being taken out, and the evil perceived, meal was by the prophet put into the pot, into which, as is to be conceived the pottage taken out to be eaten, was first put again, that it might altogether be healed. Which was not done through any vertue in the meal, but by the spirit working hereby, as by an outward signe or means, through which vertue came from God to work it. Vallesius saith, that wilde gourds are so pernicious, that if above the weight of four half pence be taken, although prepared, they cause excessive purging, and excoriation, and death, wherefore a little meal could not cure it naturally; but there was herein a supernaturall work. Yet he saith, that because glutinous and thickening things are a means to cure this evil quality, meal properly might be used to help in this case, but to work such an effect, there must be a proportionable quantity; whereas here was but a little put into a great pot full, and therefore could not do it without a miracle. For the time, when this famine was, it is thought by some to be that of seven yeares, spoken of chap. 8. 1. but if that were now begun, when Elishah raised the Shunamites son to life, how could he fore-tell her of it afterwards, as he did chap. 8. 1. It was then more probably a time of scarcity onely about those parts, for a little time, there being food else where, as appeareth by the 20. loaves, which one is said by and by v. 42. to have brought unto the prophet. Whereas it is said, v. 38. The summes of the Prophets dwell before him. Pellican expounds it well, they lived under his instruction and government. Of these gourds gathering through ignorance, and putting into the pot for food, this allegory is made by Lyra. He that giveth the literall sense of the law onely, or teacheth Philosophicall speculations, marreth the food of Gods people, so that they are hereby brought in danger of death, for the letter, saith the Apostle, killeth, but the meal of spirituall understanding put to, maketh it good and wholesome. By others, death is in the pot, when a man teacheth for divine doctrine what he gathereth ignorant ly, having no found ground for it in the holy Scriptures, and therefore he, that teacheth any other thing, must be accursed; Gal. 1. 8. but how bitter and venomous soever any thing be, the danger is removed, if it be corrected by the meal of Gods word. And when men through their ignorances endure much bitterness and misery, Christ is the grain of whom meal is made to sweeten all again, Rom. 5. 1. because through him we have peace with God; and joy in tribulation. And hitherto, one miracle in feeding the hungry, now followeth another, v. 42, 43. A man from Baalshalisha bringing to Elishah 20. loaves of barley, of his first fruits, he fed therewith 100. men, and somewhat still remained, when as his servant thought, that they were nothing to set before so many; because, as Lyra hath it, they were little, and most probably would not ordinarily have sufficed above 20. men. Of their smallnesse this is proof enough, that one man brought them and eares of ripe corn in his garment or scrip, as Jerome turneth it, and that the prophets servant thought it a shame to set them before so many men. Barly loaves are brought, because that grain was ripe first in those parts. Baalshalisha, from from whence hee came, was in the tribe of Benjamin, according to Iunius, the place; that Saul went through in looking for his fathers asses, 1 Sam. 9. 4. but Adrichomius placeth it in Ephraim, and the plains of Sharon, which was famous for fruitfulness. This man certainly was godly, and therefore the worship of God being perverted at Ierusalem, and turned into idolatry, so that it was not fit to bring in the first fruits thither, and to the temple, as they ought otherwise to have done, he brought his to Elishab the man of God. Yet Tostatus will not have them such first fruits, as belonged to the priests, but such as used to be presented to eminent men for honours sake, which I shall believe, when I finde in any place of scripture any such first fruits spoken of. When the man of God would have these loaves set before 100. men, and his servant spake against it as being too little to satisfie so many, he urged him yet to do it, saying, Thus saith the Lord, they shall all eat, and there shall remain. God at that instant most probably revealed unto him by his spirit, that he would work this miracle at his desire. For although no mention be here made of his blessing the bread by his prayer, yet Theodoret speaketh of it, as done immediately before the distributing of the bread amongst them. Wherefore it is to be conceived, that first he prayed for this blessing, and then distributed the bread amongst them. And herein Elishab did notably figure out that, which was afterwards to be done by our Saviour Christ, viz. his feeding 5000. with a fewer number of loaves and fishes, as hee was farre more full of the spirit then Elishab. Mytically, saith Rabanus, by the man bringing from Baalshalishah 10. loaves, &c. understand one holding the true faith of the Trinity, because Baalshalishah signifieth the Lord three, who by teaching the old testament, bringeth loaves, and by teaching the new, ears of new corn, of which all feed to sanctification, and yet through the blessing of that prophet, there remaineth to feed others.

Junius.
Adricom.

Theod. qu. 19. in 4. Reg. Is ben- edictionem im- perii, ut illos centum exsaria- ret, &c.
The Allegory.
Rabanus.

CHAP. V.

Naaman the Captain of the army of the King of Syria was a great man with his lord: for by him had the Lord given to Syria deliverance, &c.] As Elijah had wrought one miracle upon a heathen womans meal and oyl, so Elishab here upon a heathen mans body, infected with the leprosy, of which, see what it is Levit. 13. and thus whilst religion went down in Israel, idolatry prevailing, it was set up by some amongst the heathen, idolatry being abandoned. Whereas it is said, that by him deliverance or saving was given to Syria, the Rabbins say, that it is thus spoken, because he shot the arrow wherewith Ahab was slain, which is not improbable, or at the least, that under his conduct, that battell was fought; which freed Syria from all danger of invasion by Israel; for which cause the king had him in great estimation. But Syria thus prevailed onely for the finnes of Israel, through Gods just judgement giving strength and power to Naaman against them for their punishment. If it be demanded, whether Naaman were endued with grace, because it is said, that God by him gave deliverance to Syria? Martyr answereth, it is not probable that he had any true saving grace yet, because there is nothing said to intimate it, and the country of which he was, lay under the great sinne of idolatry generally, and he might have added, that somewhat is said, intimating him formerly to have been an idolater, viz. his resolving after his healing, to sacrifice to none other but to the God of Israel, and his scornfull contempt at the first of the message sent to him by Elishab. It is to be understood therefore, that God wrought not by Naaman for his grace, but because to deliver a people in any great danger, some man must be made an instrument, and commonly it hath bin such an one as hath excelled in military vertue, the Lord to commend even this as a good thing to all Captains and military men chose Naaman, who excelled herein, as he formerly saved Isabell, Gilead by Saul, and Italy by Marinus from the Cymbrians, and Rome by Fabius from the Carthaginians, and Hannibal a most powerfull enemy. For the saying, that God by him gave deliverance to Syria, it is intimated that when any man of valour prevaileth, he is but the instrument, and the power is from God alone, that we may look up to him, and learn to love and feare, and put our trust in him, and not in any mortall man.

Pellican.

P. Martyr.

For the time when Naaman came to Elifsha, one will not have it, as it is set down in order, because ch. 8. 4. the king of Israel is said to have talked with Gehazi about the gifts of Elifsha, which cannot be thought to have been done after this, but before it; seeing Gehazi was a leper alwayes after, and with such none conversed; but they were forced to live separate, for feare of infecting others. He therefore placeth all the miracles, ch. 6. and 7. and Hazael his coming to Elifshah for his Lord Benhadad, ch. 8. before this, determining the king of Syria here spoken of to be Hazael, and that Benhadad was dead before this.

But this reason seemeth to me to be too weak to pervert so much the order of the sacred history, when there is none apparant cause; for although lepers were commonly put apart, yet they might upon occasion come forth with a white wand, and happily the king had some occasion at that time to send for Gehazi, and so took the opportunity to question with him about his masters miracles, Serrarius, who is for the said disorder here, saith, that if any man will maintain the order of the history, he must hold that Gehazi repented, after his smiting with the leprosie, and so was healed again for his particular, although his posterity was not. But because this is against the text, saying, the leprosie of Naaman shall cleave to thee, and to thy seed for ever. We maintain it not thus, but as hath been already said. The means whereby Naaman came to the prophet to bee healed was this; a little maid being taken by the Syrians, as they came out by bands against Israel, served his wife; and seeing her master to be a leper, wished that he were with Elifshah to be healed. If it be demanded how she was brought to this believe, that Elifshah could doe this great miracle, seeing there were then many lepers in Israel, as our Lord saith, Luke 4. and yet he healed none of them? I answer, shee heard that hee had done greater works, as encreasing the widowes oyle, and raising the dead, &c. and therefore she believed, that he was able to doe this also. Now he that heareth this being guided only by the light of nature is ready to say, what good luck Naaman had to light upon such a Captive, but we that believe the providence of God to moderate in every thing, must say, what a providence it was to bring this maid in the way of Naamans souldiers, that she should be taken by them, and that shee should come to dwell in his house, and that she should be moved to speak of such a thing as as she had none experience of before, and what a providence it was that Naaman was smitten with the leprosie to cause him to goe to the prophet, that he might be converted and saved, so that we see God will provide means to accomplish what he hath preordained touching any man, although it be past mans imagination, that we may believe in God, and make use of the means as he shall bee pleased to offer them for the attaining of that which we desire, as Naaman did; not in regard of his greatnesse, despising the speech of his poorest servant, and so as whosoever doth not, shall never attain it.

Naaman hearing what the maid said immediately reported it to the king, that with his leave he might goe into the land of Israel, which he could not otherwise have done, being in such place and authority in that common wealth. The king not only gave him leave, but also wrot his letters to the king of Israel to treat him; that is, by his great prophet, who lived in his dominion. Wherein Marye rightly observeth a special work of Gods spirit in the kings heart also, in that he derided not the motion, although he were an idolater, and so did vilipend both the true God and his prophets; for God moved his heart so, that he gave all approbation and furtherance to the intended voyage. When the letters written by the king of Syria came to the hands of the king of Israel, he rent his clothes, as accounting them blasphemous, seeing he ascribed that power unto man therein, which was proper to God alone, and he feared also that he thus wrot only to pick a quarrell with him. Indeed the letters seem to come from a proud and imperious spirit, ground enough of a quarrel, the words being these. When this epistle cometh to thee, I have sent Naaman

Serrarius.

V. 2.

Nota.

V. 4.

P. Marye.

V. 7.

my servant to thee, that thou shouldest heale him of his leprosie. But considering the premises that the king of Syria had heard of a prophet within Ioram's kingdome that could doe it, there was no cause why he should interpret the writing so, as being sent only to pick a quarrell, unlesse it were for the manner. And yet happily the king of Israel did not indeed conceive so much of the power that was in Elisbah to heale, as that little maid of Naamans, no nor any Prince or Lord about him, nor many in Israel; for if they had, some or other would have wished their friends that were leprous, to have sought to Elisbah for cure also. But the king of Syria thinking it to be a thing commonly known in Israel, by reason of the speech of that Israelitish captive, wrot so curiously without mentioning the prophet, whom he meant he should cause to doe it, as he respected him, or feared his puissance; for he doubted not, but according to the maids saying, there was one who could do it, and if he would, he could cause it to be done; and therefore he would have him by this writing to understand, that if it were not done, hee would not take him for his friend, but enemy; and deale with him accordingly. Some think, that the malice of Ioram was such against Elisbah, that though he were put in mind of him, he would not use his help or counsell, but seeing he once before sought to him in his need, and since that time it seemeth, that Elisbah was gracious with him by his offer made unto the Shunamite, ch. 4. I cannot subscribe to this, but rather attribute the kings astonishment to his simple ignorance, as not conceiving yet by what meanes that might be done, for which the king of Syria wrot; and therefore holding it impossible for him or any man in his dominion.

But Naaman did not only bring letters, but a great treasure with him to reward him, that should doe so great a work, even ten talents of silver, and 6000 pieces of gold, and ten change of garments. Now the Syrian talent was 46. pound, 17. shillings, 6 pence, ten talents, 468. pound, 15. shillings. The 6000 pieces of gold were 1000 drachmaes, and a drachmah was as much as an Hungarian ducket, that is, of our mony 7 shillings 6 pence a piece of gold, then was one shilling three pence, and 6000. 315 pound; treasure enough to give away at the Court, and to the prophets for this favour, and to bear him out like a Prince in his travell with all his train. For he thought that the prophet was greatly to be rewarded by him so great a man, and such as the King of Israel should imploy to send for the prophet, or with him to the prophet, he meant not to let go unrewarded; such is the courtesie even of naturall men towards their benefactors, which should make us ashamed to be unthankfull for good done to us. And for his travell, being so attended much was requisite, it being from Damascus to Samaria 132. miles, and from thence to Jordan 16. and both these numbers of miles he doubled, before he came home again.

The tidings of these letters being brought to Elisbah, and how much affrighted the king was, he sent word that he would have Naaman come to him, that he might know, that there was a prophet in Israel, who could do any cure, when the king himself could not tell how to get it done. For indeed the king of Syria erred greatly, when thinking, that the king of Israel could cause the prophet to heal this leprosie by his kingly authority, he wrote unto him to do it, seeing howsoever a king can command other things to be done, yet he cannot command that, which is above the power of man, as this was. And therefore neither did he send for Elisbah now or before, when his army was without water, as knowing himself in this power to be his inferiour, and therefore unworthy to have Elisbah come unto him, as the Centurion that came to Christ for his servant, said that he was unworthy, that he should come under his roof, Mat. 8.

When Naaman came with his traine to Elisba his house, which he had in Samaria, as may be gathered, Ch. 6. 32. he came not out unto him, neither bade him come in, but onely sent to bid him go and wash in Jordan seven times, and so his flesh should come againe as the flesh of a childe. This he did not, saith Martyr, out of pride, but to avoid the overmuch reverence, which he thought Naaman would be ready to give unto him, that his mind might be intent to God onely, from whom this sanation should come. But this is not probable, seeing after the cure wrought he admitted him to his presence, v. 15. when there was more likelihood

V. 5.

H.B. Patriarkes travels.

V. 8.

V. 9.

P. Martyr.

Lyra.

V. 11, 13,
13, 14.

Note.

Benjam. Judeus

Note.
1 Pet. 2. 18:Quot habes ser-vos tot hostes habes

P. Martyr.

of this danger. He did thus therefore more probably, both to try his faith, and to make the miracle more illustrious, seeing the Prophet neither seeing him, nor speaking to him, nor touching him, he was yet healed meere by doing as he sent word unto him. Whereas otherwise he might haply have thought, that he was healed by some vertue coming from Elisba, and not have attributed so much to Gods power, which being now made so apparant might deterre the Syrians from coming against Israel, which had so mighty a God to protect them. Thus also Lyra. It was not therefore pride, but great humility in Elisba out of which he did thus, that nothing might be attributed to him, but all to God, by whom he was also directed to doe thus, that Naamans pride might be pulled downe, and he by humility and obedience in doing what he was commanded, although seeming too weake to produce so great an effect, might be prepared to have this miracle wrought upon him. Naaman at the first hearing of this waxed wroth, as thinking himselfe mocked, but being better perswaded by his servants, he went and washed, and was healed. He imagined another way with himselfe, that the Prophet would come out and pray for him, and lay his hand upon the leprosie, and by such meanes sanation might be attained, but in the water of Jordan he could not see, how there should be any vertue to doe it, neither could there, but by the working of him, that is Almighty. Thus man sometimes will prescribe unto God which way he shall helpe him, and if he goeth not that way to work, he despaireth. Whereas we must be willing to be saved that way which God appointeth, although it may seeme foolishnesse unto us. In uttering his choler at Elisba his answer, he said, Aren't Abana and Parphar, rivers of Damascus, &c. Martyr and Pellican render it Amana, and so saith Ianinus, it is called by Historians; and sometime, Adonis, and Parphar, Orontes.

Benjamin in his itineray saith, There is no where seen in all the world a citie fruitfull like this citie of Damascus, which two rivers falling from mount Hermion, do blesse, Amana and Parphar. For the citie lyeth under mount Hermion, and Amana runneth into it, all great mens houses, and the streets and markets being supplied with the water hereof carried by pipes, Parphar runneth by the citie, and hereby the gardens and paradises about the city are watered, of which there are abundance, making it the most fruitfull of all other cities. Thus he; and Adrichomius calleth it Abana, or Amana, as he saith, it is in Hebrew, but not in any copie that I have seen, but onely Abana; he calleth it also Aman and Amma, affirming it to be a most clear river, and pleasant. But whereas Benjamin would have this to flow through the city, Adrichomius saith, that the other cutteth through the city, and this walseth upon the West and South thereof. Now the water of these rivers being so good, Naaman thought it a vain travail to come from them, whose waters he had often used without any such effect, to wash in Jordan to be healed. But the sick wanting skill in phisick, cannot judge of the operation of the bath prescribed by the skilfull Physitian to heal him, and therefore must follow his directions, looking for successe out of a confidence in his skill, through Gods blessing that prescribeth, and so ought Naaman to have done, as indeed he by and by upon better consideration did. For his servants saying unto him [ Father, if the prophet had commanded thee some great matter, wouldst thou not have done it? &c. ] he went to Jordan, &c. In that they called him father, it intimateth, that he was loving and kinde unto them like a father, to the reproof of all cruell and churlish masters like Nabul; and yet if any servant be under such, he must bear it patiently. But such masters instead of love, get the hatred of their servants, whence the proverb did arise, Thou hast as many enemies as thou hast servants. Naamans example, to whom so much good redounded from his servants, should invite all other masters to the like humanity towards their servants, and not to despise the counsell of servants; or of any the poorest and meanest, because sometimes, he that is outwardly despicable may conceive better of a thing, then the greatest and the wisest. Martyr will have Naaman called father by his servants, as he was commonly called for the deliverance, which he had wrought for Syria, pater patrie, the father of the country, as Ioseph was called for saving his countrey [ Abrech ] a tender father. But what did his servants counsell him to doe? To think well of the Prophets command, and to follow it because it was easie to be done, and for the effect they doubtlesse believed, that it would be wrought, because he was a man of God, that commanded him to wash and be whole, and they had most probably heard, that they, who had hitherto followed his directions, had successe according to their hearts desire, as both the army in digging of pits or ditches, and such as brought him salt at Iericho to heal the waters, and meal to cure the corrupted portage. These were faithfull servants then, who neither hated their master nor flattered him, and therefore are worthy to be followed by all others. If they had not greatly loved, but hated him, they would have held their peace, rather laughing at his proud disdain, and joying to have him return home again a leper, then perswading him for his good: if they had been sycophants, they would have been ready to say as he said, and to exasperate him more against the Prophet, who sleighted so much, so great a man as he was, as being rustickall and unable to do any thing for him, or willing to make a mock of him all over Syria, in that he would have him travell so farre, to be healed by such weak and silly means, as washing in common water.

vants

Wherefore he went and washed in Iordan seven times, and his flesh came again as the flesh of a little childe. ] That is, saith Lyra, as the purest and clearest flesh of all other, because that is without mixture, whereas the flesh of others is mixed with the nutriment wherewith the body is nourished. And this similitude is used, to shew, that this was done in a figure of regeneration by baptism, wherein the image of the new man commeth againe, which is in righteousness and true holiness, Ephes. 4. and to figure out the same, the man that was blinde, was sent to wash in the pool Siloam, whereupon he was healed. To be regenerated therefore, and to be converted and become as a little childe is all one, and such we must be, or else we cannot be saved. Naamans washing seven times, served to set forth the manifold gifts of the spirit, of which they that are regenerate, are made partakers, and not the oftener iterating of baptism, as Martyr saith. For in these two things Naamans washing was unlike unto baptism; first, in that he washed seven times, baptism but once; secondly, was healed by washing, but justification is attained before, and not in washing, as Abraham was justified and then circumcised, so baptism followeth as a signe or seal of justification, not thereby, but by faith before obtained, thus he; but this is to be understood of adults, for infants are healed of the foul leprosie of originall sinne set forth by Naamans leprosie in baptism, seeing they want faith, being onely the seed of the faithfull, and so having right unto baptism, which saveth as Noahs Ark, 1 Pet. 3. 21. Faith then justifieth and saveth by the accessions of baptism in the adult according to that, he which beleeveth and is baptized shall be saved, and baptism without actuall faith saveth in infants coming of faithfull parents, yet they are so saved as originall sin, the leprosie of their natures being in baptism washed away spring not up again, as a root of bitterneesse into actuall and voluntary sinning. For in this case we must be renewed by faith and repentance, and so we recover justice lost, which baptism once received, serveth to seal up unto us for ever, and therefore is not to be iterated again.

Naaman being thus miraculously healed, returneth back to Elisab to make profession of the faith, to which he was now turned, and to shew his thankfulness: for he said, that he knew now that there was no God in all the earth, but in Israel, and he offered him gifts, and urged him to take them, but he refused them with an oath. And hereby it appeareth, that Naaman was healed, not onely in body, but in soul also. Seeing he did both beleve with his heart, and confesse God with his mouth, and after the manner of the truly faithfull, came with an offering, for the great benefit received, to shew his thankfulness therefore; as amongst the ten lepers whom Christ cleansed, one that returned to give thanks is spoken of as singularly godly. In saying, that there was no god in all the earth but in Israel, he meant not, that God was concluded within the bounds of that land, for he fillethe heaven and earth, but that the God which was worshipped in Israel by Elisab, and all that cleaved unto him, as all ought to do, was the only true God, and that the

V. 14.
Lyra.

The Allegory.
P. Martyr.

V. 15.

gods

gods worshipped by other nations, were idols and no gods: for that it is to be understood of Elishah his God onely, and the God, which had his temple in that land, thus said to be in Israel, because there, and not in any other Nation his lawes were taught, and sacrifices were offered to him, is plaine, because it was that God, by whose power Naaman was healed, which neither Ieroboams calves, nor Baal, after whom the great sort in Israel went a whoreing, could have done. But why did Elishah refuse his blessing, as he called it? did he by so doing teach that it should be unlawfull for the men of God to take any thing towards their maintenance for their paines in their calling? or what other reason might there be. For the first cannot hold, because the labourer is said to be worthy of his hire: see also 1 Cor. 9. Gal. 6. 6. It must be therefore, because it was and ever shall be unlawfull to take a reward for any miraculous healing, according to the charge also given by Christ to his Apostles, saying, Freely ye have received, freely give. Thus Pellican; saying also, that miracles were done for the glory of God and the salvation of men, and not for the increase of worldly goods, or to satisfie covetousnesse. For this were to abuse the immediate act of God, as if it were purchaseable by money; as a Physicians direction, which is so much detested before him, that when a certain Scribe would have followed Christ to make a gaine of his miraculous sanations, he rejected him as a crafty foxe: and when Simon Magus would have purchased this power for such an end, he was pronounced to be in the gall of bitterness.

Math. 8.

Mat. 8.

P. Martyr.

Lyra.

2 Cor. 12. 14.

1 Tim. 5. 8.

P. Martyr.

V. 17.

Junius.

Peter Martyr and others adde, that he refused, because he would have Naaman still to fix his minde upon God, and seeing how much he was obliged unto him for so great a benefit freely conferred upon him, be the more inflamed with his love; and againe, that by this contempt of worldly riches shewed by the Prophet, he might be drawne the lesse to admire them, yea to contemne them also in respect of things heavenly, which alone he by this meanes plainly saw satisfied Elishah so; that he cared not for worldly goods: and lastly, that he might not be scandalized, as he might have been, if Elishah had taken his rich rewards offered, for so he might have thought that his end was not, but to get worldly gaine by his God, and thus he himselfe might have rested in the fruition of outward things, as the highest attainable by such as believed in him. Lyra saith, that he wold take nothing, that he might shew, that he sought not his things, but the saving of him both in soule and body. Neither should any man of God in dispensing the mysteries of salvation seeke any other thing, according to that of the Apostle, We seeke not yours, but you, although he may take maintenance for his labours in the ministry to live upon and to provide for his family, as every one is bound to doe. The Apostle Paul indeed laboured for his living and preached in some places freely, but neither did hee so to give us an example, unless it be in the case of first planting a Church, neither did he totally refrain from taking, for he saith, That he robbed some Churches to minister freely to the Corinthians, that his evill willers, the false teachers there might not object covetousnesse unto him. And as Paul did, so saith Martyr, did some Waldenses in some part of Poland, which made them to be reputed the true Pastours, and others that tooke maintenance, bellies. But this was the effect of a blinde zeale in them, seeing it is allowed, that he who serveth at the altar, should live upon the altar. But if any have living sufficient of their owne, may such take maintenance for exercising and labouring in their ministry? Martyr answereth, That if it be said they should not, this were the way to make other ministers contemptible; that take, and to make parishioners not used to give their Pastours maintenance, to thinke more strangely of him, that should come afterwards to take it, wherefore he conceiveth, that such a minister shall doe best to take and give it to the poore; where in though I assent unto him, yet to take it and to dispoise of it, as his owne, is not to doe all (provided, that according to his double meanes he be hospitable and charitable) seeing it is his hire for his great labours.

And Naaman said, And shall not I pray thee, two mules loads of earth be given to thy servant? for thy servant will henceforth offer no sacrifices to other gods, but to the Lord onely.] The Vulg. lat. As thou wilt, but I beseech thee, Peter Martyr, Et non desur quas? Iun. At the least I pray thee, let there be given. And he addeth, that this this request, as also the next, that God would be mercifull unto him, when his Master should bow leaning upon him in the house of Rimmon, proceeded from his ignorance, because the true God was to be sacrificed unto not upon Israelitish earth, but at his temple in Ierusalem. Wherefore the Prophet gave him none other answer, But goe in peace, meaning that these things belonged not to the peace of his conscience, but rather to the disquiet thereof, God being hereby provoked. But Lyra justifieth Naaman in this his purpose of sacrificing to God out of the peculiar place hereunto appointed, because although the Israelites were tied to one place, yet the faithfull amongst the Gentiles were not, seeing the Mosaicall law was not given to them, but to the Israelites, as these words commonly used, when any rite about the worship of God was prescribed, speake unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, doe shew. As Noah then sacrificed any where before the Law and Abraham, so it was lawfull still under the Law for the Gentiles. Whereas he would have earth out of the land of Israel to make an Altar for this purpose, to which as to the other, the Prophet answered nothing but Goe in peace. He asked nothing, but what he might lawfully doe, although not necessary, seeing he might have reared up an Altar of any other earth, as well as of that, onely he thought the land, where the true God dwelt peculiarly, more holy then any other, and because that herein he had beene healed, he would shew a more venerable respect unto it. For his saying, Goe in peace, to his other request also, he hereby shewed likewise, that he needed no indulgence for it, being also lawfull. For he desired not, that he might be pardoned for dissembling any idolatry, which he meant not any more to commit either really or feignedly, but onely, that it might not be laid to his charge out of the idols temple, so not in it to performe his service to his Master the King by leaning to support him with his shoulder, upon which he used to leane and worship Rimmon, which because he might lawfully doe, the prophet made him that answer, that he might of this make no scruple. Thus Lyra, Hugo Cardin. saith, that he meant to feigne a worshipping of that idol still, and herein the Prophet dispensed with him for a time, that living amongst idolaters he might have the opportunity to preach unto them the true God, he promising to Elisabab, that he would shortly leave his place and not come any more in that temple. But this is worthily rejected by Lyra, seeing evill is not to be done; that good may come of it, neither can any man dispense with one for doing that, which in it owne nature is evil. Pellican saith, that the prophet dealt with him, as with one weak in the faith, but yet truly in him, bearing with him in his weakness, and accepting of him for his heart in sincerity set to worship the true God and not any idol more; and so he answereth him, Goe in peace, to shew, that he should be accepted of for his godly purpose, and that what he did as a weake beleever should not be imputed unto him, which maketh against those that are so ridged against Neophytes, as that they looke that they should be exact in every thing at the very first, and if they be not, they are ready to censure them. Martyr agreeth with Lyra as touching the lawfulness of a Gentiles sacrificing to God upon any earth; holding that Naaman would have some to carry away from hence yet for the purpose, that by making an Altar of it in his owne countrey he might make publique confession of the God of Israel to be the true God: and hereby be alwaies put in minde of him, and the benefit received in that land by his mercy to be stirred up to continuall thankfulness therefore; neither would he have any of the earth of that land for this use, but so much earth out of Elisabab his house, for which cause he asked it of him, whereas otherwise he could have taken it without asking, although some say, that he asked it of him, because taking it by his allowance he thought it might be of vertue to do him good, as the water of Iordan at his word had done, whereas otherwise he knew there was no such vertue in it. I thinke, that he asked it of him neither for one of these reasons nor the other, but onely to let him know by this outward signe, that the God of Israel onely should henceforth be his God; and although he would take nothing offered him, yet his cost should goe in offering sacrifice to God, and he moved him in it, because he would doe nothing but by his approbation in matters of such moment. The conceit of some mentioned by Martyr and some others is not

Lyra.Hugo Card.Pellican.P. Martyr.

not

The Allegory.

not worth the naming, viz. that Naaman would have this earth to put under his feet: when he stood in the house of Rimmon, for both it had been absurd, and he expressly shewed for what use he would have it, saying, I will sacrifice to non: other God, &c. Whether Elishah assented or no it is not said, but he answered to both his requests together and so assented, yet not to countenance the superstitious bringing of a little earth or stones from the Holy Land by pilgrims of all parts as a means of blessing: but hereby was figured out the translating of Gods favour set forth by that earth, whereon he professed to dwell, to us Gentiles, as the Syrians were, being herein some of the first fruits of the Gentiles, because the signe of Gods favour and presence came thus first to be amongst them. Touching the other passage, Martyr maintaineth it to be a sin for Naaman to do, as he said; although his heart were right towards the true God, because he prayed God in this matter to be mercifull, which he needed not to have done, unless he had known it to be a sin. Moreover, not onely evil, but all appearances of evil is to be avoided, if he therefore bowed before the idol when his Master bowed, although not with any intention to worship it, there was an evil shew and example to others, that beheld it to draw them to doe the like, for as much as they could not see into his heart to put a difference bet ween his act, and his masters.

And likewise if any be present at the Popish idolatry of this masse, they become guilty of the sin of idolatry, for so doing, although their hearts be against it. Wherefore he preferreth the piety of those Princes before Naamans, viz. of Saxony and the rest, who attended the Emperour Charles 5. onely to the Church doore when he went to masse, but entred not in with him. Whereas Elishah answered as not disliking what he meant to doe, whereby it may seem not to be a sin; he saith, that by these words, goe in peace ] he meant nothing else, but that God who had enlightened him so farre, as to see and know him to be the only true God; and that to be present at idolatrous worship was sin, would direct him so; as that he should never to keep his worldly dignity, yield to doe this, and that he prayed for him, and even prophesied hereby, that he should never doe it. But seeing no man in common sense would thus understand these words, but as an encouragement to doe what he had propounded without any scruple, and Naaman is not to be thought to have understood them otherwise, I cannot assent to them, although our own men, who would streine them to another sense, which was never given by any ancient Expositour, that I have seen. In saying then goe in peace; he doth rather secure him from all danger of sinning in doing his office to his master, either out of the house of Rimmon or within it, and yet giveth no toleration to him or any other of feinedly yielding any outward reverence to an idol, for all worship in this way of religion both outward and inward is to be given to God alone; for the arguments brought to prove it a sin, which Naaman intended. I answer, first that it was Naamans ignorance which made him feare it to be a sin, and it is no good reason from words spoken in ignorance, implying an act to be a sin, to conclude it to be so indeed. Secondly Naamans publick profession made by bringing earth out of Israel to make an altar to sacrifice to the true God onely; freed him sufficiently from all appearances of evil before all men, and made it apparant unto them, that what he did in the temple of Rimmon, was without all respect to the idol in duty to his Lord only. And to be present at idolatry for some other end without any way countenancing that sacrilegious act, is not to be censured as a sin; witnesse the prophet Elishah, who was present, when Baals priests sacrificed to him, but to deride them, and the 3 children in Daniel, were present, when the golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar, was worshipped; But however Naaman sinned not in this his service done to his master in an idols temple, they cannot be excused as free from sin, who are present at idolatrous worship only out of curiosity, or because they would not be known to be of a divers religion for feare of danger or displeasure; for this is grosse dissimulation and halting, which God cannot endure. To conclude, in justifying Naaman in this matter, as if I goe not from the ancient Expositours upon this place, so I goe not farre from Martyr himselfe, where he saith, if the person that is present at idolatrous worship, be known to abhorre from idolatry, he may be thought to be present sent

Math. 4

sent, and to bow the king for some other cause, especially a protestation being first made by him, only differing wherein he differeth from himself in his next words, which the sacred history doth not shew, that Naaman made in that temple before the Syrians, and some words used before in speaking upon the 3 mules loades of earth, which he asked; viz. he would first and chiefly that the altar made of this earth, should be a monument amongst the Syrians of his faith in the true God, the God of Israel; for what was this else but to make a publick profession before the Syrians of his being turned from idols to the true God, who was worshipped in Israel.

When Naaman was gone a mile, in his return, the vulgar Latin electo tempore, but the Hebrew בדרך a mile of ground, Gehazi thought within his covetous heart, that although his master had spared Naaman, yet he would get something of him, and so he sware that he would follow him with speed, &c. The sin of Gehazi saith Lyra, may be noted to be manifold. 1. Covetousnesse, making him to gape after gain, by the leper healed. 2. Swearing the Lord liveth, so do that which was to the dishonour of God. 3. Lying to Naaman, when he told him that two sonnes of the prophets were come to his masters, and he would pray him to give them a talent of silver, &c. 4. Theft in that he hid the mony received, laying it up for his own use. 5. Lying to Elisabab, when hee said, that hee went no whether, wherefore he was adjoined to be smitten with such a leprosie as Naaman had, both he and his children for ever; being herein faith Pellican, a figure of the covetous in their childrens holding that which they have unjustly gotten. There is another sin also that Lyra here layeth upon Gehazi, that being urged by Naaman, he sware that Elisabab had him say so to Naaman; for he saith, it is in the Hebrew [Swore, and take two talents] and the more indeed hath this signification as well as others, wherefore R. Salomon so rendreth it, but other Expositours reject it as not agreeing, because after this it is said, he compelled him. Martyr saith, that Gehazi sinned also in speaking contemptuously of so famous a convert, calling him this Syrian, and detracting from the discretion of Elisabab, as if he had not done wisely in sparing a heathen man full of wealth; and by this meanes wanting wherewithall to relieve poor sonnes of the prophets, living under his tuition, as Judas found fault with the spending of a box of pretious ointment upon Christ when it might have been sold, and the price given unto the poore, not that he was so well affected; but because he bare the bagge and was a thief, and so thought that committing into his hands, hee might have gotten a good part of it. In like manner Gehazi most probably taxed his masters forbearing to take, because he was disappointed of a prey, which by this means he expected. Now Gehazi was not so covetous and dishonest, but Naaman was as free and credulous. For he not only stayed, when he had heard of his coming after him, but also came down out of his chariot, and went to meet him; which was much for so great a man to a poor servant; but he respected the prophet whom he served and his God, to whom he ought all respect and honour, although he were now by him abused. Which sheweth, that it is not alwayes like master, like man, neither doe the best means work upon some that live continually under them; but there is more grace in some, that want all means, or enjoy but little; then in such, as Naaman excelled Gehazi. But let all be warned by his dreadful judgement to flye covetousnesse, which being in the heart, no means can worke for good.

Moreover Naaman most willingly gave him two talents, when he asked one, and sent two porters to carry them, which when he came to the Castle he tooke and laid up. The Vulgar lat. When he came in the evening. Montanus, into a secret place. Vasabl. and the Chald. Into an obscure place. For all these expositions the word may beare, and it is likely, that he had this treasure, that it might not come to his masters knowledge although he had taken it in his name, as desirous still to be reputed godly and sincere before him, when he proved himselfe herein a very thief, and he is said to have laid it up in the house, that is according to Plato, in his owne house. Elisabab presently upon his coming before him shewed, how vain his seeking to hide it was, for nothing can be hidden from God, or from such, as to whom he maketh his revelations; therefore he saith, his heart went with him, meaning, that by his propheticall spirit he saw him. Whereas in checking him he

V. 19, 30.

Lyra.

Pellican.

P. Martyr.

V. 31.

Naaman's word (Martyr) is used to

V. 34.

faith

V. 26.

saith nothing of the money, but of the raiments, and Olives, &amp;c.

Is this a time to receive raiments, olives and vineyards, cattle, oxen and servants? It was to set forth the great summes of money, to which two talents doe amount, as may be gathered also from that, which was said before.

They were so much as would suffice to buy all these things, saying, Is this a time to receive, &c. he meanes, when he refused to take any thing, that Gods glory might be the more illustrated; he taxeth him therefore, as pulling downe that, which he had built up, and indeed all taking of a reward at any time, when God by his Prophets forbiddeth it, implying yet, that there is a time of receiving for the Prophets maintenance of his disciples.

V. 27.

Therefore the leprosie of Naaman shall cleave to thee and to thy seed for ever. That is, such a leprosie, he had, viz. the greatest and most incurable. And this punishment was most just, that having Naamans money he should together with it have his leprosie, for gaping after the filthy lucre a filthy disease, for his selling secretly the grace of God, an open infamous brand, for sinning about the healing of a leprosie, the leprosie, that it might appeare to come not for any other sinne, but this, for his seeking to enrich his children with goods basely gotten, the debasing of them by this loathsome disease for ever. And mystically this teacheth, that they provide ill for their children, who by unjust meanes seeke to get riches for them, they get Gods judgements, as is most commonly seene, in that they are cithetted with the same servile bands of covetousnesse, or as is most commonly seene, they breake out with the leprosie of riotousnesse, which can never be healed. The Hebrewes by the seed of Gehazi will have no infants or borne after this understood, but onely his children growne up, and R. Levi Ben Gerson by these words [for ever] understandeth the subilee, lest God should seem to be too cruel. But seeing Ely was also punished in his children then unborn, and Iosab, &c. there is no reason thus to limit this judgement against Gehazi, seeing all are tainted with sinne, and God to terrifie the more with his judgements may without cruelty for the sin of the father plague both him and his sinfull brood also outwardly at his pleasure, as hath beene sometimes before shewed. Wherefore God made Gehazi and his seed a lasting monument of the odiousnesse of sacrilege, that in the ages to come it might be pointed at, and said, Behold the fruit of sacrilege, to make all others to have it in abomination. Gehazi is lastly said to have gone out from him a leper as white as snow, that is, the most incurable, as appeareth, Lev. 13. And he is said to have gone out, because the leprous were to be separated to an out place remote from the house, and never to live in company with them any more. Hugo Cardin saith, That some thinke, that Gehazi had no seed, but that mystically they are Gehazites, even his seed as it were, that sell spirituall things, as they are symoniacall, that buy them, or such as when spirituall gifts have been freely bestowed, looke for a recompence after wards, the seller or buyer by pact being both symoniacall. Peter Martyr will have the Pope set forth by Gehazi in that he taketh of those, that the Apostles let goe free, houses and lands, &c. abusing those of whom he taketh, with lies, as he did Naaman. But when he thinketh in thus doing to lye hid from Elishah, that is, Christ, he always beholdeth his impostures, and will judge him to depart from his presence, as most foule and filthy, and never to come where his saints dwell, but in outer darknesse for ever.

Hugo Cardin.
15. V

P. Martyr
The Mytery of Gehazi.

ps. V

CHAP. VI.

V. 1.

After that Gehazi was cast out, say the Hebrewes, who was sharpe to the followers of Elishah, and grudged at his spending of the gifts brought in upon them, the number of them increased so, that there was not room enough for them to dwell together. Wherefore they consult about making another house at Jordan. To this yieldeth another reason of this increase of his followers, viz. because they were pinched with famine, which yet continued, and Elishah, they beleaved, was able either by miracle to provide for them, or by meanes of the provision brought in unto him by such as were godly affected. Howsoever it is worth the noting, saith Martyr, both that the faithfull encrease more, when the wicked are purged out, that such may not be suffered in the Church: and also that the number of the faithfull is not diminished by persecution and tyranny, but encreased, as the Palme-tree fructifieth the more, the more it is pressed with weight, because this encrease of the sons of the prophets with Elisbah, was in the days of idolatrous Ioram. Where the house was, that had not room enough for them, it is not said, but it seemeth not to have been farre from Jordan, because they move him that they might go to Jordan to cut down timber, and build there, and that he would vouchsafe to go with them. Although they were prophets then, and according to their name spent much time in divine reading and exercises, yet they laboured and lived not in idleness, like monasticall persons now a dayes, neither were they such as vowed to live a single life; for chap. 4. we reade of a wife of one of the sonnes of the prophets, they were therefore not tied herein, but at their own liberty, and yet lived in Colledges together under a master, keeping their wives happily in some places not far from them. Which sheweth, the weak ground of Monkish votaries of these times, in their practice.

To status.

able

To Jordan they go to build, saith Martyr, most probably, because there was water for their use, and timber growing along the banks. The cause why this is related, was the miracle wrought upon this occasion by Elisbah, to comfort and confirm the faith of his disciples the more, in making iron to swim upon the water. For when one did cut down wood, the head of his hatchet fel into the water, which made him cry out to Elisbah, and the rather because it was borrowed, and a just person is troubled more, if he cannot restore that which hee borrowed, then if he had lost his own. And by the way see here, how plain and poor the sonnes of the prophets were of old, to shew, that they sought not the world by their profession, but Gods glory. Elisbah pitying his case, and being told where it fell in, for God revealed not all things unto him, cut a stick and cast it in, and then the iron swam and was taken up again by him from whom it fell. R. Solomon saith, that the stick cut was a new helve, for the other was broken, and this being put into the water, the head went on to it, swimming together to the bank, which Martyr following, noteth a threefold miracle; first, in the swimming of the heave iron; secondly, in the joyning with the new helve in the water; thirdly, in supporting the iron with the wood, when it was able to sink that down with the weight, or rather we may say, that here were two miracles wrought. First, in the sinking of the helve cast in and joyning with the head, that lay at the bottom, as if it had been put into the eye thereof by the hand of a man; secondly, in the helve swimming up again, and bringing the head with it, which according to the course of nature would have weighed that down. For this must needs be yielded, that the wood cast in went down to the bottom, or else it had been used as a means in vain, but thus, demersam fluvio relevavit virga securim, as Tertullian speaketh, the stick lifted up the hatchet drowned in the river. And in another place, the iron swam above, but the wood was drowned, which the sonnes of the Prophets received. Wherefore it was not made so to sink, but that it rose again and brought up the iron with it, as hath been already said. To enquire how God did this, as some do, whether by taking away the heave quality of the iron for the time, or by the ministry of Angels, is vain, seeing he is almighty, and can at his pleasure, make heave things to be born up by the waters, as the body of Christ, and fire to lose the quality of burning, as in the fierie furnace, and wilde beasts to refrain from devouring a prey exposed unto them, as in the case of Daniel. But that ever he changed the substance of a body into another substance, the accidents remaining, we never read, or that he made one body to be in more places at once, as the Papists fondly hold touching the body of our Lord in the sacrament. Allegorically, by the head falling into the water whilest wood was cutting down, Gregory understands a preacher puffed up, whilest he seeks to cut down sin, for hereby he himself sinketh, but upon his crying out in sorrow for this, God hath mercy upon him, & saveth him fro perishing in the deep.

P. Martyr.
Note.

V. 3.

V. 5.

Note.

V. 6.

Tertull. lib. 3. cont. Marcion.
Lib. cont. Judæos. c. 12.

V. 8.

And the king of Aram sought against Israel, and consulted with his servants, saying, in such and such a place shall my tents be, &c. ] Vpon what occasion this warre was moved it is not said, and it may seem strange, that after so great a benefit received, in the healing of Naaman the captain of the army, that the king should come against Israel. But it is to be thought, that this warre was rather onely an ambushment, when peace was pretended out of the inveterate malice of the king of Syria, against the king of Israel, then a warre openly made, as the words also intimate. He thought not himself sufficiently revenged for former overthrowes, to have slain Abab in battle, but he sought now treacherously to slay his sonne, when there seemed to be peace between them. And haply for Naaman, he was no more now in such estimation with him to hinder it, seeing he was turned after the God of Israel. The words rendred in [such and such a place] Hebrew, are במקום פלינו אלמני that is, in a place hidden and silent, so called because obscure, and to it they should come without noise, which although it be not here named, yet it was particularly appointed amongst the Syrians. Iosephus speaketh onely of one time that he did thus, in some place where the king of Israel was to ride a hunting. But it is said, not once or twice, whereby it is to be understood that he did it often, and so was by the prophet often discovered. He had power then given him by his prophetically spirit, to see into things done most secretly, and farre off from him, as also appeared partly before, in his reproof of Gehazi. But why would he do so much for an idolatrous king, that esteemed not of him, nor of his doctrine; when as before chap. 3. he professed, that had it not been, that he respected Iehoshaphat, he would not have looked towards him? Answ. It seemeth, that by the miracle wrought then he came into great grace at the court, as was noted chap. 4. in his speech to the Shunamite, wherefore he sought still by good offices doing for the king, to oblige him more and more unto God, by whom hee wrought, if by any means he might bring him to repentance. Moreover, as Martyr noteth, he being a man of God was to promote the good of Gods people, and to keep away evill from them as much as he could, although they were most of them revolted from him, because they were the posterity of Abraham, and so within the covenant still. And it is the duty of the men of God to seek the preservation of the king and state wherein they live, although they be wicked and unworthy.

Iosephus.

P. Martyr.

Note.

V. 10.
Lyra.

When Elisbah gave the king warning of these ambushments, he sent scouts out and found it to be as he had said, and so saved himself from the danger. Lyra, following the vulgar Latin [praecipavit eum] saith, that he sent and took the men laid in ambush, whereas he onely by sending found it to be so, as the Prophet had fore-told, and thus it was made evident unto him, that Elisbah was guided by the spirit of God, to give the more credit to his words.

V. 11.

The king of Syria being troubled at this, challenged his servants as discovering it, but they said that it was Elisbah; whereby it seemeth, that he was famous for his divine spirit, even in that country, and doubtlesse his healing of Naaman was no small cause thereof. The king hearing it, would take away Elisbah, and understanding that he was in Dothan, sent a great army, and horses and chariots to take him. An foolish king, that beleeved Elisbah to be endued with the spirit of God, so that he could reveal most secret consultations against others, and yet conceived not that he could as easily frustrate all attempts against himself. The army of the king of Syria being seen by the servant of Elisbah, he cried out to his master for fear, but he to put fear away from him, said, There are more with us than with them; and when he had prayed, that his eyes might be opened, he saw the mountaine full of horse, and a fierie chariot about Elisbah, the singular number being put for the plural, wherefore the vulgar Latin hath it, fiery chariots. But how could they saith Martyr, be about Elisbah, when as he was in the city, they in the mountaine? And he answereth, that as the Angels like horses and chariots were represented to him upon the mountain, so, was Elisbah also in the midst of them, as for whose sake and guard onely they were now sent. Dothan, about which these Syrians now came, according to Adrichomius, was in the tribe of Zabulon, 12 miles, as Ioram

V. 13. d. 1.

V. 15.

V. 16.

V. 17.

Hieronym.
P. Martyr.

Adrichom.

saith, faith, from Samaria, but others place it in Manassch, the next tribe unto Ephraim, in which Samaria stood. Of Dothan it is spoken before, Gen. 37. but upon what occasion Elisha was now there, is uncertain. He was the common father and instructor of the faithfull in all places, and so went to teach sometime in one place, and sometime in another, and thus I suppose, he was in Dothan at that time. If it be demanded, who was the servant of Elisha now that Gehazi was gone? Some that hold the history of Naaman to be misplaced, answer readily, that it was Gehazi who was not smitten with the leprosie till after this. But of this enough hath bin already said, and in that the servant is not named, as Gehazi commonly was, ch. 4. and ch. 5. it is intimated that he now attended Elisha no more, but another succeeding in his service, which also proveth that the history, ch. 5. is placed in due order.

Elisha perceiving that the coming of this army was to have him delivered into their hands, after that, he shewed his servant what a guard was set about him, that he might not see ar, went out of the city, and then they came down to him to take him: for Dothan according to Adrichomius, was situated in a plain place between two hills, so that to come to him, they must needs come down. Then Elisha prayed the Lord to smite them with blindnesse, and he smote them; and Elisha told them, saying, this is not the way, nor the city, come after me, and I will bring you to the man whom yeo seeke. This blindnes was not the blindnesse of their bodily eyes, for then they could not have seen Elisha to follow him, and they themselves presently perceiving, in what case they were, would not have gone on, as hee directed them; it was therefore a blindesse of mind wherewith they were smitten, making them like little children in understanding, which cannot distinguish between one place and way, and another. It is likely, when they came near Elisha, that being thus infatuated, they knew him not; but taking him for some other man, asked him for Elisha, and the way into the city.

Touching his answer, although he may seem to have spoken untruly to them, yet indeed he did not, for they enquired for Elisha, and although he at that time was in Dothan upon some occasion, yet his dwelling was in Samaria, as hath been partly touched upon ch. 5. and appeareth, ch. 6. 32. neither was he now in the city of Dothan, but came forth to goe to Samaria. In saying therefore, this is not the way, nor the city he meant, that it was not the city where Elisha dwelt, or where they might find him which was most true, because if then they had gone into Dothan, they could not have found him there; but in Samaria, he meant to shew himselfe unto them: so Lyra almost, and Martyr; wherefore Tostatus erred much in granting that Elisha told an officious lie, the spirit of God moving him thereunto, for his future glory. For considering, that to lie is to sin, we must by no means either grant, that so holy a prophet sinned, unlesse it may evidently appeare, neither that God instigateth to any the least sin for the greatest good, that may bee. Elisha would have them smitten with blindnesse purposely, that when they went about to take him, he might take them and make them see how vaine and dangerous a thing it was to come forth against God and his servant, that if it were possible, they might hereby, and by the kind usage which they had, be converted from idols to the true God, who was able to doe such wonderfull things.

He lead them therefore to Samaria, the metropolitical city of the kingdom, where the king kept his court, and had most probably a great guard continually about him, and a number of citizens well appointed, expert in military affaires, and able soon to destroy the Syrian army being now shut into their city. For so soon as they were entred saith Iosephus, Elisha commanded the gates to be shut, and sent to the king to bring forth his bands of men, and to place them round about them; which being done, he prayed God to open their eyes, that is, their understanding again, that thus they might see, in what danger they were. But that they might not be slain, he forbade this to the king; and contrariwise bad, that provision should bee set before them; which being done, and they refreshed herewith, they departed to their master, and never adventured to come in such a secret manner any more, into the land of Israel.

When Ioram coming with his men ready prepared saw them, he asked Elisha saying,

V. 18.

V. 19.

Lyra.
P. Martyr.
Tostatus.

V. 19.

Iosephus.

V. 20, 21, 22,
23.

Prov. 25. 21.

P. Martyr.

saying, shall I smite them, (O my father) He knowing that they were miraculously brought thither by the prophet, would doe nothing without his direction; but hee answered, thou shalt not smite them, but those, whom thou takest with thy sword and thy bow. Seeing his enemies brought now into his power by Elishah, he greatly revered him, and called him father, but it was in hypocrisie; neither was his heart right towards him, as the sequels in this ch. doth declare, when he sent to his house to kill him. Touching the prophets answer, the meaning is, that they were none of his Captives, but the Lords; and therefore, although he had power of life and death over his own captives, yet he had not over thes, neither should smite them, but doe what the Lord would unto them, viz. courcously set them to meat, and so send them away againe; according to that, Rom. 12. 20. If thy enemy hunger, give him meat, &c. Whereas the king obeyed the prophet herein, it was because the Lord overuled him, in whose hand is the heart of the king, and he turneth it as the rivers of water, for his will was certainly to have slain them; neither could any but the divine power have held him from it. Martyr, besides the sense of these words already given; thou wilt not smite all those whom thou takest with thy sword, &c. hath this, thou smitest such, but not all such, therefore much lesse these, whom thou hast not taken. This lenity of the prophet in this case was admirable. Seeing hee was the man that they now aimed at, to take and carry away captive, so that a man would think, he should rather have stirred up the king to slay them as enemies, having them at this advantage; but he thought it an opportunity rather to work in them by kindness a love of his God, who was both of such unparalleld mercy and power, seeing none almost would have let their enemies goe, coming by any means into their power. Neither was this kindness shewed without effect; for it is said, that the Syrian armies came no more into the land of Israel. Against which if the words following v. 24. seem to make, it is to be understood, that the meaning is, they came no more secretly, and by stealth, because they saw they prevailed nothing by so doing, but from thenceforth they made open warre; to this effect Iosaphus, the king of Syria admiring the power of God and the divinity of Elishah, determined with himselfe not to attempt any thing more treacherously and closely, but openly with a full army to invade Israel; and yet happily those forces who were now sent away in safety, never came more, they were by this miracle & mercy so much moved. To intimate which it is said, they added not to come any more, viz. the same armies, but others were gathered together to besiege Samaria in far greater multitudes; for which cause the words are varied. Benhadad gathered together all his tents, although the vulgar Latin hath it, his whole army; and thus Pellican expounds it, or that they came no more in Elishah his life time, or whilest that king reigned. If it be demanded, whether the prophet did well to spare them being idolaters and enemies? I answer, although idolaters of the Israelites were to be slaine, because God had peculiarly chosen them, and by many signes and wonders declared himselfe to be the only true God unto them, and expressly taught them against idolatry; for which cause Elijah spared neither the Prophets of Baal, nor the two captaines with their fifties, and afterwards the servants of Baal being brought together by a wife into the house of Baal were all by Iehu destroyed; Yet other nations were not to be destroyed for this, but as God appointed, viz. the Canaanites, Perezites, Ammorites, &c. who were all adjudged to destruction, and Amalekites, but upon the Syrians the like judgement was not passed, and therefore they might sometime be spared, as occasion served; as when God brought them miraculously into their hands, not for this, but another end; when for this end Benhadad was brought into the hands of Ahab, it was a great sin to spare him, as hath been shewed before. But now it was a vertue, for hereby was shewed gentleness towards enemies able to make their hearts relent, that the Israelites might live by them in the more quiet afterwards, and that their God might have honour even amongst them. Moreover the idolatry that they lived in, was out of simple ignorance, and these that came to take Elijah, did but as they were commanded by their Lord, whom they were to obey, which extenuated their fault, and pleaded for pity to be shewed unto them. Whereas Sallustius thinks, that they had such indignation at Elishah his thus mocking of them, them, that they stirred up their king to the following warre, it is improbable, because their coming no more into that land is spoken of, as the issue of this their escape, and the heart of Benhadad, as appeareth by his whole history, was generally bent after one attempt by warre defeated, to begin another so soon as he could, so implacable was his malicious mind against Israel.

Mystically by the King of Syria warring against Israel, by treachery understand the devil closely seeking the destruction of the faithfull, by Elisbah godly Preachers giving them warning against his treacheries; and as the Syrian army seeking to take Elisbah away was confounded and made to go home again without effecting any thing, so are all the attempts of the devil to take away such Preachers frustrated; when such as he stirreth up to persecute are like Saul, first smitten with blindness, and then receiving their sight again are no more enemies, but rather friends of the Church, and publishers of Gods wonderfull works toward them, as he was, being made of a persecuter, a Preacher of the Christian faith. Whereas Lyra bringeth for example, not Saul, but Anthony the Eremite a diligent Preacher, whom the devil sought to strangle, but by the Virgin Mary he was chased away; it favoureth of a Fryerly legend of inventions put for truths. The army of horses and fiery chariots about Elisbah shewed, how the Angels of God pitch their tents about those that feare him to save them from all dangers, and this none seeth but he, whose eyes God hath opened, as Elisbah his servants, and he onely is to be prayed unto for this and all other things, and not Angels, or any other of the court of heaven, as Elisbah prayed unto him and not to the Angels, although seen neare about him.

It came to passe after this, that the King of Syria gathered together his whole army and went up and besieged Samaria. And there was a great famine, &c. It seemeth, that howsoever Benhadad was moved at the wonder which was wrought so as that he assayed not to overthrow the Israelites any more by treacheries and ambushments, because he found, that there was one amongst them, that could easily defeat all such enterprises of his, yet he hardened himselfe out of the confidence which he had in his great forces wherein he exceeded Israel, to come against them in open warre, imagining foolishly, that although their God could discover his most secret counsels, that they might take none effect and blinde the understanding of his servants sent out in the darke of the night, yet he could not helpe them in case of a long and strong siege, but that they must needs thus perish. For to the like effect almost he once before uttered himselfe, when he had bene overthrowne by Ahab, that he was the God of the mountaines. And however he was then overthrowne, yet since that time he prevailed againe in a pitch battell at Ramoth Gilead, and so he hoped to doe now againe in this Samaritan expedition. And truly hereby the Israelites suffered grievously, for the famine is said to have grown so great in Samaria, That an asses head was sold for eighty pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of doves dunge at five pieces. This saith Pellican, was the just judgement of God upon them, that they, who set at naught the word of God, that heavenly manna and most precious food of the soule, should be enforced through necessity to pay most deare for base things and at other times despicable, for the satisfying of their hunger. By an Asses head, saith Lyra, some understand the whole beast, because in selling men use to say, I will have so much by the head, and I bought so many head of cattel at so much the head: others understand it onely of that part, which seemeth most probable, as Martyr also saith, for if the fourth part of a cab of Doves dunge were five pieces of silver, it is no great marvaile, though an Asses head were sixteene times as much, and in so great a scarcity it is not to be thought that an whole beast was sold together for food to any of the common sort, whose meat this must be supposed to have bene and not of the greater ones. A Cab, saith Martyr, is the sixt part of a measure containing twenty foure egges, the fourth part a measure containing sixe egges. By dung Lyra understandeth, not dung properly, but the garbage with the maw of the fowle containing the graines eaten by it, which commonly used to be cast all together away, as dung; but now by great mens Cookes, it was kept and sold unto the poore for food; because

The Myttery.
Lyra.

Note.

Psal. 34.

Note.

V. 24.

V. 25.
Pellican.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

Josephus.

Chald. paraph.

Patriarchs travels.

V. 26.

V. 27.
Josephus.

28, 29.

V. 30.

P. Martyr.

Lyra.

V. 30.

dung properly is fit rather to choke and to destroy the body, then to nourish it. Yet Martyr holdeth rather, that it was dung, because the word used in the margin cometh of דָּבָר signifying dung, and so it is used, Isa. 38. But he confesseth that the word used in the text cometh of חֹרֶר signifying a cave or hole contracted in it selfe, by which the Sacred History fleeing all obscurity is wont to set forth that, through which the excrements come forth, and not plainly. Josephus thinketh that they used Doves dung for salt, and some to maintaine their fire to make ready their meat. Amongst all which that of Lyra is to be preferred, neither doth it disagree from the originall word, for the history speaketh onely of food and not of sauce or fire, which their hunger permitted them not to look after so much, and they might as well have eaten dirt with the wolf as pigeons dung. For 80. pieces of silver the Chald. Paraphrase hath eight shekels, that is, of our money five pounds, accounting the peice fiftene pence, and a Cabs fourth part was a measure of a pint and halfe, so H. B. saying also, that in some texts for eighty, it is eight pieces of silver; the Septuagint of Sixtus hath it fifty, and likewise Saint Augustine following that translation. This is thus set forth to give us a taste of their extreme famine, seeing Asses flesh was uncleane and might not be eaten, yet now they gave deare for a little for food, which sheweth, that either this siege was in the time of famine spoken of before, or else continued long.

To shew the greatnesse of the famine there followeth another example more stupendious, a woman cryed to the King, as he went upon the wall to save her, and when he understood her meaning to be by giving her some reliefe and replied accordingly, she explained her selfe, as Josephus saith, that she meant not any such thing; then he asking, what she would have, she said, that there was an agreement betwixt her and another woman, that they together should eate her sonne one day and the next day that other womans, wherein she having performed her promise, the other now refused to performe hers. The King soone understood her meaning to be that he should doe her justice, but he replied nothing, onely expressing a great rage, whereinto he was hereby driven against Elisab, he sware to behead him that day. He went upon the wall to see, that all parts might be well defended against the enemy. He said nothing to the case propounded, because it was horrible to heare, but too hard to be judged. But why did he rage so against the innocent Prophet so soon as he heard this? Martyr answereth, partly because he thought that this famine was caused by him, as the drought before in his fathers time by Elisab, partly because he thought, that he could have kept the city from this streight, if he had would, and partly because idolatrous prophets instigated him against Elisab, as one that the gods would not endure, and therefore had brought the city to this extremity; and he addeth a fourth reason which is not so probable, that he exhorted the King to hold out and not to yeeld the city, promising deliverance, which he did to save the faithfull, that were there out of the enemies hands. Lyra resteth upon that one onely, because he delivered not the city by his prayers, which indeed he meant to doe, but yet according to the direction of God, and at the time, when he should appoint, as hereafter followeth. And it may be, that he remembring the dismisle of the Syrians by Elisab his meanes, was partly hereby provoked against him, because if they had bene destroyed when he hed them in Samaria, Samaria could not have now bene brought into this great streight by them.

He raged before at the woman, which cryed unto him, saying, [Is the Lord save thee now?]. For it is so Hebrew, being as much in effect as, The Lord confound thee; how should I save thee? and now he rageth against Elisab like a mad man, whereas, the cause of all this evil was in himselfe his idolatry and wickednesse, of which he should now have repented, and desired the Prophet to pray for him: vers. 30. He was affected with sorrow to rend his garments and to put on sackcloth, but he rent not his heart, which he should chiefly have done, Ierl. 2. 13. and without doing which all this was hypocrisie, being yet well used by the godly to expresse the contrition of their hearts. For the woman, that complained to him, he should have adjudged her to die for her murder, seeing she ought rather to have died her self, then to have committed this bloody sinne. And however her crying thus to the king was accidentall, there was a divine providence in it, to make him see the issue of so foul sinning, just according to the threatning of the law, Deut. 28. where this judgement of a mothers eating her own childe is particularly spoken of.

But Elishah saith in his house, and the Elders with him, &c. ] That is, other Prophets, his disciples saith Iosephus, lamenting the sinnes and miseries of the times. And they are called elders, saith Martyr, partly because of the age of some of them, and partly for the wisdom and gravity that was in them, as in men of greatest antiquity. Tostatus thinketh, that the house, in which he was, was not his own, but another mans, but onely he at this time dwelt therein, because he was poor, and had left all, when he began first to follow Elijah. But to let this passe, as not materiall, although I do not beleieve that Elishah left all so, as that he had now no house of his own, seeing he was never required so to do. As he saith in his house, he perceived by the spirit, that the king had sent a man to cut off his head; meaning himself to follow immediately after to see whether it were done, and therefore he said to his company, See ye not, that the sonne of the murthurer hath sent to take away my head? calling him so, because his father murthured Naboth, and in heart he was already the murthurer of him, and he biddeth them to shut the door against him; that is, not with a minde to resist authority, although tyrantizing, but that whilest they kept him out by strong hand, the king might come to countermand it, being now, as he knew, touched with repentance and hastening after him, that execution might not be done; as the next words declare, Is not the noise of his Lords feet behinde him? Thus Theodoret. He did not this, but he threatned it, but he being by and by moved with repentance, ran unto him repressing the slaughter. And to the same effect Iosephus, he bade them delay the man, shutting the door against him, for the king would by and by be there, repenting him of his command. And accordingly he came with haste to save the prophet from this danger, and being come charged him, that he sought not by his prayers to save the city in the midst of so great calamities; which last passage is not according to the sacred history, wherein he is said, to have spoken these things.

Behold this evil is from the Lord, what should I expect from the Lord any more? ] And it seemeth, according to Martyr, that at his coming some words to this effect were first uttered by the Prophet, (O King) be not so impatient, but wait upon God; then he in replying said thus, meaning, that the Lord had made their misery as great as he could, and therefore now whatsoever he did, he would no more wait upon him, but yield to the enemy; the saying of one, that utterly despaired of help from God, and therefore not likely to have blamed the Prophet for not seeking unto him by his prayers. Yea some, as the Chaldee paraphrast, think, that the Prophet moved him to pray to the Lord; unto which he replied, this evil cometh from him, which is as great as he can lay upon me, why then should I seek any more unto him? The words indeed are so brought in, as if they were the words of the messenger, for it is said, The messenger came down unto him and said, behold this evil, &c. and so it is taken by some; but most expositours take it, as spoken by the king, both for that the messenger was not sent to speak in the kings name, but to do execution, and also because chap. 7. 1. it appeareth, that the king was come thither, seeing the prince upon whom he leaned, was there to hear, and to reply to Elishah prophesying of plenty. Whereas it is said, then the messenger came down to him and said, the words are thus to be distinguished; he came to Elishah his house, but was not suffered to enter, and then the king following him at the heels, when Elishah had moved him to wait upon God and seek to him, said these words, implying, that he would hold out no longer in expecting help from the Lord, who had brought him to so great a streight, but presently yield up the city, and so the Syrians should triumph over the God of Israel, and magnifie their gods above him. Then Elishah prophesied as followeth.

V. 32.

Iosephus.P. Martyr.Abulens.

Theod. qu. 23. in 4. Reg. Hoc quidem non fecit sed minatus est se cum interempturum, ut qui negligenter vel sponte despiceret summam calamitatem, sed statim ductus penitentia accurrit eadem reprimens.

Iosephus.

V. 33.

CHAP. VII.

V. 1.

Note.

Iosephus.

P. Martyr.

Tostatus.

V. 3.

BUt Elishah said, hear ye the word of the Lord, thus saith the Lord, to morrow by this time, a measure of fine flower shall be bought for a shekle, and two measures of barley for a shekle, in the gate of Samaria. ] Although the king had sent to behead Elishah, yet he seeing the extremity in which he was, stood not to expostulate with him about it, but accepting of his recantation, spake the greatest comfort unto him that might be. Whereby is shewed, that the Lord is so mercifull, that he graciously passeth over that which is uttered impatiently in extreame misery, and provideth notwithstanding for his people, as their necessity requireth. There could not any thing more joyfull and fully contenting have been spoken by the Prophet, then to promise plenty, and to set the very day and hour; and therefore, as Iosephus saith, the king joyced greatly when he heard it, but his impious servant on whom he leaned (which argued that he was in great grace with him, as Naaman with the king of Syria) replied scoffingly with this great blasphemy, that if the Lord should make windowes in heaven, and rain down corn, it could not be so, as if he had never read or regarded not, what was recorded touching his feeding of the Israelites with Manna in the wilderness, being 600000. forty years together, and with flesh their fill an whole moneth. Moses himself doubted, as Martyr hath it, when God promised so to do, how it could be done; but his doubting was out of admiration, as the Virgin Maries afterwards, and not out of unbelief, concluding it utterly impossible. Touching the measure which should be bought so cheap, it is Satum in Hebrew and Chald. and this word is also used by Iosephus, but in the Septuagint translation, Modius, and likewise in the vulgar Latin; but according to Ierom, a satum is as much as the measure called modius and half, because it contained 6. cabs, the modius but four. A cab then being 6. pints, as was partly touched before, six of them, which was a satum, amounted to 36. that is, four gallons and half, that is, half a gallon more then half a bushel, and comparing this with the price of doves-dung at this time, we shall finde it to be 120. times cheaper, and barley 240. which was a most admirable fall of price on such a sudden. This prince, that would not believe that it could be so, was by and by threatned, that he should see it, but not taste thereof, because he should by Gods just judgement be troden to death, as hereafter appeareth. If he shall seem not worthy so fore a punishment for not believing the Prophet, who shewed no signe to prove the truth of his prophesie; Tostatus saith well, that he did not onely not believe Elishah, but not the power of God himself, for which he was worthily so punished, and he alone believed not, as it seemeth, when the king and all the rest that heard it, by reason of their former experience, that he was a true Prophet of God, believed it.

There were 4 lepers at the entrance of the gate, &c. ] The meanes whereby God brought it about, that corn proved so plentiful on such a sudden, was by causing a noise of chariots and horses, and of a great army to be heard in the Syrian army, v. 6. whereupon they imagined, that the kings of the Hittites and of Egypt, were hired to help Israel, and so halted away leaving their tents full of all manner of provision; and the means whereby the Israelites besieged in Samaria came to know this, was the desperate adventure of foure lepers, who for their leprosie were not suffered to dwell within the city, but without the gate, they being at the point of perishing by famine, went to the tents of the Syrians very early in the morning, and so discovered it. The Rabbins say that these foure were Gehazi and his three sons, but without all ground. But whatsoever men they were, it seemeth, that they had hitherto received some provision out of the city, but now they began to be in extreame want, and this made them desperate. And from their living without the gate all this time of this siege, and not being cut off by the Syrians we may gather, that the camp lay a good distance from the city, neither did they fight with Israel with any other weapon but with famine. For the sound, which the Lord caused the Syrians to heare; some think that it was not in the ayre, but only in their eares, because thus the the Samaritans should have heard it as well as they; but this followeth not, seeing God can keep some from seeing or hearing that which others heare, as appeareth by he example of Elisab and his servant in Dôthan, and of Saul and his company, Act. 9. If it be demanded what Hittites were these, who they thought came to help them, seeing they were all bondmen to the Israelites, 1 Kings 9. 20, 21. It is to be understood that there was Chalim the sonne of Iaphet, Gen. 10. 4. whose posterity were called Hittites also, and the Isles inhabited; and of these Iosephus understandeth them, only they are written with ח, but the Hitrites here mentioned with ה. But how came it to be known to him that wrote this history, seeing none of the Israelites were there to discover it? doe not think with some; that he knew it by revelation, but that the Syrians themselves made it so publick, that all nations about could not but take notice of it.

The lepers coming to the forsaken tents, where they found nothing, but horses and asses without, and within abundance of provision and treasure went into one, and did eat and drink, and then carried out treasure and hid it in the ground, and having done so the second time, Iosephus saith 4 times, they feared, that if they concealed this goodnewes, it would be found to be a great sin in them, for which they should be liable to punishment. And they had indeed faith Martyr, done already more then they could justifie, seeing the prey belonged not unto them, but was to be at the kings disposing, and till he gave liberty to take and carry away any of it, it was theft in such, as did so. But others say, that the taking of these things was lawfull, and without all fault, being made so by the justice of warre, and their own necessity. But why then did they hide them? It is said they did this, as not thinking the Syrians to be fled quite away: but this is contrary to the course of the history, seeing if they had thought so, they could not have come to tell the king, that they were gone. Moreover it had been a great fault in them, when all the city was in such extremity for want of food, to delay longer the bringing unto them this joyfull newes. Here it may seem strange, that in flying away they should leave their horses, and that when they were fled a good way off, and perceived none to follow them, that they returned not to their tents again. But the same God which sent the sound at the first, could make it continue and pursue them many miles homeward, and the terrour stricken into them to transport them so farre, as not once to think upon their beasts to carry them, or not to dare to stay to bridle them. The news of the Syrians flight being come to the king, he suspecting that it was done in policy, sent out two horse men to see whether they were really fled away or not. In consulting about it v. 13. it is said, let them take five of the horses which remain. And, They took therefore two chariots of horses. Kimhi saith, some of the five which remained; by two chariots of horses Iunius understandeth, [duos equos vestarios] two road-horses, serving to carry men upon the way. Others better [currus equestrum, i. equos curules] of the Kings chariot-horses. Iosephus, to make both these sayings the better to agree, hath it thus; Let two horsemen be sent out, &c. And two horsemen were sent saith the Septuagint, as the meaning is. And following them unto Jordan, they saw garments and vessels strowed in the way. They cast away their garments, that they might run the lighter; by vessels some understand their armour and instruments of warre, and some, precious vessels of silver and gold: but seeing the word כלים signifieth either, it is rather to be conceived, that instruments of warre are here meant, because if their halts were such, that they would not stay to take their horses, much lesse would they take any luggage, but their weapons onely, and growing more and more faint-hearted, they would no longer bear the very burthen of them, but trusting rather to their heels, cast them away.

Newes being brought to the king, the people went soon out with him to the prey, and the corn which they found there in wonderfull great abundance being brought to sell to the citizens (who stayed behinde; that were no souldiers) in the gate of the city, the unbelieving prince, was by the King appointed to keep good order amongst them, that they might not in coming over hastily throng and bear down one another. But whilst he attended upon this office, having first seen some corn

V. 8.

P. Martyr.

Sallianus.

V. 14.
Junius.

V. 15.

V. 16.

Note.

Josephus.

P. Martyr.

corn sold so, as was prophesied, he himself was born down and troden to death And so none of the Lords word fell to the ground, but was all fulfilled, that we might not be unbelieving, but believing in things, which have not so sudden accomplishment, for all promises shall likewise take effect in the time set by God. Josephus, whom also Martyr followeth, saith, that he was set to keep the people from coming out too hastily, when they went to take the prey, which cannot be, because so his treading to death had bin before that any corn had bin sold, or he had seen the cheapnesse prophesied of. And the selling of it at such a price is first spoken of and then his death; plainly intimating, that it was not in the going out to take the prey that this happened, but after the taking, the souldiers returned to sell it at the gate of the city. And after they had begun to sell so to some, the report going throughout the city, such multitudes came thronging to buy, that he who was set to keep them back, was troden down by the violence of the comers, hunger, which brought them being impatient of any stay. And this judgement is thought by some to have come upon him rather than any other, that his sinne in his former oppressions of the people, of which it is not unlikely but that he was guilty, might have a futable punishment in his being pressed to death under their feet. But I passe this over as probable onely, forasmuch as kings favourites who are wicked, are commonly found to be oppressours of the people. The punishment fited well with his sin howsoever, in that he, who slighted so much the power of God, trampling the honour thereof, as it were, under his feet, was so slighted by the multitude in his great and high place, as that they stuck not to tread him to death under their feet. A like death Martyr noteth, that Constantine the last suffered in the gate of Constantinople, when the Grecian army pressed into the city and took it. Whereas Salianus conjectureth, that this prince might be set over the gate, lest any enemies lurking about should enter into it, being empty of people; it is altogether improbable, for both they were now secure in respect of enemies, and all the people went not out to take the prey, but the souldiers onely, else what need had they to have bought? Touching this huge quantity of corn and treasure, it is not amisse conjectured by some, that the Syrians came to be thus well stored, by pillaging and foraging the countrey about during the time, that they lay in siege, but now by the power of God, they were forced to his high honour, to leave it there again with advantage, and to flee shamefully away. Yet, as all expositours note, the subjects of that king were so hardened in their wickednesse through a custome of sinning, as that no reformation from idolatry, or thanksgiving to God, followed for this great deliverance, which made the Lord to meditate upon another sweeping judgement by the Assyrians, and to bring it afterwards, chap. 17. when by many corrections following after this, they were not yet amended.

Lyra.

Lyra makes a good morall of this, from the beginning to tell of the 4 lepers, saying, these lepers set forth preachers, who teach well, but live ill, because the leproy of sin breaks out upon them, however they tell good tidings; the tents of the Syrians full of riches left to the men of Samaria, the noise of armies only being heard, the nations full of all treasure, coming under the power of the Church, onely by the sound of the Apokles preaching; the unbelieving prince, such as continue in their infidelity under the preaching of the Word, who shall finally be troden in the wine-press of Gods wrath for ever.

CHAP. VIII.

Here it is commemorated how Elisbah foretold to the Shunamite, of whom see, Chap. 4. a famine of seven yeares, warning her therefore to depart out of the land. For it is not to be conceived, that he now foretold it after the siege of Samaria, seeing not long after this it ended, and she returned home againe, as is here shewed. The foretelling of this then was about the time of his raising her son to life, seeing that within a while after a famine is said to have beene in those parts, Chap.

Chap. 4. 38. Wherefore by Ianius it is rendered, Elishah had spoken to the women, &c. But to what yeare of Ioram to referre the beginning or ending of it, is uncertaine. But most probably it being begun before the Syrian army came and infested the countrey, it was continued and increased by their long lying there and taking away and destroying their corne and provision, till at last it grew most extreme. And here Martyr well noteth, that whereas the famine threatened by Elijah was but three yeares and an halfe, this was twice as long; so that judgements being removed, and sinne still continuing, they are aggravated and sent againe in a much more grievous manner. But see the thankfulness of Elishah to her, that had bene hospitable to him. He not onely obtained a sonne for her, and restored it to life, but thinking that he could never doe enough for her, who had shewed such kindnesse to him, he giveth her in particular warning of, the danger to come, that she might provide for her selfe elsewhere. And such ought to be our thankfulness to our benefactors, and will be, if we be the servants of God as Elishah was, in way of recompence to doe them all the good that we can. But why did he not rather advertise her husband, who was the head? Ans. It is most probable, that she was now a widow, for her husband is said long before to have been an old man: or he being now aged and decayed committed all his worldly businesse to her manning being religious and discreet. And she went and dwelt in the land of the Philistines seven yeares. David Kimbi, to shew the great danger, that she and hers escaped by departing out the land of Israel aggravateth the misery of the famished in Israel in those yeares beyond all credit, as if the first yeare all their provision being spent, they had the second yeare lived upon the slender fruits, which the first yeare brought forth, and the third yeare upon the creatures, which were cleane, the fourth upon the uncleane, as asses, horses, camels, &c. the fift upon creeping things, the sixt upon the flesh of their children, and the seventh upon the flesh of their owne armes, as Tostatus recites, and confutes it. Yet Martyr saith, that some thinke this to have been the famine of which Iosel speaketh, Chap. 11. which if it were it was most grievous. By her removing into Palestine it seemeth, that other countreyes about were not punished at this time with famine also. It was a particular judgement upon this land for the wickednes thereof, and whether Iudah were thus also afflicted or no is uncertain; yet it seemeth, that it was, because otherwise she would probably have removed thither rather, unlesse the state of that countrey was such, as that they had there no more but what might suffice themselves. The countrey of Palestine and Egypt are noted to have bene very fruitfull, yea at the times, when Canaan laboured with famine in the dayes of Abraham and Isaac, who likewise in the case of necessity removed thither, and therefore this womans going thither to sojourne ought not to be called in question, how she could, being godly, goe to live in an idolatrous countrey, for Elishah also went and lived in Syria, vers. 7. and then the King of Syria sent unto him in his sickness, and if Elijah also went and lived in Sarepta, and Moses many yeares in Midian, for necessity hath no law, as the Proverbe is.

She being returned at the end of seven yeares, came to desire justice of the King, and to have her house and land restored unto her, which it seemeth, were taken away and possessed by some other in her absence, and this the King both granteth and that restitution should be made of all the fruits of her ground since the time of her departing; which sheweth, that even in this time of the famine the land of Israel was not altogether unfruitfull, as neither when that sore famine was in Jacobs time, Gen. 43. for he sent to Ioseph then some of the fruits of the land, vers. 11. viz. honey, nuts and almonds, &c. The man, whom he appointed to see this done, was an eunuch; for such attended much upon Kings in those dayes, and specially upon Queenes, as we may see in the history of Iezabel, 2 King. 9. 32. and of Ahasuerus in the booke of Hester. Yet it may be noted, that the custome of making, and of keeping eunuchs came from the heathen, neither did any godly King ever keepe any: but this is the first, as I remember, of the Kings of Israel, that are said to have had one.

Now it is noted, that at the time of her crying to the King, he was talking with Gehazi, Furnius.

P. Martyr.

Note.

Note.

David Kimbi.

V. 3. 4.

Gebazi, and asking him of the miracles of Elifhab his Master. From whence some gather, as was noted before, that this history is misplaced, and ought to come in before the healing of Naaman, Chap. 5. because after that Gebazi was a leper, he was separated from the company of other men, and so the King could not have this communication with him. But it is answered, that lepers were not so separated, but that others might come and talke with them, and therefore this argument is too weake to prove any thing. Moreover, it being at the end of seven yeares of famine that Ioram had this talke with Gebazi and he being smitten most probably at the beginning of it with the leprosie, it cannot be, that they had this communication together, before he was a leper. Lastly, Iorams inquiry seemeth to have been made, when Elifhab now growing towards his end had done working of miracles, and was absent in Syria, as Martyr noteth, because he would have him tell of all the great things, that Elifhab had done, as speaking of one, that had even now finished his course.

P. Martyr.

V. 7.

After this Elifhab went to Damascus, and Benhadad being sick, is was told him, &c. Martyr yieldeth two reasons why Elifhab went thither, 1 that he might declare unto Hazael, that he should be King of Syria, which indeed, was long before given in charge to Elijah, and Elifhab most probably by his direction given him before he was taken away now went to doe it; 2 to avoid the danger of the great famine, which still continued. And herein Sallianus also agreeth, making it the first yeare of the famine, when he went thither. The first of which reasons I willingly embrace, but because it is said expressly to have been done after these things, that is, after the siege broken up and the great scarcity turned into plenty, I cannot think that the famine was any cause of his going thither. Whereas Sallianus saith, that howsoever there was plenty in Samaria, yet the countrey might still labour with want: I answer, Elifhab dwelt in Samaria, and therefore he had not need to have departed out of the kingdome, although there were scarcity still in other parts, but how it can be, that other parts were in want now, I cannot see; Samaria the chiefest city of the kingdome being so full, that from thence they might be supplied in all other places. If it be demanded, how Elifhab fulfilled that, which was given in charge to Elijah, seeing he was bidden to anoint Hazael King; it may be, that he did, although it be not mentioned: for in Chronico Hebraeorum, it is said, that he anointed him. If not, his declaring to him, that he should be King, was, as an anointing of him to this office.

Chron. Heb.

Iosephus.

Touching the sickness of Benhadad at this time, Iosephus saith, that it came by extremam sorrow for his host's late shamefull flight, when none pursued them to his so great dammage, and ignominy. He also thereby conceived that God was against him, and so he should never prosper in any of his undertakings, which aggravated his griefe without measure. Touching the prophets going into an enemies country, so lately foiled by his meanes, and before maligned for discovering his consultations to the king of Israel, it is to be understood, that he was directed thither by God, and therefore feared no danger, there were more with him then against him, as was shewed him at Dothan. And for the Syrians, their hearts could not but be wonne towards him by his kindnesse shewed them in Samaria in delivering them from the danger of death, the king also being now sick and needing his help, it was no time to offer him any discourtesie, but gladly to receive him, being a man whom he knew to be so gracious with the highest Majesty, and of whose power he had experience in his servant Naaman.

V. 8, 9.

Benhadad being certified of the prophets coming to Damascus, sent Hazael to him with a present of all the good things of Damascus, the load of 40 camels to enquire of him, whether he should not recover his health again, meaning doubtlesse by this great kingly gift to win his favor so far as to pray for him. Whereby we may see in what honour and estimation Elifhab was even amongst the Syrians. The king presumed not to send for him, for king Ahaziah doing so for Elijah, had his messengers destroyed by fire; yea 3 kings before humbled themselves in their streight to come unto him, being warned most probably by that example, and now the king of Syria sendeth a most honourable Embassadour to him, calling himselfe his son, thy sonne Benhadad. By all the good things of Damascus understand some of all, and the very best. But whether the prophet took this present or no, is uncertain; and most conjecture, that he did not, because he refused Naamans, and if wee receive that Septuagint translation called Complutensis & Regia. Hazael stood before him and set the gifts to him, untill hee was ashamed ] he did certainly refuse it.

scp,

Hazael having done his message, Elisba answered, tell him, in living thou shalt live, yet the Lord hath shewed me, that dying, he shall dye. Hebr. it is in the text, אֵלִישָׁה say unto him, in living, thou shalt not live, and the Lord hath shewed me, &c. but in the margin it is אֵלִישָׁה to him, and so it runneth in all expositions except in that of Iunius, who hath it, say not, in living, thou shalt live ] giving this for the meaning, although this disease be not unto death, yet thou shalt not recover out of it, but certainly dye. But whereas אֵלִישָׁה in the margine is taken in, and אֵלִישָׁה in the text left out, take wee them in both, and the sense will be plain. The king sends to enquire, whether he should recover, Elisba answereth, say to him no; indeed thou mightest live, notwithstanding this sicknesse, but by some other meanes, thou shalt dye, and not recover; or leaving אֵלִישָׁה in the margine out, say no, thou shalt live, &c. David Kimhi saith, that the prophet in his answer respected two divers things, and therefore his words are divers, first respecting the disease, he said that he should live, because he should not dye of that. 2. Respecting the evill means, that he should use to make him away, he said, that he should dye, speaking the one to be delivered by way of answer to his enquiry, and the other to prevent the calling in question of the truth of his prophesie, which otherwise might have been questioned, when the king died so soon after.

But others, which Martyr most approveth, say that the imperative is put for the future tense, as in many other places; particularly, Gen. 20. 7. and Prov. 3. 4. Say, that is, thou shalt say, or maist say, if thou wilt, unto him, thou shalt live, for I both know, that he shall not dye of this sicknesse, and that thou wouldst willingly speak pleasing things unto him, but the Lord hath shewed me, that before he recovereth, he shall certainly dye by some other meanes. Other expositions of some, which he also mentioneth, are not worth the naming, as that he would not have the truth plainly told him, least being stricken therewith, he should presently dye, and so the prophet be endangered by his subjects for the great love that they bare unto him, or that he meant that he should live eternally, as being one that was converted to the true God, but this is both to presume upon that which is improbable, and to make him to equivocate, from which he abhorred. Of all these expositions I preferre that of Iunius, and so the prophet neither bad him, nor permitted him to speak otherwise, then as the event should prove, although as the same Iunius hath it, he no lesse truly reported his answer, v. 14. then he dealt faithfully with his master, when as he strangled him and stopt his breath the next day; and upon this Eyra finally resteth, saying that the Prophet told him that he should not live, so that Hazael manifestly lyed in returning his answer.

And he set his countenance, and set it till he was ashamed, and the man of God wept ] thus it is in Hebr. being rendred word for word. How the Septuagint have it hath been shewed before, and in the Septuagint Franckfort, he set the gifts to him, till they were corrupted and he was ashamed. The vulgar Latin, He stood with him and was troubled even to the suffusion of his countenance. Iun. Quamvis contineret vulum suum & componeret dudum flevit tandem vir dei. Here because it is not said, who did thus? although Iunius hath it expressly the man of God, and Tostatus and Vasablon expound it of him, some refer it to Hazael, as the Septuagint and Iosephus, and that I take it, more rightly, both because when it is spoken what the man of God did, he is expressly named, and something was spoken, wherewith Hazael might be affected, when he was told, that his master should surely dye, it being then hap pily in his minde, which he did soon put in practice; but he would now feign sorrow at the hearing of it, and set and offered him the gift howsoever, to expresse which another word is used after the first setting spoken of, and he continued thus to do, till he was ashamed; as thinking, that the man of God knew that he did it not seri-

V. 9.

V. 10.
Iunius.Kimhi.P. MartyrLyra.

V. 11.

V. 13.
Fulfilled 2 K<sup>in</sup>.
10. 32.

P. Martyr.

1 Sam. 24. 15.

Lyra.

V. 14, 15.

P. Martyr.

Pagninus.
Folsephus.
Chald. Paraph.

Note.

ously, but feignedly, having other things in his minde tending to treachery against his master, and cruelty against his brethren, the Israelites. Then Elishah wept for-somuch as he saw into the inhumane malice of his heart against the people of God. And Hazael in submissive words asking the reason, he said, that he should break down the strong holds of the children of Israel, slay their yong men with the sword, dash out the infants brains, and rip up women with childe. Of which when he thought strange, saying, am I a dog? he answered, the Lord hath shewed me; that thou shalt be king of Syria. And upon this it is likely, that he began to meditate the death of his master. If it be demanded, how Elishah may be justified in telling him thus, which was a way to set him on to practice this treason against his king? Martyr saith well, that prophets must declare what God hath committed unto them, although the wicked turn it into an occasion of rebellion, as did Jeroboam before, that the word of God, which is to salvation to some, might turn to their just damnation. For that prophesying of such things, doth not necessarily put men on ambitiously to seek them, appeareth in the example of David, who being anointed King by Samuel, was yet most averse from practising any thing against king Saul. These words of Hazael, What, am I thy servant a dog? &c. are by some drawn to another sense, being read thus without any distinction, What am I thy servant a contemptible dog for power, that I should do these great things? and the Prophet answers accordingly, Thou shalt be King of Syria, and then thou shalt have power. This had bin probable indeed, if he had said [a dead dog] as David sometime to Saul, but because it is the nature of a dog to rend and tear without respect, it is better to take it as spoken in regard of savage cruelty, as abhorring then there from, but he answered, that he should be King of Syria, and so he would change his mynde, as many men do; according to that proverb, honores mutant mores. Lyra joyneth both these expositions together. I am not so potent that I can, or so cruell that I would do thus. And indeed this was such horrible cruelty, that no heart could think upon it without relenting, and therefore Elishah fore-seeing it by the spirit, could not but weep, as Jeremiah after wards for the miseries of his people present, and Christ for their miseries, which he foresaw should come.

Hazael returning to his master told him, that he should live, but the next day he took a thick cloth, and having dipped it in water spread it upon his face, and he died. This, saith Martyr some expound, he did as done in good will to cool him, being extremely hot with a feaver, but whilest the cloth was too hard pressed, his breath was stopped; but it is commonly & best taken for a voluntary act under a colour of cooling, to hasten his end. And he being his great friend, could not so much as be suspected as guilty of his death, when he had done thus; because neither could the King cry out, neither did any fear appear upon his dead body after wards. The cloth laid upon his face, is rendred by Pagninus, pannum a pilis caprarum, or goats hair; by Iosaphus, a wet net; the vulgar Latin hath it [stragulum] a blanket; the Chaldee paraphrast, aperimentum vilesum; whatsoever it were, it was a treacherous part in him, neither did the prophesie of Elishah bear him out in so doing, because although he told him that he should be King, yet he told him not when, neither did he prescribe him such means to come to the kingdome. He was in shew an obedient servant and friend, but indeed did bear a treacherous minde against his master, for his kingdomes sake. As Martyr noteth it to be the case of many princes, which maketh their estate miserable, their nearest friends and those, in whom they trust most, proving their most dangerous enemies to their destruction; so Claudius Caesar had his bane given him by his wife Agrippina in a poisoned bullet, that her sonne Nero might the sooner come to the Empire; and Livia, the wife of Octavian Augustus was his death, when hee lay grievously sick, that hee might not alter his will, whereby he had given the Empire to Tiberius, her sonne by another husband, and give it to a grandchild that he had then by his daughter. To conclude the history of Benhadad, Benjamin the Jew saith, that in Damascus there was a most rare building, which they said, was the pallace of king Benhadad, called Gumagh Damascus, that is, the Mosche of Damascus, which had a wall of glasse built by art Magick, in which were so many holes, as there be dayes in the year, for the Sonne to shine into one each day, so that hereby the day of the moneth and year might be known; within the houses were also bathes of gold and silver, and in them a great tub like a throne, of the same matter, in which two or three might sit and bath themselves. And Iosephus saith, that Benhadad and Hazaël were worshipped by the Syrians as gods, because they so much enlarged the kingdom, and beautified the city with many Temples and other fair buildings.

To leave now again the history of the Kings of Israel, and to bring on that of the Kings of Iudah, v. 16. The fifth year of Ioram the sonne of Ahab and of Iehoshaphat, Ioram the sonne of Iehoshaphat reigned, &c. ] It is said before, 2 King. 1. 17. that Ioram began to reign over Israel, the second year of Ioram the sonne of Iehoshaphat, how then could he begin the fifth of Ioram of Israel, when as in his fifth year he had been seven years king, according to that Chronology? But I have been large already in reconciling this difference, upon 2 King. 1. 17. resting in fine upon this, that there by the second year of Ioram of Iudah, is meant the second year of his fathers making him his consort in the kingdom, here he having been a titular king together with his father 7. years, beginneth to have all the government committed to him, the old king thenceforth meddling no more with matter of government, but giving himself to prepare for his death, and therefore it is said, the fifth year of Ioram king of Israel, and of Iehoshaphat; that is, in his life-time, although he departed out of this life soon after. Here it is to be noted, that in the regie Biblie, both Latin and Greek, these words [and of Iehoshaphat king of Iudah] are wanting, and although they be in the Hebrew, and Chaldee, and Græc. Sixti, yet Tostatus rejecteth them as redundant, and Varabius thinketh they are to be read with a parenthesis, and Iehoshaphat king of Iudah subintellige (was dead) but this is forced: Some to make the sense perfect understand these words, and the fifth of Iehoshaphat, although it were much more, saying, that here his time is counted from the time of his deliverance in the warre against the Syrians, 2 Chron. 20. but this is both an unheard of way of counting, and needlesse, seeing it may be sufficiently supplied with these words at large, in the dayes of Iehoshaphat. Martyr conjectureth, that when he went with Ahab to battle at Ramoth Gilead, he made Ioram his sonne King, and from that time a new account of his reign is to begin, it being now the fifth year, as of Ioram of Israel, therefore the fifth is onely once named for them both, it being the fifth of Iehoshaphat reigning together with his sonne. And from this time of Iorams reigning alone, must his eight years be counted, that there may be an agreement with the time of his death, the 12. year of Ioram of Israel, vers. 25. when Ochoziah his sonne succeeded him, and yet neither will it agree so, unless the fifth year of Ioram of Israel be counted one, and his twelfth another of these eight parts of years being put for years, which is not unusuall.

2 Chron. 21. 1. Ioram is said to have reigned in Iehoshaphats stead after his death, not before, and v. 5. beginning at this time, he is said to have been 32. years old, when he began to reign, and to have reigned eight years. And if he began his reign whilst his father lived, how is it said, that he reigned in his stead he being dead? and if after his death he were but 32. and reigned eight years, how can it be that he was 32. his father yet living, and that he reigned no more then 8. years? Ans. Ioram is said at three severall times to have reigned, or to have been King. First, when his father made him King together with himself, of which that is to be understood, 2 King. 1. 17. Secondly, when waxing old, and desirous to disburthen himself of worldly employment, he committed all the government of the kingdom to him, of which that 2 King. 8. 16. is to be understood, and happily vers. 3. of this chapter. Thirdly, when his father being dead he reigned as sole King, of which 2 King. 22. 51. and this 2 Chron. 21. 1. And from hence his years of reigning are to be reckoned, and of his age when he began, and this most probably was within the compass of the same year, that his father committed all the government to him, as David had done before to his sonne Solomon, that seeing him in his full kingly authority before his death, and that which might satisfie his other six sonnes being at the same time conferred upon him, according to v. 3. there might be none occasion of contention amongst them, although it fell out otherwise, as is by and by shewed, v. 4. For the the kingdome being delivered to Ioram, and great gifts of gold and silver, and pensions, and fenced cities in Iudah to his other six sonnes, wherein they might sit as presidents, he most cruelly slew them all, being impatient of any honours conferred upon them, as derogatory to his royall dignity, soon after the death of his father; and also some Princes that he might have the whole power of collating their dignities upon whom he pleased.

2 Ch. 21. 4.

Tradit. Hebr.

In Tradit. Hebr. it is said, that he slew his brethren because they were godly, and insisted in the steps of their good father, from which he was most averse; as being wholly addicted to the wayes of the house of Ahab; and if so, most probably the Princes slain also were their special friends, and like affected to them for matter of religion. And for this it seemeth to make, which followeth, v. 6. He walked in the wayes of the kings of Israel, &c. And it is not improbable, that he was put on this wickednesse, as not thinking himselfe secure in the kingdome, whilest they lived, or any that might revenge their death, as he might fear, that they being slain, these Princes would doe. But why are the Princes called [Princes of Israel] when as he reigned not over Israel, but Iudah? Ans. by the same reason that Iehosh. 6 sons are said Hebr.

Lyra.

to be the sons of Iehosh. king of Israel, v. 2. The word Israel is not here put for the kingdome of the 10 tribes, but for the whole state of Jacobs children called Israel, and thus he is said to be king of Israel synecdochically, because he was king of part of Israel, and accordingly these are called Princes of Israel, because of Iudah, a tribe of Israel; and that the chiefe and most principall. Lyra saith, that he slew his brethren, because he feared least that he being cast out for his wickednesse, any of them should bee made king in his stead, and to get the goods and possessions which their father gave them; and some Princes, because they disliked his evil doings. But before he did these things, it is said, that he strengthened himselfe in his kingdome, that is, by gifts obliging many unto him, that he might the more securely thus tyrannize. And it is further added, that he walked in the wayes of the kings of Israel, as the house of Ahab did, for hee had his daughter to wife. Vnto his cruelty like that of the Turks, laying the foundation of his kingdome in the shedding of his brothers blood, he added idolatry, or because he was an idolater he was thus cruell, this being a signe for the most part unseparable from idolaters; for the devil, whom such serve, delights in blood, as being himselfe a murderer from the beginning. And the primary cause of all this is noted to have been his unequall yoking in marriage with the daughter of Ahab, Athalia, as it appeareth, that her name was ch. 31. 2. But only she is there said to be the daughter of Amri, the father of Ahab; but she might be called daughter either of the one, or of the other if she were, the daughter of Ahab, seeing Grand-fathers doe commonly call their sonnes daughters, their daughters. And it may be conceived, that she was called first daughter of Ahab, then of Amri his father to denote the deep ingrafting of idolatrous precepts within her breast, as taking them from them both, who were Arch idolaters, and most unreckonable.

P. Martyr.

For I doe not like that way of reconciling this which Martyr mentioneth, that Amri being her father, she was very young when he dyed, and so for her being brought up with Ahab her brother, she is said to be his daughter; for never yet was any woman said to be daughter to her brother for her education with him. By this marriage of Ioram with Athalia, Iehoshaphat is said to have contracted affinity with Ahab, 2 Chron. 18. 1. He was a wife and godly king indeed, but herein he did neither wisely nor godly. He thought to enjoy the more certain peace with the kings of Israel by this meanes, and hoped to draw them from idolatry to the true God, but it fell out clean contrary, his house was hereby perverted to idolatry, and consequently his race well nigh extinct; and for this cause happily he is not named (as making himselfe guilty hereby) with the blamelesse kings, David, Hezekiah, and Josiah, who are said not to have sinned, that is, by idolatry, or being any way necessary to the promoting of it, Ecc. 49. 5. whereas he was, his house not onely being by this means corrupted, but his kingdome. Let no Prince therefore in any politick respect marry so for fear of marring all, 2 Cor. 6. 16. But the Lord would not destroy the house of David for the covenant, which he had made with him, 2 Kings 8. 19. Hee would not destroy Iudah for Dauids sake, as he had promised him, to the same effect.

V. 7.

Of

Of this promise, see 2 Sam. 7. and it is said, that he might give him a light, and his children for ever.] By light kingly glory being meant, which maketh a family to shine, and this, howsoever it ended about the time of the coming of Shiloh, that is, of Christ, according to the prophesie of Jacob, Gen. 49. 10. in respect of a worldly kingdome, yet it shineth by the light of a spirituall reigning in Christ, who was of the seed of David now much more and so shall continue for ever and ever: And this is added, as implying, that for the wickednesse of Ioram he and his were worthy to be cut off, that none of that race might reigne any more; so much doth the Lord abominate idolaters and murderers, and so much is his wrath stirred up against them.

In his dayes Edom rebelled, and would not be subject any more to Iudah, &c.] As he had bene ever since Dauids time, untill the end of Iehosaphats reign, 1 King. 22. 48. 2 King. 3. 9. thus God began to lessen his dominion for his sinnes by cutting off Edom from him; and although he fought with all his might to recover it, and by setting upon them in the night slew many, yet Edom would no more be brought under, but they set up a King of their owne, and Lyba, a city of Iudah also neare unto them fell away at the same time, and as some thinke came under the King of Edom, as joyning with the Edomites in their rebellion. And that his sinnes were the cause of this it appeares, for it is added, vers. 10. For he left the Lord God of his fathers, and built high places in the cities of Iudah, and made Iudah to transgresse. The words, whereby Iorams expedition against the Edomites is set forth are somewhat obscure, therefore Ioram passed into Seir, a city in Edom, and not the mount Seir, because it is written with ר whereas the mount is written with מ and all his chariots with him. And when he had risen up in the night and smitten Edom, which had compassed him and the Princes of the chariots, the people fled to their tents. Pellican therefore expounds them thus. The army of Edom rising in the night smote the Princes of the chariots in Iorams army, and the people of Iudah with their King Ioram fled to their tents, leaving the worke undone, neither was it ever attempted any more; because Libnah, a noble city of Iudah and nigh unto Edom joyned with them also. But he confesseth, that the Hebrews expound it otherwise, and so to expound it is more agreeable to the Hebrew text, if it be not through the negligence of some corrupted, which far be it for us to imagine. The true sense is that given by Martyr, that Ioram with his chariots being come to Edom, the Edomites came and compassed about his army; but he arising in the night brake through their forces slaying many of them, and returning home again, and then they returned to their tents; this warre for the recovery of Edom being thus soone ended with out effect, after one skirmish onely. And the prophesie of Isaac, Gen. 27. 42. that Esaue should breake off his yoke was now fulfilled. And it was a just judgement of God against Ioram, that his defection from God should be punished with the Edomites defection from his obedience, and his breaking of covenant with God with their breaking covenant with him. Lyra hath another exposition, which hee makes here viz. that Ioram had many Edomites with him, that were valiant men, and served him in his warres, whose revolt he now fearing arose up in the night and slew them.

But there were letters brought unto him from Elijah the prophet, saying, &c.] Elijah being long before this received up into heaven, ch. 2. how could he now write unto Ioram, to reprove and threaten him for his wickednesse? Answ. I doe not thinke with the Hebrewes, that these letters were written by Elijah after his taking up, and miraculously presented to Ioram although Lyra holds the same: Nor with Pellican that they might be written and sent by him yet living, the relation hereof being misplaced: for Iehosaphat was dead, before that his sonne Ioram thus fell away from God, & that Elijah was taken out of this world, whilst Iehosaphat yet lived and ruled appeareth, 2 King. 3. where Elisabab, who had not the spirit of working miracles, till after the rapture of his Master, is said to have supplied the armies miraculously with water for Iehosaphats sake there present. I hold then with them, that say, these letters then might be written before by Elijah, foreseeing by the spirit, that Ioram would doe so wickedly and left with Elisabab to be sent

V. 8.

Josh. 15.
Pellican.
Lyra.

V. 10.

V. 11.

p. Martyr.

unto him, when he should see his time; because Elishab his part, as it seemeth, was to helpe and to doe miraculously for the distressed, but not to threaten judgments, or severely to proceed against any, that part being assigned to Elijah his predecessour, and accordingly acted by him. And it is the more probable, that he committed this businesse to Elishab, because he certainly left another to him, which he was to doe after his death, viz. the declaring to Hazael, that he should be King of Syria. To yield to any sending of letters out of another world is to yield to that which is strange, yea contrary to the Sacred Scriptures, which deny all dealing in this kinde in the parable of Dives and Lazarus.

V. 13.

V. 14.

V. 15.

In these letters the idolatry of Ioram is upbraided unto him and his going after the Kings of Israel; and not after Iehoshaphat and Asha; and he is threatened therefore and for killing his brethren better then himselfe, that God would strike him with a great stroak; him, his children, his wives and people, and all his substance; and that he should be stricken with a lothsome disease in his belly, untill his guts should come out. This threatening of him for killing his brethren seemeth to Lyra to be a good argument that this epistle was written after the rapture of Elijah, because they were slaine after and not before. But it must be remembred which hath beene already said, that Elijah wrote thus out of his prophetical spirit, whereby he foresaw this. Some thinke, that they were the letters of another Elijah and not of Elijah the Tishbite. The event proved this epistle a true prophesie, and it could not be long after the coming of it to his hands, for he lay two yeares after that he was smitten in his bowels, and his reigne was but of eight yeares. Most probably he was one yeare in making friends, that might stick to him; the second he adventured to slay his brethren, and some Princes; the third he built high places and forced men to idolatry; the fourth the Edomites and Lybnah rebelled and he went against them and returned doing nothing; the fift he being no whit moved hereby to repent had these letters sent unto him; and the sixt the Philistines and Arabians that were borderers upon the Ethiopians came and wasted Iudah, and tooke away all his substance, and his sonnes, and wives, onely Iohabaz remained, who was the youngest: and lastly, in the seventh yeare at the beginning his most dolorous sickness began whereof he died most miserably; and unto all this was added moreover a dishonour in his buriall, the people made no burning for him, as they had done for his ancestours, neither did they bury him in the sepulchre of the Kings, but only in the city of David in some common burying place, as thinking him unworthy and too base for his wickednesse to have that honour done to his dead corps so marked by Gods hand as most vile, whilest he lived. Of the rite of burning sweet odours to Kings departed, see before, 2 Chron. 16. 14. in the history of Asha his grandfather. Here is to be noted, that whereas vers. 17. the Arabians are said to have taken away his sonnes and wives, it is to be understood, by killing them: for Chap. 22. 1. they are said to have killed all his sonnes, but the youngest, and Iosephus saith, that they slew his wives also. A just judgement of God, that he, who so cruelly slew his brethren should have his sons slaine; and he that took their goods which their father had given them, should have his substance taken all away, and come soone after himselfe to a more miserable end, then his children. Upon what occasion the Arabians came thus against Ioram it is not said, but onely that God stirred them up; yet it is most probable, that the Edomites instigated them hereunto, that the King of Iudah being by these meanes weakened, he might the lesse infest them for their revolting from his obedience. For that Ioram had an army abroad at that time to waste the Edomites, although he could not againe reduce them to his obedience, is intimated, Chap. 22. 1. where it is said, that the Arabian robbers slew the Kings sons, when they rushed into the tents.

V. 20.

2 Chron. 22. 1.

Ioram being dead, the inhabitants of Ierusalem made Abaziah his youngest son King in his stead, for all his elder sonnes were slaine, 2 Kings 8. 25, it is said only that Abaziah his youngest son reigned in his stead. But in both places the name is divers from that. 2 Chron. 21. 17. where his youngest is called Iehohaz, but the same man is also called Azariah, 2 Chron. 22. 6. so that it seemeth he had 3 names, Abaziah was of 42 yeares when he began to reign, 2 Kings 8. He was 22. and indeed how could could he be more, seeing his father Ioram was but 40 when he dyed, for he was 32. when he began his reign, and reigned but 8 yeares as kings, and Chronicles doe both consent. Some Hebrewes say, that Chronicles reckon from the beginning of Amri, whose daughter Ashtalia is here said to be his mother, for so the years agree; Amri 6. Abab 22. Ahaziah his sonne 2. Ioram his brother 12. But because this is too much forced, other Hebrewes say, that 20 yeares of his fathers reign are concealed, and that he is said to have reigned 8 for 28, because that from the time of his troubles he made Ahaziah his son consort with him in the kingdome, and when he had reigned with his father 20 yeares he dyed, and then the men of Ierusalem confirmed the kingdome unto him anew, after which hee reigned but one yeare. And thus it is true, which is said, 2 Kings 8. He was 22 when hee began to reign, that is together with his father, and reigned one yeare only alone, and it is also true, which is here said, he was 42 when he began to reign alone. And this Martyr preferreth as most probable, and Lyra following Ierom, and proving it by the like in Saul, unto whose reign only 2 yeares are counted, when as he reigned manifestly more, as hath bin shewed upon 1 Sam. 13. 1. even 18. but he is said to have reigned two, because he reigned well so long, & no longer. So Ioram is said to have reigned 8 yeares, because so long he reigned well, or innocently as Ierom saith, but then he slew his brethren, & from hence forward wickedly, his kingdom also declining 20 yeares, which cause that time is not reckoned to him, but to intimate so much time more of his reign, and that his son Ahaziah reigned all or part of it together with him, he is said to have bin 42 when he began to reign, lest going upon the number of 22. when he is said, 2 Kings 8. to have begun his reign, 20 whole yeares should be cut off from the Chronology, and so an error be committed in reckoning the time by reason of the number there put, when as it is meant, that from the beginning of his reign with his father, he was 22. and then all the time that his father lived after this being passed over in silence, he is said to have reigned one yeare, that is, alone. And this is held by most, Vatablus, Tostatus, Azorius, Gordon, &c. And this is certainly the best way of clearing this doubt. Whereas it is objected, so Ioram must not have begun his reign at 32, but at 12. or else to have lived not 40, as is commonly counted, but 60. it may be granted that he lived so long, seeing it is not set down, how long he lived.

But whereas Ierom is brought affirming Ioram to have lived but 40. and Iosephus likewise, and all the time both of Ioram the father, and Ahaziah the son, is included within the reign of Ioram of Israel, and the time of his reign was but twelve yeares, 2 King. 8. 16. 25. I must needs confesse, that I cannot see what may be answered. Wherefore some have found out another way, saying, that a transposition is to be made of the words thus. When Ahaziah began to reign, his mothers name was Ahaziah the daughter of Amri, he was of 42. yeares, that is, Amri, or so many yeares passed from the time of his beginning to reign, till now, as hath been before accounted. But seeing there is no warrant thus to transpose the yeares, which are plainly spoken of one, as meant of another, a king of another kingdome, who was also dead long before, this is not to be admitted. Nothing then remaineth to be said, but that this place hath been erroneously copied out, and ought to be corrected by 2 King. 8. as in the Septuagint translation it is, where it is said, as 2 King. 8. so 2 Chron. 22. Ahaziah was 22. yeares old when he began to reign. And yet this is no disparagement to the holy Scripture, seeing some translation is right, and the text 2 King. 8. and pregnant reason is a sufficient ground to evince the truth. Whereas the time of Ahaziah his beginning to reign, is set forth not onely by his age, but 2 King. 8. 25. by the twelfth year of Ioram king of Israel, but ch. 9. 29. by his eleventh year. Martyr saith, that the twelfth was so little begun, that it is not spoken of in the second place, but the eleventh, which was then complete. But if the twelfth were begun, it could not be said in the eleventh with any colour of truth. Lyra therefore and others better, he began to reign alone, his father being dead, in the twelfth year; but that we might know, that when his father lay languishing of his last sickness, and grew by reason thereof unfit to govern, that the kingdome was not without a governour, for he made his sonne king together with him, a yeare before.

Heb. Chron. c. 17

*P. Martyr.
Lyra.
Hieron. Hebr.
1 Sam. 13. 1.*

*Vatablus.
Azor. Gordon.
Sa.*

P. Martyr.

Lyra.

before his death, that is inserted of his beginning to reign in the 11. of Ioram of Israel. Neither can any reason otherwise be conceived why after his death mention should be again made of his beginning to reign in a divers year, ch. 9. 29. but to intimate somewhat before omitted, viz. that besides the one year of his reign before spoken of, he reigned another whilst his father lived, as was the manner of divers other kings, and of Ioram his father, who reigned together with Iehoshaphat his father, as hath been already shewed, upon 2 King. 8. 16.

V. 3, 4.

Abaziah being made King, was as wicked as his father for matter of idolatry, for he followed Ahab, as his mother enforced him, and they of the house of Ahab, are said to have been his counsellors, thus to bring him to destruction; and he is said to have walked in their counsels. 2 King. 8. 27. all this is comprised in fewer words; He walked in the ways of Ahab's house, and did that which was evil before the Lord, for he was the son in law of Ahab. His mother provided him a wife of Ahab's house, and thus he was so strongly carried on, as if he had been enforced to that wickedness, partly by his mothers command, and partly by his wives importunity. Thus idolatry brought in by marrying with idolaters, was so rooted, that it could not be rooted out without rooting up the corrupted stock, for a warning to all generations to come, to take heed of such unequal yoking.

V. 5, 6.

How destruction came from hence unto him, the next words declare, vers. 5. He went with Ioram king of Israel to warre against Hazael at Ramoth Gilead, where Ioram was wounded by the Syrians, and so returned to Iezreel to be healed, then Abaziah followed to visite him. And this is noted to have been by the will of God against Abaziah: For Iehu coming at the same time against Ioram, he went out with him, and to his brethren upon whom Iehu first lighted being slain, he was found out and slain also. This briefly here run over, the purpose of the writer of the Chronicles, being to prosecute only the history of the kings of Iudah fully, is with all the circumstances set forth, 2 King. 9. Iosephus saith, that Iorams army was still at Ramoth Gilead under Iehu as Generall, and that Abaziah coming to visit him, left his forces there also. Which came to passe by a singular providence, that Iehu with the lesse opposition, might execute the judgements of God upon them both together, as he did 2 King. 9. The space between Ramoth Gilead and Iezreel, was 24. miles according to H. Buns.

V. 7, 8.

V. 9.

Iosephus.

Patriarchs travels.

CHAP. IX.

V. 1.

Then Elisab sent one of the sonnes of the Prophets to anoint Iehu king of Israel at Ramoth Gilead, which sheweth it to be true, that was noted out of Iosephus before, viz. that Iehu was left as Generall or chief captain over Iorams forces at Ramoth Gilead against the Syrians. And this Iehu is further said to be the son of Iehoshaphat the sonne of Nimsi, and because the Prophet is bidden to go into Ramoth Gilead, v. 2. and bring Iehu not into a tent, but into an inner chamber, Martyr conjectureth, that Ramoth Gilead was taken by the Israelites, and that Ioram left his army there, thinking, when he should be whole of his wounds, to return and pursue the Syrians further, which is not improbable. Yes, Iosephus plainly affirmeth it, and the words v. 15. do further confirm the same. The Prophet sent to anoint Iehu is thought by some to be Ionah, whom Elisab raised from the dead, viz. the widows son of Sareptah, who afterwards prophesied against Niniveh: but the holy Scripture saith onely in generall, one of the sonnes of the Prophets, therefore to passe over mens conjectures, not determining who he was by name, we read that he is bidden to gird up his loyns, that he might make the more haste, because now there was such an opportunity for Iehu to execute Gods judgements, as he should hardly have another time, Iorams forces being abroad and he disabled by his wounds, and Abaziah, who was now one of Ahab's family by marriage, and as wicked as he, in the same city together with Ioram, and that the city Iezreel appointed for the place, where this execution should be done. And he is bidden take

P. Martyr.

Chron. Hebr.
c. 18.
Epiphan.
Hicronym.

a CRUZE

a cruse of oyl for the anointing of Iehu, which was a thing given in charge before to Elijah, but he onely took order with Elifhab, that it should be done, whereby we may gather, that the Lord enjoined him not to do it in person, but to provide to have it done. And whereas Elifhab did it not himself neither, but sent another to do it, some think, that because he was old and could not travell with such speed, he sent a younger man; others, that he sent one unknown, that the thing might be the more secretly done, which could not have been by so famous a Prophet as Elijah. And I think, that not one, but both of these considerations might move him thus to do, or haply the spirit of God directed him to send and not to go. For his taking of a cruse of oyl with him, it was done, that the intended businesse might be kept the more secret; wherefore it is generally held, that he took common oyl, and none of the holy oyl kept in the Sanctuary, for this neither the haste would permit him to fetch, nor could he doe it without diminishing the matter: and a cruse not an horne, as to anoint David and Solomon; was taken to intimate, that the kingdom should not alwayes continue in his family, as in David; and the like vessel was used for Saul before for the same mysticall end. But seeing no King of Israel, but David's posterity onely was annointed King, since Saul, why was Iehu annointed? Ans. Because he had an harder taske by God imposed upon him, then any of his predecessors, who were appointed by God to reigne over Israel, viz. to execute his judgements upon Ahabs posterity, as is expressed, vers. 7, 8. that he might be the more encouraged unto it, and not feare any thing, when he had received authority, as it were, from God by this means so to doe, and a signe of assurance, that he should be enabled from above. And Elifhab telleth him, that he should finde Iehu in the midst of his brethren, that is, sitting amongst other Captains in counsell, and biddeth him call him forth and carry him into an inner chamber, and there annoint him King and then flee away, all which he did accordingly; and this was so done, that none might know of it, till afterwards, lest if it had been rumoured abroad, some means should have been used to make the execution the more difficult. And because it was dangerous for any man to doe this, whilest Ioram lived, he immediately opened the doore and fled, not tarrying to heare, what Iehu would say.

Thus the Prophets of God sometimes put their lives in hazard in doing their office to which they were appointed, and some suffered death therefore: but no servant of God must paffe for that, but courageously doe the duty commanded him, yet when there is danger, and it may be, we learne by this example to be secret and wary in the performance of it. And here we see what authority the Prophets of God had even in disposing of kingdoms, for which the Lord sometime said to such, I have set thee over kingdoms and nations to plant and root up. For this Prophet as Gods instrument, now puld downe Ioram and set up Iehu, and Abijah before, Ieroboam; and Samuel, David; yet none pretending himselfe to be the man of God, and his vicar may now of the motion of his owne minde presume to doe the like, as the Pope hath done, because every soule is subject to the higher powers, and the greatest Prophet, that ever was, never did this, but by the expresse command of God: when this Prophet came where Iehu was, he found him sitting amongst the Captaines and contrary to the manner of inferior persons, when they are to speake to Princes, he awaited not his rising, but called him forth, being haply in serious consultation about the warre, and Iehu came forth unto him, knowing him doubtlesse to be a Prophet, and supposing him to be sent by Elifhab; whom even the greatest revered for his great power. He told him that he had a message to doe unto him, which he could not, but presently conceive to be from the Lord, and therefore leaving the businesse in hand, of what great weight soever, he came forth to heare it, which shewed some piety towards God to have beene in him, although it was soone overthrowne, by his vaine glory.

When the Prophet had annointed him in secret as he was appointed, he told him, that he should smite the house of Ahab his Master, because it was the will of God, who made him King, that he should thus doe: for that he had shed the blood of his Prophets and other servants by his wife Iezabel, upon whom it should now be

P. Martyr.
Theoderes.

Note.

V. 3.

V. 6.

V. 7.

V. 8.

be revenged, and he added more according to that, 1 King. 21. 21, 22, 23. where the words are already expounded. These words indeed are not mentioned in this chap. before, when Elishah gave him his charge, but it is to be thought that they were spoken being onely for brevities sake there passed over in silence. And when he had said thus, he opened the doore and fled, for he had before shut in, when he brought Iehu into the chamber, that none might see, what he did, and now he flyeth, lest any neare unto Ababs family or of his friends should know of it, and finding him slay him.

V. 11.

D. Kimbi.
P. Martyr.

Then Iehu went in to the servants of his Lord, and they said, Is it peace? Wherefore came this mad fellow to thee? &c. ] They called him mad fellow, because the Prophets sometimes, when they were moved by the Spirit of God, did as if they were besides themselves: in imitation whereof it was common with thole that spake by an evil spirit at the time of their propheties uttering, to be cast into a fury, so Kimbi. But Martyr denieth this, and saith, that was proper to such as spake by an evil spirit; but they which spake by the Spirit of God understood well, what they said. Onely idolaters, such as these were, who loved them not, counted and called them fooles and mad men, because they declaimed against their wickednesse, and contemned the profits, pleasures and honours of this world, which they so much esteemed. So the kinsmen of our Lord sometime thought him to be besides himselfe, and Festus said to Paul, that much learning had made him mad.

Pellican.
Lyra.
Scholast. hist.

Thus also Pellican and Hugo Card. and Lyra, and because they oft times spake things that seemed strange to other men. Comestor, they called him so, because they counted the sonnes of the prophets mad men, or because he ranne away like a mad man, so soon as he had spoken. I think with Kimbi, that because the prophets when they spake by the spirit were sometimes in shew like men distracted through the spirit coming upon them, the prophane called them mad fellows, when as indeed they were not distracted, but well understood what they prophesied, as appeareth by their writing out of their propheties sometimes, and because it is said, 1 Cor. 14. the spirit of the prophets, is subject to the prophets. But that there was a shew of distraction appeareth by that which was said of Saul, 1 Sam. 19. 22, 23. Hee cast off his clotbes when the spirit came upon him, and did after the manner of the prophets being naked all that day, and night v. 24. so that the prophets sometimes were as in an extatic, when they prophesied, and so behaved themselves.

Pellican.

P. Martyr.
Lyra.
Junius.
V. 12.

Iehu answered, yee know the man and his speech. ] Some take this as spoken interrogatively, Doe yee know the man and the truth of his speech, and whether he may bee believed? so Pellican taking it, as spoken doubtfully by Iehu, and likewise Hugo Card. but Martyr, and Lyra; and Iunius, without an interrogation expound it, yee know by his habit that he is a prophet, and therefore what he said, to be by way of prophesying, or doing me a message from the Lord. Then they answering, it is false, and urging him to tell them what he said, he told them all, and they immediately, their hearts being moved by the highest, hastened and set him up for king. For it must needs be acknowledged the wonderfull work of God, when as they but even now prejudged what he had said, as false, and yet presently believed it, and did accordingly. Iosephus and some that follow him, expound it thus; I see yee know the man and what talke he had with me, for he spake madly unto me indeed, then they urging him to tell more particularly what he said, as if they would make no other account of it, then as of words coming from a dis tempered brain, he declared the whole matter unto them, and God immediately wrought herewith so, that they hasted to confirm it. And this seemeth to come nearest to the true meaning, but the reader may without error follow this, or that of Lyra. Whereas they replied, it is false, when Iehu said, yee know the man, &c. some understand it as meant, that they knew him not, nor his talke, and therefore desired to have it related unto them; but I rest in the former, as more agreeable to their calling him mad fellow, and making most for the glory of God in changing their minds so suddenly.

Iosephus.
Comestor.

V. 13.

Iosephus.

Then they hastened and put every man his garment under his feet, and sounded the trumpet, and said, Iehu is king. ] The vulgar Latin, they packe every one his garment under his foot in the likeness of a Tribunal, and Iosephus saith, that they made of them a throne, throne, and set Iehu thereon. Hebr. it is, on the height of degrees] that is, upon a place, unto which, as unto a throne it is ascended by degrees, to declare him to be king, as God had appointed; they set him upon a place somewhat elevated for want of a throne, and covered it with their garments, as with carpets for the greater state. The word used, saith Maryr, signifieth either a stone, or a bone, whereupon some understand it meant of a diall of stone, in which degrees are to note the hours of the day, as the Chald. paraphrast; others, as of ivory made of the Elephants tooth, imagining a seat of such matter to have been there, upon which the judge was wont to sit; for putting their garments under him, it seemeth to have been done amongst the Iewes in way of most highly honouring, Math. 21. 7.

So Iehu conspired against Ioram.] That is, he with the other Captains, and the army at Ramoth Gilead agreed together, binding themselves most probably by oath against Ioram to root out him and all his race, that Iehu might reign in his stead, which is not properly called a conspiring, because God had expressly appointed it so to be done. Hazael, who was likewise anointed king of Syria, cannot be counted for the manner of his aspiring to the kingdom better then a traytour, because he was not bidden to destroy Benbadad, but did it out of his ambition putting him on with hast to get that crown, but Iehu was willed to do: thus against Ahab's race. But Ioram had kept Ramoth Gilead with all Israel from Asabel, &c. Iunius [had set a custody at Ramoth, &c. the vulgar Latin had beseged] the word שָׁמַר here used, may be taken either for keeping or besieging, saith Sallianus, for so it is used, 2 Sam. 11. but untruly, for the word there used is, רָאָה, neither is שָׁמַר put for any thing else, but keeping. But how can he be said to have kept it, when as it was in the hands of the Syrians. Ans. Iosephus saith, that Iehu with the army had taken it, and so by him he kept it, untill himselfe should come thither again. And of the cities being in the possession of Ioram's men, it hath been spoken a little before. And a repetition is here made, saith Maryr, of Ioram's going from hence to Iezreel to be healed of his wounds, that it might be understood, what an opportunity Iehu and the captains at Ramoth now had to set up a new king, which they could not have done, if he had been there, unless he had been first killed, and this was needfull to be remembered, that it might appeare, what was the ground of Iehu his speech here following. If it be your will, let none escape out to tell it in Iezreel.] If yee mean that I shall be king, provide that it be kept from Ioram's knowledge in Iezreel, least he save himselfe by flying away. Hereupon saith Iosephus, all the wayes were beset, that none might goe out. Then Iehu going up into his chariot, hastened towards Iezreel; not alone, for a company is said by and by to have gone with him, being doubtlesse a band of souldiers from Ramoth. And here again it is repeated, that Ioram lay sick there, and Abaziah was come thither to him, that the over-ruling power of God might be marked, which brought them both together to one place to be with the more facility joyned together in destruction, as they had been joyned together in sinne. Then the watchman stood upon the tower in Iezreel, &c. of a watchman set upon on high also in Dauids time to espye and give notice of such, as came towards the city in time of warre, see 2 Sam. 18. 24. This telleth to some of the kings house that he saw a company coming, which the king hearing, biddeth an horseman to goe out and meet them, and aske whether it were peace, which he did, and was answered, what hast thou to doe with peace, get thee behind me, and so he returned not. Then a second horseman was sent out in like manner, who returning not neither, the watchman told that his march that was the leader, was like the marching of Iehu, for he marched furiously. Hereupon Ioram commands to bring forth his chariot, and went out to meet him, and Abaziah with him, and found him in the field of Naboth the Iezreelite, and asking him, is it peace Iehu? he answered, what peace? the whoredomes of thy mother Iezabel, &c. Iehoram then perceiving, that he sought his destruction, turned and fled back again, but Iehu shot an arrow through his body and slew him, &c. Thus it was verified which is said, Pf. 127. Except the Lord watch the city, the watchman watcheth in vain. King Ioram was by this means brought the sooner to his death, neither shall any watching or warding, profit the wicked, when the time is come of Gods judgements for their

Eng. tr. On the top of the stairs

P. Maryr.

V. 14.
Coniuratio est multorum simul iurantium & pactum aliquod iureiurand.
roborantium.
To status.

Iosephus.

V. 15.
P. Maryr.

V. 16.

V. 17.

V. 19.

V. 20.

V. 21.

V. 22.

V. 23.

Note.

Josephus.

their finnes. Iosephus differing somewhat from the Scripture, relates it thus; Ioram bad, that an horseman should be sent out and aske who it was that came, then hee approaching, asked what was done in the army? for the king desired to know; but Iehu bad him not to be sollicitous about that, but turn and come behind him with the rest of the company. Hee would not suffer him to return, that the king might know nothing, till he came at him, but hee suddenly surpris'd. The Chald. paraph. rendreth these words, he marcheth furiously, he leadeth quietly, Iosephus he marcheth slowly, and with a well ordered troop] but the same word נלח is here used, which was used before by the Captaines when they asked, wherefore came this mad fellow to thee? It is best therefore rendred furiously or madly. The king understanding, that it was Iehu, hastened with the other king to meet him for honours sake, as some suppose, he being his chiefe captain; and now thought by him to come with good newes from the army, which because he would tell himselfe, and would not be prevented by any other, hee thought that hee would not suffer any of the messengers to returne, but would have them follow after him.

Lyra.

And it is to be noted, how the divine providence carried him to the very place, where execution was to be done, to the field of Naboth the Iezreelite. Touching Iehu his answer, when he asked, whether it were peace, The Whoredoms and witchcrafts of thy mother Iezabel, &c. By both these Lyra understandeth her idolatries, for idolatry is spirituall fornication, and commonly called whoredom and adultery; because the Church is unto God, as his Spouse, and therefore as when a mans wife goeth after another man, she is an whore and adulteresse; so when any, that should worship the true God onely, follow after idols, they are adulterers and adulteresses. And witchcraft spirituall it is, because it intoxicateth as witchcraft, so that idolaters are hereby carried headlong as by an evil spirit to their destruction.

Josephus.
P. Martyr.

Iosephus understandeth whoredoms properly, Martyr both spirituall and corporall whoredome, because they commonly goe together. But why is not Iorams owne wickednesse objected to him, but his mothers? Answ. She was the head thereof, and the first bringer of the worship of Baal into Israel, and now, by her and her daughter Athaliahs meanes, Iudah was corrupted therewith. Moreover it was his part being King, not to have suffered her to goe on in her idolatry, as Asa suffered not his Mother Maachab. For by thus doing he made it his owne, and was worthy with her to be destroyed: which was Iehu his meaning, when he objected these things unto him, and asked, What hast thou to doe with peace? Note then, that where idolatry and whoredoms are common, the State cannot be quiet, but the sword and slaughter must needs follow; therefore the way to have peace is to purge the land from these evils, as all good Kings have done.

Nota.

He turned his hand and fled:] That is, he bade him, that guided his chariot horses to turne them and flee away. When Iehu tooke his bowe to shoot, it is said, [That he filled his hand with his bowe] by an Hebraisme: Then Iehu bad Bidchar his Captain take and cast him into a part of Naboths field; recounting the prophesie, whereby it was thus appointed. Bidchar in Hebrew is called בִּדְכָר which cometh of a word signifying three, because, as also Iosephus hath it, the third part of his army was committed unto him, he was then Captaine of the third part. But how did the prophesie touch Iehoram, when as Naboth was not put to death by him, but by his father, and it was Abah his father, that was threatened, that the dogs should lick his blood there, 1 King. 21. 19. For the meaning of those words see my exposition there. But the Lord then threatened not Abah alone but his sonnes, v. 21. and upon his humiliation said, that he would not bring this evill in his but in his sonnes dayes, v. 29. wherefore Iehu taking all the prophesie together maketh this construction of it, I will reward thee in this field, for the blood of Naboth and the blood of his sonnes: in which words he intimated that, which was no where before expressed, that Naboths sonnes were slaine also, that Abah might obtaine his vineyard; unless with some we shall understand their blood to be spoken of, because when their meanes were taken away, their blood was, as it were, shed; but I rather think, that they were slaine also, as I partly touched before upon 2 King. 21. because

V. 25.

V. 26.

D. Kimbi.

because many, that have no lands or goods, live upon their hands. In that place then this heinous wickednesse was revenged now, Abab being here punished in his wicked fornic. And in that he had cast his body there, it is intimated, that another part of the prophesie was now fulfilled also, viz. by his bodys lying unburied to be eaten up of birds, 1 King. 21. 24. And in speaking of the prophesie against Abab he called it a burden laid upon him, because it is to beare an heavy burden to suffer such punishments. And in uttering the prophesie he saith, I see, saith the Lord, the blood of Naboth yesterday, &c. To note, that blood unjustly shed is alwayes before the eyes of the Lord, how long soever before, as if it had beene but yesterday, till it be thoroughly revenged; so Pellican. But indeed these words uttered by the Prophet then, serve rather to set forth the time of Elijah his threatening of him to have beene the day after that murder committed.

When Joram was slaine, Ahaziah the King of Iudah fled by the way of the garden house and Iehu pursued him, and said, Smite him also in his chariot in the going up to Gur which is by Ibleam, then he fled to Megiddo and died there, 2 Chron. 22. 9. it is said, That Iehu seeking for Ahazia found him lurking in Samaria, and when he was brought unto him, slew him. Here seemeth to be a contradiction, but it is by Lyra thus expounded, Ahaziah fled by the way of the garden house; and although Iehu bade kill him in the going up to Gur, he came first to Samaria, and there sought to hide himselfe, but by those of Iehu his company being found out, he was brought unto him to the place before named and being deadly wounded haply with an arrow, as Joram had been, he fled to Megiddo and there died of this wound. Thus, but more briefly Lyra, but more largely set forth, for the more full clearing of the doubt. Another more improbably saith, that he caused his wounds to be dressed at Megiddo according to Iosephus and then fled to Samaria being fourteene miles off, from whence being found, he was brought back to Megiddo againe and there slaine by the command of Iehu. For the Sacred history speaketh not of his being slaine at Megiddo, but dying there of the wounds formerly received; nor of his fleeing any whither after that he came to Megiddo. Martyr followeth Lyra, but onely he saith, that Ahaziah was wounded at the commandment of Iehu in Iezreel, and then fleeing to Megiddo he died there. Salianus most unreasonably saith, that he lay hid in Megiddo, seeking to make this exposition good by taking Samaria the chiefe city of the Kingdome for the Kingdome of Israel, within which Megiddo was. Thus also Iunius, in Samaria, that is, in the Kingdome of Israel for which the Metropolis is put Synecdochically. But seeing Samaria is no where thus taken, I passe this over, as a groundlesse invention, and conclude, that he fled by the Kings garden in Iezreel near Naboths field, where Iehu bade smite him, but the pursuers could not then reach him, he having gotten so much ground, whilest Joram was taken out of his chariot and cast into the field of Naboth, that he got into Samaria seeking to be hidden there, but they coming soone after, found him out and brought him to Iehu about Iezreel, and then he shot him also, and not doubting, but that his wound was deadly suffered him to flee to Megiddo foure miles off, and there he died. Megiddo was a towne in Manasseh; Iosb. 17. 11. Iosephus saith, That having received this wound he left his Chariot and fled on horseback. Now for the justifying of this exposition it is to be noted, that he saith, 2 King. 9. 27. Iehu bade smite him; but these words, and they smote him, are not in the Hebrew, but onely supplied by the Vulg. Lat. and Iunius, and in some Septuagint; and so to say with the Chronologer, that after this bidding he went and hid himselfe in Samaria, is not contradictory to the Kings, but onely a declaring by way of supplement of that which is here wanting, that he was not smitten so soone as he bade smite him, but some time after being brought back from Samaria to which place he had first escaped, to Iehu to be slaine. Then he gave him a deadly wound with an arrow, as Iosephus also saith expressly, whereof he died at Megiddo, whither he fled thus wounded, and therefore it is said there, that not they, but he slew him.

If it be demanded, whether did not Iehu goe beyond his commission, which was onely to smite the house of Abab, in smiting Ahaziah, who was none of his

Si

linage

Pellican.
Nere.

V. 27.

Lyra.

H.B. Patri-
arches travels,

P. Martyr.

Iosephus.

linage also? It is generally answered by expositours, that Iehu did herein no more, then God willed: for to shew this, 2 Chron. 22. 7. it is said, It was the will of God, that Ahaziah came to visite Ioram, and went out with him against Iehu, that he might destroy the house of Ahab. God brought them both together into Iehu his hands, the one as a naturall member of his house, and the other being made so by marriage, 2 King. 8. 27. and because he came of Athaliah his daughter, and therefore in slaying him also he did no more, then was required, viz. destroy Ahabs house.

V. 38.

Ahaziah being slain had more honour done to him, then Ioram, for he was carried to Ierusalem and buried there in the sepulchres of his fathers, but 2 Chron. 22. 9. this was onely for Iehosaphass sake, of whom he descended. For that which followeth, vers. 29. Ahaziah reigned the eleventh year of Ioram, &c. It hath bene already expounded upon, 2 King. 8. 26: the seeming contradiction being reconciled. And the Spirit of God in repeating the same thing twice, viz. that he reigned but one yeare, would have us note, what a short time he reigned for his wickednesse, wherein he exceeded even his wicked father Ioram, as Iosephus saith, and we may easily gather, if we compare their histories. Righteousnesse prolongeth a Kings life in glory, but wickednesse cutteth it off betimes.

Note.

V. 30.

Iosephus.
Tostatus.
Vasabius.

And Iehu came to Iezreel, then Iezabel painted her face and tyred her head, &c.] To what end she thus did, Iosephus setteth forth, saying, that she stood in the tower in her royall attire, that appearing in the Majesty of a Queen, she might the more move Iehu, as Tostatus and Vasabius, and haply she thought that whatsoever she should say, Iehu would not dishonour himself so much, as to embrew his hands in the blood of a woman. Wherefore she cast out this reproach against him, had Zimri peace that slew his master? for he himself indeed perished, within seven days after that he had thus gotten the crown, so she hoped, that Iehu should do, she having many more sonnes, of which she made account, that some one would be presently set up, and be revenged upon Iehu, for the death of her sonne Ioram. Thus she made a treacherous Zimri of Iehu, who was anointed of the Lord to do this execution.

1 King. 16. 10.

V. 32.

But she soon paid dear for this and all other her wickednesses: for Iehu lookt up and said, who is on my side? and immediatly two or three Eunuks lookt out at the window, and he commanded them to cast her down, which they did, and so she died, and was troden under the horses feet. A miserable and desperate end, but such as she was well worthy of, for causing innocent Naboth to be stoned to death, and for persecuting and killing up the Prophets of God. For it is to be noted, that being in apparent danger, she sought not to hide her self, neither had any remorse for her sinnes before she died, but went on in her pride and vanity, thinking to daunt and to outface the executioner of Gods judgements upon her now in presence, an example to all the wicked blood-thirsty enemies of the truth, wherein they may see their own destiny, viz. that continuing to fill up their sinnes unto the end, they shall then suddenly be horribly destroyed by such means as they least feared; as she by her own attendants. But they herein shewed their false hearts to her their Lady and mistresse, for which cause such are rightly called by a certain Emperour, serices nula. It is strange to see, what an exposition, Lyra saith, the Hebrews make upon this place, contrary to all our Doctors, and yet by him also favoured, that Iezabel painted her face, &c. to allure Iehu to love her, and where-as her words seem to make against this, Had Zimri peace that slew his master? He wresteth them strangely, rendring them thus, can there be peace? there making an interrogation point, and then adding Amri slew his master, leaving it to be supplied, and yet reigned many years in peace, understanding her demand, can there be peace? as a wish that there might be so to him. But the text speaketh not of Amri, but of Zimri, neither did Amri slay his master, but the murderer of his master, and Iezabel being now an old woman, it had been absurd for her to think of alluring any man to love, by thus trimming up her self, but rather to deride her, as Maro reasoneth.

Note.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

V. 34.

Iehu then went in to take his repast, and when he had so done, he bade some about about him to visite that cursed woman and to bury her, because she was a kings daughter. He thought haply, that he should be the more maligned by other kings about, and specially by the kings of the Sidonians, of whom she came, if he should suffer her corps to lye unburied. If it be said, by the same reason he should have taken order for the buriall of Ioram, it is answered, he caused him to be cast out to fulfill a prophesie, and although there was the like prophesie touching Iezabel, yet he might for the present forget it; but when he heard, that the dogs had eaten her up, he soon called it to minde, and repeated the words thereof; that the dogges should eat her up, and that she should be as dung upon the earth, neither should any man say, this is Iezabel, meaning, when he should passe by her sepulchre, as is common to say of great persons, for she had no sepulchre or monument, whereby to be remembered, and so it was verified in her, which is said Prov. 10. 7. The memory of the wicked shall rot.

By Iezabel we may with Hugo allegorically understand this world, which being most vile, sheweth yet a painted face, to allure to the love of her, but all the pomp and pride of this world will not uphold it, but when the time of judgement cometh, it shall all be ruined and consumed, and all that are drawn by the glory thereof together. Martyr by Iezabel understandeth the Pope of Rome, who painteth and setteth forth himself as a vice-god upon earth, when as he is full of fornications and witchcrafts, by his idolatries and powerfull illusions bewitching mens mindes with the love of him. But when the time of his judgement cometh, all his glory shall suddenly be overthrowen, he shall be cruelly destroyed, and become as base as the dung upon the earth, even to those that have honoured him, which is according to the revelation, where he is likened to a great whore, that cometh finally to destruction upon the sudden. Yea, any great seducer to things idolatrous may be understood by her, as Rev. 2. 20. those that seduced some in the Church of Thiatira to eat things offered to idols.

Touching painting of faces, Martyr here taketh occasion to inveigh against it, as being censured by Cyprian, Chrysostome, Augustine, and the rest of the fathers, and as coming from pride and fleshly lust, it being hereby sought to allure men, and a changing of the naturall face into an artificiall, but indeed not to the bettering, but marring thereof; alledging Cyprian, saying, that the devill taught the daughters of men to make themselves seem faire thus, to allure the sonnes of God to their destruction. He that desireth to read more at large of it, may look into his disputes hereupon, 2 King. 9.

V. 35, 36, 37.

Hugo Cardin.
The Allegory.

P. Martyr.

CHAP. X.

NOW Ahab had 70. sonnes in Samaria (that is, of his own, and the sonnes of his sonnes and daughters) and he wrote letters to the Princes of Israel, and the Elders in Samaria, who brought them up, &c. ] That is, saith Iunius, to such princes, as Ioram had sent to Samaria with his children, to keep there with them, and to tutour them in the houses of the Elders, who were as Aldermen in that city, when he went out to war against the Syrians. Although I cannot see, but that we may well grant, a longer time of their abode in that City, as being the chief City of the kingdome, that amongst the great ones, there they might have noble education. But to let this passe, Iehu having slaine Ioram, the chiefe of Ahabs family, it remained now that he should cast about, how to cut off all the rest, and to this end he offers the Samaritans and Princes of Israel residing there for the cause before said, if they would, to set up one of their masters sons for king, and to fight for him, telling them, that they had means so to do. chariots and horses, a defended city, and armes. Which some interpret, as spoken ironically, seeing the chariots and armes were now in his own power, he being generall of the whole army at Ramoth Gilead, others as spoken seriously for the great strength of Samaria, and because most probably, although a great army was then in another place, yet Samaria was not left without sufficient strength, there being so much

V. 1.

Iunius.

V. 3.

Lyn.
P. Martyr.

of the blood royall there, and other princes with them. It ſeemeth to me, that he was not ſerious, becauſe if there had been ſuch ſtrength, he would not have delayed the time by writing, but immediately have haſtened thither with his army to deſtroy Ahab's poſteritie, leſt forces being gathered together for their defence, that work might have proved difficult and tedious. He wrote then thus unto them, as conjecturing, that it would fall out as it did, that they apprehending his great power, having the command of an whole army ready prepared, and their own inability to reſiſt him, would preſently yield unto his will.

V. 5.
V. 6.
V. 7.
V. 8.
V. 9.

V. 10.
P. Martyr.

Iehu having received answer to his letters, that they were all his ſervants, and would doe whatſoever he commanded, wrote again that they ſhould bring him the next day by that time, all the heads of their maſters ſonnes, which was done accordingly, they being all inſtantly ſlain. Then Iehu bad that they ſhould be laid by the gate upon two heaps till the morning, whereby it ſeemeth that they were brought thither late in the evening, wherefore he deferred his going out to ſee them, till the morning, and then coming to the gate, he ſaid to all the people whom hee moſt probably appointed to be there, together with the men that came from Samaria, ye are juſt, I have conſpired againſt my maſter and ſlain him, but who ſlew all theſe? Thus juſtifying himſelfe by their fact, who had now ſhed much more of the royall blood then hee, and the more to juſtifie both himſelfe and them, he applyeth the propheſie of Elijah againſt Ahab's houſe as now fulfilled, ſaying; know ye now that nothing of the word of the Lord ſhall fall to the ground, &c. P. Martyr notwithſtanding this propheſie, chargeth the Princes of Samaria with too much timorousneſſe, perfidiouſneſſe and parricide, becauſe they did not firſt entreat for the ſparing of their lives, who were committed to their care and cuſtody; but to ſave their own lives and eſtates, at the command of Iehu committed this great murder, ſaying, that although this was to be done, ſeeing God had decreed it, yet they not knowing that it was committed to Iehu to ſee this execution done, neither firſt conſulting with any prophet about it, but being carried with a baſe fear of looſing their own lives, may juſtly be condemned therefore. But for ſo much as their king was now dead, and Iehu was known to be king, and moſt probably known to be ſet up to cut off the wicked houſe of Ahab, yea happily he intimated ſo much in his letters unto them, although it be not expreſſed; I think rather that they ſinned not herein, but did according to their duty to God, whoſe will they would not reſiſt, and to the new king, to whom they yielded ſo ready ſubjection, according to Gods law. There may ſeem indeed to have been much puſillanimity in them, becauſe they were moved to yield by this conſideration, that two kings could not ſtand before him, and therefore they concluded, that they ſhould be much leſſe able to make head againſt him, but it was an higher power that moved them thus unaniouſly to ſubmit unto Iehu, whom he had ſet up, and therefore though they feared, and without any reſiſtance obeyed his command, it is not to be marvelled at, as too much timorousneſſe.

Rom. 13. 1.

Nota.

Thus the word of God alwayes takes effect, and all the wicked thereby threatened, are at the length puniſhed moſt ſeverely. Neither is it cruelty in the executioners that being hereby ſet a work, kill and ſlay them; but zeale and juſtice, ſeeing it is moſt juſt for any man to doe whatſoever God willet to be done, his will being the rule of juſtice.

V. 11.

Lyra.

P. Martyr.

And Iehu ſlew all that remained of the houſe of Ahab, and his nobles, his acquaintance, and Priests. They were all a company of idolaters, and although they came not of Ahab, yet they were of his houſehold, and ſo were included in the name of his houſe, which Iehu was bidden utterly to deſtroy. Some by the Priests here ſpoken of, underſtand thoſe mentioned, v. 24. holding this of his ſlaying his Priests here to be ſpoken by anticipation, it being meant, that he did it not now, but ſoon after, the manner whereof followeth, v. 20. 27. &c. But others better by theſe Priests underſtand the kings Chaplains in his houſe: for Iezabel is ſaid before to have had 400. that ate bread at her table, and therefore it is not to be doubted, but that her ſonne had ſome, whom he kept in his houſe. By the word nota, ſignifying acquaintance, Theodoras underſtandeth his prophets, who took upon them to foretell tell things to come, wherefore he readeth it γινώσκων knowers. But the word קִדְרָן signifieth rather men known unto him, as conversing dayly with him when he had thus cut off the house of Abah in Iezreel, he went to Samaria, and upon the way thither, he met with the brethren of Abaziah at Betbekedi of the shepherds according to Iunius, that is, the house of binding sheep to be shorne, unless it had the name from that which was done there at this time, viz. the slaughter of the 42 brethren of king Abaziah here, because kings are shepherds of the people. But this is farre fetcht, seeing although kings be sometimes so called, yet not without further explication, and their brethren are not so called, neither were they bound here, but slaine; and it was now the known name of the place, and not afterwards upon this occasion so called. They being asked, did not only tell who they were, but that they went to salute the children of the king and Queen. Here it may first be doubted, how these can be said to be the brethren of Abaziah, seeing he was the youngest, and that he was made king, because the Arabians had slain all his elder brethren? 2 Chron. 22. 1. Sol. By brethren, kinsmen also were understood amongst the Hebrewes, and these are called v. 8. sonnes of the kinsmen of Abaziah, ministering unto him, and Princes of Iudah. Secondly, whether Iehu did well in killing these who were none of Abahs house? Sol. God himselfe justifieth him, v. 30. and therefore he did undoubtedly, that which was right herein. For although they were not of Abahs house, yet there was great familiarity betwixt these and them, they were birds of a feather, and joyned to Abahs house in idolatry, for which by the law of God, they ought to be put to death. Thirdly, whether they were going to visit the children of Ioram and Iezabel, because if Iehu met them in his going to Samaria, they were come past the place where they lived; I doe not think with some, that they were travelling to Iezreel, supposing them to be there, for betwixt great persons so linked together in love, there is often certain intelligence, that they may not mistake the place, but as they came from Ierusalem towards Samaria, he might meet them, where the way from Iezreel met with theirs. Fourthly, why were they so foolish to put themselves into so great danger meerly upon complement at this time? Sol. They were doubtlesse ignorant, that the kings children were slain, or Ioram or Abaziah, which also their free acknowledging, for what end they came, argueth; so also Iosephus and Tostatus, though some think otherwise, and that they lurked at this place to hide themselves, having heard before this, how things went. But the place, where they lived being farre South and Samaria Northward, they might well be ignorant of that, which had been so lately done, as Lyra reasoneth. Fifthly, why 2 Chron. 22. 8. these are said to be slain, and then Abaziah, whereas he was slain before? 2 King. 9. 27. and these some dayes after, ch. 10. 12. Sol. The history being so fully, according to all the circumstances, set forth in the Kings, the Chronicles do onely set forth somewhat of it briefly, not respecting so much the order, as the thing done, with some particulars before omitted. And therefore because nothing was spoken before of the slaying of Abaziah by Iehu, it is finally set down, though out of place, because Iehu was now going to Samaria, where he is said to have been found hiding himself, of which see before ch. 9. 27.

Then going forward he found Ionadab the sonne of Rechab, &c. ] Rechab came of Iethro the father in law of Moses, other wise called the Cyncean, from the place where he dwelt, and Rechabs father is said to be Chamoth, who it seemeth, came of Heber, which of old seperated himself from his own nation to go and dwell with the Manassites, when they went and dwelt in the mountainous parts of Iudah, and this Iethro was also called Hobab. He was a most godly man, and full of zeal for God and against idols, and led a most strict life, and enjoined the like to all his children, as we may see Ier. 35. And for this cause he was had in great honour among the people, wherefore Iehu seeing him upon the way, thought it would be a great grace unto him to take him along with him, and for this cause after salutations he caused him to come up into his chariot to ride with him to Samaria, saying, come with me and thou shalt see my zeal for the Lord.

Iosephus saith, that he was his old acquaintance, and now told him, what he had done at Iezreel against Abahs house for idolatry, and if so, then Iehu was well disposed

V. 12.

Iunius.

V. 13.

Iosephus.
Tostatus.Lyra.

V. 15.

1 Chron. 2. 55.Iudg. 4. 11.Iudg. 1. 16.Iosephus.

posed before, seeing otherwise he would not have been linked in friendship with such a man. But there seemed by this his saying, to be some tinge of hypocrisie in him, because he would have his zeal seen by men, which appeared more afterwards, when having put downe the idolatry of Baalism, he fell to that of Irebonims calves, v. 29.

V. 17.

V. 18.

V. 19.

V. 20.

V. 21.

P. Martyr.

Augustine.

Lyra.

Hugo Cardin.

Pellican.

Toftatus.

Ephes. 4. 25.

When Iehu was come to Samaria, he smote all that remained more unto Ahab, that is, all that were any way allied unto him, and whom he had used, as his instruments to advance idolatry, thus doing there, as he had done before in Iezreel. And having by this means made the kingdome sure, all enemies being cut off, that might hinder his peaceable enjoying thereof, he calleth the people together, and by a stratagem making a shew, as if he would set up the worship of Baal, gathereth all the worshippers of Baal together in the house of Baal, and there causeth them to be slain. If it be demanded here, whether Iehu sinned not in this dissembling? Martyr answereth, that he did, because he lied to the encouraging of the Baalites to sin, who haply for fear would otherwise have left their idolatry many of them, and by this his dissimulation he grieved and gave occasion to many good men to think hardly of him, as destroying the house of Ahab for none other cause, but to get his kingdome. And what is said by others in justifying Iehu he taketh away: as that it was but an officious lye, that he made it soon appear with what minde he did this, and God knew the goodnesse of his intent, to which he answereth, that to make an act good, not onely the intention must be good, but the thing lawfull, and that sin may be committed as well in a shorter as in a longer time, and that although it were but an officious lye, it was a sinne, which he illustrateth by the practice of some against the Priscillianists in Saint Augustines time, who were a Sect that could not be discovered, that they might be punished accordingly. For when any of them were taken and examined, they would deny all their tenets, wherefore some Christians, who stood for the truth, feigning themselves to be Priscillianists also, had in private all which they held, declared unto them, whereby they were discovered. But this fact of theirs Augustine condemneth, lib. de mendacio ad Conseruino. Neither was this of Iehu an officious lye, that is, tending to good to some, and to no hurt to any, because, as hath bene already shewed, this tended to evil to divers. Lyra also saith, that this lying was not commendable in Iehu, but onely his fervent zeale to destroy idolatry, and to finde out idolaters appeared, for an example to all Christian Kings. And H. Cardin. agreeth with Martyr, saying, why should we seeke to excuse him from lying, when as he sinned so fouly by Idolatry? Yet Pellican calleth it a godly deceit, wherewith it was just with God, that they should be deceived to their destruction, who had deceitfully drawne others to their damnable superstition. And Toftatus saith, that Iehu spake ironically, as Elisabab did, when he bade the Baalites to take a sacrifice to offer to Baal, and to call upon him, and when they were calling, to cry aloud, for surely he is a God. And this is not so much to be laboured about to justifie Iehu, as other godly Princes, who have by all means sought to finde out and to punish idolaters, as Constantine, the father of Constantine the Great, who being a Christian in heart, made an Edict, that all, who were Christians should lose their places, because he would not be served by any such in his warres; but when all sincere Christians had hereupon forsaken his tents, they were recalled againe, and the other put out.

It is true, to lye or to dissemble is a sinne, so likewise it is a sin to kill, but when any are by God adjudged to death, as all idolaters in Israel were, as the Magistrate may kill them, and root them out of the land, so he may use any subtle meates, to circumvent and finde them out, which to others it is unlawfull for to doe, but they must be dealt truly and plainly withall, as being fellow members, and not lyed unto. Otherwise Ieshuab to winne Ay might not have used that dissimulation to make a shew of fleeing away to draw them into the danger of an ambushment; nor the children of Israel have borrowed jewels of gold and silver of the Egyptians, making a shew hereby, as if they meant to restore them againe within a few dayes, when they never meant it. To take usury also is a sin, but of Cananites who were appointed to destruction, it might be taken, although not of their brethren.

To

T<sup>o</sup> turne to Iehu, the Lords approbation is sufficient to beare him out, as in killinge kinsmen of Abaziah, as was said before, so in this his dissimulation also. For erit, he praiseth him, and having done that, which was right in his sight, although otherwise a wicked Idolater, and promiseth him a reward therefore, v. 30. And the Lord even seemed to worke with this dissembling by insatuating the servants of Baal to beleeve that which he had said, when as they both saw Ionadab, a zealous against such as they were and their religion, with him in great familiarity, and brought, as a spectatour of his doings, and could not but heare of the daughter of Baals priests in Iezreel, and of their King Ioram, and his Mother Iezabel for her advancing of the worship of Baal, called whoredoms and witchcrafts. Contrariwise the faithfull, who had their understanding, considering these things could not, but conceive, that what he said, was in policy, to deceive the Baalites, and rejoyce thus to see him plotting their destruction instead of being offended at it.

The servants of Baal, who were now invited to the sacrifice are generally thought to be his Priests onely, because they had vestments brought out to be worn in sacrificing: For the devil is Gods ape, for so much as Gods servants, the Priests served him in peculiar garments, the devil would have his to serve him likewise. But I cannot see, how the temple of Baal, which certainly was very great in so great and populous a city, should be full from one end to the other of Priests onely, seeing it might containe, as the temple of Dagon in Sampsons time, not hundreds, but certaine thousands. It is to be conceived then, that the vestments brought out were onely for the Priests, which assisted in sacrificing, who onely are meant by all the servants of Baal, viz. who served at his altar, but many more came in and so the house was filled. Now to bring these together into one slaughter-house, no such ready way in the world could have beene devised as this. For the servants of Baal hearing of the destruction of their great patrons could not but feare and hide themselves in divers places, so that otherwise it would have beene hard to finde them out, and would have required a long time, but by this policy they were soone brought all together to suffer death, as they were well worthy. If it shall seeme strange, that Iehu should suffer them, untill that they had finished their sacrifice: Martyr saith well, that most probably he delayed the execution till this time, because haply there came still more and more; and it may also be thought that he stayed, till the sacrifice ended, that he might take them at their coming out, and lay their punishment upon them, when they had fully acted their sinne. For his going in with Ionadab and bidding them see, that there were none of the servants of the Lord amongst them, but the servants of Baal onely, herein he would seeme to them, as if he had a care, that their sacrifice might not be defiled by the presence of any, that were enemies to Baal and derided his worship, for even the heathen used to cry out, when they went to their sacrificing, Procul, procul este prophani: but secretly he meant, to provide, that whilst the Baalites were destroyed, none of the servants of the Lord should perish together with them; for which cause some thinke, that all the Baalites had vestments put upon them, whereby they might be knowne. The servants of Baal being all slaine, their dead corpses were not buried but cast out to lye rotting as dung upon the earth for their greater, debasement, seeing to be buried was alwayes counted an honour.

Then they went to the city of the house of Baal, and brought out the images and burnt them, and they brake downe his image and house and made it a jakes to this day.] Which was all done to shew the greatest detestation of idolatry, that might be; and to purge the land so of Baalsme, that it might never be set up againe in Israel. For when Constantine the Great put downe idolatry in his Empire, he onely shut up idols temples, but for so much as they stood still, Julian easily opened them and set up idolatry againe. Wherefore Theodosius to prevent this for time to come, demolished them. And it may be noted, that the idolatry of Baal was never practised in Israel more: Iehu and his successors indeed even to the Babylonian captivity, chap. 17. idolized with the golden calves after the manner of Ieroboam, but from this of Baal they were free alwaies after this execution.

P. Martyr.

V. 25.

V. 26.

V. 27.

Note.

Where-

Wherefore to purge this land from Popish idolatry it had beene neede, at the first, although not to demolish temples to this wickednesse abused, because they were not at the first built, but purely to serve God in, yet to bring forth and burne the images, crosses and vestments, to breake downe the altars, and burne the masse bookes, &c. abused to superstition, a new table and liturgy being printed instead thereof. For because it was not thus done, this idolatry continueth this day, and of late there was great danger of its overspreading this whole Non againe, but that it hath pleased God out of his infinite goodnesse beyond our expectation to turne it away. And he, who hath done this, inspire the great court of Parliament, that by doing now, what hath beene formerly neglected, they with Iehu put this Baal quite out of this our Israel never to returne for the corrupting of it any more.

P. Martyr.

J. Junius.

Vatablus.

J. Iosephus.

Touching temples built for idolatry, Martyr maketh mention of two that were converted into churches for the use of Christians: one the temple of Pantheon at Rome, the other of Mars at Florence, adding that there were also many more used in like manner: wherefore he urgeth not to the demolishing of temples, but of images and Papists ornaments, as the safest way for those, that embrace and professe the truth. For these words, vers. 25. To the city of the house of Baal ] Iunius hath, They went into the house of Baal in every city. Respecting rather the meaning, then the words, which are so both in the Hebrew, Septuagint, and Vulgar Latine, and Vatablus, who yet expounds them, that is, into every city, where there was an house of Baal. Some by this city understand the house of Baal it selfe, that was like a city for spaciousnesse; some a little city by Samaria, wherein was an house of Baal; but Iosephus, Samaria, called the city of the house of Baal, because it was famous or rather infamous for the magnificent house of Baal built there by Ahab and Iezabel. They that stand for other cities in Israel meant by this city ground partly upon the words here following, Thus Iehu destroyed Baal out of Israel, and not out of Samaria onely, and partly upon a conjecture, that Iezabel being so earnest in promoting the worship of Baal would not content her selfe to have one temple onely for his service in Samaria, but also in all the chiefe cities of the Kingdome. But for as much as the Text speaketh but of one house, and there is nothing here said, whereby we can gather, that they did these things in any other city besides Samaria, to which Iehu and his men were come, I take it to be plaine, that Samaria is meant by the city, out of the gates whereof they having gone to cast out the dead bodies of Baals servitours, they now entered againe and fetched out the Images and burnt them, and finally destroyed the house it selfe. And if Baal had but one house in Israel and that stood in Samaria, as we read, 1 King. 16. 32. it might well be said when that was destroyed, and Baal was there rooted out, that he was destroyed out of Israel. And that being but a conjecture, whereby it is conceived, that many more houses were built in other places to the honour of Baal doth thus easily fall to the ground. But I will not here passe over the note of Martyr, that aptly Baals house was turned into lakes: for both בְּאֵימָר by which name idols are called, signifieth dung, and from hence, as from a great lakes came a stinke infecting the whole city, viz. the stinke of idolatry and superstition.

P. Martyr.
Note.

V. 29.
V. 30.

But Iehu departed not from the sinnes of Ieroboam, &c. ] Therefore the Lord said to Iehu, because thou hast done that which was right in mine eyes, &c. ] The first words here are inserted by a prolepsis, and not to shew, that God made Iehu a promise that his children should reign unto the fourth generation, when he sinned like Ieroboam. For it is most probable, that at this time Iehu sinned not so, but after that he was settled in his kingdome, onely the sacred historian having spoken so much hitherto of his well doing, could not longer forbear to shew, what a wicked heart and ungratefull to God, that had thus advanced him, he had all this while within him. The words of v. 30. then have reference to those going before the 29. God made him this promise for the zeal which he had shewed in thoroughly executing his will against Ahab and Baalisme, brought in by Ahab to the offending him in so high a degree. For God respecteth the good done by any, although his heart be not right, as he did before Ahabs repentance in sack-cloth and ashes, so now Iehu his doing doing of these executions, as he willed, because he would have, even the wicked and reprobate, have all encouragements to do well, and to see, that it is not a fruitlesse labour to execute his will, that thus comfort and relaxation might be to his servants, and they not being moved by this his goodnesse to set their hearts upon the right, might at the last day of reckoning be without excuse, and likewise all others of the same stampe by their example. Tostatus holdeth, that God said thus to Iehu, when he was a worshipper of the calves, not by way of encouragement but of cheeking, meaning that they should have reigned ever, but now onely the fourth generation: but this is a presumption without ground which the words cannot bear: for it is not said, because he had done ill, but all which was in the Lords heart, &c. so that it was plainly a reward promised for this, not a cutting of any short threatened for his sinne.

But it is to be noted, that whereas David, whose heart was upright was promised the throne to him and his for ever: Iehu whose heart was not so, had a promise onely to the fourth generation, a temporary reward for a temporary doing of good. But it may be demanded, how Iehu his doing good could please God, if it came from an evill heart, seeing that without faith it is impossible to please him. yea whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. I will not here answer with some, that the thing, which he did being good pleased him, but not as it came from him that had this evil and unbelieving heart; for if it had not pleased coming from him, he should never have beene so approved by God and rewarded: but without faith a man cannot so please God as to be saved or to enjoy his favour to the advancing of him to his everlasting kingdome, as those faithfull persons there spoken of, although he may please him so farre, as to be graced with temporary honour and blessing, that God may not seeme to be endebted to any man and not come out of it. If it be said, then God is in some sort pleased with sinne; I answer, It is called sin, which is not of faith, not because it is every way sinfull, for it may be morally good, and then the act is in it selfe not evil or sinfull but good; onely it is styled sinne because for want of faith and sincerity in the doer corruption is contracted, which shall be punished eternally, although God liketh so well, that the thing is done that he rewardeth it temporally. The Prophet, by whom the Lord spake this to Iehu, is thought by Rab. Solomon to be Ionah, who had anointed him: but by Tostatus Elishabab. And Lyra noteth a proportion betwene Amri and Iehu in their reigning untill the fourth generation. For so likewise his sonnes, Ahab, Athazias, and Joash reigned after him: but the proportion holdeth not, because Iehu had foure that reigned after him, Amri but three onely, neither continued the kingdome in his race so long for any good act done, as by Iehu, or upon any promise made therefore. To let this observation go then as frivolous, we may rather note what a great grace Iehu had herein done unto him, seeing no race, since the division of the kingdome reigned so long as his, untill the end of it at the Babylonian captivity. And here it may seeme strange, that Iehu should be so addicted unto the golden calves, as to be a worshipper of them, when he had put downe Baal: for what was there more in one idol to draw him to it then in another? Answe. He had beene bred and brought up in this idolatry, as being the Religion of Israel ever since it began to be a kingdome in Ieroboams time, and therefore although he observed the Lord to execute his will in that, for which he was made King, and haply to worship him also, as the words, vers. 31. doe intimate, He regarded not to walke in the wayes of the Lord with all his heart. He could not give over the worshipping of these calves also, for that he was bred up in this superstition appeareth in that it is said, He turned not from the sinne of Ieroboam as if it had beene said, Notwithstanding the great favour by the Lord done for him and promised to him and his as he had beene before, he continued a worshipper of Ieroboams calves still. To note which probably the same thing is said both before the approbation given him by the Lord and after, although it be first spoken by a prolepsis, as hath beene said, Iehu not doing so then. For although he had formerly sinned so, as he was blindly led, yet it is likely at the time, when he was executing the will of God, and making the kingdome sure, he for a time restrained himselfe, but it being still in his heart he left it not altogether to his

Note.

Heb. 11. 6.

R. Solomon,
Tostatus.
Lyra.

V. 31.

his dying day. And it is not to be doubted, but that he was much moved by the consideration of his kingdome being generally for this Religion, so that if he should quite forsake it, he feared, that the people would be stirred up against him, and some going to Ierusalem to worship, would draw others to the endangering of all Israel to returne to the obedience of all the house of David againe, which of old was Ieroboams feare, when he first set up these gods. And it could not but increase his feare, because he had slaine the King of Iudah; and therefore if his power had beene so increased, that succeeded him, he should have beene sure to have beene cruelly destroyed. But what needed he to have feared, when he had Gods promise? certainly he needed not, neither would he, if he had had a true faith, but for want of faith both he and some other Kings better then he have done like unbelievers, for which they have beene reprov'd and punished. So that we had need to get a firme faith to have power to forgoe our evil customes, and to goe against the stream of the multitude, and to be safe from being moved by carnall policies against that which piety and conscience require.

Note.

V. 32.

2 King. 8. 13.

V. 33.

From that time God began to cut off from Israel, and Hazael smote them in every coast of Israel. After Iehu his sinne, here followeth his punishment in his people by Hazael King of Syria, whom God appointed to be King by the ministry of Elisbah; and now is fulfilled what was then prophesied, although his cruelty towards the Israelites be not here particularly expressed, but thence to be learned, nothing being here said, but that he smote them, there that he should overthrow their strong holds, slay their young men, kill their children, and rip up their women with childe. And this was done in all the most fruitfull parts of the land, where the Reubenites, Gadites, and halfe tribe of Manasse dwelt. It was indeed a punishment threatened for Baalisme and putting downe the worship of the true God of which Elijah complained, whereupon he was bidden to anoint Iehu King of Israel, Hazael of Syria, and Elisbah Prophet in his stead, threatening to destroy by the sword of one, what was not by the sword of the other destroyed. But the worshipping of the calves being idolatry as well as it, and growing now to be an inveterate evil, both it and Baalisme, of which they never repented, (for no sinne is thoroughly repented, when the like abomination is still lived in) were punished together, and great was the misery of this kingdome.

V. 34, 35.

And this is all which in the sacred history is recorded touching Iehu, who reigned 28. years, and then he dying, Iehohabaz his sonne reigned in his stead. He did nothing of worth, after that he fell to the worshipping of the golden calves, his valour said to be written of in the book of the Kings of Israel was before, not after, for then he had no courage to defend his coasts from the Syrians, but lost both Ramoth Gilead lately recovered, and all the rich countrey beyond Iordan, where the Reubenites, Gadites, and half tribe of Manasse dwelt. For that not onely the people in those parts were now smitten, but that Israel was truncated, part of the kingdome being taken away and brought under the Syrian, appeareth, because Ieroboam is said about 60. years after, to have recovered the border of Israel from the entring in of Hamath, 2 King. 14. 25. so that it seemeth all this while to have been held by them. Wherefore let Kings keep all idolatry out of their kingdomes as bringing ruine thereunto, and not some onely, as Iehu did, having thus also the spirit of courage turned into pusillanimity, and his glory into shame.

Note.

CHAP. XI.

V. 1.

Vhen Athaliah (the mother of Ahaziah King of Iudah) saw that her sonne was dead (as being slain by Iehu in Israel) she (to shew of what kinde she came, for she was Iezabels daughter, who was both most earnest in promoting Baalisme, and of a domineering spirit) rose up and slew all the Kings seed, her own grandchildren, thus through an ambitious desire of reigning extinguishing in her self all sparks of naturall affection. And she was carried on to this tragick fact, as

Martyr

Martyr noteth, that by her authority Baal and his worship might be upheld in Iudah, although exterminated out of her father Ahabs kingdome of Israel by Iehu. For such is the fury of idolaters, that they passe not for embruing their hands in the blood of any for the promoting of their idolatry, and therefore she fearing, that the people would take one of the royall seed and make him King, which might be prejudiciall to her superstition, she hasteneth and cutteth them all off that she could come by. And it is not to be doubted, but that she made this destruction of the blood royall, as well out a desire of revenge upon that seed, which she thought should be favoured as coming of David and Iehoshaphat, of whom she would not leave one alive, as Iehu had got of her fathers house, as out of an ambitious desire of reigning. But what had she to do to reign, although all had been dead, she was an alienigena, descended from the daughter of the Sidonian King, and not wholly Israelitish, and a woman, and so incapable of the kingdome, seeing by his law God provided, that no stranger, but one of their brethren should reign over his people? But she most probably having the administration of her sonnes kingdome in his absence, had now power in her hands to set up her self, the just judgement of God working with her designs for the punishment of Iudah for their idolatry, to which they were drawn by her means. Yet whilest she tyrannized thus, behold the providence of God, according to his word unto David, preserved a light of his seed, one sucking childe called Ioas.

Iosabeah sister to Ahaziah, wife to Iehoiadah the high Priest, stole him away from the midst of the slain, &c.] And so this royall stock, now greatly in danger of being quite cut off, continued even untill the coming of Christ, who is King and reigneth for ever. This Iosabeah is called Iosabab, 2 Chron. 22. 11. and whereas here she is said to have taken him away and his nurse in the bed-chamber, there, she hid him and his nurse in the bed chamber, when the rest were slain. His nurse then, it seemeth kept him out of the sight of the executioners, till this was done, and so she was taken away with him to nurse, and to bring him up in secret, none knowing of it, as Iosephus saith, but she and Iehoiadah, who is said to be her husband. About the place where they were kept, all are not of an opinion, for some think, that it was one of the lodging-chambers one some side of the temple, for there were many, and R. Solomon that it was a room above the most holy place, wherein the sacred vestments and vessels, and treasure were kept. P. Martyr, that he was caried first into the one, and then for more safety to the other, to which I cannot subscribe, because one place onely, where he remained hidden six years, is spoken of, and R. Solomon is confuted by the text, wherein it is said to be a bed-chamber, and not a treasury. It was then a room amongst those, which the high-priest had peculiarly to himself on one side of the temple, which was very secret, and so fit for this purpose, and Ioas being here by the care of his Aunt preserved sixe years, whilest Athaliah reigned, in the seventh was brought forth and shewed to certain with whom Iehoiadah made a covenant, that they should joyn together to set up him for King, viz. to centurions, captains, and other officers, whom he sent for to this end to come to him to the house of the Lord.

In the Chronicles centurions onely are mentioned, who are also named, and they are said to have gathered together the Levites all over Iudah, and all the chief of their fathers houses. These centurions Martyr thinketh to have been a kin to the Levites, and such as were well known to Iehoiada to be faithfull, to whom therefore he might safely communicate this matter. But I cannot think with him, that he had at the first made some Levites acquainted with this matter, that in time to come they might testifie, that this was the kings son, and not supposititious; for his testimony being of that high place and credit, was sufficient for this amongst all the faithfull, especially his wife and the nurse who was known at the Court, being agents herein also, neither indeed was it safe, till this time to discover it to any.

But why was he now brought forth, not sooner nor later? He answereth, for two causes. First, least Athaliah continuing longer, should be more confirmed in the kingdome, and prevaile to appoint a successeur and doe more hurt in setting up and spreading Baalistime into more places. Secondly, because Ioas now growing past

P. Martyr.

Note.

Deut. 17.

V. 2.

2 Chron. 22. 11.

Iosephus.

R. Solomon.
P. Martyr.V. 3.
V. 4.

2 Chron. 23. 1, 2.

P. Martyr.

past a child ought in reason not to be kept as a child still in obscurity, but be made known, that henceforth he might live like one of royal dignity. I think that he stayed till this time and no longer, because he doubted whether the people would be so inclinable to accept of him for their king being an infant, but so soon as he thought him fit to be shewed unto them, he brought him forth, and happily he delayed it, till now that the people being weary of her tyrannicall government, might be the more ready to receive him.

Moreover touching this Ioas, there are faith Martyr, who think him to be of the posterity of Nathan another of Dauids sonnes, and not the sonne of Abaziah, although called so, because he succeeded him in the kingdome, who strengthen this their opinion from hence, that Athaliah would never have been so unnaturall, as to seek to slay the child of her own sonne, who living and reigning, she might have exercised the power of a regent at her pleasure, but for so much as Abaziah her sonne and late king had no naturall sonne, and by this means the kingdome was in danger to be translated to another stock, she thought it necessary to provide for the safety of her selfe, and favourites of her religion, by rooting all others out, that might bee brought in to reigne, and so to put her down, and her great God Baal withall. And to this he confesseth, that he most enclineth, but I must needs confesse that I see no such force in this reason to move me so to do. For she was of an haughty and ambitious spirit, & therefore would not be satisfied now with a ruling power under another, though never so near unto her; but would rule as Queen her selfe alone, like unto Semiramis the mother of Ninus, who put her sonne into a womans habit, that she might reign, and Irene the mother of Constantinus Copron: who put out her own sonnes eyes to make him incapable of the Empire, that she might enjoy it. And he is so plainly said to be the sonne of Abaziah, v. 2. and when he was shewed, it is said, he shewed them not the kings kinsman, but the kings sonne, that he cannot possibly be any other, besides the consideration of her, by whose care he was saved giveth no litle light into this matter, shee was sister to Abaziah, in whom naturall affection wrought to preserve her brothers sonne, and being of the same family, she might well have opportunity so to doe, but not a little one of another family.

By their gathering together of the Levites, it seemeth that they were in these corrupt times most observant of the ordinances of God above others, but because the chiefe strength of the kingdome lay in the heads of the families, they were called together also to goe about this great work to set up a new king, who had right, and to put down a bloody Queen which had none.

V. 5.

And he said unto them, the third part of you shall be of them that enter upon the Sabbath, and shall ward the kings house, &c.] That this is to be understood of the Levites appeareth, because they are spoken of that enter in upon the Sabbath, and v. 8, they which goe out upon the Sabbath. For they were by David numbered and distributed into 24 courses, of which each course served about the temple a week, and then the Priest of that course with his troop of Levites going out, he of the next course with his troop came in. Now there were of the Levites, 38000. whereof 24000. served at their times in the house of the Lord, besides 4000 door-keepers, and 4000 singers, who attended there by turnes, also, only 6000 were dispersed over the land for judges. They that came in then were the course coming to serve at the temple, and they that went out the course, which had served the week before, and each of these, if they held, as in Dauids time, were 1500 and upward. By this then we are to understand, that Iehoiadab stayed that course of Priests and Levites, which had served the week before, and now went out to help to defend the king, and as he used them that came in in three companies, one to ward about the kings house to withstand any that should be sent out by Athaliah, against the king, one to keep the gate Sur. 2 Chron. 23. 5. The chiefe gate, which was the largest faith Iunius, and stood Eastward, and it was called Sur, faith Martyr, from declining, as the word signifieth, because the door-keepers standing before it made the unclean to decline from coming in that way, as the most common, and one the gate behind the guard, which carried shields, 2 Chron. 23. 4. Ianitores luminum, according

1 Chron. 24.
1 Chron. 23. 2.

Iunius.
P. Martyr.

ding to the Vulgar lat. in the gates; but another gate in particular, saith Innius, is hereby meant, which stood South. As he distributed this course of the commers in, I say, into three companies and placed them thus, five hundred in a company, so he divided the goers out into two, whom he set to guard about the King on both sides, for which Innius calleth them Laterales custodiae. The Chronicles make it more plaine, that these were Priests and Levites, and whereas nothing is here said of the rest of the men, that were present, there they are appointed to be in the courts of the Lords house, and the Priests onely and Levites, who were holy might enter in and be about the King, that is, those Priests and Levites, who were last distributed into two companies, and if any others entered, they must be slaine, as not coming in the way of good will, but to seek the young Kings destruction. Moreover Iehoiadah put weapons in the hands of the Centurions, speares and shields, which were in the house of the Lord, and bade the Levites hold weapons in their hands also; and when he had made the guard strong in all places about, he brought forth the King and crowned and anointed him, 2 King. 11. 12. 2 Chron. 23. 11. Iehoiadah and his sonnes anointed him and cryed out, God save the King.

2 Chron. 23. 4, 5

V. 6.

V. 9.

V. 7.

1.

Here many doubts occurre, as first, whether Iehoiadah being a subject did rightly to conspire against the Queen, who then reigned? although he might have withstood her taking the government upon her at the first, yet it seemeth, that being in the throne it was not lawfull for any subject to pluck her out, because all must be subject to the higher powers?

Ans. She was an usurper and the true King abode in his custody, & therefore how long soever she reigned, that obliged not the subjects of that kingdome any more unto her, but they might without all scruple proceed against her, as an enemy to the true King and State, especially he that was by his place the second man in the kingdome, and to see the doing of right to the King, who suffered wrong all this time. They that live under a King, who hath unlawfully attained to the Crowne, and possesseth it are not by this example justified, that conspire against him being private persons, and not having right unto it, or lead by these, that have, or by such Peeres of the kingdome as stand for the right of another unable to helpe himselfe. For to such it may be said, He that smiteth with the sword shall perish by the sword, because he doth this, when it is not committed unto him.

Secondly, whether Priests and Levites might beare armes, as he appointed these to doe, sith the word is the sword of the Clergy, and Prophets pull downe, root up, and plant not by the materiall sword, but the spirituall, viz. prophesying?

Ans. It was no new thing for men of this tribe to take arms no more then of any other, for both Moses commanded them to goe every one with his sword in his hand, and to slay such, as committed idolatry with the golden calves, and when an army was sent against the Midianites Phinees the Priest went as capitaine over it, and this tribe made an army, when they marched in the wilderness, as well as any other. And well they might, because, as hath beene already shewed, many of them were set over civill affaires, and their service being so seldome required about the temple, viz. not above twice in a yeare, they might easily be spared, at sometimes to doe this service to the common wealth, namely, when great necessity required it. But other wise I doe not thinke, that they were employed as souldiers, because they did also read and instruct the people in the Synagogues in all parts every Sabbath day.

Exod. 32.

If the question be of Ministers under the New Testament: whether they may be required to doe likewise? I answer, that our Lord seemeth to take all armes from us, when he forbiddeth his Disciples to take a staffe with them; and our ministry is a kinde of warfare for God, whose souldier Timothy is called, which must not be entangled with secular affaires, yea, a Bishop must be no striker, but must give himselfe wholly to meditation, reading, and preaching, except extraordinary necessity requireth the drawing of his sword; as to resist cheeves and robbers, or enemies setting upon him, or the place, where he liveth; in which case it is no good citizens part to sit still, but to resist to the uttermost of his power.

1 Tim. 3.

Thirdly, Whether the temple were not polluted by giving order to have bloud

T t shed

shed there? Ans. It is requisite, that the place dedicated to the worship of God should as much as may bee be spared from shedding blood therein; but the Lord himselfe biddeth to pluck wilfull murderers from his Altar and to slay them, and inspired Solomon, who caused Iozab to be slain there, did by his fact sufficiently justifie this of Iehoiadab, but of this enough hath been said before upon that touching Iozab; and yet indeed by his military preparation there was no blood finally shed there, for Athaliah was carried forth and slain.

V. 12.

P. Martyr.

To returne therefore to the Kings coronation, here are three things said to have been done unto him about his inauguration. First, a diadem or crown was set upon his head. Secondly, the testament was put into his hands. Thirdly, he was anointed, although some for (the testament have) the ornaments, as Martyr saith, and rendereth it, howsoever in commenting upon it he preferreth, this reading, the testament: and indeed, it is to be preferred, although the word may also signifie an ornament, and both Pagninus and Vatablus take it so. For Deut. 17: 19. it is commanded, that the King should have the book of the testimony by him, and read therein all the dayes of his life; neither do we read in any place of other royall ornaments besides the crowne, and of putting this book into his hands, according to the Vulgar lat. there was now good reason, because it had been in the dayes of his grandmother, father, and grandfather so much neglected. The crowne set upon his head glittering with gold and precious stones served to shew his kingly dignity, that he might be honoured the more: the book of the testimony, the care, that he should have to maintaine the worship of God, and to beat down idolatry so much condemned in this book; and the anointing, other kingly endowments of wisdom, fortitude, and justice.

V. 14.
Vulg. lat. standing upon his tribunall.
Iosephus.

V. 15.

V. 16.

Note.

These things being done, acclamations were made, [God save the king] and trumpets sounded, and there was clapping of hands for joy. Whereupon Athaliah hearing the noise came forth, into the temple, and seeing what was done, and the King standing by his pillar, rent her clothes and cried Treason, Treason; and if Iosephus may be credited, bade them take the new King and slay him, and the people contrariwise cryed out, God save King Iozab, and let Athaliah dye. But Iehoiadab bade the have her forth out of the house of the Lord, that she might be slain, which was immediatly done, & in the way of the horses entrance into the King house she was slain, no man, that we read of, seeking to rescue her, whereby we see the miserable condition of tyrants, they may have mens bodies and lives subject unto them, but their hearts they can never have, that they who are in Regall dignity may feare to tyrannize or unjustly to usurpe. As the mother Iezabel came to a base end for her tyranny before being trodden under the horses feet; so most probably did her daughter for the like cause, because it was in the way of the horses, that she fell. Which was so called, saith Lyra, because the Nobles about the Court might come riding thus farre, but then alighting they went on foot to the temple. Wherefore Iosephus is not to be heard, when he saith, that she was carried downe to the brook Cidron, and slain there.

Lyra.

Toucheing her rending of her clothes, she did that in detestation of the fact, and out of extreame sorrow, it being a ceremony in use not only amongst the Israelites, but the heathen also, as Martyr noteth out of Suetonius, who saith, that Iulius Caesar made an oration unto the people with his clothes rent when civill wars were began, the tribunes of the people being violated, & compelled to depart out of the city.

P. Martyr.

V. 17.

Then Iehoiada made a Covenant between the Lord and the King, and the people: &c. and between the King and the people. Things being so much out of order, the wise Priest thought it necessary now that he had made Iozab king, to direct him and the people to make a Covenant with the Lord to root idolatry out of the land, and to restore and maintain the worship of God pure according to his word, and to joyne the people and king again together as one in doing this to direct him to make a covenant with them to rule them in justice and equity, and them to make a Covenant with him, to obey and serve him as their King and Lord. Neither was this done without effect, for immediately they went about that, which their Covenant tyed them to, viz. to destroy the temple of Baal and the idols therein, and slew

V. 17.

Matthan

Matthan the Priest before his altars. And thus doing, they had godly Aſa going before them, who coming after idolatrous Abijam, and Rehoboam together with the people, made a covenant with the Lord, and did mightily beat down idolatry. Oh that as the house of Commons hath entred into ſuch a Covenant, ſo the King and Lords would bee pleaſed to doe likewiſe, that all the people and not ſome only might follow them, and ſo together joyn their forces to root out popiſh ſuperſtition, which of late hath been ſo much magnified amongſt us. And the Priest ſet governours over the houſe of the Lord. 2 Chron. 23. 18. And Iehoiadah ſet preſtewreſhips in the houſe of the Lord, which were committed to the Priests, the Levites, whom David had diſtributed, &c. It may ſeem by this in the kings, that ſome Captains with their bands were ſet to ward about the temple, that the Priests might ſecurely in thoſe tumultuos times doe their office therein, as ſome underſtand it, but the Chronicles maketh it plain, that nothing elſe is meant hereby, but that he appointed the 24 courſes of Priests firſt inſtituted by David to ſerve in the Temple, as formerly they had done, and verſ. 19. the porters to keep out the uncleane.

After this the Centurions and the guard, and all the people conducted the King to his palace, and ſet him upon the throne. But all that went before touching the deſtruction of Baals houſe, and the ſetting again of the Priests in their courſes could not be ſuddenly done, but required ſome dayes for the doing thereof, wherefore it muſt be conceived either that the king was conducted to his houſe before all this was done; yea they being but begun only, as ſome hold, or that he remained certain dayes after his coronation ſtill in the temple, happily where he had been kept before till they were done, and then this company repairing to him again, conducted him to his houſe with great joy, which is the more probable, both becauſe according to this order, his carrying to his houſe is ſet forth, and becauſe it is ſaid, Iehoiadah took the Centurions, Captains, &c. as implying his calling them thither again, after the buſineſſes before ſpoken of ended. And now the city had quiet, they had an unquiet life before under a tyrannicall Queen, who together with her husband, as Iosephus ſaith, built a Temple unto Baal and ſet up his worſhip, which doubtleſſ: was the occaſion of many quarrels betwixt the Baalites and the ſervants of the Lord, but now there was an end put unto them all, neither did any riſe up to revenge the death of Athaliah, and ſo they enjoyed great quietneſſe and peace.

Rabanus upon Athaliah maketh this Allegory; ſhee ſeeking to deſtroy all the ſeed of David, ſetteth forth the ſynagogue of the Jewes ſeeking to deſtroy Chriſt and Chriſtianity, for as Athaliah, ſo ſhe reigned, whiſt the Temple and ceremonies of the law ſtood. But Iehoſhabeb ſetting forth the Church, kept Ioas cloſe and ſo preſerved him in an inward place of the Temple, in like manner the Church preſerved the faith and love of Chriſt in the hearts of the elect by preaching him, untill that the ſynagogue Athaliah being deſtroyed in the time of Titus and Veſpaſian the city of God had quiet and no trouble from thenceforth any more by it.

2 Chron. 15. 12.

Lxx.

V. 19.

V. 20.

The Allegory.
Rabanus.

CHAP. XII.

I Oas was ſeven yeares old when he began to reign. In the ſeventh year of Iehn he was made King and reigned 40. yeares, &c.] The kingdome of Iudah being much diſordered by Athaliah, cometh now by the divine providence to be under a child; from whom in humane reaſon, what could be expected for the amending of their condition. But it pleaſeth God, by weak means oftentimes to do wonderfully for the magnifying of his own power and mercy, and ſo he did at this time, Ioas by the good inſtructions of Iehoiadah the high-prieſt, did well, and was accordingly rewarded with a long reign, whereas his father and grandfather that were wicked, reigned but a ſhort time. His mothers name alſo was Sebia of Beerſhebah, which was one border of the kingdome of Iudah, that we might know, that ſhe was not alienigena, but rightly bred as his fathers mother was not, which turned to his ruine.

T t 2

But

V. 1, 2.

V. 3.

But this good high-priest lived not alwayes with him, as is after wards shewed, and then he did evill.

V. 4.

But the people still sacrificed in the high-places. ] That is, as hath been before shewed, upon such mountains, as whereupon their holy fore-fathers had anciently sacrificed, but it was unto the true God and not unto idols, and therefore yet tolerated, as it had formerly been by godly Asa, the great grandfather of this King, of which see more there.

1 King. 15. 14.

V. 5.

Lyra.
Exod. 30. 12.

Wolfius supplens Martyris comment.

And Iom said unto the Priests, all the money of the Saints, the money of him that passeth, the money of souls, and the money of him that willingly offereth, the Priests shall take to themselves, and repair the ruines, &c. ] The vulgar Latin, to make it more plain, The money of the saints, which is brought into the house of the Lord by those that passe, which is offered for a price of the soul, &c. Here Lyra reckoneth but two sorts of money; first, that of the half shekles, which all were appointed to pay when they were numbred by the poll from 20. years old and upward. Secondly, voluntarily given by such as were more wealthy. Wolfius besides these two, nameth a third, viz. the money vowed by any for the preservation of their lives in danger. But forso much as the same is said to be paid for the life or soul, which is paid by those that passe under this reckoning, for it is said, he shall give for the redemption of his life, that there be no plague amongst you, and this shall be given by every one that passeth to the numbred; it is plain, that the money of every ones life, and the money of him that passeth, is all one, and if we make a third sort of money here appointed to be gathered, it must be founded upon these words, the money of the saints, but hereby nothing else seemeth to be understood, but the money of the holy things, as the word [sacellorum] signifieth, as well as saints, and so the first words set down only the genus, or the money in general to be taken, and the next the two sorts, redemption money being about 10. d. and money voluntarily given, as we read was afterwards done, when Christ sitting over against the treasury, rich men cast in much, and the poor widow her two mites.

2 Chron. 24. 5.

The Priests are bidden by the King to go through all the cities of Judah, to gather moneys for this end from year to year, but the meaning is, the redemption moneys, and what any would voluntarily give, as in this place. For when all from 20. years old and upward, had paid it once, others still attaining to the age of twenty, were to pay it the next year, and others the year following, &c. unlesse we shall think with Junius that the work of repairing the temple, at this time lasting more years, it was gathered of all over again from year to year, as in a case extraordinary it might sometime be done, seeing it is said unto Moses, When thou numbrest the people, &c. so that it seemeth when ever they were numbred, these moneys were to be taken, yea as I have shewed upon that place, this numbring was from year to year, for the maintenance of divers things pertaining to the service of the temple, although Junius thinketh other wise, and now most probably whilst the temple was in repairing, the service being intermitted, about which these moneys had been formerly bestowed, they were taken for the use of reparation. Whereas 2 King. 12. 6. it is said, that they should take these moneys of their acquaintance, but here that they should go out to gather money in all cities, it is most probable, that as the Priests dwelt in divers parts of the land, so they that dwelt nearest to some cities, where they were most acquainted, should go thither to gather it, and others to their neighbour cities. But it is to be noted, that before this 2 Chron. 24. 4 it is said, that Jeboiadab took him two wives, and this surely was not till he was of riper years, as may also be gathered by the age of his son Amaziah, who was 25. when he began to reign, therefore born, when he had been King fifteen, that is, anno 22. of his age, most probably then he took him not these wives till he was 20. or 21. years old, about the 14. year of his reign, and after this, he took order for repairing the house of the Lord, and yet it is said that it remained undone till Anno 23. of his reign, v. 7. If any man aske why Jeboiadab so godly a man took not order with the young king, about this so holy a work sooner? It may be conceived, that the decay was not yet grown so great, or at the least that the people not thinking it yet necessary to repaire, were unwilling to contribute unto it, or Jeboiadab being very Junius in Exod.

30. 12.

2 Chron. 24. 4.

very old, for he dyed at 130. and therefore was 90 when Ioaſh was made king, thought not upon all things that were needfull to be done, or if hee thought upon this, he feared the peoples unwillingneſſe, although it proved otherwiſe, and ſo delayed the time, at length yet as Iosephus ſaith, moving the king to provide, that this work might be done.

What this decay was is not here expreſſed, only it is called the breach of the houſe, or the place or places broken through, as the word ברק ſignifieth. But 2 Chron. 24. 7. it is ſaid, Athaliah being moſt wicked, her ſons brake into the houſe of God, and took away all the conſecrated things of the houſe of the Lord, to adorn Baal. The vulgar Latin, deſtroyed the houſe of the Lord. Whereupon Ierom according to the tradition of the Hebrewes, they deſtroyed it either by carrying out of it the ornaments, or as they ſay, becauſe when Athaliah endeavoured to bring idolatry into it, there was an earthquake renting it, and the Chald. calleth it the ſciſſure or cleft place of the houſe. This of the Hebrewes I paſſe over as an imagination of the Rabbins, becauſe it is not ſpoken of in the ſacred hiſtory. But we may well gather that ſome violence was done to the Temple in the time of ſuch impious rulers, whereby breaches were made in the walls thereof, although the deſtroying of it was not attempted, and ſuch a great rupture; and where ever elſe any decay was through antiquity for the Temple had now ſtood 155 yeares according to the Hebrews greater Chronicle, and as may eaſily be computed, or by any other means, the kings meaning was, ſhould now be made up, and if there came in mony enough, that ſuch ornaments as were taken away, ſhould be repaired again, as is partly ſhewed, that it was done v. 1. Iunius calleth the breach of the houſe, Labes domus. The Priests having the care of this reparation committed to them, were negligent in gathering the money, becauſe no benefit ſhould thereby redound unto them, or the people delayed to pay it, as not being willing to commit it to their truſt, or having gathered it in part as it ſeemeth, v. 7. where they are bidden to reſtore it, they neglected to ſet upon the work: wherefore the king calleth for Iehoiadab, anno 23. of his reign, challenging him for this neglect, and forbidding the prieſts thenceforth to gather any more money. For he had commanded, that this work ſhould be done with ſpeed, 2 Chron. 24. 4. and v. 5. in challenging them for that they made no more haſte, he ſaith, that they might bring from Iudah and Ieruſalem the gathering of Moſes the ſervant of the Lord, and of the congregation of Iſrael to the tabernacle, &c. pointing at the firſt ordaining of this numbring money, of which it hath been already ſpoken, and hereby it is implied, that it was an annuall revenue of the tabernacle. To return to their neglect, the king for this would have them to meddle no further in this matter, and chid with Iehoiadab about it. Whereby becauſe it appeareth, that the king had power over the high-prieſt (which the Pope can by no means endure now) Toſtatus ſaith, that then the prieſts and laity were all alike ſubject to the king, but under the new Teſtament, the prieſts dignity received infinite encrease, ſo that he can both remit finnes, and make the holy body of Chriſt. But this is a meer deluſion, witneſſe St. Paul, who chargeth every ſoul to be ſubject to the higher powers, even under the new Teſtament, Rom. 13. 1.

Then Iehoiadab the Prieſt took a cheſt, and having bored an hole therein, ſet it on the right ſide of the altar, where men entred into the houſe of the Lord, &c.] 2 Chron. 24. 8. Therefore the King commanding, they made a cheſt ſix, and ſet it in the gate of the Lords houſe without. Whereas Iehoiadab is ſaid to have prepared and ſet this cheſt, 2 King. 12. 9. it is to be underſtood by the kings appointment, then proclamation was made that they ſhould bring the gathering of Moſes appointed in the deſerts. Then all the Princes and people brought and caſt in rejoycing, untill they had finiſhed. That is, they who were employed about this, repair the whole work belonging to it. For the placing of the cheſt, it was ſet in a place, to come into which a man muſt go through the prieſts court, whereinto it was not lawfull for the people to enter, for it ſtood by the door of the houſe, therefore the offerers did not put in the money with their own hands, but giving it to the prieſts and levites to put it in, to ſhew which, it is ſaid 2 King. 12. 9. that the prieſts who kept the door, put all the money that was brought to the houſe of the Lord there. And this was a means wiſely

Iosephus.

2 Chron. 24. 7.

Hieron. tradit.
Hebr.

Iunius.

V. 7.

V. 9.

Wolphius.

V. 10.

V. 11, 12.

2 Chron. 24. 11.

V. 16.

V. 13, 14.

Wolphius.
Rabanus.

V. 16.

Sallianus.

Pellican.
An Allegory.2 Chron. 24. 14.
15, 16.

devised to draw the people to a willing offering, when they were thus assured that their moneys should certainly be employed, as was intended, as also the setting of keepers, and placing of the chest near the altar, that men might be encouraged to it, as to an offering made unto God, as Wolphius noteth.

And when they saw, that there was much money, the Kings and high Priests scribes came up, &c. ] After that money in abundance was brought in, now they fall to the disposing of it, giving it into the hands of such as were appointed to oversee the work, and they herewith hired carpenters and masons, &c. 2 Chron. 24. 11. this is more fully set forth thus, they emptied the chest and set it again in his place, and so they did from day to day, till they had gathered money in abundance. That is, from time to time, so oft as they perceived that any good summe was put in. And v. 12. this the King and Iehoiadab gave into the hands of the overseers of the worke, who hired therewith carpenters, &c. and thus the work went on, till it was all finished, v. 13. somewhat being added, 2 King. 12. 16. in way of commending the fidelity of those that were chosen to take care of this work, they called them not to account, for they were faithfull ] v. 134. before this we are given to understand, that neither basons, psalteries, trumpets, or other vessels of gold or silver, were made of this money, but that it was given wholly to reparaire the house withall, v. 14. But 2 Chron. 24. 14. it is said, that of the money which remained when the reparations were finished, Instruments both of gold and silver were made, for ministration in the house of the Lord. To reconcile which it is to be held, that the meaning of the Kings is nothing else, but that these monies were not given to the overseers of the work in part to make any such vessels or instruments, but onely to reparaire the house, yet there being much money remaining still, faith that of Chron. the fidelity of the overseers was such, that they brought it to the king and the high Priest, who caused these instruments to be made therewith. So then by the care of the overseers appointed no such vessels were made according to Kings, but by the care of the King and Priest, they were of the superabounding money brought back unto them, according to Chron. so also Wolphius rejecteth that of Rabanus, who faith that the money whereof these instruments were made, was the money voluntarily given, and not the redemption money, which went wholly for reparations.

Finally because other monies by the law of God were also to be paid for attonement, and consequently the safety of the offerers soule, viz. for trespasses and sinnes, which went to the Priests maintenance, it is shewed, that such equity was now used, that this belonging to the Priests of right went to them, neither was any part thereof taken for the foresaid uses. What money this was, see Levis. 5. 15, 16. even the price of any mans fraud in keeping back part of the holy things, and a fift part more added hereunto. Sallianus addeth, that in case that he who was to offer was asare off, he sent money to the Priests to buy all things for the sacrifice, and what was spared out of this, when all things were brought, went to the Priests, which is not improbable; for difference between trespasses and sinnes, Testatus faith those were omissions, these commissions, see before upon Levis. 5.

Pellican maketh the negligence used about repairing the Temple, a figure of the neglect to reform abuses in the spirituall Temple, that is, the Church; for as breaches made the Temple ruinous, so corruptions put the Church of God in great danger of ruine, and yet in seeking to purge these out, great negligence is commonly used. And he noteth, that Iehoiadab was the onely priest, that ever took care about repairing the Temple, but he should have said, till the time of Indas Macchabens.

All things being prepared about the Temple, as was aforesaid, sacrifices were there constantly offered unto God all the dayes of Iehoiadab, 2 Chron. 24. 14, 15, 16. but then he being very aged, viz. 130 yeares dyed, and was honourably buried for his good deserts in the sepulchers of the kings of Iudah. And the princes of Iudah after this comming flatteringly to Ioash with most lowly reverence so wrought upon him, who had alwayes hitherto shewed himselfe a most godly king, that they drew him to idolatry, to wor ship idols in groves, leaving the house of the Lord, to the provoking of his fierce wrath against Iudah and Ierusalem, v. 17, 18.

The

v. 17, 18. The good demerits of Iehoiadab are thus expressed in the text. For the good, which he did in Israel towards God, and towards his house. That is, in Iudah, and not in the kingdome of the ten tribes, with which he had nothing to do [towards God] faith Ierom in beating down idolatry, and (to his house) in repairing it. For this also God blessed him with long life beyond any, that went before him since Iacobs time, who was of the same age, when he went down into Egypt. And his so honourable a buriall, is to be ascribed to the piety of Ioas, to whom he was as a father, as long as he lived, and therefore was by him accordingly honoured both in life and death.

Hieronym.

After the death of Iehoiadab the court-sycophants, whose hearts had been all this time towards the idolatry formerly practised by his father and grandfather and grandmother, in all humility move him, that this religion might be set up again; in the text no more is expressed, but that the Princes of Iudah came before Ioas worshipping him, to whom he hearkened, and so they left the house of the Lord and worshipped groves and idols. Whereupon Lyra following R. Solomon faith, that they perswaded Ioas to accept of divine honour, and to this he yielded, because one idolatry easily draweth on another, they soon added hereunto idolatry with groves and other idols also. And he feigneth, that they drew an argument from his living in the temple six years, where none, but the priests must come upon pain of death, yet he continued there so long without any hurt, which proved him to be more than a man, a god, and this is followed by Hugo Cardinalis and Pelliam. But the ground of this opinion is too weak, viz. their bowing of themselves to him, which is no more then Bathsheba and Nathan the prophet did to David, or then is commonly done to any king. Whereas it is said, that he hearkened unto them, it is a forcing of the words to strein them to this, that he was willing and agreed, that worship should be given to him as to a god, neither was the like ever done to any king of the Jews before or after. However the heathen Emperour Caius Caligula presumed to set himself so up. Neither is it probable, that God would any time have tolerated it in him, being so well instructed, as he was, but presently have stricken him with some miserable death, as he afterwards did Herod. The words of the text indeed are so brief, that hereby it becometh questionable, whether they moved Ioas to turn idolater with them, or only to give them leave to serve such gods, as they had formerly done, because nothing else is said, but that they came and bowed unto him, and he hearkened to them, & that then they forsook the house of God, &c. But what they requested is not expressed, nor that they made any request at all unto him, but left to be gathered. So that from this Scripture we can rightly gather no more, but that they leaving him free, if he pleased to go on in serving the Lord in his house, as he had been by Iehoiadab taught, desired, that they might have liberty, as in times past they had, to set up in other places such worship as was used in other nations, which were most flourishing. And this being granted, they did so, but that the king did thus also, it is not said. Yet Iosephus faith, that both king and people did it. But no more can hence be certainly affirmed, but that he tolerated idolatry in his kingdome, being drawn by their flattery, who durst not move him herein all the dayes of Iehoiadab his life, but now he being dead, moved for it and prevailed. Yet because he degenerated so farre, that he commanded Zechariah, a most godly priest, and sonne of Iehoiadab to be slain, when he reprov'd him, as is by and by shewed, it is most probable that he turned idolater also together with them, seeing this is peculiar to idolaters to be cruell and bloody, by the instigation of that murderer the devill, whom they serve. We may note hence, first, what need we have alwayes to pray, that wee may be upheld in the truth, seeing Ioas being godly so long, yet now destitute of his old tutour, fell so foully. 2. that it is of great avail to commit youth to good tutours & governours. Thirdly, that there is not a more pestilent way of corrupting princes or others, then flattery, that by shewing an hatred alwayes of such, we may keep out of their danger. Fourthly, that to tolerate a false religion, is the very way for kings to overthrow themselves and their kingdomes, although they embrace it not themselves, as the sequel here declareth.

Lyra.
R. Solomon.

Ait. 12.

Iosephus.

Note.

2 Chron. 24.
V. 19.

He sent unto them his prophets, who protested unto them, but they would not hear them,

them,

them, &c. God being so greatly provoked, yet judged them not immediately, but first admonisheth them to turn from his great wickedness, and it is said not a prophet, as if he had sent one onely, but prophets, that is, many one after another, who exaggerated this sinne unto them, and threatned them with judgements, if they did not, laying before them doubtlesse the examples of other wicked kings and people, as of Ieroboam, Baashab, and Ahab, for thus prophets used to deale in the like case. He deferred therefore long to bring his judgements upon them, out of his accustomed goodness, seeing it is not to be supposed, that these prophets were sent altogether; but first one, and then another, afterwards a third, that when by no means they would be reclaimed, their censure how severe soever, might follow the more justly. But they were so farre from being moved by these admonitions, and this long patience, that they went on in their wickedness, without regarding what the prophets said. And they perswaded the king most probably, that he being greater then they all, needed not to regard them, but doe what he pleased, notwithstanding their admonitions and protestations, as other kings of the heathen did.

V. 18.

Caietan.

Tostatus.

Genebrard.

Iosephus.

Lyranus.

Junius.

2 Chron. 18. 1.

1 Chron. 11. 8.

Then Hazeal king of Syria fought against Gath and took it, and then set his face to goe to Ierusalem. For here most rightly commeth in the history of the kings again not sooner, as Cajetan would have it, when he saith that this warre happened before the death of Iehoiadab, for punishments follow sins, and go not before them, nor latter, as Tostatus, and Genebrard, and Iosephus, would have it, when they say, that Zachary had first impugned their idolatry, and was slaine; so making but one only coming of the Syrians against Ierusalem, for they came manifestly twice. First taking a bribe without doing further hurt, and then this shaking off the rod over them, as it were not working, at the end of another year, when they had raged against holy Zachary to the shedding of his innocent blood, with a few, killing and slaying many, and all the princes of the people, &c. Thus also Iunius. Touching Gath, it was a city of the Philistines subdued by David, & ever since that time till this held by the kings of Iudah, for Reboboam is said to have repaired it, and Iosephus writeh of it, as being now under the king of Iudah. Hazeal therefore in beginning his warre, here fought against Ioash, and prevailing went on to the chief city of the kingdome, Ierusalem, thinking to take that also. But Ioash fearing it took all the sacred things, which Iehosaphat, Ioram, and Ahaziah had consecrated, and his own sacred things, and all the gold, &c. It may seem strange that Ioram & Ahaziah being idolaters should consecrate any thing to the house of God, but it is to be conceived, that they did it in the beginning of their reigns, before they declared themselves, according to the accustomed manner of the kings of Iudah their predecessors, that their reigns might be the more auspicious. Whereas it hath bin already said, that the temple was before spoyled of all the ornaments which were carried into the house of Baal, so that it may seem there were now no pretious things therein remaining, it is to be conceived, that when Iehoiadab caused the house of Baal to be destroyed, he first took and brought these ornaments out, and being sanctified, restored them to the house of God again, but now the temple being forsaken, and grove frequented, it was just with God to give these pretious things into the hands of the heathen, and so the king of Syria departed from Ierusalem home againe for that time. For his other coming against Ioash, as this is wholly omitted in the Chronicles, so is that here, there being only a reference made to the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Iudah, for the rest of the acts of Ioash in this place. Wherefore we must now again look to 2 Chron. 24. 20, 21, 22, 23.

V. 20.

Moreover when the spirit of the Lord comming upon Zachariah the sonne of Iehoiadab he from an higher place threatned them with Gods judgements for their foule sinnes, they conspiring against him, stoned him in the court of the Lords house by the kings command, who remembered not the kindnesse of Iehoiadab his father towards him. Therefore at the end of the year certaine bands of the Syrians coming up, destroyed the Princes, &c. When this holy man saw that the judgement before going made the King and his Princes no whit the better, he according to his place, as the spirit moved him, inveighed most earnestly against them, and threatned a greater judgement to come upon them by the Syrians, at what time they should should have no help from the Lord. For some hold that he was high Priest after his father, as Tostatus and Wolphius, Pellican, &c. But in the Hebrew Chronology Pedaiah is said to be high Priest now, and Zachariah a priest and a prophet, Genebrard followeth this Chronology, Iosephus calleth him that was high-priest now, Pbidaas. And because the Scripture saith nothing of Zachariah his being high-priest after his father, we may well follow the Hebrew Chronology, holding that Ichoiadaab had another elder son, who succeeded him in this office. And if Zachary were not high-priest, yet he was a priest and a prophet, and so a sacred person, who should have been revered, and the rather, because he was the sonne of so well-deserving a father. But such is the madnesse of idolaters being opposed in their idolatry, that all respect of persons being laid aside, they breath out nothing but slaughter and bloodshed, against those, that tell them the truth, and so did Ioa and the princes of Iudah against Zachary, and not onely against him, but as may be gathered from vers. 25. against his other sonnes also, for it is said, his servants conspired against him for the slaughters of the sonnes of Ichoiadaab. Vnlesse with some wee hold, that the plurall number is put for the singular, which is not unusuall in the holy Scriptures, as where Sarah speaketh of her giving children suck, when she had but one, and of the theeves crucified with Christ, it is said, that they railed upon him, when onely one did so. Therefore the vulgar Latin rendreth it by the singular number, and Iosephus also, yet Ierom saith, that Zachary was slain together with his sonnes, and that not improbably, although he onely be first spoken of, seeing it is said like wise of Naboth at the first, but after wards by Iehu his sonnes are spoken of, as slain also. Our Lord reciting this parricide saith, Zachariah the sonne of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Iunius and Hugo Cardinalis, Lyra, and others say, that the same man had two names, as many more have had, or that he was called Barachiah commonly by the people, the blessed of the Lord, as the word signifieth, because he enjoyed the blessing of so long a life, farre beyond others, and was a blessed instrument of so much good, to restore the decaying estate of that kingdome and church. But why the murdering of this man is instanced in next to the murdering of Abel, when as it was 800. years before the time that Christ spake thus, and in that space they had murdered many more prophets? is a question. Iunius resolveth it by saying, that Zachary dying called for revenge, as Abel's blood had first done, for he said, the Lord shall see and require it, 2 Chron. 24. 22. and the like is not said of any other martyr. Wherefore our Lord threatening revenge, nominateth two examples alike, and passeth over all others, leaving all the righteous blood also shed from Zachary till his time, to be understood hereby. What other opinions there are touching Zachary the father of John Baptiste meant there, or Zachary one of the small prophets, see my comment upon that place. Genebrard relateth a tradition of the Iews, that his blood continued bubling up, untill the time of Nebuchadnezzar, as calling for revenge still, so long after. And out of Epiphanius, that after this blood-shed the answers of God ceased, because the temple was hereby polluted. Whether this were so or no is uncertain, because many wonders are invented and passe for old traditions, but this murder indeed was most heinous, as the sacred history noteth, saying, the King remembred not that kinde: scilicet, which Ichoiadaab his father had shewed towards him. For he saved a venomous serpent from destruction, to be the death of his most dear and godly sonne, which was the highest degree of ingratitude, and a childe of the family, where he had been tenderly brought up, which was most unnatural, his father and mother also adventuring their lives to save him, that gave out this bloody command, which was unpareld tyranny, and that for nothing but zeal for God, and against most abominable idolatry, and obedience to his spirit moving him, which was a very presumptuous fighting against God himself, and therefore if he did miraculously a long time after shew his displeasure against it, he did but thus brand it to deter all men from the like ever after.

Therefore at the end of the year, certain forces of the Syrians coming up against him, invaded Iudab, &c. v. 24. And although these forces were but few, yet the Lord delivered multitudes into their hands, &c. so they executed judgements upon Ioa. After so horrible a sin, judgement was not long deferred, the king of Syria himself came not,

Tostatus.
Wolphius.
Chron. Hebr.
Genebrard.
Iosephus.

Iunius.
Barabius.

Hieron. tradit.
Heb. in 2 Chr.

Matth. 23. 35.
Iunius.
Hugo Cardin.

Iunius.

Genebrard.

2 Chron. 24. 23.

not, for it is thought by some, that Hazael was now dead, and a new king set up in Syria, who not regarding the great price not long before paid to his predecessor by the king of Iudah for his peace, entered his kingdom with some forces to spoil and destroy those, whom the Syrians commonly counted their deadly enemies, as they did them. And it seemeth, that he was extraordinarily stirred up by God, who hated so much the abominable wickedness of Ioas, because otherwise he should have done like a desperate man, to send out fewer against many more, unless it shall be thought that he presumed upon the valour of his men, and the cowardice of Ioas, who had formerly without making resistance compounded with very great treasure with Hazael. However, the hand of God was certainly in it, as the words of the history do imply. Therefore the forces of the Syrians came up, &c. viz. Because when he consented to idolatry he dealt so tyrannically with Zachary reproving it, and God delivered great multitudes into their hands being fewer. Thus fulfilling that which is threatened in the law against transgressors, Levit. 26. 37. ye shall have no force to stand against your enemies. For their invading of Iudah and Ierusalem, it is most probable that it was done in this order, first their coming being heard of, the king gathered a mighty army and went out to fight against them, but the Syrians having slain many of them, and put the rest to flight, went on to Ierusalem, and having slain the Princes and done what they would to the king, most probably wounded him incurably, they took the spoils of the Princes and sent it away to their king in Damascus; the vulgar Latin hath it [in regem ignominioso exercere judicia], that is, saith Ierom, they used him basely, or slaying his sonnes before his face, they upbraided him by his wickedness committed against Zachariah. Whatsoever the judgement was, it seemeth that he was evill entreated by them in that they left him grievously sick and full of pain and torment by reason thereof. For it is said, they left him in most grievous diseases, v. 25. Vatablus thinketh, that by their executing judgements upon him is meant that they punished him diversly, and it is most likely, that hereof he fell thus sick. Lyra, that they wounded him with divers wounds, which were not mortall, and so left him languishing. And it is to be noted, that having him and his city in their power, they neither slew him outright, nor took possession of the city, nor carried him away to be ransomed; for in this the singular providence of God appeared, who would have him reserved after much misery endured in his body, for his foule falling into the abominable sin of idolatry, to be slain by his own servants, who ought to have revered him, for his shamefull murdering of Zachariah, whom he ought to have revered for his fathers sake, to whom he had been more obliged, then any of his servants to him. For so it followeth, 2 Chron. 24. 25. His own servants conspired against him for the murder of the sonnes of Iehoiadab, and in his bed slew him; and they buried him in the city of David, but not in the sepulchers of the kings. v. 26. They that conspired were Zabad the sonne of Shimathab an Ammonitise, and Iehoshabad the sonne of Shimrithab a Moabitise. 2 Kings 12. 21. he is said to have been slain by his servants in the house of Millo, of which, see 1 Kings 11. 26. it was a building reared up by Solomon upon a prerupt place, which he filled up, which goeth down to Silla, where the house stood which Solomon built for Pharaohs daughter, when he had levelled the ground. Iunius understandeth Silla appellatively, as signifying an heap of earth, and not as a proper name. It was then in his own house, that he was slain. And of his murderers one is said to be Iosachar the sonne of Simeath, the other Iehoshabad, the sonne of Somer, so that it seemeth, that the first had two names, and the mothers of them both likewise.

Iosephus saith, that they were a kinne to Zachariah, who thus revenged his blood-shed. But wee may rather with Wolphius observe the futableness of the judgement with the sin of Ioas. One of his murderers was an Ammonite by the mothers side, the other a Moabite descended from two nations, that came of Lot, whom Abraham had saved from destruction out of the enemies hands, whereinto he fell in Sodom; but as they ungratefully sought the destruction of the Hebrewes, the children of Abraham, so did Ioas against the children of Iehoiadab, to whom he was obliged for preserving his life, when he was in danger to loose it, and therefore

Hieron.

Vatablus.

Lyra.

1 Chron. 24. 25.
26.

2 Kings 12. 21.

Iunius.

Iosephus.

Wolphius.

fore it was just with God, that he should now perish by the hands of some of these nations, and those most probably his slaves, born of women, that were enthralled unto him. He was as an Ammonite in condition, and therefore an Ammonite was made his executioner; lib. trad. Hebr. saith, that this is set down to denote the wickedness of the Iewes, they would not take revenge upon Ioas for that foule murder, therefore men of another nation were stirred up to doe it. But seeing they were murderers for this, it is to be held, that their malice stirring them up, God permitted it for the blood of Zacharias.

And they buried him with his fathers in the city of David. ] which least it should be understood of the sepulchers of the kings, the Chronicles saith, that it was not there, as he was unworthy of it, so he had not that honour; the high Priest who acted a kings part better in restoring and well upholding all things, had this honour, but the king thought unworthy to lye near him, whom he so much wronged in his posterity, was buried lesse honourably in some other inferiour burying place. If any shall marvell that his sonne would suffer it, most probably his body was so corrupted with his disease, that it was not to be buried with any solemnity, and therefore not amongst the kings; and the hand of God so grievously upon him, shewed him to be so hatefull unto him, that men durst not thus honour him, so it was verified in him, pride went before, with which he swelled through the flatterie of the Princes, to as that he thought he might doe what he listed, as having all power, and dishonour followed after. And Amaziah his sonne reigned in his stead. ] From hence some gather, that the tradition before spoken of, is not true, viz. that the Syrians slew his sonnes, determining this to be one of the judgements which they executed upon him; for if this had been so, saith Lyra, he should not now have had a sonne to reign after him, and therefore he saith that book of the Hebrew questions wherein this is contained, is none of Ieroms, as also appeareth by the stile; and because in lib. de illustr. viri, where Ierom reciteth all the books by him written, hee mentioneth the book de Hebr. quest. upon Genesis, but not any any other. Wherefore he concludeth, that it was written by some Iew, who mingled together things true and feined. In which his censure touching that book, although I deny not, but it may be just; yet his argument against that particular touching Ioas his children is not good. For some might then be slain, and yet one escape by a singular providence to reign after him, that the promise made unto David might stand. There was great perill of cutting off all his posterity before, when Ioas was preserved; which yet the faithfull not knowing, were tryed 6 yeares together, whether they would continue to believe it, even all the time that he was hidden, and now again the like danger was renewed by the Syrians, touching whom being masters of Ierusalem and of the king, it may be wondered that they destroyed not all his sonnes. And no lesse illustrious was the divine providence once before both these in preserving Abaziah, when all the rest of Iehorams children were taken away by the Philistines, that in him David's line might be continued, so that God in judgement remembreth mercy, and how greatly soever provoked, will never falsifie his word, to the comfort of the faithfull. But his sonnes and the burthen imposed upon him, and his founding of the house of God, behold they are written in the book of the Kings, and then followeth. Amaziah his sonne reigned in his stead. For the place where these things are written, Iunius referreth us to 2 Kings 12. but there is no mention made of his sonnes, nor in any Canonickall Scripture, but only in general, 2 Chron. 24. 3. that he begat sonnes and daughters, and of his building the Temple decayed is lesse said, then in Chronicles, and although the treasure which he sent to the king of Syria to depart from him be there spoken of, yet nothing is said of a burthen of tribute imposed upon him. Wherefore it is most probable, that not 2 Kings is meant, but some other book, wherein the histories of the Kings were more largely written, which was not Canonickall Scripture, and so as many other writings of the Iewes perished in the many mutations, which befell them.

V. 25.

Lyra.

2 Chron. 21. 17.
Nota.

2 Chron. 24. 27.

Juniu.

CHAP. XIII.

V. 1.

V. 2.

V. 3.

V. 4. 5.

Lyra.

Jusinus.
Wolpinus.Tostatus.
Chap. 14. 27.

Josephus.

V. 6.

V. 7.

Nota.

[In the 23. of Ioasb King of Iudah, Iehohaz the sonne of Iehu began to reigne, &c.] This King as his father had begun to him, went on in the sin of Ieroboam, worshipping the golden calves, and the Lord accordingly went on to punish him and his people, by Hazael the king of Syria, and his sonne Benhadad after him, who did so waste and destroy the people of Israel, that, as it is said v. 7. they left him not above 50. horsemen, 10. chariots, and 10000. footmen. But when Iehohaz was brought thus low, he sought to the Lord, who heard him, and gave them a saviour, &c. who this saviour was, because it is not expressed, Lyra saith, that R. Solomon conjectureth, that Ioasb his sonne is meant, of whom it is said, v. 25. that he smote the Syrians three times in the dayes of Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, and recovered the cities which Hazael had taken from his father Iehohaz, and Iunius followeth the same. But Lyra rejecteth it, because it is said, he was delivered out of the hands of the King of Syria, whereas the victories by Ioas obtained against the Syrians were after the death of Iehohaz. But Lyra was herein much mistaken: for it is not said in the text, he was delivered, but God gave a deliverer to the people of Israel, & liberatus est populus, the people or Israel, not the king, of whom no mention is made. Wherefore notwithstanding this objection, that exposition may be good. God gave Ioas, a saviour to the people, although not in his fathers time, yet soon after. Whereas it is said, yet they ceased not from their sins, as if the deliverance were then; it may be conceived that immediately there was by Gods mercy a cessation from war, some good angel of God being sent out for this purpose, to stay the king of Syria from coming against them any more, by striking a terour into him and his people, or some other way as seemed best unto him, as the same Lyra conceiveth. Tostatus saith, that by this saviour is meant Ieroboam, the son of Ioas, because it is said, that by him God saved Israel. By the savior then here spoken of, is not meant one onely at one time, but three. First, immediately upon their humiliation, he sent a good spirit invisibly to stay the Syrians from coming any more against them in the time of Iehohaz. Secondly, Ioas saved them yet more through the prophesying of Elishah, v. 19. when he went three times against them, and overcoming them, recovered his cities formerly lost out of their hands. Thirdly, Ieroboam most of all, who recovered all the land of Israel out of the enemies hands, from the entering in of Hamath, unto the sea of the wilderness by the prophesying of Ionah, chap. 14. 25. Josephus saith, that God made Iehohaz himself a saviour to Israel, who having but 500. horsemen and 10000. foot left him, (he should have said 50.) went with them against the Syrians, and took from them many great cities, and made great slaughters of them. Which is manifestly false, because it is expressly said v. 25. that Ioas the son took the cities, which his father had lost; and of the state of Israel, whilst Iehohaz lived, no more is said, but that they came out of the hand of the Syrians and sat in their tents, as in times past; that is, being quiet and no more vexed with warres, the Syrians being held by a divine power, thenceforth from making warre upon them. For the name [saviour] it is commonly given to men extraordinarily stirred up by the spirit of God to save Israel, being oppressed by his enemies a long time before.

But they departed not from the sinnes of Ieroboam, &c. but walked in every one of them, and the grove stood still in Samaria,] Of which grove see 1 King. 16. 35. and how it was planted by Ahab. And thus they did, although they were beaten by warres of the Syrians, even as the dust under our feet, and of so great multitudes, which might formerly have been raised to go to war out of Israel, now there were left onely 50. horsemen, 10. chariots, and 10000 foot. Which is set down, as to make it appear, how deeply grounded this wickednesse was in them by a continuall accustomed themselves to it, that we may beware of sinfull customes. So to magnifie the goodnesse of God, that he would be entreated, and his power, that he could by such an handfull of men (who could not be much encreased in so short a time, as between between this and the time that Ioash went against the Aramites ) give so great victories to Israel. But it was not for any complacency that he had in their seeking to him with their lips, when their hearts were farre away from him , but to keep his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, &c. as is expressed chap. 14. 27. and because he had yet let them a longer time, before he would destroy them , that his exceeding great patience might be admired by all men , and praised , who still upheld their state, when they were so near to utter ruine , and that when afterwards having so long a time of repentance granted, they abused it, and were destroyed by the Assyrians, his judgements might be acknowledged to be most just.

For the rest of the acts of Iehohaz and his valour, we are referred to the book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel, that is, their annals; and his valour faith, Wolphins, is mentioned to intimate , that Israel was not brought to low in his time, through his sloth or cowardise, but by the judgement of God, justly making the valour of the wicked vain. For no power or fortitude is of any avail against enemies invading us, if God be forsaken, and so becometh an enemy.

Then Iehohaz dying (and being buried, his son Ioas reigned in his stead, anno 37. of Ioas king of Judah he began, &c. ) Whereas v. 1. Iehohaz is said to have reigned 17. years, beginning anno 23. which must needs be to the 39. of Ioash, the king of Judah at the least, it is conceived by expositours, that he made his some confort of the kingdom with him two years before his death, or as some think three, and he reigned 16. years, whereof two or three passed in his fathers time, the rest he reigned alone. The Septuagint reconcile this difference by rendring it thus, anno 39. of Ioas, not respecting so much the Hebrew verity, as the making of the matter plain.

The wicked life and death of Ioash is spoken of by anticipation, and Ieroboams succeeding him in the kingdom, as appeareth v. 14. 15. &c. where his history is again profecuted, and ch. 14. 8, 9. &c. The reason of this brief running over the history of Ioash at the first, as Wolphins well observeth, may be , because all which he did worthy of remembrance, was to be brought in under the histories of Elishab and Amaziah, which here follow, by the prophesying of the one he being encouraged and made successfull in his warres against the Syrians , and by the provocation of the other being drawn out to that victory against him. The sacred historian therefore stayeth not in telling any thing of Ioash, but of his wicked life and death, and so hasteneth to Elishab his last sicknesse and death, where there is occasion again to speak of him, and then to Amaziah, in the time of whose reign, what happened between him and Ioash is recorded.

And Elishab was sick of the sicknesse, whereof he died, and Ioash went down unto him and wept, &c.  ] This was according to the Hebrew Chronology , anno 10. of Ioash, from whence it is gathered, that Elishab had been a prophet above 60. years, as the same Chronology speaketh, seven under Iehoshaphat, five under Ioram, sixe Ashaliab, forty Ioash, eight Amaziah, unto which if twelve be added, whilst he followed Elijah and the years of his age, when he called him thirty , as may be conjectured, the whole time of his life, was 108. Yet others, saith Wolphins, think, that Elishab died in the beginning of the reign of Ioash, unto which he rather assesteth, because even in the time of Iehohaz his father, it is said, that God sent them a saviour, therefore saith he, it is not probable, that it was deferred to his tenth year. But if they were quiet and free from the invasion of the Syrians all that time, the fulfilling of this was begun long before, and from henceforth more. Touching Ioash his visiting of Elishab and weeping, although he were a wicked king, yet herein he gave a good example to visite the sick, and to shew other Princes, in what account they should have the holy prophets of the Lord. And yet I cannot think, that this visite was without the singular hand of God leading him, that he might be made by the ministry of the prophet, a deliverer to Israel from the hands of the Syrians. And therefore the hand which brought him, made him weep when he was come, to see so worthy a man as Elishab ready to depart, who was as he called him , as a father to care for him and his kingdom, although unworthy , and the chariots of Israel and her souldiers thereof, that is, the greatest strength to defend it, that he might be moved by the spirit, wherewith he was endued, to do something for him now be-

V. 8.
Wolphins.
Note.

V. 9.
V. 10.
Junius.
Wolphins.

V. 11, 12, 13.

V. 24.
Seder Olam.

Wolphins.

Note.

fore his departure, seeing his case and the peoples would be lamentable, as he conceived, when they had lost him their greatest strength, by reason of the power which he had with God. And it is to be noted, that he speaketh to him in the same words, wherewith Elifhab spake to Elijah when he was taken away, 2 King. 2. 12. as if he were led by the same spirit of love and reverence towards him. Wolphius observeth it as a remuneration of Elifhab his piety towards Elijah in that the like was now ascribed to him. But how could Iosb speak thus to Elifhab when as he yet living the Israelites were so greatly oppressed by the Syrians, as hath been already shewed? Answ. He had heard of his assigning the kingdom to his grandfather Iehu, Ioram being slain, and that his prophesying was verified, seeing he was mightily set up, and his son after him, and now himself being the second generation of the four, to whom the promise was made, and in the dayes of Ioram, that he had divers times disappointed the Syrians forces, by discovering their plots, and lastly, bringing them into the kings power. Wherefore he conceived, that if he would, he could still do as great things for Israel, if he might live amongst them, and hereupon he so stiled him, that he might insinuate into him, and obtain his favour to do as much for him before he died, as in times past for others, his predecessors in that kingdom.

2 Kings 6.

V. 15.

Then Elifhab bade him take bow and arrowes, and lay his hand upon the bow, which done, the Prophet laid his hands upon the Kings, having first bidden him, open the window towards the East. Then at the direction of the Prophet the King shot, and Elifhab said, the arrow of the salvation of the Lord against the Syrians, &c. By an outward symbol or signe of bow and arrowes, he would, that he should understand and not by word of mouth onely, what the Lord would do by Iosb, as the instrument for the saving of Israel from the Syrians, and for their destruction who had now long oppressed them. So the prophet Abijam formerly shewed Ieroboam, that the Lord would make him King over ten tribes, by renting his garment into twelve parts and giving him ten, for his further confirmation, and to make in him the deeper impression, and also to strengthen him to this mighty work, and the prophets afterwards did often use signes, of all which, as of holy sacraments, this was the use. And this of shooting an arrow towards Syria, for it stood eastward, saith Lyra, to which part the window opened, was a most apt signe to shew the piercing of the Syrians with the Israelites arrowes, through Gods power, who hereby shewed, that he would strengthen the kings and their hands for this end, when the Prophet laid his hands upon the kings, although Lyra derogating from God saith, that it shewed victory to come unto him by the merits of the prophet. But whereas Elifhab addeth, thou shalt strongly smite the Syrians, till thou hast consumed them, he being about to shew it by a further signe, wherein Iosb not doing according to his expectation, he retracted and said, now thou shalt onely smite the Syrians three times. For he bade him take the rest of the arrowes and smite against the ground, and he smote three times and then ceased, at which the Prophet waxing angry, said, thou shouldst have smitten five or sixe times, and so thou shouldst have smitten the Syrians to consumption, &c. It seemeth, that God had revealed to Elifhab, that if Iosb being bidden by him to smite the ground, should smite with his arrowes five or sixe times, the Syrians should by him be utterly destroyed, but if under that number, he should onely so many times overcome them, this work of their utter consumption, being reserved for another, as it was indeed, for his sonne Ieroboam after his death. Wherefore Elifhab said no more, but bade him smite, supposing, that he would have continued to do so, till he had cried enough. But seeing him give over so soon, he was greatly offended for the discredit of his prophesie, which now could not take such effect through Iosb his fault, he had stinted himself to the number of smittings, wherewith he should smite them, and therefore should now go no further in victories over them. The word translated here [fortiter.] strongly, by Iunius who I follow in this particular, is Aphék in Hebrew, and commonly rendred, thou shalt smite them in Aphék, a certain place saith Wolphius, being named, the more to assure him, and not an uncertain Oracle like that of Apollo being uttered. Now there was an Aphék a city of Iudah, of which Iosh. 15. and another in Abhur, Iosh. 19. and

Lyra.

V. 17, 18, 19.

Wolphius.

at

at this last most probably this destruction of the Syrians should be made, the very place, to which they formerly chose to come in the time of Ahab, and were destroyed unto 127000. and therefore it is now again appointed to be the place, for more confirmation. Pellican saith, that Aphac in Iudah is meant. For the mystery of this, that Ioas smote the earth onely three times and no more, doing thus against himselfe to his hindrance, in respect of the utter destruction of his deadly enemies, which for this his remissenesse he could not compasse. It is according to Wolphius, hereby shewed that we through our own negligence cannot conquer over our spirituall enemies, because having begun well and with a good spirit to fight this spirituall battell we persevere not, but so give in, that they continue still to hinder our felicity, seeing such as endure to the end only, shall be saved. Or according to Rabanus, that who so believeth onely in the trinity set forth by the three times, and doth not adde unto his faith also charitable and vertuous actions, prejudiceth himselfe in respect of everlasting salvation, for he must smite the earth five or six times, that the Syrian like evill spirits hindering his salvation, may be utterly subdued; for faith without works is dead.

Then Elishah died and was buried, &c. [It may be marvelled, that the death and buriall of such a worthy is passed over with so few words. But Iosephus saith, that he was honoured sepulchro magnifico, but telleth not the place where, therefore some will have it in Samaria, some in Carmel, and some in Sebaltea. They that are for Samaria, hold it and Sebaltea all one, as Epiphanius, Beda, and Isidor. For Carmel is Adrichomius, saying that he was afterwards translated to Samaria. Tostatus thinketh that he was buried in the Sepulchers of his fathers, as it was said before of Samuel; the holy Scripture is so briefe, that the place is left uncertain, as not materiall to be known, but when he is said to have been buried, it is left to be understood, that he had a buriall according to his worth, seeing the king himselfe did so much honour him. And hast is made to tell of another thing happening about his Sepulcher, which honoured it more then if men had done all that they could to honour it, and so the mentioning of all solemnity is omitted. It is said onely that they buried him, saith Wolphius, to condemne superstitious rites, since invented about the dead, and the superfluity of cost, alleading the example of Cyrus, who charged his sonnes when he should dye, not to delay the time of his buriall by making costly preparation, but so soon as might be to put his body into the ground, as being the most kindly thing that they could doe for it, that it might again be mingled with the mother earth, out of which all things spring and grow. The thing that happened, after his putting into his sepulcher was this, certain forces of the Moabites coming, whilst they went about burying another man, they for fear cast him into the prophets sepulcher, and so soon as he touched his bones, he revived and arose, and stood upon his feet.

These forces or troops, as the word signifieth, were robbers, which came into the land of Israel for booty, whereby the miserable estate of the Israelites appeared, now that they were so much weakned and disheartened by Syrians, they became a prey to other nations also, and were without all courage to resist, like fearfull deer, at the sight of them they ran away. They had by their sinnes lost Gods protection, and so lay open to all their enemies to be robbed and pillaged, as the Misians, when their king Telaphus was gone into a farre country, were made a prey to all their enemies. But God out of this evill bringeth good at this time, as he doth often, turning the malicious attempts of the enemies of his people, into an occasion of good; for thus occasion was given to this miracle for the comfort and confirmation of Ioas and his people, who most probably had not yet attempted any thing against the Syrians, for then the Moabites would not have been so bold, but now such vertue coming from Elishah being dead, and hereby it being shewed, that God by his prophesying could strengthen the Israelites, which were made to be of a dead heart towards any warlike undertakings through the Syrians manifold oppressions, hee and they might well reuize up themselves, and prepare to goe against the said Syrians, as is by and by shewed that they did, and stood up so stoutly against them, that they overcame them time after time unto three times, as Elishah had prophesied,

1 King. 20. 26.

The Mystery.

Matth. 23. 13.
Rabanus.V. 20.
Iosephus.*Epiphanius in vita Elishae.
Beda in Marti-
ro.
Isidor. de vita et morte Sancti.
Adrichomius.
Tostatus.Wolphius.
Xenophon.*

V. 21.

Nota.

Chald paraph.
Toftatus.

and took away from them their cities formerly lost; when this was done, viz. the reviving of the dead man is shewed in these words, the yeare coming or beginning, according to Iunius, the year following, according to Wolphins; the vulgar Latin, in ipso anno, but seeing it is in Hebr. כִּנְיָה the yeare coming, I rest in the first. It was in the beginning of the year after the burying of Elishah, at what time being the spring, they most commonly went out, that invaded others; as is noted, 2 Sam. 11. and if Elishah dyed, June 14. as the Roman Martyrology hath it, this happened about ten months after in the month of March, the Chald. in the entrance of the year; Toftatus in the return of the year, that is, saith he, in the beginning of the spring, or in the month of March. By their casting in of the dead man so speedily into the sepulcher of Elishah, it appeareth that hee was not laid into a grave and covered with earth, as the manner now is, but in a sepulcher of stone, having either a cover of stone to it, or standing open in some vault or cave; for so they buried Lazarus of old, and our Lord; and thus we may well conceive, how the dead mans corps being cast in, came soon to touch the corps of Elishah, if the stone covering him were but only removed first. What became of this man the Scripture saith not, but the Rabbins bold to invent any thing and to set it forth as a truth, say that he by and by fell down dead again, being raised to come out of the sepulcher because he was unworthy for his wickednesse to lye so near the holy prophet. But if this had been so, it might well have been suspected, whether he was indeed raised up or no. It is therefore more probable, that he lived and went to the king with his bearers, as witnesses, that both he and all the people might reverence Elishah the more, and give credit to his last prophesie to be stirred up immediately to prepare and goe against the Syrians, being assured, that his God that set him a work to prophesie so, was as well able by weak means to give life unto that state now after a sort dead, as by the bones of Elishah touching this man only, to give him life againe. This is made a ground by papals of going in pilgrimage to the bones of the Saints departed, and by praying at their monuments to seek help against their maladies and salvation to their souls. But forsomuch as we read not of any such use made of this miracle by the faithfull of those times, it is to be condemned, as grosse superstition. For if God for some mysticall end, of which by and by, and to confirm Isaiah, as hath been said, touching the prophesie of Elishah did work at this time miraculously by his bones, but never did any more wonders hereby after, nor at any time before either by Samuels bones or Dauids, Iosephs or Ioshuabs, or the bones of any other of his dearest Saints, what a madnesse is it, or giddi-headednesse to goe to the dead bones of Saints, purposely to have help by vertue coming from them, as if this had been propounded for a president unto us to invite us thus to doe? They had no such custome in the primitive Church, as we may gather from Ambrose, who saith no more of this, but that as the Virgin Mary being full of the spirit prophesied, so Elishah being dead, raised a dead man by the touch of his bones. And Chrysostom only that by vertue coming from them, none believing this great miracle was wrought.

Ambros. in Luc.
lib. 1.
Chrys. hom. 58. in in Matth.
Euseb. lib. 4.
c. 15.

And Eusebius writeth of Polycarpe being martyred, that when the Christians desired to have his body to bury, the Jewes their deadly enemies sought to hinder it by saying, that if it were granted them, they would, leaving their Christ, worship it. But they replied, that they could not forsake, but worship him, who had redeemed the whole world by his blood, and love his Martyrs and Disciples, as his imitators. It is indeed not to be denied, that by Martyrs bones also, sometimes wonders have been wrought, when God would, for the confirmation of the true faith, but this hath been extraordinary and rare, not by being sought unto, but when God pleased unexpectedly in the times of infidelity, at what time onely other miracles were wrought also,

The mystery.
Ambrosius.
Rabanus.

The mystery of this, according to Ambrose and Rabanus, was to shew, that who so being dead in sin, believeth in Christ, who died for our sins, toucheth thus, as it were, his bones; and liveth by grace, and shall live again for ever, after that he is dead, in glory.

V. 22.

And Hazael oppressed Israel all the dayes of Iehohaz, then the Lord had pity upon them for his Covenants sake with Abraham, &c. And Hazael died, and his sonne Benhadad

Benhadad reigned in his stead. And Ioash returned and took cities, &c. Here is shewed, how the prophesie of Elishab was accomplished, and that the power and truth of God and his mercy might be more magnified, least it should be conceived for that which was before said, touching a deliverer given unto them, that they were already exempt from their oppressions, it is prepared to tell of these victories of Ioash, by saying, that Hazael oppressed Israel all the dayes of his father Iehobaz, which that it may not seem contradictory to vers. 5. it is to be understood, that their resting in quiet, as in times past, there spoken of, is not meant of the present time, whilst Iehobaz lived; but in his son Ioash his time, after that the Syrians had been overcome by them; although, as hath been said there, it is to be conceived, that the Syrians were even then by Gods providence restrained from vexing them any more; for Israel might still notwithstanding this, be said to be oppressed by them, because they yet held their cities formerly subdued. But now God enlarged his mercy towards them more for his Covenants sake with their holy forefathers, and restored their lost cities again unto them, the Syrians that had taken them, being expelled. This Covenant was, that he would be their God, and the God of their seed, and give them the land of Canaan for the pleasure thereof, being a type of heaven; and by promising the seed, in which all nations should be blessed, intimating true blessednes also for ever, to come finally unto them.

Hazael, by whom God had as by a rod, scourged Israel about 50 years, now was taken away by death, and so his sonne reigning, these victories were achieved. And here Wolphius noteth well, that this blessed change was granted unto Ioash in way of recompence, for his so kindly visiting Elishab in his sicknesse, to stirre men up to kindnesse and respect towards the Prophets and Ministers of God.

V. 22.
V. 23.
V. 24.
V. 25.

Wolphius.
Note.

CHAP. XIV.

THe second years of Ioash began Amaziah to reign over Iudah, he was 25 years old, when he began to reign, and reigned 29.] Having left Amaziah since ch. 12. 22. now he prosecute his history again, telling also who his mother was, viz. Iehobaddam of Ierusalem. He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, but not like unto David, but as Ioash his father. He began well, as Ioash, and ended ill, as is shewed, 2 Chron. 25. as he also had done; whereas David's heart was upright towards God all the dayes of his life, so as were the hearts of very few kings after him, as their histories doe shew. And 2 Chron. 25. 2. it is said of Amaziah in particular, that his heart was not upright. But how did he then; that which was right in the sight of the Lord? Ans. Hee restrained from worshipping idols, and restrained the people also from them, and both came himselfe and caused others to come and worship the Lord only, and this was right not only in the sight of godly men, but of God also. But in that he did it not out of conscience and piety, but being moved hereunto by some other thing (as Ioash his father had done by the instructions and authority that Iehoiadab had with him; so he seeing the ruinous estate of the kingdome, when he came unto it, because he thought by this he should obtain mercy to be saved from his enemies, by whom his father had suffered grievously, when he turned to the favouring of idolatry) he is said to have done right, but not with a perfect heart, as David who bent all the forces of his heart to promote the worship and service of God meerly out of piety, without looking at any worldly end herein. For who so doth not thus, doth not good with a perfect heart, and is alwayes unstable in the true religion, as Amaziah was, and fell therefore into great miseries, as the following history sheweth. Touching v. 4. The high places were not taken away, &c. it hath been often spoken before in the reign of other kings his predecessors, v. 5. But when the kingdome was confirmed in his hands, hee slew his servants, who had smitten the king his father, &c. And herein hee shewed his wisdom, in that (things standing as they did with his fathers house, since his ungratefull murdering of Zacharias) he avoided the giving of occasion to his subjects

V. 1.

V. 3.

2 Chron. 25. 2.

Note.
V. 4.

V. 5.

Note.

Deut. 24. 16.

Rom. 13.

The murderers of kings punished.

V. 7.

2 Chron. 25. 5.

2 Chron. 17. 14.

H. B. Patriarches
travels.

in the beginning of his reign to think him cruell, least by any means their affections being alienated from him, his kingdom should have been endangered. Wherefore he prudently first setteth himselfe in the throne, and by lenity and kindnesse winneth the hearts of his subjects, and then being by such means established, he doth justice upon those murderers. Some from hence gather, that although they were the kings servants, yet they were no mean persons, but men of might, so that Amaziah had need first to make himselfe strong, and then to proceed to judgement against them. Note from their example, that wicked murderers may escape for a time, but they shall at length be punished most certainly as they deserve, and so shall other wicked ones, as Ioshl and Shimei were before. And this execution he did necessarily, because bloodshed polluteth the land, and here from it is not againe cleansed, but by shedding the murderers blood. Besides, it had been against nature for the sonne not to revenge the death of his father, being slain by his own servants. But although he was most deare unto him, yet he exceeded not the measure set in the law of God by smiting also their children, as is shewed, v. 6. For if any murder deserveth excess of punishment, the murdering of a king certainly doth, although he be wicked, because he is set up of God; he is his annointed, and therefore not to be laid hands upon, as David concluded touching Saul; and if he be, God taketh it as done against himselfe, and therefore alwayes maketh such spectacles of his severest judgements, as was most notably shewed in the murderers of Iulius Caesar, although hee had made himselfe worthy of hatred, in that he took the Empire upon him, and changed the government, which had hitherto been Aristocraticall. For Cassius when hee had joyned battell with Brutus at Philippi, when he saw his army give way, slew himselfe. M. Iun. Brutus also being in the same battell, slew himselfe likewise, and his dead body being sent by Antonius to his mother and wife to be buried, his wife Portia seeing it through extream griefe sought to kill her selfe, and when she could by no other meanes, she did it by thrusting hot burning coales through her own throat. The like was the end of Cato Minor. And D. I. Brutus falling into Antonies hands was put to death, neither did any of the other conspirators escape. He also smote Edom in the valley of salt, 10000 men. That which is here omitted of his preparations to this warre is supplied, 2 Chron. 25. 5. Then Amaziah gathering the Jews together, made them Captains over thousands, and Captains over hundreds, &c. and numbering them, he found them to be 300000 chosen men, &c. This number although it may seem to be great, yet if we compare it with the number in the days of Iehoshaphat his great grand-fathers father, who reigned scarce sixty yeares before, it is small, for he had under severall Captains 1160000 besides those that were put into fenced cities; so greatly were the people waisted under wicked Iehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Ioshl. And unto these Amaziah hired out of the kingdom of Israel, 100000 more for 100 talents of silver to goe against Edom. What the cause was may be gathered from 2 Chron. 21. 8. they had revolted from the obedience of the king of Judah in Iehorams time 60 yeares before, and therefore being now free from the oppressions of the Syrians, as also the Israelites were, he thought it would make for his honour to reduce them to his obedience againe; wherefore he made this mighty preparation to goe against them with 400000 men. But a man of God was sent unto him to bid him dismishe the Israelites, because God was not with them, and this he consented to doe, but was sorry for his 100 talents given unto them, which might seem a small price for the hire of so many, although it were a great sum. For a talent, if it were the common one, was 187 pound 10 shillings, if the kings talent 281 pound 5 shillings, of the sanctuary, 375 pound; now it is most probable that the king counted by his owne talent, and if so, 100 talents amounted to 28925 pound, and yet the hire of each souldier, accounting one talent for a thousand men was little, viz. 27 pound eight shillings four pence, to a hundred, that is, about five shillings seven pence a man; but some reckon a talent at lesse, as Sallianus, who will therefore, that it may not seem too little, have it understood of talents of gold; but this is against the expresse text, which hath it, talents of silver. But it is rather to be supposed, that money was more scarce then, so that twenty shillings will not go further now in buying any provision, or hiring a man, man, then five shillings at that time. And it is also to be conceived, that these men were drawn as much by hope of spoils, as by their hire. When king Amaziah was troubled in regard of this money, the Prophet comforted him by saying, that God was able to give him more, and so he dismissed them, but they taking it to be a disgrace unto them, departed home full of wrath. And Amaziah with his own men went on against Edom, and in the valley of Salt slew ten thousand.

Here it may be demanded, how it could be said, that God was not with the Ephraimites, or those of the kingdom of Israel, seeing about that time he gave them such victories over the Syrians? Ans. He did that out of his great mercy, and pity that he took on them, being a long time before grievously oppressed by the Syrians, and not because his favour was towards them, for he was even then offended at their idolatry, and therefore he threatened, that if Amaziah took them with him, he should fall before the Edomites. For although he doth wonderfully sometimes even for wicked idolaters, as for Ahab also before, and for Ieroboam after, yet he is greatly offended, and fighteth against his own servants, when they joyn their forces with idolaters, as Iehoshaphat with Ahab, and with Abaziah his son. In that the kingdom of Israel was now able to supply Amaziah with 100000. men, which was brought to so low an ebb in the time of Iehobaz, the father of Iosaf, from whom, till this warre, were but 14. or 15. years, for according to the Hebrew Chronology, this was the 12. year of Amaziah, and he began to reign the second year of Iosaf, the great blessing of God to multiply them so much in so short a time, is to be noted, in that they were grown from 10000. which was their number then, to 100000 which might be spared to help another king in his warres, besides them, that most probably layed at home for the defence of that kingdom, which were not a few. But it is likely that they increased greatly, by the return of their own cities from the Syrians into their own hands again, and by the access of such as before fled and hid themselves for fear of the Syrians.

Touching the Valley of salt, which is said to be the place wherein the Edomites were smitten, see before Gen. 14. 8. where a battle is said to have been fought between the Sodomites and their enemies, and 2 Sam. 8. 13. David sl: w 18000. of the Edomites in the same place. For Edomites the Chronicles hath it, of the children of Seir, because the Edomites who came of Esau, otherwise called Edom, inhabited a place called mount Seir; and he took Sela and called the name of it Iokteel to this day. Iunius, he took the rock which men call Iokteel to this day, expounding it of a city in Arabia Petrea, from whence it had the name Petra or Rock, and yet he referreth us to Iosh. 15. 38. where Iokteel is numbred amongst the cities of Iudah, but bordering upon Edom southward. v. 21. the vulgar Latin, he took the rock and called it Ioshakel, that is, saith Lyra, gnashing of teeth, because they that were thrown down from thence and so killed, as 2 Chr. 25. 12. made a lamentable noise through their teeth. But in the Hebrew it is Iokteel, according to Bede coming of חַיִּי caim, a company, and אֱלֹהִים God, this name being given for a remembrance, that the company coming with Amaziah, took this place by the help of God, and if so, it was piety in Amaziah to call it thus. H. B. deriveth it from Iakab heareth, and El God, because God heard to give him victory. Some derive it from אֲנָק a bird called Onocrasilus, which maketh a lamentable noise, holding it to be so called, for the reason before rendered by Lyra. Vatablus thinketh, that because it was a very strong place, and yet taken now by one Iokteel, it was called after his name, and this is the most probable. But whereas Iunius calleth it first Selah, and then saith men called it Iokteel, as if it were not now first called by this name, but indifferently by either of these names, referring us to Iosh. 15. 38. where the name Iokteel is found long before, setting it forth also as the metropolitan city of Arabia Petrea. He was certainly mistaken, for it is manifestly spoken of, not as a city, but a rocky place, as Selah signifieth, and may further be gathered from 2 Chr. 25. 12. but a strong hold of the Edomites, which made the taking of it so remarkable, neither is the manner of the holy Scripture to speak thus of the name of a place, but of such as was not called so before. And it is manifestly to confound places to say, that Iokteel in the borders of Edom pertaining to Iudah, was a city in Arabia. And hereunto adde, that Arabi-

Junius.

Lyra.

Bede.

Wolffius.

Vatablus.

Josephus.

2 Chron. 25. 13.

Junius.

Lyra.

Nota.

2 Chron. 25. 14.

Lib. de hebr.
quest.

Lyra.

Arabia Petrea was farre from Edom, and when this was done, Amaziah was not fighting there but against the Edomites, wherefore it could not be a city in Arabia, but a rocky held in Edom, which Josephus saith, did imminere Arabie, look towards Arabia, and therefore was not in it.

At this place what company was also slain, is not here recorded, but 2 Chron. 25. 12. it is said 10000. more, by casting them down from that rock, thus cruelly breaking their bones in pieces. This being done, the history of 2 Chron. 25. 13. proceedeth to tell, how the dismissed forces of Israel called Ephraimites, because that tribe was the most populous, raged against the kingdome of Iudah in that part, which lay nearest to them, viz. from Samaria, which was the metropolis of their own kingdome to Beth-horon, that is, according to Junius, all the latitude of the kingdome of Iudah, which bordered upon the kingdome of Israel, slaying 3000 and carrying away a great prey. It is well noted here, by Lyra, that this was not done immediately after the Ephraimites dismissing by Amaziah, but as it is set down in order, after his victory against the Edomites, and that cruelty shewed towards them: for God now most probably saw his heart lifted up with pride, and through displeasure taken hereat, secretly wrought in their hearts now to take revenge for the supposed disgrace done unto them by their dismissal, after they been hired. For if this had been done before in their return homeward, it had would have been said, from Bethhoron in Iudah to Samaria, whereas it is said, from Samaria as farre as Bethhoron, to denote the place, from whence they then came, and to confirm this more, it is said vers. 10. that being dismissed they departed, though full of wrath, to their place. Neither would God certainly have suffered this their wrath to have thus broken out, for the credit of his Prophet employed about that dismissal, but that Amaziah immediately upon his victory against the Edomites, had his heart, which was not perfect before, corrupted with pride and insolent cruelty, whence more sinne followed, as is by and by shewed. Touching Bethhoron it was double, the one called the nether, lying in the tribe of Benjamin, the other called the upper in the tribe of Ephraim, wherefore it must be understood of the nether Bethhoron in the kingdome of Iudah, against which they went.

Then Amaziah took the gods of the children of Seir, and set them up for his gods. ] It is a marvell, that by Gods help he having obtained victory over the Edomites, as he knew well enough, because Elisabab had shewed him so much, and seeing the helplessness that was in these idols towards the people that served them, that he should so suddenly be befotted with their outward splendour, as that he should fall to the worshipping of them. But the Hebrewes, that this may not seem to have bin done without all reason, feign, that when those 10000 Edomites were cast down from the rock there was a voyce heard coming from the idols, this happeneth unto you because ye have been negligent in the worship of us, which Amaziah hearing, carried them home with him and worshipped them. But Lyra well confuteth this, because no glossie ever yet yielded this reason, and when a prophet sent unto him challenged him for it, v. 15. he could, if it had been thus, readily have answered him accordingly, but he did onely check him, as being to saucy with the king, v. 16. And it is reason enough against it, because, if it had been so, the holy historiographer, who so diligently setteth down all things of moment in the Chronicles, would not certainly have passed it over, to say nothing, that the Rabbins are known well enough to be audacious forgers. It is reason enough, pride arising in his heart after his victory against the Edomites, as he is charged by Isaiah, v. 19. God who alwayes despiseth the proud, seeing it (for he seeth into the heart) was angry, and left him to himself, and being left, it is no marvell that he ran into any abominable wickednesse. For when he by the encouragement of a prophet promising him, victory had obtained it, to be lifted up in his heart was so against God, that nothing could be more, for it was in effect the taking of the glory due to God for this victory, unto himself. Wherefore it was just with God to withdraw his grace from him, that he might abase himself to worship stocks and stones, and because he had now a proud opinion that victory was pinned to his sleeve, into what other wars soever he he should (as the sequel sheweth in his sending to Joash) enter, v. 17. he cared not for serving the Lord any longer, to which he had hitherto been necessitated, when he was weaker, and therefore did it outwardly, but never from his heart. Lastly, as the old Romans having subdued any nation, set up their gods also to themselves to win their favour, that as they had not, so they might never be against them to withdraw the obedience of that nation from them, or in case of revolting, to stand to defend them, so haply Amaziah set up these idols of Edom.

God seeing this, was full of wrath, and sent a prophet unto him, that he might the more justly proceed in judgement against him, when he should condemn his admonition, as he did. For when he expostulated with him about the serving of those gods, that were not able to save their own people, he did nothing but check and threaten him, and bade him be gone, lest he should smite him, but the prophet answered, that he knew, the Lord determined to slay him, because he would not hearken to his counsell. This prophet, saith Hugo following Ierom, was Eleazar the sonne of Dodo his uncle, and some say that he was Amos the father of Isaiah, who is said 2 King. 14. 25. to have been a while after sent to Ieroboam the sonne of Joas. But it is more probable, that it was one dwelling in Judah, that had caused Amaziah to dismiss the Israelitish army, whereby they were provoked in his absence to do him so much mischief; therefore he was now so angry with this prophet, as the cause hereof, but what his name was, is to us unknown.

Then Amaziah sent messengers unto Joas, saying, &c. Go to, let us see one anothers face, &c. ] After admonition by a prophet, there following no reformation in Amaziah, but an obstinate setting of himself to his idolatry begun, now followeth his punishment, of which he was made the occasion to himself. He returning from Edom with victory and great spoils, when he heard what the Israelites, the men of Joash had done in his absence, in spoiling his countrey, and slaying his subjects, was greatly exasperated, as well he might, and to be revenged after counsell taken, saith 2 Chron. 25. 17. sent to challenge Joash the king of Israel, to come and fight with him; for this he meant by the consent of all expositours, when he said, Let us see one anothers face. As if he had said, let not thy men come thus cowardly to fight and kill up my subjects, and to take booties by stealth, but if thou beest a man, come in person and bring all thy forces with thee, and I will meet and fight with thee face to face openly in a set battle, and not infect thy borders by stealth and then run away again, as thy men have done.

Iosephus addeth, that he also challenged him for usurping the kingdome over the ten tribes, which of right belonged unto him, as being lineally descended of David and Solomon, from whose kingdome they were rent by rebellion. Now although Amaziah had a just cause to go against the king of Israel, for the wrong which he had done him in his absence, yet it was temerity and no advised wisdom (although he be said to have taken counsell) thus to challenge him. His counsellours most probably were such, as those young men of whom Rehoboam took counsell in times past, and lost the greatest part of his kingdome. A wise King would rather have sent to require satisfaction for the wrongs done him, or without sending, taken the advantage of sudden coming upon him, thus seeking to save himself again for his losses. But when God meaneth to bring the wicked to destruction for their wickedness, he enflameth them, that they may run to their own ruine, and so he did Amaziah at this time. He let him be lifted up with pride, so as to think his forces were now invincible, because he had overcome the Edomites, and withall recounting what the prophet had said unto him, when he went against Edom, that the Lord was not with Israel, to slight all the power, that the king of Israel could raise. But of his own idolatry, which he was lately fallen into, he was nothing sensible, although the prophet had threatened him, to fear an alteration of success in the warres, that he should henceforth make; therefore Joas having received his message, returneth answer by way of allegory.

The thistle of Lebanon sent to the cedar of Lebanon, saying, give thy daughter to my sonne to wife, but a beast passing along trod down the thistle, &c. ] Hereby most aptly the wing him, how unequal his forces were to his own, and if he proceeded according

2 Chron. 25. 15.

Hugo Cardin.

V. 8.

2 Chron. 25. 17.

Iosephus.

V. 9.

H. 4. 11.

Lyra.

V. 10. 11, 12,
13, 14.
2 Chron. 25. 20.

V. 11.

Josephus.

according to his challenge, what the event would be. For the cedar is the tallest and firmest of all the trees of the forest, one being found in Cyprus, according to Pliny, 130. foot long, and as big about as three men could fadome, and for the lasting of the wood hereof, it is reported to be incorruptible, but the thistle is so vile, that it is not to be accounted a tree, but a weed. And hereby he would set forth Amaziah, contrary to the proud opinion that he had of himself, to be most mean and contemptible, in comparison of the king of Israel. And he compareth their meeting together to fight, to a most unequal marriage, which tendeth alwayes to great hurt to the over-matched; by the beast treading down the thistle, he meaneth, his soldiers, who would make no more ado to subdue him and his men, then a great beast to tread down a thistle. Thus Wolphius; but Lyra following R. Solomon, sheweth further the originall of this comparison. The Jews counted Shechem affecting a marriage with Dinah Jacobs daughter, as a thistle requiring the cedar to give his daughter to wife unto it, because Jacob was a great Patriark, and Shechem a base Ethnick, and because when Shechem sought that marriage, the sonnes of Jacob like a mad beast came and destroyed him, and the people of his city, it went for a proverb amongst them, when any man would set forth one undertaking a thing too hard and dangerous for him, to say, the thistle sent to the cedar, &c. and so Ioas now used it to Amaziah.

Thou hast done valiantly against the Edomites, be content with this glory, and keep at home, &c. ] Here Ioas shewing plainly this to be his meaning, that he challenged him but to his own destruction, giveth him good counsell. But he had not the power to follow it, the Lord working so by his judgement for his idolatry with the gods of Edom, that he hardened himself to go to this battle, wherein he was so overcome and subdued, that Ioas took & spoiled what he pleased in his dominions, even to Ierusalem, and the temple it self, as is expressed 2 Chron. 25. 20, 21, 22, 23. carrying away all the treasures found therein, with Obed-edom, and in the kings house, and taking pledges.

The place where they met to fight was Bethshemesh in Judah, so called, because there was another of the same name in Nephthali, Iosh. 9. 38. and this was near to Kirath-Iearim, where the Ark sometimes rested divers yeares, when it was brought back out of the Philistines country, and not above four miles from Ierusalem. Ioas then seeing, that Amaziah was fully bent to warre, stayed not for his coming, but hastened to meet him in his own kingdom, as is the part of a wise prince, thus keeping his own from being spoiled by a multitude of soldiers, which was also the policy of Hanibal the Carthaginian afterwards, to keep his country from the invasion of the Romans, to make warre upon them in Italy, and theirs at length on the other side to do the like by Africa, and Carthage. The two Kings meeting at Bethshemesh, the challenger Amaziah paid for his arrogancy and rashness: for he was soon overcome, and his men put to flight, he was taken, and at the mercy of Ioas, as the Edomites lately were at his, but found none. So it was just with God, that he should now be under the power of his enemy, then which nothing certainly could more vex him, being proud of his former victory, and expecting nothing lesse, as his challenge before-going shewed. Being taken, Ioas leadeth him away in triumph, as a prisoner, to his chief city Ierusalem, and there breaketh down the wall from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate, 400 cubits. The gate of Ephraim was that which looked towards the kingdom of Ephraim and stood northward, and the corner gate that, where the wall began to turn again, which was westward, according to Josephus, who in setting these things forth saith, that when the two armies were now ready to joyn battle, such a fear fell upon those of Judah, that without fighting they began to flee away, and so the king was left to come into the enemies hands. And Ioas having taken him, brought him to Ierusalem, and there commanded him to cause his people to open their gates and yield their city unto him, or else he would presently put him to a cruell death. At his perswasion therefore the city was yielded, and because Ioas would have room enough for his army to enter, he brake down thus much of the wall, the citizens looking on, and not daring to resist. Then he riding in, in his chariot triumphantly, took all the treasures, as was before said. Obed-edom, in whose hand the treasure and vessels of the Lords house were, was a Levite, to whose custody these were committed. The pledges which they took, was mens sons of the highest rank, whom he caried away with him, to be his security for the payment of such tribute and standing to such conditions as he pleased to propound. Thus Amaziah and his people smarted for their idolatry, Joas, who himself was no better, being made the instrument. And to shew, that God used him but as his rod to punish sin in Amaziah, the relation of his death followeth next, as most probably happening the same year. For Joas reigned but to his sixteen year, 2 King 13. 10. Amaziah began his reign in his second year, and anno 12. fought against Edom, wherefore the war between him and Joas must be anno 13. that is, the 15. year of Joas, and this most probably near expired when he returned to Samaria and then he lived not a year after. And unto this agreeth that, which is here added, v. 17. Amaziah lived after the death of Joas 15. years, and the whole time of his reign was 29. v. 2. wherefore in his 14 Joas died. Now although Amaziah lived still fifteen years, yet there is nothing memorable recorded of him in all that time, but that after he left following the Lord, his owne subjects in Ierusalem growing weary of him, conspired against him, and thus hee was forced to flee to Lachish, to which place hee was notwithstanding pursued, and slain there. Their hatred most probably was stirred up against him for the great miseries, into which the kindome was brought by his means, who after his overthrow by the king of Israel grew pusillanimous, not daring to attempt any thing more like a valiant king, for the good of his kindome, but lay in the abominable sinne of idolatry, spending his time idly and basely. Of this the princes and nobles being at length impatient, when his sonnes were grown up to 16. years of age, consented together to depose him and set up his son, then he hearing of it fled. Ierom thinketh, that this conspiracy was begun in secret immediately after that their kindome was made tributary to the king of Israel, and not brought to perfection till this time, and that Amaziah perceiving what they went about, fled; but being immediately followed, was taken and slain. Others think, that it was the fift year after the death of Joas, that they made this conspiracy, and that he lay hid after this in Lachish ten years, before he was slain. But this cannot be, seeing he is said to have reigned 29 years, wherefore they are rather to be followed, who hold, that this conspiracy was made, and he thereupon fleeing, was pursued and cut off, all in his last year, no time being given him at Lachish to fortifie himself against them. If it be said, it is not likely that they would conspire against him 15 years after, for the mischief brought upon them by Joas; the longer they were held under by the king of Israel, the more weary doubtlesse they grew, and now to be rid of this bondage they agreed to depose this king, who by oath was obliged, and to set up another, who was free. Whereas some are of opinion, that Amaziah in all this time patiently bare his miseries, and turned from his idolatry, as the cause hereof, yielding this for the reason, that his sonne Vzziah is said to have done that, which was right in the sight of the Lord, as his father Amaziah, 2 Chron. 26. 4. they go upon a most weak ground, seeing the like is said before of Amaziah, compared to Joas his father. Their opinion then is rather to be preferred, who say, that when they conspired against him, he should have better provided for himself, by fleeing the idolatry which he had set up, and go to God by true repentance, then by fleeing to Lachish; but whereas in all his miseries he did not, this is set forth as another judgement of God coming upon him, as the words imply. After he left following the Lord, they conspired against him in Ierusalem. And it seemeth to have been a strong conspiracy, that he was not able to repress, and therefore was constrained to flee from, neither did his sonne after him attempt to punish it, as he had done to those that slew his father Joas. It seemeth then, that it was made by a generall consent, as that sometime against Athaliah, and so the succeeding King was faine to passe it over.

took

Lachish, the city to which he fled, was in the tribe of Iudah, upon the borders of the Philistims, of which see Iosh. 15. it sometime had a King, and 2 King. 18. it was besieged by Sennacherib, when he had overcome the Philistims, whence we may gather

V. 15. 16.

V. 17.

2 Chron. 25. 29.

V. 19.

Hieron. de Hebr.
qu.

Wolphim.

Junia.

gather, that it was a place of strength, in which Amaziah haply thought to defend himself, it was 20 miles from Ierusalem.

V. 20.
*Hieronymi. trad.
Hebr.*

When they had slain him, they carried him upon horses to Ierusalem, and not upon mens shoulders saith Ierom, because he served the idols of Edom, whom he brought to Ierusalem upon horses, therefore his dead body was carried so likewise, they thinking it unworthy to be carried upon mens shoulders, as the Ark of God upon the shoulders of the Koathites, because he had forsaken him.

V. 21.
2 King. 15. 30.
He is also called Vzziah.
2 Chron. 26. 3.

Then all the people took Azariah and made him King, &c. 2 Chro. 26. 1. Vzziah. It seemeth that he was called indifferently by either of these two names; his age also is set down 16 years, and his mothers name Iecolia of Ierusalem, and the time of his reign 52 years, 2 Chron. 26. 3. Vzziah, saith gloss. ord. n. signifieth the vertue of God, and Azariah, the help of the Lord, according to which names he did, and was holpen in the beginning of his reign, as here followeth, v. 4, 5, 6, &c.

V. 22.

He built Elath after that he had recovered it to Iudah, and slept with his fathers. ]

Chap. 15. 1.

This Elath was in the land of Edom near to Ezion-gaber, 1 King. 9. 26. and if it were by Amaziah his father taken, when he went against the Edomites, it is most probable, that after the great blow given him by Joas King of Israel, he lost it again, the Edomites waxing bold upon his being brought under, to set upon it, and take it from the Jews again. But now Vzziah coming to a better estate, taketh it and layeth it to Iudah, and fortifieth it for his use, as being of great importance, sith it was a port town. And this is all that is in this Chapter set down touching Vzziah in the history of the Kings. But ch. 15. 1. returning again to the beginning of his reign, it setteth forth more. Anno 27. of Ieroboam king of Israel, Azariah began, &c. touching which description of the time, a great question ariseth, how it could be 27 of Ieroboam, seeing his father lived and reigned after the death of Joas, father to Ieroboam 15 years, as was before shewed, and if he began immediately after his father, it must be the 15 and not 27 of Ieroboam. Some answer this by saying, that there was an inter-regnum after the death of Amaziah, of twelve years, but the granting of this, maketh the Chronology of the Kings of Iudah uncertain, whereas the end of reckoning the years of every ones reign is, that the whole time might be certainly known, as from the Creation to the Flood, by the fathers of the line of Sheth, and from the Flood to Moses and the Iudges, by the fathers of the line of Shem, so from thence to the carrying of Iudah captive into Babylon, by the Iudges and the Kings. Moreover, because ch. 15. 8. Zechariah the sonne of Ieroboam, is said to have begun his reign, anno 38 of Azariah, it cannot be admitted, that there should be an interregnum of twelve years, so that from the death of Joas of Israel, should be 27 before he began, seeing from the 27 to the 41 of Ieroboam, are but fourteen years, and this was the whole time of his reign. It must needs then be yielded, that there was no interregnum in Iudah, but an ante regnum in Israel, Ieroboam being made consort of the kingdom together with his father, twelve years before his death, and this might be well upon good reason, seeing he made warre with the Syrians, the first, second, and third time, that in his absence he might rule and if he should have happened to dye in those warres, the kingdom being ready provided of a king, might sustain no danger for want of one, through divisions: And if we count it thus, twelve years to Ieroboam with his father, and fifteen after to Azariah, we shall fall justly upon his 27 year, when Azariah began. But then a greater difficulty remaineth, seeing Azariah by this account, had not reigned above fifteen years when Ieroboam died, and betwixt fifteen and 38 are 23 years difference; Here I do not finde any one Expolitour, that doth fully satisfie this doubt, not Iunius by saying, that he was taken and made King eleven years before his fathers death, when he fled to Lachish, for 11 added to 15 make but 26, and if all the time of his age before he began, viz. 16 be added, they will together make but 31. Nor Tostatus by saying, that there was an interregnum in Israel after Ieroboams death, before Zachary began, of eleven years, for they being added to fifteen, do much lesse make up the number of 38; and Genebrard and Funtius come yet shorter, who allow an interregnum but of eight years. But if we allow both unto Azariah eleven years in his fathers time, before he came to reign alone, which is not improbable, considering the enmity of the people against his father, and an interregnum in Israel of twelve years after Ieroboams death, these two numbers put together unto fourteen or fifteen of his reigning alone, make just 38. And that it was so, must necessarily be held, to come to the thirty eight of Azariah when Zechariah began. And it is most probable, that it was thus through contention in Israel, keeping Zechariah from the regall dignity a long time, because when he had gotten the crown, he kept it not long, viz. but sixe moneths, being slain openly by Shallum, neither did he enjoy it above one moneth, but was slain by Menahem, chap. 15. 8, 9, 10. So that it seemeth, under the warlike and victorious king Ieroboam, such as were employed as great captains, grew to that height of ambition, that they kept his sonne, haply being young, or of weak parts, under, that they might be regents, till at the last Menahem with his faction consented to set him up for king, Shallum another great commander not consenting, wherefore he taking opportunity came with his power, and assaulted and slew Zechariah, taking upon him to be king, which Menahem seeing, came with his forces and slew him.

Iunius.

Tostatus.

To return again to that, which is further set forth 2 King. 15. 2, 3, &c. his age also, and his mothers name is shewed, and his doing right, as his father had done, and the high places not being put down, and lastly, how he was smitten with the leprosie, died, and was buried. But because all this is more fully set forth, 2 Chron. 26. 4, 5. where he is said to have done that which was right in the sight of the Lord, as his father Amaziah had done, for he was intent to seek the Lord all the days of Zechariah that informed him. I will here take into that history, in which a doubt ariseth, who this Zechariah was, for he could not be that Zechary who was one of the small prophets, for his time agreeth not. Ierom saith, that he was the sonne of Zechariah the son of Iehoiadab, born after his father was dead, whom Joas caused to be stoned, and if it were he, as is not improbable, he was above 30 years old, when Vzziah began to reign, and so might continue many years to guide the young king aright. And in that time he is said to have prospered: first, against the Philistims, prevailing so, as that he brake down the wals of their strongest cities, Gath, Iabnes and Ashdod, and built cities there. It is not likely, that he did these things, so soon as he came to the crown: because he was then both young and tender, and found the kingdome in a poor estate, as it was left by his unhappy father. But after certain years, he having gotten much wealth, by Gods blessing upon him for his piety, began first with the Edomites that held Elath from him, as hath been already said. Then he went against the Philistims, but upon what occasion is not expressed, onely we may gather, from 2 King. 12. 17. that partly occasion was taken to fight with them about Gath, which David had formerly subdued and put under tribute, but towards the latter end of Joas his reign, who was grandfather to Vzziah, this Gath is said to have been taken by the Syrians, and most probably, their state declining, it came into the Philistims hands again: for Joas king of Israel overcame the Syrians so often, that they could not but hereby be made very weak, and unable to hold what they had formerly gotten. Therefore Vzziah now being strong, after he had dealt with the Edomites, setteth himself to recover this city also from the Philistims, and when they being overcome there refused to be tributaries unto him, he brake down their wall and pursuing them, who haply from other cities made head against him, he served their cities like wise, and so he came to break down the wals of Iabnes and Ashdod also. Partly that cruell inroad made into Iudah, both by Philistims and Arabians in the dayes of Ioram, his fathers great grandfather, recorded 2 Chron. 21. 16. (when they carried away his treasures, his children and his wives) might come into this kings remembrance, to be revenged upon both these peoples, v. 7. Gath, here said to be taken by him, and the wall to be broken first, was one of the five principall cities of the Philistims country, and of great strength by reason of the Giants there; for of this city was Goliath and four other of the sonnes of Anak, 2 Sam. 21. 19. Iabnes was another strong city of the Philistims by the sea side, not above three hours travell from Gath, according to Adrichomius. Ashdod was another of the 5. cities, formerly also strengthened by Giants, Iosh. 11. 22. and herein was the temple of Dagon, 1 Sam. 5. These

2 Kings. 15. 2,
3. 4.

2 Chron. 26. 4, 5.

Hieronym. de tradit. Hebr.

2 Chron. 26. 6.

Adrichom.

Josephus.

Junius.

Stephanus.

Hieronym.

Josephus.

Hieronym.

Junius.

2 Chron. 26. 10.

V. 11, 12.

Note.

V. 15.

Josephus.

V. 16.

three, Vzziah did not onely reduce to the state of villages, which are without wals, but also built in Ashdod and other parts of the Philistims countrey, defended cities for his people to dwell in, the better to contain the Philistims thus subdued in obedience. And it is said, v. 7. that God did help him herein, and not onely against the Philistims, but also against the Arabians, who joyned their forces of old with the Philistims against Judah, as hath been already said. And more particularly, these Arabians are said to be inhabitants of the plain of Gur, that is, near unto Egypt: for which cause it is said, v. 8. that his name was famous to the entering in of Egypt. Iosephus saith, he subdued all that way as farre as Egypt. And moreover, he is said to have prevailed against the Ammonites, as the vulgar Latin rendereth it, and the words following do intimate, v. 8. where it is said, the Ammonites brought him presents. And both are expressed by the same letters in Hebrew, but onely in the first place נ is set before י, it being written ימערני, in the next י after נ, it being written ימערני. Junius rendereth it indigenas, expounding it of such as dwelt dispersedly, and yet Judg. 10. 12. 11. 6. he calleth them Ammonites. Stephanus saith, that they were Arabians dwelling near the red sea; and Jerom, that Gur before spoken of, as the place of the other Arabians habitation, was Gerar, where Abraham had sometime sojourned. But it is most rightly understood of the Ammonites, there being onely a transposition of one letter. And all these peoples were borderers upon Judah, as Junius noteth, the Arabians upon the south, the Philistims upon the West, and the Ammonites upon the East. And it is said, that the Ammonites in token of subjection, brought him presents. Moreover he fortified Jerusalem with towers, even to the gate of the corner, and of the valley, &c. v. 9. In the dayes of Amaziah his father, the wals of Jerusalem next unto Syria were broken down by Joas, but now he reared them up again, saith Iosephus, and whatsoever decayes else there were, he repaired and fortified. Touching the limits, unto which, the corner gate, and the gate of the valley, it is before said, the corner gate, and the gate of Ephraim, chap. 25. 23. but that of the valley and of Ephraim, Jerom saith, are one and the same, and upon the corner] that is, where these two wals met. Junius rendereth the word translated corner, as a proper name, Mikzenah, and Neh. 3. 19. he expoundeth it, a tower in a most high place of the city of David, so called for the prerupt situation: but then it must not be read upon Mikzenah, but to it, he built towers as to the corner gate, and the gate of the valley, so to this tower, that is, as farre as was needfull, the vulgar Latin renders it, & reliquas in eodem muri latere, but without any ground in the originall, wherein are no such words.

He built towers also in the desert, &c. that is, saith Junius, of Arabia, which was full of pastures, for the more safe keeping of his cattell, where with he abounded, and he digged cisterns also, at which they might be watered. For he had many husbandmen, and vine dressers, for beloved husbandry, and it is said that he had them both in the mountains and the fields, rendered in vulgar Latin, Carmel, according to the Hebrew word here used, כרמל denoting fields most fruitful, as Carmel was, for that it is not to be understood of the place to properly called, appeareth, because the fruitfull Carmel was in the tribe of Issachar in the kingdom of Israel.

From hence he proceedeth to set forth the greatnesse of this kings forces, viz. 2600 Princes or Captains, under whom were of able warriors 370500 all well armed by the king, &c. But it is not to be thought, but that Vzziah prepared these great forces to goe forth to warre against the Philistians, Arabians, and Ammonites, before spoken of, although they are not mentioned till now. Thus it appeareth, how greatly he by Gods blessing increased in wealth and power: whilst he cleaved to Lord, that other kings may learn by his example to do likewise. Moreover he is said to have made engines by a singular art in Jerusalem, which he placed in the towers and the corners of the wall to shoot arrowes and great stones, which Iosephus doth not so truly relate, when he saith that he made them to break down wals of such cities as he besieged withall. And hitherto the well doing and prosperity of Vzziah, now followeth his foule falling and punishment. His great prosperity made him proud inso much that he went into the house of the Lord to offer incense, but Azariah the high Priest with his company resisted him and when he was angry, therefore therefore the Lord smote him with leprosie, &c. 2 Kings 15. 5. It is onely said, when the Lord smote the King so as that he was a leper to the day of his death, he dwelt in an house apart, and Iotham his sonne was set over the kings house, the cause and occasion being altogether omitted, wherefore in the Chronology this defect is supplied, and by Iosephus more fully, saying, He being puffed up with the possession of fading riches, let light by divine and ever endaring riches, the reverence of the divine majesty, and the keeping of his law; wherefore upon a certain solemn day, to shew that he was above the condition of other kings, and nearer to God by a peculiar superexcellency, in the sight of all the people hee entred into the Lords house to offer incense, and when Azariah the high Priest, with 80 other Priests withstood him, alleadging the law of God, which appointed the Priests only, the sonnes of Aaron to doe this, he waxing angry threatned them with death, and so persisted in his enterprize, untill that a terrible earthquake came, and a rent was made in the temple upward, through which the Sun-beame smote the wicked face of the king, and then presently the leprosie appeared. And at the same time another prodigy happened in a place called Eroge, before the city, halfe a mountaine Westward was pluckt away by the same Earthquake, and removed four furlongs off to the East part of the said mountain, damming up the way to the city, and with the ruines filling up the kings gardens. Thus the Lord miraculously shewed the greatnes of this his sin, and how highly he was displeased at it, that all men might learn by this example to keep their hearts humble and not be puffed by their great wealth, honour and prosperity. For the earthquake happening now, of which Iosephus speaketh, see also Zachariah 14. 5. although some that will have it the same with that spoken of, Amos 1. 1. doe hereupon deny it, because it was in Ieroboams time who died long before that Vzziah was smitten. But that which Amos speaketh of might be another, some yeares before this. For he that now was superiour to all men of those times in all these, when his heart was hereby lifted up, in an instant was brought to such an estate, that he was sequestred from the society of men, as unfit for his loathsome disease to live amongst them, having no liberty any more to dwell in his own royall palace, or to reign as king, or to come to the house of the Lord for this once carrying of himselfe to proudly there. Wolphius to aggravate his sin, whereby hee deserved to be thus punished, saith, that it was not only a breach of the law ratified with pain of death, Levit. 16. but also a confounding of the orders of men, which God had distinguished, that one should doe the office both of King and Priest, and that by him that was the head, whose part it was to keep every one within his own order: yea forso much as the Priest in offering incense typified Christ, it was a treading under foot of that sacred mystery for another to take upon him to do the same. Lastly to doe this in contempt of the grave admonitions of the High Priest being seconded by such a number of Gods Ministers, putting him in mind of the law of God forbidding it, and threatning him with the danger of sudden destruction, which by so doing, he should incur. Chrysostome also sheweth divers sinnes to have concurred in this one fact of his. 1. Ambition, in that he could not be content to enjoy the kingly dignity, but he must usurp that of the high Priest also. 2. Arrogancy, because he thought himselfe fit to execute both these high offices. 3. Pertinacy, in that he was not staid by the admonitions of the High Priest, but madly went on notwithstanding to doe that which he had conceived in his mind. 4. Humane folly, in that seeking to ascend to higher dignity, he fell from that which he had. 5. Humane viciousnes & pronenes to sin, in that having before done so worthily, he now fell so foully. 6. Impiety, in that he durst break into that holy place, which to come into was interdicted to all others, but the High Priest, from which piety in respect of the strict law of God against it, and so many venerable men endeavouring to keep him from it, should have held him back upon the leprosie arising in his face for this. Hugo well noteth, that the punishment was most futable to his sinne, in that as the High Priest wore a plate of gold upon his fore-head to adorne him when he offered incense, this proud king contrariwise was made to weare for ever the filthy mark of the leprosy upon his forehead to his perpetuall ignominy, and because he had so brazen a forehead, as without all shew of modesty or shame thus publickly to presume through

2 Kings 15. 5.

Iosephus.

Note.

Chrysost. Hom. de verb. E/sa.Hugo Card.

Note.

Jam. 4. 6.

V. 20.

Procop. in Esa. 6.

V. 22.

Junius.

Lyra.

2 Chron. 15. 6.
it is said, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Iudah.
Pellican.

V. 23.

his pride, he was compelled to cease from that by punishment making ashamed, which modesty could not make him to do. In this example is shewed, that when a man doth excellently, so as that he cometh into great grace with God, and the devill cannot prevail with him to draw him into any grosse sinne, yet he is not out of all danger of falling, and judgement therefore, if for the grace conferred upon him, he be lifted up in his heart: for God despiseth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. Again, it is pride, that God will not endure, to presume to execute a ministeriall office, in him that is not called thereunto. Lastly, who so seeketh to make himself glorious, shall have shame for glory, and instead of rising shall fall from the glory that he already hath, to be the vilest amongst men, as leprous persons were.

When the King was smitten with the leprosie, the high Priest with his assistants began by force to thrust him out of the temple, because no unclean person was to be suffered there; and he seeing a necessity resisted not, but departed and dwelt in an house alone to his dying day, as the Lord had appointed that all leprous persons should do, Levit. 13. 46. Procopius saith, that he would not go out of Ierusalem, as he ought to have done, but dwelt in an house there by himself, by which means the whole city was polluted and counted unclean, insomuch that the Lord would not then reveal himself to his prophets there, (Chrysost. also in Esay 6. saith, that the people were deprived of prophesie, because they expelled him not out of the city) and when after this kings death, Esa. 6. 1. Isaiah had a vision, v. 5. he crieth out, that he was unclean, and dwelt in the midst of a people polluted. But no such thing can be gathered from the words of the prophet, and it is rather the pollution of sin for which he crieth out, then of the leprosie. And because there is nothing said of this his refusall in the history, it is rather to be concluded, that he went out of the city, where an house might be had standing alone, which could hardly be in the city, where they stood in rowes, one being joyned to another. For the time, when this leprosie befell him, it cannot be, as some conjecture anno 25. of his reign, because his son Iotham ruled the court and judged the people, from this time forth to his dying day, whereas in that year he was yet unborn, seeing chap. 27. 1. he was but 25 when he began to reign after his fathers death, and his father reigned 52 years. And it is improbable which some others hold, that it was in the last year of his reign, both, because it is said, that when he was confirmed, his heart was lifted up, v. 16. and this most probably was some years before the end of his reign; and because he is said to have dwelt in an house apart to the day of his death, no mention being made of this happening to him so shortly after. It is therefore most probable, that he was smitten some years before he died, and if we shall pitch upon the particular year, it was anno 48 of his reign; because then he might most of all be said to have been confirmed, seeing Ahaz the sonne of Iotham was born that year, as appeareth chap. 28. 1. he was 20 years old when he began to reign, and his father reigned but 16 years, therefore he was born 4 years before Vzziah died. Most probably then, when he had not onely a sonne to succeed him, but a sonnes sonne to reign after him also, in a kingdome now so glorious and flourishing, his house being thus confirmed, he was lifted up with pride. And if this were the 2<sup>d</sup> year, Iotham his sonne was now 21, and so fit by his age to govern, when he was excluded.

The rest of the acts of Vzziah, Were Written by Esaiiah the sonne of Amos the Prophet. That is, saith Junius in the second Book of the Kings, and in the Book of his prophesie; but Lyra, in some book of his which is lost, and not in his prophesie, which is more probable, seeing in the Kings little is said of his acts, and lesse in Esay his prophesie. It is to be supposed to have been a book of annals written by Esay, as there were divers written by others, which were onely as Chronicles of other nations, and no canonical Scripture; thus also Pellican.

Then Vzziah died, and they buried him in the field of the Kings sepulchres, for they said, he is a leper. Therefore they laid him not into their sepulchers, but onely in the same field where their sepulchres were, in a place somewhat remote. Thus Vzziah was punished and abated for his presumption, both in life and death, and although we read not of his repentance, it may be hoped, that he repented, and so

God

God judged him here, but had mercy upon his soul, seeing he is not said to have fallen into any other sin but this onely.

The 15 year of Amaziah, &c. began Ieroboam the sonne of Ioash king of Israel to reign, &c. Chap. 15. 1. Azariah is said to have begun his reign over Iudah, anno 27. of Ieroboam, therefore, seeing Amaziah the father of Azariah reigned but 29 years, it seemeth rather that Ieroboam began anno 2<sup>d</sup> of his reign. But this doubt hath been already resolved, upon ch. 14. 21. he began to reign alone anno 15. of Amaziah, having reigned before together with his father twelve years, and he is said to have reigned over Israel 41 years, and to have been as wicked as the first Ieroboam, v. 24. Yet recovered the borders of Israel from the entering in of Hamath to the sea of the Wildernesse. Of Hamath see Numb. 13. 20. 34. 7. 8. both of the sea and Hamath, the sea being southward, and Hamath next to Damascus, the chief city of the Syrians northward. It is meant then, that he recovered from the Syrians all that which they had gotten from Israel farre and wide, coupling them up in a narrow compasse. Rabanus saith, that the whole latitude of the Syrians countrey is hereby set forth, and that they over-ran all this, dealing by the Syrians, as they dealt by Israel.

And this he did by the prophesying of Ionah the Prophet, the sonne of Amittai, who was of Gath Hopher. This Ionah, by the consent of all Expositours, was that Ionah, who wrote the prophesie called Ionah, for he also is said to be the sonne of Amittai. Whereas some will have him to be the widowes sonne of Sareptah, but called the sonne of Amittai, signifying truth, because when Elijah had restored him being dead to life, she said, she knew now that the word of God in his mouth was true: this is improbable, because he was a Sidonian, this an Hebrew, Ionah 2. 9. and Amittai is not an appellative, but a proper name, and this was of Gath-Hopher in the tribe of Zabulon, having the addition of Hopher, to distinguish it from Gath in Palestine, he of Sareptah. And lastly, since that time in the dayes of Ahab passed 80 years before this. In Ahabs five years, in Ahaziah's two, Ioram's twelve, Jehu twenty eight, Jehobaz 17. Ioas 16. unto which adde his age, when he was restored to life, haply ten or twelve, and if he were the man, he must be 90 years old at the least, when Ieroboam began to reign; which is not probable. And as Ieroboam is said to have done this, by the encouragement of Ionah, for he did it according to the word of the Lord by him, so the motive that moved the Lord to make him the instrument of this work, is shewed to be, that he saw the affliction of Israel, and that there was none shut up or left in Israel, &c. It was not his or the Israelites well doing, whereby he was moved, but his meer pity and mercy, and as is added v. 27. he had not yet said, that he would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven. For the phrase [there were none shut up or left] see the like Deut. 32. 36. it is meant, according to Vatablus, that the oppressions wherewith the Syrians oppressed the Israelites, were so universall, that none escaped their fury, no not such as were shut up in the strongest holds, nor the poorest sort of people left out as the refuse to their mercy. It doth not then argue, that our wayes are well pleasing to God at all times, when we arise out of misery, and our state is changed from worse to better: for this may be onely through pity in God to the miserable, when he thinketh them to have been afflicted already enough for one time, and not because they are bettered. And when affliction is taken off without amendment, it is to be feared, that farre greater judgements shall ere long be inflicted, as it happened to this people, chap. 17. when they fell into the hands of the Assyrians, and before that by factions amongst themselves, and by the Assyrians doing some mischief, ch. 15.

For the rest of the acts of Ieroboam, and how he recovered Damascus and Hamath to Iudah, they are written, &c. Iudah is here put for Israel, a part most worthy for the whole, as also hath been noted sometime before, and he is said to have recovered them, because David long ago subduing the Syrians of Damascus, laid it to his kingdom, but since the Syrians had again taken it, and Hamath and many other places properly belonging to the kingdom of Israel.

2 King. 14.

V. 25.

Epiph.
Hieronym.

V. 26.

V. 27.

Vatablus.
Nota.

V. 28.

2 Sam. 8. 5.

C H A P. XV.

THe history of Azariah or Uzziah contained in the seven former verses being already explained, as being but the brieft of that which is more largely set forth, 2 Chron. 26. and the question arising about his beginning, Anno 27. of Ieroboam resolved, 2 Kings 14. 21, 22. now followeth the time of the next kings beginning to reign in Israel, viz. of Zachariah the sonne of Ieroboam, who is said to have reigned Anno 38 of Azariah 6 months, where again if a question bee made how this could be, seeing Azariah began Anno 27 of Ieroboam, and from thence to the end of his reign were onely 14 yeares, see the resolution; also 2 King. 14. 21, 22. There was an interregnum as some think, during the minority of Zechariah, when the kingdome was governed by regents, whereof Shallum was one. And that we might know the cause of his so short a reign, v. 9. he is said to have followed Ieroboam in sinning, and therefore he was rewarded with death, which he suffered at the hands of Shallum the sonne of Iabeesh, who having slain him openly, taigned in his stead. Iosephus calleth him the sonne of Iothan, the kings friend. Lysa saith, he was one greatly increased with the kings riches, and hereby gotten to great favour with the people, as he might well be by his liberality and courtesie towards them, wherefore presuming upon their good will, he openly slew the king, no man resisting him. Thus Wolphius saith, Lysa hath it; but indeed he speaketh not of his riches, onely he saith, that he was one of the Princes who were regents after Ieroboam, till Zachary was made king, and so most probably was in great authority, and therefore committed this murder openly, the people for the most part consenting, and being ready to receive him for their king, in his stead. And it appeareth, that (although in respect of the divine providence; his living in the sinne of Ieroboam was the cause of this his untimely cutting off) Shallum did not slay him for this, because he also followed Ieroboam, but for his tyranny and ill governing of the kingdome, which made the people weary of him, being moved also by ambition to preferre himselfe, as Tostatus hath it.

The time also being now come, of which the Lord had spoken before in favour of Iehu his zealous proceedings, as is said, v. 1. that his children should sit upon the throne of Israel unto the fourth generation, for Iehobaz was the first, Ioaish the second, Ieroboam the third, and Zechary the fourth. However therefore the Lord had hitherto forbore to execute his judgements upon these idolatrous kings, the race of Iehu, and their idolatrous subjects for his words sake, that it might be verified, and for many yeares in the reignes of the two last, Ieroboam and Ioaish had made them prosperous, that they might subsist till Zachariah the fourth, yet he would not now suffer them in their wickednesse any longer, but brake out against them in his fierce wrath by judgement after judgement, till they were utterly destroyed. Note hence (because the first times of Iehu and his race were miserable, the kingdome being then brought by Hazael and his Syrians to nothing, but the following times of Ioaish and Ieroboam prosperous; although they were as wicked as their progenitours, but now that mercy being abused, and their hearts not hereby moved to turn from their sins, although they had Elishah, Jonah and other Prophets among them to improve it, misery followeth misery, as one wave of the sea another without end) note I say that no way is left by God unattempted to make sinfull man to turn unto him, for first he seeketh to engage by mercy, as hee did Iehu in raising him to kingly dignity, and making a promise unto him, then mercy not working, he sought to terrifie them by judgements, after this out of his compassion he returned in much mercy again, and gave them victory over their enemies, lastly, this not taking any effect, he cast them quite off, leaving them for a time to imbrue their hands in the blood of one another, and then giving them over into their enemies hands, the Assyrians. 2. Note that the greatest prosperity is followed with the greatest misery, when there is no reformation made therefore, that none may trust to present or long continued prosperity

V. 8.

V. 10.
Iosephus.
Lysa.Wolphius.

V. 11.

Note.

prosperity, or be hereby made bold to go on in sin without feare of judgement.

Shallum having gotten the kingdome enjoyed it onely one month, and then he was slain by Menahem the son of Gadi coming from Thirza; and taking the kingdome upon him. For although Zechariah for his idolatry was worthy to dye, and the time appointed by God was come, to translate the kingdome from the family of Iehu to another, yet he was a wicked conspiratour against his lawfull king, and a murtherer, and therefore vengeance from God soon cut him off, as it doth likewise all such as attain to royall dignity by bloodshed, according to that saying;

Ad generum Cereis sine cade & sanguine pauci

Descendunt reges, & sicca morte tyranni.

Menahem is said to have come from Thirzah to Samaria, where he slew Shallum, that is six miles; of Thirzah, see Iosh. 12. 24. where the king of Thirzah is said to have been slain by Ioshuah, arguing it to have been a great city, and here it seemeth Menahem gathered his army, and so came against Shallum, when he heard, that he had slain Zechariah his master. From Samaria, when he had thus gotten the kingdom, he went to Thipsah, being also six miles, the vulgar Latin renders it also Thirzah, but in Hebrew and Chaldee it is Thipsah, another Town not farre off Thirza. Iosephus saith, that Menahem was captain of the Army at Thirzah, which was once the Metropolis of the kingdom, for there Ieroboam began to reign and his successours, till that Omri translated the seat of the kingdom to Samaria. He therefore now that Zachariah his master was dead, thinking that he had as good right to succeed him as Shallum, who had wickedly conspired against him, and slain him; went with his army against him, &c. then hearing happily that the men of Thipsah would not receive him for king, he went against them, and when they shut their gates against him, he fell into a rage against them, and breaking in, smote whatsoever was therein, and all the borders thereof from Thirzah, and he ripped up the women great with child.] Why they would not open unto him some conjecture, the reason to be, because they had given their faith to Shallum before, some because they had seen some experience of his cruelty, when he lived with his army near unto them at Thirzah, but upon what occasion soever, he practised this barbarous cruelty amongst them, that other cities being terrified might not dare to withstand him. Iosephus speaking hereof, saith, that he spared not the tender age, taking liberty to doe that which was not lawfull towards Hebrewes, being overcome. But he mentioneth not his ripping up of women with child, as abhorring to tell of such unheard of cruelty, amongst the men of his nation. Some saith Volfphius expound it by bulwarks made like mountains, as if it had been meant, that he brake them open, because הרים signifieth mountains, but the word here used is הריות which is never rendred other wise, but gravide, and so the Septuagint and Chaldee. This was horrible cruelty on his part, but on Gods a just judgement for their foule sins, in which they went on so long in impenitency, that others may beware.

In the 39 of Azariah he began his reign, and reigned ten years, &c.] Although he were a most cruell tyrant, yet God suffered him to continue thus long to aggravate his own misery, and the misery of this wicked people, for he going on, as his predecessours had done, ever since the first beginning of this kingdome in Ieroboam, suffered by Phul king of Assyria, who came against his land, and although he made his peace with a great summe of money, that he might reign under him, which he exacted of his subjects, even a thousand talents of silver, which was above 100000 pound, that is, 187500 pound, yet he was brought thus to live basely and poorly all his dayes. This Phul is said to be king of Assyria, or of Babylon, for these names are sometime confounded, because Babylon was the chiefe city of that kingdome. He was called Phul Belochus, who succeeded Sardanapalus, and gave part of his kingdome to Arbaces, viz. the Medes and Persians, keeping to himselfe Babylon and Nineveh, and he was the first Assyrian king, that ever came against Israel; yet some think that he came not against Menahem, but being called by him, fearing for his cruelty to be deposed from the kingdome, which he had usurped, and that the money here spoken of was not given once only, but as a yearly tribute,

V. 13, 14.

Note.

Patriarchs travels.

Iosephus.

V. 16.

Iosephus.

Volfphius.

V. 17.

V. 18.

V. 19.

Tostatus.

tribute, grounding upon Sept. Sixti, where it is read, all his dayes came Phull, and he gave him 1000 talents, which reading is followed by Tostatus, and because Tiglathpilesar his sonne came againe against Israel, when after the death of Menahem and his sonne, this tribute was paid no more, v. 29. But it is said expressly, 1 Chron. 5. 26. that God stirred up Phull and Tiglathpilesar to come against Israel for their sinnes, and therefore when Tiglathpilesar came, there being no word spoken of tribute denied, as the cause; this appears to be a meer invention, and touching these words [all his dayes] they are erroneously in that translation taken from v. 18. and transposed to v. 19. farre from their place. And if Phull had come by the procurement of Menahem, it would have been so said as well as when Tiglathpilesar came in the dayes of Ahaz, 2 Chron. 28. 16. and hee should hardly have raised such an huge summe from such a multitude of wealthy men, as it is said, 50 shekels of each man, for so to the raising of it about 60000 men, must be seised, seeing 50 shekels come but to three pound two shillings six pence; and it is incredible, that so much should be paid yearly out of so little, and now to poore a kingdome. Therefore I conclude, that this was only once paid, Phull happily promising hereupon, if there were any rebellion to be assistant unto him, which might be the cause that he continued 10 years, and then died a naturall death, leaving his kingdome to his sonne after him.

V. 23.

In the 50 yeare of Azariah began Pekahiah the sonne of Menahem to reign over Israel, &c. Whereas Menahem is said to have begun, anno 39. and to have reigned 10 yeare, it is to be understood, 10 compleat, the time which he reigned above, before and after, being a few odde dayes, not being here reckoned. Of Pekahiah nothing is said, but that he went on in the sinne of Ieroboam, and reigned but two yeares, being slain by Pekah the sonne of Remaliah, and Argob and Arie, and with him 50 men of the children of Gilead, &c. This Pekah is said to have been his Captain, Hebr. שר צבא being called from the word signifying three, either because he was the third man of the kingdome according to some, or had command over the third part of the army, called the rereward according to others; who also say that the valiantest men were here placed to uphold the battell, when the others quailed.

V. 25.

Argob and Arie are thought by Lyra to be no men, but places near unto the Palace, where this murder was done, wherefore in the vulgar Latin it is rendered [near unto Argob and Arie] but for Arie, saith he, Hebr. it is Arie, signifying a Lion, by which the place was named by reason of a golden Lion standing therein for ornament, and this out of R. Solomon. And this is most probable, because the particule אשר set before Argob and before Arie, as it sheweth the Accusative case, so it sometime signifieth in or super, adversus or ad; that is, above, over against, or at. Although some think two speciall men to be hereby meant, who together with the 50 Gileadites conspired with him. But the more probable opinion is, that these were slain together with the king in taking his part, as being in speciall favour with him, and then at a feast. For so Iosephus telling this history saith, he was slaine at a feast.

Lyra.

Wolphius.

Iosephus.

V. 27.

The 52 yeare of Azariah began Pekah the sonne of Remaliah to reign over Israel, 20 yeares. Hee was suffered 20 yeares in the kingdome, which hee came to by blood, although a wicked idolater also; but then his blood was required therefore, a conspiracy being likewise made against him by Hosheah, and hee being by him slain, v. 30. Neither did he escape Gods punishing hand in the mean season, for Tiglath Pilesar king of Assyria came and took from him Hijon, and Abel Beth Maacah, &c. and carried the inhabitants thereof into Assyria. Besides the places here said to be taken, he took the countries of the two tribes and an halfe also, viz. of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasseh on the other side of Iordan, which were most fruitfull, and on this side Galilee, the whole land of Nephtali, so that he bereft him of three tribes and an halfe, and so left him but a poor king. The cities here named were the uttermost bounds of the kingdom of Israel, as wee may see touching Hijon, 2 Chron. 16. 4. and touching Abel Beth-maacah, 2 Sam. 10. 14. Touching the other places here named, Ianaah was a border of the tribe of Ephraim.

1 Chron. 5. 26.
Lyra.

Jesb. 16. 6.

Jesb. 19. 36, 37.

Chadesh was a city of Galilee in the tribe of Nephtali, and so was Hazor, although though there were other cities of the same name of the tribe of Judah, Gilead was that, where the two tribes and an halfe dwelt. Galilee was both superiour called Galilee of the Gentiles, and inferiour; both which are greatly praised by Iosephus not ony for fertility, but for the great number of inhabitants there maintained. Whereas they are said here onely to have been carried into Assyria. 1 Chron. 5. 26. the places in Assyria to which, are more particularly named, Chalah, Chabor, and Haram and Nehargozan, where they abide to this day; but of these cities see more upon 2 Kings 17. 6. where the carrying away of the whole kingdome is spoken of. Thus although the Lord suffered long the wickednesse of the Israelitish kings and their people, viz. 220 years yet when after divers, corrections and admonitions, in this long time they being nothing amended shewed themselves to be incorrigible, he sent a judgment by the Assyrians, that swept away a great part of them at the first, and then all to live for ever after in perpetuall captivity and misery, and this will be the end of any nation, that in like manner abuseth his long continued patience, to the hardening of themselves the more in sin.

Then a conspiracy being made against Pekah, Hosheah smote him so that he slew him, and reigned in his stead Anno 20 of Iotham.] Here because Iotham reigned onely 16 years, v. 33. and began but Anno 2 of Pekah, who reigned 20 yeares; Expositours are troubled about reconciling this. Iunius saith, that it is said, in the 20 year of Iotham, as meant onely of the 20 year from the time that he began to reign, 4 yeares also of Ahaz his son being now expired, wherefore he rendreth it 20 yeares from the kingdom of Iotham begun, so like wise Wolfius having first confuted two other opinions. 1. That to make up the number of 20, it must be understood, that 4 yeares are reckoned here to Iotham of his fathers life, because after the time that he was a leper, Iotham governed all, but this makes the chronologie uncertain. 2. That Ahaz being a wicked king is thought unworthy to be named in counting the beginning of any kings reign, and therefore he that was dead is rather mentioned, then this wicked king, that was living, but forso much as the sacred history hath hitherto reckoned by the wicked kings, as well as by the godly, it were strange, if for this reason he that began to reign in the fourth or fifth of Ahaz, should be said to begin the 20. of Iotham, yet Lyra indifferently followeth either this, as being the solution of R. Solom. or the other already rejected by Wolfius touching four yeares expired, when he began to reign alone. But I marvel, that he considered not, how ch. 17. 1. the time of Hosheah is reckoned by the yeares of Ahaz also, which sheweth, that the year of his reign, when Hoshea began, is not passed over in silence for his malice or wickednesse, but because the beginning of his reign was not yet spoken of, but long after ch. 16. 1. the whole history of Iotham, his fathers reign coming between this and it; and it is not the manner of the sacred history to reckon by the reign of any king so long before his time comes to be set forth, but by the nearest, which here is Iotham, v. 32. By the twenty year of Iotham, I conclude then, is meant the 20 from the time that he began, he being now dead four yeares before Hoshea his reign; who this Hoshea was it is not said, but Iosephus saith it was one of his familiar friends, and most probably by himself preferred. And it was just with God, that Pekah, who had been false to his lord and master, under whom he had been in an honourable place, should be likewise dealt withall by one preferred by him.

The second year of Pekah the sonne of Remalish, began Iotham to reigne over Judah, &c. ] The history of Iotham being intermitted from v. 7. hitherto ( that the kings of Israel, who began to reign before him, might be shewed together, Zechariah, Shallum, Menabem, Pekabiah, and Pekah ) is now again prosecuted, his age, his mothers name, and the time of his reign being the wed. Whereas he is said to have begun the second year of Pekah, who reigned twenty yeares, and yet Hosheah that succeeded Pekah, began twenty yeares after the beginning of Iotham reign, it is to be understood, that the second year of Pekah was but new begun, and so Pekah being dead, nineteen yeares had passed from the beginning of Iotham reign, and in the beginning of the next, which was the twenty, Hosheah began. Iotham is said to have done that which was right in the sight of the Lord, as Vzziah his father.

2 Chron.

Iosephus.

Note.

V. 30.

Iunius.Wolfius.Lyra.Iosephus.

V. 32.

V. 33.

V. 34.

2 Chron. 27.
Josephus.

V. 35.

Vatab'us.
Rabanus.
Lyra.

2 Chron. 27. 3.
Furnius.

V. 5.

V. 36.

V. 37.

2 Cron. 27. 3. it is added, that he went not into the temple, as his father had done, but the people corrupted themselves. Iosephus praiseth him for a right godly and excellent prince, neither doth the Scripture speak otherwise but very well of him, and of his deeds for the good of the church and kingdome, and of Gods blessing him therefore. Which maketh against the people, in that having so godly a king, and some famous prophets, who were of that time, as Isaiah, Hoseah, and Michah, yet they were corrupt. 2 King. 15. 35. No more is said, but as in the time of Vzziah, Amaziah, and Ioash, the people sacrificed still in the high places. This therefore, how ever tolerated hitherto, is thus censured as a corruption in the service of God, whereby he was much offended, seeing all sacrifices were now to be offered in the temple only, which Solomon built, of which I have spoken often before, see upon 1 King. 15. 9, 10. And therefore the Lord to shew his dislike, raised up adversaries against Israel, Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah v. 37. most probably towards the latter end of the reign of Iotham, so as that he lived not to see their coming, but was before in mercy taken away, and in the dayes of his wicked sonne Ahaz they came, making preparation only in Iothams time, ch. 16. 5. But because Esay prophesying in Iothams time, speaketh against Judah, as hearing but not understanding Esa. 6. 9. it seemeth, as Ierom also thinketh, that by these words, they corrupted themselves, is not onely meant by offering in high places, but also falling to idolatry, whereunto they saw Ahaz the young prince then inclining. The piety of Iotham is further set forth v. 35. he built the upper gate of the house of the Lord. Whatsoever his subjects did (because it seemeth that they could not yet be restrained) in sacrificing upon high places, he applyeth himself to beautifie yet more the house of the Lord. The Septuagint, for upper gate, have the high gate, portam excelsam, and so it is in the Chronicles. This, Vatablus saith, was the East gate; Rabanus, the gate called beautifull, Ast. 3. which Lyra well confuteth, because the temple standing then was burnt down long before. But about this we need not contend, it was most probably, the highest and most magnificent gate of the temple, whereby it was most adorned outwardly, but now, it being above 200 years since Solomon built it, and in decay, Iotham out of his piety rebuilt it, for the honour of God, and that the people might be the rather drawn from high places, to the temple. 2 Chron. 27. 3. and in the wall of the hill he built very much. That is, saith Iunius, behinde the temple Westward, where the ground was highest, betwene the brook of Gihon and the fish-gate. The vulgar Latin renders it, in the wall of Ophel, the Hebrew word being retained, which signifieth, high, or defended, or a tower, he built the wals of an high tower, for the defence of the city. v. 4. He built also cities in the mountainous places of Iudah, and in the plains, pallaces and towers. In the vulgar Latin, castles and towers, which were also for the defence of other parts of the kingdome.

He also fought against the king of the Ammonites and prevailed, so that they gave unto him 100 talents of silver, &c. ] Thus likewise Vzziah his father did before, ch. 26. 8. and the Ammonites gave him gifts, that is, as being subjected by him, they paid tribute: but now refusing so to do any more, Iotham by war compelleth them again unto it. And his power to do all these things, is ascribed to his piety towards God, v. 6. and this is the onely way for any king to prosper, as many examples more, both in the holy scriptures and other histories do shew.

Concluding the history of Iotham, he saith, the rest of his acts, &c. ] and in those dayes the Lord began to send Rezin the king of Syria, &c. ] That is, at the latter end of his reign, they began to prepare to come, and in the time of Ahaz his son, they came, as appeareth chap. 16. 5. as hath been already shewed, as also the cause, the signes of the people; notwithstanding the good King and Prophets, which they had most famous amongst them.

CHAP. XVI.

A Haz the sonne of Iotham now succeedeth him being dead, Anno 17. of Pekab, and followed not David but the wicked kings of Israel, making his son to goe through the fire, after the abominable manner of the heathen. He began his reign at 20 and reigned 16 yeares, 2 Chron 28. 2, 3. He made images to Baal, and burnt incense in the valley of the sonnes of Hinnom, and burnt his sonnes with fire. Of this way of worshipping idols, see before, upon Levit. 18. 21. and the manner of it. Volphius from the time that he reigned, which was as long as his father had done before, noteth a proportion of time held in punishing the wickednesse of Judah answerable to that, wherein they had such meanes of grace, and enjoyed prosperity; for 2 Chron. 28. all his time was full of oppressions, and miseries. And likewise we that have so long prospered may justly feare intollerable and long protracted miseries to come upon us for our sins, unless by speedy repentance we prevent them.

Then Rezin King of Syria, and Pekab king of Israel came against Jerusalem, and besieged Ahaz, but could not prevaile. 2 Chron. 28. 5. it is said, wherefore the Lord delivered him into the hands of the king of Syria, who smote him and carried away captive a great multitude to Damascus, and also into the hands of the king of Israel, who slew 120000 in one day, &c. Betwixt these there seemeth to be a manifest contradiction, so if they prevailed not, how was Ahaz delivered into the Syrians hands, &c. Iosephus saith, that coming first together against Jerusalem, they could not prevaile for the great strength of that city, but then the king of Syria turning himselfe to Ellatha, which was a city taken away from the Syrians before by Azariah, 2 Kings 14. 21. he took it; and having slain, he should have said, rooted out the Jewes who dwelt there, v. 5. he placed Syrians in their stead, thus returning into his own country, and for Ellatha, he hath Aila by the red sea. Then the king of Judah understanding that the Syrians were departed because hee thought himselfe of strength sufficient to deal with the King of Israel, went out to fight with him with a great army, but doing it in contempt of God, whom he had forsaken, the king of Israel prevailed against him and slew of his men 120000. and carried away captive an incredible multitude, the Chronicles saith, 200000 women and children. And if things were done in this order, both these histories agree very well together, the Chronicles only supplying that, which was wanting in the Kings. Ierom, and after him Procopius, and Theodores say, that one warre made by the Syrians and Israelites severally is set forth in the Chronicles, and another after this, their forces being joyned together, set forth in Kings, and this agreeth with the Hebrew, Chron. 2. 2. and is followed by Dionysius and others. And this is most consonant with the sacred history, which saith, that Rezin the king of Syria smote him, whereas if nothing be meant, but that he smote the Jewes in Ellathah, it were not so properly spoken, seeing he smote not him there, but some of his subjects; he being in the mean while in Jerusalem with his army cut of his danger. Moreover when Rezin and Pekab king of Israel besieged Jerusalem, it is said that Ahaz sent for help into Assyria against them, and that the king of Assyria came and took Damascus, the chief city of Rezin and slew him, wherefore he had no time then by the way as he returned from Jerusalem to fight against another city, and to take it, and to remove the old inhabitants, and to bring in new, but rather hearing of the coming of the king of Assyria against his country, he hastened thither to defend it. And see the taking of Ellatha and restoring it to his dominions could not be at that time, but at some other before it, although it be mentioned after the siege and fighting against Jerusalem, v. 6. and said to have been done at that time, for these words [at that time] may be expounded generally of the time when Rezin had power over the king of Judah for his finnes, which was from the very beginning of his reigne, and and so Chron. Hebr. saith, Anno 17. of Pekab, this was done.

If it shall seem strange that the king of Israel should joyn with heathens against Judah, it may be conceived that Ahaz kept correspondency with the king of Assyria,

V. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Volphius.
Note.V 5.
1 Chron. 28. 5.Iosephus.Procop.
Hieron. 2. in Esa
7. Theod. in 2
Chron. 28.
Hebr. Chron.
*Dionysius.*2 Kings 16. 7.

syria, who was the great enemy of Israel, and therefore the king of Israel was easily brought to joyn with the king of Syria against him, to take him away, and to set another king in his room, who if the king of Assyria should come again, might be an help unto them, and not ready to joyn with him their common enemy, as Ahaz was, which is expressed Esa. 7. 6. where this coming against Jerusalem by these two kings, is more fully set forth, saying; Let us joyn Iudah to us, and set over it for king the sonne of Tabeal. For the Syrians, if it shall seem strange, that they who were alwayes so great enemies to Israel, agree now to make one army together with them, it is to be understood, that in the dayes of Ioash and of Jeroboam they were so beaten, that they were glad to live quietly by the Israelites, and from cessation of armes, it is no marvail that they grew into such amity, as that they were now as one people confederate together, especially being also idolaters alike. Whereas Israel being idolatrous, as Iudah, yet prevaileth against Iudah, this is nothing strange, if we consider Ioash before prevailing against Amaziab, and the kings of Assyria against them both. For God useth oftentimes some most wicked, as his rods against others to correct them, and then casteth these rods also into the fire, as he did the Assyrian kings, when by them he had scourged Israel.

Now forsomuch as it appeareth by that which hath been said, that the history touching Gods delivering of Ahaz into the hands of Rezin, and then of Pekah king of Israel, set forth 2 Chron. 28. went before that of their joyntly coming together against Jerusalem, I will proceed in the explication of this first, and then return again to 2 King. 16. The king of Syria first coming against Ahaz, is said to have smitten him, and to have carried away captive a great multitude, that is, to have gotten the victory, and to have taken many prisoners, which yielded to his mercy: for he is smitten by the enemy, and into his hands he is delivered, whose forces are subdued. And this most probably was done about Ellathah, for which Rezin contended at this time, and so these captives were the inhabitants of Ellathah, who are said to have been carried away, and others from Syria brought to dwell in their place, 2 King. 16. 6. Then the king of Israel came also and prevailed against him, and smote him with a great stroke. This being shewed in generall, v. 6. the number of his forces slain by the king of Israel, is particularly declared, viz. 120000 in one day, and then the number by him carried away captive, v. 8. and before that what men of note were smitten. v. 7. Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim smote Maaseiah the Kings son. For whom Ierom, qu. Hebr. hath the sonne of Molech, that is, one, as he thinketh, so called, because he was most earnestly addicted to the worship of Molech, the idol whom Ahaz served. He smote also Hazricham governor of the kings house, and Elkana the second to the king, and all this God did against him and his people, because they had forsaken the Lord, as is expressed v. 6. Whatsoever was the quarrell that their enemies had against them, God in whose power it is only to give victory, made them victorious for this cause, and the Israelites to sustain so great slaughters, of the like to which in the reign of Amaziab, see also chap. 25. Whilest the Israelites were carrying away captive that great multitude of women and children, which they had taken, Oded a prophet of the Lord came before them, as they were entering into Samaria, &c. v. 9. the vulgar Latin hath it, Obed, &c. Lyra saith, that he dwelt not in Samaria, but came out of Iudah, so like wile Ierom according to the Hebrew traditions saying, that Oded came to Samaria, for he was of Iudah, as being that Oded who was father to Azariah, that prophesied to Asa, 2 Chron. 15. 1. But how far from truth the Hebrew traditions are herein appeareth, because from Asa till this time, passed 300 years, and Oded was then father to a son that prophesied. To leave this Oded then, as unknown any more, then by his name, let us see what he saith. Behold, the Lord being angry with Iudah, hath delivered them into your hands, and ye have heinously slain them, so that your cruelty reacheth up to heaven. Moreover, ye mean to make them servants and handmaids unto you, which is not needfull to be done, for ye have sinned in this matter against the Lord your God. So the vulgar Latin. But Iunius more according to the Hebrew, are there not amongst you, amongst you I say, onely sinners against the Lord your God? Hebr. verbatim, annon vobis solum, vobiscum peccata, &c. that is, have not

2 Chron. 28. 5.

Hieronym. qu.
Hebr.

Lyra.

Hieronym. trad.
Hebr.

not ye sinnes enough of your own, only against God, to pull down his judgements upon you, that you will by more cruelty thus against your brethren of Iudah, encrease the number of them? He would not have them to think, because God had now given them the victory for the sinnes of Iudah, that they were better accepted of before him, for even they had sinned as grievously also, and therefore ought not thus to insult over their distressed brethren, lest that hereby God should be provoked against them also, but restore again their captives.

At this saying, there were certain men of Ephraim of the chief, that were so moved, as that they stood against the army, and forbade them to bring in the captives, which did hereupon forbear, and then they having fed and clothed the naked, &c. carried the feeble amongst them upon their own beasts unto Iericho, and delivered them to their brethren; so mightily did the word of God in the mouth of the Prophet work upon them, although he used not the Lords name unto them, as Ierom noteth, because he thought them for their idolatries unworthy.

At that time Abaz sent to the Kings of Assyria desiring aid. Moreover the Edomites came, and the Philistims, &c. This of sending for help to Assyria, is more fully set forth, 2 King. 16. 5. 7. When Rezin king of Syria, and Pekab king of Israel came against Ierusalem and besieged it, Abaz sent to Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, to help him against them. Then he took the silver and gold in the Lords house, and in the Kings treasury, and sent a present unto him, who thereupon came against Damascus the chief city of Syria, and took it, and slew the king, who doubtlesse hearing of his coming, hastened from the siege of Ierusalem to defend his own country. This is more amply set forth Esa. 7. where it is shewed, what fear came upon Abaz and the men of Iudah, when they heard of the coming of these two kings against them, and that the prophet was sent unto Abaz, to tell him, that they should be able to do nothing against Ierusalem, and therefore he biddeth him not to fear them. And then he giveth a signe of a Virgins conceiving and bearing a sonne, extending his prophesie to a farre greater comfort to come after wards by the birth of Christ. And to comfort and confirm the men of Iudah the more for the present, he foretelleth of the destruction of both these kings in a short time, viz. before a childe now born, should have knowledge to refuse the evil and to chuse the good, as indeed it fell out, because Rezin was slain forthwith, and Pekab in the twenty year of his reign by Hosheah, who usurped the kingdome, and at this time he was upon his 18. year at the least. And chap. 8. 4. that as those two kings had come before severally, and carried away rich spoils out of Iudah, so from Damascus in Syria and Samaria in the land of Israel, should the like spoils be carried by the king of Assyria, before the childe then born should be able to say (my father.) How the judgement against Rezin was executed, is shewed here v. 9. but against Israel how, it is not said, but because Esa. speaketh hereof also, it is certain, that it was fulfilled, and Iosephus saith expressly, that Tiglath-pileser carried away a great multitude of captives out of the land of Israel, having wasted first the country, and Chron. Hebr. that then the golden calf in Dan was carried away by the Assyrian.

For the beginning of this warre made by the two Kings against Ierusalem, it is likely, that having severally invaded the land of Iudah the yeare before, and prevailed, they thought, that if with their forces united they should march thither againe, they might take the chiefe city it selfe, Ierusalem. Wherefore they attempt it, but in vaine, although Abaz for his idolatry deserved to be given into their hands. For if they could have prevailed, as is shewed, Esa. 7. they would have quite taken away Abaz and his seed, and have set up for King the sonne of Tabeal, that is, some great man of Syria, which God would not suffer for his promise sake unto David, that he would alwaies leave unto him a light in Israel. Therefore to prevent this, Esa. with his sonne Sheuriasub is sent to Abaz, as was before said. But the wicked King not beleeving him, trusted rather to an arme of flesh and sent to the King of Assyria, hiring him with great treasure to come and helpe him. Then he being allured by so great a gift, hastened with his army against Damascus, as hath been already shewed, thus causing the Assyrian forces to leave the siege of Ierusalem, and to returne to their owne; and it is most probable, that

2 Chron. 28. 12, 13.

V. 16.
2 King. 16. 5. 7.

V. 8, 9.

Iosephus.
Chron. Hebr.
6. 22.

V. 10.

2 Chron. 28. 20, 21.

Futius.

Lyra.

Hugo Card.

Glos. ordin.

the King of Israel did also the like, whereby Ahaz being freed from their danger went to Tiglathpilesar to Damascus to congratulate his victory, and there seeing a great and glorious altar, upon which those heathens sacrificed to their idols, he sent the patterne of it to Jerusalem, commanding Uriah the priest to make the like against his returne, &c. But before we come to this, a doubt is to be resolved: for whereas it is here said, that Tiglathpilesar came against Damascus and slew Rezin the King, and depopulated the countrey of Pekah, and carried away many captives, as hath beene already shewed, this being by Hebr. Chron. the second captivity of the Israelites, which was a great help to Ahaz King of Iudah, 2 Chron. 28. 20. it is said, that Tiglathpilesar coming to Ahaz streightened him, and confirmed him not, and v. 21. although he gave great treasures to him out of the Lords house, &c. yet he holpe him not. Sol. When he had at his request gone against the two kings his enemies, whereby, they were compelled to withdraw their forces from Jerusalem, he did him more hurt after this, then he had done him good herein, by coming into and pillaging his countrey and putting him in feare of his owne life also, which is intimated, 2 King. 16. 18. where it is said, that Ahaz removed the covering of the Sabbath, &c. from the house of the Lord for feare of the king of Assyria, so that this king was then in Jerusalem, and made great havock there amongst Ahaz his people, and he was in continuall feare of his breaking into his pallace, so Iunius. But it is not said he did these things Hebr. for feare, but מִפְּנֵי מֶלֶךְ אֲשׁוּר before the face of the king of Assyria, which by Lyra is expounded, to please him by shewing, that he had left worshipping of the Lord, the way into whose house he had stopt up, as it lay from the kings pallace. But if it were so, his seeking thus to please him came from feare, and because he saw himselfe to be now in his power and yielded to doe any thing, that his kingdom might not be destroyed, but he might agree to depart: For that the Assyrian king at this time subdued him and made him his tributary appeareth, 2 King. 18. 7. where it is said, that Hezekiah, his son rebelled against the king of Assyria and would not serve him, which agreeth not, but to a kingdom under tribute and to this was Iudah never brought, till that Ahaz, as he had spoken of himselfe, 2 King. 16. 7. I am thy servant and thy sonne, was indeed brought under by the same king of Assyria. And to expresse this the Vulgar Lat. for these words, 2 Chron. 28. 20. Tiglathpilesar coming to him streightened him] hath these words, he brought also Tiglathpilesar against him, who afflicted him and wasted him without resistance. Touching the cover of the Sabbath, and the outward enterance of the king, which he is said to have removed from the house of the Lord before the king of Ashur; the Vulgar lat. retaining the Hebrew word, hath Musac Sabbati being expounded by Lyra, either the treasury, where the kings upon the Sabbaths put their offerings for necessary uses about the temple, which he saith, is the common exposition: or according to R. Solomon, a place in the porch of the temple gloriously covered, where the king used to sit upon the Sabbaths. Hugo followeth that of a treasury, but saith, the monyes given by the king and put there were for charitable uses. And whereas Iunius hath he removed from the house of the Lord, the Vulgar lat. hath, he turned to the house of the Lord which the Ord. Glosse expoundeth, that when the king of Ashur should come he might see and desire them to carry away, as he did many other great gifts, which he gave unto him. The word סָבַח here used signifieth to make to goe about, and being read together with the next words, it is neither from, nor to the house of the Lord, but onely he made to goe about the house of the Lord. And what did he make to goe about? Answ. The covering of the Sabbath and the kings outward passage to the house. Or rather the covering having reference to the word, cut off, v. 17. (for most probably, as he tooke away other things of price from the house of God, thus defacing it and leaving it naked, so he tooke away this covering of brasse also, which was built in the house for some use before spoken of, or for the Priests to rest themselves in, according to some others) nothing else is meant, but that he stopt up the way of the king to the Lords house, so that if any would goe thither they must needs goe round about and so come up by many steps an high hill with great difficulty to the house; yea having done thus, to shew, that he he would have no more worship there performed, he shut up the doores of this house, as is said, 2 Chron. 28. 24. And whereas he is said to have done these things and others against the house of the Lord, v. 17. before the king of Assyria, touching the meaning whereof expositours are doubtfull. I conceive, that he did thus, when the Assyrian King was there, that he might give largely unto him to enjoy his favour, not regarding the Lord so much as him: for which cause and for that he was a grosse idolater, he cared not, how he spoiled the Lords house of all the ornaments, to give to this heathen king. And thus haply it is to be understood, that the king of Ashur coming to him streightned him and did not helpe him, because by his meanes he was greatly impoverished, that all he could wrap and rend, as we say, being taken to give to him, whether out of the Lords house or his owne, as 2 Chron. 28. 21. And so he became the lesse able to make warre against other enemies, that invaded his land, as 2 Chron. 28. 17, 18. the Idumeans and Philistims.

Having thus resolved the doubt, how the King of Assyria is said not to have helped, but streightened Ahaz, he also covenanting, as we may gather by that, which hath beene already said, to pay him a yearly tribute hereafter, I returne now to his idolatry with the gods of Damascus: of which see 2 Chron. 28. 23. although here his causing of an Altar to be made like unto that at Damascus only be spoken of, and setting it up in the place of that, which he caused therefore to be removed. It is most probable, as Pelican hath it, that he first sacrificed to the gods of Damascus being there, that he might the more confirme his league with the king of Assyria. But whereas he professeth, 2 Chron. 28. 23. that now he would serve the Syrians gods, because they had holpen them, and he hoped, that they would helpe him likewise; but it is said, This turned to his ruine, he had reference to the Syrians victories obtained against him in times past and not to their present state, since the king of Assyria subdued Damascus, seeing now they were not helpfull to them. A man would thinke, that Ahaz seeing, how they failed the Syrians at this time; should not have beene induced to sacrifice to such impotent gods: but idolaters are like men bewitched, for so did one of his progenitours; also Amaziah, when he had subdued the Edomites, worshipping their gods, 2 Chron. 25. 14. yet because he did not onely thus, but caused also such an altar, as was at Damascus to be made at Ierusalem, upon which all sacrifices should be offered against his returne thither with Evilmerodach, it seemeth, that the good liking of that king was of no small force to move him hereunto. And it is noted that he had an high priest according to his minde, called Urijah, to whom he had no sooner sent the patterne of the Altar, that he would have made, but it was done according to his command against his returne to Ierusalem. Yea, he did so comply with him, that he suffered the king at his returne to offer sacrifice upon this new great Altar, and his meat-offering and drinke offering, as the zealous Priest Azariah would by no meanes suffer his grandfather Uzziah to doe, and when he persisted notwithstanding his opposition, God executed his judgement of leprosie upon him. If any man shall marvel, that he did not the like against Ahaz, who much more deserved it; I answer, God is not wont alwayes to proceed one way in punishing, but divers, wherefore he punished Ahaz otherwise: for 2 Chron. 28. 17, 18, 19. it is said, that the Edomites and the Philistims spoiled his countrey, and that his kingdome was brought low because of him. And if he escaped in person, it was but for a time in this world, he being reserved to the future judgement in another world, as most wicked men are, whereas Uzziah most probably was judged here, that he might not be condemned hereafter.

But it may be demanded, to whom did Ahaz here offer, to God or to idols? Ans. it is not expresse, but only that he offered and commanded the Priest hereafter to offer all sacrifices upon this new altar, whereupon some think that the sacrifices were still here offered to God, because the holy Scripture saith nothing of this abomination done in the Temple or Court thereof, as it doth in relating the idolatry of Manasseh, 2 Chron. 34. 5, 6. yea it is expressly said, 2 Chron. 28. 24, 25. that the doores of the Lords house being by him shut up, he set up altars and idols in every city of Iudah, and sacrificed there unto them. Yet Testatus saith, he took away the

2 Kings. 16.
10, 11, &c.
Pelican.

Tostatus.
Theodoret in 4
Reg.

V. 14.

Pellican.
Lyra.

Adrichom.

Pellican.
The Allegory.

2 Chron. 28. 17,
18.

The finnes of Ahaz summed Theodoret in 4
Reg.

altar of the Lord, that no more sacrifice might be offered to him, but upon the new altar to the honour of the gods of Edom. And Theodoret saith, that this altar was set up to some one of the gods of Damascus, and Adrichomius and Gensbrard that upon it sacrifice was offered to them. And truly I can hardly be induced to think, that hee would set up an altar of Damascus to sacrifice to any other, but to the gods of Damascus, especially seeing hee shut up the temple of the Lord, and rifled it of all the vessels and ornaments. It is expressly said, 2 Chron. 29. 7. that no sacrifice was then offered to the Lord, and if not to the Lord, then it must needs be to idols.

Then Abaz removed the Altar of the Lord that it might not stand between his new altar, and the house, to the North side, commanding Orijah the Priest to offer all sacrifices upon the new great altar, wherein he readily obeyed him also. And touching the altar of the Lord, he said, that it should stand by for him to enquire, that is as Iunius hath it, if he should think good at any time so to doe. And in the Hebrew it is also to enquire, but the vulgar Latin hath it, ad voluntatem meam, expounded by Pellican, to be offered upon, if at any time I shall please, but for the present it shall stand by as antiquated, and out of use. But Lyra will have the meaning, shall be at my will to make what I think good thereof, wherefore he saith, that he made afterwards a famous diall of it, of which mention is made, chap. 20. 11. and this is followed by Adrichomius also, the contrary to which yet appeareth, 2 Chron. 29. 18. where it is said that the altar and the utensils thereof, which had been by Abaz rejected, were sanctified, and if so, then that brazen altar was not broken to make a diall called Abaz his diall, seeing that stood still after that Hezekiah his sonne had cauled this to be sanctified, even to the time of his great sickness.

Pellican of Orijah his setting up of a strange altar, makes this Allegory. Such Ministers, as to please wicked Princes, bring into the Church of God strange doctrine, and rites in the worship of God, doe act over againe, as it were, the part of this wicked temporizer Vrijah, they set to the North side the altar of the Lord, and make and place an altar to the devill in the room thereof, the word of God and his ordinances are thus debased and turned, as it were to the left hand, which was the North, and mens inventions drawne from the Gentiles, honoured above them. To revenge this wickednes in Abaz, the Edomites were brought against him, and carried away many captives from Iudah, when they had smitten it. And the Philistines brake into the Southern parts, and took Bethshemeth and Ajalon, &c. 2 Chron. 28. 17, 18. But all this would not move him to repentance, nor yet his suffering by the help which he had sent for out of Assyria, for even after this, he waxed worse and worse, v. 22. In the time of his streights he increased his contempt against the Lord, this is Abaz. The vulgar Latin joyning these words with the next following hath it, thinking Abaz by himself offered to the Gods of Damascus. But it is plainly distinguished both by a full point & a conjunction copulative, beginning the next verse thus, And he offered. These words are added then after his despising of all corrections spoken of, partly to shew that he was the same wicked one still, and partly to move all kings and men to look at him and his impious doings to abhorre from the like. Not one but divers wayes he sinned fowly. 1. By idolatry after the manner of the Israelitish kings, yea he made his sonne to goe through the fire to Molech, which was not as Theodoret thinketh, by burning him, which he calleth a common error, but by sanctifying him, as the heathen counted, by making him to goe through the fire. And the manner of this he saith, that he had seen it, viz once in the year fires being made in some cities, there were those that went dauncing through them, both men and boyes and infants were by their mothers carried through the fiery flames. 2. By infidelity, rejecting all confidence in God, and putting his trust rather in the King of Assyria. 3. By setting up a strange altar in the courts of the Lords house, making the altar built by Solomon to give way unto it. 4. By robbing the Lords house of the ornaments, and by shutting it up keeping men from worshipping him. 5. By sacrificing to the gods of Damascus, that sinore him, and seeking to draw the people to the same idolatry, in that he set up altars unto them in many places. 6. By incontinency, in that being severely punished by Syrians, Israelites, Assyrians, Edomites, Edomites, and Philistines, he was so farre from being touched with repentance, as that he did like one set to vexe and anger the Lord all the wayes that he could possibly devise. And it was now like Prince, like Priest, so that the state was intollera- bly corrupted.

Here nothing more, but of his death and buriall in the city of David, but not in the sepulchers of the Kings faith, 2 Chron. 28. 27. as was said before of Amaziah.

V. 19. 20.

CHAP. XVII.

THe 12 year of Abaz king of Judah, reigned Hosheah in Samaria. The history of Hosheah begun, chap. 15. 30. is here continued. But how is it said, that he reigned the 12 year, when as he began in the fourth, which was the 20 of Iotham, as was before shewed, reckoning from his first beginning, till that time? Pellican to this answereth well, that by reason of the king of Asshur, although he had slain Pekab, he could not attain to the regall dignity, but ruled as a Lievtenant under him, till the 12 of Abaz, that is, 8 yeares after, at what time he took upon him to reigne shaking off the the Assyrian yoke and might best be said to begin to reigne as a king of himselfe, and not under another. This is also recited by Wolphius and a second exposition of some, who say, that the first 8 yeares of his reign were full of tumult and trouble, but in the last of these, which was the the twelfth of Abaz he began to reign in quiet, for which cause he is said here to have reigned, Anno 12 of Abaz. And a third, in which he resteth, viz. that he slew Pekab Anno 4<sup>o</sup> of Abaz, and took the kingdom upon him, Anno 12<sup>o</sup> being within 2 yeares after accepted for king by the Itates of the land, from which time to the 6 of Hezekiah are 9 yeares, according to which it is said that he reigned 9 yeares. But here are not 3 times, but two only put of the beginning of Hosheah his reign, or rather one of his beginning servily, and another of his reigning, after this shaken off, because it is not here said, he began to reign, but he reigned Anno 12 of Abaz 9 yeares, according to Iunius, [the ninth yeare] whereby I suppose he meaneth, that this was the ninth from his beginning to reign; for so it was, if respect be had to that, ch. 15. 30. where hee is said to have reigned 20 of Iotham, that is, 4 of Abaz, as hath been already shewed; seeing the 12 is the ninth from the fourth spoken of in that place. But if we read it he reigned or had reigned then nine yeares, it will agree better with the Hebrew text. For another beginning of his time made by Wolphius 2 yeares after, viz. Anno 14 of Abaz; I know no ground that he hath thereof. And therefore leaving it I should rest in the first brought by Pellican, but only that ch. 18. 1. the beginning of Hezekiah his reign Anno 3 of Hosheah seemeth to crosse this, for if he reigned Anno 12 of Abaz, and Abaz reigned 16 yeares, from the twelfth, to which are foure yeares at the least, how can it be said that he began the third yeare. To this it may be said, that the 12 was now at an end within a few dayes, so as that it was not counted, and the 4th year was so newly begun, that it was not reckoned neither; but it is said the third, meaning the third being even now expired. Vnlesse we shall say, that Hezekiah was made king some time before his fathers death, for the better settling him in the kingdome in those tumultuous times, and for the opposing of the enemies that invaded it. Again, it is said here v. 3. that Salmanasar king of Assyria came up against Hosheah, because he denied to pay him tribute, which he had paid in former yeares; then he took Samaria his chief city, when he had besieged it three yeares, in the ninth of Hosheah. So that if it be true which goeth before, about Hosheah his beginning to reign in liberty, the twelfth of Abaz, he was suffered by the Assyrian king sixe yeares before he came against him, which seemeth to be improbable.

Sol. It is probable enough, if we consider, that there be two kings of Assyria spoken of, Evilmerodach and Salmanasar, the father and the son, since Hosheah attained to the crown. Wherefore Evilmerodach haply growing old, and towards his end, when Hosheah denied to pay any more tribute, this was permitted till Sal-

V. 1.

Pellican.

Wolphius

Iunius

manasar was king, his father being dead. But it is said here v. 3. that Salmanasar came first and brought him under tribute, and when he denied to pay it any longer, trusting to the help of the king of Egypt, he came again, and wasted his country, and took him; and all this was done from the twelfth of Ahaz, whereby his reign is here reckoned, to the end of his term of nine years. And if so, then the beginning of his reign in liberty is not here meant, because after this he paid tribute certain years. Rather before this he reigned free, for the kingdom was reckoned to him, because when Pekah was slain, there was none else reigned: but because he coming to it by the murder of the old king, civill warres followed hereupon, and sometimes he ruled, but sometimes again his enemies prevailed against him; so that all this time he stood very uncertain, as if this had been no reigning, it is passed over, and the time here set down, when he began to reign; after that the king of Assyria taking advantage of the civill dissensions had come and subdued the land, and settled him for king, under a tribute yearly to be paid to the king of Assyria. And in this I rest, as the clearest and most free from all exception. And so it appears, that there was a double time of this king Hosheah, one before that he was made tributary of nine years, and the other after of nine years more, the whole time of his reign, when he was carried away captive, and his people, being eighteen years.

V. 2.
Hebr. Obrom.
6. 22.

He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, but not like the kings before him. ] The Hebrew Chronology expoundeth this, of his not hindering men of his kingdom to go to Jerusalem to worship, as they were by the law of God bound to do three times in the year. For Jeroboam set garrisons, as some think, to keep them from going. But now, the golden calves, which he had set up for gods, being carried away by the Assyrians, Hosheah was lesse carefull to uphold that idolatry, and so let his subjects for that matter do what they would, not setting any to keep them from going to the temple. But this is onely an imagination; and the lesse probable, because the temple was now shut up by wicked Ahaz, so that it booted not any to repair thither, although it be most commonly followed. I rather think with Wolphius, that he urged none to idolatry, as they had done, although he were an idolater himself, but was more remisse, either naturally, or for the reconciling of all mens mindes the more unto him, whilst he left every one to his own will for devotion, compelling none.

Wolphius.

V. 3.

Against him came Salmanasar, &c. ] God had been so greatly provoked in that kingdom, that although Hosheah was not so bad, as his predecessours, yet because his kingdom was all over greatly tainted with idolatry, and he was a party herein amongst the rest, and sought not to reform it, as he ought to have done; that he would now spare them no longer, but bring them into servitude, and soon after into miserable captivity. It is not a mans not being so wicked as others, that will avail with God for mercy, and sparing from his most severe judgements; who so doth evill, although not in that high degree, is in danger of Gods wrath, as well as they that sin more foully: that we may abhor not onely from so much evill, as others, but any evill at all.

Note.

V. 4, 5, 6.

This coming of Salmanasar against him, was after he had reigned, in some sort, nine years, yea at the beginning of his next ninth. And then being made tributary, he paid it five years or thereabouts, in the sixth he denied it, conspiring with So king of Egypt; in the beginning of the seventh, Salmanasar came, and in three years altogether vanquished him and his people. Because he is said to have conspired with So, Tostatus thinketh, that he like wife was a tributary to the king of Assyria, and whereas it is said, Wherefore Salmanasar streitened him, and bound him in prison. He takes it as spoken of him, seeing he could not get Hosheah into his hands, till the third year after. But, however So might be a tributary as well as he, and so they might joyn together in denying more tribute, it is plainly spoken not of So, but of Hosheah, that he besieged him and bound him in prison, it being left to be understood, when he had gotten him into his hands at the taking of Samaria next spoken of. Wherefore Lyra saith well, that his imprisoning is here spoken of by anticipation. For the long time, that he was in besieging Samaria, it is probable, that

Tostatus.

Lyra.

that

that by the help of the king of Egypt, Hosheah had extraordinarily fortified it against this time. And now the kingdome of Israel utterly ceased, the time being come, of which the prophet Esay had spoken, saying, Within 65. years. Ephraim shall be wasted so, that he shall not be a people. Which according to the Hebrew Chronology, is to be understood of those 65 which began, when their carrying away captive was first threatned by Amos, which was anno 25. of Uzziah, as is commonly held, for from thence to the end of his reign were 27 years, Joahaz 16, Ahaz 16, and Hezekiah 6, for these together make 65, and the ninth of Hosheah is said to have been the sixth of Hezekiah, chap. 18. 10. thus many. But Iunius rather thinketh, that the reckoning ought to begin from the time of Esaiah his prophesying, viz. anno 40 of Ahaz, from which to the carrying away of Israel captive, although there were but seventeen years, yet to the time of their ceasing to be a people were many more, viz. 48; for Hezekiah reigned after this 23, and after his time Efarhaddon the sonne of Sanneberib, in whose time the Israelites say, that they were carried away captive, Ezra 4. 2. For although this may seem to be spoken of the Jews of the kingdome of Iudah, yet they are there said to be Israelites; and 2 King. 17. 24. when the Israelites were carried away, it is onely said, that they were caried by the king of Babylon or Assyria, without naming him, and this is even by the Samaritans themselves expounded of Efarhaddons carrying away all the rest, at what time he brought in new inhabitants, and this most probably happened anno 25 of Manasseh his sonne, which together make 65. thus Iunius. But because, however the Israelites indeed remained haply in other parts still, for a time, yet they were no kingdome ever any more; and it is improbable, that the Assyrian king, having subdued Israel, whom he is also said to carry away captive, would deferre the utter depopulation of the countrey, till 48 years after, and the bringing in of new inhabitants, and they of Iudah are often called Israelites, as well as the rest, I rather subscribe to the first, especially seeing v. 18. it is said, that none remained but the tribe of Iudah onely.

The people carried away into Assyria, are said to have been placed in Chalac and Chabor, and in the cities of the Medes. Of those places mention was made before, 1 Chron. 5. 26. when Tiglath pileser carried away part of the people. They are held to be cities on the further side of Assyria next unto Media, so that they were not places farre asunder, and within a while, as it is in 4 Ezra 13. 40, 41. they left those parts and went further to inhabit, where never mortall men dwelt before, and as Genebrard thinketh, the north parts of the east, where the Tartars now inhabit, which may be the more probable, and that they are descended of them, because some places amongst them are called by the names of Dan, Nephtali and Zebulon, and some Hebrew monuments still remain there. Some take these for the names of rivers, but Ptolomee saith, they were cities. Whereas the binding of Hosheah onely is spoken of, and putting him in prison, he is also said to have been carried away captive, 4 Ezra. 13. 40. of which, I think, no doubt is to be made, and he may well be comprehended under the name of Israel here. He carried Israel into Assyria. He being now but as one of the rest.

The judgement, which swept all Israel thus away, being shewed, now follow the causes, why God was so severe against them. Although he had brought them in singular mercy out of the land of Egypt, yet they served other gods and forsook him, becoming even as the Gentiles, who dwelt round about them. And when he sent his Prophets to admonish them, yet they persisted, thus shewing themselves contemptuous of his statutes. And from this they proceeded to the casting of all his Commandements behinde their backs.

Then more particularly their horrible sinnes are laid open, they made them golden calves and worshipped them and the whole host of heaven, and Baal, and made their children to goe thorow the fire, and gave themselves to witchcrafts. Wherefore the Lord in wrath removed them, leaving behinde onely the tribe of Iudah. Neither did this tribe finally escape, and for the present were given into the hands of robbers, as was before shewed in the history of Ahaz, because they sinned also like Israel, they were spoiled also in the dayes of Ioash and Amaziah, Esa. 7. 8. expounded. Chron. Hebr.

Iunius.

V. 6.

Genebrard.

V. 7.

V. 13.

V. 16.

V. 17.

V. 18.

V. 19.

V. 20.
V. 21, 12.

Amaziah, &c. till they as Israel, were also removed from his face. Lastly the time how long Israel had thus sinned, is set forth, even from Ieroboam, vntill this their carrying away captive, which was 262. yeares, as will appeare to him that shall count it by the yeares of the kings of Iudah in this time. For Rehoboam reigned 18. Abijam 3. Asa 42. Iehoshaphat 25. Ioram 8. Abaziah 1. Ioash 40. Athaliah 6. Amaziah 29. Azariah 52. Ioatham 16. Ahaz 16. Hezekiah 6. together 26. only because Ioram reigned 5. yeares, together with his father Iehoshaphat, 2 King. 8. 16. deduct them and there will remaine 256. a very long time of provocation, before the Lord brake out into this severity, whereby appeareth his patience, and their continued obstinacy, making them well worthy of so sore a judgement, and although the Lord be slow to wrath, yet his patience being long abused by any nation will at length brake out into the greater fury. Whereas, v. 9. it is said, They did things secretly which were not right. Wolphius noteth, that the word rendered covertly, signifieth also to put a glosse or colour upon a thing: hereby then is intimated, that they justified their doings as acts of piety, as the Papists doe at this day. And whereas it is said, from the watch tower to the defended city, they set up images, &c. he understands it from one limit of the kingdome to another, seeing watch towers used to be set upon the borders to espy the coming of the enemy.

Note.

V. 9.
Wolphius.

V. 24.

Berosus.

Iosephus.

Uran. in Arabicis.

Then the king of Ashur brought men from Babel and Chuthab, and Abah, Hamath and Sephenuim, &c. Babel was the metropolitan city of his kingdome of wonderfull vastnesse, and strength: for according to Berosus it was sixty thousand paces in compasse, the walls were two hundred foot high and fifty broad, and he saith, that it was built by Saturne and was the first city, that was built in all the world, see also Pliny. Chuthab is by Iosephus thought to be a countrey of Persia, having the name from a river so called. Avah was an Arabian Colony according to Uranus. Hamath is by Jerom called Epiphania, by Munster Epiphane and Theopolis. Of Sephenuim we have no certainty; but Iunius saith, that Sephara is a city in Mesopotamia by Euphrates. Of the same places see something spoken again, chap. 18, 34. as of places subdued by the king of Assyria, viz. of Avah called there Ivah, Hamath and Sepharuaim. So that, it seemeth, the people brought by him to inhabit Samaria and her cities were none of his naturall subjects, except those of Babel and Chuthab, being onely thus translated thither out of their owne countrey, that coming into so good a land, whereunto they had no right but by the donation of the Conquerour they might the more willingly live in subjection to him and pay him tribute without rebelling. But whatsoever they were, so soone as they were come, because they feared not the Lord, he sent Lions amongst them, which slew them: Whereupon the king of Ashur hearing it sent back a priest, whom he had carried away captive to teach them the service of the god of that land, which he did, and so they served him; but they served their owne gods also, every one the gods of his nation; and thus they persisted to do both fathers & childrens children. If it be demanded here, why God sent such destruction upon these heathens now more then in times past in their owne countreys, where they feared not God any more then at this time? Answe. because they were now in that land, which the Lord was pleased particularly to owne; for which cause he forbade any of it to be sold; and in his owne land he would be knowne and served; whosoever dwelt therein, and in case that he were not, send destruction amongst them therefore. But then another question ariseth, If for not fearing him he sent Lions amongst them to slay them, why did he forbear to doe so still, when as they worshipped heathen gods together with him, which is so contrary to him, that rather then be so served, he will not be served at all, as Elijah said to the people. If the Lord be God, follow him, if Baal, follow him: and how long halt ye betweene two opinions? Answe. It seemeth, that he sent not Lions amongst them for their idolatry, in which they were bred and borne: but for that being in the land, which the Lord had peculiarly chosen, they feared not him, as if he had no power or were but a weake God, that could not keep his people from being carried away captive by the Assyrians, as afterwards Rabshakeh said, What is God, that he should be able to deliver you out of my hands? To shew therefore, that he was the God of all power,

Levit. 24.

1 King. 18.

Chap. 18.

power and to make them to feare him, and speake, and thinke reverently of him, he thus judged them, but forbore to doe like wise afterwards, when they bare a reverent regard unto him, as the priest taught them; leaving their idolatries to be reckoned for and judged at the last day. Yet I doubt not, but the priest sent to instruct them, taught him to be the onely true God, and that their idols were no gods, but vanities, and told them of his creating heaven and earth, and all things, and of his stupendious judgements shewed upon Egypt, and the Canaanites, and upon the Israelites themselves, when they turned idolaters. Yet they applied no more of his teaching, but onely so much as concerned the reverencing of him. For sacrifice they could not be taught to offer there unto him, seeing it was not acceptable in any other place, but onely at Ierusalem.

This sheweth, that if any of the people of God do abominably, as the heathen, God will not endure it at their hands, although they worship the Lord also: for it is in them spirituall adultery, seeing they are his spouse; but thickets, that never were contracted unto him by covenant, are otherwise looked upon, as doing wickedly indeed, but forso much as they are not the Lords, but another mans wife, as it were, his jealousy is not hereby stirred up against them, to make presently therefore sensible demonstration of his wrath, as against his Israel. According to which it is said, the time of this ignorance God regarded not, &c. And the people now placed in Samaria, being therefore called Samaritans, continued in this their superstition even till the time of the Macchabees, but afterwards it seemeth, that leaving their idolatry they worshipped God onely, as the Iews then did, because that woman of Samaria Iob. 4. enquired to seriously of the place, wherein they ought to worship God, and called her self, together with her citizens, the children of Jacob, and shewed a faith in the Messiah to come. To make all men to abhor from such kinde of fearing and worshipping God, as is joyned with idolatry, the manner of these peoples doings being recounted, they are greatly taxed, as not fearing the Lord, v. 34. although they had been said twice, v. 32, 33. to have feared the Lord, that is, to have trembled before him, and not to dare speak contumeliously, but reverently of him, and haply they prayed unto him, as well as they did to their idols; yet they could not be said to fear him truly, if by the fear of God we understand, as we must, such fear of him, as moveth a man to have respect to all his commandments, and specially to that which forbiddeth the worshipping of other gods, as being most of all other things repugnant to his will, as is in the same v. 34, 35, 36. expressed. The gods whom they made to themselves and worshipped, were Succoth Benoth made by the men of Babel, they of Chuth made Nergal, Hamash, Asima, &c. Succoth Benoth, signifieth covering her children, that is, an hen, as the Hebrews expound it. Nergal is a woodcock, Asima a goat, Nibkaz and Tartar were the gods of the Havites, that is, a dog and an asse, though some by Tartar think, that Tartar is meant, who was one of those, whom Sanneherib sent against Ierusalem, as Wolphius saith, Adramelech was an horse, and Anamelech a mule, some think, they were the sonnes of Sanneherib. But forso much as other nations in the world have worshipped such base creatures also, as the Persians a cock, the Ptoembari a people of Africa a dog, according to Aristophanes; the Mendefians a goat, and some an asses head. According to Ashunafius, it is most probable, that these heathens set up to themselves the images of such creatures also, according to their countrey manner. For of the heathen in generall, it is complained Rom. 1. that they changed the glory of God into the similitude of beasts, fowls, and creeping things. And hereby we may see, how greatly we are blessed of God, in that we are better taught, and not left to follow such ridiculous vanities, as for our sinnes we might have been, that we may endeavour to live more to his glory, and not as the servants of dogs, goats, and asses, &c.

Note.

A. 16. 30.

V. 34.

V. 30.

Wolphius.

Note.

CHAP. XVIII.

V. 1.

IN the third year of Hosbeah, Hezekiah began, &c. ] If this shall seem to be repugnant to chap. 10. 1. where it is said, Ahaz his father began anno 17 of Pekah, who reigned 20 years, and so he reigned but three years in his time, then he continued 13 more, for his whole reign was of sixteen years, and Hosbeah got the crown immediately after Pekah, wherefore he reigned in Hosbeah his time also thirteen years, and so Hezekiah could not begin till his fourteenth year. How this may be reconciled see before, upon ch. 17. 1. The age of Hezekiah when he began

V. 2.

V. 3.

V. 4.

V. 5.

Jerom.Iosephus.

V. 4.

Wolphins.Tostatus.

to reign was 25, the time of his reign 29, his mothers name was Abi, the daughter of Zechariah. His praise is, that he did altogether like David, he brake down the high places, where other kings had permitted sacrificing, and brake in pieces the brazen image which Moses had made because they burnt incense unto it; and it is said, that he did so excellently, that there was never any king of Iudah like unto him, before or after him. Touching his mother, some think, that she was daughter to Zechariah, the son of Iehoiadab, slain in the time of Ioram king of Iudah, for reproving his wickednesse. But that was so long before, the reign of Amaziah of 29, and of Azariah 52, and of Iosbarn 16 coming between, together 97 years, that there is no probability of it. Jerom therefore conjectureth, that she was his grandchilde, coming of a sonne of his own name, which is not unlikely, and if so, he had most probably a good mother, although a bad father. Others hold this Zechariah her father, to have been the last king of Israel of the race of Iehu, but then most probably he should have been so set forth; and to put this out of doubt, Iosephus saith, that he was a Zechary of Ierusalem. Whereas it is said, that Hezekiah brake downe images, and cut down the grove, for so it is in the Hebrew and not groves, as in Vulg. Lat. (although a figure called Enallage numeri is there thought by Wolphi to be used, grove being put for groves) it is to be understood, that some escaped his hands, remaining still for Iosiah to have the honour of cutting and breaking them downe, as appeareth, 2 King. 23. 13. where he is said to have polluted the high places set up by Solomon to Asteroth and Chemosh and Milcom, and to have broken their images, &c. and these are said to have beene before Ierusalem, and therefore not suffered to stand now, because in some obscure corner out of sight, but because haply they were unfrequented, untill the dayes of Manasseh, the father of Iosiah, who exceeded in idolatries of all sorts, as is shewed, 2 King. 21. Thus also Tostatus, these images either were not now worshipped, or the people, being taken with the pleasantnesse of the place would not suffer them to be beaten downe, so that the king could not doe it without danger of sedition, but I rest in the former of these, because to a godly king the people were never so undutifull to crosse him in any of his godly designs, but rather have most readily joyned with him.

And if idolatry had beene there after Solomons time committed, it is to be thought, that neither Asa, nor Iehoshaphat would have suffered them to stand in their times. For I cannot incline to that conjecture of one, who thinketh, that Solomon upon his repentance beat them downe; and whereas it is said, which Solomon made, it is to be understood, the like unto which he made and upon the same foundations, because these words, [which Solomon made] cannot with reason be expounded, the like to which others made. And that he did not demolish them hath been already shewed and brought by Eucherius as an argument of his small impenitency, 1 King. 11. 7. But touching the superexcellency ascribed unto him above all other kings of Iudah before or after him: If it be demanded how this can be truly said, seeing Iosiah did rather exceed both in polluting those high places, which he suffered to remaine, in keeping a passeover in such manner as no king ever did before him, 2 King. 23. 22. in rooting out Wizzards, and removing all abominations v. 24. Whereupon it is said, that he was such a king, as that there was never king like unto him, v. 25. To this Wolphins answereth by saying, that we

Wolphi.

V. 5.

we must take it according to the meaning and not stand strictly upon the words, it being not intended here to deprive other godly kings of their due commendations, but most highly to commend these two, as the most excellent of all others. Hezekiah for his beginning so soone, viz. anno 1. the first moneth of his reigne, 2 Chron. 29. 3. and that not being deterred by the state wherein he found the kingdom, viz. altogether corrupted by idolatries, and that by his father. 2. For his most eminent confidence in God shewed herein, and in his breaking in pieces the brazen Serpent, which was in so high estimation then amongst the people, that they worshipped it. 3. For Gods favour constantly gracing him unto his end by miraculously delivering Jerusalem upon his praying from the proud king of Ashur, smiting his host by his Angel, and hearing him in his most dangerous sickness to restore him to health againe, and to adde fifteene yeares more to his dayes, and for a signe to shew a miracle almost, as at the request of Ioshuah upon the Sunne going back, as then it stood still. For in these three even Iosiah himselfe came short of Hezekiah, in that he began not his reformation, till anno 18 of his reigne, neither did he finde his state so corrupted, seeing Manasseh his father was converted and reformed all things most materiall before his end. 2. He had no image to breake downe so dangerous for the causing of tumult amongst the people, as the brazen image, which Moses himselfe had set up, and therefore Hezekiah in doing this did much endanger himselfe, as one that might be thought for this fact to be against God. 3. He was cut off by a violent death, in going out against Pharaoh Necho, non consulting with the Lord first about it.

Yet Iosiah excelled even Hezekiah, first in ridding the land of all abominations both the high places built by Solomon, and the altar at Bethel. Secondly, in the singular passeover, which he kept. Thirdly, in his hearts melting within him for the sinnes of the people, when he heard the law read, and bringing them into a covenant with the Lord; in which respects it is truly said of him, that there was no king like unto him before or after, and for that he lived without all scandall, so as David himselfe did not, nor Hezekiah, who was visited for his unthankfulness after his great deliverance, and heard an harsh prophesie for his correspondency with the king of Assyria, and his vain-glory in shewing his Legats his treasures. And as truly it is said likewise of Hezekiah, for the three things before spoken of, which were most notable in him. For the brazen serpent, see Numb. 21. 9. by Gods own command it was set up, and had been hitherto preserved, as a monument of the cures wrought hereby. But in the days of Ahaz, by the superstitious incense was offered unto it, as thinking vertue to be therein. But Hezekiah brake it, and called it Nehushtan, that is, their brasse, and therefore without all vertue, and unworthy of adoration, seeing not thereby, but by Gods power cures were through it done. And hereby we are taught, that whatsoever is an occasion of offence ought to be abolished; such as is the crosse it self, although sometime Constantine thereby prevailed.

Touching Gods being with Hezekiah in all his enterprises, and his smiting of the Philistines set forth here v. 7. 8. because his pious acts were the first, that he began with, as is noted 2 Chron. 29. 3. and these followed as blessings hereupon, we must here leave the history of the Kings, and bring in 2 Chron. 29. 3, 4, &c. where is shewed, what he first did after that he was king. In the first year, the first month he opened the house of the Lord, and called the Priests and Levites together, willing them to sanctifie themselves and the Lords house, recounting unto them, how their fathers had carried themselves indignly, shutting up the Lords house, and not offering to him, &c. This godly king, to give example to all others, began first with the worship of God, which is the principall thing in a kingdom; and if it be rightly intended, that which bringeth with it all other blessings, as a very fountain and well-spring thereof. Ierom saith, that by tradition he did this not only the first moneth, but the first day thereof. He opened the doors of the Lords house, which Ahaz his father had shut up, ch. 28. 24. and this is most consonant with v. 17. He caused the Priests and Levites to assemble in the East street, that is, saith Lyra, in the Priests court, where stood the altar of burnt offerings, and was on the East side of

2 Chron. 29. 3, 4.

Hieronym. 17. ad.
Hebr.

Lyra.

Hieronym. de tradit. Hebr.

V. 8, 9.

V. 10.

V. 27, 28, 29.

V. 12, 13, 14.

Psal. 73. 77. 98.
of Asaph, Psal.
88. to Heman.

V. 16, 17.

Note.

V. 18, 19.

V. 20, 21.

Sept. and Lyra.

Sept. and Lyra.

Sept.
Lyra.

of the courts of the Lords house, which is said to be 100 cubits square, as the other courts also were. And here he exhorted them to sanctifie themselves, that is, by washing their bodies and clothes, and then to sanctifie the temple, by cleansing it from all the foulness growing therein so long a time; Ierom saith, by carrying out the images set up there, and all their appurtenances. But seeing the doors were kept shut, I see not how images could come to be set up there. And to stir them up the more, he commemorateth the wrath of God executed against Iudah, in slaughtering many of them, and giving others to be carried away captive, both men and women, of which see ch. 28. 5, 6, 7, 8. Then he telleth them, that he meant to enter into a covenant with God, which how it was performed I finde not expressed, but onely that sacrifices were offered for them all, and praises sung, and then both king and people bowed themselves and worshipped, which was implicitly a covenanting, according to that saying Psal. 50. 5. which hath made a covenant with me by sacrifice, and this he propoundeth to do, that the Lord might turn from the fierceness of his wrath, as being a speciall means to move him so to do. Then the Priests and Levites gathered themselves together, and it is shewed, of what families the Levites were, viz. of Chaath, Gershom, and Merari, Elisaphan, Asaph, Heman, and Ieduthun. Of which, the three former are well known to have been the sonnes of Levi. Elisaphan was the sonne of Huzziel, the sonne of Amram, the sonne of Kaath, Exod. 6. 20. and Numb. 3. 30. he is called prince of the Chaathites. Of the other three mention is made in the Psalms, as of chief singers, to whom therefore many Psalms were committed, and by some of them endited. Heman was a prince of the family of Gershom, 1 Chron. 3. 43. Asaph of the family of Merari, v. 39. And Ieduthun, was a skilfull Musitian next unto them, 2 Chron. 5. 12. where these three are named together in Solomons time, as being of the same faculty. Now the order of proceeding in cleansing and sanctifying was this, the Priests cleansed the house of the Lord, bringing all the filth to the door, and there the Levites took and carried all into the brook Kedron, and this work being begun the first day of the first moneth, was finished in eight dayes, and in eight more the courts, with all their appurtenances were cleansed and sanctified also. From whence we may gather, that Hezekiah began his reign in the very beginning of the year, and the same day that he began to reign, spake unto the Levites to set upon this work; and that they without any deferring began the same day, that they were spoken unto. A most excellent harmony and consent in the greatest diligence about things pertaining to religion, worthy the imitation both of prince and people in all ages. This work being finished, they certifie the king thereof, and of their cleansing of the altar for burnt offerings, and all the utensils thereof, which Ahaz had removed and cast aside, setting up an altar like that at Damascus in the room of it, as was before shewed. Wherefore, without doubt that altar was broken down by them, and carried away with the other filth, the altar of the Lord being set again in the proper place.

The good king hearing what they had done, delayed no time, but rising early in the morning, called together the princes, and causing seven bullocks, seven lambs, seven rams, and seven kids, to be brought to the Lords house, he commanded the Priests to offer them upon the altar, for sinne, for the kingdom, for the sanctuary, and for Iudah, which they did accordingly. For the kingdom saith Lyra, was for the king and the princes, for Iudah was for all the people of the land, and for the sanctuary, was for the Priests and Levites who ministred therein. But because Levit. 4. one bullock is appointed for the Priest sinning, and one for the whole congregation, and a kid for a prince, so that this may seem to be an exceeding of the precript rule of the law, he answereth, that Numb. 15. 24. unto the bullock, in case the whole congregation sinneth, a kid is added, whereby it may be gathered, that the meaning of Levit. 4. is, that so much must be offered at the least, but when the sinne is greater, more must be added. And at this time, because sinne had exceeded in the dayes of wicked Ahaz, the beasts brought and offered are many more, viz. a full number (for such is the number of seven) of all sorts that were fit for sacrifice, and not of the two prescribed in that law onely. Inimus by the sanctuary

ary understandeth it properly, becauſe being polluted it had need again to be ſanctified, as at the firſt conſecration, which was with blood, Levit. 8. 15. ſo likewiſe Pellican, and this ſeemeth to be the beſt, becauſe the altar was ſprinkled with blood, before the ſacrifices for ſinne were offered. And by the kingdom and Iudah, may be underſtood all the whole body of that ſtate, conſiſting of King, Clergy, and Laity.

And the goats were ſet before the King, and the whole congregation, and they laid their hands upon them. ] That is, the king, and ſome of them repreſenting the reſt, laid on their hands as was appointed, when ſacrifices were offered for ſinne, Levit. 4. and thus they confeſſed their ſinnes, ſhewing by their thus doing, that they were worthy to dye, but beſought the Lord to accept of the blood of this beaſt, whereby Chriſt his blood was figured out, and to ſave them.

And the Priests killed them, and ſprinkled their blood upon the altar, to make an expiation for all Iſrael, &c. ] Such was the piety and charity of this king, as that he would have ſacrifices offered not onely for his owne kingdom of Iudah, but alſo for all Iſrael, although under another king. And that the ſacrifices now offered might be made with the greateſt grace and praiſe to God, he addeth alſo muſicke by instruments and voice of the Levites as was uſed in Dauids time, as God commanded by his prophets, Gad and Nathan.

The ſacrifices at this time offered were 70. buls, 100. rams, 200. lambs, 600. oxen, and 3000. ſheepe, which was a great matter conſidering the poverty, to which the kingdom was brought by Ahaz; and that theſe offerings were given by the men of Iudah onely. And theſe were ſacrifices of praiſe, as thoſe before going for ſinne. And being ſo many it is ſaid, that the prieſts being fewer could not ſea them all, wherefore the Levites did helpe them: and the reaſon, why there were fewer prieſts ſanctified, was becauſe the Levites were more upright in heart to ſanctiſie themſelves, then the prieſts, for this is the true reading according to the Hebrew, and not as the Vulg. Lat. hath it, more belonged to the ſanctifying of the Prieſts then of the Levites. Another reaſon why theſe fewer prieſts could not doe all, was becauſe the fat alſo of every beaſt was to be taken off to be burnt upon the altar, which required the helpe of many hands.

H Ezekiah that godly king having made this preparation, which was neceſſary in the firſt place, now taketh into his conſideration the great neglect of keeping the Paſſeover, and although the firſt moneth of the yeare was paſt wherein it ought to have beene kept, yet he would not deferre it, till another yeare, but rather keepe it the ſecond moneth, beleeving that God would accept of his piety herein, although the circumſtance of time were not precisely obſerved, ſeeing this could not at this time be for the caſe, wherein the altar and temple were in the firſt moneth, the ſanctifying of which muſt take up many dayes. And yet he did not this without warrant, but as was allowed, Numb. 9. 10, 11. Here are alſo two other reaſons of this, viz. becauſe there were not a ſufficient number of the prieſts ſanctified to miniſter at this ſolemnity, and becauſe the people of Iſrael could not ſuddenly be gathered together unto it from all parts, as all the males ought to be. And he endeavoured to have them all at Ieruſalem, not onely of his owne kingdom of Iudah, but alſo of Iſrael under Hoſhea, and therefore he ſent letters to them of Ephraim and Manaſſeh and to all Iſrael to invite them unto it. For although their king were wicked, yet the golden calves ſet up by Ieroboam being now taken away by the Aſſyrians, as hath beene already ſhewed, he did not evil, as other kings, his predeceſſours, by worſhipping idols, or keeping his ſubjects from going to Ieruſalem to worſhip, as they had done, ſo that if they would, they might freely come to this Paſſeover. And ſuch was his charity, that he deſired to doe, what he could for the reconciling of Gods favour unto them as well as to his owne kingdom, that no more of them might be caryed away captive into Aſſyria, as ſome had beene before, 2 King. 15. 29. which is expreſſed, v. 6, 7, 8. And in this example we are taught how we ſhould be affected to and ſeeke the good of our brethren in other kingdoms, as well as in our owne. At what time this was done, all are not agreed: for Cajetan will have it to be the yeare after the captivity by Pellican.

V. 23.

V. 24.

V. 25.

V. 32.

V. 34.

V. 35.

2 Chron. 30.
V. 1, 2.Deut. 16.

V. 6.

2 King. 17. 2.

Note.

Cajetan.

Josephus.
Tostatus.
Genebrard.

V. 10.
Josephus.
V. 11.

Pellican.

V. 12.

V. 14.

V. 15.

V. 17.

Lyra.

V. 18.

Junius.

Lib. de quibet.
Lyra.

Salmanasar, when they had no king of their owne to hold them at home. But seeing that was the seventh yeare of Hezekiah and this the first, he is in a manifest error. Wherefore Josephus, Genebrard and Tostatus doe all agree, that it was before that captivity, which was not, till the sixth yeare of Hezekiah; the good King hoping by this meanes, that they might finde favour to be spared for time to come from being carryed away; and those, who were carryed away before, might in their captivity have more comfort. The messengers sent were mocked of some in Manasseh, Ephraim and Zabulon. Josephus addeth, that they took both them and the prophets, who exhorted them to goe up, and slew them. But some in Asser, Manasseh and Zabulon humbled themselves and went to this Paschever. The time was now almost come of giving Israel over into the hands of their enemies for their sinnes, and of their utter extirpation: therefore to prepare unto this, they are first given over, as their wicked hearts lead them, to the contempt of all goodnesse, and then the judgement soone followed. They that humbled themselves and came, were, as Pellican conceiveth, of those seven thousand that never bowed their knees to Baal, that is, of their posterity; for their time was expired long before this. And it is not to be doubted, but that these escaped the better, when the Assyrians came, coming again haply into Iudah, where so godly a king was, to be out of that danger, when they had first returned to their possessions and in their owne country destroyed idols, as chap. 31. 1. Touching Iudah it is said, that God gave them one heart to doe all of them, as they were commanded touching the paschever and in shewing their zeale against idolatry by breaking downe the idols altars, &c. as the Priests and Levites had cleansed the temple, so they cleansed both the city and countrey from all idolatrous pollution. Then the Paschever was kept and the Priests and Levites, who were not yet sanctified, were ashamed and sanctified themselves, that they might be fit to doe their duty at this great solemnity, and so they offered the burnt offerings. That, which made them ashamed was to see the readinesse and zeale of the people, to whom they ought to have been leaders. Yet it is said, that a multitude of the people were uncleane, for which cause the Levites were enforced to kill the paschal lambs for them, that they might thus be sanctified. They were for necessities sake now allowed to eat the Paschever, although they were uncleane, as is shewed, v. 18. that is, by touching some unclean thing; or by a dead body, the order of sanctifying, after which, had now been neglected a long time, and haply, for want of teaching, unknown unto them: but to kill the Paschever in this case none were permitted, but the Levites, who were sanctified, did it for them. Because, as Lyra saith, It is a greater work and unto it more holinesse is required, to kill the Paschever, then to eat of it, as in a priest that consecrateth the Sacrament, then in such, as receive it. All such indeed as ate the Paschever, must be sanctified from their uncleannesse, Levitic. 7. 20. there being one common law against eating any of the holy things by such as were uncleane, and the penalty set therefore, death and cutting off from his people: for which it is said, v. 18. that there were many uncleane of Manasseh, Issachar, &c. which did eat, not according to the law, for whom Hezekiah prayed, that God would forgive this and accept of them notwithstanding; who ate the Paschever with a perfect heart, and it is said, that God heard him and healed the people, that is, according to Junius, sanctified them by the vertue of his Spirit: the Vulg. Lat. (placatus est erga eos) was pacified towards them, respecting more the sence, then the words. But the word (healed) is used because uncleannesse is as a sickness in those that participate of holy things, endangering their lives by reason of the penalty before spoken of; so that God being pacified and his wrath stayed by the prayer of Hezekiah, this malady might well be said metaphorically to have been healed.

But how was it known, that God was pacified? The Rabins, saith Lyra, answer, that commonly when any presumed to eat of the holy things of the Lord in his uncleannesse, they were stricken with death, and therefore because these were not thus smitten, it appears, that Gods wrath against this sinne was pacified. But this he approveth not, because, if there had been such danger it had been a tempting tempting of God to adventure in this case to eate the passeeover, and delivering his own opinion, he saith, They were dispensed withall for necessities sake and for the good and hearty devotion, with which they came. For touching the first of these, David in case of necessity did eat the shewbread which otherwise it was unlawfull for him to doe; and for the second, it is faith and uprightnesse of heart, that maketh the doing of holy duties acceptable to God, although they be not at sometimes performed strictly according to the rule of his law.

Which reasons indeed are good for the Lords accepting of them, and pardoning their error, but they do nothing satisfie the question propounded, viz. how it was known, that God was pacified, and therefore I rest in that, which Lyra excepteth against, because however at other times, when there was no necessity, Gods wrath might break out against such, as ate in their uncleannesse, yet in this case of necessity, the king might well hope of his fatherly indulgence, to spare a poor ignorant people, that now began again to return with all their hearts unto him, although in outward things, which never really defiled, they did not altogether according to the law, seeing they were as a people newly converted, and therefore such as it could not be expected at their hands, that they should exactly keep this solemnity at the first. For both David before spoken of, did that which was dangerous in eating the shew-bread in his necessitie, and all the Hebrews in omitting circumcision all the time of their being in the wildernesse, yet sinne was not imputed unto them.

To make it then the more probable, that such as at other times ate of the holy things in their uncleannesse were punished with death, St. Paul saith of the unworthy receivers amongst the Corinthians. For this cause there are many amongst you sick and weak, and many a sleep, that is, dead. For God hath at all times been most severe out of the case of necessitie, against those, that have transgressed the externall rites of the law, as we may see in Vzzab, and in the men of Bethshemesh. Whence we may learn, that the heart indeed is the principall thing that God looketh after: but however the heart be affected, there is danger to any, that presumeth to eat of the holy things of the Lord in the uncleannesse of sin, which he will never dispense withall, although he did sometime with legall uncleannesse. Yet seeing there is place for repentance for this and for all other sins, except that against the holy Ghost, upon prayer, pardon and reconciliation may be attained, as it was at this time by Hezekiah. Touching the case of necessity here often spoken of, it is to be known, that this was now the Israelites case. They came farre to the passeeover, had kept none a long time, and had not now the liberty of another moneth, as the unclean, Num. 9. therefore must either eat it as they were, or else misse the taking of it haply for ever, to their greater danger.

Then they kept the passeeover with joy seven dayes, the Levites playing with musick, and these being ended, they agreed at the kings motion to keep it seven dayes more: for he offered a thousand bullocks, and seven thousand smaller cattle, and the Princes a thousand bullocks, and ten thousand smaller cattle, which could not all be spent in the former seven dayes. And these, it is to be understood, were eucharisticall sacrifices, wherewith all the people were feasted, whom Hezekiah desired to hold longer, that by hearing more of the law, they might be the more confirmed therein: for which cause, neither he nor the Princes spared for any charges, whereby they might draw them to stay with delight. This indeed, saith Pellican, was more, then the law required, but not against it, seeing as free-will offerings, besides those enjoyed were greatly accepted of, so to take time for the offering of them to the praise of God, could not but be highly accepted of also. And it must be taken, as coming from their superabundant joy for that feast; now kept again by all Israel together, so as it had not been since the dayes of Solomon, because they of the ten tribes were never hitherto permitted to come to Ierusalem, from the beginning of Seroboams reign, and for a long time in the reign of Ahaz, the kingdome of Iudah had been debarred by his shutting up of the doors of the house of the Lord. How it was accepted of before God, is shewed v. 27. where it is said, that the Priests and Levites blessed the people, and their prayer came into the holy habitation of heaven.

1 Cor. 11. 30.

2 Sam. 6.

1 Sam. 6.
Note.

V. 21.

V. 23.

V. 24.

Pellican.

V. 26.

V. 27.

Then all the children of Israel, that were in Ierusalem, went out and brake down the images, &c. [ ] This is, when they had heard the law against them, they returned not home, till they had first done these zealous acts. And because Hezekiah doubtlesse exhorted them so to do, and by his authority set them to this work within his dominions, it is said of him 2 King. 18. 4. that he did all this, and brake in pieces also the brazen serpent. For the history of the Kings omitting altogether the narration of his pascover, cometh immediately to this of his demolishing idolatry, but here it is set forth in the due order, together with those that were employed about it. He began then so soon as he came to the crown, to purge the house of the Lord, and this being done, proceeded, as the time required, to the celebration of the pascover, from which the people by him called unto it, being set on fire with a holy zeal, went out and purged all other parts from the filth of idolatry, even as farre as Ephraim and Manasseh in the kingdome of Israel, of which tribes some of them were. For although ch. 30. 10, 11. no mention is made but of some of Asher, Manasseh and Zabulon, that came at Hezekiah, invitement to the pascover, others of Ephraim, Manasseh and Zabulon, being set forth as mocking, yet v. 18. Ephraim and Issachar are mentioned, as being there also. If it shall seem strange, that the subjects of another king should presume to do these things without his licence, within his kingdome, It is to be considered, that Hosheah then king, was but an usurper, that by murdering of his master attained the kingdome, and therefore the subjects thereof did as if they had no lawfull king, being also haply permitted by him to do in these things, what they would, so that he might be suffered to sit in the throne; for which cause, as was said before 2 King. 17. 2. he is reported not to be so bad as other kings of Israel before him for idolatry, being rather A-thiest then idolater. Here is then no warrant for subjects and private persons, to run of their own heads, to the pulling down of images set up by publike authority, especially living under a lawfull king, to whom every soul must be subject, and to his counsell, but when the king that reigneth is indifferent, such zeal is hereby warrantable, as stirreth up the people to the pulling of them down. Other wise it is to be expected, till God shall move his or their hearts to appoint it to be done, as he did the heart of Iehu before, and of Iosiah after.

Rom. 13.

V. 2.

1 Chron. 24.

V. 3.

V. 4.

Lyra.

Note. maintain

V. 5.

Pellican.

Note.

Having thus purged both the Lords house and the whole land, as remained to be done in the next place, Hezekiah appointeth the Priests and Levites thenceforth to attend upon offering sacrifices, and singing praises unto God. And because this could not be done without many helps, who must all have due maintenance, he both renewed all the divisions of them in their courses, as they had been set by David, and also stirred up the people to bring in the first fruits and tithes, whereupon they were to live, which they did abundantly. And the king for his part, to free the people from that great charge, undertook at his own costs, to maintain the continuall morning and evening sacrifices, those of the Sabbath and new Moons, and of other feasts which the Lord had appointed, of the laws touching which, see Leviticus. 23. Exod. 29. 39. Numb. 28. &c. The first fruits and tithes due to the ministers of God he calleth their parts, because they had none other part or portion in the land; but these were by law appointed unto them, that they might attend upon the office, by the same law commanded them, and not be distracted by seeking out for maintenance; that is, saith Lyra, upon reading, studying, and teaching, and officiating in the temple. And good reason there is, that Gods ministers in all times should have maintenance sufficient without trouble, seeing that even amongst the heathen, they who attended upon divine worship, were alwayes provided for by the care of others, as in Egypt, when that great famine was, which compelled all others to sell their lands to buy food, the Priests yet even then had no want, whereby they might be compelled to do likewise. The first fruits and tithes, that hereupon were brought in, were of corn, wine, oyl, honey, and all things which the earth bringeth forth, these came in now abundantly. But as Pellican noteth, no tithe of money, yet tithes might be converted into money, and thus Gods ministers were supplied with all things necessary for their sustenance, as they ought to be. And this people shall rise up in judgement against, and condemn many of these times, times, who will not pay tithes of all things, but keep back sundry of the smaller, saying, that the minister hath enough of the other. Such are worse, not only then these Jews, but then the Pharisee, who said, that he payed tithes of all that he had. They also of Judah gave the tithes of their beards, and of their flocks, and their holy tithes, or tithes of holy things. That is, most probably, of calves, whitemeat, wool and lamb, the tithes of holy things, saith Lyra, according to the Hebrews, were the tithes of the tithes, which the Levites paid unto the Priests, Numb. 18. 26. but because they were not paid by the people, but by the Levites, after they had received them of the people, they cannot, I take it, be meant here, but rather such tithes, as over and above the tithes ordinarily appointed to be paid, any did voluntarily vow to give; because there it is said, v. 8. these oblations of the holy things of the children of Israel shall be the Priests. And here it is said, the tithes of the holy things. Whereunto the vulgar Latin, for more expression, addeth, which they vowed to the Lord their God. Because amongst the oblations of this kinde assigned to the priests, things vowed are also mentioned, v. 14.

In the third moneth they began the heapes, and in the seventh they finished them.] So that immediately after the pascheover in the second moneth, they began to gather and bring in their tithes from all parts, that is, about our mid May, at what time their harvest began, the time of the year concurring with the exhortation made to move them unto it. And because after their corn-harvest their other fruits coming of the vine, olive and pomegranate followed, which were not all ended, till the seventh moneth, at the beginning thereof, viz. the midst of our September, they were thus long in making their heapes.

Then Hezekiah came and saw the heapes, &c.] For which he and his princes blessed God, and understanding by Azarias the high priest, that these heaps remained over and above their necessary sustenance, that attended upon the service of the Lords house, he commanded to provide barns to lay them into, and this being done, all that provision was laid up in them, and committed to the custody of certain Levites, who should distribute them doly amongst their brethren, both in their service about the temple, and to them in the countrey, and all their families, that none might have any want, either men, women or children belonging unto them. Whether these barns or places of receipt were now new built or no, it is not said, but it is most probable, that they onely prepared, and repaired and made clean, having been made before by Solomon, when the temple was built, seeing rooms were then made all along by the sides of the temple, 1 King. 6. 5.

But what is meant v. 6. by saying, besides the males of their kinne from three yeares old and so forth] Ans. These are spoken of inclusively, as being some of those, that were with the holy things to be maintained, because they that enter into the house of the Lord are immediately spoken of in particular, and their age is set from twenty yeares old and upward. Lest therefore it should be thought, that others, who under that age, should not have allowance made for them, this parenthesis comes in, besides those of three yeares, &c. that is, who shall be provided for as well from that age to twenty, as from twenty and upward. If it be demanded further, what should the females then live upon, and male children under three? Ans. This distinction is made, because by the law of God some of the holy things might be eaten onely by the males, Levit. 6. 11. and Numb. 18. 10, 11. it is shewed what the males might eat of, and what both sonnes and daughters. None but the males then should have portions out of those allowed unto them, and with the other both males and females, and such as were under three yeares of both sexes should be sustained. Thus Hugo; but Lyra saying, according to the Vulg. Lat. that these are to be excepted, makes it doubtfull, wherewith such little ones should be sustained. But because v. 18. it is expressly said, their little ones, their wives, sonnes and daughters, it is plaine, that the meaning here is according to that, which hath been said. If it be further demanded, why the age of three yeares of the males is spoken of, and then from twenty and upward, seeing that in numberiug the Levites it is begun at a moneth, and twenty five years is the soonest, that they began to serve, and thirty. It is answered, indeed the Luk. 18.

V. 6.

Lyra.

V. 7.

V. 8.

V. 11, 12.

V. 16.

V. 17.

Hugo Card.
Lyra.

numbering of them from a moneth old is appointed, Numb. 3.15. but that was because, as is there said, v. 13. they were taken for all the first born of the children of Israel; and a numbering from thirty to fifty, chap. 4.3. 23.33. of such as were able to carry burthens, when they travelled with the tabernacle: and chap. 8.24. from twenty five to fifty, of such as were able to keepe the watch of the tabernacle and to attend there, that they might in five yeares more be better prepared to doe the full office of Priests and Levites at thirty. But there is likewise a numbering of them from twenty yeares old and upward, 2 Chron. 13.23, a reason whereof being yielded, v. 24.25. viz. because God had given the children of Israel rest, so that the Levites should not need to carry the tabernacle any more from place to place, it is concluded, v. 26. that according to the last appointment of David they were numbered from twenty, although v. 1. of the same Chapter it had bene said, that the Levites were even in David's time at the first numbered from thirty and upward. Hezekiah therefore in ordering the distributions here to be made to them of twenty yeares old and upward followeth his father David, who was assisted by the Prophets, God and Nathan, as is expressed, 2 Chron. 29.25. and not the way of accounting first appointed in Numbers. Yet it is to be held with Iuvins, that they were not admitted to exercise their full ministry, till thirty yeares of age, at what time both Christ and John Baptist first began their preaching. But at twenty they began happily to be instructed in things pertaining to their office, at twenty five to execute it in part, and at thirty fully. Touching those of three yeares old and upward to twenty, they are most probably distinguished from such as were under, because although ordinarily they entered not into the tabernacle till twenty, yet sometimes extraordinarily they did, when they were very young and tender, as Samuel, whom his mother brought thither so soone as she had weaned him, 1 Sam. 1. and it is not improbable, but that some others gave their children to God likewise upon extraordinary occasion, as Hannah did.

2 King. 18.7.

Wolpinus.

Origen. lib. 9.
in Rom.Anabaptist
M. J.The higher powers to be obeyed how far forth.

Having thus taken in the memorable acts of Hezekiah omitted, 2 King. 18. but supplied, 2 Chron. 29.30,31. as hath been shewed: I will now return again to 2 King. 18.7. The Lord was with him, and whithersoever he went he was prospered, as more briefly it is concluded, 2 Chron. 31.21. And he rebelled against the King of Assyria and served him not: that is, he refused to pay tribute unto him, as his father Ahaz had bound himselfe to doe, chap. 16.7. neither would he and his kingdom be subject to him any more. But how may this be justified, seeing he could have his kingdom no other wise then his father left it unto him, therefore if he held it as tributary to this king, his sonne ought to have held it so likewise. Seeing the fathers covenant made in this case bindeth the sonne also, and that which he did being called rebelling against him intimateth it to have bene unlawfull. To this Wolpinus answereth, that Ahaz his father did either covenant to be his servant, that he might be under his protection for ever, or else for certaine yeares, or as long as he lived. If for ever, he saith, it bound both him and his, and this fact of Hezekiah cannot be justified: but if for certaine yeares onely, or for his time alone, Hezekiah was now free. but he rather thinketh, that by his rebelling against nothing else, but his ordering of matters concerning Religion contrary to his liking, which he might lawfully do, seeing the highest power is to be obeyed in God and for God, and not against him, as Origen saith, upon these words, He that resisteth the power, resisteth the Ordinance of God; this is not to be understood of such higher powers as persecute the faith, for in such case that saying must rather be taken up, We ought rather to obey God then men. And Tertullian upon these words, [Give us Caesar the things of Caesar, and to God the things of God,] saith, this is well opposed, otherwise what shall be left for God, if all be Cesar's? Paulinus Tironensis, Lawyer Sardinia, and Dionysius Modiolanus, being required to write against Athanasius an Orthodox Bishop by Constantinus an Artian Emperour, answered, that the Kingdom was not his, but Gods, of whom he received it, and that he is to be feared, lest he suddenly take away that, which he even now gave him. Trajan also is reported to have said to a certain Profectus Praterii, when he gave him a sword a sword and belt, If I shall rule justly, use it for me, if unjustly, against me. And another Emperour said, He did not desire, that his wills should have any power against right; but if they seeme to fight against right, to have them abrogated, would be most pleasing unto him. Thus he bringing many arguments to the same purpose, and concluding, that it is Catachresticos called a rebelling. But because these words are added, [and served him not] it is plaine, that not any act of reformation in the worship of God is meant, but his casting off the Assyrian yoke, which I doubt not, but he might justly doe, what contract soever his father had made with that King. For although he being an idolatour fled to his patronage and trusted in an arme of flesh, covenanting therefore to pay him tribute, it was not necessary, that Hezekiah, who trusted not in man, but in God, should also doe likewise. Wherefore by the word [rebelled] here is not meant any unlawfull act, but onely, as the next words explaine, he would not serve him, as his father had done; and so did God defend him against that mighty king, that he could never by all his power be brought to the like servile conditions, but lived a free and glorious king, bringing his enemies under his feet.

Therefore, that his prosperity might the more appear, it is said, v. 8. He smote the Philistims even to Azazab and the coasts thereof, from the tower of the keepers to the fenced city. The like phrase unto which see before ch. 17. 9. These towers some expound by cottages, where vine-dressers and shepherds shelter themselves. Theodoret by towers, on which fires were made, Vatablus by strong towers, the meaning is, that he smote them in all places, whether solitary or frequented by people howsoever they were fortified. Azazab, otherwise called Gaza, was one of the five Lordships of the Philistims. Into this warre against the Philistims, Hezekiah entred to revenge the wrongs by the Philistims done in the time of his father unto his kingdom, 2 Chron. 28. 18. And because the Assyrian king came not till anno 14 of his reign, and this appears to have been done before anno 4. at what time Israel was carried away captive into Ashur, some think, that this his expedition against the Philistims, was before his revolt from the obedience of the Assyrian kings, and that his rebelling against them was after the Israelitish captivity, seeing it is most probable, that if he had rebelled sooner, the Assyrian king would not have returned, when he had subdued Israel, without fighting against him. Wherefore they hold, that he being lifted up with the victory against the Philistims, began to refuse the paying of tribute to Assyria, hoping that he should be able now to withstand any power through Gods help, that should come against him. But before this victory they think, that for some time he paid it. But to me it seemeth by these arguments not so probable, as therefore to yield a neglect of order in the sacred historian, who placeth his rebelling against the king of Ashur first, and then his smiting of the Philistims. Because if upon this reason it be held, that his rebelling was not till after his victory over the Philistims, animating him thus to do, for the like reason it must be held, that there is a disorder also in relating this victory before the carrying of Israel away captive, seeing if it were before, then he was before lifted up thereby to rebel, which according to this reason could not be, sith it was so long before the Assyrian king came to chastise him for it. And if he had at any time paid him tribute, it would not have been said, that he served him not without some addition touching the time, when, for other wise it is as much as if it had been said, he never served him. Again, if he at any time served him, there was a time after he was king, that he had not such confidence in God, whereupon he neglected man, the contrary to which seemeth to be most true, in that he was very godly from the first month of the first year, as appeareth before at large. But why then did the king of Ashur forbear so long to come against him, and to take his opportunity to be revenged? Answ. It was Gods singular providence over him, whilst he was busied in doing things touching religion, that he should not be disturbed, and when the Assyrian hoste came against Israel, his men being made courageous by their victory over the Philistims, it might haply not be thought a fit time, without first returning and increasing his forces, for the Assyrian king to set upon him. Being returned and carrying away the people of Israel, and putting others others in their places, thus strengthening himself in those parts, he thought happily to come again with a greater puissance, but he was prevented by death: for we read no more of Salmanasars coming to warre, but of Sennacherib, which implyeth, that he died. And who knoweth, what troubles his successor might have at home, before he could enjoy the kingdom quietly, or whether he were of that warlike disposition at the first to prepare for this warre? Thus then time might passe away, and nothing be done till anno 14 of Hezekiah, although the provocation were made anno 10. Touching the Philistines now subdued, they were a warlike people, and therefore the greater was Hezekiah's glory to smite and bring them under, as Plutarch doth hence praise the Romans above Alexander, because he subdued Africks, that were weaker and more effeminate, but these the Germans, Spaniards, Britains, &c. most valiant nations.

V. 8.

Theodoret.
Vatablus.Sallianus.

V. 9.

In the fourth year of Hezekiah, which was the seventh year of Hosbeah, came Salmanasar; &c. ] How this is to be reconciled to chap. 17. 1. where the beginning of Hosbeah's reign is in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore it was his eight or ninth year, and not his seventh, when it was the fourth of Hezekiah, seeing Ahaz reigned sixteen, how the time of Hosbeah two wayes counted, maketh a seeming difference, in comparing the time of his predecessor and his together, see before upon chap. 17. 1. Here the same thing is againe declared, which was said before, chap. 17. 6. The reason whereof, as Pellican thinketh may be, that the great favour of God, whereby he now protected godly Hezekiah and his kingdom when danger was so neare might be manifested, and so in what a safe condition a godly king and state are, when the wicked goe to ruine, as Hosbeah now did together with his people.

Pellican.

Note.

V. 13.

In the fourteenth of Hezekiah came Sennacherib king of Assyria against all the fenced cities of Judah and took them, &c. ] After the prosperity of Hezekiah set forth, now followeth his adversity by the invasion of the Assyrians. He had revolted from their obedience, in which his father lived, and therefore they come now to be revenged upon him and prevaile very much. Then he sent to Sennacherib at Lachish, one of the strong cities of Judah, saying, I have sinned, but go from me, and whatsoever thou shalt lay upon me I will beare; and three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold being imposed upon him, he paid it out of the treasures of the Lords house, and with the ornaments thereof pulling off the plates of gold upon the doores, which he had formerly fastened there. Lyra thinketh, that the finnes of his father Ahaz and of the people in his time were the cause of his adversity, and that when Hezekiah confessed to the king of Asshur, that he had sinned, he meant that sinning of others against the Lord, which yet he taketh to himselfe, as being now king. Pellican, that the hearts of the people were to idolatry even in the time of this godly king, which soone appeared in that immediately after his death in the time of Manasseh they fell away most foully againe; and for this cause God now brought the Assyrians against them, sparing the king. And by his sinning, which he acknowledgeth, he understandeth that against the Assyrian king in refusing to serve him. And Wolphius will have it a sinne indeed in Hezekiah to refuse to serve the king of Asshur, because that he was by his father bound unto it, of which enough already, and because he made a league with Tirhakah the king of Egypt and Ethiopia, trusting to which he withdrew his obedience from the Assyrian, and that contrary to the warning given him, and the invectives made by the Prophet Esay against it. Thus he; but looking into Esay I finde nothing spoken against Hezekiah for trusting to the Egyptians and Ethiopians helpe, but against the Philistines, one of those chiefe cities the king of Assyria fought against, viz. Ashdod, but they comforting themselves in expectation of helpe from this king, are by the prophets threatened, and by the signe of his going naked shewed that the Egyptians and Ethiopians being subdued by the Assyrians should be so carryed away out of their owne countrey to their shame. And concluding, v. 6. he saith, Then shall the inhabitants of that countrey say, Behold, thus it is with our hope, to which we fled for helpe, &c. that is, not as some would have it, whom Wolphius followeth, the inhabitant of the countrey of Judea, but of Palestine,

Lyra.

Pellican.

Wolphius.

Palestine, as Iunius rightly expoundeth it, and the whole course of the history directeth seeing here is nothing said of Judea, but of Palestine onely, whereas this may seeme to belong to another kings time, and not to Sennacherib, seeing he is called Sargon, king of Assyria, v. 1. It is to be understood, as Jerome hath it and others after him, that the same king had both these names Sennacherib and Sargon, as is also intimated in that Tharion said to be a captain of Sennacherib, 2 King. 18. 17. is said to be a captain of Sargon, Esa. 20. But let us proceed to Esa. 22. there Iudah is threatened with a dismal time; and upbraideth by keeping in the waters and strengthening the wall, v. 9, 10, 11. and not looking to the Lord by fasting and prayer to seeke unto him: of which practices for fortification against the coming of the enemy, see 2 Chron. 32. 3, 4, 5, &c. But what is all this to prove a confederacy with the king of Egypt and Ethiopia? verily nothing; or to the taxing of Hezekiah, as if the Lord were offended with him for revolting from the king of Assyria? For he is not once named, but Sennacherib who is threatened and the people of the city, who when they were thus strengthened, were secure.

And whereas Esa. 30. a threatening is denounced for their trusting in Egypt, it is not to be understood of the time of Hezekiah as Iunius well observeth, but of Zedekiah, who was long after, although this were prophesied, as also the streight besieging of the city of Ierusalem, ch. 29. 1, 2, 3. in the dayes of Hezekiah, but happened not, till after wards, as in some passages here following appeareth. Wherefore Hezekiah brought not this judgement upon his kingdome by any sin, which he had committed, as Wolphins would have it: but rather according to others, it came for the hollow heartednesse and wickednesse of the people having so godly a king and so holy a prophet as Isaiah: for that they did most of them conforma to the Ordinances of God onely externally, their hearts being bent a cleane contrary way. Hezekiah then sent to Sennacherib, saying, [I have sinned] onely by way of humbling himselfe before so mighty a King, who taxed him of sinne and rebellion against him, if haply by this meanes he might stop his further proceedings in destroying his countrey, and specially Ierusalem. And this he did not out of any distrust in God, seeing he was before for his trusting in him commended above all others, 2 King. 18. 5. but because the people were wicked, and had committed in his father Ahaz, his time so great abominations, he feared, as he might justly do, some great judgement to be now in coming against them. Moreover, how he comforted himselfe and others in God, and what a confidence he had in him, see 2 Chron. 32. 7, 8. where his exhortation to the citizens of Ierusalem is set forth: Be ye valiant and feare not, neither be dismayed with the feare of the king of Assur, and the multitude with him, for he is more that is with us, then with him, &c. which speech is said to have bene cordiall to the people, v. 6. And it is said, v. 1. that after the godly orders before spoken of firmly settled by Hezekiah, came Sennacherib, intimating, that his coming was onely or chiefly to exercise his faith and to make it the more glorious, when as by so great a power coming against him he being tryed quailed not, but encouraged others, and finally so miraculously prevailed against him, by his fervent prayers bringing downe destruction upon his army and him also.

But whereas, 2 King. 18. 13. it is said, that he came against all the defended cities of Iudah and took them, here it is said onely that he invaded Iudah and pitched his tents against the defended cities thereof, thinking to subdue them to himselfe. The meaning of that 2 King. 18. 16. that he presumed soon that he should take them, neither did the Iews themselves make any other account, by reason of his irresistible forces, wherefore the writer of the Chronicles, to make it more plain saith, that he thought, or as it is in the Hebrew, he said, meaning in his heart, that he would, &c. For 2 Chron. 32. 9. it is plainly said, that he was besieging Lachish, when he sent messengers to Hezekiah, and therefore all the cities of Iudah were not taken, neither when it is said, that he came against them all, is it to be understood, that he did so any otherwise, but in purpose and resolution, because he could not so do, they being very many, but he must necessarily begin with some first, and most probably, he having taken some of lesse strength, proceeded to besiege

Iunius.Hieronym. in Esa. 20.Iunius.

2 Chron. 22.

V. 1.

Iosb. 15. 39.Iosb. 15.

Josephus.

Josephus.

2 Chron. 32. 2,
3. 4.

Lyra.

Junius.

besiege Lachish, a city that might not be so easily subdued. And if he had taken any, then those words 2 King. 18. 13. must be understood, he took some of them, when it is said, he took them; but others which he had not wonne, he laid siege unto, as he came at any of them. Josephus relating this history saith, that Sennacherib bringing with him the whole strength of Asia, divided his army into two parts, one of which he sent with his captain Tartan, against Azotus or Ashdod of the Philistims, of which see Esa. 20. and with the other he came against Iudah, so likewise Chron. Hebr. c. 13. In the same hour that he came against Iudah he sent Tartan against Azotus. Thinking, because he had forces sufficient, with one part of them to keep the Philistims, who were at this time subject to Hezekiah from coming to help him, and withall to stop the passage of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, whom he most feared, whilest he was busied in the Iewish warres. Whether this were so or not, certain it is, that about this time the Philistims were overcome by him, and not long after the Egyptians under Tirhakah, according to Esa. 20. Hezekiah his sending to pacifie the Assyrian king, which was the first thing done on his part after his coming into this countrey, being sufficiently set forth 2 King. 18. is in the Chronicles omitted. And what he did after that, he fought by so great a price to buy his peace, but was by the perfidious king notwithstanding come against, is onely set down, as being omitted in the Kings. But how it happened that when he submitted himself for the safeguard of his countrey, as a provident king, to pay such a masse of silver and gold, he had the Assyrian forces yet bent against him, is left untouched in both. Josephus saith, and we may easily conjecture the same, that Sennacherib promised by oath, that if Hezekiah did pay unto him so much silver and gold, he would depart with all his power, and not invade his land any further, but he sware this deceitfully, intending first to draw from him what treasure he could, and then to go against him and subdue his whole kingdome. This being perceived by Hezekiah, he consulted with his people about using the best means that he could, to keep off so great an army from lying near to Ierusalem, and for this end, with the help of his people, he dammed up all the fountains of water thereabouts, and stopped the course of that, which ran from the city through the midst of the countrey, that is, into other parts; and this Lyra conjectureth, that he did by digging a great head or pond to receive that water, and when that was full and ran over, making it a passage under the ground, that the Assyrians might have no benefit by it, and for want of water be forced estoons to depart from thence, see 2 Chron. 32. 30. And then having also repaired the wall, which had been broken by Joas king of Israel in the dayes of Amaziah, 2 King. 14. 13, 14. and built an outer wall for more strength, he called the people together and made that oration unto them so cordiall and comfortable, v. 6, 7. And if the wall remained broken from the dayes of Amaziah till this time, it lay in ruine above 98. years, that is, 52 in the reign of Vzziah, 16 under Iotham, 16 Ahaz, and 14 to this year of Hezekiah, which is a marvell, considering that Vzziah is said to have had a prosperous time, and to have built towers in Ierusalem, 2 Chron. 26. 9. yet indeed nothing is spoken of his repairing the broken wall, so that it might probably remain in the same state, in which Amaziah his father left it, Vzziah haply intending after his towers building to do it, but being prevented by the judgement of leprosie, which befell him, left it; and so it continued, till this time, yet not in that length broken, but being almost all rebuilt before, now in the time of this danger it was with speed finished, and another such wall added, as they were able in that shortness of time to make. Thus Hezekiah did now, and thus he expressed his true trust and confidence in God, which sheweth, that he sent not to compound before, out of any base fear, but that he might use the most effectually ordinary means, if haply so, this tyrant would have been moved to depart, to save the shedding of much blood of his people. If he shall seem to have committed sacrilege (which he ought not to have done) in that he took away the treasures and ornaments of the temple; I answer, that the present necessity was a dispensation unto him, neither is it sacrilege in any king, but warrantable by this example to do the like in the like case, having a minde to give again as much to the house of God, when he shall be able, as he

he taketh away, for necessity hath no law, and so precious are mens lives in Gods sight, that to save them he is not unwilling, that his rights should be taken, seeing the faithfull are his living temples, in which he dwelleth by his Spirit.

After this preparation made for defence and an oration full of faith unto the people to stirre them up to beleewe, Sennacherib being still at the siege of Lachish sent messengers to Hezekiah, 2 King. 18.17. He sent Tartan, Rabaris and Rabshakeh with a great army. But how could this be, seeing he with all his domination laid siege to Lachish? the Vulg. Lat. [he with all his army] It is to be understood of that part, the leading whereof he tooke upon himselfe: as may be gathered from that, which hath been already said about this dividing of his forces into two parts, whereof he committing one to Tartan according to Esa. 20. And he sent these men with this great company to terrifie the Jewes, that they might deliver the city of Ierusalem unto him, and not yet to lay siege unto it; neither indeed ever did he, according to the Prophecie of Esay, 2 King. 19.32. but lost his army, and was himselfe destroyed for attempting it in so insolent a manner. Touching the reason why Sennacherib sent against Hezekiah after the composition before spoken of made with him; Pellican himselfe thinketh, that Hezekiah made account, that when he paid so great a summe of silver and gold, the Assyrian would not have expected also a yearly tribute from him, but he requiring this, Hezekiah by the perswasion of Gods Prophets refused & so rebelled the second time against him, whereupon he sent, as here followeth; but for as much as no such thing is said in the text, this is uncertaine, and it is rather to be held, as was before said, that when he had received the money, he would not depart, but most injuriously would have the city delivered unto him also, and this being denied, he sent thus to threaten and expostulate with the people. Amongst the persons of note sent, Rabshakeh in particular is the mouth, v. 19. and it seemeth, v. 26. that he spake in the Hebrew tongue. The Rabbins, as Ierome hath it, upon this, say, that he was the son of the Prophet Esay, who fell from the true religion and ranne away to the Assyrians, and therefore was now employed by them; but the ground hereof is so weake, that it is not worth the confuting, viz. because Esay had another sonne called Iasub, signifying Left: but it followeth not from hence, that he had his name for this reason. And they adde, that by the menaces of Rabshakeh, Shebnah, one of them, who was sent by Hezekiah to speake to the Assyrian Embassadors, was so terrified, that he betrayed part of the city Ierusalem into their hands, and for this the Prophet Esay speaketh so bitterly against him, Esa. 22.15, 16, &c. and threateneth his putting out and placing Eliakim in his roome by a decree not to be altered.

But although he were thus threatened, yet it no where appeareth, that this was the ground or cause, but rather his relying upon outward meanes, and not trusting in God; and for his betraying of any part of the city, there is nothing to intimate it, but rather the contrary; both because he went with Hilkiah after this to the Prophet Esay, and it was by him promised that he should not enter this city or doe any hostile act against it, 2 King. 19.32. Iunius upon Esay 22.15. saith, that Shebnah, who was now over the house, held that Office in the dayes of wicked Ahaz, father to Hezekiah, being, as his old master, wicked in heart, and secretly a favourer of wicked idolaters, and an hinderer of reformation, yet he could not at the first be outed by reason of his greatnesse, onely since the time of Esay his prophesying against him, he was put from that Office and made the Kings Scribe, that so he might have lesse power and Eliakim placed in his roome. For which both here and Esa. 36.3. Eliakim is said to be over the house, and Shebnah the Scribe, or principall Secretary to the King, haply his age being pretended, which made him unfit to hold that place any longer; and this being an honourable place, and because it was of little paines, fit for a man now grown old, Esa. 36.2. Because Rabshakeh was the onely speaker, he onely is mentioned, as sent by Sennacherib.

Now for the speech of Rabshakeh, some parts of it onely are set forth, 2 Chron. 32.9, 10, &c. because it is contained at large in this place, v. 19, 20, 21. and Esa. 36. we have the same set forth verbatim, from whence most probably both this and the whole

V.9.
2 King. 18.17.

Pellican.

Ierom. de tradit. hebr.

Justin.

V.19.

whole 19. chapter, and 20. to v. 19. was taken and interted here, which maketh this history of Hezekiah king of Judah so compleat as that the writer of the Chronicles had nothing left him to adde hereunto, as his manner hath hitherto beene touching all other kings of Judah, but onely before this conflict with Sennacherib as hath been already shewed, and after his recovery from his dangerous sicknesse, from v. 25. of 2 Chron. 32. to v. 31. where some remarkable passages more are set forth then in Kings.

The place, where Rabshakeh stood, was at the conduit of the upper fishpoole, as the way lay to the fullers field, a place neare Ierusalem, where Fullers used to wash and dry their clothes, being a plaine place neare to the wals of the city. Here *Sennacherib*s messengers call to the king, but he not thinking it safe to come out unto them in person, who were so false hearted, (for the person of the King is not to be hazarded) nor yet to stand with his honour to deale any otherwise with the king of Assyria, then he dealt with him, viz. by messengers, sent his servants to speak with the servants of that king, Eliakim governour of the house, Shebnah the Scribe, and Ioas Recorder. Concerning which offices enough hath been said before upon 2 Sam. 10. 24, 25, 26.

Pellican.

V. 19.

For the speech of Rabshakeh, v. 19. Say to Hezekiah, thus saith the great king, the King of Assyria, What is that trust in which thou trustest, &c.] Which was spoken out of intollerable pride in respect of the king of Ashurs unresistable strength, as thinking it vaine for Hezekiah to trust either in God or man to be saved out of his hands. For so he goeth on, to beat him from all confidence, in the king of Egypt, calling him a broken staffe of reed; not that Hezekiah sought help from Egypt, as Pellican noteth, but because he was his next neighbour; and it is the manner of kings in time of danger to seek to some neighbour king for aid: wherefore Rabshakeh presuming also, that he did so, as Hosheah the last king of Israel had done before, propounds this as true, when it was false, and Hezekiah was not so prophane as to doe thus, seeing if he had done it, some record in the Sacred History would have beene made thereof. Yet Wolphius holdeth, that he did, but without ground, as I have made it appeare before by examining the prophesie of Esa. the allegory of a broken staffe of reed was very apt both for the situation of Egypt in a low reedy ground, and because a reed leaned upon giveth a man a fall, and hurteth his hand by piercing it. 2. He proceedeth to shew, that if he trusted in God, this was vaine, seeing he had broken down his high places and altars in other places, restraining all his worship to one place at Ierusalem onely. And this he spake after the manner of an heathen. (which sheweth, that he was no Jew) for they thought that it tended greatly to the honour and glory of their gods to set up altars and temples to them in many places, and that to breake downe any formerly set up was a dishonour which could not, but greatly incense them. But he was herein deceived, for when one stately temple was by Solomon built to the honour of the true God, to shew, that he was one onely and his religion one, he forbade sacrificing in any other place. 3. He propounds to his consideration, how much he was overmatched, seeing he had not men enough to manage two thousand warre horses, and he had so many to spare, if he would, for him, and yet too great a power for him to encounter, although he had Egypt on his side. 4. Which might move him most, he saith, that God bade him come against that countrey and destroy it. This, saith Wolphius, he spake from their owne principles, viz. that nothing comes to passe without Gods providence, and according to Esa. 10. 5. where Ashur is called the rod of Gods anger against Ierusalem: but that it should not remaine long upon it. And accordingly the king thereof at this time distressed it, and probably took some other parts belonging to the king Hezekiah, that reigned in Ierusalem, but that he should destroy the countrey can not from thence be truly gathered.

Pellican.

Wolphius.

V. 22.

Levit. 17. 3. 4.

Deut. 16. 5.

V. 23, 24

V. 26.

Wolphius.

V. 26.

Lyra.

Eliakim hearing his oration, together with his fellowes, besought him to speak unto them in the Syriack tongue, and not in the Iewes tongue in their hearing, who were upō the wal, lest they should be terrified by his words. Lyra saith, not only the Rabbins, but also our doctours commonly gather, that Rabshakeh was a Jew, because he spake Hebrew; but this is no argument, seeing it seemeth, he could have spoken spoken Syriack also; and Lyra himself noteth, that men near the king learned more languages commonly, that they might be the fitter to entertain forraign embassadours. But why would they have him to speak in the Syriack tongue? and not rather in the Assyrian or Chaldee? seeing he came from the king of Assyria. Sol. The Syrians, Chaldeans, and Assyrians, used all one and the same tongue, as Wolphius noteth, and the Jews language not differing much from it, but as one dialect in the Greek tongue from another, came afterwards in their captivity easily to be turned into it, their own being forgotten. But whereas they sought from hence to move this Rabshakeh to speak unto them in this tongue, that it might not be understood of the people, which he said, he condemneth as most foolish, absurd, and pernicious, because it could not but be conceived, as it fell out indeed, that he would by this motion be more provoked then stayed, from speaking whatsoever he could devise, to stir up the people to revolt from the obedience of Hezekiah, and their saying so, shewed a fear in them of the peoples fidelity towards their king, and was enough to stir them up to a jealousy against him, that he would have them kept hood-winked, that they might not know their danger, till it came upon them, which could not but greatly exasperate them. Yet that such an aspersion might not be cast upon Eliakim, or Ioas, who were good men, he conceiveth that this was the devise of wicked Shebnah, purposely to provoke Rabshakeh to rail the more, and to lay open that, whereby the people might be moved to yield up the city, and yet he thought, that by making this motion he should be conceived to be very godly, and a great lover of his countrey, when he secretly meditated the betraying of it into the Assyrians hands. And if otherwise it came from Eliakim, he imputeth it to his fear, which made him speak unadvisedly; thus he. But others blame them not for thus saying, because either that the people might by this means be provoked to shoot at him from the wall, or would be overmuch terrified, was to be feared. I hold with those that lay no blame upon these messengers of Hezekiah, for making this motion, because they thought haply, that he spake in the Jews language, as supposing that they understood none other, and it irked them, that all the people should hear their good king thus traduced, making no doubt, but that his errand being to the king, he would hereupon be moved to alter his language, as having in commission not to speak to any other, but to commissioners sent from the king, however it fell out to the contrary.

Rabshakeh utterly refusing to hearken to this motion, takes occasion hereupon to traduce it, as if he that made it, cared not to what miseries the poor people were exposed, saying, but my lord sent me to speak to thy lord and to thee these words, and not to the people, that they might eat their own dung? &c. Hereby intimating a long siege, which they must necessarily endure, and at the last be forced to yield, and therefore that they should provide best for their own good, to do it now at the first.

Then he spake with a loud voice to the people, Let not Hezekiah deceive you, for he shall not be able to deliver you, &c. ] That is, to make you abide quietly in the city, and to hold it against Sanneherib. For neither is his power sufficient to secure you in thus doing, neither can his God in whom he would have you to trust, defend you from him. Because other gods, as experience had already shewed, could not save their people; viz. the gods of Hamath and Arphad, Sephervaim, Hevah, and Ivah, nor the gods of Samaria. Of Hamath and Sephervaim and Hevah, see before ch. 17. 24. Arphad, saith Iunius, was a countrey in the upper part of Assyria. Ivah, called Ingilines in Epiphanius, in Mesopotamia. Of Samaria, it hath been shewed, how that was taken by the Assyrians, ch. 17. and 18. 10. He therefore moveth them in time to provide for their own good, by coming forth with a present to Sanneherib, as Iunius rendreth it, by doing that which might be profitable for them, saith the vulgar Latin, but in the Hebrew it is, make a covenant with him, that is, by voluntary submitting and making oath unto him to be his subjects. Then he promiseth on Sanneheribs behalf, if they would do so, that they should remain in safety in their own land, living as they had done in times past, every one in his possession, till that he should remove them to one like their own most Wolphius.Pellican.

Lyra.

V. 27.

V. 28.

*Faciun.*V. 31.
V. 32.

V. 36.

Lyra.

Pellican.
Wolphius.

Note.

V. 37.

fruitfull, that is, at his return out of Egypt, Gloss. Ordin. For so he had already dealt with the Israelites their brethren, and with the Syrians, who were removed into other countries, in policy to keep them the better under. And thus he concludeth, that they might live, but otherwise dye, because neither Hezekiah nor his God could save them. But herein he blasphemed the living God, as also his Lord Sanneherib doth cb. 19. 12. in comparing dumb idols, the work of mens hands with him, for such were the gods of the gentiles, and therefore his judgement was not long delayed. To this railing and blasphemous oration, no man made any answer, for so the king had commanded, lest Rabshakeh should be provoked to blaspheme the more, according to Lyra. They had a most wise and godly king, who would have the answering of this reserved to himself, and therefore they did better to obey him in silence, then to be moved by Rabshakeh to answer, so Pellican. But not onely for this cause, saith Wolphius, and that reason rendred by Lyra, was this silence enjoyned, but also lest liberty of answering being left unto the people, something might rashly have been uttered, whereby the enemy might have had advantage given him, to gather the disposition of the people, or the state of the city; And lastly, to shew his contempt of the Assyrian King, and how much he slighted him for the vile speeches of his messenger, as a dog or swine, before whom pearls and holy things are not to be cast. And to teach us to answer such in their calumnies with silence, whom we have no hope to amend by speaking; And the strict obedience of the people to their king in this case is worthy the imitation of all subjects, as being the safest way in times of greatest danger, the king being wise and godly, and carefull to preserve the kingdome. Then they that were sent, returned with their garments rent unto the king, relating all unto him. For thus in sorrow the Jews commonly used to do for blasphemy, or some great misery, as hath been sometimes noted before, and in the high Priest, supposing that Christ had blasphemed.

CHAP. XIX.

V. 1.

Gloss. ordin.

Lyra.

Sallianus.

V. 3.

Lyra.
Wolphius.

H Hezekiah hearing this, rent his clothes, and putting on sackcloth went to the house of the Lord, &c. ] 2 Chron. 33. 18. it is said, that the servants of Sanneherib spake more against God and the king, wherefore he presently humbled himself in prayer, and whilest he was thus doing, sent to the prophet Esay. He considered, saith Gloss. ordin. that the sinnes of the land might be the cause of this misery, and therefore he mourned. And although it be not exprest, what he now prayed, Lyra conjectureth, that it was for pardon, and help, and mercy towards the people, and justice towards blasphemers, and because he thought there was more merit in the prayers of Esay then in his own, he sent to him to pray also; he should have said, because he thought, that his prayers could more prevail, seeing he was a prophet of the Lord, and so most gracious with him, as sometime Elijah and Samuel, and Moses, &c. had been. For what can the poor merit at the hands of the rich by begging? And therefore another of the same religion saith better, he sent to Esay, as to one, that had most inward familiarity with the Lord, and he sent the same messengers that came unto him with their clothes rent, together with certain priests clad also in sackcloth. Whereas coming to Esay they complain of their common calamity, and say, the children are come to the birth, and there is no power to bring forth; that is, the state is now like unto a woman in travell full of pangs, which are to much the greater, because she cannot bring forth: for even so was Hezekiah and his people in Ierusalem; they conceived great indignation and horreur at the blasphemies of the Assyrian king, being desirous to revenge this wrong done to their God, but his forces were so great, and theirs so small, that they were no way able to do it, which made their sorrowes to continue, and them to flee to the divine Majesty, who only is able to judg him according to his demerits, thus, but more briefly Lyra and some others. But Wolphius more fully. We are full of sorrow, as a woman

a woman in travell, that cannot be delivered, both for the great power which is come against us, and because our God is so vilified, as unable to help, and his servant Hazekiah, as a deceiver and oppugner of his worship, to promote which his chief care hath been, inasmuch, as if a woman at the point of bringing forth be not presently holpen, there is danger of perishing both to her and her children, so if God make not haste to help his people in these extremities, there will be present danger of ruining all, both the city and religion. By the children come to the birth, he meaneth the people in distresse, unto whom he being as a mother, laboured to bring them forth of it, by doing what in him lay by great gifts sent to Sanneberib, but he was not able, for still the danger continued. Pellican likeneth the conscience of their own sinnes, thought to be the cause of Rabshakeh his blasphemies to the pangs of a woman in travell, that cannot be delivered, because they are as bitter to a godly soul. I rest in the first, Hazekiah and his people were as much pained at these blasphemies, as a woman that wanteth strength, when the childe is even now come to the birth; because they went to their hearts, making their spirits ready to fail, and power they had not to overcome them, wherefore he did flee to God for help, being otherwise ready by and by, together with his people to perish, and desired Esay to pray for the remnant of the people, that is, them being but a remnant, in comparison of the great number that were of them, before they were wasted in the time of Abaz, so Lyra; or a remnant he calleth them, with reference to their brethren of Israel, who were carried away captive before.

The kings messengers coming to Esay, are comforted against these their great sorrowes, and sent back with comfort unto him. For the prophet biddeth from the Lord, that he should not fear Sanneberib's brags, saying moreover, I will send a spirit unto him, and he shall hear a message, and return into his own land, and fall by the sword there. That is, a spirit of trouble at the message brought touching the king of Ethiopia coming to fight against him, and when he hath gone against him and is returned, his holte being cut off and destroyed, he shall return and fall by the sword in his own land, all which came to passe accordingly, but not till he came again from fighting against the Ethiopians, so Lyra. But Wolphius, by the spirit, which he would send unto him at the hearing of a message, understandeth a panick fear, wherewith he should be surprized at the hearing of the destruction of his army by the Angell of God sent out in the night against it, the lamentable cries whereof should come to his ears and affright him. Some by this spirit understand the fear, where with he should be stricken at the hearing of the Ethiopian king, lest the Ethiopians and Egyptians joyning together against him, whilest he went to fight against them, the Jews should come upon him at his back, and so being beset with three nations at once, he should be endangered with his whole army. Iunius, by this spirit understandeth a minde to return. But I prefer that of Wolphius, because he was not so much afraid of the Ethiopians, that we read of, nor at the hearing of that message, nor caused hereby to return home, but still continued as full of courage, and insulted as much over the God of Israel, and Hazekiah his servant, as appeareth by his letters unto him, as he did before. But so soon as, his army being destroyed, the noise thereof came to his ears, he presently fled away. Neither doth the word rendred Message in the vulgar Latin, signifie any thing else, but an hearing, he shall hear an hearing, or sound, Iunius hath it, a rumour. It is therefore to be conceived, that the prophet overpassing the impediment, which he met withall by reason of the Ethiopian king, comforteth Hazekiah and his people by this, wherein the greatest comfort lay, viz. the enforcing of Sanneberib to flee to his own countrey, never to come against Ierusalem, or any other city of Iudah again, which yet was not immediately fulfilled, as we may gather from v. 9. but a year after, when he had ended his warre against the Ethiopian, and returned, thinking to take Ierusalem. For there the prophet giveth this signe to confirm his words. This year ye shall eat that which groweth of it self, and the next year, and the third ye shall sow and reap. Implying an whole year to come after that, wherein he thus promised, before their full deliverance.

Rabshakeh having no answer, and thereby perceiving, that the Jews meant to Pellican.

V. 6.

V. 7.

Lyra.
Wolphius.Tostatus.Iunius.

V. 8.

Tostatus.
Lyra.
Pellican.

Junius.
Iosephus.

Genebrard.
S. Sulpitius.

V. 10.

Lyra.

V. 12.

Junius.

Wolphius.

hold Ierusalem against his Master, returned unto him at Libnah, for he heard that he was gone from Lachish, being, as is generally thought by expositours, taken, because it is improbable, that he would otherwise have gone from the siege thereof to another. Rabshakeh coming to him at Libnah relateth unto him the stoutnesse of the Iewes at Ierusalem: Whereupon he wrote as followeth, v. 9. Because he being enforced to go against Tirachab king of Ethiopia, and Egypt, as is commonly held, could not goe immediately against Ierusalem as he desired. But this coming of the Ethiopian king against Sennacherib is not thought to have been against his countrey in this his absence, but in the place, where he then was, whereas indeed it seemeth rather to have beene against his countrey, both because it is here said, he returned, although Junius for this word hath nothing else but again, he wrote letters, &c. but in Hebrew it is, he returned, and wrote. And so Iosephus saith, he heard, that the king of Ethiopia led an army through the desert against the Assyrians, whereupon he returned: so likewise Genebrard and Severus Sulpitius, but as Iosephus saith, he left Rabshakeh with two others to continue the warres against the Iewes in the meane season, so that they could not in his absence intend their husbandry, but lived upon that, which grew of it selfe, according to the forementioned Prophecie. And the long time, that he was in this expedition against Tirachab, viz. an whole year at the least makes it the more probable, that he tooke a long journey to repress the Ethiopians, even to Assyria, which was seven hundred miles, and not that the Ethiopians came neare Iudea to fight against his army there, for then he should doubtlesse have sooner ended that warre. Of what great power the Ethiopian King was, so that he had need with all his might to oppose him, see in the example of Zerah king of Ethiopia, 2 Chron. 14. 9. who came against Asa with 100000. men.

For his writing to Hezekiah, it is said, that he sent messengers to him, that should say, Let not thy God deceive thee, in whom thou trustest, saying, Ierusalem shall not be delivered into the hands of the king of Assyria, &c. and yet v. 14. When Hezekiah had received the letters, &c. So that it seemeth he both wrote and committed the same to be delivered by word of mouth to these his messengers also. To this effect Lyra saith, He threatned him both by word and writing to strike the greater terrour into him. See also 2 Chron. 32. 17, 18.

And in this speech and letter is nothing, but the same, which Rabshakeh had said before, nor all that, yet coming to reckon up the countreys, which the Kings of Assyria had subdued, v. 12. he is more full, then Rabshakeh had been, saying, Have the gods of the nations, which my ancestors destroyed, delivered them? For whereas Rabshakeh addeth next to these words, Where be the gods of Hamath and Arpad, &c. He before his coming to Hamath inserteth others thus, Gozan, Charan, and Rezep, and the children of Eden, which are in Thelassar. Junius thinketh Gozan to be the same, that is called Nehar Gozan, chap. 17. 6. Charan, that city in Mesopotamia, Gen. 11. 31. Rezep also, according to Ptolomee, he placeth in Mesopotamia. The children of Eden in Thelassar, about the midst of Euphrates, being a garrison appointed to that place by the king of Babylon, where they pitch their tents, as the word Thelassar signifieth. Wolphius saith, that Ptolomey in his Geographicks sometime placeth Rezep in Syria, as may be seen in his description of Syria, and sometime in Mesopotamia, & that some hold it to be the same with the city Petra in Arabia; but most probably it lay in Syria, because that countrey was now certainly subdued by the king of Assyria. By the children of Eden he understandeth a people of Eden Eastward now inhabiting the city Talathah standing according to Ptolomey betweene Apamia and the Persian bosome. It being of no great consequence to know these things more certainly, and haply the certaine knowledge hereof not to be attained, we may be content to know onely thus much, that for their chastisement for sinne God gave many kingdomes into his hands, whom he to have them more certainly at his obey, removed from their native countreys to others, as the children of Eden in particular, of whom also mention is made, as of fellows to Tyre Ezek. 27. But he not knowing by whose gift he obtained these countreys tooke occasion from thence proudly to magnifie his owne power and to extenuate the the Lords, and if he made any promise, as having power against him, he blasphemously called it a deceiving and not to be trusted to, threatening Hezekiah, that he should not be delivered by all that he could doe, and therefore the best way for him were to yield the city quietly into his hands.

Hezekiah having heard this message, and received letters to this effect spreadeth the letters before the Lord and prayeth, saying, (O Lord God of Israel, who sittest between the cherubims, &c. That is, as Lyra hath it, rulest over the glorious angels represented by the cherubims set in the most holy place, and therefore the Mercy-seat was supported, between them, which was the seat of God. And he mentioneth his sitting there, saith Pellican, as intimating his readinesse, according to his promise to Moses, to meet such as seek him in his house. And to shew the confidence, that he had in his power over all things in heaven and earth, he calleth him Lord of all kingdomes, and maker of heaven and earth. He had before a promise against Sanneherib, so as that he might have contemned his threats: but because he iterated the same message againe, he fought the second time unto the Lord, that he might be further confirmed, and by hearing answer from the Lord againe comforted against the sorrow, which he could not but conceive at these iterated blasphemies, teaching us in his example still to seeke by prayer even that, which God hath promised.

When Hezekiah had made an end of praying, the Lord suffered him not to stay for an answer, but prevented his sending againe to Esay by causing the Prophet to send to him, saying, Thus saith the Lord, I have heard thy prayer against Sanneherib. And this is the word which the Lord hath spoken concerning him; The virgin, the daughter of Sion hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn, &c. That is, the faithfull king and people of Sion, the highest part of the city Ierusalem have contemned and derided thy boasts and brags made against her, knowing assuredly, that all thy power is weaknesse to doe her hurt, having the Almighty on her side. And he saith, the virgin daughter of Sion, because there were some alwayes there, that persisted in the true faith uncorrupted. Then he turneth his speech to Sanneherib, saying, Whom hast thou upbraided and blasphemed, &c. Even the holy one of Israel, that is, the most holy God, who is peculiarly the God of Israel, because he chose Israel above all peoples, and onely there was he worshipped aright.

Thou hast upbraided the Lord by the hand of thy messengers, That is, by Rabshakeh and others sent the second time, whereby the proud kings abusing of the Lord is aggravated, in that he did not onely blaspheme with his owne mouth and pen, but by his servants who were of an inferiour condition.

Then he addeth other words full of insolency which he spake, With the multitude of my chariots I have ascended unto the high places of the mountaines, &c. Hereby, saith Lyra, he meaneth Ierusalem. To the top of Libanus and cut down the Cedars thereof. That is, destroyed the temple made of Cedars of Libanus, which he is brought in speaking, not because he had already done it, but did as certainly promise himselfe in his owne heart, that he should doe, as if by this time it had beene done. He also by Cedars understandeth the Nobles of the land, and by the Forrest of Carmel the common sort: and whereas he saith, I have drunke the waters of others and dried them up by the steps of my feete: It is meant, that he had gotten all the cisterns and wells with water made at other mens cost, and had to many men and beasts in his army, that all the waters of Iudea would not suffice them to drinke by a vainglorious hyperbole. But we may better with Wolphins understand Libanus properly, the height whereof was such, as that it was impregnable. Yet this tyrant bragged of coming over this huge mountaine, and cutting downe the Cedars thereof, which were preserved for speciall uses by the kings of Iudah for the building of houses of greatest note, as the house of the Lord, and the kings, but he in spite of Hezekiah would cut them down; and adding to this the Forrest of Carmel also, another high mountaine towards the sea, it is meant, that he would bring under his power all places of greatest note both farre and wide. Lastly, in saying, I have digged and drunke others waters, He meaneth, that the work, which Hezekiah and his people had done in stopping the waters about Ierusalem

V. 14.

Lyra.

Pellican.

Note.

V. 20.

V. 21.

Lyra.

V. 22.

V. 23.

Lyra.

Wolphins.

V. 24.

V.

before spoken of, that Sanneherib coming with his host might finde none, should little avails them; because he with his great multitudes were soone able to digge new wells of water sufficient for them to drinke, and to make their waters within the city soone to faile. Of which words, although we read nothing before, yet probably they were spoken by his servants at his first sending, seeing it is said, that they spake much more, then was expressed, 2 Chron. 32. 16.

V. 25.

Lyra.

Wolphins.

Chald. paraph.

Hierom. in Esa.

V. 27.

Psal. 39.

V. 28.

Wolphins.

But what doth the Lord now answer to this? v. 25. Hast thou not heard long ago, that I have done it, and of ancient times, that I have formed it, and now that I bring it to passe, that thou shouldst be to the troubling of defenced places, &c. ] That is, saith Lyra, at the beginning of the world, that I made it and all things contained therein: for this the very heathen Philosophers taught, when they said, there was one cause of all other things, viz. the God of gods, and now for the times of divers nations, I appoint thy ancestors and thee as my scourge to bring to ruine many strong cities, not by any might or power of your own, but by me given unto you, and to be taken away again when I please. For which cause the Lord calleth Athur his rod and staffe, Esa. 10. 5. 6. to scourge and beat many nations withall, but because he did it, as by his own might proudly being putt up hereby, a wo is denounced against him. Wolphins analysing this speech of the Lord, makes it to answer to Sanneherib's letters in the three parts thereof. First, whereas he bragged of his many conquests, this is answered v. 25, 26. Secondly, whereas he magnifieth himself, this is answered, v. 27. Thirdly, whereas he threatned what he would do further, this is answered v. 28, 32, 33. To the first, he did nothing by his own, but the power of God; to the second, he was well known to the Lord, and how weak and unable to subsist any longer then he pleased; to the third, he should do nothing against Ierusalem, but be carried back into his own countrey and be slain there. Touching these words, hast thou not heard of old that I made it, &c. he saith, that some understand them as spoken of Pharaoh, and what he did many ages before, but this cannot be, because it is added, and now I bring it to passe. Some by it understand Ierusalem, which the Lord made and formed in that beauty, long before the Assyrian Monarks were: but neither can this stand, because the thing pointed at here, is the laying desolate of defenced cities, as Ierusalem should never be by him. Wherefore he setteth this down rather, as the true meaning. Hast thou not heard of old, that I have done that which thou speakest of, viz. set up thy ancestors and thee in this height of worldly glory, and made other nations of no strength, before them and thee, and he addeth, that in ancient times he formed it, that is, laid down from the beginning of the world in his minde, a platform of all this, which is now come to passe. And he asketh him, if he had not heard it, because he was not so barbarous, but he must needs ascribe to the divine power the elevation of his own house and kingdome, and the pulling down of others, yea he said before by his messenger Rabshakeh, that God bade him come up against Ierusalem, and destroy it. From this dissenteth not Ierom, who also understandeth the word [ it ] of that which by Gods providence and predetermination the Assyrian kings had done against other nations, taking away all heart and courage to resist from them, and making them as weak as grass, as here followeth v. 26. So likewise Iunius, Pellican and others, neither can it be understood otherwise by any, that duly consider these two verses together.

I know thy sitting down, or dwelling, and thy going out and rage against me, &c. ] That is, although thou hadst not in words boasted of thy greatnesse, and uttered thy fury against my city and servants, I know well enough what counsels thou tookest in thy minde, yea all thy very thoughts and intentions, for by Gods knowing of his sitting down and rising up, David sheweth, that all the most secret cogitations and counsels of his minde were known unto God, but these of Sanneherib were both known and derided, as meer vanities. And because the Lord knew him to be raging like a beast, he threatneth to use him accordingly, viz. to put an hook in his nostrills, &c. alluding to the manner of men towards a buffe or wilde oxe, into whose nostrills an hook being put, he is led to the house of slaughter. For even so the Lord shewed by thus saying, that he would with shame and disgrace thus bring him back to Assyria, as to his slaughter-house.

And

And to thee (O Hezekiah) this shall be a signe, eat this yeare what thou findest, the second yeare that which groweth of it selfe, &c. ] Thus the Vulg. Lat. but Paganius, whom Iunius, Wolphius and other Translatours follow: eat this yeare what groweth of it selfe, and likewise the second. But for so much as two divers words for these two yeares are used, for the first ספיר Saphiach, coming of [ Saphac ] to gather: for the second שרש Sachish, signifying that which groweth of it selfe, Wolphius well acknowledgeth, that the store then by them, which they had before gathered and laid up, might well be meant hereby; so also Lyra. And it agreeth best with reason, that they should one yeare live of their old store, and when this failed, God hereby promised a supply extraordinary of fruits and selfe-sowne corne haply encreasing the more by meanes of the corn the year before beaten downe and spoiled by the Assyrian armies. So that Hezekiah and his people are hereby comforted and confirmed against the feare of want during the time, that their enemies placed in that countrey by Sanneherib annoyed them. For although they could not goe forth to plow and sowe, yet God promiseth by his blessing to cause the earth to bring forth so much fruit even in this troublesome time, (suffered happily by the Assyrians to grow to maturity in hope to enjoy it themselves) as should satisfie them and keepe them from famishing. And if it be doubted how they should come to reape it, seeing their enemies were in the land? It is to be conceived, that at the very time, when it was to be gathered in, the Assyrians were smitten, as is here by and by related, and then they had their full liberty. For although the signe given is extended to the third yeare, when he saith, The third yeare sowe and reape: Yet it is not to be understood so, as if they should doe thus before their deliverance, but that when they had beene preserved one whole yeare by their old store, the enemy all that while ranging about the countrey, so that they could not provide for the next, in it they should be extraordinarily provided for by corne growing of it selfe, as well as if they had followed their wonted course of husbandry; and by this means they should also have seed to sowe the ground to be reaped the third yeare, being at the time of reaping the second yeares crop miraculously set free from the feare of their enemies. It was not then the term of three yeares, that passed before the putting of the hook into Sanneheribs nostrils, and that prodigious slaughter of his men, nor much lesse then a year after his so foully blaspheming of the God of Israel, and yet a signe is given of three yeares continuance, whereof part must needs follow after the thing signified hereby, but so plain a shew was in the second yeare made hereof, that they might well beleieve it, seeing the earth so to fructifie without labour, that they should not in the third want either provision for sustenance, or seed. For why should it be doubted, when they had and used means, whether God who had promised, would make the earth to bring forth abundantly, when as without meanes he had sufficiently furnisht them with provision the year before? If it be demanded, how this could be a signe to confirm their faith, considering that they saw it not performed, till their deliverance? I answer, they did see the earth fructifying the second yeare, although unsown, and in the year wherein this was prophesied, their store haply was almost spent, but miraculously multiplied, as the meal and oyl of the widow of Sareptah, so that they wanted not, but still had enough, and forso much as this could not be without a singular providence, and divine favour towards them, how could it but confirm them touching his promised mercy against Sanneherib?

For the residue of the house of Judah, shall take rooting downward, and bring forth fruit, &c. ] Here he proceedeth from the encrease of the fruits, which should come of their sowing, when their enemies should be destroyed, unto their firm and stable habitation in the land, which remained, and escaped in Judah, wherein many doubtlesse had been slain by the Assyrians, by continuing his speech, as he had begun metaphorically. For what is a peoples taking rooting downward, but the firm establishing them in their place? as trees, the more deeply they are rooted stand the surer, and what is their bringing forth of fruit upward, but their encreasing in posterity, although Lyra expoundeth it of good works, but without reason.

And the remnant shall come out of Ierusalem, &c. ] That is, although now they shut

V. 29.

Lyra.

V. 30.

Lyra.

V. 31.

*Junius.
Pellican.*

Sallianum.

Pellican.

V. 32.

*Lyra.
Hieron. in Esa.
lib. 11.*

Wolphius.

V. 35.

shut up themselves within their wals for fear of the enemy, yet being delivered, they shall come forth again, as men at liberty, to plow, and sowe, and reap, as in former times: The zeal of the Lord will do this, and not their own merits, as Lyra well noteth. Whereas one expoundeth all this of the residue of their corn, which should greatly encrease, insomuch as that they should go out with it to sell to men of other countries, and have no need to lay it up at home for fear of another siege to come, I think it to be altogether from the purpose, because it is not said, the residue of the corn in Iudah, but the residue of the house of Iudah, and not the residue shall be brought forth as speaking of corn, but shall come out, as speaking of men, that have life and motion. Pellican extendeth that which is said of their going out, yet further, thus, they shall go out and take the rich spoils of three nations, Assyria, Ethiopia, and Egypt, by a singular providence brought thither, to become a prey unto them, conceiving, that Sanneherib having gone out to fight against the Ethiopians and Egyptians, and overcoming them, brought their spoils to his camp, which now came into the hands of the men of Iudah; but forsomuch as nothing is spoken of the spoils taken by them, but onely of the destruction of their enemies, I passe this over, as depending meerly upon conjecture. Comestor saith, that these words [shall go out] have reference to the men of other parts of the land, who in this time of danger, came for shelter to Ierusalem, but now returned to their own places and multiplied there, as they had formerly done, Eccles. histor.

He shall not enter into this city, nor shoot an arrow against it, &c.] The Lord hereby promisseth, that he should not onely not overcome it, but not be suffered to come and besiege it, but before that he with his hoste should approach so near as to shoot an arrow unto it, he should by the utter losse and overthrow of his army, be forced to flee away most shamefully. And this he promised to do for himself, that is, his glory, when all men hearing of it should extoll his power, and for Dauids sake, because of the covenant made with him. Lyra saith erroneously, for his merits. And therefore Jerome is rather to be heard, who is farre more ancient, who saith, for Dauids sake, that is, for, or in the remembrance of him, adding moreover, that so highly accepted of are some of the holy servants of God, that he is delighted to remember their pietie long after, and maketh it to go the better with their posterity therefore many generations after, as he also promisseth in the second Commandement. And as Wolphius hath it, his saying that he would do this for Dauids sake, is to be understood, for the promise sake made unto David, 2 Sam. 7. that the kingdome should be established to his posterity for ever.

Wherefore it came to passe the same night that the Angel of the Lord went out and smote in the tents of the Assyrians 185000.] That God, whom the proud King of Assyria had vilified and contemned, would not have execution done upon his army by any other, but his Angel, that he might against his blasphemies vindicate his power from contempt and prove it to be above all men and gods. But where this army now was, by what kinde of death it was smitten, and what night is meant by the same night, is uncertaine. But most probably his army was brought againe back from his Ethiopian expedition into the coasts of Iudah, because the Lord sweareth, Esa. 14. 25. in that land to tread him under his feete, and chap. 10. 12. having threatened to destroy his power, and v. 16. shewed the manner, how, viz. as it were by the burning of fire, and v. 26. as the Midianites and the Egyptians were destroyed, whom his Angel smote, he sheweth, v. 28. by what places he should passe, when this should be done, viz. Haiana, Migron and Michmasb Gibeah Ramah and Madmenah, naming Nob as the uttermost to which he should come towards Ierusalem, intimating the destruction of the Assyrians there, v. 32. Whereby we may gather, that at his returne from Ethiopia, he being come to Nob some sixteene miles off towards the North, where he appointed all his army to come together to him; for it is said, That he should appoint a day at Nob, his host was thus smitten. For the manner, it is thought by some, because of that, which is said, Esa. 10. 16. to have beene by fire, being further confirmed, Esa. 33. 11, 12. Some think, that an earthquake and horrible tempest and fire together destroyed them grounding upon, ch. 29. 6. and some, that they were smitten ten ten with the plague. But that of fire burning in their breasts and stifling them is most probable, in which the Hebrews consent, saying, that their bodies were burnt, but their garments untouched, so that the Jews might take the spoile of them. Lastly, although Wolphius by the same night understandeth the night following the delivery of the foregoing message of comfort from the Prophet, yet Lyra better determines, that it was the night after Sanneherib's returne to fight against Jerusalem when he had been gone near two years; or rather, as I shewed before, about a year to fight first against the Ethiopians, when he was come with his army to Nob, as also R. Solomon saith, nearer then which place he came not towards Jerusalem. For it is against the tenour of the prophesie beforegoing, This year ease of your store, the second that which groweth of its selfe, &c. Implying, that a long time was to come betweene the prophesie and their full deliverance from the Assyrians, and not that it should be wrought by and by.

Wolphius.
Lj74.

Whereas it is here said, The Angel of the Lord smote 185000 and whom they rose in the morning, behold, all were dead corpses, 2 Chron. 32. 22. it is said, The Lord sent his Angel, who smote every strong man and warrior, and the prince of the host of the king of Assyria. Whereby we may gather, that some of the weaker sort were spared, the prime men onely being smitten, without whom he and his host remaining became contemptible, wherefore it is said, that he returned with shame into his owne land. He had then many more doublese in his army according to the manner of such mighty Monarchs, who used not to goe forth to warre, but with 500000. or 1000000. men, but all his captains and officers of bands being destroyed and the Generall, so that none were left to order the battell, he was so confounded, that he speedily provided for his owne safety by fleeing home with those weake and inferiour persons, that remained in his campe, not daring to abide in the field any longer. Wherefore Iosephus saith, that he fled with his army, and Heb. tradit. his head and his beard being as it were shaven by singeing, according to Isay. They that rose then in the morning and saw them dead, were the refuse of the army, who brought word hereof to the king: but the Vulg. lat. rendereth it, When he arose in the morning he saw, as if it were meant of the king, contrary to the Hebrew verity.

Sanneherib then returning to Nineveh, the chiefe city of Assyria was slaine by his owne sons Adrammelech and Sharezer. as he was worshipping in the temple of his god Nisroch. For the cause, why his owne sonnes slew him, R. Solomon, whom Lyra citeth, hath a pretty invention. The great men of the countrey having lost each one his sonne, brother or friend in that expedition against Jerusalem by means of his blasphemies, were provoked so, that they meant to destroy him, which he hearing, fled to the idols temple and prayed and vowed, that if his god would deliver him from this danger, he would give these two sonnes for sacrifice unto him; then they hearing this, came and slew him there.

V. 36.

Lyra.

But this favoureth as a Rabinicall invention, for by what means came he to know this, and how should his sonnes know so soon what he said in praying? It is therefore more probable, which Lyra rejecteth, that they slew him, because he neglecting them, that were haply elder, appointed Esharhaddon another sonne of his, to reign after him, but they not being able after this appointment to alter it, contented themselves onely to take this revenge, and then fled away. Thus the people of God were by degrees made more and more safe from the enemies sword. First, by the sudden destruction of his hoste. Secondly, in that he returning, is said to dwell in Niniveh, that is, giving himself to sloth and pleasure, not applying his minde to make warre any more, or haply, as some other tyrants have done, in their elder years, when they became weary of the warres, they have betaken themselves to a monastery, that they might spend the rest of their time in blinde devotion, so he, and then it may well be conceived, how he came at this time to be taken in his idols temple. Thirdly, by his cutting off, as was threatned, Wolphius rejecting the reason of his coming to this temple at his return, rendred by Ierome, viz. to give him thanks for his victories, saith that he fled hither to complain before his god of his ill successe, but because it is said he dwelt in Niniveh, I rather think,

Wolphius.
Hieronym.

think, as was before said, that he spent most of his time in blinde devotion to an impotent idol, thinking thus to live the more securely the rest of his days, because the terrour of the Angels stroke which he had received in his hoste, would not yet go out of his minde. So farre was he from learning by that scourge of God, that there was but one onely true God of power, viz. the God of Israel, and acknowledging the impotency of dum idols. Wherefore his blaspheming of God was now fully punished, when he praying in the temple of his god, that it might appeare, that the idol had no power either to save his host or him as farre off, or being nearest to him, seeing it may be, that he ascribed the preservation of his owne person in that great massacre to this tutelar god and therefore worshipped him still, notwithstanding his armies overthrow in the land of Iudea. But if Tobit. 2. 24. may be credited he lived not 55. dayes after his returne to Nineveh. Touching this idol Nisroch nothing is recorded amongst Writers, saith Wolphius, but by Ierom. in tradit. Hebr. that he was of old worshipped amongst the reliques of Noahs Ark, and calleth him Dagon. The Assyrians worshipped Impiter Belus for their god, as saith Dion. Cyril. Eusebius and others; and haply the same was called also Nisroch, because he was a refuge to such, as fled and escaped out of battell, this being supposed by the ignorant heathens to have been under his protection, and through his tender care, according to the signification of the word, נִסְרוֹךְ Nes, fleeing, and רֶכֶךְ Rech, tender. But the Lord to shew the vanity of such as trusted to this, would not have him slaine by the Angel coming upon his army, but after his returne, before his idol, in which he trusted, and that by his owne sonnes, that came out of his own bowels, as is added, 2 Chron. 32. 22. both that his sufferings might be the greater, who had sinned so greatly, in seeing first the principall of all his army slaine, and in fleeing so many hundred miles with great shame and feare: and also that he might be punished in his kinde for the striking of terrour into all others, by being led as an oxe to the house of slaughter, who thought none either man or God comparable to him in power and puiſſance, and by their lifting up of their hands against him most unnaturally, to whom he had given their being, as he had ungraciously lifted up his blasphemous tongue against him, that had so greatly magnified him and set up his throne above the nations about both far and neare.

The place, that his sonnes who slew him fled unto, was Ararat in Armenia, of which see Gen. 8.

After this, 2 Chron. 32. 23. it is added, that God saved Hezekiah and the inhabitants of Ierusalem out of the hands of Sanneherib and gave him peace round about, and many brought sacrifices to Ierusalem, and gifts to Hezekiah, &c. That is, this miracle of the Assyrians destruction being divulged amongst the nations, they both sent great gifts to Hezekiah for honours sake to one so highly in the favour of the Lord, all their hatred against him and his people being turned into love and admiration, and a desire, (all hostility being laid aside) of their amity, and so they had quiet on every side, and in acknowledgement, that the God of Israel was the onely true God and the Almighty, they sent sacrifices to be offered in his temple in Ierusalem, being, as Pellican thinketh, converted to the true faith by this great miracle, that being in part now fulfilled, which is prophesied, Esa. 2. of the flocking of all nations to the mountaine of the Lord. So that however the ten tribes were carried away captive for their sinnes and no more sacrifices came from them, which before had beene prophesied against, as abominations, and forbidden, Esa. 11. Yet there was now no defect, but rather a superabundance of them, by reason of the nations about, who brought them in from every place haply being moved also in part, because they having been under the oppression of the Assyrian tyrants, shared with the Jews now in the comfort and freedome coming by this their miraculous destruction.

W. lphim.

*Theodoret in 4. Reg. Qui adversus deum, qui ipsum fecerat, rabie suis
percutus, ab illis, qui ex ipso pro-gressi fuerant
interficiuntur.
2 Chron. 32. 23*

Pellican.

C H A P. X X.

IN those dayes Hezekiah was sick unto the death, and Esay the sonne of Amos came to him, saying, Set thy house in order, for thou shalt die and not live. The Hebrewes, saith Pellican, think that this sicknesse was three yeares before the destruction of the Assyrians before going, ch. 19. although it be related after, because it is said, v. 6. And I will deliver thee out of the hand of the Assyrians, and will defend this city for my selfe, and for David my servant: and they say three yeares, because after the Assyrians coming against Ierusalem, three yeares are spoken of, that should be to Hezekiah a signe of deliverance. But if it be taken as it lyeth in order, a good reason may be rendered of the promise of deliverance from the Assyrians after Sannacheribs death, because there might be danger again by Esarhaddon his sonne, who reigned in his steed, and might threaten to come and be revenged upon the Iews for the overthrow of his people past, and thus to vindicate the credit of the Assyrians, who were then put to great shame.

Lyra is for that of the Hebrewes, alledging R. Solomon, in confutation of the opinion of some, that Hezekiah was smitten with this sicknesse, because he was not worthily thankfull for his great deliverance. For this, saith R. Solomon, cannot be so, because that deliverance was after his sicknesse, and the cause of his sicknesse, was for that he would not take a wife to continue the line of David, but lived a single life, till after his recovery of health, as is probable, if the time be considered of which his sonne Manasseh was, when he died, viz. twelve yeares old, whereas from this sicknesse were 15. But Wolphius well confuteth this of the Rabbin, because there was no law, whereby he was bound to marry, but when he himself thought fittest, and if his life be considered from the beginning of his reign to this present, a fit time for his marrying could not hitherto be found; for first the service of God was so disordered, at his coming to the crown, that much time was requisite for the re-ordering thereof, and then his wars with the Philistims followed; after which anno 4<sup>o</sup>. of his reign, his neighbour kingdome of Israel came into great calamity by the Assyrians, and therefore, he having refused to pay him tribute, could not but expect the like, and labour to fortifie all his cities against the time of their coming. But letting all this passe, who knoweth, but that he was married, and went so long childlesse, or without a sonne, as others had done at sundry times, or having children, no son lived with him, till Manasseh. Touching the cause yielded by others of his sicknesse, viz. his unthankfulnesse and pride, wherewith his heart was lifted up from his great victory, it is both contrary to Iosephus, who saith, that he offered many eucharisticall sacrifices, and to the piety, which was alwayes known to be in him, although Ierome somewhat taxeth him for this, and he is thus charged in part, 2 Chron. 32. 26. but it was after his deliverance from his sicknesse. But that which maketh most for the confutation of this opinion, is the allegation of R. Solomon brought before, viz. that his sicknesse did precede, and not follow after his deliverance from Sannacherib, as appeareth from the consideration of the time, when the Assyrian came, viz. anno 14. and the time of his life after this sicknesse, viz. 15 yeares, and the whole time of his reign 29 yeares. Therefore this sicknesse must needs have befallen him, about the time of the Assyrians first coming into his land, and not after Sannacheribs departure, from which to the death of Hezekiah could not be 15, but onely 13 or 14 yeares at the most. It must needs be yielded then, that his sicknesse and danger by Sannacheribs coming against him, were about the same time, the army of that blasphemmer not being yet destroyed, and unto this agreeth the promise made here v. 6. But what then was the cause? Verily none that we can know, but as in the case of the man that was born blinde, Ioh. 9. that God might be glorified, and his servant Hezekiah tried, and his faith made the more illustrious by this miracle, wrought upon his faithfull praying, to the encouragement of all others, to fervent and faithfull praying in their sicknesses and dangers. Wherefore although it be set down after his deliverance from

V. 1.

Pellican.

Lyra.

Wolphius.

Iosephus.

Note.

Albur

Wolphius.

Lyra.

V. 2.

Phil. 1. 23.

Hieron. in E/sa.

Cypr. lu E/sa.

Wolphius.

Alhur, it is onely said, In those dayes Hezekiah was sick, nothing being spoken denoting the time either before or after, but that being left to be gathered by the diligent reader. He was sick unto the death; that is, according to the nature of his sicknesse, and in humane reason. For it is hereby intimated, that his sicknesse was such, as that he could not by all the help of phisick or chirurgerie escape death, had not the divine power miraculously healed him. But to finde what sicknesse it was, we must look to v. 7. a bile, the same word being used, that is Exod. 9. 9. a bile so painfull through inflammation, as that a man cannot long endure it, and by the same word, the biles of Job are set forth. But this certainly was the most dangerous of all others, a very swelling full of pestilentiall matter, as Wolphius and other think, which neither by lancing, or outward application could be made to break, but must needs kill without supernaturall remedy. And accordingly the prophet denounceth death unto him, which Lyra noteth to have been done with respect unto secondary causes, and not by divine revelation. For then it could not have been otherwise, neither would Hezekiah have prayed against it as he did. It is to be conceived then, that Esay, as the duty of a good pastour is, hearing of the kings sicknesse, went to visite him, and finding him to labour with such a sicknesse, as alwayes killeth, he dealt faithfully with him, and told him, there was no way for him now to go but one, viz. down the grave, exhorting him therefore to make his last will and testament, for the settling of his worldly estate, that he might wholly dispose himself towards God, and to a better life. And as Hezekiah, so every man that hath possessions or riches to be disposed of, is to be exhorted to make his will before his death, and because the time of that is uncertain, especially in these times, wherein men do often dye suddenly, without delaying, till warning be given by sicknesse. Of making wills see Wolphius at large, upon this place, and touching Hezekiah in particular, he having no heir to his kingdome, and the danger being great, if this were left undetermined, whom should succeed him by reason of the contention likely to arise, the enemy also now being at hand to destroy it, the wise prophet thought it of great importance for him to make his will, and therefore moveth him in it. Whereas he saith, for thou shalt dye and not live, some Rabbins make a strange construction of the words, viz. that he should dye soon of this sicknesse and not live in the world to come: but considering the piety of the king, and that Gods ministers are not instruments to drive into desperation, but of comfort in times of danger, this is to be exploded, and it is rather to be held, that having said he should dye, he added, and not live, lest he still being in hope to live, should defer the making of his will, about which the Prophet was very solicitous.

Hezekiah hearing this, turned his face to the wall and prayed, Remember I beseech thee O Lord, how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is pleasing in thy sight, and he wept sore. The news of death approaching, is naturally terrible to any, the most courageous man, although St. Paul, since the breaking of the power of death, by the death and resurrection of Christ Iesus, desired rather to be dissolved, then to live. And to hear of dying now, did pierce the heart of this good king the more, because the worship of God had by him been but newly reformed, and there would by his death so soon, be great danger of corrupting it again, and he was also yet without a sonne, to continue the line of David, touching which God had promised, that a light should not fail unto him in Israel for ever. That of Ierom is not to be heard, that he was thus troubled, because he was uncertain, whither he should go: for he was of greater faith, and whereas he inferreth upon this, that no man is certain of salvation, till he be in possession of it, Cyprian is rather to be heard, who saith, that death is not to be feared of the godly, because they were not ignorant, whither they go when they dye.

Touching the words of Hezekiah his prayer, they may seem, saith Wolphius, both to favour of arrogancy and discontent, in that he assumeth to himself perfectnesse of heart, and expostulateth with the Lord, as if he were injuriously dealt withall, to be made to suffer, by such a sicknesse as was incurable, when as he had not displeased, but pleased the Lord: but he saith, that Hezekiah spake not thus to justifie

justifie himself to God, but in way of appeal against the blasphemy of Sanneherib, not by way of complaining against Gods just dealing, but of imploring his help to heal him again by his almighty power, that all mouthes might be stopped, from taking occasion upon this his stroke to caluminate him as an hypocrite. For Rabshakeb in declaiming against him, had sought to infringe his piety, in saying, that he had put down the high places of the Lord, and that he deceived the people, in making them believe that he was in so much favour with him, when he had greatly incurred his displeasure by thus doing, and if he did any acts of godlinesse, it was not for any other but his own ends, as hypocrites do. Now this deadly sicknesse concurring with that exprobration, if he should die thereof, would make the world believe that he was such an one indeed, to his infinite discredit, wherefore he maketh here God the judge of his sincerity, and the rather uttereth his grief by weeping, to think of dying at this time in such infamy, thus striving with the Lord of pity for restitution to health, believing, that he was easily able to raise him up, how deadly soever his sicknesse was. Yet he prayed not to have his life prolonged, saith Ierom, remembering how acceptable Solomon was to God, for his not desiring long life, therefore he left that unto God. When he had prayed, he turned himself to the wall, partly because it was next to the temple, and partly that he might be more private, and not interrupted by any object occurring, whilst he was praying, and that he might not make ostentation of his tears, so Rabanus; who also saith, that Hezekiah spake here as the Pharisee, Luk. 18. but not from the like heart, for Hezekiah spake out of humilitie being necessitated, he out of pride, therefore the one is justified, the other condemned by him, that looks not at the words, but at the heart.

When Esay was scarce gone out of the kings court, the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, return to Hezekiah, &c. ] Here for the word [court] Hebr. is ירי signifying the city, and so Iunius, who confesseth, that having sometime rendred it so, now he rather thinks it fit to be rendred city; but in the margin it is ירי, court, and the Chald. and Sept. follow that, and the Hebrews generally, and of the court made by king Solomon we read, 1 King. 7. 8. and it may be conceived, that the kings court was like a city; wherefore in the text it is put down city, and that it might be understood what city was meant, in the margin it is court: for it is not to be thought, that the prophet was gone so far as the midst of the city, because this countermand is spoken of, as coming to Esay immediately after the kings praying, in the time whereof being so short, he could not be gone farre. Whereas Pellican thinketh, that Esay was bidden before to denounce death to the king, but now he had a new revelation to the contrary: I rather hold me still to that of Eyra and others, that he spake not before by revelation, but by conjecture, seeing what his diseale was, and now first was the will of the Lord made known unto him, touching his recovery. And what doth the Lord now say? Truly, that he had heard his prayer and healed him, and he should go up the third day to the house of the Lord, that is, to praise him for this great deliverance. And R. Solomon saith, for the destruction of the Assyrians the same day, but I leave that as uncertain. And it is thought most probably, that by the third day, is meant the third from that wherein the prophet spake unto him including it, so there was but one day for the medicine to work between.

And I will add 15. years unto thy dayes more, &c. ] This is not so to be understood, as if he should live longer then the time first set in Gods decree, but whereas he was now according to the nature of this sicknesse a dead man, that he should be raised up again, and live from henceforth one 15 years more. For as St. Augustine saith, it was from the beginning by God determined, that Hezekiah should be smitten with this mortall sicknesse, and recover again and live after it 15 years, and therefore he did not that now, which should not have been, but what must be, because he fore-knew that it should be. And if Esay spake at the first by revelation from God, that he should now dye, there was no contradiction in the Lord in his returning and saying soon after, that he should not dye, but having proved Hezekiah by the first message, and found him so submisive and unmoved from his faith, as appeareth

Bbb

V. 45.

Junim.

Pellican.

V. 6.

Aug. de Gen.
ad lit. c. 6. l. 10. 19

Gregor. Moral.
lib. 12. in Job.

V. 8.
Lyra.
Wolphim.

Basil. interro-
gat. 55. in Reg.

Hieronym.

Palles. c. 39. de Sacra philosoph.

V. 8.
Hieronym. lib. 2.
cont. Pelagium.
Auctor mirab.
S. S.
Lyra.
Dionysius.
Toftatus.

V. 9, 10, 11.

appeareth by his faithful and fervent prayer, he as his purpose was hereupon, takes away the fear of death at this time by the second, and not only prolongeth his life, but granted this upon his praying, which he never did to any mortal man so long before, to know, how many years he should yet live. Touching the time set by God long before of Hezekiah's life, it is true not onely touching him, but also touching every other man, that his time is determined, neither doth any live fewer or more years. So Job 14. 15. the dayes of man are predetermined, the number of his moneths are with thee, neither can any one passe the time set him. Likewise Gregory hereupon; God fore-knowing all things to come, decreed before the world, how all things should be disposed throughout the world, and it is also set, how long every one should live temporally in this life. If it be objected, Psalm 54. The wicked and bloud thirsty shall not live out half their dayes, therefore some die before the time set by God. It is answered, the meaning is not half the time set him by God, but reckoning according to the common account of the time of mans life, he shall not live out half the time that men commonly live, but either be cut off by the sword of justice, or by his riotous courses bring himself soon to his end. And the Lord doth not onely promise a longer life by 15 years, which were one more then he had reigned hitherto, but also to exempt him and his citie from the danger of the Assyrians, and that upon a sure ground, for himself, and for David.

Then Esay said, Take a lump of figs, &c. This, saith Lyra, was by the nature thereof rather a meane to encrease his paine, then to ease him of it, because sweet things doe so, as the Hebrews also hold, thus making the miracle the greater. But Wolphim averreth it to be a meane to ripen and to bring out the corruption of the bile according to Cornel. Celsus l. 5. c. 12. and Galen l. 8. de simplic. medoi, and Dioscorides l. 1. whose sayings he citeth to this effect. Basil also speaketh, as holding the same. Physick is not to be neglected nor the benefit coming thereby, yet health thus recovered is not to be imputed to it, but to God, as was done by Hezekiah, who did not think that masse of figges the chiefe cause of his recovery, neither imputed his health hereby recovered to it, but to Gods glory, adding thanks to him, that created the figge. And Ierome likewise, saying, some thinke it not a bile, but an apostemated place twolne and filled with corrupt matter, all which according to the art of the Physician is drawne to the superficies of the skin by dry figges panned or bruised and applied outwardly. And agreeable to this is that of Fr. Vallesius. Hezekiah could by no meane be more aptly cured then by a Cataplasme of dried figges with barley meale, if the inflammation might be dissolved, if not, with wheat meale to mitigate the heat of the fever and other accidents. Ob. But if this were so, what miracle was there in this cure? Sol. There was not so great force in this medicing as that by vertue thereof he might in so short a time have beene healed, wherefore God miraculously made the force of it at this time greater then ordinary, thus he; or rather the sicknesse of Hezekiah was such, as that it was hereby, incurable, as the Physicians present probably knew well, yet it being applied at Gods command, he was healed; and thus it was miraculous.

For Hezekiah had said to Isaiah, What shall be the signe, &c. Here it may be doubted, whether Hezekiah sinned not by doubting of the truth of Gods promise? Ierome saith, Parva fidelitatis indicium fuit. But Auctor Mirab. Sacre Script. better, he had heard from the same Prophet two contrary messages, and therefore to confirme the last he thought it requisite, that he should give a signe; and Lyra, Dionysius, and Toftatus, His father Ahaz had sinned in denying to aske a signe, therefore he asked one for this further confirmation to Gods greater glory, when not one onely but two miracles should be wrought together. Or rather because he did not plainly ask a sign, but only what should be the sign, it is to be supposed, that he presumed that Esay would give him a signe, as his manner was before to Ahaz, Isa 7. and so he onely demanded, what this signe should be; whereupon he gave him liberty to ask one of two, which he propounded, as he had before done to Ahaz and a farre greater. The liberty given to him was, whether the shadow should goe forward ten degrees or ten degrees backward upon the diall, but he asked, that it might goe backward and so it did upon the diall of Ahaz. But here a question a question ariseth, Whether the Sunne went backward so many degrees in so many houres, as it had gone forward, and so the day was made longer in all places by twice ten degrees, or whether the Sunne keeping the course, the shadow upon that diall onely notwithstanding, went ten degrees backward. Comestus for going backward hath standing still ten houres, averring, that in Herbrew it is so, and that the day either way should have beene encreased but ten houres, yielding this as a reason, why Hezekiah would not have it stand still, because that had been done before for Iosnab. But he is deceived, Hebr. is  $\text{לָחַץ}$  signifying to goe, not to stand. R. Levi as Pellican hath it, answereth, that the prophets proposition is to be understood, as if he had said, Thou seest, that the shadow is gone forward upon the diall ten degrees, wilt thou therefore that in a moment it go forward ten degrees more, or be immediately, brought back ten degrees, referring all to the shadow and not to the body of the Sunne. And this seemeth to be the truth; if we consider the answer of the king, It is easie for the shadow to goe forward, because it will doe so naturally; but to cause the body of the Sunne with so great celerity to move forward is a greater miracle, saith Pellican, then ever was wrought by Moses, neither could it be done without the concussion of the whole heavenly frame; yet God was able as well to doe it without this concussion as to doe so great a miracle. Lyra contrariwise saith, that the Sun went backward ten degrees, which made the shadow upon the diall to goe back also, and that in the ordinary time, viz. ten houres, so that the sunne being now within two houres of setting was kept still above the horizon ten houres, in which it went back againe from West to East, from whence againe it returned in ten houres more to the same point, the day being thus made twenty houres longer then ordinary. And for this he citeth Dionysius his Epistle to Polycarp. Wolphius making no doubt, but that the body of the Sun went backward to the East, saith, that all the question is about the degrees; whether they were, as Dionysius and Lyra hold; so many houres, or as others, so many halfe houres, or as some, so many quarters, and either twenty, ten or five in going backward and forward againe, for in some dials be two degrees in an houre, in some foure, and in some each degree is an houre; or whether it were suddenly brought backe, and immediatly forward againe, and he concludeth without resolving it, because none before him hath cleared this question. Rab. Kimhi holdeth, that the day was but ten houres longer, and Procopius saith the same in effect, the day was almost doubled, and Ierom likewise, and Tostatus, and Author Mirabil. Sacra Script. The Sunne, saith the Rabbin, being brought back in a moment, and then going forward againe in such time. And some Hebrewes are so bold in this point, that they tell the reason of this signe given in particular, viz. because in the day of wicked Abaz his funerall the Sunne hastened faster then ordinary to his setting, that there might be no time for funerall rites; now to recompence the losse of time, which had beene then, the day was prolonged. But if this were so, what shall be said for getting up the time againe, which was lost in the dayes of Iosnab by the standing still of the Sunne an whole day together? Lyra is large in reciting the tenet of Burgensis, that the body of the Sunne did not goe back, but the shadow upon the diall of Abaz onely, and not upon other dials, which he founds upon the words of the text, which speaketh three times of the shadow going back, but not of the Sun. 2. Because no Astronomers ever observed this in any other countrey to write of it, which they would doubtlesse have done, if so strange a thing had happened contrary to the course of nature. 3. Because this had been the greatest of all miracles, that ever had been wrought by Moses or any other, for so much as it was in the chiefe of all the heavenly bodies, and yet there was no such great cause, as at some other times, there being now none other cause, but to assure Hezekiah of the restitution of his health, yet he saith it was greater, then that standing still of the Sunne caused by Iosnab, seeing it is a greater worke to bring the Sunne back then to make it stand still; wherefore he concludeth, that the day was neither longer nor shorter, then other dayes, but onely the shadow was made upon Abaz his diall to goe backward miraculously, when as by the course of nature it should have gone forward. All this and more being recited by Lyra he Pellican.

Lyra.

Wolphius.

Procop. in Esa. 39.
Hierom. in Esa.

Burgensis.

he confuteth, opposing first here against Dionysius and August. de mirab. Sacra. Script. Ierom and others; then he confuteth his reasons, to the first answering, that the shadow upon the dial caused by the Sunne could not goe backward unless the Sun went backward also, and therefore the one inferreth the other. To the other, that the Persians have left it written in their memorials, viz. their priests, that there was one day almost as long as three; and to the third, that this signe was given not onely for Hezekiah's healths sake, which should be recovered, but also to assure him of the deliverance of Ierusalem from Sanneherib, which was of greater consequence, then that which was done in the time of Iosuah, because if then the enemies were destroyed, that roome might be made for the Israelites to inhabite that land, now he and his army was to be destroyed, by whose blasphemies they might be made to stagger in their faith touching the true religion newly restored by Hezekiah and purged from the idolatries practised in the time of his father Ahaz, which was of farre greater moment. Moreover, the will of God is the cause of miracles greater or lesse, and therefore no reason is to be demanded why a greater should be wrought now, then at any other time, thus Lyra: wherein I must needs say, he hath not spoken so satisfactorily, as to overthrow that opinion. For first however in the course of nature the shadow caused upon a dial by the Sun cannot goe backward, when it goeth for ward, yet supernaturally and miraculously it may, for what is not God able to doe? 2. It is doubtfull whether any such memoriall be made by the Persian priests or no, seeing Lyra himselfe is not able to affirme it, but onely that Dionysius read such bookes, as Burgenfis never saw. And if such a wonderfull day almost treble to another now were: the Caldeans who were under the dominion of the king of Ashur should rather have written of it, then the Persians, especially seeing their king sent to Hezekiah, as being much affected with the wonder, which he heard was wrought for the recovery of his health, to congratulate the same, 2 Chron. 32. 31. and to enquire after the said wonder, 2 King. 20. 12. 3. Lyra overreachteth much, when he assigneth other weighty causes of this signe besides Hezekiah's recovery of health, seeing this onely is named, What is the signe, that the Lord will heale me, and that I shall goe up the third day to the house of the Lord? For although his and the cities preservation from the Assyrian be promised, yet a signe to confirme his faith touching that is not desired, but onely of the restitution of his health, neither was it needfull, as being done before, chap. 19. 29. Wherefore I conclude rather, the wonder wrought at this time was in the shadow going backward upon the dial of Ahaz onely, when the body of the sunne went forward, seeing nothing more is expressly said in the text, and the litterall sense is to be taken in all places, if it be neither against the analogy of faith, nor any other place of Scripture, nor absurd as this is not but rather more miraculous. But then it is not to be conceived, that the sunne was at this time onely two howers high, but five, if we reckon, as is most probable, two degrees of the dial to every houre: for so it might either goe forward or backward ten degrees as was propounded, before sunne setting, the time of the degrees being kept. And if so, by that time the sunne went downe, the shadow was gone back just to the degree appointed, viz. to about eight of the clock in the morning and then the sunne setting appeared no more that day, whereas if the shadow had gone forward ten degrees in the like proportion of time, it had been no wonder, but that, which was easily and extraordinarily done daily, as Hezekiah said. But I would have this taken, as spoken onely in way of confuting Lyra's reasons, seeing yet something to encline me to the common tenet, viz. that the sunne went backward, and that is the expresse text, Esa. 38. 8. And the sun returned ten degrees by the same degrees by which it descended: unless this shall be construed of the sunne appearing on the dial onely, that is, the beames thereof. Some are altogether for an allegoricall sense here, as Rabanus, making these ten degrees of the sunnes going backward a figure of Christs going backward or descending by so many degrees, saith, the first was his descending to an Angel. 2. In the Patriarks. 3. In giving the Law. 4. In Iosua. 5. In the Iudges. 6. In the Kings. 7. In the Prophets. 8. In the high Priests. 9. In his Incarnation. 10. In his Passion. Yet the

the same authour in Lyra going upon the letter: sense saith ten degrees were ten houres, wherefore the sunne being within two houres of setting was brought back ten houres upon the sudden to the East, and if it had gone forward ten houres it should instantly have passed those two houres, and so, there being no night beene carried to the ninth hour of the next day. But for so much as this had beene as great a miracle as the going backward and rather greater, why did Hezekiah refuse it as being more easie to be done? he answereth, in an Island called Tyle beyond Britany and the North of Scythia divers dayes in summer there is of course no night, and so the sunne is seen still to goe forward, when it is at the West, although to us in parts more southerly it is never so. Others, saith Wolphim, allegorize to the nine degrees of Angels, and a tenth of soules glorified, beneath all which Christ, the Sun of righteousness descended, when he was made man, but leaving this he findeth an aptnesse in this signe to the matter in hand. Hezekiah was as the sunne to the kingdom of Iudah, therefore the suns going backward ten degrees did most aptly set forth his declined estate by this sicknesse almost to the extinction of so famous a light; but because the sunne having gone backward being caused so to doe by the Almighty power, in the course of nature would returne againe and goe as much and more forward; Hezekiah should likewise be hereby assured to returne to his former health, and live rather longer a glorious king from hence forward, then he had hitherto done, for fourteene past, fiftene as he was now promised. Genebrard saith, that Hezekiah was studious of the Mathematicks, and the Rabins to the same effect, that he restored the yeare by the intercalation of a day every third yeare in the moneth Adar, that answereth to our February, and if this were so, he had a signe most fitting for him.

Now for the Prophets making him this offer, it was not out of any private motion, as if he at his pleasure could doe so great a worke, but as he was moved by the spirit, for which cause having heard *Hezekiah*s answer he is said to have prayed that this signe might be shewed, and then the shadow went back upon the diall of Ahaz, which it is to be conceived stood so as that Hezekiah might see it. Touching dialls made by art, the world was long without them, at length, as Varro saith, they were devised by Anaximenes Milesius amongst the Lacedemonians, and by Marcus Valer. Messala amongst the Romanes 477. yeares after the city built, and by Gods working of a miracle upon a diall at this time, this art was honoured and approved, and by consequence the seven liberall Sciences, of which this is one.

And hitherto of the sicknesse and recovery of Hezekiah. Now although v. 12. the next thing spoken of is the king of Babylons sending Embassadours to him, yet 2 Chron. 32. 25. he is before this taxed for ingratitude and pride, for which Gods wrath was greatly kindled against him, which notwithstanding how it could be is a doubt, considering that Esa. 38. 9. he is said to have made a commemoration of Gods gracious dealing with him, in writing to his praise, as a lasting monument of his thankfulness. For if he rendred not unto the Lord according to his dealing with him, but had his heart lifted up, as is there said, what is to be thought of that his thanksgiving? Sol. By his not rendring to the Lord is meant, that he gave not thanks unto him, but because after his health restored, Sennacheribs army at his prayer destroyed, and other great worldly blessings heaped upon him, recorded v. 27, 28, 29. his heart was lifted up, and he made ostentation hereof to his own vain-glory, at the coming of the embassadours from Babylon unto him, shewing them in a vaunting manner all his treasure, as being proud of that respect, which was shewed unto him by so great a king, and he shewed it, not as a blessing bestowed upon him by the God of Israel, that he might be magnified and thought highly of by these heathens, but to set forth his own excellency, as if for some extraordinary merit in himself, his miraculous recovery and these blessings had befallen him. And what thanks soever a man giveth unto God in word, yea though he writes it to continue and to be publicly sung alwayes in the sanctuary in his behalf, as most probably was the case at this time, it is not counted a condigne rendring unto God, if the heart be any way ill affected, and not holy and humble, which God

Tbula.

Wolphim.

2 Chron. 32.
25.

Note.

counteth the greatest retribution which can be made unto him, as appeareth Mich. 6. 6.

That which is then set forth 2 Chron. 32. 25. in way of blaming Hezekiah, is by anticipation; the proper place being after the Babylonian embassadours coming to him, v. 31. where it is said, that God left him to try what was in his heart, and more fully 2 King. 20. 13, 14, &c. For the words here following, therefore the fierce wrath of the Lord was kindled against him, &c. have reference to that, which is there said, viz. the threatening of the prophet Esay, that all this treasure should be carried into Babylon, and the answer of the king submitting himself to the will of God, for this is here called his humbling of himself, for which the adjourning of this judgement was made to the times following after his decease. Yet it is to be conceived, that this was not the sole cause; for Ahaz and other wicked kings of Judah before had incensed the Lord much more, and Manasseh, and Zedekiah, and Iechoniah, who reigned after, when the judgement was executed, but hereby the coals of Gods wrath were again blown up, as they are by sinne in the best, especially, if extraordinary benefits be abused to their own vain ends, and not used to Gods glory, from whom they come. Touching the thanksgiving made and written by Hezekiah, it is set forth Esa. 38. 9, 10, &c. to v. 21. and by the last words thereof it seemeth to have been compiled to be used in the house of the Lord, not only at his going up thither upon the third day before spoken of, but also at certain times as long as he lived.

Note.

V. 12.

At that time Berodak Baladan, the sonne of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters with a gift unto Hezekiah, for he heard that he had been sick. ] 2 Chron. 32. 31. It is said, The Oratours of the Princes of Babylon who sent to enquire of the prodigy which was done in the earth. Esa. 39. he is called Merodach Baladan, and it is not only said, that he heard he had been sick, but also recovered. But of what stock this Berodak or Merodak was, and how he attained to that kingdome, when as Esharhaddon the son of Sanneherib, is said to have reigned after him, may be a question, seeing he that was king of Assyria, was king of Babylon also, as appeareth in Salmannasar, who carried Iews away to Babylon, when he subdued the kingdome of the ten tribes, and brought men from thence to Samaria. But it is resolved by some, that this Merodach was vice-roy of Babylon, as also his father Baladan had been, under the kings of Assyria, but now Sanneherib being dead and his chief strength overthrown, and Esharhaddon his sonne young and tender, he waxed bold to take that kingdome absolutely upon him, the Assyrian being shaken off, and to strengthen himself the more, he sought the friendship of other princes, which had been oppressed by the great tyrants of Assyria, amongst whom Hezekiah being one, whose part God had specially taken, and for whom he had done wonderfully in delivering him from his sickness, he specially sought his friendship, wherefore Genebrard in him placeth the beginning of the kingdome of Babylon. But R. Kimbi as Wolphins saith, holdeth him to have been the son of Esharhaddon, and king both of Assyria and Babylon, which is improbable, both because his title should not then have been altered from king of Assyria, to king of Babylon, and the time of his sending agreeth not, it being in the beginning of Esharhaddons reign, and therefore not of his sonnes, after he had reigned twelve years, as Chronologers say. But besides this cause of Merodachs sending to him, concealed in the sacred historie, there are two other causes expressed, viz. to congratulate his recoverie, and to enquire of the prodigie, that was wrought thereabout. Comestor saith, that he sent unto him to be his friend and fellow; for at that time both the Babylonians and Medes fell from Esharhaddon, but the chief cause is held to be, for that the Chaldeans, his subjects, being Astrologers, not being able to yield any naturall reason of the extraordinary length of one day by all their skill, were at length certified, that it was done for Hezekiah his sake. This the king hearing, sent to enquire the certaintie of it, and a present for honour to him, whom the Sunne, which they worshipped in that countrey as a god, had so much honoured, in staying the ordinarie course, and prolonging the day in token of the prolonging of his life. Hezekiah rejoiced at the coming of these Embassadours, not so much for the gift, but to see, that his friend-

Functi Chrono.

Genebrard.

Ecclef. hijf.

ship

ship was highly esteemed of by so mighty a king, to be in league with whom, would be a great strengthening to his kingdom against the Assyrians for time to come. And for the gift sent, which doubtlesse was no small matter, but of great worth, as befitting the sender, and the royall majestie, to whom it was sent, it is to be understood, that it was and is common amongst princes thus to honour each other, when they send out their embassadour, and that king hath thought himself mocked of old, to whom another prince sending, sent him no present. The Hebrew for rejoyced, as the vulgar Latin renders it, hath heard them, but Esa. 39. 2. it is rejoyced. Comestor addeth, he was again also puffed up in his minde, affirming, that he sinned once before in the same kinde, after his deliverance from Sanneherib, because he shewed not himself sufficiently thankfull, although, as Iosephus saith, he offered many eucharisticall sacrifices, yet because he wrote no canticle of praise, as others of his fore-fathers upon such great occasions had done. Wherefore God pulled down his minde, that was lifted up by that great sicknesse, thus he; but as hath been already shewed he was much mistaken, the time agreeing not. But now being left a little to himself to try what was in him, as is said, 2 Chron. 32. 31. he was lifted up by all these honours done unto him, v. 25. and so in great vain-glory he shewed his treasury, silver, and gold, and precious spices, and oyl, and the house of his vessels, &c. Some, saith Comestor, by the house of spices understand a cell in the temple, into which it was unlawfull to bring any heathens; but Epiphanius saith, it was a very long house made by Solomon, the entrance whereof was so cunningly contrived for secrecie, that it could not by the people be found, yea many Priests were ignorant of it, and here lay his treasure and spices, then the corpses of his progenitours, and after them of the high Priests and Prophets, which he denuded to them, and so defiled their dead bodies with the presence of heathens, wherefore from that day he was made barren, the contrary to which was true, seeing he begat Manasseh after, as his age being but twelve yeares at his decease sheweth. R. Solomon in Lyra saith, that he shewed them the things, that were most secretly and reverently kept in the temple, viz. the anointing oyle for kings and high priests, and the two tables of the testimony and the law; and Ierom saith, that he shewed them not only his own treasury, but of the temple also, for that was in his power, following the Cald. who for these words, In his whole kingdom, hath, in all his power. But it is not to be thought, that a godly king would goe so plainly against the law of God, whereby heathens were prohibited coming any nearer to the temple, then the court of the Gentiles; neither is any thing said by him, to have beene shewed unto them, but whatsoever was in his house, yea Esa. 39. 2. where more is said, and in all his dominion, nothing is spoken of the Lords house, and if he had brought them in thither, certainly the Prophet would not have passed it over without a particular taxation. It was sinne enough to stirre up the wrath of God to abuse the favours of God done unto him above all other men unto pride and vain glory which he did at this time, and to comply so with heathen idolaters, from leagues and covenants with whom never redounded any good, but hurt unto the people of Israel. Yea, hereby he shewed some distrust in God, who had done so mightily for him, and some trust in forreign forces, of which God had so lately shewed him, that he stood in no need. And if there had been none other fault in him, but the abusing of Gods singular blessings to puffe up himselfe there with, it had been intollerable, it being no lesse, then a sacrilegious robbing of God, who doth all things for himselfe and his owne glory, protesting against giving it to another; as if a steward to a lord should rob him and convert the goods, wherewith he is entrusted, to his owne use. Wherefore the Prophet Esa cometh unto him in the name of the Lord, and threatens him with the carrying away of all his treasures into Babylon, of which he had said before, that it was a countrey a farre off: for he said unto Esa, that the Babylonian Embassadours came from a farre countrey, the distance from Babylon to Ierusalem was 680. miles. But it seemeth, that he upon this message humbled himselfe for this sinne, and all Ierusalem with him, and had comfort, that those evils should not come upon the land in his dayes, but after his departure: for 2 Chron. 32. 26. somewhat Eccles. hist.

V. 13.

Lyra.

Hieronym. in Esa.

Nott.

Prov. 16. 4.

V. 14.

H. B. Patriarks travels.

Junius.

Iosephus.

Pellican.

Wolphius.

Hierom. in E/s.

is said implying thus much, and here Hezekiah answereth the Prophet, as having a promise, that they should not come, whilest he lived, v. 19. The word of the Lord is good, which thou hast spoken, seeing peace shall be in my dayes, Junius, Is it not, fith peace and stability shall be in my dayes? So likewise Hebrew, Is it not, if peace and truth be in my dayes. Vulg. Lat. Sit tamen pax et veritas in diebus meis. As if he had prayed so; and thus Iosephus takes it, who saith, that the godly king was grieved at this message, as unwilling, that his nation should fall into that calamity; but seeing God had so determined, he prayed that he might passe the rest of the time assigned to his life in peace. But the Hebrew verity being otherwise, I adhere to my former exposition, from which neither doth Pellican vary, for he findeth no praying here, but a submissive resting in the will of God, who, he knew was propitious, mercifull and holy in all his workes, and injurious to none. Wolphius thinketh, that he spake of peace all his dayes, as grounding upon a former promise, when Esay comforted him by prophesying restitution to health and prolongation of life, and preservation from his enemies: but seeing those enemies are particularly named Assyrians, and here not the king of Assyria, but of Babylon is threatened to be sent to vanquish the land, unlesse he had some new promise, he could not build his confidence upon that. Some Hebrew expositours as Ierom sheweth upon Isa. 39. take Hezekiah here, as unlike unto Moses, who was so affected to the people, as that he prayeth rather, then they they should suffer, to be blotted out of Gods booke: but he contrariwise, as not passing for the miseries of his people and posterity is intent onely to his owne preservation for his time in peace. But herein they doe most injuriously traduce this Saint of God, whose care and paines were alwayes so great for their good. And Iosephus much better writeth of him, as grieved for them, but necessity submitting to Gods will, as he would also have done doubtlesse, although no exception had bene made of the terme of his life to be spent in peace. It was not therefore out of a dislike of Hezekiah his answer that Esay turneth to the people, chap. 40. 1. saying, Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, &c. as these expositours would have it, but that they hearing of a captivity to come might not be overcome with griefe. Ambrose also favoureth that of Iosephus, saying, That just Hezekiah rejoyced not, that the misery of captivity should come upon his children, but he could not resist Gods will, and therefore submitted to it as a poore servant.

V. 18.

There is rather thed here to be noted, of what a good spirit Hezekiah was, in that he raged not, but patiently received this sharpe message from the Prophet, as godly Theodosius bare the censure of Ambrose, honouring him the more for it, in that he said, he thought him onely worthy to be a Bishop.

Whereas v. 18. it is said, They shall also take of thy sonnes which thou shalt beget, and make them eunuchs in the court of the king of Babylon. It appeares, that in the fiftene yeares which he lived, he had more sonnes besides Manasseh, although mention be made of no more; or rather by his sonnes are meant his grandchildren foure or five generations after, viz. the children of Iechoniah, who was the sonne of Iehoiakim, the son of Josiah, the son of Amon, the son of Manasseh his son, for these also came out of him, and were begotten by such as he begat, and therefore may well be meant, when it is said, which thou shalt beget. And if he had any other immediate sonnes besides Manasseh, it cannot be understood of them, because they must needs be all dead long before the carrying away here spoken of, unto which from this time passed at the least 100. yeares, seeing it was after that Manasseh had reigned 55. Amon 2. Josiah 31. and Iehoiakim 11. for after him was Iehoiachin or Iechoniah. 2 King. 24. who was carried into Babylon, and other princes, who most probably were some of them of Hezekiah his posterity, and then and not before was this prophesie fulfilled.

V. 20.

The rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and how he made a fish-pool and a conduis to bring water into the city, &c. ] Of which act of his, see 2 Chron. 32. 4. 30. the last place being a comment upon the first, he stopt the waters so from flowing out, for the benefit of his enemies the Assyrians, and that he brought them under ground, and turned them to another part of the city to the no small benefit thereof; thus briefly

ly the writer of the Kings. But 2 Chron. 32. 27. it is said, after his recovery from his sickness, that he attained to great treasures of silver, gold, and precious stones, spices, and shields, and all desirable stuff, and store-houses for provision of wine and oyl, and stables of horses, and flocks, and cities, &c. all which or some of which, viz. treasures, whereby he compassed the rest, he had gotten before the coming of the Babylonian Embassadors unto him, after he was delivered from the danger of the Assyrians; for which cause, their coming followeth after this, v. 31. as being not immediately after his recovery, but three or four years haply after, when Baladan had attained the kingdom of Babylon, and enjoyed it without any more opposition, from which most probably he was not free at the first. For he had ex-haulted his treasures so to pacifie Sanneherib, that without some time coming between to fill them again, he could not have had any such glorious things to shew to the Babylonians at their coming, nor in so few years neither, but that the huge hoste of the Assyrians being so destroyed, as hath been said, and the spoils of the camp left unto him, he was doubtlesse hereby greatly enriched; and so by Gods blessing upon him for his pietie, he soon encreased it much more, so that it was now a thing worth the shewing to great princes, what he had so extraordinarily heaped up together, although it were intollerable in him so to do to idolaters, who were Gods enemies, as unto his intimate friends, and joying to be counted such to them, and to their lord the king of Babylon, as hath been already shewed. By the spices here said to be shewed, saith Rabbi Solomon, some understand those sweet spices, in which the kings his progenitours were laid, and upon this reason they think, that he shewed them their sepulchers, as hath been spoken before. But he better expoundeth them of sweet spices, of which the incense was made to be burnt daily in the temple. Now as the Kings hath reference to the Chronicles of Iudah, for the rest of Hezekiah his acts, so 2 Chron. 32. 32. hath reference to the vision of Esay, by whom ch. 36, 37, 38, 39. the most memorable touching him are also set forth; but nothing of his riches, unlesse it be in speaking of his shewing them to the Babylonian Embassadors: yet because Esay is more full in setting down some things, as also the Kings, he referreth to them both. And so concludeth with his death and honourable buriall, in the upper part of the sepulchers of Dauids posteritie, all Iudah and Ierusalem doing him honour, by assembling from all parts to his buriall, v. 33. which in the Kings is altogether omitted, it being onely said, that he died, and Manasseh his sonne reigned in his stead, this other being left to the relation of another, who hath done it indeed briefly, but so as that we may conceive, he had no lesse love then wealth, by reason of his great pietie, wherein he continued to the end, in that it was done so to him at his death, as to none of his progenitours, he was placed above all the house of David, as he exceeded them all in vertue; and therefore cast not off the care of posteritie, as some have fondly imagined, but have been already confuted.

2 Chron. 32. 27.

V. 28.

CHAP. XXI.

Manasseh was 12 yeares old when he began to reign, and reigned 55 yeares, his mothers name was Hephzibah.] Numa, saith S<sup>t</sup>. Augustine, reigned at the same time over Rome, who encreased so the number of the gods by making more, that he left no room for himself to be placed amongst them, and Baladan the king of Babylon was also idolatrous, the Sabinian Sybilla was also of these times. The world then, as we may gather, was full of superstition, and the Princes of Iudah being alwayes prone to the same, most probably wrought upon the youth of their king to favour this way, and the rather, for the league made by his father with the king of Babylon, whereby he became most wicked, as is hereafter shewed. Touching his mother, some Rabbins say, that she was the daughter of the prophet Esay, as Wolphim hath it; but because he was so bad, she that bare such a sonne is not set forth by the name of her father; to leave which to the inventers, Hephzibah signifieth,

V. 1.

*Aug. de civit.
lib. 18. c. 24.Wolphim.*

fieth,

Not.
V. 2.

fieth, which pleaseth me, or is acceptable to me; whereby is intimated, that of what parentage soever she came, she was a good wife, and according to Hezekiah his heart, seeing names are not thus singularly commemorated in holy Scriptures, but because they, that beare them, are really such. Wherefore most probably, as Manasseh came of a good father, so likewise of a good mother, yet he degenerated, to shew, that vertue is not hereditary. Notwithstanding he lived long and reigned longer, then any of the kings of Judah before him, amongst whom none but Azariah attained to 52. but he to 55. but he spent a great part of his time in much misery for his abominable wickedness, wherein he equalled the most idolatrous heathens. And in that which is said touching this, first it is to be noted, that he was most contrary to his godly father, 2. The maine parts of his wickedness are to be considered. For the first, whereas his father in the very beginning of his reigne endeavoured by all meanes to set up the true worship of God, he contrariwise put that downe; his father set the Priests and Levites in their order about the temple, he drave them from the temple, setting idols priests in their roome; his father brought even some heathens by his piety to the true faith; he by his impiety corrupted many of the faithfull; his father honoured much the Prophet Isaiah, he, as history saith, sawed him asunder, having first dishonoured his venerable age by scourges, although he were his neare kinsman; his father consulted with God by his Prophets, but he with the devil by witchcraft; his father had the sunne and starres obedient unto him, he worshipped most basely the sunne, moone, and stars; his father by praying, and piety prevailed to keepe away judgements from his people, he by his impiety brought judgements upon himselfe and them; wherefore his father obtained a glorious victory over his enemies to the encrease of his honour, no labour or paines in fighting being taken therefore, but he to his great infamy was overcome by his enemy and bound like a slave in chaines was carryed into Babylon. Somewhat to this effect also hath Iosephus. For the second, his wickedness consisted of three parts; Idolatry, Homicide, and Magick.

V. 3.
V. 4.

First, he turned and built the high places, which Hezekiah his father had pulled downe, and set up altars in the house of the Lord, as Ahaz his grandfather had done.] For by means of evil counsellours about him, who swayed him in his childhood, he was perswaded, that his grandfather was wiser then his father, and therefore preferred rather to follow the house of Ahab, of whom he was descended by the mothers side: for Ahaz was the son of Iotham, the son of Ozziah, the sonne of Amasiah, the son of Joash, the son of Ahaziah, whose mother was Athaliah the daughter of Amri, Ahabs father, who was the setter up of more idolatry in Israel, then any of his predecessors. Wherefore it being now a long time, since this superstition came up and was practised even in Judah, the young king might easily be made believe, that it was the old religion, and that of Hezekiah new, and so to stand for it, this being put downe: for so was Joas by the flattery of his courtiers carried away after the death of Iehoiadab. But hereby the great men of Judah shewed, how hollow hearted they were, when as under Hezekiah they had shewed all forwardness against idolatry and for Gods pure worship; but now immediately after his death having an opportunity, they soon discovered, that their hearts were all this while towards idols.

2 Chron. 24. 17.

V. 5.
V. 6.

And he set up altars in the two courts to all the host of heaven.] That is, according to Varatius, in the inner court of the Levites and the outer of the Israelites; thus defiling all holy places, both temple and courts, in the temple the altar set up most probably was such an other as Ahaz had set up there before to the idol of Damascus, these in the courts were to the Planets, Saturne, Jupiter, Mars, Sol, &c. having severall images with inscriptions to make them knowne: and as Wolphins hath it, not to the Planets onely, but also to the fixed starres, and the spirits in the aire.

V. 6.

And he made his sonne to passe thorow the fire,] Which he could not doe at the first, because being but twelve yeares old he had none, but having begun betimes in his idolatrous course, as he grew into more yeares, he grew still worse and worse. Of this horrible and most unnaturall practice of idolaters to their deare children, dren, see before upon chap. 16. 3. Yea he did not onely make groves, and set up the idol Baal, as is said here, v. 3. but he brought in time that idol into the temple, waxing more audacious against God, who had given a streight charge about putting his name there so, promising, that Israel should never be moved out of his place. But he nothing regarding this, together with his princes committed this abomination to remove the Lord, as it were, and to set up Baal there. In the text it is called the image of the grove, whereupon Vasabius saith, that it was an image of a grove, which he had planted, artificially carved; but Dionysius better, the image which he had placed in a grove, which he would have worshipped above all others, that is, the image of Baal. And it is said, that the people being deceived by him did worse then the Gentiles expelled out of that land before them. He forced them not at the first then, but sought to allure them to his idolatry by setting up glorious images, and planting pleasant groves, in which they might walke and delight themselves, and when by this meanes he saw them come to a liking of this, he ascended this height of impiety to pollute the temple it selfe. Neither is this all that is said, to aggravate his wickednesse, but both he and they being admonished by prophets, they contemned it, and all the terrible threatenings, which they added against him and them. And hitherto the first part of his wickednesse, the second was his Magick inserted, vers. 6. He became a soothsayer, and set up such as had familiar spirits, and multiplied Wizzards to provoke the Lord. Because his law was thus manifestly transgressed, as also by causing his children to passe thorow the fire, which two are censured together, Levit. 20. 1, 2, 6, &c. But of these devillish practises see before upon Levit. 19. 31. There were two wayes of the wizzards divining, the one called auspicium, the other augurium: 1. By beholding their flying. 2. By hearing their singing, unto which they added a third, viz. aruspicium, by looking into the entrailles. So Wolphim who entreateth at large of all sorts of heathen superstitions.

The third part of his wickednesse was his homicide, he shed so much innocent blood, that he filled Ierusalem therewith up to the brim. So that although at the first he drew men on by fair deceitfull means, yet afterwards it seemeth that he persecuted, and tyrannically murdered such prophets and other godly persons, as opposed and would not consent to his idolatries, and other abominations: because after the relation of Gods threatening against him by his prophet, made v. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15. this followeth immediately of his rage and bloodshed. Who they were that suffered under this tyrant, by name is not recorded, onely forso much as he is said to have filled Ierusalem with innocent blood, alluding unto a floud filling all places where it cometh; we may gather, that many of the common people also were murdered, inso much, as that through the great numbers who were slain, there was as it were a sea of blood in the city; and it is generally held, according to Epiphanius, that the Prophet Esay was one of them that suffered by being sawn asunder, and then buried under the oak Ragel. But the Rabbins more circumstantially say, that because he called the princes, Princes of Sodom, ch. 1, and said that he saw God, ch. 2. which it is said no man shall do and live, Manasseh sought to slay him, but a great cedar opening it self, he went in and was closed there, then the tyrant commanded the tree, with him in the midst of it, to be sawn asunder, to the sawing of him it is pointed Heb. 11. 37. Lyra saith, that this history is set forth in a book called Iehamosh, thus; Because Esay was uncle to Manasseh by the mothers side, he durst not deal with him as with other martyrs, but sought occasion against him from his writings, Esa. 6. as hath been said before, hereupon he was condemned to dye; then he prayed unto the Lord, and he caused a cedar to open unto him to hide him therein, but he not terrified with the miracle, caused him to be sawn asunder with an iron saw; according to some, with a woodden saw, to encrease his pain, and when he being thus tormented desired drink, they would give him none, but God sent some down miraculously into his mouth. But it is more probable, that Esay was slain for his bold enveighing against the sinnes of the king and his people, Esa. 57. 3. where he calleth them witches children, and children of the adulterer and the whore, and Esa. 1. 10, &c. And hitherto of the great wickednesse

V. 7.

V. 9.

V. 10. 11.

V. 12. 13.

V. 6.

Wolphim.

V. 16.

Epiphan. lib. de prophet. vita &amp; interitu.

Lyra.

V. 17.

2 Chron. 33. 11.
V. 12.Josephus
Lyra.Junius.
1 Sam. 13. 6.
Hierom. in vadis. Hebr.Chrysost. opus imperf. in Math.
Hom. 1.

kednesse of Manasseh, unto which in the Kings nothing is added more, but briefly having referred us to the history of the Kings of Iudah, his death immediately followeth.

Wherefore 2 Chron. 33. 11. it is said, The Lord brought against them the princes of the Army of the king of Assyria, who took him in the thornes, and bound him with two iron chaines, and carried him into Babylon, where being in great affliction, he prayed unto the Lord, &c. Josephus, for the Princes of the king of Assyria, hath, the king of Babylon. But herein, saith Lyra, there is no difference; because the King of Babylon, that now was, had been a subject of the king of Assyria, together with the princes there, but now they were revolted, & Babylon was an absolute kingdom of it self, as hath been shewed before. When he together with his princes, then are called princes of the king of Assyria, it is onely spoken as they were in times past, for that the princes of Babylon are meant, appeareth, because he is said to have been carried into Babylon, and these princes are not here simply said in Hebrew, to be the princes of the Assyrian king, but the princes of the army which was his, viz. when he came against Ierusalem, for although they who were of the kingdom of Assyria were destroyed, yet these most probably escaped away alive, and now did no longer live under that king's obedience. The place where he was taken, was in a queachy place full of thorns and briars, to which Junius saith, he fled to hide himself; for so did many of Israel in the dayes of Saul, for fear of the Philistims. For the great misery endured by Manasseh in Babylon, Jerom saith, that he was put into a brazen vessell full of holes, and therein tormented by fire put about it, wherefore he prayed earnestly to all the gods, whom he had formerly served, but having no help, he remembered what he had heard his father say of the God of Israel, that he onely was able to help in distress, and would save all those that called upon him, and therefore he sought most earnestly by prayer unto him, and was delivered. But this is generally sleighted as a Rabinicall invention, because it hath no ground in holy Scripture, and it is improbable, that being brought into this misery, whilst he was so zealous for his idols, who (it appeared now) could do him no good being in his own land, that he would seek unto them in a strange land, to which they had suffered him their servitour to be carried away. Moreover, for the affliction endured by him in particular, Chrysostome saith, that he was fed but with so much barley bread in a day, and so much water mingled with vinegar, as might keep him alive, being all the while bound with chains in the prison house. Which sheweth, that the particular relations of his miseries are but conjecturall, none being able to tell, what they were besides imprisonment and bands, and this was misery enough for a king to endure. If it be demanded, what quarrell had the king of Babylon or his princes against him, that they should come thus against him, and use him so indignly? It is answered, that most probably he being waxed great, as the kings of Assyria had formerly been, was moved out of the ambition of his minde, when Hezekiah was dead, with whom he had contracted friendship, to think of subduing the land of Iudah, and getting that wonderfull great treasure, which he heard by his embassadours was at Ierusalem, and so sent out some to take the king, which he thought they might easily do being young and improvident, and then he might propound his own conditions, before he were again restored, to pay him such a summe of money down, and to be his tributary under a tribute of so much per annum; thus he. But God, who moderateth in all things, had another end in the coming of these men against him, viz. to punish him with grievous affliction, according to the grievousnesse of his sinnes. But it is strange, and different from all other histories, which is here related, in that it is neither said with what forces this expedition was made, nor how he was taken, nor whether being alone, or having any of his princes in his company, he were carried away. Wherefore the sacred historian was only intent to the shewing of his punishment, as being the main thing to be looked at for use, together with his repentance and deliverance, not regarding to speak of other things concomitating the same. It is probable therefore, that all which was here done was extraordinary, and not like to any other invasion or deliverance, any where recorded in holy Scripture. The King Manasseh haply being being so horrible a sinner and bloodshedder, was stricken with inward terror, as Cain had sometime been, which made him to flee out of the city, there being no apparant cause, and to seek to hide himself amongst thorns, and these princes at the same time being extraordinarily stirred up, came into the land of Iudah to get some rich prey, being drawn by the fame of the great wealth which was there, and having accidentally lighted upon Manasseh, they thinking him prey enough for that time, made him fast with chaines, and so carried him into Babylon, without any other in his company, except Shebnab, who might also then be taken and carried away likewise, as is prophesied Esa. 22. 17. according to Cyrl. Gresser and some others, because we never read of any king so carried away, will needs have some of the princes also to have been carried away with him, because also the Lord is said to have brought these princes against them, in the plurall number, & not against him in the singular, and good reason, that they who did partake with him in his sinne, should likewise partake with him in his punishment; especially, seeing they most probably were the instigators of him to these evils, he being too young to set to such works of himself. But because the taking and carrying away of none but of him is spoken of, it is rather to be held, that he was alone, or at the least without any considerable company, haply having but one or two with him, being for their paucity omitted without speaking of them. Whereas some conjecture, that the city of Ierusalem was now also taken, it is yet further from the truth, neither doth Iosephus make mention of any such thing, but saith, that Manasseh was taken by deceit, haply riding out for his recreation with few attendants, but when he saw the Assyrian princes, and the danger, wherein he was, he fled into a bushy place, and lurking there for fear, was taken.

The Lord being prayed unto was entreated, and brought him back againe to his owne kingdome, &c.] As the hand of God was evidently in his carrying away so extraordinarily, so it was in his bringing back againe; for how or by what means this was done it is not said: whereupon some conjecture, that it was miraculously. Ierom. in the Hebr. tradit. That it was by taking him up as Habbacuk Dan. adjeft. c. 14. 35. by the haire of his head, and carrying him from Ierusalem to Babylon and thence back againe to his owne place. Chrysost. op. imperf. That a fire being sent by the Lord dissolved his chaines and so he was delivered. But because God hath many ways to deliver such as call upon him in distresse, which are unknown to us, the safest is to passe this over undetermined, onely we may be sure, that he was extraordinarily delivered: and not as Benhadad sometime had beene out of the hands of Abah by humbling himselfe to him and entering into covenants, for then it could not so properly have been said, That the Lord brought him back. Most probably as he was carried away without battell first fought, the kingdome not being indammaged much hereby, so without ransome or covenant for tribute he was returned against the will of the king of Babylon and his princes, most probably his chaines being loosened, and the prison doore being opened in the night, as to Peter afterwards, Act. 12. and so he departing unseene. In what yeare of his reign this was done is uncertaine, but the Hebrew Chronicle saith, that anno 22. some others anno 7. but that is more unprobable, seeing he was not by this account come to mans estate, when he was carried away, and all the evils that he did, and gods patience and sending to admonish and threaten him imply a far longer time. Then he knew that the Lord was God] That is, experimentally by this judgement brought extraordinarily upon him, and by his extraordinary deliverance. He was not certainly ignorant of it before, but whilest he lived in idolatry he was not reputed one that knew God, but now he reforming both knew and acknowledged him indeed. In Manasseh see the unspeakable mercy of God towards man most sinfull repenting, in that he having been so foule a sinner, as that none was ever like him to the destruction of many in body by bloody persecution, and of many more doubtlesse in soule by deceiving them, yet he was received to mercy, when he was greatly humbled, and fervently sought to the Lord by prayer, for the comfort of all distressed sinners, but not of audacious ones, who are bold presuming upon mercy to run into and continue in any wickednesse. What words he used in praying is not

Ccc

Cyril. in Esa.
22.
Gree/er.

Iosephus.

V. 13.

Hieronym.

Chrysost.

Chrys. Heb.

Not.

V. 19.

not recorded in the Hebrew text but onely in the Apocriphals in another language; but v. 19. it is said, that his prayer is in the words of Cozi, that is, some booke not now extant, but not canonicall Scripture: Of which it is to be held that nothing hath perished, or shall perish, whilst the world lasteth, because by Gods singular providence preserved; whose it is the Hebrew Chronicle makes mention of Ozai as a Prophet, saying, Under the reign of Amon Skellum prophesied, who was high Priest and Ozai. By Ozai then is not meant Esay, as some conjecture for he was dead long before Manasseh.

V. 14.

Josephus

Afterwards Manasseh builds the outward wall of the city of David, &c. The Sacred Historian immediately after the returne of Manasseh from his captivity sheweth his providence to defend himselfe and his people against his enemies, out of whose hands he had escaped, and then his approving himselfe to be truly converted in the care that he took about religion. Josephus contrariwise saith, That he first reformed religion, and then went about those works of defence, neither doth the Sacred History plainly crosse this, but onely relateth the one before the other, and it may be, as in some other things, not regarding order, ἵερον ὑπολείπον, the last first. For it is most probable, that Manasseh being brought home againe a convert, did without all delay prepare to offer unto God eucharisticall sacrifices, and that he might rightly doe this, first tooke away the altars set up to idols and then erected the altar of the Lord in the proper place, and as he had before drawne the people to idolatry, so now he sought by his godly exhortations to draw them to the Lord, because that therein stood their greatest safety, and this might soone be done; and then in due time the building of another wall for defence might the better be intended. The city of David was Zion, the wall now built was first westward toward Gihon, a brooke of water in a valley there, then towards the fish-gate, which was east, all these parts being compassed with a strong wall round about, which lay lowest. And it is most likely, that whilst the Priests and Levites were busied with some workmen to help about the temple, others were employed about preparing materials for the wall.

V. 17.

V. 18. 19.

2 King. 21. 18.

Judas.

As in the dayes of other godly kings, who also maintained the true religion, so now yet the people persisted to sacrifice in the high places, but to the Lord onely. And of Manasseh no more is said, but references are made to other bookes and writings, and Amon his sonne succeeded him. But 2 King. 21. 18. he is said to have bene buried in the garden of his house, which was the garden of Uzzah, appointing it thus by his last will and testament, as Iunius conjectureth, as counting himselfe unworthy for his sinnes to be laid in the sepulchre of the kings of Judah. Tostatus saith, that the people would not suffer him to be buried amongst the other kings for his great wickednesse past, and indeed although he humbled himselfe and prayed, and was to his kingdome restored, yet his wickednesse was still remembered and punished after wards, 2 King. 23. 26. & 24. 3. It was forgiven to him, and no further punished in his person, but in his posterity, that renewed it, to deterre all men from such profligate wickednesse.

Who this Uzzah was from whom this garden is named, is not shewed by any that I have seene but for so much as inheritances passed not from one to another family, he was some man of the family of David, whose garden came to the king, for want of another heire, unless by Uzzah be meant Uzziah the king, who because he died a leper was buried in a field belonging to the kings, 2 Chron. 26. 23. being haply made a garden and for his being buryed there called by his name.

V. 19.

Amon was twenty two yeares old when he began to reigne, &c. his mothers name was Meshullemeth, the daughter of Charutzi of Iorabab. Of which Iorabab see Deut. 10. 7. It was, saith Ierom, an ancient towne of the tribe of Judah, but whether she or her father were good or evill, it is not said, onely we may gather, that she was no stranger, but a Jew, and so he was no mungrell breed; and by his age it appeareth, that he was borne long after his fathers conversion and so educated in the worship of the true God all his dayes hitherto. Wherefore it is the more strange, which is there related of him: He did evil in the sight of the Lord, and walked in all the wayes in which his father had walked, worshipping those gods, &c.

2 Chron.

2 Chron. 33. 23. He humbled not himselfe as his father did, but encreased the guilt. So Iunius translates it, the Vulgar Lat. He sinned much more: Hebrew it is הרבה חטא Hirbe Ashma, which may be indifferently rendered either way. He was therefore another Iosiah, of whom see before, chap. 12. who notwithstanding his good education under Iehoiadab turned wicked idolater, and therefore this king came also to the like end, was slaine by his servants, because haply by them and their flattery he had been drawn to idolatry, as Iosiah also had been by his, who came and fell down before him and thus enclined his unsetled minde to their impious desires. And it was a judgement of God singularly to be marked, justly coming upon him, that the same should be the instruments of his destruction, who were the instruments of his seduction. And although Manasseh his father repented and rejected his idols, yet he was not altogether blamelesse of this wickednesse of his sonne, because he burnt not his idols, but onely cast them out of the city where they remained to be a snare to Amon. Neither is he said to have done any thing for the reforming of other parts of his kingdome, but of Ierusalem onely, so that from the countrey, where his corruption remained still it might easily be derived to the city: for a warning to all reformers, not to doe as Manasseh, but as Iehu, breake down the image and burne the house of Baal with fire, and so root out idolatry from Israel forever. But how can it be said, that Amon sinned more, seeing he turned not wizard, nor shed innocent blood, that we read of, but onely in idolatry followed his father? Chrysostome saith, that he sinned more, because he said, that he would thus doe now and by the example of his father repent, when he was old, and this is to sinne presumptuously. The Hebrew Chronicle, he sinned more, because he burnt the bookes of the law, which is the more probable, because a book of the law being found amongst the rubbish in the dayes of Iosiah was brought unto him, as most rare. This also made his sinne the greater because he was taught by his fathers example, but contemned or perverted it: lastly, whereas Manasseh repented, he did not, but died in his sinnes, as 2 Chron. 33. 23.

And the servants of Amon conspired against him, and slew him in his house, &c. ] Thus through the just judgement of God, he was soon cut off, although the traitours who did this execution are by no means to be justified, but condemned as most wicked bloodshedders, for that they not onely maliciously in way of revenge kill an ordinary man, but the King; whose person is so sacred, that although he be rejected of God for his wickednesse, yet every one of his subjects ought to be so farre from killing him, as that he should fear to cut off the lap of his garment, as David did by Saul. And therefore the people did well to slay those, that thus treacherously had slain their king, as David had before done by him, that said, he had killed Saul.

Amon being dead, the people made Iosiah his sonne king; and buried him in the garden of Paza, where it is said Manasseh was buried before. They neither put him into so honourable a sepulchre, as other kings that were godly, nor any lamentation for him, as they did afterwards for Iosiah when he was slain by Pharaoh Necho. Thus a difference shall be put after death betwixt the wicked and the godly, not so much in respect of the more or lesse honourably bestowing of their carcases, but of their souls; as of Dives and Lazarus.

2 Chron. 33. 23.

Nota.

2 Chron. 33. 15.

Nota.

Chrysost. opus imperf. Chron. Heb.

2 King. 21. 23.

V. 24.
V. 26.

Nota.

CHAP. XXII.

I Iosiah was eight years old when he began to reign, and reigned 31 years, &c. ] And And he is also set forth by his mothers name and parentage, which was Iedidiah, signifying the beloved of God, and it seemeth that she had not this name by chance, but the divine providence appointing it, because she bare so excellent a sonne, Iosiah, signifying the salvation of God, as he was named before in the time of Iero-boam, and prophesied 344. years before he was born, and indeed by him was Israel

V. 1.

V. 2.

saved all his time, both spiritually by being delivered from the bondage of idolatry, and corporally saved from the invasion of torreign enemies.

He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, &c. ] As his father was most wicked, he was most godly, for which cause he is compared with the first king, who was notable for godlinesse, even David, from whose wayes he is said not to have declined; that is, his wayes of sincere seeking to promote the worship and service of the true God onely. Whereas v. 3. he passeth immediatly from this to repairing of the temple anno 18. of his reign, omitting to say what good he did before.

2 Chro. 34. 3.

This defect is supplied 2 Chro. 34. 3. In the 8 year of his reign he being yet a child, he began to seek the Lord, and in the 12, he cleansed Iudah and Ierusalem, from the high places, groves, and images, &c. It seemeth, that he was godly brought up, in that he began so soon to declare himself, what course he would take, viz. follow on in the steps of David; which is meant, when he saith, that he then began to seek the Lord. Before this he was too young to make any such expression, and in that he did it now being but sixteen years old, it appears that the grace of God wrought betimes in his heart, and other youth should hereby be stirred up to do the like. Such an other was our Henry the 5th, who being dissolute before, suddenly turned saint, being very young; and Edward the sixth was another very Iosiah. In the 12 year, when he was but 20, he sought to reform others under his dominion, by demolishing all idols and their appurtenances in all places, yea in thus doing he proceeded so farre, that he beat the images and altars of Baal to dust, and burnt Baals priests bones upon them; and passing out of the bounds of the kingdome of Iudah, he purged the cities also of Manasseh, Ephraim, Simeon, and Nephthali, yea all the parts of the land of Israel. And how hee proceeded in doing this, is more particularly shewed, and more largely, 2 King. 23. 4. although this relation be there misplaced. For it followeth after the repairing of the temple and the covenant making, in the eighteenth, &c. of Iosiah, whereas this was done from the 12 to the eighteenth, wherefore it seemeth that the writer of the Kings regarded not order so much, but onely to set truly down the particulars done. And the writer of the Chronicles putting things in order, regarded not so much to relate every particular, as being a thing done before, and therefore is so brief, as that without any mention making of purging the temple, wherewith indeed this godly king is said to have begun, 2 King. 23. 4. he passeth on to the worke of his eighteenth year, wherein order was taken for repairing the temple. That we may then more fully understand how Iosiah proceeded, in purging Iudah and Ierusalem, we must look back from the Chronicles to the 2 Kings 23. 4. He commanded first Hilkiah the priest and other priests, to carry out of the house of the Lord, all the instruments of Baal, &c. and burnt them, and carried the ashes thereof to Bethel, which was, as Junius noteth, under the dominion of the kings of Iudah, as being taken from Ieroboam, by Abijam the sonne of Reboboam, a Chron 13. 19. and because it was by Ieroboam made a place of abominable idolatry, this godly king to disgrace it the more, caused this base dust to be carried thither, as to a most prophane place, and soon after upon the altar there, burnt mens bones, and then brake it down and burnt it to ashes, v. 15. What these vessels were, it is not said, but it may be conceived, that as for the service of the Lord there were precious vessels of gold and silver, as censers, basons, dishes, bowles, spoons, &c. so there were many such for superstitious uses about Baal, and the hoste of heaven. Yet as precious as they were, Iosiah thought them not fit to be put to any other use, then to be burnt to powder, as the cursed goods of Iericho, that there might remain no remembrance of them, for the entangling of others afterwards. And the like care is hereby commanded to all godly princes, and not to do as Manasseh, when he turned to remove appurtenances of idolatry onely, and to cast them out, seeing so they may soon be brought in again, as those that he cast out were by Amon, but utterly to abolish them. Moreover in speaking of the vessels made to Baal, it is added, and to the grove, which was, saith Wolphius, a place of pleasure near to the Lords house, in one of the courts, where men and women met together and satisfied their fleshly lusts under the Note.

V. 45.

V. 6.

V. 7.

2 Kin. 23. 4.

Junius.

Bethel was 8 miles from Ierusalem. H. B.

Note.

Wolphiu.

the shade of the trees planted there. But more probably, by grove here is meant the image of the grove before spoken of 2 King. 21. 7. because vessels were not made to groves; but to idols, for the service of which, groves used to be planted where they were worshipped. 2 Chron. 34. 4. The dust of this burning, which is said to have been carried to Beth-el, is carried and strewed upon dead mens graves, that is, the graves of idolaters, to shew the baseness both of idols and idolaters, and what they shall come unto, viz. to be as the dust, which is troden under foot, that none might be infatuated thus any more, to worship any such base and refuse stuff.

And he caused to cease the wizards, &c. or priests of the idols. ] Hebr. כמרים sometime rendered one of these wayes by Ierom, and sometime another; some, saith Wolphius, think that the word cometh from burning, because they carried fire to burn incense to their idols. Pagninus deriveth the word from נכמר, to be blacked, because idols priests did put on black garments. Whatsoever they were, it is certain, that they were the servitors of idols, being set up and having maintenance from the wicked kings of Iudah, to do this impious service, like unto which are Iesuites and Monks, to whom maintenance hath been given from princes and great persons, who were superstitious, to perform blinde devotions, whereby they thought good would redound to their souls, and to their whole families. But as Iosiah caused them to cease doing so any more, dissolving those nests of unclean birds, and converting their means doubtlesse to better uses; so should all Christian kings do, that would come into favour with God.

He made the grove also to be taken out of the house of the Lord, and burnt it in the valley of [Chedron, &c.] This grove is called the idol of the grove, ch. 21. 7. which Manasseh made, touching which see there; it is not to be understood as properly spoken of a grove planted with trees, but of an image called the grove, or grove image, because brought out of a grove thither; which is also intimated, in that it was carried as other images and vessels, and burnt in Chedron, and the dust thereof was strewed upon mens graves, whereas not dust, but ashes come of the burning of trees. And indeed it cannot be conceived, how a grove should be in the house of the Lord, or in so short a time, for Amon stood but two years, neither did he any other thing, but renew the idolatry of his father Manasseh, who planted no grove there, but set up the image of the grove, which also after his repentance, he is said to have cast out, 2 Chron. 33. 15.

Verf. 7. He destroyed also the houses of masculine harlots or Sodomites, Iunim The stoves in the house of the Lord, The Vulgar Lat. The little houses of the effeminate. That is, saith Lyra, of the priests of that idol, who are so called, because they were gelt. But of this see before in the time of Aza, 1 King. 15. 12. and of Iehoshaphat, chap. 22. 47. Where Women weaved little houses to the grove. That is, saith Lyra, curtaines, where with being enclosed as in little houses they prostituted themselves to such as came unto them to the honour of the idol, as the priests commanded them, holding therefore that they did well, for so much as they did not so out of lust, but in obedience. Oh a nation blindly lead, that could be made believe they did well, when they consented to such foule and abominable sinning, and therefore such as needed purgation at this time. Neither is it improbable, seeing Popish priests at this day have the faith of silly women as much subjected to them, as those idolatrous priests had.

Verf. 8. And bringing the priests out of the cities of Iudah, he defiled the high places, where they burnt incense from Gebah to Beershebah. ] That is, from one end of the kingdome of Iudah to another, for Gebah was the farthest city Northward in the tribe of Benjamin, as Iunim noteth from 1 King. 15. 16. and Beersheba in the tribe of Iudah Southward, Iudg. 20. 1. [And the high places of the gates] That is, not sparing the idols of any, but destroying even those, that were set up by great men, and rulers, whose judgement seats were in the gates of the cities and there they had set up altars, amongst whom Iehoshuah governour of the city Ierusalem is named as the chiefe. Wolphius thinketh, that the priests, who are said to have offered incense in the high places, did it to idols, but Lyra better,

2 King. 23. 5.

Note.

V. 6.

Iunim.
Lyra.

Note.

Iunim.

Wolphius.
Lyra.

to the Lord, yet because the temple was the onely place, they were caused to leave those places, they being now destroyed, which divers godly kings had before spared, and permitted sacrificing in them; which they would not doubtlesse have done, unlesse the sacrificing there had been to the Lord, as Manasseh after his conversion, and Asa, who is said in the Chronicles to have destroyed the high places, but 2 King. 15. the people are said still to have sacrificed in them, he destroyed those, that were made to idols, but permitted those wherein it was sacrificed to the Lord. Moreover, that which here followeth, viz. that they had portions of food allowed them to live upon after this, sheweth that they offered not to idols, for if they had done so, they had been idols priests; and so most probably should have beene slaine, as other idolatrous priests were. v. 20. He slew all the priests of the high places. But these were onely from henceforth put from their ministry for that their offence, but had maintenance out of the priests meanes allowed unto them, as long as they lived, but no more, I suppose, then necessary for their sustenance, because otherwise they should have suffered onely in their honour, but being for this cause of the burden of his service, it would have been counted as no punishment for their error past. After this example such as are taken from the executing of the office of the Popish priesthood, ought to be judged unfit to be employed in the reformed, if without them enough others may be had: if not, such as turne, may be employed, but the rest not, seeing there is no agreement betwixt God and idols.

Vers. 10. He also defiled Tophet in the valley of the son of Hinnom. That is, a pleasant place nigh unto Jerusalem, dedicated to the idol Moloch, where they used to make their very children to passe through the fire, being called Tophet, signifying sympanum a taber, because the priests of that idol played upon tabers at the time of sacrificing, that the noise of the children crying which were offered, might not be heard, as is more at large shewed upon Levit. 18. 21. and in the history of Abaz. And he is said to have defiled this place, that is, saith Pellican, by filling it with dead mens bones, that it might be unfit for sacrificing there any more, see vers. 14.

Vers. 11. He also broke away the horses, which the kings of Iudah had given to the Sunne, &c. That is, some idolatrous kings of them. But whether these were images of horses onely and of a chariot, wherein the heathen thought the Sunne to be drawne about; or very horses drawing a chariot in honour of the Sunne, is doubted. Christian expositours for the most part hold the first, R. Solomon the second, saying, That every morning some were carryed out in that chariot at the Sun rising towards it to salute the Sunne in the kings name. Wolphius conjectureth, that the image of the Sunne was placed in a glorious chariot, and that horses being kept for the purpose were at certaine times made to draw it about in honour of the Sunne, which he groundeth upon Macrobius, who saith, That there was amongst the Heliopolitans a golden image of Apollo, or the Sunne without a beard carried about in a chariot after the manner of the images of the gods, which were carried in pompe at the time of the Circensian playes. And this seemeth to me most probable, because it is said, The kings gave them to the Sunne, not made them, as if they had beene images, and he caused them to cease, as speaking of things living, as before of idols priests, v. 5. whom no man doubteth, but that he slew them, and why should we not then in like manner hold, that here the killing of these horses dedicated to such superstition is meant, and the rather because he immediately said to have burnt the chariot with fire, and why not the horses also, if they had been onely images of horses? The place, where this idolatry was done was at the entering of the Lords house, that is, East ward, as thought most apt for the Sunne rising there, and yet not very neare that house, because it is said to have been in the suburbs, at the chamber of Nethannelech.

This idolatry Iuvim noteth out of Siraho to have beene derived from the Persians, and he saith, They were the suburbs of the city of David, that is, Sion, where the Idol stood.

Vers. 12. And the altars which were upon the rooffe of Abaz his parlour, which the Note.

2 Cor. 6. 16.
V. 10.

Pellican.

V. 11.

Wolphius.

Junim.

V. 12.

the kings of Iudah had made.] So excessive was this Abaz in multiplying places of idolatry, that he set up some on the top of his owne house, and most probably Amon the sonne of Manasseh did the like, and Manasseh also, for which it is said, [which the kings of Iudah had made] but Iosiah pulleth them downe, and the altars set up first by Manasseh in the courts of the Lords house, and restored againe after that they had been by him upon his repentance cast out, by Amon his son.

The high places also, which were before Ierusalem set up by Solomon, &c.] Of Solomons setting up of these high places see before, 1 King. 11. 7. and what idols those were to the honour of whom he set them up. And the destroying of these is specially named, because this fact argued a notable resolution against all that might be said in regard of Solomons wisdom, who set them up, Art thou wiser then Solomon? Iosiah cared not what might be said, seeing he did that, which true zeale and piety required. And in his example we are taught not to be moved to impugn the lesse any superstition in the Church, because men most eminent for wisdom and learning have long agoe brought it in, used, and countenanced it: for if it be a corruption, true piety will not be hereby hindered from beating it downe, seeing in the wisest there is some folly, and in the most holy some blemishes which we must take heed of, although we reverence them for the excellencies that were in them.

If it shall seem strange, that these abominations were put down no sooner in the dayes of some other godly king his predeceffour, as of Asa, Iehoshaphat, or Hezekiah? It is to be held, that although they were godly and zealous, yet God had one all that while in his minde called Iosiah, to bring into the world, who should in purging the Church somewhat exceed them all, that if after this they should fall to idolatry again, they might the more justly be given over into the hands of their enemies as desperate, as indeed they were. And herein haply was figured out, what should be done in these latter dayes of the Gospel, in which a great reformation of religion hath been made, but it shall come to more perfection yet, the Iewes being also converted; and when after this a relapse shall be made again, destruction by the Lords last coming to judgement shall soon follow. This doubt also touching former godly kings, why they suffered these abominations to stand in their dayes, hath been further resolved upon. 2 King. 18. 4. Of these high places it is said, as of Tophet, v. 10. he defiled them; and to expresse how, v. 14. he is said to have filled the places, where idols were worshipped, with dead mens bones.

And he destroyed the altar at Bethel, which Ieroboam had made.] What power he had thus to do, seeing Bethel was in the kingdome of Israel, over which, according to the first division of the two kingdomes, the house of David had no dominion, see before upon v. 4. But forsomuch as v. 19. he is said to have destroyed idolatry also, in all the cities of Samaria, and 2 Chron. 34. 6, 7. in Simeon and Manasseh, Ephraim, and Nephtholim, and even all over Israel, which were subject to the Assyrians, it is apparant, that his zeal carried him in his holy warre against idolatry, not onely throughout his kingdome of Iudah, and other parts actually under his dominion, but also through all other parts, where any Israelites yet dwelt, as belonging anciently to the house of David, and without doubt being now willing to subject themselves to that house again, or brought under by his power, which those poor people were not able to resist. Onely it is probable, that he bauked the cities of Samaria it self, as being inhabited by strangers. Iunius thinketh, that Ephraim Manasseh, &c. in this place are meant onely such as in those tribes were willing, because in the dayes of Hezekiah his grandfather, it is said, that many of them came to the passcover to Ierusalem. But in such places doubtlesse, they would of themselves have beaten down idolatry, and Iosiah should not have needed to come amongst them for that purpose. Wherefore I think rather, that he did this whether they of the place were willing or unwilling, not without some reluctance and danger, which might follow to him from the king of Babylon, or Assyria, when he should hear of his bold attempt amongst a people subject unto him, in a matter of so great consequence, viz. the alteration of religion, which commonly beareth more sway with conscionable men, then any other thing. This then shewed a most great

V. 13.

Note.

Note.

V. 15.

Iunius.

great courage in Iosiah, carrying through all difficulties; and the difficultie of doing this will appear the greater, if we consider how long idolatry had continued in the kingdome of Israel to take the deepest rooting; viz. even from the beginning of that kingdome, in which there was never any other king but an idolater. Touching the altar at Bethel in particular, it is noted, that his destroying that was prophesied of in Jeroboams time 1 King. 13. and also the burning of mens bones first upon it, which was now fulfilled by Iosiah his taking them out of their sepulchres and burning them there, thus to defile and make unfit for any such worship for ever this place, which had been formerly this way so grossely abused. Whose bones these were it is not said, 2 Chron. 34. 5. he is said, to have burnt priests bones upon their altars; whereby we may gather, that these were the bones of idolatrous priests, who had served there in their life-time; and if any shall think hardly of this fact against the bones of the dead, which had no sense of that which was done unto them, it is justified by the prophesie, whereby he was appointed so to do, and the Lord would have it so done, to shew the abomination wherein he had idols servitors, in that he provided that they should have no rest in their graves, as others commonly have, but be disgraced to the uttermost; and the burning of their bones after death, was a demonstration of their burning in hell fire, to which, idolatry and other foul wickednesses do make all men liable. And this judgement was just, that they who had sacrificed beasts to the devill, should for their bestiall stupidity shew here, be themselves sacrificed as beasts; the devill being thus dishonoured in his servitors, where they him most had honoured. Whereas the Antichristian sect have some time done the like, against the oppugners of idols and Antichrist, as against Robert Grosset bishop of Lincoln, and Bucer; it was by a zeal, but not according to knowledge, as in those of whom Christ speaketh, the time shall come, that they which kill you shall think that they do God service. For the time that this was prophesied of, it was above 300 years before, as hath been already noted, and not till now accomplished, whereby we see, that the words of God shall take effect, and judgements threatened shall be executed, although they may seem to be long deferred, see this also in many examples more.

Note.

Job. 16. 1.

Note.

V. 17.

Lyra.

Tostatus.
R. Solomon.

And he said, What title is that which I see the men of the place said, it is the sepulchre of the man of God, &c. Because Iosiah noted this sepulchre above all the rest, there are divers conjectures about it. Lyra saith, that it was highest, having a pillar standing at one end, in which was a large inscription, so as was not in any of the rest, and this might well move the king to look at it, and thus to enquire. Tostatus, that he was moved by the instinct of the spirit to note it, that his bones might rest in quiet. R. Solomon, that bryars growing about the other sepulchres, here grew balm; for the Rabbins have inventions for all things. However, it was noted and declared, what sepulchre it was, and it was left untouched; and thus the old prophet, who had deceived this, rested in quiet also, seeing he was laid in the same sepulchre. But the greatest wonder is, that the men of that place so well knowing this, were not moved to abdicate idolatrous worship. But most probably they believed not, till they saw it fulfilled.

V. 19.

From thence the king going on to Samaria her cities, destroyed all the high places, and burnt the priests upon their altars. 2 Chron. 34. 7. He is said, to have destroyed all the idols throughout all the land of Israel; that is, where the Israelites inhabited, with whom he had to do. But in Samaria, where strangers inhabited that were of other nations, it is not likely that he meddled: because also it is said, 2 King. 17. 41. They feared the Lord, but served idols, both fathers, and children, and childrens children to this day. Then he returned to Jerusalem.

All this being done from the twelfth of Iosiah to his eighteenth year, that is, in six years, in which time also it seemeth, that a collection was made for the repairing of the temple, now the godly king taketh order for this work. 2 King. 22. 3. In the eighteenth year of his reign, he sent Shaphan to the house of the Lord, to bid Hilkiah the high Priest prepare the money, which the porters had gathered of the people, &c. Nothing had been done for the reparation of the temple, that we read of, since the time of Iuash and Iehoiadah, the high Priest, which was before this 234 years,

2 King. 22. 3.

18 of Ioash, Amaziah 29, Vzziah 52, Iotham 16, Ahaz 15, Hezekiah 29, Manasseh 5, Amon 2, Iosiah 18. Wherefore it is probable, that it was in great decay again, which being etyped then in the twelfth year of his reign, the temple was purged, and order, as is here intimated, was presently taken to collect moneys for this work, as had been done before under Ioash, 2 Kin. 12. 4. where the same is said, that is here, of putting the moneys collected into the hands of overseers of the work, and not requiring an account, and therefore shall not need to be here expounded again. Onely it is to be understood, that 2 Chron. 34. 8. things are more exactly set down, for it is said not onely that Shaphan the Scribe was sent, but also with him Maasiah the governour of the city, and Ioash the recorder, to confirm the house of the Lord, so Iunius; but the vulgar Latin, to repair; respecting rather the sense, then the proper signification of the word.

2 Chron. 34. 8.

Who came to Hilkiah and delivered unto him the moneys gathered of the Manassites, Ephraimites, and all Israel and Judah by the Levites the porters, when they returned to Jerusalem.] Whereby it appeareth, that there was not a chest set with an hole, as in Ioash his time to put moneys in, but that whilest Iosiah went about destroying idols and altars in all places, they went about gathering moneys for this worke. And in speaking of the work to be done, he addeth, Which is not in Kings: and for the rooofe of the houses which the kings of Judah had destroyed] That is, as Junius conjectureth, of the Priests and Levites houses about the temple, which haply Manasseh, when he persecuted and slew the priests opposing him in his idolatry threw downe, and Amon likewise, if he upon his repentance repaired them againe. Moreover it is here more expresse, to whom the moneys for this work were delivered without calling them to an account, because they were most faithfull, viz. the overseers of the work, Iasaph and Obadiab, Levites, Merarites, &c. And such, faith Pellican, ought much more to be made Bishops, that is, overseers of the spirit: building under the Gospel, and not any unfaithfull, or not thoroughly approved for their piety and good conscience.

V. 9.

11.
Junius.V. 13.
Pellican.
dior.

V. 14.

And when they brought forth the money which had been brought into the house of the Lord, Hilkiah found the booke of the Law, &c.] It seemeth, that the Levites, who gathered these moneys, v. 9. brought them to the high priest and so they were laid up in the treasury of the temple, untill the kings officers coming, they were before them brought forth againe by the care of the high priest, as had beene done in Ioash his time, that they together might take order with the overseers of the worke to have all things done herewith, that were needfull about the temple. But whereas in Ioash his time besides reparations, that were done, divers gold and silver vessels also are said to have been made of the overplus money, 2 Chron. 24. 14. here nothing is spoken of them although some, because the word consecratur pecunia, is used in the Vulgar Lat. hold it to be obscurely intimated, because that word is used to set forth the making of vessels of silver, but Iunius renders it better, absolutat, and if the making of it out into vessels were meant, what should there have beene for the reparations? It is most probable, that Hezekiah reigning so lately, from whose time no vessels were taken out of the temple, he left it sufficiently furnished, being a king of so great wealth, as he was, and so there was at this time no need of supplying these, although Iosephus, who is in many things of little credit, saith the contrary.

Sallianus.

Touching the book of the Law said here at this time to be found accidentally as Hilkiah took out the money out of the chest in the treasury, it may seeme strange, that it should be spoken of as so rare, seeing such a book was appointed to be kept alwayes in the Arke, and also by the king, that he might continually read therein: some of the Hebrews say, that Amon had burnt the books of the Law, which he could finde, in so much as it was thought, that they had all perished; and if it were so, no marvaile, although this being found was produced, as a thing so rare and presently carried to the king. How ever, it is certaine, that so few books of the Law remained in the land, by what meanes soever they were destroyed, that neither the high priest, nor the great Princes of Judah knew, where to finde one at this time, till that Hilkiah lighted accidentally upon this which haply his predecessor

Exod. 25. 16.
Deut. 17.

cessour

cessour had hidden here from wicked Amon, and then dying left it, no man knowing thereof. For it may be conceived, that there were in those dayes very few such bookes, before that any thing was done against them, because we read not of any but that put in the Arke, and a copy before the priests, the Levites, and another written out of that for the kings use, Dent. 17.15, 16. Of the Levites copy see also, Dent. 3.19. and how it was ordained, that they should reade out of this book to the people at the feast of tabernacles, and the Law should be written in plaster upon stone in a publique place, where every one might read it. In processe of time notwithstanding it seemeth, that they were multiplied so, that in every Synagogue there was one under the hand of the Rector or Ruler of the Synagogue, because it is said, that Moses was read in their Synagogue every Sabbath day, and because this reading and expounding, (which commonly went together for which it is said, Moses is preached when he is read; and Ezra is said to have done thus) was by the priests; it is said, The priests lips shall preserve knowledge, and they shall enquire the law at his mouth. The ten Commandements were indeed at the first made common, for every father was bidden to write them upon the posts of his house, and to talke of them to his children continually, that they also might know them, but all the books of Moses here called the book of the Law were more rare, as may be gathered from that which hath been said, till that afterwards divers copies being written out, every Synagogue was furnished with one, and most probably some, that were godly disposed, were at the charge to have them in their private houses. If it had bene so yet in Amons time, he could not so easily have deprived the Church of this treasure, and now that one was preserved in the treasury unknowne to any man living, it was the wonderfull providence of him that was the Authour of this blessed book, that although heaven and earth shall passe away, yet not one jot or tittle of the Law should perish till all be fulfilled. And whereas not onely the books of the Law doe so much abound amongst us, but of the Gospel also at this day, we see, how much we are bound to God, if the commonnesse of these divine books make us not to sleight and neglect them.

The book thus found by the high priest was by him delivered to Shaphan, who carryed it to the king, and after relation made of the moneys taken and delivered for the building, he told him of this book, and read it before him; and when Iosiah the king heard it he rent his garments, &c. The place in which he read, that troubled the good king so much, was as Ierom conjectureth, Dent. 8.9. but there be many Chapters more in that book containing terrible threatenings against transgressours of the Law, in hearing any of which, and considering the wickednesse of that land a tender heart could not but be smitten. For both his fathers had foulely sinned and the people by grosse idolatryes, which never goe unaccompanied with many other abominations, for which he saw, that grievous judgements hanged over the land, and therefore he sent immediately to enquire of the Lord by Huldah, a Prophetesse, by what means they might be prevented, and most probably that she might pray for the averting of them, as Hezekiah had formerly sent unto Esay, when the kingdome was in danger by Sanneherib, the king of Assyria. Of rending garments to shew the sorrow of the hart hath been spoken before, but for the person, to whom he sent, it may seeme strange, that it was not to Jeremy rather, being a Prophet of more note and a man, then to a woman: for that he had begun to prophesie five yeares before this appeareth, Ier. 1. 2. even in anno 13. of Iosiah, whereas this was done anno 18. so that they doe ill, who bring a reason of this from his minority, saying, that he had not yet begun, or being but young was not so venerable. And as ill doth R. Solomon in saying, that the king feared to send for him, because he thought he would be more rigid; but a woman, who is by nature more tenderly affected, more milde. For both the king knew, that either of them would speake, as God directed without varying any jot therefrom, for even so Balaam himselfe had done; and being so cast downe by hearing the book read, he doubted not certainly, but that from either of them both he should heare of comfort.

The cause then of his sending to Huldah rather then to Jeremiah was, for that she dwelt Dent. 27.8.

A 7.15.

Nehem. 8.
Mal. 2.7.
Dent. 6.

Note.

2 King. 22.8.

Hieronym.

R. Solomon.

dwelt nearer, even in some part of Ierusalem. For she is said to have been the wife of Shallum the keeper of the wardrop and to have dwelt in Ierusalem in Milnech, for so the Septuagint read it, reteining the Hebrew word, but the Vulgar Lat. and other expositours render it [in secunda] that is, either the second gate of the wall, as Ierom, or upon the second wall; for Hezekiah built another wall, as Lyra, or the second part of the city, as some others dividing it either into two or into four parts, as Wolphius saith. But Jeremiah his dwelling was at Anathoth in Benjamin about two miles from Ierusalem. And haply he was at this time further off, reproving and threatning sinne in another part of the land of Israel, to which he was sent. And it was not without a speciall providence, that they went to her, that this weaker sexe might not be despised; but forso much, as sometime God hath vouchsafed to make women instruments of revealing his will touching things to come, as well as men, as Deborah before, and Miriam the sister of Moses, and Hannah after, &c. they might according to their good endowments, have their due honour, and that marriage might not be vilified so much as it is, amongst popish teachers, seeing it hath pleased God to inspire with his spirit, even married women, and men; for some of the prophets were married men, and the high Priest also, who oft times prophesied, as high Priest of that time, as Caiaphas did. Whereas Wolphius seeketh a proof of prophetesses under the new Testament, from 1 Cor. 11. where it is said, A woman praying or prophesying with her head uncovered; saying, that although other women must in the congregation be silent, yet hereby it is shewed, that such as had the spirit of prophesie, were left at liberty to speak there; he is in this contrary to the current of other expositours, who generally hold, that they are spoken of as prophesying, that are present at the prophesying of the word. And although women have prophesied even under the new Testament, yet it hath not been publicly in the congregation, but privately.

But to return again to Huldah, some Hebrews think, that Shallum her husband was uncle to Jeremiah his father; whereas also some expound the wardrope of the priests, others expound it of the king, and Ierom gathereth yet somewhat more from their going to her a woman, viz. that this was done to the reproach of men in those dayes, and to shew, that there was not a good man, who was worthy to be consulted with. But how this can stand, seeing Jeremiah lived then, and Baruch, and Zephaniah, I cannot see.

Say to the man that sent you unto me, &c. ] She doth not say [to the man] without adding any word to set forth his dignity, out of a minde neglecting to give honour to so great a person, but as Gods deputy she onely uttereth the words of God, with whom there is no respect of persons, or giving of titles, but the king is as another man. Yet when she cometh to speak comfort to him, she altereth her phrase, and saith; But to the king of Iudah, &c. v. 18. To intimate, that although a king is not made by his dignity to differ from another ordinary man before God, yet when he is godly, he shall be honoured even before him, as he is, with the title of a King, or the Captain of my people, according to the name whereby God calleth Hezekiah to Esay, when he sent him unto him. Her saying unto him from the Lord, consisteth of two parts; First of a threatning to the place and to the inhabitants, of all the judgements contained in the book, which should not be turned away, together with the reason, because they forsook the Lord, and offered incense to other gods, this being the greatest provocation of all others, and therefore solely mentioned, although they were full of other wickednesses also, as all other idolaters are. And she speaketh of that which was written in the book for the credit thereof, that we might know all things to be most true and certain, which are herein written, and so tremble at hearing the judgements threatned in this book. And she threatneth these judgements without any hope of reversing them, because the Lord, who put these words into her mouth, saw into the wicked hearts of the people, although when the king made a reformation, they seemed to consent unto it. For that their hearts were still bent to idolatry, which was now destroyed, appeareth, because Iosiah was no sooner dead, but the kingdome returned to the former vomit, doing as in the worst dayes of Manasseh, both by idolatry and shedding innocent

Hieron. de quest.
bebr.
Lyra.
Wolphius.

Note.

Hieron. lib. 2.
cont. Pelagium.

V. 15.

Note.

V. 16, 17.

Note.

cent blood, chap. 24. 3. and then they fell into the hands of the king of Babylon, according to this threatning, and others before going. Otherwise, if their hearts had been as Iosiahs, they should not have been threatned with the abiding of Gods judgements upon them, without any means of escape, seeing he is gracious to all that truly repent, even when his threatnings are most peremptory and terrible, as to Nineveh, and Manasseh, although not amending when he was threatned, yet amending afterwards, his compassion was extended towards him, to take him out of his miserable captivity, and restore him to his kingdome, as hath been before shewed.

V. 18.

The second part of her saying, was touching comfort to godly Iosiah, because his heart melted at the hearing of the threatnings of the law, he humbled himself, rent his garments, and wept, and prayed, as is implied, in that the Lord saith, I have heard; the bringing of these judgements should be respited during his life time, who he promisseth, shall be gathered to his fathers in peace. Touching which last clause, if it be doubted, the common answer is, that although Iosiah thirteen years after fell by the sword of the king of Egypt, yet it may truly be said, that he died in peace; that is, the kingdome enjoying peace, and not being annoyed with war by any enemies, but remaining free from the miseries which warres bring, to the end of his daies: because that king of Egypt moved not warre against him, but professed the contrary, and whereas he perished by his sword, it was by his own seeking, neither did he any more hostile act against the kingdome of Iudah, when he was slain, untill three moneths after, when the time was come that judgements should begin to work against that place, for the peoples horrible wickednesses. Moreover, as Lyra hath it, he is counted to dye in peace, that dieth, before he seeth the destruction of his people and true religion, which to wise men are so grievous, that they prefer dying, before living to see such things; as it is said, 1 Machab. 3. and it is worthy the remembring to this purpose, that Titus the Romane Emperour said to certain priests of the Iews, who escaped hardly from the burning of the Temple, and craved of him to grant them their lives, he commanded, that they should be slain, saying, that they were of degenerate mindes, who desired to overlive their temple and god. He also saith, that he died in peace, because in full assurance to be saved everlastingly, forsomuch as he was a true saint of God. But the former doth best agree, because the peace spoken of was not internall, but externall; the kingdome not being infested by any warres, as it should be afterwards, when so holy a king being gone, and not another good one left to stand in the gap, judgements should have full scope to enter in. And these words, that thy eyes may not see all the evils which I shall bring upon this place, do plainly shew this to be the meaning. Whence note, what benefit cometh by the godly and zealous, it is by such, that all the kingdome is preserved from ruine, seeing it was kept off from Ierusalem, for Iosiah his sake whilest he lived, but so soon as he was dead, without any long delay, the flood-gates of Gods judgements were set open upon it.

2 Chron. 36. 2.

Lyra.

Note.

C H A P. XXIII.

V. 1. 2.

Iosiah hearing the Lords answer, immediately gathereth all the people of Iudah and Ierusalem, before the house of the Lord, both great and small, and having read the words of the book in their hearing, they entered into a covenant to keep these laws, with all their heart, and not to sinne against them any more. Yea, as is added 2 Chron. 34. 33. he rested not in this, but removed all abominations out of all Israel, and caused all in all parts to follow the Lord all his dayes. The godly king thought it necessarie, when the land was in so great danger, to binde himself and the people by oath, from going after idols any more, as being a course taken before by Asa, 2 Chron. 15. 12. and by Iehoiadab, ch. 23. 16. and by Hezekiah, ch. 29. 10. grounding doubtlesse upon that fact of Moses, after the giving of the law, who caused caused the people to make a covenant, to keep the things therein contained, confirming it by sprinkling blood upon them. For the tie of a covenant is so sacred, and so strongly binding, as that none but such as are desperately mad upon sinning, dare break it, because whoſo breaketh it, diſſolveth the bands of his ſouls marriage with God, and is actually divorced, and ſo excluded from all benefit of his protection from miſeries here or hereafter.

Now Iosiah is ſaid to have made this covenant with all his heart, and the people did outwardly all binde themſelves alſo, but diſſemblingly, as appeareth by Ieremiah his complaint, that they turned not with all their heart, but faſly, or deceitfully; for which he ſaith, that rebellious Israel was juſtified before Judah, becauſe Judah added to all her abominations hypocriſie, and therefore chap. 4. he biddeth them to breake up the fallow ground of their hearts and not to ſowe amongſt thornes; that is, having ſtill an impious and perfidious heart. If it be demanded why Iosiah did thus now, ſeeing for his owne time he was by the promiſe of God ſecured, and afterwards the threatening was ſo peremptory, that there was no hope of preventing the judgements? Anſw. When any promiſe is made, the faithfull know, that tacitly it is implied, that they ſhould with all diligence uſe all good meanes to obtaine it, and when judgements are threatened, as againſt Nineveh, they may be by true repentance averted. Wherefore Iosiah forbeareth not to doe his beſt to make ſure the promiſe, and if it might be, to avert the judgements threatened againſt the land.

And for this cauſe next unto the covenant he calleth to the keeping of a paſſeover in a moſt ſolemne and religious manner. v. 21. For although here from the 4. v. hitherto the purging of the temple, &c. from all idolatrous pollution cometh betweene, yet, as hath been before ſhewed, it went before and followed not after the making of the covenant, and therefore of all that, it hath been already ſpoken. And 2 Chron. 35. 1. the keeping of this paſſeover is ſet forth immediately after the making of the covenant and that moſt amply, whereas here it is only mentioned moſt briefly. But there is 1. mention made of the time, the fourteenth day of the firſt moneth. 2. Of the prieſts, that miniſtered about it. 3. Of the Levites, that killed and ſleaed the ſacrifices. 4. Of the number of kids and lambes out of the flock given by the king, v. 7. 5. Of the number given by the princes of the Prieſts and Levites, v. 8, 9. 6. Of their boyling for all the people and for the prieſts and themſelves, who were buſied about ſacrificing till night, v. 13, 14. 7. Of the Levites the muſicians, who ſtood to play upon inſtruments of muſick, v. 15. 8. Of the continuance of this ſolemnity, viz. ſeven dayes, v. 17. 9. This paſſeover is praized above all, that had beene kept, ſince Samuels time, v. 18. 10. It is ſaid to have beene kept anno 18. of Iosiah his reigne, v. 19. that is, the ſame yeare, that the repairing of the temple was made. Yet here alſo this paſſeover is in like manner praized and before others preferred, that had been kept, ſince the dayes of the Iudges, and the time is alſo ſet down, viz. anno 18. v. 22, 23.

But whereas 2 Chron. 35. 3. it is ſaid, *And he ſaid to the Levites giving underſtanding to all Israel, ſanctifying them to the Lord, put the holy arke in the houſe which Solomon built, &c. There is no burden for you to carry upon the ſhoulder now, ſerve the Lord your God and his people Israel.*] It may be demanded, where the Arke now was, and whether out of this houſe, and when it was carried out, becauſe we never read, that it was carried out ſince the time that Solomon placed it there. Ierom ſaith, that it was carried out by Ahaz, when he ſet up idolatry in the Lords houſe and ſet in the houſe of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the Prophetesse, where it continued, till that Iosiah cauſed it at this time to be fetched away by the Levites into the Lords houſe, being the proper place thereof: and Cajetan, that the wicked kings of Judah moſt probably remembering, what damage was done to the Philiftims, when the Arke ſtood by Dagon, their idol, durſt not let it ſtand in the temple, when they worſhipped idols there, but cauſed it to be carried out into ſome other place. And the kings ſending to Huldah the prophetesse to conſult with the Lord is thought by ſome to favour the relation of Ierom, that it ſtood in her husbands houſe. Lyra having recited that, which Ierom hath,

D d d

Exod. 24.

Jer. 3. 10.

V. 21.

2 Chron. 39.
1, 2.

V. 3.

Hieronym. in trad. Heb.

Cajetan.

hath, saith, that in an Hebrew Gloffe it is said, that the Arke was not carried in Ahaz his time out of the temple, but when Manasseh set up an idol, he removed the Arke to another place in the temple, that he might make roome for that idol to be placed there, and so it was not brought at this time from any other house but from some other part of the temple to the most holy place, where most properly it ought to stand. But he excepteth against both these, against the first, because Hzekiah reigning after Ahaz, who was so full of zeale, would not doubtlesse have suffered the Arke in any other place all the time of his reigne, and against the second, because the Levites might not come into the temple, but the priests onely, and therefore, if it had stood in any part of the temple out of the proper place, Iosiah would have spoken to them and not to the Levites to remove it in. And he resolvethe, that it was carried out by Manasseh, and now at Iosiah his appointment brought by the Levites to the Temple, of whom the Priests receiving it, carryed it into the most holy place. But against this it may as well be excepted, because Manasseh was converted and lived many yeares after, in which time it is not to be conceived, but that if he had carryed out the Arke before, he would then have brought it in again. Wherefore, if it were now brought in, that conjecture seemeth the best to me, whereby it is held, that Amon the sonne of Manasseh, that was worfe then his father, proceeded to this height of impiety to caule the Arke to be carryed out, and it having stood so till he was cut of and during the time of Iosiah his minority, and till he had found the booke of the Law, he now appointed it to be brought and set in its place, where it should rest; neither should the Levites, as in times past be troubled with carrying it upon their shoulders any more; so that they might the more freely attend upon their other ministrations. But Iunius admits not of any such sense of the words, as may imply, that the Arke had been carryed out, and was now brought in again: for he rendreth them thus. And he said to all Israel preparing the holy things of the Lord, put them before the Arke in this house, &c. Which reading although I approve not, (because I have before rendred them otherwise verbatim according to the Hebrew text, neither can the words well beare it, seeing there is no word signifying preparing, or before the Arke, but plainly put the Arke in the house, and it is improper to say of the sacrifices, which must be meant by the holy things, if it be so rendred, put them in the house, sith they came no nearer then the court, (where the altar to sacrifice upon stood) yet I cannot but approve of that opinion, whereby it is held, that the Arke was not hitherto removed out of the house where it should stand, since the time that it was placed by Solomon, so that it needed not now any carrying in, as most expositours imagine, because the carrying it out in the most corrupt times is no where spoken of, whereas if it had been, doubtlesse it should not have been passed over in silence, being an impiety so remarkable, and the manner of bringing it in with all solemnity (as was requisite,) would have followed, whereas nothing is said hereof a lastly, as Pellican hath it, the Prophets of those times most probably would have earnestly called for the restoring of it to the place, if it had been taken out, seeing no sacrificing could be acceptable, or seeking unto God, but before the Arke. But whereas he hereupon inferreth a fault to be in this place through the negligence of the Scribes, it is by no means to be given way unto, as being of dangerous consequence, as I have sometimes said before. If it be demanded then, how could he bid them set it in the house, if it were never carryed out, but stood there already? I answer, the word נָתַן set or put doth not onely signifie thus much, but also suffer or permit it, for the word נָתַן whereof it cometh, hath all these significations, wherefore if we render it, suffer the holy Ark in the house, the meaning will be nothing else, but as the next words imply, the Levites were since Solomon's time exempt from this work of carrying the Ark upon their shoulders, seeing it was to stand fixedly in the most holy place, therefore as they might by reason hereof, he biddeth them now to attend wholly upon the service of this pascall solemnity. For the first words of this verse the Vulgar Lat. hath, At whose instruction all Israel was sanctified: respecting rather the sense, then the translating of the words: seeing they are therefore said to sanctifie them, because they made them understand how this was to be done,

Junius.

Pellican.

done, and the truth is said to sanctifie, because when a man being instructed herein receiveth it, he is renewed unto holinesse thereby.

Whereas v. 4. he biddeth them according to the divisions of their families made by David and Solomon, to prepare for the people, as was appointed by Moses; the meaning is, according to their divisions into severall families, 1 Chron. 26. they should kill the lambs for the passeeover to be kept by all Israel, preparing for each family a lamb, for so Moses appointed, Exod. 12. They did this indeed themselves by the first institution, every one in his own family, because they wanted a publike place to come unto; but now, there being a temple, this feast must be kept before it, and because in the publike place, to which all assembled together, the publike Ministers must do this service for all, as is shewed v. 11, 12. that they did; and it is not to be doubted, but as Pellican hath it, that the Levites being present, taught them the right order and ceremonies to be observed in eating the passeeover, that they might not erre hereabout, and how prepared, being sanctified from all uncleannesse, they ought to come unto it, see also for this vers. 6.

For the number of cattle given now to furnish this solemnitie, they were exceeding many, viz. of small cattle out of the flocks 30000 given by the King, and of greater out of the heard 3000, &c. and these are said to have been given to the people; the godly King, and Princes after his example, and the Princes of the Priests and Levites also, thus providing, that the passeeover being no burthen to them, because their flocks were not hereby diminished, they might the more cheerfully keep it. And all these cattle thus given, were partly spent by severall families, according to the institution, and partly in eucharistickall sacrifices, a great part whereof went every of these dayes to the offerers to feast and make merry withall. The blood, which the priests are said here to have sprinkled, was upon the altar, as Levit. 3. and whereas the Levites fleaed them, it was not because their office required it, but for necessitie in respect of the multitude of sacrifices, as before in Hezekiah his time, chap. 29. 34. whereby it appears, that this ought to have been done by the priests, but now as need required, the levites help them herein.

And they sod the Passeeover, &c. ] The vulgar Latin, they roasted it. And this indeed doth best agree with the ordinance of Moses, Exod. 12. 8. But the word here used, doth first and most properly signifie to sethe, for it is בש, but as Pagninus noteth, it sometime signifieth to roste, and so it must be understood here, because the pasch raw or sodden is forbidden, Exod. 12. 8, 9. whereas this here is said to have been done, as was appointed by Moses. And the other holy things were sodden in pots, that is, the flesh of the sacrifices, for so it ought to be.

All Israel being provided for thus by the Levites, they finally provided for themselves and the priests, who ate the passeeover last of all, because they had no leisure for sacrificing till night, and for the Levites, Musicians, and Porters, who kept them all this while to their stations, the musicians to sing and sound over the sacrifices, and the porters to keep the doors.

In concluding this history it is said, that such a passeeover as this had not been kept since the dayes of Samuel, by any of the kings of Israel, 2 King. 23. 22. from the dayes of the Iudges, by any of the Kings of Israel or Iudah; both to the same effect, because Samuel was the last of the Iudges, but in Kings not onely the Kings of Israel, but of Israel and Iudah are spoken of; because passeeovers had been kept, not onely whilst all Israel was united under one king, but also after it was divided, by godly kings that reigned over Iudah in particular. Whereas the time is extended to the dayes of the Iudges, Lyra noteth, that no passeeover is commemorated to have been kept in the time of the Iudges, but onely in the time of Iosiah, Iosh. 5. 9. but that passeeovers were kept from year to year, when they had godly Iudges or Kings, is not to be doubted, although not commemorated, sith it is not the manner of sacred historians to set down the solemn feasts, which were commonly kept of course, but when there was somewhat extraordinary in the keeping of them, as in the time of Hezekiah, and now in the time of Iosiah. For that in Hezekiah his dayes was extraordinary for the time, the second moneth, and the keeping of it seven and seven dayes, the congregating not onely of Iudah, but of the other Job. 17. 17.

V. 4.

Pellican.

V. 7.

V. 13.

V. 14.

V. 15.

V. 18.

Lyra.

kingdome alſo to it, viz. many tribes thereof, and the great number of cattle then offered, viz. 1000 bullocks, and 7000 leſſer cattle by the King, and 1000 bullocks, and 10000 leſſer cattle by the Princes, and the moſt joyfull keeping of this feaſt, like the joy in Solomons dayes, 2 Chron. 30. 26. And this in Iosiah his time was yet more extraordinary, becauſe it is ſaid, none like unto it had been kept before, and therefore neither in the time of Hezekiah. But wherein did this exceed that?

Anſw. Firſt in the time, this being kept the firſt moneth, as was primarily appointed that in the ſecond through the neceſſitie of the time. Secondly, in the univerſality of the congregation gathered to this out of all Iſrael, for he brought them all to follow the Lord, ch. 34. 33. Whereas in Hezekiah his time, ſome onely are ſaid to have come out of the tribes of the kingdome of Iſrael, to that paſſeover. Thirdly, in the ſanctitie of all that came, for they were taught by the Levites firſt to do this; whereas at that were many out of the tribes of Iſrael eating in their uncleannesse, but Hezekiah prayed for them, and ſo it was forgiven. Fourthly, now were all the claſſes of the Levites employed, in preparing and killing even that, which was for the eating of all Iſrael; then they killed onely, and for the unclean only. Fifthly, the ſingers and players upon inſtruments, kept them to their ſtations all day, the Levites providing for them alſo, but then not, as we reade of. Sixthly, in the number of cattle given by the king to the keeping of this ſolemnitie 30000 ſmall cattle, and 3000 oxen, whereas by Hezekiah, onely 1000 and 7000 were given. But whereas Iosephus will have the preference to be in his keeping it more exactly, according to the ordinances of Moses, he is not to be heard, becauſe this were a derogation to David, Hezekiah, and other godly kings, as if they had not in ſo materiall a point of religion kept them to the rules preſcribed, If any man ſhall wonder, why the keeping of the paſſeover was made ſo great account of, when as it conſiſted of nothing, but eating, and burning fat in the fire. It is to be underſtood, that the thankfulneſſe to God for their deliverance out of Egypt expreſſed hereby, was the thing in eſteem, and faith in Ieſus Chriſt, of whom this was a figure, and obedience to Gods will, when as other nations ſacrificed to falſe gods, in abhorring from that, and ſacrificing abundantly to the true God. And obedience, faith and thankſgivings, in ſolemn manner are ſtill the duties moſt acceptable; ſo that there be no ſparing of coſt withall in contributing to the maintenance of that which tendeth to his praiſe, or charitie to his poor.

Iosephus.

Note.

2 King. 13. 22.

Although there was not ſuch a Paſſeover as this, &c. ] The vulgar Latin, for there was not, &c. But 12 here uſed, ſignifieth both for and although, but it agreeth better with the words following, v. 26. Yet God turned not away from his wrath, &c. to render it with Iunim, although. For ſo it is, as if he had ſaid, all the means that might be, were uſed by godly Iosiah, in keeping a moſt exact paſſeover, and purging the church from all pollutions, yet he turned not away, &c. And here is ſubjoynd a recitall of things formerly done by him in reforming, v. 24. He took away the wizards, ſoothſayers, and images, &c. and v. 25. there was no king like him, &c. Shewing, that all this is to be underſtood as ſpoken together, that it might appear, how reſolutely the Lord was bent to bring his judgements; whatſoever was now done tending to a pacification, and therefore that it agreeth beſt to render the word, although.

V. 25.

But how is it ſaid, there was no King like unto him, that turned to the Lord with all his heart, &c. ] Whereas 2 King. 18. 5, the ſame is ſaid of Hezekiah? In ſatisfying this doubt, enough hath been already ſaid upon that place, the things being the ſame, wherein Hezekiah did ſo, as that none other did like him, and the things on the other ſide, wherein Iosiah was without his peer.

V. 26.

Laſtly, if it be demanded why it is ſaid, that he was not turned from the fierceneſſe of his wrath, to which he was provoked againſt Judah by the provocations of Manaſſeh, notwithstanding? Pellican answereth, that Manaſſeh his ſins did onely lye covered all the time of Iosiah, till by his wicked poſteritie and the Jews, who now turned but feignedly from them, they were uncovered, and vengeance ſent down therefore even to the making of all their ceremoniall worſhip, which they had ſo much abuſed, ceaſe, ſo as that it was never perfectly reſtored again, but ſome

Pellican.

of

of the divine glory henceforth diffused amongst the Gentiles. Lyra saith, that the holiness of Iofiah sufficed not to expiate the wickedness of his predecessors. But all this satisfieth not the doubt, seeing Manasseh was a convert, and against true converts their sinnes are remembered no more. Hugo therefore expoundeth it thus, the provocations of Manasseh, wherein the people imitated him. The more full answer is, the provocations of Manasseh are in speciall mentioned, not that they were not blotted out of Gods remembrance towards him, but because they were in the highest degree (no king of Iudah doing so vilely before) and renewed with the liking of the people by his sonne Amon, and God, who teach into all hearts, saw that they were still in their hearts, although outwardly they conformed themselves to Iofiah his minde for the time, seeing both Jeremy complaineth of this, ch. 3. 9. 10. and their relapse immediately after Iofiah his death declared it. And because Manasseh began to advance iniquity to this height, they are still called his provocations, when as they were his now in name onely, but really theirs that feared not to act them over again after his severe chastisement and repentance. Sin, we see by this, leaveth a scarre, although remitted, in the name of him that commits it, throughout all generations, as a personall foul sinne did also to David, who greatly repented himself thereof, that if we would have a good name like a precious ointment, we may abhor from all such sinning, and flee even the corrupting that cometh hereunto by any folly, as by dead flies, which are but little, to a boxe of precious ointment.

In his dayes came Pharaoh Necho against the king of Assyria to the river Euphrates ] 2 Chron. 35. 20. He went up against Charchemish. Which was a city of Syria, or rather Assyria 400. miles off from Ierusalem standing neare the river of Euphrates. The Assyrian Monarchy now declining, the king of Egypt trusting to his great power went forth to make warre against him, and because he could not come thither without passing through the kingdome of Iudah in some part, Iofiah either, because he thought it not safe to suffer such great forces, to passe through his countrey, as fearing least under a colour of passing through they should endeavour the possessing of it, or because some amity had been sometime betwixt the kings of Iudah and Assyria; or he feared by his suffering of the Egyptian army to goe quietly through his kingdome, to incurre the Assyrians displeasure, as others thinke; but most improbably, seeing the friendship of king Ahaz with Assyria was long agoe broken off in the time of Hezekiah, and Iofiah had no reason to fear any king in the world, having a promise of peace in his time to the end. It was therefore a suspicion of treachery towards his land in Necho, that made him to goe out to oppose him, and an unwillingness to have the Assyrian subdued, lest the king of Babylon having no potent adversary neare to resist him, the effecting of that should be hastened, which had been threatened to Hezekiah, viz. the subduing of Ierusalem to that proud king. But whatsoever cause outwardly there may seeme to have been, this his going against Necho to fall by his sword was not without a divine providence secretly working, that he being taken out of the way room might be made for Gods judgements for his sake hitherto withheld, to enter amongst a rebellious and hypocriticall people, of whom many secretly practised abominable idolatry even whilest Iofiah lived, as we may gather by the invectives of Jeremiah, chap. 5. 7, &c.

The place, to which Iofiah went against Necho is not here mentioned, nor what other passages were, before they met, betwixt him and Necho, but 2 Chron. 35. 22. It is said to be the valley of Megiddo, and that Necho sent first unto him to will him to forbear, seeing his coming out was not against him, although he marched through the borders of his countrey, not without a command from God. So that it is to be conceived, that the king of Egypt hearing of Iofiah his preparation to resist him, sent an Herald un to him with this message, going on his journey in the meane season, till he came to Megiddo, where Iofiah encountered him and was slaine in the very beginning of the battell, as is intimated in saying, He slew him, when he saw him, v. 29. And in more words, 2 Chron. 35. 21, 22. The darters smote Iofiah, who had disguisedly thrust himselfe into the battell: then being carried away in his charriot he died. Of Megiddo in the tribe of Manasseh, see Iosb. 17. 11.

Lyra.

Hugo Card.

Note.

Eccles. 10. 1.

V. 29.

H. B. Patr. travels.

2 Chron. 35.
21, 22.

25.

2 King. 23.30.

Junius.

Wolpius.

The place, wherein he died, was Ierusalem, 44. miles from Megiddo, and he was greatly lamented by Iudah and Ierusalem, and Ieremiah who wrote his lamentations upon his death, and the miseries ensuing; and these lamentations they were taught commonly to sing both to put by the singing of other vaine songs, and that a daily remembrance being herein made of the vertues of Iosiah, all might be moved to the love hereof; and this took so as that it continued a custome thus to doe to the time of the writing of this book, which serveth to commend unto us the singing of the like godly songs throughout all ages.

Iosiah being dead, Iehobaz his sonne was anointed king in his stead being twenty three yeares of age, &c. This anointing of a king, that was heire apparant to the crowne, was extraordinary and needed not to have been done, saith Junius, but onely because the kingdome having been troubled by Pharaoh Necho, this was now used as a signe of putting it into his hands, as the right king to be by him defended against the Egyptians and all others. But, as Wolpius noteth, they did unwisely herein so to neglect the victor, whom they should rather have sought unto for peace and liberty to make them a new king: for this their fact could not but greatly provoke him, as the sequels sheweth, that it did, when returning from his warres against Ashur he came and took Iehobaz and carryed him away bound in chaines unto Egypt, where he died, having reigned before his captivity but three moneths, and made Eliachim his brother king in his stead, turning his name to Iehojakim, who is said to have been 25. yeares old, and therefore the elder brother to Iehobaz, and consequently the right heire to the crowne, but he being injuriously refused, the younger was set up, and it succeeded accordingly. For both he was put downe and came to misery, and the land had a mulct imposed upon it for this presumption, one hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold, which, if we account to the talent as the Hebrews commonly do, 125. pound, amounteth to 12500. of silver, and of gold 2250.

This Iehobaz is otherwise called Shallum, that is, a recompence, Ier. 22.11. Or consummation, although Ierom applyeth it rather to Zedekiah in whom the judgements threatned were consummated; but because Iehojakim is spoken of after this, and Zedekiah was after him, that cannot stand. The Hebrews by the name Shallum understand all the sonnes of Iosiah, either Iehobaz, Ichoiakim, or Zedekiah, because they were all alike wicked and holpe towards the consummating of the judgements, but it is plainly spoken of one particular Iehobaz, as who began by his wickednesse to make way for the fulnesse of Gods judgements to come after Iosiah his death. And his dying in Egypt is prophesied of, and that he should never returne into his owne land againe. The place where Necho took him, was Riblah in the land of Hamath, eighty miles from Ierusalem in the tribe of Nephtali. Of Hamath, there see Iosh. 19.35. it was the uttermost boundary of the land of Canaan. But how it happened, that Iehobaz came to Riblah to be bound there, some conjecture most probably, that Ichoiakim his elder brother went to Necho thither, as he returned from Ashur to complaine of the wrong that was done him, profering, if he would helpe him to the kingdome, to pay him a tribute, whereupon Necho sent for Iehobaz, under a pretence of compounding the matter betwixt the two brothers, and when he came within his power, bound him, and made Ichoiakim king, imposing the money aforesaid upon the land. But that we might know the cause, why Iehobaz enjoyed the kingdome so short a time, and came to such misery, and that it was not accidentall, it is said, that he did evil, as his wicked forefathers had done, viz. Ahaz, Manasseh and Amon. His mothers name is also set downe, Hamutal the daughter of Ieremiah, not of the Prophet, for he was of Anathoth, yet it is likely, that the Ieremiah of whom she came, was godly, seeing Iosiah would not otherwise have matched himselfe with her, and if so, he was a degenerating plant, and therefore the more worthy to be rooted up.

V. 34.

The brother of Iehobaz set up by Necho, was at the first called Eliakim, but he changed his name to Iehojakim, which he did, that it might alwayes be remembered that he was made king by him, the changing of names being a signe of their being obliged to those that changed them for some great benefit, as Nebuchadnezzar, zar changed also the name of Zedekiah, when he made him king; and it was usuall amongst the Romans, when a man endued a servant with freedome, to change his name. But the change now made was but small, for Eliakim signifieth, rising, and Iehoiakim, the rising of the Lord, as Genebrard noteth out of the Hebrews, who, he saith, do use these two names promiscuously, which may well be, for that there is no more difference, but as betwixt  $\text{יהוה}$  signifying God, and  $\text{יהי}$ , three of the four letters of the name Iehovah, the rest of the word  $\text{יהי}$  being common to them both. But although either way he had in his name the most holy, yet in truth there was in him nothing lesse, for he is said to have been wicked as his fathers, and therefore in his dayes the judgements threatned from Babylon began to work, he not being suffered to sit in the seat of royall Majestie above eleven years, but he began immediately to exact the moneys ceased for Pharaoh, as Manahem had also done once before for Phul the king of Assyria. Of his wickednesse Ezekiel speaketh under the similitude of a lion devouring men, as he doth also of his brother that reigned before him: and Jeremiah taxeth him with covetousnesse, and ambition, and other vices. Whereas Ezekiel calleth them princes of Israel, it was because they reigned over Israel also in a great part, for so the gestes of Iosiah their father shew that they did.

Genebrard.

Ezech. 19. 5.

Jer. 22. 13.

CHAP. XXIV.

Against Iehoiakim the Lord brought Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and he became his servant three years, then he rebelled against him, &c. 2 Chr. 36. 6. Nebuchadnezzar is called the king of Chaldaea, and it is said, that he took Iehoiakim and bound him, to be carried into Babylon together with the vessels of the Lords house; so that Chaldaea and Babylon were all one, Chaldaea the country, and Babylon the chief city thereof, and this in the Chronicles is to be understood, as happening to Iehoiakim after his rebelling against the king of Babylon, when having been before for his sinnes brought into his power, he had bound himself by oath to serve him, so Pelican. Yet some will have it meant of his first coming into his power, when they say he was carried away, but upon agreement soon returned. And forsomuch as when he was bound to be carried away, the precious vessels of the Lords house were carried away also, and this is not said to have been done anno 7 of Nebuchadnezzar, Ier. 52. 28. for of the three carryings away there mentioned, that was the first; and the seventh of Nebuchadnezzar was the eleventh of Iehoiakim. But Dan. 1. 2. part of the holy vessels were carried away Anno 3. of Iehoiakim, it is plaine that the binding of Iehoiakim to be carryed away was Anno 3. of his reigne, but upon composition he came backe againe to rule as tributary to the king of Babylon, and so did till that rebelling he was within a few yeares after destroyed by the Chaldees and others coming against him, in Ierusalem, and cast out of the gates thereof like an asse unlamented by any, Ier. 22. 19. This is indeed in Kings for brevities sake passed over, the coming of Chaldean robbers against Iudah being onely spoken of, but plainly shewed to be so in Jeremiah, wherefore Nebuchadnezzars coming is not mentioned here any more, but that he being dead, his childe was immediately set up to reigne after him, whereas, if he had fallen by the sword of Nebuchadnezzar, he would doubtlesse have taken order for a successour, as well as he did, when he carried away Iehoiakim soone after. In what yeare of Iehoiakim Nebuchadnezzar came first against him, it is not here said, but Dan. 1. 1. In the third yeare of Iehoiakim concerning which a question ariseth, because Ier. 25. 1. the first yeare of Nebuchadnezzar is said to be the fourth of Iehoiakim, whereas by Daniel it should be in the third, and his second in his fourth. Some answer, that the third and fourth yeare are so neare together, if by the third we understand the latter end of it, that the first of Nebuchadnezzar might be said to be either his third, or fourth.

V. 1.

Vatabulus.

But out of Berosus it may otherwise be resolved thus, that Nebuchadnezzar came Berosus.

came against Iehoiakim a year before his fathers death, and so the first year of his reign was the fourth of Iehoiakim; For he saith, that Nebuchadnezzar senior, hearing of the revolt of those in Syria, he being unable through age, sent out his sonne Nebuchadnezzar against him, and died before his return; then he having overcome his enemies, returned, and was made king in the room of his father. In the third year of Iehoiakim then, Nebuchadnezzar not being yet crowned, but soon after made king of Babylon, for which he is now so called, came and subdued, and bound, and made him his tributary; which is meant, when it is said, he served him three years, that is, paying tribute unto him. Hitherto, it seemeth that he had continued under Necho king of Egypt, who first set him up, and when he had thus long served the Babylonian, most probably Necho instigating him hereunto, by promising him ayd, he denied him tribute, and then was troubled with Chaldees, and other robbers, and most probably destroyed by them.

At what time also, to make it the more probable, that Egypt was his stay, to which he trusted in revolting from the king of Babylon, it is said here v. 9. that from the Egyptian king was taken away at the same time, whatsoever was betwixt the river of Egypt and Euphrates. Whereas Ier. 46. 2. the Egyptian forces are said to have been smitten by him, anno 4. of Iehoiakim, that is said to have been done at Charchemish, where Necho was fighting against the Babylonians; but this about the time that Iehoiakim perished. Those warres were begun in the last year of Iosiah, and having continued till the fourth of Iehoiakim, Necho was able to stand no longer, but his forces were then overthrown, yet it seemeth, that after this he practised again with Iehoiakim against Nebuchadnezzar, wherefore now he both sent some to cut off Iehoiakim, and subdued a great part of the Egyptians dominions also. And to effect this utter overthrow of Iehoiakim, it is said v. 2. that the Lord sent against him troops of the Chaldees, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, and against Judah, as he had threatned by his prophets, that is, Huldah and Jeremy, cb. 14. 15. &c. From whose mouth it is said to have come, to take Judah away for the sinnes of Manasseh, according to all which he had done. Iunius renders it, for the like sinnes to those which Manasseh had done, holding a trajection to be in the words. As also, Gen. 5. 29. Iudg. 18. 31. עֲשֵׂה כְּחַטַּאת מְנַשֶּׁהכֹּהֵן אֲשֶׁר, that is, verbatim, in the sinne of Manasseh, according to all which he did. Which is plainly meant of the kingdome of Judah thus wasted, when as the sinnes of Manasseh were again acted over therein, as the words [according to all which] do imply. For it is as if it had been said, as the Lord had threatned so he did, viz. took away Judah, when they sinned like Manasseh, doing according to all that, which he had done, yea filling Ierusalem also with innocent blood, which is intimated in comparing Iehoahaz and Iehoiakim to lions devouring men, as hath beene already said; and the shedding of innocent blood is expressly laid to the charge of Iehoiakim, Ier. 22. 17. For if these judgements had beene sent simply for the sinnes of Manasseh, that proverbe had beene justly taken up, The fathers have eaten sower grapes, and the childrens teeth are set on edge. From which, as great injustice the Lord vindicateth himselfe. Wherefore not those personall evil acts done by Manasseh are here meant, for he repenting thereof was forgiven; but the men of Judah never repenting, but dissemblingly had them still remembered against them, as coadjutors in to evil works, and now the stay which held them in from running to the like wickednesse being taken away, viz. godly Iosiah, they returning with the swine to wallow in the mire were severely judged, as they were wel worthy.

Iehoiakim being dead, Iehoiakim his sonne was made king, being eightene years old, and reigned onely three moneths, &c. 2 Chron. 36. 9. He is said to be eight yeares old, when he began to reigne. This is commonly resolved by saying, that the Chronicles mention the time, when he began to reigne with his father, which was in the second yeare of his reigne, and if so he were but eight then, he was eightene when his father being dead he began to reign alone, according to Kings. And this is the more probable, because the times were troublesome, and Iehoiakim might think it necessary to settle his sonne in the kingdome before his death, that there might be lesse danger in setting up another, before him, which was a thing fo

V. 2.

V. 3.
Junius.

Ezek. 36. 9.

V. 6.

V. 8.

2 Chro. 36. 9.

so lately done in his younger brother Iehoabaz, he himselfe being kept from it. But because no such thing is spoken of, as his reigning together with his father, all this is but a conjecturall. Iunius therefore by this word [He] When he began to reigne, understandeth not Iehoiakin, but Iehoiakim his father, he was eight then, but now eightene, alleading the like touching Abaz, 2 King. 16. 1. but then he must needs be in his nineteenth at his fathers death, seeing he reigned eleven yeares, but it may be that the first yeare of his eleven was but part of a yeare, and so is not here reckoned. But the words are the same which are used in Kings, כמלך when he reigned, and therefore it seemeth, that the same [He] is to be understood in both places, yet no better way of resolving this having been by any other found out, I rest in this, not thinking it safe to admit of the resolution of some, that here was a fault in the scribe, eight being written for eightene, for which cause in one Septuagint translation it is eightene, as in Kings. Of the wickednesse of this king read more, Ier. 22. for which he is threatened to be delivered into his enemies hands, and was delivered, as we see here, v. 12. and 2 Chron. 36. 10. the time is noted to be the turning of the yeare, that is, most probably, in the Spring time, when kings used to goe forth to warre. And it is here said, that Nebuchadnezzar first sent his servants and besieged Ierusalem, then he came in person, and the king fearing ruine both to himselfe and the city, came forth unto him with his mother and courtiers, &c. But for what cause he then invaded that land it is not said, onely Iosephus saith, that fearing the young king would seeke to revenge his fathers death, and ignominious casting out of Ierusalem unburied, done by Nebuchadnezzar, he thought it not safe to suffer him to reigne, and therefore came against him, carryed him away to Babylon, and set up another to reigne in his stead; and some thinke, that he having first made him king, soone repented and returned thus againe. But forsomuch as it no where appeareth that Nebuchadnezzar was at the death of his father, as hath been partly noted before, neither is he said to have set up his sonne, and it is improbable, that having done it, he would without some new cause so soone reverse that act of his; it is rather to be held, that Iehojakim having rebelled against him, but by some troupes of his Chaldees already slaine; he heard that his sonne tooke the kingdome upon him, and at this he being offended, as making account that it was in his owne power onely to set up a king there, since he had subdued that kingdome, he thus sendeth his forces against him, &c. but on Gods part the cause why he sent Nebuchadnezzar against him was his wickednesse, he did that which was evil, even as his father had done.

Then Iehoiakin coming forth and yeelding himselfe to Nebuchadnezzar was taken and carryed into Babylon together with his mother, wives and courtiers, and all the best of the people, and artificers 10000. and the whole summe being first by a prolepsis set downe together, they are immediately distinguished into 7000. mighty men, 1000. artificers and warriors, whose number is not expressed, but to make up the foresaid summe must needs be 2000. so Iunius. Others as Wolphius hath it, will have the whole number carried away 18000. viz. 10000. of the common sort, 7000. of the better sort, and 1000. artificers, and Iosephus hath it, 18032. but in this summe there is a manifest mistaking, for in Iosephus it is 10000. and 832. this last number being added out of Ieremiah 52. where it is that anno 18. he carryed away 832. these two then, which were ten yeares after one another, are by Iosephus put together. I assent therefore rather to Iunius, that although here be two numberings of them, that were carryed away, yet the second is but to shew more distinctly, of what sorts the 10000. first spoken of were. But because Ier. 52. 28. it is said, that the people carryed away, anno 7. of Nebuchadnezzar were 3023. where both the number mentioned is much lesse then this, and the yeare agreeth not the eighth being spoken of here, but there the seventh, and therefore there were either more carryings away captive, then these mentioned by Ieremiah whose purpose seemeth to be to summe up all together, or the Scripture is contradictory to it selfe. To this the same Iunius and some others answer, that the 3000. there spoken of were onely of Ierusalem, those of the rest of the kingdome of Iudah being omitted, which were about 7000. more, and that this

Junius.

V. 10, 11, 12.

Iosephus.

V. 9.

V. 12.

Junius.

Wolphius.

Ioseph. Antiq.
l. 10. 9.

carrying away was at the latter end of the seventh and the beginning of the eighth, and therefore said by Jeremiah to have been anno 7. by Kings, anno 8. but the solution, I take it, will be more cleare, if it be said, that when Iehoiakin dyed, the troupes of Chaldees and others sent by the king of Babylon carryed away that lesser number, and this was anno 7. but when he came against Iehoiakin in person the greater number was carryed away the yeare following, which was the eighth, and that it was in another yeare may be gathered from Chronicles, where it is said in the turning of the year, and it is likely, because this was plainly set forth, 2 King. 24. Jeremiah omitted it, as also, that captivity anno 3. of Iehoiakin, being left to be recorded Dan. 1. 1. Some thinke, that Iehoiakin coming out to Nebuchadnezzar, was not to yield himselfe into his hands, but being required so to doe under a pretence of receiuing conditions of peace, but when the king of Babylon had him in his power, he held him, and carryed him away captive: but others contrariwise more probably, that seeing the danger wherein the whole city and kingdome was, he voluntarily yielded himselfe, hoping thus that it should be preserved, wherein he did the part of a good king, as Iosephus commends him in speaking of this, and to make this the more probable, he was better entreated then his successor Zedekiah, that stood out and would never yield, although moved to it by the Prophet Jeremiah. But he upon the like motion yielded, as is intimated, Ier. 24. 5. where the Lord saith, that he sent them into Chaldea, who were then carryed away, and would bring them againe as good figges, see also Ierem. 29. 2, 3, 4. The same king by Ierem. 22. is called sometime Iechoniah, sometime Choniah, whereby it seemeth, that he had two names, and it is threatened, that none of his children should sit upon the throne for his wickednesse, and accordingly it came to passe, for Zedekiah his uncle, a third sonne of Iosiah was made king in his stead. Thus as Wolphius noteth, his yielding as the prophet moved him brought upon him great calamities at the first, but in the end he was not without a reward for this his obedience and piety towards his countrey, when Evilmerodach the sonne of Nebuchadnezzar lifted up his head, and set him at his owne table that others might not teare to obey the motions that come from God, but whatsoever they see, they are like to suffer for thus doing, be comforted by looking at the end, which shall be comfortable; and that Kings in particular may practice the like piety towards their countreys in the time of danger, doing what they can, although it may seeme a disparagement unto them, that so many thousands committed to their government may not be brought to misery, they being as their sheepe, of whom they are made shepherds, and therefore ought to be ready as the good shepherd to lay downe their life for them.

Iosephus

Wolphius.

Note.

V. 13.

And he took away all the treasures of the Lords house and of the Kings, and all the golden vessels that Solomon had made. It may seeme, that there could be none of the golden vessels made by Solomon remaining at this time to be carryed away, because all the treasures of the Lords house were taken away long before in the time of Rehoboam the sonne of Solomon, 2 Chron. 12. 9. And if under the name of such treasures the vessels were not comprehended, they are expressly said to have beene carryed away in the time of Amasiah, 2 Chron. 23. 24. To say nothing of these treasures againe exhausted in the time of Hzechiah, 2 King. 18. 15, 16. But it is answered, that they are called the vessels of Solomon, because they were made like unto them, and so as God had directed Solomon. This was prophesied of to Hzechiah by Esaie above an hundred yeares before, and now fulfilled after so long a time to shew the truth of God; that we may beleeve, and it is to be noted, that Ierusalem was now punished in that, whereof they were proud and vain-glorious to make ostentation of it, that our precious things may not puffe us up, lest God thereby provoked to strip us likewise, and bring us to misery.

Note.

V. 14.

Wolphius.

Iunius.

And he carryed away all Ierusalem, and all the mighty men, and all carpenters and Smithes, &c. The Vulgar Lat. for Smiths, hath inclusores, by which word, saith Wolphius, the Hebrews understand those that were shut into the towres to keep them; but because they are rather to be thought to come under the name of warriours, he preferreth the other reading of Iunius, Smithes. But for as much as the

of it, they did according to all the abominations of the heathen, and the contempt of admonition, touching which, it is not only said that they mocked at his messengers; but also despised his words, as causing to erre by his prophets, or deceiving; thus it is in Hebrew. The vulgar Latin, they set light by his words, and mocked his prophets. Inimicus, they said, they were led about by his prophets. The word is, עוֹנֵהוּ making to erre, or made to erre. The scoffe which they put upon the prophets was, that they were deceivers, and false prophets, and thus they went on, till the wrath of God burnt against them, and there could be no healing, that is, of the land thus sick of sinne, till it was utterly destroyed and laid waste, and not of their souls, which when they were upon this grievous punishment, being made penitent in any of them might be saved everlastingly.

And hitherto is shewed what was done in the fourth moneth of the eleventh year of Zedekiah. Now the authour of Kings saith, The fifth moneth, the seventh day (that was the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar) came Nebuzaradan, &c. Which is doubtlesse so punctually set downe that reckoning from hence forward by the yeares of the Babylonian kings, we might know in what time the end of the seventy yeares captivity prophesied of, Ier. 25. 11. ch. 29. 10. expired. As for the difference, which seemeth to be from this Jeremiah 52. 12. saying, The fifth month, the tenth day, it is nothing, for here is noted the time of his coming, there of his burning the temple three dayes after. From whence he came it is not said, but most probably king Nebuchadnezzar staying yet at Riblah after a moneths deliberation, sent him with a company of butcherly executioners back to Jerusalem to make his spoile there, for which he is called præfectus laniorum, master of butchers, as Wolphius renders it, but Innius, præfectus satellitum, captain of the guard; Volg. Lat. princeps exercitus. But טבח, which is the word here used cometh of טבח, to kill, and therefore most aptly may be rendered by butchers, the souldiers over whom he was, being for their cruelty and abundance of bloudshed thus termed in disgrace. But to returne to the foresaid time, there is a difference amongst expositors, some holding, that it began at the carrying away of Iehoiakim, eleven yeares before and some at this time; and Wolphius saith, that some make a third time, when Iehoiakim was slaine, when the Chaldees began first to carry away captives, ending this and that of Iehoiakim the first of Cyrus, the other the second of Darius, the limits of each containing within them seventy yeares. They that will have the time begin at Iehoiakim, alledge the Epistle of Jeremiah sent to those of the captivitie, comforting them by promising a returne, after that they had bene in Babylon seventy yeares, and this Epistle was sent by the messengers of Zedekiah, therefore not to those, who were carryed away with him, but before with Iehoiakim, and this they strengthen farther from Ezech. 1. 2. and 40. 1. where a reckoning is made by the yeares from the carrying away of Iehoiakim, the fift and twenty five, and from Matth. 1. 11. where the captivitie is reckoned to begin at Iehoiakim. But in the same 40. of Ezech. there are two reckonings, one from Iehoiakim, another from the destruction of the city, betwixt which two a distance is put off eleven yeares, the first was the time of the captivities beginning, the other of the desolation, whereby Jeremiah beginneth the time of account, chap. 25. 11. and therefore from thence doubtlesse, according to the opinion of others, we are to reckon and that was the time of carrying away Zedekiah, and this they further confirme out of 2 Chron. 36. 21. and Dan. 9. 2. For the Epistle sent by Jeremiah to those in captivity, it must be expounded by the prophesie preceding, when they had been leventy yeares in Babylon, that is, who were carryed away both first and last, for he by the spirit foreseeing this, speaks of it, as being the captivity fully made, from whence they were to reckon and not from that already past, and then the seventy yeares expired, anno 1. of Cyrus king of the Persians, and of Darius, who although he be said, Dan. 6. first to have reigned, after the Babylonian kingdome destroyed, yet his reigne was very short, viz. but one whole yeare, before he died, and Cyrus his sonne in law was king immediately after the next yeare. The destruction of Babylon then was the terme of the desolation, and a new kings beginning to reigne, who was of another nation, the beginning of their Finitus.

2 King. 15. 8.

Wolphius.
Finitus.

Wolphius.

Jer. 29. 10.

Functi Chrono.

V. 9.

Athanas. in Synop.

Dan. 9.

Joseph. l. 11. c. 1.
Theodoret in Dan.

Nehem. 8.

2 Chron. 36. 17.

V. 11.

V. 13.

V. 18.

promised deliverance. But if we reckon from the desolation happening anno 19. of Nebuchadnezzar who reigned 43. yeares, in histime there were after it, 24. Evilmerodach his sonne, 30. Regassar the next king, 30. Labassardar the next 6. and Balbazzars, 5. Darins, 1. altogether 69. we shall finde, that the seventieth was the first of Cyrm, and so their deliverance was the same yeare, that it was promised.

To returne to Nebuzaradan, He burns the house of the Lord, and the kings house, &c. ] It is a received opinion amongst many ancient fathers, that now also the holy Scriptures were burnt, and that God inspired Ezra to write and set them forth perfectly again, and this is grounded upon 4. Ezra 1. 4. 21, 22, &c. But Athanasius saith, When the sacred books perished by the incury of the people and the long captivity, Ezra being a very industrious and diligent reader and lover of the truth kept them all by him and afterwards brought them forth for the common good, and so in a manner preserved them being delivered from destruction. It is said also, that Daniel by reading Jeremiah found the time of the captivity to be at an end, when 70. yeares were expired. And Josephus saith, that the Prophet Esay was by Daniel shewed to Cyrm, wherein it was prophesied of him by name 200. yeares before, by which he was the more moved to let the people goe, so Theodoret saith, that for the familiarity, which he had with him, he shewed him the Prophecies of Esay, and was unto him the authour of returning the captivity. Neither is there any mention in canonicall Scripture made any where of the burning of all the holy Scriptures, which would not doubtlesse have beene omitted, or passed over unlamented by Jeremiah, if it had been so. Lastly, Ezra himselfe is said to have read the Scriptures to the people, and other Levites read therein also, but it is not said, that he indited them over againe, but onely read them and gave the sense. Wherefore it is not probable, that all the bookes of holy Scripture were now suffered to perish, but some copy was still by a singular providence preserved, and this being done by Ezra, he was therefore counted the restorer of them, being in no other hands then to be found.

But to returne to the burning of the Lords house, 2 Chron. 36. 17. before this it is said, That they slew their young men in the Sanctuary and spared no age, and they took out and carryed into Babylon all the vessels of the Lords house, both great and small. This is inserted to shew the extremity of their misery, such as fled to the sanctuary thinking to be protected by the holiness of that place, were cruelly slaine notwithstanding, neither were young children, or virgins, who are most commonly spared, exempt from the Chaldees fury. And for the carrying away of the vessels of the Lords house, it is here set downe when they were taken out of that house, 2 King. 25. 13, 14, 15. After the burning, when they were carryed away into Babel, a more particular enumeration being made of them.

But the rest of the people, which remained in the city, and which fled to the king of Babylon he carryed away, &c. ] The warriors were before said to have fled out of the city, when the king fled, and leaving him alone to have shifted for themselves, some others both young and old fled to the temple for safeguard, and were slaine there; all the rest, who either stayed in the city and yielded, or had fled before out to Nebuchadnezzar, as Jeremiah had oft counselled the king to doe, were carryed away into Babylon to be servants to the Chaldees, except some poore people, who they thought would either be a burden to them rather then a benefit, or more beneficiall being left to till and husband the ground for their use, these were left still in the land to be vine dressers and husbandmen, most probably by their labours to raise somewhat, out of which a yearly tribute might be paid to the King.

The brazen pillars and the bases, and the brazen sea, &c. The Chaldees brake down and carryed into Babel, &c. 2 Chron. 36. 18. it is added, the treasures also of the Lords house and the kings, and of the princes ] And here, whatsoever vessels were of silver or gold they carryed away, and the height of the pillars is set downe, 18 cubits, and the weight of all brazen things inestimable.

He also took Seraiah the chiefe priest, and Zephaniah the second, and the three porters, &c. ] And these being brought to Nebuchadnezzar in Riblath were all slaine there.

the word מסג signifieth, shut up, or shutters up, it seemeth rather to be meant of porters, as some expound it, for they shut up the gates, and by all Ierusalem, understand some of all forts, wherefore Junius reads it, He carried out of Ierusalem, all the princes, &c. instead of these words, He carried away all Ierusalem, and all the princes. Whereas, 2 Chron. 36. 10. it is said, that Nebuchadnezzar tending carried him into Babylon, it is not to be understood, that he sent first, but followed in person, and then tooke and carried him away as is said, 2 King. 24.

And he made Matthaniah his uncle king in his stead, and turned his name to Zedekiah. ] The reason of this change, saith Lyra, was, because Zedekiah signifieth the justice of God; and Nebuchadnezzar when he made him king caused him to swear to be just and true unto him, in paying him tribute and having nothing to doe with the Egyptian, which is also in part expressly said, 2 Chron. 36. 13. and by giving him this name he would as shew his authority over him, so hereby put him continually in minde of his duty, that when he should rebell contrary to this oath, he might appeare to be the more odious and worthy to come into his enemies hands, as also was to be expected for his other abominations. He had the same mother with Iehoiakim, and sinned like him, but his father Iosiah is not once here mentioned, because he was unworthy of that honour, to be styled the sonne of so godly a king. This king was so wicked, that notwithstanding his oath to Nebuchadnezzar he rebelled against him, and 2 Chron. 36. 12. He humbled not himselfe before the face of Ieremiah at the word of the Lord. Of which word see Ier. 37. 2. 38. 17, 18. The Prophet warned him doubtlesse not to rebell, and when he had rebelled and the city was besieged, not to stand out against him, but to yeild. And through his rebellion and obstinacy the judgements of God by the Babylonians were hastened against him and his people of Iudah and Ierusalem.

V. 17.

Lyra.

Eee2 CHAP.

CHAP. XXV.

V. 1, 2.
How great the army besieging Jerusalem was,
see Jer. 34.1.

V. 4.

Iosephus.

V. 6.
Iosephus.

Iosephus.

2 Chron. 36.14.

Zedekiah rebelling against his lord, began by him to be besieged in his city Jerusalem anno 9 of his reign, and anno 11 the city was taken; the siege began the tenth month, the tenth day, and the city was taken the fourth month the ninth day. Here it is onely said, the ninth day of the month, but Jer. 39. 2. thus fully, the fourth month the ninth day. Whence also the reason may be gathered, why it was so long before the city could be taken, viz. Nebuchadnezzar heard when he was in this siege, of the coming of Pharaoh king of Egypt against him, whereby he was constrained for a time to withdraw his forces, but the Egyptians being soon overcome, he returned to the siege again, Jer. 37. 5. The time wherein the city was besieged, was also revealed to Zechariah in Babylon, ch. 24. 1. the tenth month, the tenth day, which used to be a day of humiliation, for the making of an atonement, Levit. 16. but now their wickedness was grown to that height, that God would be reconciled to them no more. The city being broken into by the Chaldees, the warriors fled out by a back gate and the king also, but is taken and brought to the king of Babylon in Riblah, and there his children being first slain before him, his eyes were put out, and he was carried bound into Babylon. The siege then, as appears by this description, lasted long, viz. eighteen months, whereby a great famine was first caused in the city, before the winning of it, inasmuch that mothers boiled and ate their own children, as both Lament. 4. and Iosephus do declare, who also saith, that the pestilence was in the city, according to Jer. 20. 16. The gate by which they fled, is said to have been that which led to the Kings gardens, and towards Iericho by the way of the wilderness, that is, by a way most secret and unfrequented, and the Hebrews say, that here was a way under the ground leading to Iericho, Iosephus in a deepe valley betwene mountaines, yet the king could not escape the punishment threaten'd unto him for his foule wickedness. v. 6. It is said, They gave judgement upon him, that is, as some thinke, when he was brought before Nebuchadnezzar in Riblah, a city in Syria, he having first upbraided him by his perfidiousness, committed him to his judges to be punished, as they should finde him worthy, and by their sentence, his children being first slain before his face, to vex him the more (for as Iosephus saith, when he fled by that secret way out of the city, he took them with him) his eyes were put out, as unworthy to see or enjoy the comfort of the light any more, the eyes of whose minde had been put out long before, so that he could not see to follow the safe counsell of the prophet, rather then the flattering counsell of his princes. A punishment oft inflicted by enemies, as also upon Sampson by the Philistines, upon Constantinus Copronymus by his unnaturall mother Irene, upon Robert Duke of Normandy by his brother Henry the first King of England, and upon the sonne of Trebellius king of the Bulgarians, to whom his father had committed the kingdome to be maintained in the Christian faith, but he forsaking this set up idolatry, wherefore he refusing the kingdome again, put out his eyes, as unworthy to enjoy the comfort of the light, who had put out the most glorious light amongst his people, viz. the light of Truth.

Thus Zedekiah was carried captive into Babylon as Ieremiah had prophesied, but yet never saw Babylon, as Ezekiel had said, that he should not. So Iosephus, who saith, that hereupon he hardened himself against the counsell of Ieremiah to yield to Nebuchadnezzar. The Author of the Chronicles chap. 36. 14. in speaking of the cause of this judgement addeth, after that he had spoken of the finnes of Zedekiah, The princes of the priests and of the people sinned greatly, doing after the abominations of the heathen, and polluting the Lords house. And when he sent unto them by his servants, they mocked, &c. So that sinne was now grown to the full, not onely in the court, but also in the country, and in the clergy also both through the univerality

of

there. Most probably these men had hidden themselves, thinking thus to escape the Chaldees hands, but when the temple & all the principal buildings of the city were fiered, they could lye hid no longer, and because they were men of note, the captain would not slay them himselfe, as he had done the common sort which yielded not, but reserved them to receive their judgement from the king himself, who for their rebellion put them now to death also. Lastly, because the poore people remaining must needs have an head to governe them or else confusion would follow, Gedaliah the son of Ahikam is set over them, and moreover some Chaldees, as it seemeth, v. 28. were left to see, that all things might be ordered for the best for the king. Of this Gedaliah nothing is recorded amongst Writers, but that he was a good man and loving. For which cause the captaines of the army, who fled out of Ierusalem when it was taken, and there men resorted to him to Mizpah, where he kept in the borders of Iudah and Benjamine, being a citie famous of old, as Gilgal, in both which Samuel is said to have judged the people. The captaines, that came to Gedaliah, were Ishmael, Iohanan, Serajah, and Iozaniah. To whom he sware for their assurance. Because probably when they came unto him and saw some Chaldean souldiers there still, they feared, that they were left to take such Iewes, as should after the departure of Nebuchadnezzar come out of their hiding places, and send them captive to Babylon or slay them, as others had been served before. Therefore to secure them he sware unto them, and Ier. 40. 10. He spake comfortably unto them, bidding them gather the Summer fruits, the vines and olives, for now it was the sixt moneth; wherein they were usually ripe; and if any shall wonder, that any fruits remained to be gathered and were not spoiled by the Chaldee souldiers, who had been so long in that countrey, it is to be conceived, that they spared them, as not knowing what use they should have need to make of them. It is also further by Ieremias added, that all the Iewes amongst the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, &c. came to Gedaliah, and gathered much fruit, neither doth he omit, but speake more fully in the full place of his owne, coming to him, as Nebuzaradan had appointed.

Then Ishmael who was of the kings seede, and ten men with him came and smote Gedaliah; and the Iewes and Chaldeans, that were with him. This is more fully set forth, Ier. 40. 13. where Iohanan the sonne of Careah and all the captaines are said to have come out of the field, that is, from gathering of the Summer fruits, and to have certified Gedaliah, that Ishmael was sent by the king of the Ammonites to slay him, but he not beleeving it, no not when Iohanan told him of it againe secretly, and would have cut off Ishmael, before he should commit such an heinous and dangerous fact; whereby all the Iewes remaining should come in perill, as sheepe without a shepherd, without all feare received him, and ten men of the kings of Ammon with him, eating and drinking together; and as Iosephus hath it, when they were heavey with wine and sleeping, they fell upon him and his company and slew them all. Why Ishmael did thus is not said, but it may well be conjectured, that he did it out of envie to see Gedaliah thus preferred before himselfe, who was of the blood royall. And this was done the sixteenth moneth to the extreme griefe and terror of all the Iewes that remained, before two moneths of his government were fully expired, because they feared, that the Chaldees would come againe and destroy them all for this fact. And it is thought by some of great judgement, that in this moneth the Iewes kept a fast therefore during the time of the desolation of their land, as also the fourth moneth, because in the fourth the city was broken up, and in the fifth because the temple and city were burnt in the fifth, and in the tenth moneth, because in the tenth Nebuchadnezzar first besieged Ierusalem. For of all these mention is made, Zach. 8. 19. it being promised, that they should be turned into times of rejoycing at their returne from captivity.

Then all the people of Ierusalem and Iewes went into Egypt. Before this it is shewed, Ier. 41. 4, 5. that there came eighty men from Shurham, Shiloh, and Samaria; two hundred shaven, and garments rent &c. And it is said, that they came knowing nothing that had been done against Gedaliah, for they came the second day after, directing their course to the house of the Lord, with an offering to be made at the least in that place, for

V. 22.

1 Sam. 7. 15.
V. 26.

Jer. 40. 10.

Chap. 40. 11.

Chap. 40. 4, 5, 6.

V. 25.

Iosephus.

Hieronym.
Crisost.V. 29.
Jer. 41. 5.

Jer. 41. 10.

Chap. 42.

Chap. 43.

2 Chron. 36. 20.

2 King. 25. 30.

Wolphiu.

Wolphiu.

Wolphiu.

Wolphiu.

for they could not well be ignorant, that the temple was now burnt. To meet these men, Ishmael went out dissembling sorrow, also for the ruining of the city and temple, and brought them into Mezpah by the way to see Gedaliah; and when he had them in the city he slew them also; most probably, because they loved Gedaliah, whom he envied; and he cast their dead bodies, as also others whom he had slain, into a pit made sometime by Ash, of whom it is said, 1 King 15. 22. that he built of the stones carried from Ramah, Gebah and Mizpah, haply trenching some of part of it with a great trench, like a pit, for the greater strength. And this being done, he took the remnant of the people and the kings daughters, that were with Gedaliah and carried them away captive towards the Ammonites country. But Iobanan and the other captains in the field now hearing, what he had done, went with their men against him, and he with eight of his company fleeing away, the captives were all brought back again, and the whole company came to Bethlehem, to passe from thence into Egypt. But before they went the captains spake to Jeremiah, to crave the Lords direction for them, promising to obey. This Jeremiah did, and after ten dayes gave them an answer, that they should not go into Egypt, threatening them, if they did, with destruction, if not promising them safetie. But they obeyed not, but told Jeremiah that he lied unto them, and so in contempt of that which he said, went into Egypt, carrying him away with them also. Thus the prophesie, which was of a desolation of the whole land for 70. years took effect, a divine providence secretly working with their obstinacie, that no word spoken by the Lord, might at any time fall to the ground.

2 Chron. 36. 20. It is concluded with Nebuzaradan carrying away of captives, and their continuance in Babylon till the Persian Monarchie began, that the prophesie of Jeremiah might be fulfilled, of the lands enjoying her Sabbaths 70 years, of which times beginning and ending, see before upon this, 2 King. 25. Then finally, it is shewed, that Cyrus king of the Persians in the first year of his reign, made a proclamation throughout all his kingdome, for the return of the Jews, with which the book of Ezra beginneth. and therefore the explanation hereof I deferre, till I come to Ezra.

But before this captivitie ended, viz. anno 37 of Jehoiakins captivitie, it is said, 2 King. 25. 30. that in the twelfth moneth of that year, the 27 day, Evilmerodach lifted up the head of Jehoiakin in the first year of his reign out of prison, and spake comfortably to him, and lifted up his throne above the thrones of the rest of the kings, &c. See the same also Jer. 52. 31. but there the 25 day of the moneth is put for the 27 here. Wolphiu saith, that by the Rabbins it is thus reconciled; Nebuchadnezzar died the 25 day, and being buried the 26 day, his son Evilmerodach coming to the crown the 27 day, caused his dead bodie to be taken up again, and drag'd about the streets, that it might appear to all men, that he was verily dead, and then causing it to be cut in pieces, it was given to the vultures to be devoured, that he might be sure, that he could never live again to put him by, as he had once done, when after his seven years living amongst the beasts of the field, he returned to his kingdome, and put his sonne Evilmerodach in prison, who in that time had taken the kingdome upon him. Now because Evilmerodach haply being at his fathers death in prison with him, spake comfortably to him, and promised him deliverance; Jeremiah sets down this as the day, but because he was not fully delivered till two dayes after, when Evilmerodach had obtained the kingdome, here it is set down the seven and twentieth day. But Wolphiu himselfe bringeth another solution, viz. that Evilmerodach held a consultation about his deliverance, and propounded it the 25 day, but it was not actually performed, till the 27. Some others, he was loosed from his bands the 25, and the funerall rites being performed the 26 day, in the 27 he was fully delivered. But who shall accurately compare the places together, will rather incline to think, that Jeremiah setteth forth the day of his coming out of prison, and the Kings, the day of his being so preferred, above other captive kings then in Babylon, because, in Jeremiah it is said, he lifted up his head bringing him out of prison; but in the Kings, he lifted up his head from the prison house, intimating two degrees of favour done to him.

First,

First, in freeing him from prison, for this was one lifting up of his head. Secondly, in raising him from being a prisoner to royall Majestie, and maintaining him accordingly all his dayes, for this was another lifting up of his head, being now out of prison. What moved Evilmerodach to shew this great favour to Iehojakin is not said, in any of both these places, but if that be true, which the Rabbins report, that Evilmerodach was by his father Nebuchadnezzar put into the same prison where Iehoiakin lay, it may easily be conjectured, that some friendship that grew between them in that time was the cause, and Iehoiakins acquainting him with his first voluntarie putting of himself into Nebuchadnezzars hands, hoping, that he would not have dealt so hardly with him. For this could not but work upon a good nature, to seek to make him some amends in doing him a greater favor, then to any of the kings about him. But if we would know the true efficient cause, it was Gods singular providence, whereby this was brought to passe for the verifying of his word, and the encouraging of all kings and men to obey his prophets, as Iehoiakin did in so freely yielding himself to the king of Babylon, that his citie Ierusalem and the temple might be spared. For Ier. 24. 5. Iehoiakin and the Jews, who were carried away with him, are said to have been sent away by the Lord, and to have been beloved as good figs, and chosen to have good done unto them, whereas they that were carried away afterwards under Zedekiah were as evill figs, that could not be eaten, and therefore condemned to disperision and destruction. It was long indeed, before this good was fulfilled to Iehoiakin, and his captived subjects, but now at the end of 37 years it was performed. For although nothing be said of his subjects here, but of him onely, yet it cannot be thought, but he faring thus well, they participated with him in the comfort. And for the story before going of Nebuchadnezzar, and of his body being cut in pieces and given to the vultures, there seemeth to be some ground for it, Esa. 14. 19, 20. where it is threatned, that he should not, as all other kings, enjoy the honour of a sepulture, but his dead corps should be cast out. Evilmerodach is by some expounded Junior Merodach, by others foolish Merodach, because he was drawn, as some suppose, by Daniel, who was gracious at the court of the king of Babylon, to do for Iehoiakin and his people, according to the word of the Lord by the prophet Ieremiah, for this prophane men count simplicitie. But if for this reason he had been so called, the pen-man of the Scripture would not in following such unworthy authors so have called him. I hold therefore rather with the former reason, that he was Merodach the younger, because there was another of the same name before.

And here is an end of the history of the kings of Iudah, who came of David, but not an end of his posterity, which continued untill Christ, the promised seed of David, as is declared Matth. 1. 12. where twelve generations more are named after Jechonias, the first whereof are Shealtiel and Zerubabel, but 1 Chron. 3. 17. Shealtiel, Pedaiah, and Zerubabel. But of this Genealogie see enough upon Matth. 1.

To conclude, I have in explaining the history of the Kings, so interlaced the Chronicles also, from Saul and David, cha. 10, 11. throughout, that both those books are with the same labour explained also, and the seeming differences reconciled, so that here is nothing passed over but onely genealogies from Adam to Abraham, and from Abraham to Ishmael, and to Isaac, and Jacob, and his issue; and the captivitie and their return from it. All which was done by Ezra, as Iunius saith, together with the following supplement of the history of the Kings of Iudah, being for the most part omitted in the history of the Kings, or so briefly delivered, that the reader could not thereby onely be acquainted with many memorable things concerning them and their times. And the genealogies being for the most part such, as in divers places of the holy Scripture have been already set forth, and containing onely names, shall not need to be any further insisted upon. Wherefore leaving these books, I will hasten towards the book called Ezra, and shew so farre as I can finde any light, what followed after the last captivitie under Zedekiah, to the Jews return therefrom, and at and about their return, and after before the comming of CHRIST.

Onely whereas some think it not probable, that the Chronicles were written by Chron. 3. 19,

20, &c.

Ezra 7.

Ezra, because nine genealogies are mentioned after Zorubbabel, unto which Ezra could not live. I grant indeed, if Ezra had been contemporanean with Zorubbabel, he could not in the course of nature have lived so long, but forsomuch as he came after Zorubbabel about 78 years, as is shewed, ch. 7. For he was anno 10. of Cyrus, and Ezra, anno 70. of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and for ought we know, might live 30 or forty years after, and if so he attained to above 100 years after Zorubbabels coming to Ierusalem, and if he grant that he had a son then, he also might have a sonne soon after his coming thither, so that here are two generations, and who doubts but that in a hundred years and odde there might be seven generations more, seeing Kings amongst the Iews may be noted to have begotten at thirteene or fourteen years of age, so prolificous were that people, by Gods singular blessing to make good his promise to Abraham. But if Ezra lived not altogether so long, this argueth not, that the book was not written by him, no more then that Deuteronomy was not written by Moses; because his death and something after it is therein recorded. For as that was done by another hand, as God in his providence appointed; so might two or three genealogies be by some other added to Ezraes, and yet the book may be said to be written by him.

And it is thought that the books of the Chronicles, were written last of all others of the old testament, yea, after the books called Ezra; because by the Hebrews they are placed after it.

A

Ezra, The Preface.

Esides this there are two other Books, which goe under the name of Ezra, or Ezras, called the 3 and 4 of Esdra: but those, as Jerome sayth, are apochryphall, whole words are, let no man be moved at this, that I have translated one Book of Esdra onely, neyther let him be delighted with the dreames of the 3 and 4 which are apochryphall. Because also amongst the Hebrews the words of Ezra and Nehemiah are put together in one Book, and those things, which are not amongst them neyther, be of the 24 Elders, are to be cast far off. Where by Elders, Lyra sayth well, are meant the 24 Canonickall Books of the old Testament in alluding to Apoc. 4. This then is the only undoubted Book written by that learned and famous Priest Ezra, that hereby we might know, what hapued unto the people of God after license given them to return from their captivity in Babylon thence forward unto the 19 year of Artaxerxes, Mnemon, as Junius noteth, which was 146 yeers. For Cyrus and Cambyfes reigned 9 yeers, the Mngi, 1 Darius Hystaspis 36, Xerxes 22, Artaxerxes Longimani 40, Darius Nothus 19, Artaxerxes Mnemon 19. For in the seventh yeare of his reigne, Ezra came out of Babylon, Chap. 7. 7, 8, and the Book of Nehemiah is begun Anno 20, of the same King. He wrote indeed, as Junius saith, and is most probable, the books of the Chronicles, but after them this book of his onely is acknowledged Canonickall and no more. For the reckoning of the time see more in these Kings severall reigns, what happened after the Jewes hardening of themselves against Jeremiah his Prophesying! to goe down into Egypt, when Ishmael had treacherously slain Gedaliah, which was the first year after the Temple and Ierusalem destroyed, is not recorded in Holy Writ, but onely that Jeremiah persisted to inveigh against their sins, and to threaten their destruction by Nebuchadnezer: For to shew this he tooke great stones being in Taphnes, and hid them neerer to Pharaohs gate, saying, that Nebuchadnezer let his throne upon those stones. And when the Jewes came to dwell not onely at Taphnes, but also in other Cities of Egypt, and followed the manners of the Egyptians in Migdol, Noph and Pachros, in sacrificing to their gods, he threatned them again with destruction for these abominations, which is supposed to have been Anno 2, of their comming into Egypt, hereupon, they impatient of his reproofs stoned him to death, as is commonly held amongst ancient writers, as Epiphanius de vita Jeremie, adding that he was buried in the place where Pharaohs house stood. Dorotheus also having written of his stoning to death, addeth, that the Egyptians did him the honour to bury him in the place where Pharaohs house stood, for the benefits by him done unto them. And Isidor saith, that Jeremiah prayed for the Egyptians, that the Serpents which annoyed their Countrey might be taken away and prevailed, wherefore when the Jewes had cruelly slain him, they buried him honourably near the Kings Palace. Jerom also and Tertullian, and all the Martyrologies both Greek and Latine consent herein. Jeremiah being martyred, the Jewes in Egypt escaped not long after the judgements threatned against them. For in the fifth yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem, saith Iosaphus, which was the 23 of Nebuchadnezer, he with great forces invaded Calosyria, which being subdued, he fought against the Ammonites and Moabites, and having brought them under also, he hastily invaded Egypt, killing the King that then reigned there, and setting up another, and carrying the Jewes away into Babylon, whom he found there. And haply Baruch the the Scribe of Jeremiah, was one that was carryed amongst

A

Hieronymi:
prolog.

Lyra.

Junius.

Nehem. i. i.

What hapned before the 70 yeers captivity
expired.

Ier. 43. 8.

Ier. 42.

Epiphanius.
Dorotheus.Isidor. de vita & obitu Prophetarum.

Iosephus.

amongst them, because he writes of himselfe as being in Babylon, Baruch 1. yet some thinke that Ieremias being slain, he stayed not in Egypt, but went voluntarily away. Touching Zedekiah the King, nothing more is said after his carrying away into Babylon. But Ier. 34. 4, 5. It is said, that he should be carried into Babylon, yet not to die by the sword, but in peace, and that they should make a burning for him after the manner of the Kings that had reigned before him. And so Iosephus saith, that Nebuchadnezzar kept him in prison, indeed, as long as he lived, but then buried him, being lifted up with the Kingly pomp of a funerall. At what time this was, is uncertain, but most probably, the pain of the losse of his eyes, and griefe for his children slain, his Countreyes and his own miseries, suffered him not long to live after. But to return to Nebuchadnezzar, he having enlarged his Empire unto Syria, Egypt, Ammon and Mosab, proceeded still to conquer more Countreyes, as it must needs be granted, because Ier. 25. 20, 21, &c. many more Countreyes are named which he should subdue, and finally, ver. 25. Elam, that is, Persia, and Media, and ver. 26. All the Kings of the North both far and nigh: by the far, we may understand the Arminians and Hircanians, which inhabited Mesopotamia; and by the nigh, the Assyrians inhabiting Nineveh, so that Nebuchadnezzar ceases not warring till he had subdued all Nations, and which is most remarkable, the Ninevites, Assyrians, under whose Dominion the Babylonians had formerly been, untill the great overthrow of Sarnehrib before Jerusalem in Hezekiah's dayes, are now brought under by the King of Babylon, which did so greatly puff him up with pride, as we may see in Daniel, for with the spoils of that rich and goodly City Nineveh, he built and enriched Babylon, so as that now Nineveh being put down, there was no City equall to it in all the World. And of this destruction of Nineveh, Nabum prophesied, which happened above a hundred years after Ieremias his preaching amongst them.

Iosephus.

When Nebuchadnezzar had thus subdued all Nations, he dreamed that admirable dream recorded Dan. 2. For although it be said, Anno 2 of his reign, yet it is not to be understood of his reign reckoning from his beginning after his fathers death, for then he had not subdued all Nations, but of his universall Empire, from the beginning whereof, as more glorious by far, he would thenceforth have his reign counted, wherefore Iosephus saith, that it was Anno 2, after his conquest of Egypt, and this then must be, Anno 25 of his reign, reckoning from the beginning, seeing he had then reigned 23. And this is generally followed by all Expositours, but Theodoret and Ierom prayeth, that it cannot be meant of his second year, reckoning from the beginning of his reign over Babylon, because three years after his attaining to the Crown, and conquering and carrying Captives from Iudea, amongst whom Daniel was one, were expired before this, as will appear to him that compares, Dan. 1. 5. with ver. 18, 19, &c. seeing Daniel and his brethren were kept first three years, and then brought before the King, wherefore it must needs be the second yeare of his universall Empire, and not of his reign over Babylon, and that was about seven years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Not long after, as is supposed, about three years Nebuchadnezzar made that monstrous image of gold, 60 cubits high, and six cubits broad, which he would have all men to worship, some thinke, that thereby he might be worshipped, but others more probably, to please his gods, whom he was told by his Caldees, that he had greatly offended, by attributing so much to the God of Daniel, some, to crosse that which was represented to him in his dream, the head whereof was of gold, the breast of silver, &c. to shew that his Empire should never suffer any alteration, but be always golden from the head to the foot: Howsoever he shewed hereby his great lenity, in that being a little while before a convert, he now fell to Idolatry again, and his great pride in being at such excessive cost in making so mighty and vast an Image all of gold, to which must needs go many thousand talents. And it may well be thought, that such of the Caldees as envied the honour of Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, put the King on to the making of this Image, that by this means they might be pulled down.

Dan. 3.

Plutarch.

About the 14 year after the captivity under Zedekiah, Solon was made the Law-giver of Athens by a common consent, by reason of the miseries wherein they they were all referring to him the sole power of Law in a King, whereupon hee made many good Laws, and instituted two Senates, one of the Areopagie, who were Judges, and the other of 400 Senators, repealing the bloody Laws of Draco, who had made stealing of apples, or pears, and idleness, capitall, appointing death onely for murder. In the 16 yeare of the desolation, that is, Anno 27 of Jehojakims captivity, Ezekiel prophesied of Nebuchadnezzars service done against Tyrus, and not long after he was martyred by the then Judge of the Jews in Babylon, for inveighing against their idolatry, so Epiphanius, & Dorotheus, and Chrysostom ope imperfect. in Math. faith, upon Chap. 23. I sent Esay unto you and yee sawed him, and Jeremiah you stoned to death, and Ezekiels brains yee caused to be dashed out, by drawing him against the stones.

About the same time also, most probably, Nebuchadnezzar had his second Dream of a great tree, which Daniel expounded of him, shewing that he should be driven from amongst men, and living amongst the beasts seven years, which within twelve moneths came to passe accordingly, and in that time he is said, to have eaten grasse with the beasts, and then his understanding was restored unto him, and he came again to his Kingdom, and within one yeare dyed. All which History is by some turned into an allegory, as not seeing how it can be historically true, that a King should live amongst beasts, lying and feeding as they doe seven years together, because also in the Caldee Histories no mention is made hereof. But we must certainly, as Ierom faith, hold it to be an history of that which was truly done, or else the verity of any other historicall narration in holy Writ may as well be called in question, and so the Scripture it selfe shall be uncertain. And why should we doubt of Gods power to deprive him of his understanding for a time, and to make him to turn wilde, and to run out amongst the beasts, going upon all foure, and feeding as they did, and to sustain his life all the time that hee did so, seeing many Eremites have lived upon herbs and roots, 50 or 60 years, and lyen in dens or under trees in the openaire. And for the Caldee Histories, it is not altogether untouched in them: for Eusebius faith, that one Alpheus a writer of the Assyrian History, writeth thus, Megasthenes faith that Nebuchadnezzar was stronger then Hercules, and having subdued all Asia, as far as the Armenians, he returned home, and was by God stricken with madness, &c. The next remarkable thing happening in these 70 years was, Jechonia his freeing from prison, and preferment in Evilmerodachs Court, who succeeded his father Nebuchadnezzar in the Kingdom, of which see before, upon 2 Kings 25. 27. and this was Anno 26 of Jerusalems desolation, for it was Anno 37 of his captivity, that is, 11 years before this time began. And how long Evilmerodach reigned, hath also been shewed upon 2 Kings 25. 9. and the Kings that succeeded him till the first of Cyrus. Yet some there are that mention onely three Kings of Babylon, that reigned in the time of this captivity, viz. Nebuchadnezzar 25, Evilmerodach 23, and Belsazzar 21. as Theodoret, Sulpitins, Eusebius, Heb. Chron. Cap. 28. Genebrard and the rather because no more are spoken of in the Sacred History, nor, Ier. 27. 7. but Nebuchadnezzar and his son, and sons son. In the dayes of Evilmerodach some think that those things happened which are related of Bel and the Dragon, confounded by Daniel, and of Daniels casting into, and abiding in the Lyons den six dayes, when Habacuk was brought miraculously to him with food. But one thing makes against the credit of that History, as Iunius noteth, viz. that Daniel is said to have been a familiar friend of Cyrus, and after that, that these things followed, which could not be in the Persians, but Babylonians times.

Anno 30 of Jerusalems desolation, there was one Ezra or Esdra, who complained before God of the miseries of his people, and had divers revelations as he faith, but he was not this Ezra, for he was not yet borne, seeing from hence to the end of the captivity were 40 years, from thence to the seventh of Artaxerxes when this Ezra came to Jerusalem 134 years, as appears by the computation before going, that none may be deceived by the name, to regard the contents of that booke, which the most learned have never esteemed of. But from hence we learn, that Salathiel the sonne of Jehojakim, was now Prince of the Jews, because Chap. 5. 16. he is called by this name, & it is said that he came unto him, so that Jehojakim

Solon.
The Areopagie began.

Ezech. 29. 17.

Epiphanius.
Dorotheus.

Dan. 4.

Euseb. l. 9. de prepar. Evan.

Anno 26.

Esd. 3. 1.

Berosus.

was now dead three or foure years after his deliverance from prison, and it seems that Salathiel his sonne succeeded in his Princely honour through the same Evilmerodachs favour. About 20 years after this Evilmerodach was slain by his sisters husband, called Niglissoroor, so Berosus and Iosephus, and then he reigned in his stead foure years. From hence forward, that is, from Anno 48 of Ierusalem desolation, we read not in sacred History of any other Babylonish King till Belshazzar, although both Funccius and some others, place others between, as Regassar and Labasardac. But to say nothing of them of whom we are ignorant, and if any thing memorable were in the times of any such Kings done, it is not recorded in the first year of Belshazzar, Daniel had his Vision of Chap. 7. of foure beasts, one headed like a Lyon, two like a Bear, three like a Leopard, four more terrible then any of these with iron teeth, representing four Monarchies of the World, and their destruction at the last day.

In the third year of Belshazzar, Daniel had another Vision of a Ram and a Goat having one great horne, which when it was broken off, foure sprung up instead of it, whereby the Persian Monarchy was set forth, and the Grecian after Alexander divided into foure, amongst whom Antiochus Epiphaneus is specially set forth, as exercising most cruelty towards Gods peculiar people. From hence there being 18 years still to come of the 70, the sacred History saith nothing of that which was done in any of them: But because Cyrus is here said to have reigned at the expiration of this time and to have been upon his first year, and yet Dan. 6. Belshazzar being slain, it is said that Darius reigned, it will be necessary before we come to speake of the liberty given by Cyrus, to say somewhat of this mighty King, and of his gests before his comming to the Kingdom of Babylon. He was the son of Astages his daughter, who was King of the Medes and Persians, but before he was borne, Astages dreamed that he saw a vine growing out of his daughters belly, which overspread all Asia, and being told by his Wizards, that hereby was shewed that shee should beare a son that should reign over all Asia, and put him from his Kingdom, he thought to prevent this by adopting Darius a Kinsman, that he might succeed him in his Kingdome, because he had no sonne but a daughter onely, whose issue he would not have come to that honour. Then he gave his daughter in marriage, not to a great man, because the sonne that shee should have by the helpe of his kinsmen should aspire to the Crown, but to an ordinary Souldier, and when shee had a sonne by him, he caused the infant to be brought unto him, and delivered it to Harpagus one of his Nobles to be slain. But he fearing that the Kingdom might afterwards come to the mother durst not doe it, but cast it in a Wood, into which there came, by a singular providence, a Bitch which gave suck, and suckled and defended the infant from the fowls and beasts til that the Kings shepheard accidentally found it, and brought it home to his wife to be nourished up. The child thus preserved and growing up to a lad of some bignesse, was in playing chosen by other lads to be their King, and behaved himself so severely towards such as offended, as that they complained to their parents, and their parents to the King. Hereupon the King sent for him, by whom he being asked, why he dealt so with them, answered with an undaunted courage, that hee did it, as their King. Astages admiring the lad, as not likely to be of a shepherds race, sent for the shepheard and of him learned the truth, and so came to know, that this was his daughters son. Yet his wrath was pacified towards the lad, supposing the prediction to have been already fulfilled in his being King of the boyes, and he delivered him to the same Harpagus to be brought up. But for his disobedience formerly, hee caused his sonne secretly to be murdered. This comming to his knowledge, he yet wisely dissembled his anger against the King, till that divers years after, the King having committed an Armie to him to goe against his enemies, hee perswaded them to make Cyrus King in way of revenge for his sonne; Astages hearing this gathered an Army, and fought against Cyrus, and at the first prevailed, but at the next encounter was overcome by Cyrus, who so moderately used his victory, that he suffered his Grand-father to continue King of the Hircanians, and Darius his Uncle King of the Medes, he holding the Kingdom of the Persians onely during their lives, but afterwards conditioning to enjoy all.

The

The name Cyrus was first given unto him by Harpagus, when he made him King, for before he was called Speitascus, that is, Catulus, or Whelp, because a Bitch nourished him. When Cyrus was grown to this greatnesse, Cræsus King of the Lydians being in a most rich and prosperous condition, for he had subdued unto himselfe 14 Nations in Halim in Asia, as Herodotus sayth, would not suffer Cyrus quietly to enjoy his Kingdom, but passing over the River, which divided their Kingdoms, hee made war upon him, and when they had fought fiercely on both sides one day, they were parted by the comming on of the night, neyther part pre- vailing, but many on both sides being slain. Cræsus then retyring to Sardis, sent to the Egyptians and Babylonians, with whom he was in league, for aid, not once suspecting, that Cyrus would come against him in his chief City, with whom hee had fought in open field with equall succeffe, wherefore hee appointed his Confe- derates to come unto him not till the fifth moneth after. But Cyrus with all speed gathering his forces together went against Sardis. Cræsus hearing of his com- ming called together his Lydians, who were then counted the valiantest men in all Asia, and the best horsemen. Cyrus against them commeth with many Camels, whose sight or smell horses cannot endure, and so brake the order of their battell. Then the Lydians leaving their horses fought on foot, but at length were put to flight, and so the City was besieged, and within fourteen days taken, and Cræsus the King taken. Cyrus then condemned him to be burnt to death, but when hee was set upon the pile of wood prepared, and fire was now putting to, hee cryed, Solon, Solon, at which words Cyrus caused him to be brought unto him, and asking the cause of his so crying out upon Solon, he sayd, That wise Solon upon a time de- nyed him in the midst of all his wealth and prosperity to be happy, saying, He knew not, what should happen to him before he died. Cyrus hearing this, and and withall considering his own case and the uncertainty of these worldly things, spared him and made him his Counsellour, doing many things both in warre and peace by his advice. Not long after Cyrus appointing Harpagus to fight against the Ionians and Eolians, went himselfe against the upper parts of Asia, and having subdued all, he lastly bent his forces against the Egyptians and Babylon, which was the seat of the greatest Monarch in the World, where Belsazzar the son of Evilmerodach now reigned by Herodotus called Labinus. But before hee could come thither, he must necessarily passe the River Gindes, which runneth into the River Tigris. This River Gindes, not being passable on horseback, but by boat on- ly, Cyrus devised by making 365 ditches to carry the water away, being offended for one horse in attempting to passe over was drowned there, and about this work was spent one whole yeare. Then he went on with a mighty Armie and besie- ged Babylon, but they within the City at the first derided him, as thinking them- selves safe against all the Forces of the world. For Babylon called the great City, was so great and strong, as that it was held to be invincible. The situation of it was in a plain foure square, every side being 120 furlongs, according to Herodotus, Pliny, and Philostrotus, but Diodorus Siculus makes the whole compasse to be but 365 furlongs, the reason of wick difference happily was, for that Diodorus describes it as it was first built by Semiramis, Herodotus as it was enlarged by Nebuchad- nezar, and if it were 120 furlongs long and broad, that was 15 miles either way, it was a monstrous City, and about all this length and breadth was a wall of incre- dible thicknesse, viz. 50 cubits thick, that is, 75 foot, and 200 cubits high, saith Herodotus, beyond all credit, yea, and he addeth of the Kings cubits, one of which is longer then the ordinary by three fingers, so that six chariots might goe abreast upon the wall. But Diodorus more moderately, 32 foot thick, and 50 cubits high, so that two chariots might safely passe by one another upon it. Without the wall was a ditch full of water, out of which the bytuminous stufte, where- with the brick for the wall was made was digged, 100 foot broad, and as much space of ground was between the wall and ditch for gardens and orchards. There were 100 gates of brasse, and as many Towers, and the great River Euphrates ran through the midst of the City, so that hereby it was divided into two, and on each side of the river there was a wall as thick as the other, and in the midst a bridge 30 foot broad of five furlongs, and yet the river, as Strabo saith, was but Herodotus.

Herodotus.

one furlong broad. The invincible strength and greatnesse of this City at the first, ftrounded Cyrus, when he heard also that they had brought in provision for more then 20 years, for he thought to force them to yeeld through famine. But there being nigh a place made sometime by Samaritis to hold water 120 furlongs square, and 35 foot deep, he sent his men to scoure it, and making great trenches, dreaned the waters of Euphrates into it, placing his men some at one end of the City, and some at the other, that they might be ready to enter when the water should be falne so low that they might wade through, which they did accordingly, and took the City, after that in one night the water was let out into the drains before prepared. And it fell out so, that the same night the Babylonians were generally drunken, having kept a great festivall the day before, of which Cyrus not being ignorant, chose that time purposely for this exploit. The Hebrews say that Belshazzar the King knowing of the Prophecie of their deliverance from their captivity, and supposing the time to be now expired, and therefore their hopes frustrated, made that day his great Feast commemorated Dan. 5. and in way of insulting over the God of Israel, caused the precious vessels of the house of the Lord, which Nebuchadnezzar had carried away to be brought fourth, and carowed in them together with his Princes and Concubines, but vengeance presently befell him therefore. However whether it were a Feast made for this cause, or according to their usuall manner at that time of the yeere to the honour, of some Idoll, it seemeth, that they slighted much the danger, in which they were, in that they would not for it intermit their usuall feasting and making merry unto such excesse. But God certainly had an hand in it, who had by Jeremiah foretold many particulars now happening long before, as first, that the Kings of the Medes should be the agents in this destruction. 2 That her waters should be dried up. 3 That they should be drunken, and so sleep a perpetuall sleep. 4 That one yeere there should be a rumour of destruction comming first, and the next yeer both rumour and violence. 5 That the Princes and Captains and Rulers should all be drunken, and so without fighting sleep a perpetuall sleep. 6 That they should run one after another to tell the King, that Babylon was taken: for in some parts of the City it was not known, till three dayes after, through the vastnesse of the place. If it shall seem that the Prophet erred somewhat in that hee spake of the Kings of the Medes, that should do this exploit, whereas it was the Persian King, it is easily resolved, Cyrus was so the King of Persia, that he was King of the Medes also, Darius, that thereby his permission reigned, not being counted the King of that people, because but for a short time, as appears before, and then the Kingdom was to come to Cyrus and his issue. Thus the King of Babylon was slain, and Cyrus became an universall Monarch, and yet suffered Darius, to whom he had given the kingdome of the Medes before to reigne, here also during his life, as being his Uncle, but within one yeer he dyed, and Cyrus reigned, as it is here sayd, and gave the Jews leave to return to Jerusalem just at the time before prophesied of, that is, at the end of seventy yeers. And thus we may see the reason of Daniels speaking of none but Darius reigning after Babylon destroyed, till chap. 10. where hee mentions Cyrus, and why Ezra omitting him altogether, speak only of Cyrus. And how Daniel understanding by the prophecie of Jeremiah, that the time was now come, prayed unto God for deliverance, see Dan. 9.

CHAP. I.

IN the first yeare of Cyrus, that the word of the Lord by Jeremiah might be fulfilled, he stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, &c. What the word of the Lord was, Jer. 25. and chap. 29. hath been enough spoken of before. For his stirring up of Cyrus to give the Jews this liberty. Iosephus sayth, that he was moved to this by reading Es. 44. 21, 22, 23. Theodoret, that Daniel having some familiarity with him by reason of the great grace done unto him by his Uncle Darius, in setting him over all the Kingdom, shewed him that prophecie, wherein hee was named long before he was born (for it was 170 yeers before this) and it was foretold of him

Ier. 51. 11.

Vers. 36.

Vers. 39.

Vers. 46.

Vers. 57.

Vers. 31.

Vers. 1.

Iosephus.
Theod. r.

him, as of the servant of God, that he should take order for the building of Ierusalem and of the Temple, and that Ierusalem should then be inhabited again, and that the waters of Babylon should be dried up. And it may well be thought, that by reading this prophesie so plainly intimating a spirit above all the gods of the Heathen, for the knowledge of things to come, and by those things that had happened about Daniel, he being preserved in the Lions den, and having expounded the writing upon the wall to Belshazzar, which none of the Magicians could do, he was not only stirred up to this, but attained to such knowledge of the true God, as that he worshipped and served him.

For he calleth him the Lord God of Heaven, &c. and ascribing unto him his ample dominion over all the Kingdoms of the earth, for he sayth, that hee had given them unto him, hereby acknowledging both, that all are the Lords and at his disposing, and that he got them not by his own power, but by Gods providence, whose will therefore revealed in the prophesie of Esay, hee would apply himselfe diligently to do in providing for the rebuilding of his house at Ierusalem, so long ago ruined. By all the Kingdoms of the earth given unto him, understand all the kingdoms of Asia, that wast part of the earth, where he reigned, for in other parts he reigned not. For the piety in this King and care about building the house of the Lord, Pellican doubteth not to call him a type of Christ.

Who is there amongst you of all his people? the Lord be with him, and let him go unto Ierusalem, &c. Here he acknowledging the Jews to be Gods peculiar people, giveth liberty to all, that would, to return, wishing prosperity unto them, and Verse 4. such as would not, but continue still in those lands hee required by this his Edict to give to such, as could go, necessities for their journey, and gifts for the house of the Lord, which they that went, should build. For he supposed, that the poorer sort would be readiest to go and labour in that work, and that many of the richer, who had settled themselves in the Countreys, where they lived, would stay there still, wherefore it was necessary, that they should be holpen by these. Whereas he sayth, he is the God that dwelleth at Ierusalem, it is not to be conceived, that he thought him properly the God of that place, because hee sayd before, that hee was the God of Heaven, but hereby he declared a most true faith touching God, viz. that the God, who appointed a Temple to be built him at Ierusalem, and his worship to be mayntained there, as he prescribed, was the only true God of Heaven, who ruleth over all the World, neyther are any of those, whom the Heathens worship, true Gods, but dumbe Idols. Thus by Gods providence a King of the Gentiles, to the shame of the Kings of Judah, provided for the building of that Temple to the honour of God, which by their sins had been pulled down, a very figure of that, which was done under the Gospell, when the Gentiles being intent to the building of the spirituall Temple, gave occasion to provoke the Jews to jealousy, as is sayd, Rom. 10. 19. And when they corrupted and oppugned the true faith, he confessed it, as the Gentiles also under the Gospell did.

Then arose the chief of their fathers Families of Judah and Benjamin, &c. whom their neighbours confirmed with vessels of silver, with gold, &c. So many of the Jews, as whose hearts God stirred up, went to Ierusalem to build, and with them many more of the poorer sort, who had not of their own wherewithall to defray the charges of the journey, these, their neighbours, that is, the rich Jews, who stayed still did help with their silver and gold, and cattell or beasts to beare burthens, but according to some, as Lyra sayth, the Gentiles amongst whom they dwelt for the respect, which they bare to Cyrus, who commanded it, holpe them with these things. And I see not, but that it may well be thought, that they were holpen both by the one and the other.

And King Cyrus himself brought forth the vessels of the house of the Lord, which Nebuchadnezzar had carryed away 70 yeers before, by the hands of Mithredates his Treasurer, and delivered them to Sheshbazzar, Prince of the Jews. Who this Sheshbazzar was is not agreed, for whereas Expofitors commonly say, that he was otherwise called Zorobabel, which name followeth here, chap. 2. 2. and chap. 3. 8. Iunius approveth it not, but upon such a reason, as I conceive not of, viz. because chap. 25. Thainai and his companions in their letters to Darius would Verf. 2.

Pellican.

Verf. 3.

Verf. 5. 6.

Lyra.

Verf. 7. 8.

Iunius.

not

Dan. 1.
Dan. 10. 1.

Iunius.
Lyra.

Schol. hist.
Ierom.

Iunius.

Pellicani.

Verf. 9.
Lyra.

The Allegory.

not have omitted to mention the Nation, to load the Jews cause with more hatred. But to prove, that he was the same man, who was other wise called Zorobabel, the son of Shealtiel, the son of Iechoniah, let it be considered, that after this Sheftbazzar is named no more, in speaking eyther of those that went to Ierusalem, chap. 2. or of the prime builders there, chap. 3. and 4. but only chap. 5. 14. where certain Persian Princes writeto Darius; what the Jews sayd was decreed by Cyrus that name is again mentioned, and that Sheftbazzar layd the foundation of the Lords house, ver. 16. whereas, chap. 3. 8. it is plainly sayd; that Zorobabel did it, thus proving him to be the same man. Hce was by the Persians then called Sheftbazzar, but by the Hebrews Zorobabel, that is, a stranger to Babel, because it was hoped, that in his time they should again depart from Babylon, to go to Ierusalem. Yet the Hebrews by Sheftbazzar understand Daniel, whereas indeed the name given him in Babylon was Belsazzar, and he speaks of himself as being still in Babylon, Anno 3 of Cyrus, whereas this man took charge of the precious vessels carrying to Ierusalem, and carried them, ver. 11. whereas it is sayd, ver. 5. that the chiefe of the tribe of Judah and Benjamin, and so many as whose hearts God stirred up, arose to go to Ierusalem, it is to be understood, so many of other tribes, as Iunius noteth, 1 Chron. 9. 3. and Lyra likewise, who sayth, That many of other tribes were joynd to the kingdome of Judah in Iosiah his time, 2 Chron. 34. and so they were together carried away captive into Babylon, and returned together. Whereas their rising up to goe is spoken of, as if they had gone immediately after the liberty given, Comestor sayth; That they made such slow haste, that they went not, till the third yeere after, when Zachariah and Haggai by their prophesying stirred them up. And this hee seemeth to ground upon Ierom, who sayth, That the seventh yeare of the seventh Decad was the first of Cyrus, and so in his third, full seventy yeares were expired. But whereas hee sayth, That they went not, till they were stirred up by Zachary and Haggai, this agreeth not to the foresaid time, because their prophesying was many years after, viz. the second of Darius, Ezra 2. 24. 5. 1. that is, as Iunius sayth, of Darius Nothus betwixt which and the first of Cyrus were 107 yeares. But according to others, it was Darius Histaspis, and so the building was hindered but sixteen or seventeen yeares. I see no reason therefore why we should follow Comestor herein, but hold rather, that so soon as they had leave given them by Cyrus, they prepared to return, and returned, as is here said. And yet, as Pellicani sayth, All that were godly returned not, as Daniel and Murdecai, &c. for by a divine providence some such were held still in Babylon, that by their means others who remayned, might be upheld in the knowledge and worship of the true God, and many of the Gentiles converted.

In reckoning up the vessels of Gold and Silver belonging to the Temple, about 2500 being numbred, it is sayd, they all were 5400, because it was thought good not to give the particular sums first, of all the kinds, to avoid tediousnesse, so Lyra. Yet in the Greek of Sixtus, there are reckoned up by their kinds 5496. Iosephus hath 4210. All that which is sayd in this Chapter is morally, or rather allegorically applyed thus by Lyra. Cyrus figured out Christ Iesus, being therefore called Christus Domini, Esay 45. For as he proclaimed liberty, when God had given him all kingdoms, to all Gods people to goe and build the Temple: so Christ having all power given unto him in heaven and in earth, as he sayd, gave liberty to the captives by sin, and then the chiefe of their Fathers Families rose up, that is, the twelve Apostles, and the seventy Disciples and others, who were moved by the Lord to this work amongst the Gentiles, by preaching and working miracles to build up the spirituall Temple, being holpen by their neighbours, when as the people, amongst whom they preached, sold and brought in the price of their possessions and layd them downe at the Apostles feet. The precious vessels of the Temple which Nebuchadnezzar had carryed away, and put in the Temple of his gods, now restored by Cyrus, figured out men, whom the Devill had used as his instruments to serve sin in former times, now by Christ restored to their right use, viz. to serve God in holinesse, &c.

C H A P. II.

And these are the men of that Province, who ascended, &c. That is, saith Lyra, of the Province of Iudea, Iunius of the Province of Babylon: but because in Hebrew it is, The children of the promise, I rather assent to Lyra, as also Hugo doth: for they are said to be the children of a promise, who are the natives thereof, and not who have dwelt in such a Province, and been kept there, although along time, unless it shall be thought that they of ver. 59. were of some other Province of the Caldees, for then more probably these were of the Province of Babylon, of Iudea, called a Province, see Nehemiah 1. 2. And their names and number are set down, saith Pellican, for the credit of them and their posterity in future times, for that they were the first, that shewed their love to the holy City and Temple in returning from a Countrey where they had been so long settled, and now were well, having a King that was so well affected towards them, to a place void and desolate, ver. 2. which came with Zorobabel, Jeshuah, Nehemiah, &c. Zorobabel is here first named, as being the Prince of the Jews, as hath been already shewed in speaking of Seshbazzar, which was but another name of the same man, But when the setting up of the Altar commeth to be spoken of, Chap. 3. ver. 2. Jeshuah the Priest is first named, and then Zorobabel, but ver. 8. the order is again altered, Zorobabel and Jeshuah. Lyra in his Prologue upon Ezra saith, that howsoever their names are placed, the High Priest was now and from henceforward the chiefe Governour of Iudea, for which he alleageth Zacharia 6. 11, 13. where crowns of gold are appointed to be made, and to be set upon the head of Jeshuah the High Priest, and he is set upon a Throne, and therein to rule, so that now he saith, there was a third forme of Government, the first having been by Judges, the second by Kings, the third was by Priests, and under this the people were better restrained from idolatry, then under either of those two, seeing idolatry was no more after this by the Jews set up in that land. But Hag. 1. 1. Zorobabel is called Duke or Prince of Iudah, and likewise, Cap. 2. v. 3. and by the course of the sacred History, it seems that the Scepter once set up in Iudah, must not depart from it, till the coming of Skileh, that is Christ Jesus, as Iacob prophesied, Gen. 49. 10. and Dauids house was not to be without a light for ever, of which Zorobabel came. It is therefore more consonant to the Scriptures to hold, that the people were now under a Prince of the Royall Line of David, as the chiefe and the high Priest, as a second unto him, they joyntly governing as one supreme Magistrate, yet Iosephus saith, that the chiefe authority was in the High Priest. Touching Nehemiah he is here spoken of by anticipation, for he went not till Anno 20 of Artaxerxes, who according to the computation of Iunius, began not to reigne till after 125 years from this time, unless some other Nehemiah be meant. The company that went up with these leaders, are first summed particularly by their families, ver. 3, 4, 5, &c. to ver. 61. and then generally altogether, ver. 64. 42360, but if we compare the particulars with the generall, we shall finde that this exceedeth them above 10000. R. Solomon resolveth this by saying, that in the particulars are put onely the men of three Tribes that returned, Iudah, Benjamin, and Levi, but into the generall came also those of other Tribes, who returned with them, as hath been before noted. Iunius, that they who could not finde their Genealogies, who were not summed up before, make up this number. But seeing there be so few families of them spoke of, it is improbable that they should amount to so great a summe, rather both they, and so many of other Tribes as were mixed amongst them together make up this summe. The Hebrew Chronicle also saith, that the men of other Tribes come under the generall number. These also were amongst those that went up from Thelmelaeh, Telcharseha, Cherub, Adan, and Immer, &c. These are the names of places about Babylon, from whence also they ascended, as well as from Babylon it selfe, but because they could not shew their Genealogies, it was uncertain whether they were Israelites or not, for which cause certain possessions could not be assigned unto them in that Land, but being of the same faith, they were not Vers. 1.

Lyra.
Iunius.Pellican.

Vers. 2.

Lyra.

2 Sam. 7. 15.

Vers. 3, 4, 5.

Vers. 64.

Lyra.Iunius.

Vers. 59.

Verf. 6.

rejected, whether they were Israelites or strangers, but received into their society. Onely such as said that they were of the Priests, but could not shew their Genealogies were kept from the Priests office, whereupon Lya groundeth, that it is necessary for a stranger now adayes, comming into any place to shew his Ordination, before that he be suffered to celebrate.

Verf. 63.

Junius.Lya.

For Atherfata said unto them, that they should not eat of the most holy thing, untill there arose a Priest with the Urim and Thummim. Junius readeth it, The Kings Commissary said, expounding it of the aforesaid Shefhabazar. But Lya saith, that he is commonly held to have been Nehemiah, seeing he is expressly set forth by this name, Nehem. 8. 10. he was Hathafhatha. But because Nehemiah came not to Ierusalem till many years after, he could not be meant here, but he who in the Caldee tongue, was for his authority called so, that now was appointed, as Prince, and that was Zorobabel, or Shefhabazar. For although the Iews had now liberty given them to return, yet they were never more after this captivity a free, but a tributary people, either to the Persians, Greeks, or Romans, so that the onely difference was, in the time of their captivity they served a forreign Nation in another Land, but after their return in their own Land. For Cyrus made Shefhabazar Prince first, and Artaxerxes Nehemiah, and then Ezra afterwards, giving him power to make other Magistrates. But whether the Prince or the High Priest was the chiefe Governour it is uncertain, although Iosephus saith, that the High Priest was, untill the time of the Assamoni: who wrested the government from him, and Lya following Iosephus, as hath been already shewed, but certain it is that sometimes the chiefe authority was in the High Priest also.

Chap. 5. 14.

Chap. 7. 25.

Iosephus.

Verf. 63.

Untill a Priest should arise with the Urim and Thummim, that is, saith Iosephus, to declare the will of God hereby: For the precious stones in the High Priests Breastplate, called, the Urim and Thummim, light and perfection shining bright, when God was consulted withall, as some hold, was taken for an answer, in way of granting the thing desired. But thus say the Hebrews, they never did more after the Babylonish captivity, and therefore this touching those that could not shew their Genealogie, was never resolved.

Verf. 65.

*A. B. Patri-archs Travels.
Junius.*

Pellican.

Verf. 69, 70.

Patriarchs Travels.

Besides their servants and maids 7337, amongst whom were 200 singing men and women. These and their cattell, of which, ver. 66. that is, horses 736, mules 245, camels 435, asses 6720, are reckoned apart as their substance, which they had gotten in Babylon, wherethey had been permitted to live under a Governour of their own Nation, and these beasts served to carry such as were weake, and their wives, and little ones, and stiffe. For the journey was long, viz. 680 miles. Those of their servants which were singers, are thought by Junius to have been bought by the Levites, as having skill in song and mutick, because through disuse neer the space of 70 years, they had lost it, Pellican; that they used them to sing by the way, to expresse their joy for their return. Ver. 69. When they were come to the house of the Lord, the chiefe offered towards the charges of building it 61000 dracmas of gold, and 5000 pounds of silver; that is, 21525 pound of gold, and reckoning the silver at 37 shillings six pence the pound, 9375 pound. But seeing King Cyrus took order for all this building, commanding that it should be done at his cost and charges, as appeareth, Chap. 6. 4. whereupon occasion, his Ordinance is recited, it may be demanded, why the chiefe of the Iews contributed towards it? Ans. Some thinke to make the building larger then was propounded by that King, but it is more probable because he took order onely for the timber and stone work, that this contribution or offering was made for the adorning and beautifying of it, and to supply it with many utensils about it, that were necessary.

CHAP. III.

Verf. 1.

And when the seventh moneth was come, &c. In the end of the former Chapter having shewed that after their offering made, the Priests and Levites went and dwelt in their Cities, and the rest of the people in theirs: Now the time of keeping the Feast of Tabernacles being come, in the seventh moneth they came came with one accord again to Jerusalem: Then Ieshuah with his kinsred, the Priests and Zorobabel with his kinsmen, rose up and built the Altar, &c. And having set this upon the old foundation in the Priests Court, where Solomon had set the Altar for Sacrifice up of old, they offered sacrifices pertaining to that solemnity from day to day, as was appointed, Numb. 29. 13. And this they did although the heathen dwelling round about them made them afraid, as envying at these their proceedings, for the enmity which they bare through the instigation of Satan, against the true God and his worship. And as they did at the feast of Tabernacles, so they did daily, as was appointed by the Law morning and evening, beginning the first day of the moneth, and so going on from day to day, and on the new Moons, when yet there was no foundation of the Temple laid; for order was not taken for this till five moneths after, but onely moneys were given to workmen for the providing of materials, and then in the second moneth of the second year after their coming, they set to the work, and laid the foundation, certain Levites being set to play upon instruments, and to sing at the doing hereof to the praise of God. But even when some were singing and making musick, others that were ancient wept to see how much this Temple was like to come short of that which Solomon had built before, but was by Nebuchadnezzar destroyed for their sins. For so indeed it must needs doe, seeing Solomon who built the former abounded both with riches and people, and they that sate now to the work, were a company of poor exiles, who wanted the means which he enjoyed: yet Hag. 2. 8. they are comforted with this, that the glory of the Temple by them now built, should be greater then the glory of that, which Lyra expoundeth as sayd, because the state that they were in being considered, it was more admirable, that such an house be built by them now, then one more magnificent by Solomon then. But for so much, as it is spoken not of the present but of the future times, The glory of this house shall be greater, he yeeldeth this other reason, viz. because the Law was taught in the Temple of Solomon, whereby none shall live, but in this the Gospel of life and peace by Christ and his Apostles. And this indeed is the truest, and most evidently proving, that Christ is not yet to come, but already come, seeing otherwise this can never be verified, for so much as the Temple built by Zorobabel and Ieshuah was long agoe destroyed by the Romans.

Vers. 2.

Vers. 6.

Vers. 7.

Vers. 8. 9.

Vers. 10. 11.

Vers. 12.

Lyra.

CHAP. IV.

THE foundation of the Temple was no sooner laid, but the Jews enemies hearing thereof came to Zorobabel, and offered to joine with them in this building, alleaging, that since the dayes of Esarhaddon the King of Assyria, who brought them thither, they sacrificed to none other God. But Zorobabel denyed them, and alleaged the decree of Cyrus, that the Jews onely should build it, for which cause they sought to hinder them as much as they could, and did hinder the building of the Temple all the dayes of Cyrus, that it went no farther forward all his dayes, nor after his decease till the reigne of Darius, that is, Darius Hystaspis, who succeeded Cambyses, otherwise called Ahashuerus, or Artaxerxes, ver. 6. 7. For Cyrus having reigned after the Monarchy of those parts attained, nine years, was slain by Themiris Queen of the Massagetes, having committed his Kingdom to his son Cambyses when he went to that war, then he having reigned eight years, the Magi obtained the Kingdom seven moneths, after whom being slain, this Darius was chosen King by the neighing of his horse, so that the work was intermitted about 19 years. In the time of Cyrus, because he was busied with divers wars with the Lydians, who revolted from him, after that he had subdued them, and that by the means of Pactias, to whom he had committed the treasure of Crasus, taken there to carry to Ecbatana, his chief City. For hereby he animated the Lydians against Cyrus, and went and besieged Sardis the chief City of the Countrey, which was by him committed to one Tabulus to keepe, Cyrus therefore fought against the Lydians, and overcame them the second time, and would have destroyed Sardis, but that Crasus desired him rather to take all

Vers. 1.

Vers. 2.

Vers. 3.

Vers. 4.

Vers. 5.

Herodotus.

Armes away from them only, and to forbid them to have any hereafter, and instead of exercising themselves therein, to use playing upon instruments of Musique, perswading him, that thus they would soon grow effeminate and no more dangerous for rebellion. And so indeed it proved, the most warlike people of that Countrey becoming most womanish and unfit for War. 2 Hee had Wars with the Massagets, against whom he by the advice of Crasus used this policy, he sent a weak part of his Army against them, for hee had therein 20000 men, who were instructed, to leave in their tents, when they should see before the Massagets good store of wine and other provision, and having done so, the third part of the Massagets Army which only was employed against them, having overcome them, and taken their tents, ate and drank abundantly, and thereupon fell into a dead sleep, then the Persians returning slue and took them all, and took Spargapses, the son of Thomiris their Queen. Hereupon she rayled against Cyrus, and had him return speedily into his own Countrey, spying him with his deceit, and threatned for his bloud-thirstinesse to kill him with bloud soone, if he did not. And so, he contemning all that shee sayd, shee proceeded to battell against him and slue him, and all his men, not leaving one alive to tell the news, and having found him amongst the dead, cut off his head, and filled a vessell with bloud, and cast it in saying, Satisfie thy self now with bloud, which thou hast so much thirsted after. By reason of these Wars Cyrus could no more, whilst he lived, intend the building of the Temple, and therefore the enemies of the Jews nere about them might easily hinder it all his days. So that great Monarch having been King of Persia 20 or 21 years, and nine years over all the Kingdoms round about him, fell with his whole Army through the prowesse of a woman. And when Cambyses attained the Kingdom after him, the Samaritans wrought so with those, that were great about him, that he would not suffer the Jews to go foward in this building during his reigne. But to returne to the enemies, that hindered the building, because they might not be permitted to build amongst them. They are thought to be the Samaritans, that is, the people placed in Samaris by the King of Assyria, when he had carryed Israel away captive, from which time they say, that they sacrificed to none other God, but to the Lord. Whereas they say, that they were brought thither by Esaraddon, who was son to Sennacherib, and when he was slain, reigned in his stead, but Salmanassar a Predecessor of Sennacherib brought those thither, that dwelt in Samaris according to the sacred History. Lysa and others say, that these were another company sent over, after that the other were, many of them destroyed by Lyons, together with a Priest to instruct them in the service of the true God, after which they are sayd to have feared the Lord, but to have served their Idols still. Wherefore they sayd untruly, that they sacrificed to none other, but to their god, as also when they offered to build with them, they did it but in dissimulation, that they might have an interest in the Temple to bring in their Idolotry thither also, which Zorobabel suspected, and therefore denyed their joyning vvith him and his Levvs. And with what an ill minde they made this attempt, appeareth in that they practised against this building to hinder it so soon as they were denyed. Pellican observeth hence, that we ought not to have communion with such, as worship not God sincerely, that is, which worship God so, as that they serve Idols also, and this was reason enough to reject their motion, but because Zorobabel would not provoke them, he passing this over in silence, allegeth only the Kings Decree. And upon this ground Papists refuse to have communion with Protestants, whom they count Hereticks, but they themselves are far more aptly resembled by the Samaritans for their manifest Idolatry both practized by them, and commanded by their second Nicen Council.

It is sayd, that they might hinder this work, they hyred Counsellours against them, that is, as Iosephus hath it, they by Bribes corrupted such officers, as were by King Cyrus appointed to defray the charges out of his treasury, that they devised some excuses to Cyrus, and so held their hands, when he by reason of his distractions had no leysure to look so narrowly into it, whereby it came to passe, that their hands were weakned, and this work, although it did not utterly cease, went but slowly forward, untill the death of Cyrus. But hee being dead, and Aha-

2 Kings 17.

2 Kings 19.

Pellican.

Note.

Vers. 5.
Iosephus.

Cambyse or Cambyfes coming to the Kingdome, the enemies waxed more bold, and by writing to him obtains an utter cessation thereof all his time, which was about nine yeares.

In the dayes of Artaxerxes wrote Ribstan, Mithredates, and Fabeel, &c. These three, and they that are said to be their fellows, were Toparchs, saith Iunius, and the other two, ver. 8. Presidents of those parts, and he saith, that they wrote in the Syriack tongue, because the Ievvs commonly understood it: But Pellican contrariwise that it might not be read of the Ievvs, who were about the King, yet Lyra expounds it, as Iunius, saying, that it was both written and read in Syriack, that it might be understood by the King and the Ievvs, amongst whom it was sent, well understood that tongue, seeing they had dwelt long in Babylon. And divers other peoples are numbered, which wrote to the same effect with them, as the Dinzans, Aparfathians, &c. whom the noble Asnapper is said to have brought and placed in Samarina. In some Translations, sayth Lyra, it is Salmanasar, but in Hebrew it is Asnapper, and he is held to be the same with Esachaddon, who is said, ver. 2. to have brought them thither, they being two names, of one and the same man, whereas these people are said to have dwelt beyond the river, the river Euphrates is meant, for that was between the land of Judea and Assyria.

Now in their Letter they gave the King to understand that the Jews were about building the City Jerusalem, and if they were suffered so to doe, there would be danger that he should have no more tribute paid unto him, yea, of losing all that Province. Before this nothing is said of building the City, but of the Temple onely, nor in the Proclamation of King Cyrus, but it is to be understood, that when the building of the Temple was permitted, the building of the City wherein it stood, was permitted also, or else, how should the people have dwelt in it? And this, as seeming most materiall to these Samaritans to move the King withall, is laid to their charge, the Temple not being once mentioned, as being a work about which they did little, since that by their enemies conspiring against them, they had the charges at the first allowed by Cyrus kept back. Ver. 15. They will the King that the Records may be searched, that thereby the rebellions of the Jews against others his predecessors might appeare to make their present accusation the more probable. For Kings had their Chronicles in all Countreies, wherein all memorable things were recorded, and therein was set down their rebellions against former Kings of Assyria and Babylon, ever since the time of King Ahas, who first intralled his Kingdom to Tiglath Pileser.

King Artaxerxes having read their Epistle, returneth answer, that it was true touching that which they had written unto him, the Jews had always been rebellious, and in times past had mighty Kings of their own, who reigned far and wide, and took tribute, that is, David and Solomon, and therefore he commanded, that they should not suffer them to build any more, &c.

And so they accordingly, by force kept the Jews from building the City, and thus the Temples building also was hindered, although not by the King forbidden, unlesse as a part of the City, but howsoever it was hindered, it seemeth by that which is said, Chap. 5. 16. that it was not altogether intermitted, no not at this time, of this Artaxerxes or Cambyse: Eusebius sayth, that he was called the second Nebuchadnezzar, as he might well be, because of his enmity against the Jews, in that as he destroyed the City and Temple, so this man would not suffer the re-building of it. And by the History written of him by Herodotus and Justin, it appeareth that he was a man most ambitious of dominion, a contemner of all Religion, and a cruell Tyrant, and was judged accordingly. For first he took occasion to quarrell with Amasis King of Egypt about his daughter, and fought against and subdued Egypt, destroying their Idols, and particularly causing their god Apis by the Priests thereof to be brought unto him, which was a choise bullock rarely marked, kept in a Temple, and deriding their superstition, he with his sword thrust it into the side, of which wound it languished and dyed. Then he sent to spoile the Temple of Jupiter Ammon in Lybia, but they that were sent by him were destroyed by a tempest of sand over-whelming them. After this, he also fraudulently sent a present to the King of Ethiopia, pretending a desire of amity,

Verf. 7.
Iunius.

Pellican.
Lyra.

Verf. 9, 10.

Verf. 12.

Verf. 15.

Verf. 18.

Verf. 23.

Euf. b. Chron.

Herodotus.

Nauclerus.

but intending thus to make him secure, and then to invade him. But that King wisely seeing into his end, told his Embassadors plainly thereof, and returned unto him a bow, bidding them to say unto him, that he were best to forbear comming thither, untill the Persians were able to bend that bow, and then also to increase his number. For the Ethiopians, called Macrobian for their long life, were mighty men, being nine or ten foot high. Cambyfes, notwithstanding, bent his course towards Ethiopia, but through want of victuals by the way, he was constrained to kill the horie for meat, and then every tenth man, and so with great losse and shame to return into Egypt again. For his cruelty, it appears by these few examples. His brother Smerdis being present when the bow was brought from the King of Ethiopia, attempted to draw it, which he did within three inches, but none else could doe the like, wherefore the King being jealous of him, least he should aspire to the Kingdom, sent him away, and a man after him to kill him, which was done accordingly. He also having a lust to his own sister, would take her to wife, but because he knew that the Persians would not endure it, he first called the Judges, and demanded of them, whether he might not by the Laws of the Persians marry her. They fearing his displeasure, said, there was no Law whereby such a thing might be done, but by the Persians Law, the King might doe what he pleased, and so he married her, but within a while when he was with her, beholding a lyon put out to a mastie dog, to fight with him, who having torne, and almost kild him, another dog, fellow to that which was in danger espying it, brake loose from the place where he was tyed, and run and helped his fellow, and so together they overcame the lyon: he laughed to see this sport, but shee wept, and being by him asked the cause, shee answered, shee wept to see that the poor lyon had no brother to helpe him, whereupon he fell into a rage, as thinking himselfe thus taxed for his brothers death and slew her. Prexaspes also whom he had with him as his Counsellour, being asked what the people said of him, and answering, that the common speech was, that he was too much given to drinking, he was so moved at this his freedom to admonish him, which he thought for his familiarity with him, that he might be bold to doe, as that hee caused his son to be brought forth, and set for a marke to shoot at, saying, hereby thou shalt perceive whether I be a man intemperate, and troubled in my head or no. If I shoot and hit thy sonne into the heart, then it will appear that I am sober, and it is false which the Persians say of me, and having shot, he caused his body presently to be ripped, and finding that he had pierced his heart, he rejoiced greatly, neither durst the father say any other, but praise his skill, in such slavery are the most familiar friends of Tyrants unto them. After this also he put Craesus from him, who was bold to reprove him for killing twelve of the Persians, for which he bent his bow to shoot at him, but he perceiving it, avoided out of the room: then he commanded one to kill him, this being by Craesus perceived, he wrought so with him, that he was content that he should hide himselfe, untill that the King asked again after him, and if when he spake of him, he should desire his company, he should bring him forth unto him alive, but if otherwise he should declare again his pleasure was that he should die, he should yeeld himselfe to death. Now, it so hapned, that the King asked after him as desiring him, then the man to whom the charge had been given to kill him, said, that he was still alive, of which Cambyfes was glad, and receiving him again into his grace, hee caused the other that saved him contrary to his command, to be put to death. Besides these, he cruelly kild unjustly many more. But at last, it came to him according to his demerits: for one Smerdis a Magus, to whom he had committed the Government of Persia, in his absence, tooke the Kingdom vpon him, giving it out that he was Smerdis the Kings brother, being also most like unto him in favour and person. The King hearing this, called the man unto him, to whom he had committed the killing of his brother Smerdis, and examines him again about it, he affirmed, that he had buried him with his own hands, and so being satisfied touching that, he hastned against the usurper, but in taking horse, his sword fell out of the scabbard, and wounded him mortally on his side, where he had stab'd Apis before. Then he calls together his Nobles, and certifies them, that Smerdis his his brother was certainly dead, and therefore he that now usurped was another man, that they might not suffer him in the throne, and so he dyed: and this was thought by the Egyptians to have befalne him as a just judgement for his contempt of the gods. And indeed in a man, either of no Religion, or of a false Religion, it is no marvail to see vengeance coming upon him for his contempt, even of superstition, because such are without God in the world, and so under the power of the Devill, by him to be carried headlong to destruction, that ruleth in them.

Note.

Thus then it appeareth that Darius came not immediately to the Crown after Artaxerxes, but Smerdes a usurper having first held it seven moneths according to Herodotus. For the manner how he was cut off, he sayth it was thus. At the first the man to whom the King had given a charge to murder his brother, after the King Artaxerxes his death denied it utterly, as fearing, that if he should confesse it, his life might be in danger. Hereupon the Smerdes now reigning, was suffered to sit upon the throne in quiet, yet when the Princes saw that he kept himselfe so secret, that none of them could see him in a long time, they began to marvel at it, for although the Persian Kings holding it a point of royall state, not to be often seen of the people, yet the Princes sometimes were admitted into his sight: Therefore it not being now so done unto them, they much suspected that he was not the right Smerdes of the blood Royall, who now reigned, and one of them especially called Ortanes, Uncle to Cambyses, being desirous to sift out the truth, sent by a secret messenger to his daughter Phedima, who had been one of Cambyses his wives, and now was taken by this Magus; as also the rest of his wives were, desiring her to let him understand whether this were that Smerdes indeed, which was Cambyses his brother; but shee returning answer that shee knew not; for shee had never seen that brother of the King, he willed her to aske Acassa the daughter of Cyrus that question. But when she answered again that she was kept from her, and so were all the wives of Cambyses, that they never could come one at another: he yet devised another way to finde it out, and that was this. He called to minde, that Smerdes the Magus lost his eares once by the command of Cambyses. He willed his daughter therefore, once more, when he slept by her, to seele whether this Smerdes had any eares or no; and when shee had thus done, and certified him of the truth, he being resolved that he was an usurper, and calling two other Princes into Counsel with him, disclosed the matter unto him, then unto those three were joyned three more, who agreed together to enter the Palace by night, and to kill such of the Guard as resisted them, till they should come at the King, and did so upon such a sodain, that they found little resistance, till that by the noise which was made in the Court, his two brothers started up, and took one a bow and arrows, and the other a speare to resist them, but they being soon quelled, they came to the Usurper and slew him, defending himselfe with the leg of a golden chaire standing in his bed chamber. Then after consultation, they agreed together for the Government of the Kingdom, to choose a new King, and it was done thus. A certain place was appointed, for all the Princes to meet together, early in the morning before the Sun, and hee whose horse neighed first after the Sun rising should be King, for the Persians were worshippers of the Sun, and to the Sun used to sacrifice horses. Therefore the horse of Darius neighing first, he was immediately saluted as King by all the rest. And this was Darius, the sonne of Hystaspis, concerning whom being but 20 years old, and so thought to be too young to goe to war, Cyrus had dreamt in his last expedition against the Massagets, that he saw him having upon his shoulders two wings, which covered all Asia and Europe. This he taking to portend his attaining to the Monarchie over both these parts, called Hystaspis his father to him, and told him that he much suspected his sonne for rebellion, and therefore would have him return home forthwith, and look to him that he attempted nothing, threatening at his return to call him to an account. But this dream took not effect till this time, being nine or ten years after. Darius being thus made King, the rest of the conspirators made him to agree to these two conditions. 1 That he should take no wife but of their daughters. 2 That it should be lawfull for any Verf. 24.

Iosephus.

any of them at any time, to come and speak with him, without any messengers going between, unlesse he were in private with his wife, Intafernes therefore after he had fulfilled one condition in marrying Phadima the daughter of Othones, went to speak with him, and passing on till he came at the porter, he would have entered into the room where Darius was, but being told by the porter, and him that brought answer from the King, that he was then with his wife, and therefore not to be spoken with, he took them two in a rage, and cut off their ears and noses, and putting bridles about their necks let them goe, because he thought that he was deluded by them. They being thus deformed, went into the King, and when he understood what was done, and by whom, he first feared that it was done by the consent of the rest of the Princes, as meaning to rebell against him. But upon inquiry finding that Intafernes was the sole agent, and that none of them had any knowledge thereof, he sent immediately, and caused Intafernes with all his house to be put in prison, intending to punish them all with death. But his wife seeing the danger wherein her husband and his whole house stood, went to the Court, and ceased not by her tears to importune him so, as that he granted her the life of one of the house whom shee should desire, then shee desiring her brother, the King would know the reason, why shee beg'd his life rather then her husbands, and she answering, because if her husband were dead she might have another husband, and by him more children, but if her brother, she could not have a brother again, the King was so well pleased herewith, that he granted her not onely his life, but also the life of her eldest sonne, and caused all the rest to be put to death. Darius being thus established in the throne, the Temples building went not yet forward till the second year of his reigne. Yet Iosephus saith, that he had vowed, if he were King, that it should be built, and that out of 3 Esdrae 4. where it is said, that Zorobabel standing before Darius with two other young men, spake so wisely beyond them, that the King bid him aske what he would, and it should be done for him. Then he humbly desired his Majesty to remember his vow that he had made, if he were King to build Jerusalem, and to restore the vessels pertaining to the Temple, whereunto he immediately consenting, gave bounteously to this work yearly till it were finished, and sent home the Jews remaining, and made them free, &c. Wherefore it is most probable that Zorobabel by the counsell of the High Priest, and elders of the Jews went over to Persia, in the first year of the reigne of Darius, being full of hope now, that Artaxerxes was dead, who had been an enemy to all Religion, and Darius had attained to the Kingdom, that he should prevail with him to further the building of the Temple. Especially for that familiarity which he had with him in times past, when he lived in Babylon, and heard him make such a vow, intimating the piety that was in him. And if the story of that Esdrae be true, he thus prevailed, as hath beene said, and the next year they fell afresh to the building, as followeth, Chapter 5.

CHAP. V.

Verf. 1, 2.

Then, that is, Anno 2 of Darius prophesied Haggai and Zechariah, that they should build, Zorobabel the Prince, and Jeshuab the High Priest hereupon setting again upon the work. This seemeth to contradict the History of Iosephus, and of 3 Esdrae, because if by the grant of King Darius, they returned to this building, then they should not have needed Prophets to incite them, and to make them promises if they proceeded in it, or to reprove them for their backwardnesse to this work, as Haggai doth. For how could they have shewed more forwardnesse, then in sending over to Darius, so soon as they heard, and so could conceive any hope to prevail for liberty to returne to this building againe? The prophesie therefore of Haggai being an invective against them for their backwardnesse, and a complaint that they rather intended their own private contentments then the building of the Lords House, sheweth that till they were excited by the Prophets, they had little zeale or care about this work, and that the encouragement rageiment which they had from Darius, came after an attempt made again in the time of Darius by the enemy to hinder it, appears here, Chap. 6. 7, 8. It is to be conceived then, that when these Prophets prophesied, both the Prince and people being cooled in the zeale by the opposition of enemies, sat still and ceased working upon the Temple, and yet both built houses for themselves and followed the works of their husbandry and trades. For this Haggai intimateth when he saith, it is time for you to dwell in seiled houses, &c. And ye carry out much seed, and reap but little, &c. That this was a fault, and worthy of reproof, appeareth, because as was noted before, when Artaxerxes forbade the building of the City, he forbade not the Temples building also, but passed that over in silence, so that they were not by his command kept from this work, however their enemies might abuse their authority to make them to cease from that also, if their words would doe it. But notwithstanding these enemies opposition, they built them fair houses to dwell in, it being no part of that Kings meaning that they should be hindered here-from, but from bringing it into the forme of a City, by walling it, and making Forts therein. Wherefore if their zeal had been as great to the Lords house, as their care for their own private content, they would not doubtlesse so have neglected it, but taken as much liberty to re-build it as for their own dwellings. As need was therefore, God now stirreth them up by his Prophets, in a time, which he by his divine spirit knew to be most fit, and so they set to the work again. Yet Josephus to make good what he hath said, conceiveth that the Jews were afraid, notwithstanding the Kings writing, that hee might change his minde, and therefore they needed Prophets to put them on, which is improbable, seeing the Laws of the Medes and Persians altered not. But Thainai Governour beyond the River, and Shether-Boznai came unto them and said, &c. These men, as it seemeth, were at the comming on of a new King, put into commission there, to rule instead of those in the time of Artaxerxes, for Chap. 6. 16. they are called Persians, and they were more equally disposed towards the Jews, then their predecessours had been. For they certified nothing but the truth, and sought not to exasperate the King against them by malicious suggestions, as they, but onely desired him that search might be made, whether Cyrus had given liberty, and contributed to this building or no, as the Jews said, and hereupon to signifie his pleasure. Whereas it is said in the first person, we answered them, &c. Pellican gathereth that Ezra was now present amongst the Jews, and Lyra likewise, but I rather subscribe unto Lyra, in otherwise shewing a reason of his thus writing, viz. because he counted himselfe one of them, although at this time in another place, as appeareth, Chap. 7. 1. we answered therefore, is as much as if he had said, some of us Jews, so St. B. speaking of Christs comming to judgement, saith, Then we that are alive shall be taken up, that is, some of us who are the faithfull.

Ver. 5. But the eye of their God was upon the captives which returned, this is inserted that it might not be imputed to fortune or chance, but to the divine providence, that these Princes did no way hinder the building of the Lords house, although they came to enquire about it, and that we might know that it was no good disposition in them, but an over-ruling power of God, who hath all mens hearts in his hands, to hold them from doing otherwise, and withall to encourage all men to obey his Prophets, in doing that which they commanded in his name, although otherwise they can see no cause of encouragement, as these Jews could not, when they were exhorted to set upon this work again, till the event gave them encouragement.

Verf. 3.

Verf. 4.
Pellican.
*Lyra.*1 Thes. 4.
Verf. 5.

Note.

CHAP. VI.

THe Epistle of Thainai and his Colleagues comming to King Darius, search was made in the Annals, and it was found, that Cyrus ordained the rebuilding of the Lords house, and therefore King Darius giveth a charge to Thainai, &c. that they interrupt them not, but further them by supplying necessaries

Iosephus.

Vers. 14.

Vers. 15.

Iosephus.

Fucci Chronol.

Iunius.

Note.

out of the Kings Revenues there, threatening such, as did otherwise with destruction, and imprecating all enemies to this work, or demolishers of it again, after it should be built. Besides this, Iosephus sayth, that there was another Epistle written by the Samaritans, wherein they sought to move him against this building, by recounting the prohibition of Cambyfes, his predecessour: but seeing nothing is sayd hereof in the sacred History, I passe this over. Darius having given such encouragement to this Work, it went forward with all speed, till it was finished according to the will of God, at the prophesying of Haggai and Zachariah, as Cyrus had appointed, and Darius and Artaxerxes, and it was finished the third day of the moneth Adar, the sixth yeare of Darius. Hereby Artaxerxes is to be understood the son of Darius, called Artaxerxes, so Iosephus, who will have Xerxes and Artaxerxes all one. But the truth is, Xerxes was the son of Darius, and reigned next after him, and then came Artaxerxes to the Crown two and twenty years after the Reign of Darius ended, but his name is here put down together with Cyrus and Darius, by way of preoccupation, that wee might have at one view all the Contributors of the Persian Kings to the Temple together, and the name of Cyrus by capitulation. And this Artaxerxes to distinguish him from the other, hath amongst Historians the name of Artax. Longimanus. And Fucci sayth, that this Darius Hystaspis was otherwise called Abastuernes, and was the husband of Hester, to the confirmation of which maketh also that which is written of his Feast, and his 127 Provinces, 3 Esdas 3. the same being said of Abastuernes, Hester 1. but some others hold Artaxerxes Longimanus to have bin that Abastuernes. The moneth Adar was the twelfth moneth, answering for the most part to our February, so Junius, and that rightly, but whereas by Artaxerxes here is spoken of, he understandeth Artaxerxes Mnemon, the son of Darius Nothus, hee greatly erreth, seeing betwixt him and this Darius were three Kings, as hee himself granteth. Xerxes, Artax. Longimanus, and Darius Nothus, the first reigning 22, the second 40, according to Fucci, 44, the third 26, unto which if 36 be added, which was the time of the Reigne of Darius Hystaspis, nine of Cambyfes, and nine of Cyrus, of how long a time must the building and adorning of the Temple be with such vessels, as were to be used therein? (for more vessels were by this King given to the house of the Lord, chap. 7. 19. Verily above 140 yeeres, which is improbable, and all the time of three Kings being 88 yeeres must be granted to be passed over in silence. R. Solomon, sayth Lysa, will have Darius and Artaxerxes one and the same man, affirming, that all Persian Kings were called by the name, as the Egyptians of Pharaoh. The time then of building the Temple after this setting to the worke againe was but foure yeares, and some odde moneths, and from the beginning about 24 yeares. Whereas Joh. 2. 20. it is sayd 46 yeares was this Temple in building, see the resolution there. And it might haply be a common error arising from the ignorance of the yeares; that these severall Kings reigned especially, if the first year of Cyrus his Reign, when hee provided for the building of the Temple, were taken for the first of his Reigne over Persia: for so unto his Reigne of 30 yeares more then nine yeares of Artaxerxes being added, (for some say, that he reigned more) and six of Darius the totall will amount to 46 at the least, when the building of the Temple was set upon again at the prophesying of Haggai, and it is to be noted, that this work brought with it a temporall blessing of great fruitfulness. For to shew this, Hag. 2. 11. in the ninth moneth, which was three moneths after they began to build, and answers to our November in part, and in part to October, when the Grapes and Olives being all gathered, they used to make their Wine and Oyle, they are bidden to consider what scarcity they had before, as is also spoken, chap. 1. and what plenty now, Vers. 15, 16, 19. to be encouraged to go on in so godly a work, in hope of the like blessing to continue still upon them: affirming, that the sacrifices, which they offered before, were not offered to him, whilst the building of the Temple lay neglected. A notable ground of looking for a blessing in worldly things then only: when the edification of the Church in any land, and what conduceth most hereunto is attended first and chiefly, for till this be done, there is no expectation of prosperity in any thing.

The

The building of the Temple being perfect'd, they proceeded to the Dedication with sacrifices of all sorts. But because between this worke begun, and the time of finishing there hapned a revolt of Babylon from Darius, which was againe recovered by the most admirable stratagem that ever was devised, I cannot but insert it, before I proceed further to tell of the Jews great solemnity. Darius having brought mighty forces against Babylon, was shot at from the Walls, and derided by them, saying That he might go away and come again, when a Mule had foaled, to win Babylon. But when he had continued his siege 20 moneths, there was one Prince with him called Zopyrus, one of the seven that killed Smerdes the Usurper before spoken of; who had a Mule that foaled, of vvhich being certified by his servants, he vvent to see it, and recounting the vvords of the Babylonians, hee gathered hereby, that the time vvvas novv come to vvinne Babylon, and that he must be the man, by vvvhose policy, vvwherefore taking a knife, hee slit up his oven nostrils, and cut off his ovvn eares, and so all bloody presented himself to Darius, to vvhom being amazed, at the sight he opened his stratagem, viz. that he vvould go as a Run-avvay to the Walls of Babylon, and being taken, hee vvould handle the matter so, that he might get credit amongst them, and have the government of their Army committed unto him, and then hee vvould have the King ten dayes after to assault one of the gates of the City vvith a thousand of his meaneest souldiers, and a fevv dayes after another gate with 2000, & after that another gate with 4000, at vvvhich last time he should place his Army under the Walls at vvvo other gates, vvwhere he vvould let them in. Then he fled vvithout delay to the Babylonians, vvwhere being taken by the Watch and brought in, he exclaimed upon Darius, saying, That because hee persvaded him to rayse his siege and not to teare time in abiding before a City invincible any longer, hee thus misused him, for vvvhich, if they vvould harken to him, he vvould both be revenged upon him, and help them to a famous vvictory over him, seeing he knew all his counsels. Hereupon they began to be somewhat moved, and at the day by him appointed, furnished him with an Army to defend the first gate before mentioned, vvwherein he behaved himselfe so, that he slew 1000 men, at the next time, at another gate 2000, then 4000, vvwhereby he came to be the onely man in authority in the City, and was extolled of all, till the day being come that he had appointed with Darius, hee set open those two gates, vvvhich he had promised, and so Babylon was taken the second time, and Zopyrus was rewarded with that City during his life, enjoying it free, and with many other honours. Thus Herodotus and Iustinus, vvwho also tell of another war made by him against the Sythians, about the fifth year of his reigne, to vvvhich he prepared 700000 men, and 600 ships, but returned with great losse of men and dishonour, both because he needlessly put himselfe into this war, as may be conceived, and did a most cruell act at his enterance upon it against an old man, vvwhose three sonnes, he having taken to serve him in this war, he was by their father sued unto, out of commiseration to his old age, to let one of them stay vvwith him for his comfort. The King replied as if he had been moved, that none of them should goe vvwith him, but thereupon he immediately commanded their Captain to slay them all three. Vvwherefore when he was come to Scythia, and they continued not certain in any place, but flitted from one to another, he thinking that they fled from him, sent to their King either to stand his ground and to give him battail, or else in acknowledgement of subjection, send him some of his earth and water. The Scythian King replied, that he removed not from place to place, for fear of him, but according to their Countrey manner, vvwho used not to stay long in a place, but he vvished him to depart out of his Countrey, or else he should shortly receive a present from him, vvwhereby he should know his minde, and accordingly he sent unto him, a Bird, a Moulse, and a Frog, and five Arrows, vvvhich were by Gobrias a Prince vvwith him, thus interpreted: Unless they did presently flee away as a Bird, or creepe into holes as a Moulse, or get them on to the water as a Frog, he vvould vvwith his Scythian Archers, utterly destroy his vvwhole Army. This being heard he hastened away, vvhaving lost for want of provision, about 80000 men. But to return to the Dedication of the Temple, they could not but do this vvwith exceeding great joy, because Herodotus.

Iustinus.

Verf 16.

Verf. 18.

Iunius.

Verf. 19.

Verf. 21.

Verf. 22.
Iunius.

a.

Herodotus.

it had lyen so long demolished; and was rebuilt with so great difficulty, and so much opposition, wherefore, notwithstanding their great cost in building, they all joynd as one man; now in making a solemne Dedication, by abundance of sacrifices, as they were able: and it is said, ver. 18. that the Priests and Levites were distinguished, as was written in the Law of Moses, which is so said, because Numbers 3 and 4. they are distinguished by their families, but more exactly, 1 Chron. 24. into 24 courses, whereof one served every week, and each one at his weeks end, was free to goe about his own affairs, untill his week came again. After the Dedication, followed the Passeover, within little more then one moneth, and therefore it is here also commemorated: for the third day of the last moneth, the Temple being finished, the Dedication was made, and the time of the Passeover followed the next moneth, being the first of the yeare, the 14 day, and they had a care in this also, to doe according to the Law, the Levites killing the Paschall Sacrifices, and the cleane onely eating thereof, and that both Jews and Gentiles that cleaved to them, for so it was ordained, Exod. 12. 48. Numb. 9. 14. whereas, ver. 22. in concluding this History it is said, God hath made them rejoyce, and turned the heart of the King of Assyria towards them. Juniust taketh occasion hence to confirme his exposition touching Arsaxerxes, upon ver. 14. that he was Artaxerxes Mnemon, and not Longiman, the next unto Darius but one, because he might well be called the King of Assyria, for so much as his father Darius Nothus made him King in his own life time, and he reigned many years together with him, the Kingdom being divided between them, Assyria to Artaxerxes, and Persia to his father Darius. But how could this be a cause of their present rejoycing in the time of Darius Hystaspis, when as hee reigned not so by the favour of his father, till certain Generations after? The resolution therefore of Lyra is better. Darius is meant by the King of Assyria here, and hee is thus called, because Assyria a Kingdome famous of old was under his Dominion, so that hee might be called King of Persia, or King of Assyria, as the French King, King of Nauarre. Touching any thing else done in the Reigne of this Darius the sacred History sayth nothing, but Herodotus noteth, how a foundation of warre with the Grecians was now layd, whereby in time the Monarchy of the Persians was overthrowne. There was one Hifticus, Prince of the Milesiens, who having done a good office for Darius in his return from Scythia, by keeping the bridge of Istym for him with his Army to passe over, was therefore bidden by the King to ask what he would and it should be granted him. He therefore asked a place neer Hellespont, called Mercimus, where he might build a City, and this being granted, hastned away about the Building. But Megabyfus a great Commander under Darius, being returned from his Wars, in which he had employed him, advised the King, that if Hifticus went forward in that Work, it would in time prove dangerous to the Persian State, because he was an industrious man, and the people thereabouts were rich, and well furnished with shipping, wherefore by his perswasion Darius sent for him under a pretence of love, to have him as a most faithfull friend and Counsellour about him. But Hifticus returning to the King, lest Aristagoras his Kinsman to govern in his stead, and after a while, secretly stirred him up to rebellion, signifying his minde upon the head of a man, whom he sent unto him so characterized, that he might understand his meaning. Aristagoras hereupon sought to stir up the Lacedemonians, but being by him rejected, he went to the Athenians, and prevailed with them, and the Ionians, peoples of Greece, so far that they joyning went against Sardis. Darius hearing of it, sent forces against them, and compelled them to return home, but yet they ceased not to fight against his people in other parts, till that with a great Army he overcame Aristagoras at Mileum, and he fleeing into Thracia, was slain there. And to Hifticus the King relating, how his people had dealt with him, he said, that all this had happened through his absence, wherefore, he desired of him, that he might be sent unto them again, and being gone, turned Captain of the Rebels. But after many battails fought, at length he was overcome by Harpagus a Persian, at Lesbos, and a great part of his Army slain, and he being taken was hanged, and his head being cut off sent to Susis to Darius, being powdered with salt, at the sight whereof he being offended, chid the actors, because they brought him not alive to his sight, and commanded the head to be washed and buried, as being the head of a friend, that had formerly deserved well of the Persians. By these examples we may see the end of such as are the authors of rebellion, vengeance at the last befalls them to the cutting of them off, according to their demerits.

Note.

After this Mardonius a kinsman of Darius was sent out with a mighty Army against the Athenians, thinking also to subdue all Grecia, but his Sea forces being destroyed to the number of 20000 by an extraordinary tempest, and his ships broken and battered, and he himself being in a fight by land wounded, hee returned into Asia. But certain years after this, Darius being perswaded by one Hippias, the son of Psistratus that fled from Athen to him, and put in minde by a servant daily of the wrongs done him by the Athenians at Sardis, whom hee had caused ever since to say these words once a day with a loud voyce unto him. O here! memento Atheniensium, rayled a great Army, whereof, removing Mardonius for his former ill successe, hee made Darius and Ariaphernes Leaders, commanding them to go against Eretria and Athen, and to bring them bound unto him. Then in a short time they subdued Eretria, being after six dayes fight betrayed unto them by two chief men of the City. After this they layled to Attica, and there being guided by Hippias to Marathon, a place most fit for horsemen, the Athenians came out thither to encounter with them, not being together with their assistants above 11000 men, under the conduct of ten chief Captaines, whereof Miltiades was one, but their enemies were according to some 60000, according to others 30000. The Athenians sent to the Lacedemonians for helpe, but they came not to ayd them, till after the Battell ended, out of their superstitious use not to go forth to battell, till the full Moon. The Athenian Captains at the first considering, how much they were overmatcht in number, were divided in their opinions, some being for fight, and some against it. But Miltiades, who was for giving battell to them prevailing, the government of the Army being committed to him, after some rites performed to their gods, hastened forth to meet the Persians who derided their rash attempt, as making none other account, but that they should easily overcome such an handful of men. But the Athenians although beaten before, the Persians in the middle Battell prevailed in both the Wings, and having put those to flight, that fought in the Wings of the Persian Army, contracted themselves into the middle and fought so valiantly, that at length they put their enemies in the middle Battell to flight also, and so pursued them to their ships, burning many of them. In this Battell fell scarce 200 of the Athenian Army, of the Persians 6300, according to Justine, 20000, Darius also, one of the chief Captains was slain, and Hippias, the Run-away, who was the instigator to this War. Pausanias also sayth, that in the fight there was seen a man in a Country habit with a ploughstaff, beating down many of the Barbarians, and then vanishing, which they accounted help sent unto them from their gods. Darius hearing of this overthrow of his Army was more enraged against Athen, and all Greece, and therefore prepared far greater forces, intending to go thither in person. The Egyptians also revolted from him at that time, whom he meant to subdue in the way. But his forces being in three or foure years prepared, hee dyed; having before his death declared his sonne Xerxes King. For he being aged, and intending so long and dangerous a Voyage, his sonnes fearing least he should dye before his return, and that then contention would arise about the Kingdome, desired him before his going to appoint one of them King after him. For he had two Breddes one of three sonnes, before he was King, and another of foure, after by Artasa, the daughter of Cyrus. The first-born of the three was Artabanes, the first of the foure Xerxes, the one pleaded his Birth-right, the other the Nobility of his Mother, and afterwards, that he was born to him, when hee was a King, the other when he was a private man, whereupon Darius made Xerxes King, and it being done, the eldest Brother did so acquiesce in his Fathers sentence, as Justine noteth, that there was no diminution of love by this means made between them, but the one did prosecute the other with as much kindnesse as ever before, an example to frame many Infirm.

Note.

Chri.

Christians, who are at continuall deadly feud one against another not for a mighty kingdom, as that was, but for a petty Patrimony, after sentence given against one of them. Xerxes being thus made king in the second yeare of his Reign, began to prepare a mighty Army to go against the Athenians, and all Greece, in which preparation, before all things were ready, he spent five years & then set forth, first, to Sardis, then to Hellepont, where the passage out of Asia into Europe was narrowest, viz. but 12 furlongs. His Army consisted of 230000 and more, according to Herodotus, and his ships were 600, with his company hee filled both Sea and Land, and where they came, they are sayd to have drunk up whole Rivers. At Sardis he was entertained by one Pythius a Sardian, and after abundance bestowed in entertayning him and his company, hee told him, that hearing of his preparation to passe into Europe to Warre, hee had prepared a summe of money, which he would give unto him, and being asked how much it was, he answered 2000 talents of silver, and 4400000 pieces of Gold, wanting 7000. Xerxes replying, but what wilt thou live upon? if thou givest all this away, he answered, his Slaves and his Vineyards would suffice for his mayntenance. Then Xerxes being delighted with the answer, not onely refused to take it, but commanded, that 7000 pieces of gold should be given him to make his gold up an even sum, which was done accordingly. But afterwards, before he was gone over Hellepont, the old man trusting to the favour which he thought now he had with him, intreated him to leave one of his five sonnes, which he had in his Army, at home with him for his comfort: the Tyrant was so enraged, that he rated him for being so bold to make such a demand, and commanded that sonne of his, whom he desired, to be forthwith cut in sunder, and to be laid one part of his body on the one side of the way, and the other on the other, where the Armie was to passe, to deter all others from the like attempt. Then he comming to Hellepont, caused a bridge of Boats to be made over the water, but being made, it was soon broken again, by the violence of the waves, for which he being wroth, put the overseers of the work to death, and out of his pride caused Hellepont to be beaten with 300 stripes. After this he set upon the same work again, and it being finished, passed over with his whole Armie, having first offered a drinke offering, out of a golden viall, and cast it into the sea to pacifie Hellepont again, which he had before chastened. Being gotten over, he came with his Army to Tempe, where was a straight passage between the great mountains Olympus and Ossa, in which had been placed 10000 Grecians from divers parts, a little before, to stop his passage, but being afraid of his huge Army, they were now gone, having first sent unto him earth and water, as the manner of the Persians was to require in token of subjection, wherefore all Thessaly, where this straight was presently yeilded unto him. But as he was to passe further into Greece, there was another way straiter then the former, to keepe which, Leonidas with 300 Lacedemonians came, and 5000 other Grecians. The King set his Medes first to fight with them, but they being slain by the Greeks, his Cassians fought next with them, and lastly, they being slain also, the most choicemen of his Persians, and when the darknesse of the night parted them for that day, they fought again with them next day, but with such ill successe, that the King despaired of winning the passage, till that by a certain Thracian he was told of another way over the mountains, by which he would lead his men, that they might come upon the backs of their enemies, to which he harkned, and next night sent 10000 of his valiant Persians that way. But the same night, Leonidas, having exhorted his men, they took and refreshed themselves with meat, and went together into the Kings Camp, and slew very many, seeking for Xerxes, till the arising of the day, at which the Persians, seeing how few they were, set upon them and slew them all. After this he went on without resistance, by land, great Cities and Towns being forsaken for fear of him, and all the best things carried out of their ships at sea, of which they had 200 and upward. His Navie therefore set upon them, but partly by a great Tempest, many of his ships were broken, and partly by the valour of the Grecians, vvho that time got the victory. Then the King himselfe leaving the Land, renewed his forces, and went to sea in person, but vvith as ill successe, for his Forces vvere again overthrowv, throvvn, vvhich strook such terrour into him, least the Grecian ships should hasten to Hellespont. and stop his passage home, that he forthvvith fled avway alone, leaving the government of his vvhole Armie to his Uncle Mardonius. Then Mardonius preparing his forces by Land, first, vvvent and took Athens, vvhich he might easily doe, because it vvvas left by the inhabitants, and sent to the Athenians, vvvhom he knevv to be most valiant, to try if by any means, or promise of great gifts he could dravv them to be associates vvwith the Persians, but they denying, he fired their City, and vvvent to fight against them, and the other Grecians, vvwho vvvere novv gathered together to the number of 110000, to fight for their Countrey at the City Platas. Here either Army deferring a time to come over a River to the other, because their Wizards on both sides, had forbidden it, as a signe of ill luck, at length, Mardonius, impatient of further delay, vvvent over. and vvvas overcome and slain, neither vvvere any of the vvvhole Army, which could be taken spared from death. And thus the rich Tents and spoyle of the Persians came into the hands of the Grecians, wherein were abundance of silver and Golden vessels, and tables and tressels of Silver and Gold with other riches inestimable. Pausanias the King forbad all men to take any of the spoyle; till part had been taken out to send to the Temples of their gods, then he caused a Supper to be prepared most sumptuously set forth according to the Persian manner, and another most frugall after the Grecian, to which he brought the Nobles and sayd, What fools were the Persians, when they lived in such abundance, to come into Greece to lose their lives in getting more? and having commended frugall living, and spoken against excessse, he parted the spoyle to each one according to his demerits, and the Athenians with their parts, fell to re-building of their ruined City, and finisht it in a short time. Xerxes being thus repulled out of Greece, attempted War against those parts no more, but growing slothfull and contemptible was at length slaine by Artabanus Captain of his Guard in his Bed, thinking by his owne greatnesse, and the help of his seven sons to obtain the Kingdome. Therefore, when hee had slain Xerxes, he hastned cunningly to his younger son Artaxerxes, and told him, that his elder Brother Darius had slain his Father, that he might the sooner come to the Crown, perswading him to revenge it, offering the helpe of the Guard to do it, that he might thus with one work both revenge his Fathers death, and also obtaine the Kingdome. Artaxerxes, hereupon, hasteneth with the Guard and doth execution upon his brother, then Artabanus thinking, that none now stood in his way but Artaxerxes to hinder him from the Kingdome, strook at him and wounded him, yet so lightly, that he returning upon the Traytour againe, ran him through and slew him. And then was he King, having the name of Longimanus, because one hand was larger then another, insomuch, that with it he could touch his knees standing upright.

CHAP. VII.

WHen Artaxerxes was King, then is the first mention made of Ezra, the Writer of this Book, how expert hee was in the Law of God, and in what great favour with the King, and this was in the seventh yeer of his Reigne, the fifth moneth, Verse 8. And this was after the Temple rebuilt 53, whereof 30 in the Reigne of Darius, 21 of Xerxes, and seven currant of Artaxerxes, and 78 after the returne of the first Captives in the days of Cyrus. And at this time, as Funecius noteth, the seventy Weeks spoken of, Dan. 9. did begin, seeing now and not before perfect liberty was restored to the Jews to rebuild, and inhabit the City of Jerusalem, whereas before they had liberty only to build the Temple, but not the City: for Verse 25. it is sayd from the going out of the word to build the City, &c. are seven weeks, and 62 weeks, wherefore those weeks of yeers are to begin, when Ezra was first licensed by the King, and obtained so great favour at his hands, and this was the first moneth of the yeare, according to the sacred account of the Jews, the 12 day of the moneth, and so determined when Christ his Passion began, as he reckoneth two days before the Pascheover, for them he Funecii Chronol.

Dan. 9. 25.

Vers. 1, 2.

Vers. 6.

Chrys. Hom. 8.
in Heb.
Theod. Prefat.
in Psal.

Hieron. Prefat.
in 12 Prophet.

Cyrill.

R. Abraham.

he prepared, there being not a day odde, but just 70 Weeks of years then expired. Some others begin them not till the 20 year of Artaxerxes, when Nehemiah was sent with authority to build the Wall of the City.

Touching Ezra, his Genealogie is first set down unto Aaron, in which are put in names, 1 Chron. 6. there be many more unto Seraiah, here said to be the father not of Ezra, for there are 20, and next unto him Jehozadak is put, and yet he was his only Progenitour more, but some others must come between, who are not named, seeing he is sayd to have been carryed captive into Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar, Verse 15. and the same is affirmed of Seraiah, the chief Priest, his father, 2 Kings 25. 18. and from that time, till this were passed 70 years of the Captivity, and since the first of Cyrus, where the Captivity ended, 92 being together, 162. This Ezra, thus descended of the chief Priests, is sayd to have been skilfull in the Law of God, which he gave by Moses; and to be prompt herein: Some set him further forth, as the restorer of all sacred Books which were lost and a Prophet, yea the same, who is otherwise called Malachiah, the last of the small Prophets. That he restored the holy Scriptures being all lost, hath been amongst some a common received opinion, but not true, as I have already shewed upon 2 Kings 25. 9. and Chrysostome sayth, that out of the remaynders of the Scriptures he composed them again, and Theodoret, that the Scriptures being depraved in the time of the Captivity were by Ezra again restored. For when the Temple was burnt, the Scriptures doubtlesse were but negligently kept, and there was need of some learned and industrious man to collect them together, and to purge them from corruptions, that might be crept into many copies, or rather into those few that were of divers parts of the Bible, wherefore God stirred up Ezra to doe this worthy Work, who diligently collecting all together, made perfect this necessary treasure of the Church. The Chronicles of the Hebrews sayth, That 120 of the great Synagogue were assembled together after the Captivity, for amending of the sacred Books after the Captivity, and that Jeshuah, Zorobabel, Mordecai, Ezra, Daniel, Nehemiah, and the three last of the small Prophets were over them. But how Zorobabel, that was Prince of the Jews 160 years before Ezra his time, and the rest of that time should be together with Ezra and Nehemiah, &c. I cannot see. For Ezra his being a Prophet, and otherwise called the Prophet Malachy, there are that affirme and confirme it, as Jerom, saying, That the Hebrews have held him to be the same, and that the words of the Prophet Malachy intimates the same, where he sayth, The Priests lips shall preserve knowledge, and hee is a Messenger of the Lord of hosts, where the word setting forth a Priest Messenger is Malak, and what Priests lips did so preserve knowledge, as his? Moreover, the time, sayth he, doth agree, being next unto Haggai and Zachary, after whom there were no mote Prophets till Christs comming, and the matter of Malachy inveighing against such, as sinned against the wife of their youth, whereas Ezra complaineth much of the like, and reformeth it, so likewise Remigius and Rupertus, and Ribera argueth for it, because in Ecclesiasticus 49. some being praised as excellent after the captivity, and Jeshuah, and Zorobabel, and Nehemiah, no mention is made of Ezra, but of the 12 small Prophets, so that if Ezra were not one of them, he being a man so famous, and of the same time, had injury done unto him, for that he was passed over in silence. But Cyrill denyeth, that he was Malachy, and so doth Lyra, Varablus, &c. because no certain argument can hence be drawn for it, and the Rabins, traditions are often found to be but their inventions, Saint Augustine also, and Chrysostome, distinguish him from Malachy, and R. Abraham speaketh of him as another man, in his Cabbala Historica, where he sayth, then dyed Ezra, Haggai, Zachariah and Malachiah, and so the gift of prophesying was taken away from Israel. Let the judicious reader follow whether of these he pleaseth, The King gave unto him, as the hand of his God, was upon him, all his petition, that is, God guiding him, as it were, with his hand to goe and aske of him, and the King to grant it. Some pretend another mediate cause, that is, his prophesying of victory to the King, in his expedition against the Egyptians, which fell out accordingly, for hereby Ezra came into such estimation with him, that hee favoured him so greatly, as here is shewed, and spake so magnifically of him. Yet others think, that it was only the estimation, in which he was had for his great learning and piety amongst his own Countrey-men, that made him famous, and so he came to be taken notice of by the King, so Josephus. However the Kings Letters do shew, that he was greatly affected towards him, for Verse 12. he therein entitleth him, The expert Priest of the Law of the God of Heaven, and giveth leave to all the people of Israel within his Dominions, that would go with him to Jerusalem, that he might there teach the Law of God, and to carry thither Silver and Gold, both which the King and his seven Counsellours offered, and any of the people of Israel inhabiting there, to buy Sacrifices therewith, &c. whereas, Verse 16. it is sayd, With all the Silver and Gold which thou findest in the Province of Babylon. This is to be understood, which any of his subjects would willingly contribute, namely, the Caldees, besides that which the Jews in all parts should give. For, as Lyra hath it, there were probably many, who by converting with the Jews, came to the knowledge of the true God, and therefore would contribute to this work of his worship, and many Jews, who being now settled with their Families in those parts could not return, yet sent their gifts for the promoting of this service. Moreover, the King put into this his Decree that his Receivers in those parts should furnish him with all other necessities even unto 100 talents of silver, 100 Cores or measures of Corne, 100 baths of Wine, and 100 baths of Oyle, &c. And he ordained, that all Priests, Levites, Singers, and Nethinims serving about the Temple should be free from all tribute, and yet of these there were many thousands. Here it is to be noted, that Heathen Kings being guided only by the light of Nature thought it fit to free the servants of God, who attended continually upon his worship, from taxes, which were imposed upon others, and somewhat like unto this did Pharaoh to his Priests in the time of famine. Therefore Christian Kings should much more make the Church free, as did Edward the third by his Charter, and many other Kings of this Land, and to take away any privileges of the Clergy cannot but be counted a sin against the light of nature. Wherefore a care ought to be had by the higher powers, when the necessity of the Kingdom requires taxes to be imposed upon all, to shew them some favour. The Nethinims according to Josephus, were such as in Joshuah his time were given unto the Levites to serve under them in hewing of wood and drawing of water for all the Congregation. Lastly, the King also gave power to Ezra to constitute Judges and Priests to teach in all parts of the land, adding severe penalties to such, as should refuse to obey his Constitutions. Ezra having this great encouragement, published, as Josephus sayth, and is most probable, the Kings Letters through out all Media, whereupon many gathered together unto him both Priests and people with no small joy, bringing their goods with them to ascend to Jerusalem. Yet none returned with him, but of the two Tribes of Judah and Benjamin, innumerable multitudes of the other ten Tribes still tarrying behind, which were and still are beyond Euphrates. Then they began to take their journey the first moneth of the yeare, and came to Jerusalem the fifth moneth, which was in the seventh yeare of King Artaxerxes, the first day of the moneth: or rather it being propounded by Ezra, the first of the first moneth to return, when in ten days they had prepared for it, they set forward the 12 day of the moneth, as is precisely noted, Chap. 8. 31.

*Joseph. lib. 11.
cap. 5.*

Lyra.

Note.

Josephus.

See upon *chap.
1. 7. 8.*

Verse. 5.

CHAP. VIII.

Here they are named, who were the chiefe that ascended with Ezra to Jerusalem, and their Families numbred, viz. 1514. in 12 Companies, and then in three Companies more 258, being altogether, 1772. The place, in which they met was by the River of Ahava, otherwise called Euphrates, as most hold, or Perath, as the Hebrews. At this place Ezra numbring the people found that there were no Levites come: Wherefore hee sent certain teachers to Iddo the chiefe in Caspia. This sayth Lyra, is commonly held to have been the place of the Caspian Mountains, beyond which the ten Tribes were carryed captive by Salmanasar

Ver. 1, 2, &c.

Verse. 16, 17.

Lyra.

2 Kings. 17.

2 Chron. 11.

Vers. 18, 19.

Vers. 20.

Iunius.

Vers. 21.

Vers. 24, 25.

Vers. 33, 34.

Vers. 35, 36.

King of Assyria, being in Media. But he rejecteth this, both because there were no Levites amongst them, seeing they left the Kingdome of Israel, and came all of them into the Kingdome of Judah in Ieroboams time, and there continued, till the ten Tribes were carryed away, whence it followeth, that they were carryed with Judah and Benjamin, and lived amongst the men of those Tribes in their Captivity: and also because those parts were so far off, that Levites could not have bene fetcht from thence in so short a time, as was taken for this journey, viz. seven or eight days. For to the River they came the first day of the moneth, and these were not sent for till three days after, and when they were brought a stay was still made there to keep a Fast, after which the vessels dedicated unto the house of the Lord were weighed to certain Priests to deliver at Ierusalem, and yet upon the 12 day of the same moneth they began their journey towards Ierusalem, wherefore he subscribeth rather to R. Solomon, who sayth, that Caspia was a place in Babylon, not far off, where many Levites remayned, of whom Ido was the chiefe, and because these came not to go up to minister in the house of the Lord, but only some Priests were there ready to take their journey with Ezra, he sent for a certain number of them, who were accordingly sent unto him together with many Nethinims, viz. 18. Levites of one Family, and 20 of another, and of Nethinims 120. And so there remayned still in Babylon many of them, who never returned, and millions of the ten Tribes about the Caspian mountains. Thus Lyra, but Iunius following the more common received opinion, sayth, that the place, from whence they came was situated in the upper part of Media, between Armenia and Horcasia, and that having the Kings Letters they might well be furnisht to travaile this great journey with swift beasts in so short a time, which yet I cannot see, how, because they were so many, and to provide to bring them all with such speed must needs asketime, besides the time of the messengers going and their coming. But to the other Caspia, which was but 680 miles from Ierusalem, and so not full 80 miles from the place in which they were, they might, if they made hast, goe and come in the compasse of the time before spoken of. For that it was not 80 miles from them may be gathered, because it was no further from thence to Ierusalem, then from Babylon, as hath been already shewed upon Chap. 2.

Then Ezra proclaimed a Fast, that God might be moved to keep them in their travail, for he was ashamed to ask a Guard of the King, because he had used speeches employing security under Gods protection, and so they came all safely to Ierusalem, the first day of the fifth moneth, chap. 7. 9. that is in 12 days lesse, then four moneths. But before he set forward on this journey, hee weyed the Gold and Silver and vessels given for the Lords house by the King and his Counsellours, and Princes, and by the Israelites to certain Priests, both of the chief and others in number 22, and then they took and carryed and delivered all at the Lords house in Ierusalem, after which they that returned offered many whole burnt offerings, and shewed the Kings Letters to the Princes beyond the River, that they might not molest, but deliver unto them necessities for the Works, that they should set upon.

CHAP. IX.

Vers. 1.

When things were brought to this passe, and now by the coming of this great Priest, who was armed with so great authority, all seemed to be well with the Jews, behold, another occasion of sorrow is offered. The Princes came unto him, and told him of the unlawfull marriages which many had made with the daughters of Idolaters, and that not onely of the common sort, but even of the Priests and Levites, and they say, that they had not separated themselves from the people of the land, and from their abominations, that is, of the Canaanite, the Perizzite, &c. Thus the vulgar Latine, but Iunius, according to the abominations of the Canaanite, &c. and so it is in Hebrew, the sense is the same, in not separating they did according to their abominations, and so separated not from them seeing, this very thing, the marrying with such wives was ababominable, as being against the expresse charge given, Dent. 7. and the very high-way to Idolatry, in so much as that it may be thought, that these were not cleare here-from by reason of their wives. But because they are taxed here for nothing else but marrying strange wives, and yet are spoken of as being according to their abominations: Note, that it is not a small evil, but an heathenish abomination, for any of the people of God to marry with such, he makes the member of Christ, the member of a spirituall harlot, which God abhorreth:

Note.

Touching these marriages, the Hebrews have a tradition; that some of their wives, wearied with the length of the journey, grew sick, and some were so worn out with travell and deformed, that they put them away and tooke others of these Nations which pleased them better, and this they say was the reason of Malachiah his invective against them, for sinning against the wives of their youth, and putting them away, Chap. 2. 14, 15, 16. for him they hold to be Ezra. But for so much as many of these wives had borne them children, as appeareth Chap. 10. and this could not be in foure moneths, which was the time of their journey. Lyra well rejecteth this tradition, as a vain imagination: and it is said, that the very Princes and Presidents had done so, and Chap. 10. 18. the Priests and Levites themselves.

Ezra hearing this was greatly grieved, and rent his garments, and pluckt the haire of his beard, as men used to doe when they were much stricken with sorrow, to expresse their indignation at the vilenesse of the fact, and in way of humiliation to move the Lord to forgive, and to make others, beholding it, to be the more affected with the sin. And in this dejected manner, he sate untill the evening sacrifice, all they that trembled at this sin comming about him. Then the time of evening Prayer being come, when a Lamb used daily to be offered in sacrifice, according to the Law, Exod. 29. 39. He kneeled down and prayed, and confessed the sins of the people, so as if he himselfe had sinned together with them, because he was a member of the same politike body, and in danger of Gods judgements together, unless they were by his humiliation averted. And first having confessed what they had done of old, both Princes, Priests and People, and how they had been therefore delivered into the hands of their enemies, he in the next place acknowledging how mercie wrought against justice, or moderated justice so, that they were not all destroyed, but a remnant were saved and brought out of captivity, that they might have a naile or pin in the Lords house, alluding to the pin, unto which the main post of a Tent is fixed, meaning that they might be at some good and comfortable stay again) and that in this state they had been but a very little while through the favour of the Persian Kings, that they might build the waste places of the Lords house, and set them up some fence, the vulgar Latine, hope, the Septuaginta wall, and it is not unlikely, but that since the first returning of the Jews, they set up by stealth some kind of wall, although but like a fence about a vineyard. Having acknowledged this, I say, to the praise of God he confesseth further, that since this little time of comfort begun, that is, since the return in the dayes of Cyrus, they had provoked God anew by marrying strange wives of that land, which made him greatly ashamed. Lyra following the vulgar Latine, having for these words, And now when for a moment favour is done to us by the Lord our God, and now for a little, a moment, our prayer hath been made unto the Lord, giveth a double exposition hereupon. 1 When we have not long, or much, but a little sought it. 2 So few being returned, of all that were carryed away, viz. onely of two Tribes. But he hath plainly respect unto the time of their obtaining favour, which by this sin they took a courte, might not continue long, unless they presently departed from it. Lastly, Alleaging the streight charge given by God against it, he concludeth with praise to God, and shame to the people, seeing this sin could neither be denied nor justified.

Vers. 3.

Vers. 6.

Vers. 7.

Vers. 8.

Vers. 9, 10.

Lyra.

Vers. 11, 12.

13;
14, 15.

CHAP. X.

Vers. 1, 2.

WHen Ezra had ended his confession made with the people, both men and women weeping about him, Shechaniah said unto him, we have sinned, but now there may be some hope in this matter. Therefore let us make a Covenant, &c. The Vulgar Latine for these words, there may be some hope, hath, If there be repentance in Israel, let us make a Covenant, but in Hebrew it is, There is hope to Israel in this matter, meaning, because they were all full of sorrow and penitent, therefore who this Shechaniah was I finde not, but onely that he was a Prince amongst the people, who in the name of all confessed their guiltinesse, and exhorteth to the making of a Covenant, of putting all such wives away (that Gods anger might be averted) and the children borne by them. Onely it appeareth by the catalogue of those that had married strange wives here following, ver. 26. that he was none of them, because his name is not in amongst the sonnes of Elam, of which family he was: He was therefore most probably a godly man, and when he confessed this sin, did it but as Ezra had done before, as a member of the same body, in which regard the most innocent is not without guiltinesse, till that by humiliation and sorrow he obtaineth forgiveness.

Vers. 4.

In what place and authority he was, may be gathered, ver. 4. where he telleth Ezra, that it belonged to him to doe this, and promiseth him assistance. And because he spake so unto him, it appeareth that Ezra the High Priest had now the principality, as also by the Kings letter unto him, whereby he set him over all in those parts. Then Ezra arose and sware the Princes, or chief of the Priests, Levites, and all Israel to doe thus, so they were bound by oath, or vow, which none may dare to break. Then Ezra went into the chamber of Iehohanan the sonne of Elsaph, he was one of the Princes of the Priests, and with him and others, he having most probably consulted there, a Decree was sent out through Judah and Ierusalem, that all should come together to Ierusalem within three dayes, upon pain of losing all their goods, and being cast out from the congregation. Hereupon all assembled together, the 20 day of the 9 moneth, and being moved by Ezra to confess their sin, and to put away their strange wives, they promised so to doe, but because much time would be requisite to set it down by every one, and it was then wet and cold, Officers were appointed to set it down in all parts, with all convenient speed, & accordingly it was performed by the first day, of the first moneth, of the next year, being begun the first of the tenth moneth, and that was in three moneths, and the number that had thus sinned was 113, whereof 28 of the Priests and Levites, with whom it seemeth, Malac. 2. 8, 9, 10, 11, &c. that God was most offended, because when their lips should have preserved knowvledge, and they should have been a guide to others, they contrariwise gave an ill example, and maintained the lawfulness of these promiscuous marriages, so it may seem they are brought in, arguing for them, ver. 9, 10. They that hold Hester to have been taken to wife by this Artaxerxes, place her marriage with him about this time, viz. the eighth year of his reigne, and so betwixt this and his 13 year, bring in the rest of the History of Hester, but of this more when I come to that Book it selfe. From Ezra his example, bevvailing the sins of the people, and fasting therefore, we should learn to be likewise affected with the sins of others, and not with our own onely, and to pray for the forgiveness of them, and to seeke their reformation.

Vers. 5.

Vers. 6.

Vers. 7, 8.

Vers. 9, 10.

Vers. 16, 17.

Note.

NEHE-

NEHEMIAH, CHAP. I.

Here being nothing of note recorded more since the eighth year of Artaxerxes, it is here shewed, that in the 20 yeare of his Reigne, Nehemiah the Kings Butler, but a Jew hearing of the evill case in which his Brethren were in Jerusalem, and that the Wall of the City remayned broken down, obtained leave to go and build it.

The words of Nehemiah the son of Hilkiab. Hereby it appears, that this Book was written by him, as also sayth R. Solomon. Hee had notice of this in the moneth Casseu, which was the same amongst the Caldees, with our November. If it shall seeme strange, that the Jews having been so long there, and having had one King before, viz. Darius to favour them besides Cyrus, and now Artaxerxes 13 years, since his sending of Ezra over to them, had not by this time done any thing towards the building of the Walls of the City: it is answered by Lyra, that they had no leave hitherto given them, but only to build the Temple. For first, Zerubbabel was sent to do this by Cyrus, then there being an interruption by enemies, untill the Reigne of Darius, hee sent likewise to have the Temple built and it was finished, lastly, Artaxerxes sent Ezra to instruct the people, and to provide, that the service of God in the Temple might be duly performed, and the Common-wealth there well governed, but for the building of the Walls of the City no order was yet taken. Wherefore howsoever, as was said before upon Ezra 7. Funccius will have the 70 Weeks of Daniel begin, Anno 7 of this King, yet they are not indeed to be begun till this 20 yeare, because no Decree to build the City came out, till now, so also many grave Authors should, as Inlinus Africanius, alleaged by Ierome, Beda lib. 3. allegi interpr. in Ezram. Rupertus cap. 15. in Dan. Theodoretus Orat. 9. in Dan. Comestor, &c.

Nehemiah hearing of the evill case, wherein the City and the people were, wept, for being without a Wall, sayth Comestor, Thieves came in the night and slue many of them: and fasted and prayed, and then three moneths after, viz. in the moneth Nisan, that is in our March, the same 20 yeare of the King, he petitioned for leave to go and build the Walls of Jerusalem, and prevailed, so that the many days spoken of, wherein he mourned and fasted to prepare to the effectuall offering of his Petition were no lesse then three moneths. Pellican contrary to all others, that I have seen, by Artaxerxes Will have none other understood, but Darius whom he maketh next successeur to Cyrus, and in the sixth yeare of whose Reigne the Temple was finished, and Ezra sent over in his seventh, and Nehemiah in his 20. But to passe this over, as his manifest errour, the place, wherein Nehemiah was, when he did thus, was Susa, the Metropolitan City of Persia, built by Darius Hystaspis for his Winter habitation, as Ecbatana was for the Summer.

I also have sinned and my fathers house, to obtain mercy, he confesseth the sins of the people, and his own sins: for the best are not without sin; although Lyra sayth, that he confessed his own sins, but only as a member of the same body, hee himselfe being innocent, but the Jewish people, of whom hee was one, were wicked. But because he nameth himself and his fathers house a part, as bearing a part in the sins whereby God was provoked, it is rather to be held, that hee spake thus, as acknowledging himself to be a sinner, as indeed even the best are. And in his beginning with confession, we are taught the only way to prevaile for mercy, that is, to lay open our misery and wickednesse before him that can heale us, as the sick patient before the skilfull Physician.

Vers. 1.

Lyra

Vers. 4.

Chap. 2. 1.

Pellican

Chap. 2. 6.

Lyra

Vers. 7.

Vers. 8.

Vers. 10.

Vers. 11.

We have not observed the Precepts, Statutes, and Judgements. The Laws of God given by Moses are here distinguished into three sorts, Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall, against all which he confesseth that they had sinned. But withall he recounteth the promise of God made to Moses, viz. That if for their sins they were dispersed to the uttermost parts, yet upon their repentance they should be brought back again, Deut. 30. 2, 3, 4. And this although it were long agoe fulfilled in the dayes of Cyrus, who gave them leave to return, and of Darius, who established the same decree, and of this Artaxerxes, who added to the favours formerly done unto them, in sending Ezra 13 years agoe, yet it was not fully done according to every clause of the promise, which was also to doe good unto them, and to increase them more, and to make them excellent, Deut. 30. 5, 9. For they were now in reproach, and in much misery, as Hanani related unto him, ver. 3. and they had not yet attained to their ancient splendour of their City, in the high and strong walls thereof, because they still lay ruinous ever since, that in the dayes of Nebuchadnezzar they had been broken down. And this most probably made them a scorn to their enemies dwelling about them, of whose hatred a hint was given before, Ezra 4.

Then he addeth a remembrance of that which God had formerly done for them in bringing them out of Egypt by his most mighty power, the glory of which would be obscured, if he should not now goe further to bring their state begun to be amended to more perfection.

Lastly, He concludeth as he began, with earnest calling for audience, and for blessing upon the means which he was now about to use, viz. Petitioning to the King, for leave to goe and build the walls of Jerusalem, to whom he intimateth how easily he might have access, because he was his Cup-bearer, that came daily before him.

CHAP. II.

Vers. 1.

Vers. 2.

Lyra.

Vers. 3.

Vers. 3.

IN the moneth Nisan, when wine was to be brought in to the King, &c. Three moneths being past since Nehemiah prepared for this, as Hester prepared herselfe three dayes, to come and petition for her people by fasting. Now hee comes with a sad countenance to doe his office before the King, that he might take occasion to speake unto him first, and so he might have opportunity to make his request. Haply he deferred thus long, that the winter being past, which was unfit for this worke, he might immediately, having leave, go about it, for Nisan was the first moneth of the yeare, answering to March, by the Hebrews called Abd. When he came to give the King wine, he put upon him a sad countenance, which he used not to doe, thereupon the King asked the reason, and then Nehemiah was much afraid, that is, as Lyra hath it, least by the change of his countenance he should have suspected, that he meditated to doe him some mischief. For they who machinate the death of Princes, can hardly doe it without some change and palenesse appearing in the face, because the heinousnesse of so great a wickednesse strikes their hearts. Therefore Nehemiah to put all such suspicion out of the Kings minde, cryeth out immediately, O King, live for ever! that is, I am so far from meditating any treachery against thy life, that I wish thee a long and happy life. Then he sheweth that the thing which affected him with so much grief, was the desolation of Jerusalem, the place of the Sepulchres of his fathers, which he thus setteth forth to move the King the more, seeing even the Gentiles loved to have the places where their Ancestours lay buried fairly built, but specially the Egyptians, who when they dwelt in poor houses living, yet had fair monuments for their dead bodies to lie in, because they thought them to be their habitations for ever these but for a short time. And what account the Jews made of buriall places, appears where our Lord compares the Pharisees to whitened Sepulchres, which were fair outwardly, &c. The King hearing his answer asked him what his request was, as being now so far from conceiving any anger upon any suspicion that he inclines to grant him his desire, so easily doth the Lord turne

the

the Kings heart, as the rivers of water, as Lyra noteth. But it seemeth, that his heart was before this towards Nehemiah, in that, as Pellican observeth, having so many Nobles, he chose Nehemiah to this Office about him, rather than any of them, and of his good will to the Jews, hee had given large testimony before in sending Ezra, so as he did, Ezra 7.

Then he having prayed to God sayd, &c. that is, in his heart by short ejaculation, that the King might by the motion of his spirit be brought to favour his petition. He, that is, Artaxerxes having heard it to be for leave to go and build Jerusalem, asked only, how long time hee would desire for this work. And it is sayd, the King asked him and the Queen, or his Wife sitting by him, but Lyra, that it might not be doubted, whether both asked the same question, will have the signification of the Hebrew text to run thus, and the Queene sat by him, but indeed the word is יושבה a participle sitting, but in the same sense, for her sitting by only is intended to be shewed, when the King spake, and not her speaking also, and therefore when Nehemiah had set the time, which is not here expressed, but chap. 5. 14. it appears to be 12 years, it is said only of the King, that it seemed good unto him to let Nehemiah go. Then he being animated by this grant, desired also a safe conduct, and timber out of the Kings Forest in those parts for the building of doores to the house of the Lord, and a Towre for more safety neer unto it, and the wall of the City, and an house for him to go into, that is, to dwell in, sayth Lyra, a common Hall or Shire-house, wherein hee might sit and judge Causes, that should be brought before him, sayth Junius, and it is most probable, for both purposes. And all this was granted also. The Princes beyond the River were those beyond Euphrates, to whom he desired, that Letters of safe-conduct might be written, namely, the Princes of Syria. But for any thing, that should now need building about the house of the Lord, it should seem strange, seeing Ezra but 13 years before had a large grant made unto him to do all things about the house, which he thought good. Some think, that it was to build the Porch higher, some to repair it being now again decayed, but the Hebrew text having it to board or cover the Palace, which is by the Temple, or house, it seemeth rather, to be meant of the Kings Palace, which stood neer unto the Temple. And it is to be noted, that when hee desired timber out of the Kings Forest, the word Paradise is used, by which name probably Lybanus was meant, as most abounding with timber, and for the delight, which the King took in it, kept as a Garden. Then Nehemiah went and gave the Letters to the Princes, &c. Josephus sayth, the next day he took his journey and delivered his Letters to Saddens Governour of Syria, Phoenicia, and Samaria.

And it is sayd, that Sanballat the Choronite hearing this, and Tobiah servant of the Ammonites, they were much grieved. These sayth Junius, were both Toparks, or Governours of Provinces under the Persian Kings, the one of the Moabites, the other of the Ammonites, the last being set forth by the name of a servant, because a vassall to this King, as indeed the other also was, but this is left to be understood of him by this name given to one. Pellican and some others by Sanballat and Tobiah understand Princes of the Samaritans, who were always hitherto noted to have been most envious against the Jews. But because one is expressly called an Ammonite, that of Junius is to be preferred, because the Jews had more enemies besides the Samaritans, and Moabites, and Ammonites, especially.

When Nehemiah was come to Jerusalem, and had spent three dayes there in refreshing himselfe after so great travell, as Ezra before had done, Ezra 8. 32. and visiting friends. He went out in the night with a few men to view the wals, keeping his intention yet secret, till he saw, what possibility there was of effecting it, and that the rumour of it might not be spread abroad amongst the enemies, till the work was in doing. And he sayth, that he went by the gate of the valley, that is, where that gate anciently stood, but now only a passage with ruines on each side, and it was Westward, and had the name from the valley, because sayth Junius, it stood at the foot of the Hill, whereupon the upper City was built. The Septuagint of Sixtus calleth it, portam Galila, that is, the Gate of dead mens skuls, because in the valley without there was the place, in which they were layd. Then

Lyra.
Pellican.

Verf. 4.

Verf. 6.

Lyra.

Verf. 7, 8.

Lyra.
Junius.

Verf. 9.
Josephus.

Verf. 10.
Junius.

Pellican.

Verf. 11.
Verf. 12.

Verf. 23.

Vers. 14.

Chap. 3. 15.

Vers. 15.

Vers. 17, 18.

Josephus.

Vers. 20.

to the fountain of the Serpent, Vulgar Latine, Before the fountain of the Dragon, Junius thinks that it was so called, from the slow running of the water there, and that it was the pool Siloe, F. say 8. 6. said to run tofily, then to the gate of the dung-hills, that is, on the East part where the brook Kedron ran, and washt away the filth of the City, brought out to that place. Here he brake off a piece of the wall, to try the foundnesse or unsoundnesse of that which remained of it, that he might know whether it should need to be all pulled down, that a new foundation might be laid, or whether it might be built upon. Then he went to the gate of the fountain, and to the Kings fyst pool, where there was no room for the ruines, for his beasts that he rode on, to passe. The gate of the fountain was that saith Junius, whereby men went out to the pool Siloe and Kogel. Here because he could not ride on, he was forced to fetch a compasse, and so came up by the further side of the brook, till he returned again by the same gate, at which he went out.

But to the Rulers he saith, that he had not yet shewed his intent, that is, to the Presidents placed there by the Persian Kings, or to the Priests or common people of the Jews, or the overseers of the work. But now having secretly viewed all, he stirred them up to building, shewing them what had passed between him and the King for their encouragement: And this he did, sayth Josephus, calling them together into the Temple, and his exhortation took such effect, that with all cheerfulness, they presently fell to the work. But when Sanballat, Tobias, and Geshem the Arabian heard, they mocked at us, and despised us, &c. Here besides Sanballat and Tobias, mention is made of an Arabian, that is, the Teparch of Arabia, who together sought to discourage them from this work, calling it a rebellion against the King. This derision of the Heathen, is again spoken of Chap. 4. Now, they coming to Ierusalem, when they heard what they went about, then at home amongst themselves, when the work went forward. For now Nehemiah answered them, as present, saying, The God of heaven will prosper us, and we his servants will rise and build, but yee have no part, &c. He vouchsafed not so much as to tell them of the Kings licence, so little did he feare them, but shakes them up as having nothing to do with this work about Ierusalem, seeing it was not within any of their Principalities, but the government of that place was now committed unto him.

CHAP. III.

Vers. 1.

Junius.Lyra.

Then Eliafib, the chief Priest and his Knafmen built the gate of the flock, &c. This gate, sayth Junius, was on the South part in a valley before the Temple, where a Market used to be kept to sell sheepe for the service of the Temple, see more of it, Iohn. 5. 2. there was the pool of Bethesda, Lyra addeth moreover, that by this gate, the cattell which were for sacrifice were brought in. And that their proceeding in building, might be the more distinctly understood, he observeth that there were about Ierusalem three walls, within the innermost of which dwelt the King and the Priests: within the second, the Nobles and Prophets: and within the third, Artificers and other sorts of people: and therefore the relation of the building, beginneth first with the outermost wall, wherein were six gates, and then proceeding to the second, ver. 19. where Heser the sonne of Ieshuab is said to have built the second measure, that is, the second or middle wall: lastly, to the third wall, ver. 28. where it is said to be above, and it is begun with the horse gate. That gate which was nearest to the Temple, the Priests began first to build, to give example to the rest, and not onely the gate, but also the wall to the centenary Tower, and the Tower of Hanael, that is, according to the signification of the word, most probably, 100 Cubits. And they are said, when they had finished the gate, to have sanctified it, that is, according to some, to have adorned it, and made it most beautifull, but according to others better, to have sanctified it by prayer, from thence forward to be counted holy, as an appurtenance of the Temple, or rather feasting and offering sacrifice, when they had finished it, as was wont to be done, when a new house was built, and it it was dedicated. Next unto the Priests built the men of Iericho, that is, the wall, as some think, because that part was right over against their City. But the Fishgate built the sons of Hassenaah: This was so called, sayth Lyra, because fishes coming from the sea, were brought in at it: but now it is called the gate of David, because it vvas nigh unto Sion, his City, but by the Sea understood, the Sea of Galilee.

Then built the men of Teknah, that is, of that place, of vvhich Amos vvas, but their Nobles would not put their neck to the worke of their God. The great ones of Teknah are thus branded to their disgrace, vvhhen those of an inferiour condition, did all put their hands to a good vvorke, such as the building of the vvall of the City of God vvas, for vvhich it is called the vvorke of their God, yet they did nothing, vvhio indeed ought to have been the forwardest, and to have done most, as they vvere most to God obliged. But it oft times falleth out thus, that the meaner sort shew most love and zeale, vvhhen the greater are cold, and doe nothing to further a good cause, and so it vvas under the Gospel, Not many Noble were called.

The old gate built, Joada the sonne of Phasheah, &c. This, sayth Lyra, vvas otherwise called the Gate of Iudgement, and here the old gate, because the Elders sate here in judgement: some think that it vvas called the old gate, because it had in part continued ever since the Jebusites time, and lead into the old City of Salem.

From henceforward are sayd to have built Melathiah the Gibeonite; Iadon the Meronothite, the Gibeonites, and the men of Mizpah, even to the throne of the Prince on this side the River, according to Iunius his reading. But the vulgar Latine, For the Captain, which was in the Region beyond the River, expounded by Lyra, as being set a work by him although an Heathen, for the good will, which he bare to this work; whereby it should seem, as Pellican gathereth, that he was a Profelyte. Hebrew it is לְכֶסֶת מֶלֶךְ עֵבֶר הַזֶּה to the throne of the Prince beyond the River. But if wee take כֶּסֶת, as Pellican doth for a proper name, and so read it, unto the Prince Chisse beyond the River, it must be understood, unto that part, which he being a Prince of the Persians beyond Euphrates, yet out of his piety was at the charge to build. If with Iunius wee should understand, to the throne of the Prince; that is to the Hall, where the seat of judgment stood, what reason can be yielded of adding these words, beyond, or on this side the River, certainly none.

Then speaking of the building of Huzziel and Chananiah, he sayth, they left Ierusalem where soever the wall was broad, as Iunius reads it, giving this for the sense, they were not carefull about repaying the middle Wall, whereby the upper City was divided from the nether. The vulgar Latine, they dismissed Ierusalem even to the wall of the broader street, which Pellican expoundeth only by saying, that there was a spacious place for a Market or Faire to be kept, Lyra, they dismissed Ierusalem, that is, they extended the Wall thereof. Hugo Cardinalis, they built the outward Wall so farre, as till they came, where the City was most spacious and of greatest compassse. Hebrew, they left Ierusalem even to the broad wall, that is, as it seemeth rather to me, they built so far, or went on so far in building, that they brought their work past the City on one side to a Wall, that because of the greater thicknesse and strength remayned hitherto undemolished, and so needed no building, which happily might be that, which Hzziah built so strong, 2 Chron. 26. 9. and because of the strength more labour being required to beat it downe, the Caldees weary of the worke in demolishing the rest left it untouched.

Next built Rephaias Governour over half the tract of Ierusalem, that is, sayth Iunius, that part which belonged to Judah, the vulgar Latine, Prince of a street of Ierusalem, but Hebrew, it is of the half division of Ierusalem, by some understood of half a street, because Shallum is sayd to have been Prince of the other halfe, Verse 12. but Iunius will have that other half to be understood of that part of the City, which belonged to the Benjamites, that is, the North part. Now Rephaias is sayd to have built next unto Chenaniah, because, although there was a Verf. 2.

Verf. 3.
Lyra.

Verf. 5.

Note.

I Cor. 1. 26.

Verf. 6.
Lyra.
Comestor.
Sallianus.

Verf. 7.

Iunius.

Lyra.
Profelyte.

Verf. 8.
Iunius.

Pellican.
Lyra.

Verf. 9.
Iunius.

- space betwixt their two buildings of the broad Wall, which needed no building, yet none came between them.
- Verf. 10. At his side built Jedaiah, right over against his own house, he being most probably assigned to that part, because it was thought, that he would build the stronger for his own security.
- Verf. 11. In the other measure repaired Malchia the son of Charim, &c. that is, sayth Iunius, so much by measure; as Chattushlast before spoken of had done. The vulgar Latine, the middle part built Malchia, which Pellican knoweth not, whether to expound of the wall or of the street, and if of the wall, whether of that before passed over, it being meant, that whereas it needed some repaying, he did that. But because it is not in Hebrew, the middle part, but the other measure, it is to be thought, that Iunius expounds it best of the like quantity. And by some it is conceived, that there was a space of wall betwene to Towres, to which this second measure hath reference, and of this when the three before going had built part, the two following named in this Verse built as much by measure, and the other Towre of Furnaces or Ovens also.
- Verf. 12. Next built Shallum another Prince over the other half tract, &c. and his daughters. How this is to be understood, see before upon, Verse 9. and his daughters are spoken of, as his heirs, because he had no sons, and the work being by him begun, haply he dyed, and left it to his daughters to finish.
- Verf. 13. The gate of the valley built Chanum, together with the inhabitants of Zanoach, &c. Of the gate of the valley see before, Chap. 2. 13, as also of the gate of dunghills here named, being 1000 Cubits of.
- Verf. 14. The gate of the dunghills built Melchias the sonne of Rechab, Prince of the street Bethacharem. Of the Rechabites, read Ier. 35. how abstemious they were, and observant of their fathers precepts in their rigid living. Of them the Effees are thought to have come that dwelt afterwards in this street, and from them the gate was called the gate of the Effees. The street, that this Prince was over, sayth Pellican, had the name from Vines, which, it seemeth, abounded there, for Charem signifieth a Vineyard, and Beth an house, of which it is compounded.
- Verf. 15. And the gate of the fountain built another Sellum, of which before, Chap. 2. 14. here was a Conduit to convey the water, it being next unto mount Zion, or the City of David. After him built Nehemias, that is another of this name, being Prince over half the street Bethzur, which Pellican sayth, is not to be understood of a street in Ierusalem, but of the Towne Bethzur: but it was plainly a street called by this name. And his work was drawn over against the Sepulchers of David, and the fish-pool built with great cost, that is, of Hezekiah, 2 King 20. 20. even to the house of the valiant, that is, sayth Iunius, where the Warders of the City of David kept, Lyra, where the Worthies of David and other successively of the most valiant, who were there trained up to feats of Armes, that they might be ready and the more fit upon all occasions to defend the City.
- Verf. 16. Then built Hefer the Governour of Mafeph another, or second measure. Here sayth Lyra, beginneth the building of the second or middle Wall; but Pellican will have nothing else meant by the second measure, but that the wall to be built being divided by equal measures, whereof one man was to build one and another another, this Hefer not contenting himself to build one only, builded two of them. But it is not sayd, he built two measures, but the second, wherefore that of Lyra seemeth more probable especially because these words the second measure are often used (from henceforward) but seldom in speaking of the Wall hitherto built, right over against the ascent to the Armory Mikzohah, that is, sayth Iunius, to a Towre or Munition, in a most high place of the City of David, called Mikzohah, as also 2 Chron. 26. 9. from the cragginess thereof. But Mikzohah signifieth a corner, and therefore it may better be rendred, the ascent of the corner Armory, seeing the word Nesbak here used, signifieth Armes, the vulgar Latine, the ascent of the most firme corner, so called, sayth Lyra, because two walls met here, and so it was most thick and strong. But thus the reason of the strength of this place, is not all shewed, for it was because a Towre stood here wherein Armes lay.
- Verf. 19. After him built with a burning mind Baruc, so Iunius, vulgar Latine, upon the Mount
- Verf. 20.

Mount, built Baruck. But the word הר here used doth not signifie any thing else but wrath or fury, and therefore it may best be read, cholericke or wrathfull Baruck, entered the gate of the house of Eliashib, the High-Priest not, as some conceive to a gate of the City, supposing that the High-Priest had dwelt so, as that the entrance by that gate had been into the High-Priests house: but to the gate of his house, which was doubtlesse a place of note for his eminencie, and very great, because the next man built no further, but all along behind it, and then came the part which the Priests built.

Vers. 21.

Then built the Priests the men of the plaines, the vulgar Latine, men of the plaines of Jordan, adding the last word, which is not in the Hebrew Text for explanation. But it appeareth, Chap. 12. 28. to be a mistaking, because they are spoken of, as dwelling in the plains about Ierusalem.

Vers. 22.

Mention is made of another measure to Mikzoah and the former, that is, the other corner of the City of David, where stood a Towre also; as is said of the other corner before, ver. 19.

Vers. 24.

Mention is made of the Kings house, joyning to the Court of the Prison, of which see, Jer. 32. 2. ver. 26. But the Nethinims dwelt in Ophel, right over against the gate of waters. Ophel, sayth Lyra, was a Towre neer the Temple and the Priests chambers, and because they ministred to the Priests wood and water, they were placed here, as was most convenient. Of the gate of waters, and the street before it, see again, Chap. 8. 2.

Vers. 25.

Vers. 26.

Lyra.

Above, the gate of horses built the Priests, the vulgar Latine, above at the gate. Here, sayth Lyra, began the third and innermost wall, where the Priests dwelt, and therefore they built it, every man against his own house. The gate of hories was so called, because, hitherto men might ride towards the Temple, but no nearer, when the King himselfe came: he must alight here, and goe afoor to the Temple. Iunius and others, say nothing here of a third wall, but understand by this word, above, the horse gate to have stood in a descent upon the ground, rising from which the Priests built.

Vers. 28.

Lyra.Iunius.

Then built Zadock and Shemiah, &c. After the Priests spoken of in generall, here they are set forth by name; and it seemeth that they built on each side of Nehemiah, because, ver. 30. he sayth, After me built Chaniah and Hanun, &c. omitting, out of his modesty, to speake how great a part he built, yet Chap. 4. 16. and Chap. 5. 16. he sayth, that he and his servants were in the work and built. The vulgar Latine, neither here, nor ver. 31. where again it is said, after me, doth render it so, but after him, as if nothing else were meant, but after the man next before spoken of. But in Hebrew it is, אחרי that is, after me, but that commonly when the word signifieth after me, it is put without a prick above the Fed, whereas here it hath one, and in the margin, to expresse the force of it, it is אחרי after him. But it is put both these wayes, that Nehemiah might most covertly set forth his own work, to avoid all shevv of vainglory. Here Chanun the sonne of Tala is called the sixt, as is supposed, because hee had five brethren elder then himselfe.

Vers. 29.

Vers. 30.

It is said, Right over against the gate of the commandement, so Iunius, the vulgar Latine contra portam judicalem, and the word שער signifieth a Governour, and most probably the gate, where the great Senate, called Synedrion, sate is meant.

Vers. 31.

Finally mention is made again of the gate of the flock, where the Godsmiths and Apothecaries built, whereby we may gather, that the wall by this time was brought round about the City, seeing these last left where the first had begun, ver. 1. Therefore as Pellican noteth against Lyra, there were not three walls now repaired, but one onely, and this was a great work, as the state of the people then was, and as much as was needfull for the present. But Lyra will have this understood of the middle, next unto which by the outward, these men dwelt, so maintaining his tenet touching three walls still. All the gates here mentioned are but eight, yet there are that number 12, whereof foure Eastward, the Potters gate, the Water gate, the horse gate, and the gate of the Flock: foure Westward, the corner gate, the gate of the valley, the dunghill gate, and the gate of the fountain: and foure Northward, the gate of Benjamin, the fish gate, the old gate, and the

Vers. 32.

Pellican.

Lyra.
The Mystery.

Eda.

Pellican.
Notes

Verf. 1.
Note.

Verf. 2.

Verf. 3.

Verf. 4.
Verf. 5.
Pellican.

gate of Ephraim, for Southward the hill upon which the City stood, was so steep that there was no entrance in that part. And as the old, so the new Ierusalem is set forth. as having 12 gates, Revel. 21. but no more, but these eight needed repairing. Of these gates Lyra draweth six to an allegory, first laying it for a ground, that Ierusalem which was now built, figured out Ierusalem above, which is heaven, Gal. 4. And then the gates leading into Ierusalem, figured out the way leading to life, according to that of our Lord, Wilt thou enter into life, keep the Commandements. And as these were both negative and affirmative, the one sort serving to restrain from evil, the other to stir up to the doing of good, according to Psal. 34. 12. so there be three things, the consideration whereof may restrain us from evil, and thirdly, to stir up to good. The first three are, Vitiis factor, iudicii terror, supplicii horror, set forth by the dunghill gate, the judicall gate, and the gate of the valley, because hell is below, for which the valley of Benhinnon is applied hereunto. The second and third are Decor operis, dulcor fœderis, valor muneris, because to do good is comely, linketh unto God, and is rewarded in heaven, and these are set forth by the gate of David, who was comely, the gate of the fountain, because by water the Covenant is entered into with God, and the gate of negotiators who traffick and truck for gold and pearls. Thus he, but because no gates serve onely to keepe out, but for entrance also, this allegory will not well hold, wherefore Beda better makes Ierusalem a figure of the Church, the building of the gates figuring out the Apostles, who taught the way to heaven, and that whereby errours may be kept out of the Church, as gates serve both to enter by, and to keepe out enemies, and the builders of the walls, other pastors and teachers who watch continually, and are as a wall of defence about the Church. Nehemiah has particular registering of the names of them all, figureth out the writing of their names in heaven, that they may be had in everlasting remembrance, who help to the perfecting of this spirituall building. Morally Pellican sheweth, that in these repairers of the gates and walls of Ierusalem, thus accurately set forth to their praise in the Generations to come, they who doe the like for their native Countrey and Church, labouring to reform things amisse, and to reparaire the decays of both are praised, and we are taught always to have them in remembrance, as most worthy instruments.

CHAP. IV.

BUt when Sanballat heard that we built the wall, he was very angry and said, &c. Of this Sanballat and Tobias, see before, Chap. 2. 10. Note, that this is the sequell of seeking to repentance, the decays of Gods Church, the wicked are always mad at it, and deride and oppose it, as also some of the Tribes, in the dayes of godly Iehoshaphat did, when they were building the wall. There were three impediments, as Lyra noteth, the first set forth in this Chapter, the second, Chap. 5. the third, Chap. 6.

What will these weak Jews do? He calls them so in contempt, as thinking them vvhoo were but lately come out of captivity unable to perform so great a vvork, should they suffer them, that is, vvill the Gentiles suffer them? as the vulgar Latine expresseth it, although they were able to build it, Will they finish it in a day, and build it of burnt stones out of the rubbish? they add this as thinking it as ridiculous, as if men should think to build so great a building in one day, and that of stones unfit for building, because burnt in the dayes of Nebuchadnezzar, and partly by reason of that burning, and partly by the vvether in so long a time, made unusefull for building.

Tobias to increase the derision, answered, vvhen they have built, if a fox goe but upon their wall, he vvill breake it dovvn, and therefore vve need not care, let them build vvhat they can, their vvall vvill not be able to endure the least force comming against it, of this Nehemiah complaineth to God, and prayeth him not to cover their iniquity, that is, to forgive it. He prayeth not, sayth Pellican here, that for their sin they might not be toucht vvith repentance, but being manifest oppugners of God, and enemies to his people, and so incorrigible, they might be made examples by Gods judgments against them. Thus he prayed, but they neglected not to build still, yea, the heart of the people was provoked to the work, their scoffes made them the more earnest in it, untill the wall was halfe finished.

Then their enemies Samaritans, Ammonites, Arabians, and Ashdodeans, which were of the Philistims, were greatly incensed at the going on of this work about the Wall, and the repaying of the wide breaches thereof and assembled together to fight against the Jews.

Hereupon they did flee to God by Prayer, and set a watch night and day, that they might not come upon them unawares. For God is first and chiefly to be fought unto in danger, and then means of prevention are wisely to be used.

But the Jews sayd, the force of our burthen carriers is weakened, and there is much earth, &c. After one impediment by the Jews enemies, here followeth another amongst themselves, they murmured for the labour in carrying so much rubbish away, as lay about the Wall, giving it impossible for them to perfect this building, having also so many enemies to interrupt them.

The enemies also according to their combination before spoken of, attempted to come secretly upon them, cyther to slay them or to hinder their work, but they being forewarned of it by their friends abroad, ten times disappointed them of their enterprize by fitly placing armed men to encounter with them, if they had come, and Nehemiah made an exhortation to them not to feare, but to trust in God, and to fight manfully for their Countrey.

The enemies seeing that their enterprizes were discovered, God wrought so hereupon with them, that they were confounded, and the Jews returned to the work, having for a time intermitted it for their necessary defence.

Yet they did not altogether leave their armes, for part of his young men laboured in the worke, and part held shields with darts and bows, &c. thus Iunius, but the Vulgar Latine, half of the young men did the work, and half was prepared to the war, and speares and shields, &c. And this agreeth more to the Hebrew, and to sense; seeing the intent is not only to shew what his young men did, which could not be many, but what the workmen in generall did, who were young and lusty, and whereas he hath it shields with darts, Hebrew it is, holding both speares, shields, and bows, so that neyther hath the vulgar Latine rendred it rightly in this clause nor sensibly, and the Princes after them in all the house of Judah, that is, following them some to the work, and some to their armes to order them, encourage and defend them.

Also the builders went to their work armed with swords girt unto their sides and they sounded with the Trumpet by Nehemiah, that is, when need required that they might come altogether to that part, where their enemies came to assault them. For so he yields the reason, why the Trumpet sounded by him, vers. 19, 20. because they were at the work of the Wall far asunder, and he taking upon him as a Watchman carefully to foresee the danger would give them warning in all parts by the sound of the Trumper.

Hee also provided, that these might be a watch by night, in which hee and his friends and servants bare a part, not putting off their clothes, but only for washing. Iunius, Cuique gladius suus & aqua esto. Hebrew, Every man put that into the water, that is, his garment, when need required to be washed, but Iunius, going upon another signification of the word וַיִּשְׁכְּמוּ, his sword, reads it otherwise, as if the meaning were, let every one go with his sword to the water, as Pagum. expounds it. But if the word be rendred, a sword here is no more sayd, but each man his sword, the water. I hold it therefore better to follow the vulgar Latine, but each put it off for washing, because his purpose here is not but to shew how they did to keep themselves cleanly and from being nasty, seeing they did not at night put off their clothes, viz. by saying, that they put them off to be washed, either as was requisite of course, or as the Law required, upon the contracting of any uncleanness, mystically by the enemies of this building, Hereticks and wicked men are set forth, who deride and seek by all means to hinder the Vers. 6.

Vers. 7.

Vers. 9.

Vers. 10.

Vers. 11.

Vers. 12.

Vers. 13, 14.

Vers. 15.

Vers. 16.

Iunius.

Vers. 17, 18.

Vers. 22.

The Mystery.

Pellican.

Beda.

Experis vitiorum illecebris difficilis care-mus quam in-cognitis minorisque libris incognitam ca-vere voluptatem, quam reilicere cognitam.

spirituall building, that is, reformation of Doctrin and Manners, from which they are most averse, the builders that complain of much earth, which must be dig'd and carried away, to lay a firme foundation, the spirituall builders who are wearied with labouring to remove earthly thoughts from mens minds, that they may be well founded upon the Rock Christ: the enemies plotting to come unawares upon them, the Devils stratagems to surprize mens souls unawares: their arming against them, the taking of the spirituall armour, Ephes. 6. 12. The Labourers being armed, even when they wrought, the watchfulnesse which should be in all the people themselves, besides the watchfulnesse of the Pastours set to defend them: or, according to Pellican, the double work which spirituall builders have to doe, both of building up in grace, and impugning error. And it is to be noted, sayth Beda, that when Solomon built the Temple at the first, he did it without opposition, but now it having been destroyed for sin, the rebuilding of it is with great difficulty, to shew that a mans first conversion is more easily wrought, but he being again drawn away to sin, to bring him to be renewed by repentance, is of greater difficulty, because it is more hard for him that hath once and again felt the pleasures of sinnes to refrain from them, then for him that hath not so deeply tasted thereof: They are like stones burnt in the Devils fire, as these in Nibuchadnezzars, making the enemies to deride the attempt of building herewith. And so some Hereticks speak against such, as in the time of persecution have falne away, as if they could not be renewed by repentance, denying them therefore any admittance into the Church, whereas indeed it is a work not impossible, but far more difficile. Lastly, their watching by night, and not putting off their clothes, shewed the vigilance of every faithfull person against sin, out of the danger whereof it is so hard to be kept, for which cause we must always keep our spirituall armour about us, and never put it off either by day or night.

CHAP. V.

Vers. 1, 3.

3, 4.

Vers. 5.

Vers. 6.

Exod. 22. 25.

Vers. 8.

Here is another great impediment in this building, a complaint is made by the poor of three things. 1 That for sustenance they gave their sons and daughters as servants to the rich. 2 Others sold their possessions, that they might have wherewith to buy sustenance, there was such a famine. 3 Others were enforced to take up money upon use, to pay the Kings Tribute, and this they did, laying their fields and vineyards to pledge therefore: And to these streights they seem to have been brought by their continuall attending upon the building, the works of husbandry being neglected, whereby they should have gotten their living, touching tribute paying, although the Priests and Levites were by the King freed herefrom, Ezra 7. yet all others paid it. And partly by the charge that lay upon them for this, and partly for this building, the meaner sort, which were the far greater part, waxed very poor, and were enforced thus to complain against the rich. Now they say, that their children were as their kinsmens children, free by Gods Ordinance, as being part of them that were delivered out of the Egyptiacall bondage, although they now being grown poor, were enforced to sell them to the rich for servants.

Nehemiah hearing this was very wroth with such miserable men, as thus sinned against charity towards their poor brethren: for they ought in this case to have lent money to them freely. And first hee reproveth even the chiefeest for this privately, then a Congregation being called, publicly, saying we, according to our power, redeem our brethren from the Gentiles, that have been sold unto them, that is, so many as are able and fear God: for thus it is commanded, Levit. 25. 47. 48. and doe ye sell your brethren that they should be sold unto us? that is, be redeemed by us, as the vulgar Latine hath it, and the meaning is: when ye out of your hard heartednesse, rather then lend gratis unto them, have enforced them for your money to sell themselves unto you, that yee might for your advantage sell them again, will yee commit such an absurdity, who are as neer unto them, as we are, as to expect, that wee should give you your price for them to set them free again?

again? Thus he upbraids them by dealing as hardly with their brethren, as the Gentiles, and so frustrating the grace of God towards them in bringing them from amongst the Gentiles in their own Country again, seeing they thus made them servile here, when as the Gentiles themselves had dismissed them freely. Wherefore he willeth them to consider, what the Gentiles would say, when they should heare of this to the disgrace of them and of their Religion.

Should I, my kinsmen, &c. exact money of them, &c. the vulgar Latine, we have lent them, as if he had spoken affirmatively, whereas the word used signifieth lending to usury, which Nehemiah would not doubtlesse doe, wherefore it is better rendred interrogatively, implying that both he, and all that belonged unto him, abhorred from doing thus, and therefore he moveth them to ease their poor brethren of this burthen, as indeed by the Law of God they ought to doe, seeing usury to the poor is therein so strictly forbidden. Then shewing how he would have them ease the poor, he sayth, Restore unto them their fields and vineyards, &c. that is, which are made over to you till the jubilee, to make amends for your former exactions, restore now again to the poor owners, as their need requireth, and the hundredth part that ye exact of them, that is monethly, so that every moneth they exacted one shilling for 100 shillings, that is, 12 shillings for twelve moneths, and for 100 pounds, 12 pounds. This also he requireth them to remit, whether it were to be paid in wine, oile, or corne, and to lose the time which they had untill the yeare of release, in their lands and houses, as brotherly love required.

And when they yeilded to doe thus, he cursed all that should not indeed performe it, using for a forme his coat, which he shak't and said, so let God shake all that doe it not, and make that from all their labours no good may come unto them, but that they may be as a tree, the fruit whereof is shaken off. Then the Priests being called for witnesses, he adjured and sware these men to it, that being done, in their presence, who stood for God, they might think themselves the more strictly obliged. Pellican sayth, that by calling the Priests to be present at this Oath, he shewed that they should be shaken, and excommunicated out of the house of God, and from the Congregation of his people. Sallimans understandeth these words, I adjudged them, of the Priests, whom being guilty of the like sin, he admonished and adjured privately for honours sake, when he first publicly dealt with other rich men.

Nehemiah having this way, promoted the good of the poor Jews, sheweth in the next place, that he refrained from taking ought of them all the time that hee continued Governour over them, which was twelve years, contrary to the manner of others, that had ruled there in times past, who lived upon them to the impoverishing of them the more. Wherefore it seemeth that he was a man of great wealth, as they commonly are that be in office about great Kings, and from him should other Rulers take example to favour their Subjects in matters of charge, as much as they can, and not oppresse them to maintain themselves in greater pomp, and worldly glory.

He also recordeth his own work, and his servants in helping to build the wall, not for ostentation, but to shew how greatly the feare and love of God, to the honour of whom this was wrought in him, as P. afterwards speaks of his labours, and forbearing to take maintenance, for the good of Gods Church being yet weak and poore, to draw on others for a more generall good, to doe likewise in the like case. He meaneth, sayth Lyra, that he wrought with his own hands to draw on others the more, when they should see their Governour himself so intent to the work. A notable example set to all in high place and authority, that they from hence might learn to go before others in doing that good, which they stirre up them to do. And he sayth, that he purchased himself no field, that is, he kept not the surpluse of his revenues to encrease his possessions withall, as rich men commonly do, but spent all for the publike good.

Also 150 men of the Jews being Presidents, and those that came from the Gentils round about, came to my table, that is, they that for their publike offices should have been maintained by the publike charge, I daily gave diet to, and to Samaritans

Vers. 10.

Vers. 11.

Vers. 12.

Pellican.

Vers. 14.

Note.

Vers. 16.

1 Cor. 9.
Lyra.

Note.

Vers. 17.

Vers. 18.

The Morall.

ritans, Arabians, Philistims and Ammonites round about, that came upon occasion of busines to Jerusalem. Finally, he sheweth, what his daily provision was, one ox, six smaller beasts many fowls, &c. in regard of all which he desireth God to remember him for good, that is, according to Lyra, both of grace and glory, seeing that out of Charity to his people that were poor and brought low, he did all this that they might be the more spared from charges. Morally in that Nehemiah required the chiefe amongst them to doe nothing in way of charity towards their poor brethren, but that wherein he went before them in his own example, all Governours may learne it to be their duty to be the first and chief in doing the good, which they require others to doe. And in that, with shaking off his garment, he cursed those that either were uncharitable to the poor, or oppressed them, or went from the good profession which they had made: Note, that whosoever doth any of these things, must not expect to prosper, but be blasted in all his goods and labours.

CHAP. VI.

Vers. 1. 2.

R. Sol. sayth, it was a place without Jerusalem.

Note.

THis let of building the wall being thus overcome, now ariseth another, when then the wall was finished, but not the gates of the City, for they remained yet imperfect. Samballat and other enemies of the Jews inhabiting neer unto them, and being Governours of those parts sent unto him to meet with them, that they might make a Covenant together, thinking to take an opportunity thus to kill him, and the place which they appointed was the valley of Omin, of which see Chap. 11. 35. whereby we may see into what dangers godly Governours come, through the malice of wicked enemies of the truth, when they endeavour to repair the walls of Jerusalem, that is, to reform things amisse in the Church of God, by restoring sound Doctrine, wherein soever it hath been corrupted, but God will preserve them as he did Nehemiah. And it is to be noted, that these enemies took their opportunity when the gates were not yet finished, for if they could but yet have caused the work to cease, all that was hitherto done had been vain.

Vers. 3.

Note.

Note.

But Nehemiah wisely foreseeing their drift, sent them answer that he was about a great work, and if he should come abroad to consult with them, it would be hindered, but notwithstanding he was urged by them to come foure times. Prudence is necessary as well as innocency to see into the subtilties of our enemies. For Nehemiah wisely foreseeing what these wicked Princes went about, would by no means be drawn to goe out of the City, in which he was in greatest safety.

Vers. 5.

Then Samballat sent unto him the fifth time by a servant, writing something to terrifie him, viz. that it was reported amongst the Gentiles about, that when the Wall was finished with the gates, the Jews meant to rebell, and he to make himself King, wherefore he willed him to come forth, that they might consult together, pretending great good will towards him to give him advice, what were the best course for him to take to prevent the comming of this rumour to the Kings eare, and consequently the danger that would ensue hereupon. Yet he wrot not so plainly, but that he left him doubtfull, whether this were the end of his sending for him, or to get somewhat out of his own mouth, whereof he might accuse him to the King, or else to conspire with him.

Vers. 8.

But Nehemiah having a good conscience was nothing moved at this, but answered, that he feined this of his own head, that they being afraid, who were in the work, might break off from it, and therefore he applyed himselfe the more earnestly unto it, praying God to strengthen their hands in the work.

Vers. 10.

This policy of the enemies being thus frustrated, another device of theirs was, to suborne a false Prophet, to tell him, as if it had been from God revealed unto him, that they would come upon him in the night and slay him, which they might easily doe, because the gates of the City were not as yet perfected, and it was no doubt, but that they would be ready enough to doe so, for the hatred which they conceived against him, in regard of his attempt to fortifie Jerusalem, and because of his contempt shewed towards them. Therefore he perswaded him to goe with him him into the Temple, which was as a fort, that he might there be safe. This false Prophet was Shemabiah, who came of Delaiab, of whom see, 1 Chron. 24. 18. he was one of the principall Priests of the 23 course, and he is said to have been shut up, that is, one who sequestred himselfe from company, as being most strict and holy in the course of his life, that he might be in the more estimation, as converting the more with God, and by him graced with the spirit of Prophecie. Junius renders it, detained, or held by vow to doe all that he could for the good of Nehemiah. It is most probable, that Nehemiah being sent for to him, as to a man of God, came to his house, and there under a pretence of speaking by Prophecie for his safety, he sought to move him to make the Temple the place of his refuge, that so he lurking in secret for feare, all the Jews who were in the work, should be terrified and cease from building any more, to his great ignominy and disgrace: or, as Pellican hath it, he should thus indanger that holy place, of being defiled with blood, if they should there be let in to him, as by the fraud of the same false prophet and his complices, they easily might.

Into the house of this Shemabiah, Nehemiah saith, that he went, as supposing him to be a friend, but when he heard him speake to the effect aforesaid, he easily discovered the contrary, and that he was one of the evill minded Jews, who held correspondencie with the Samaritans against Nehemiah and the rest. Therefore he answered him, Should such a man as I see, or, who being as I, can enter into the Temple and live? that is, should I that have hitherto professed so great confidence in God, and perswaded others to doe the like, now distrust his providence, and shew it by fleeing so shamefully to hid my selfe? surely if I should doe this, I might justly feare that God would protect me no longer, but give me over into the hands of my wicked enemies, to be slain for this my sin against him.

Moreover he saith, that he understood, that God sent him not, but that he dissembled in speaking thus, being hired unto it by Sanballat and Tobias for a reward, to draw him to sin, that is, to doe so cowardly against that which the dignity of his place required, being Governour over all the people, that he might afterwards beare reproach for it. Whereas he saith, that he understood, &c. this is generally thought to have been by divine revelation, which came unto him after that hee had given him the repulse, but it may as probably be held to have been by some faithfull man or men, who knew of the compact, and discovered it unto him.

This danger being thus escaped, Nehemiah prayeth God for this treachery to remember Sanballat, and Nohadiah a Prophetesse, &c. viz. which joyned with Shemabiah in this dissimulation, and together drew on others to pretend the same, whereby we may see how dangerous a plot this was, when not onely a man, but a woman also, and others came and spake unto him about the same thing, as Prophets sent by God.

At length the wall was finished the 25 day of Elul, the 52 day. The moneth Elul amongst the Hebrews, answereth to our August in part, and in part to September, by 52 dayes he meaneth from the beginning of their working, so Lyra, and all other Expositours almost, except Varatius, who would have it 52 dayes after the Epistle sent by Sanballat to Nehemiah, but certainly erroneously, because the wall being all repaired before, they might well in far lesse time have finished the gates.

And it is to be noted, that the time which the wall was in building, is set down as wonderfully short, that God might therefore be praised, by whose singular help it was done, notwithstanding all the delays caused by the enemies, in so few dayes, to intimate which, it is said, that the enemies acknowledged that it was the work of God, which made their stomacks that were so stout, before now to quail. Vers. 16. Josephus therefore is far wide, when he sayth, that the wall was in building two years, and three moneths, and Eusebius much wider, who reporteth the time to be 12 years, mistaking, doubtlesse, the time of Nehemiah his being Governour there, for the time of doing this work. And whereas some think that this building was in the last yeare of Nehemiah his Government there, as Jerome, who saith, he came to Jerusalem, Anno 200 of Artaxerxes, and made an Junius.

Pellican.

Vers. 11.

Vers. 12.

Vers. 14.

Vers. 15.

Lyra.
Varatius.Josephus.
Eusebius.

Hieronym.

Dan. 9.

end of building the wall and City, Anno 32, which some others follow, because the end of his coming was onely to build, and this being done he was to return again, it is to be conceived rather, that he set to the work in the first yeare, and finished the wall, and from thence forward he intended the building of the City, as long as he stayed, which doth not disagree from Jerom. Of this short time in building the wall, Daniel seemeth to Prophesie, when he saith that it should be built again in angustis temporum, in the streights of time. If any man shall say, how could a wall of so great compasse be built in so few dayes, although God prospered the work never so much: It is answered, that many thousands laboured in it with all diligence, and the Princes also were present to stir them up, neither needed it building from the foundation, or in all parts, but repaying and building in most places, upon the old foundation.

Vers. 17.

Here another impediment or plot is mentioned, whereby Nehemiah is also indangered, which tendeth the more to the magnifying of Gods mercie in preserving him, till all the work was finished. There came some of the chiefe of the Jews, who were allyed to Tobiah by marriages, and therefore these were in covenant with him, confirmed by oath to doe what they could to betray Nehemiah to him and his fellows, and to hinder the building, and to this end there went Letters between them, from time to time, wherein the speeches and counsels of Nehemiah were discovered, and they praised Tobiah unto Nehemiah, as meaning him no hurt, but ready to advise him for the best, that he might be drawn to goe out unto him as to a friend, that so he might be indangered.

The Allegory.

For the Allegory of this, Beda saith, that these Samaritans figured out Hereticks, which desire to be in league with the Orthodox, that by conversing with them, they may have advantage against them, and hinder the proceedings of the truth. Nehemiah his going into the house of Shemai, as of a friend, but he found him deceitfull, sheweth how the Orthodox are assaulted, not onely without by known enemies, but also within by false brethren, feigning themselves friends, of whom they must beware, as Nehemiah did of them. Lastly, the wall finished, the sixth moneth, answered both unto the six dayes of Gods working to make the world, after which a rest followed, and to the everlasting rest in heaven, after six ages of the world spent in toile and labour.

CHAP. VII.

Vers. 1.
Pellican.

THE gates being now finished in all points, as well as the wall, the Porters, Singers, and Levites were recounted, &c. Of Porters, sayth Pellican, here, we may conceive a reason, viz. to keepe the gates, by opening and shutting them again in due time, and of the two Ananjes, Vers. 2. to whom it is commanded to see this duly done, as super-intendents over the Porters, and of others set every night as watchmen of the inhabitants neere to each gate, for more security, Vers. 3. But what Singers and Levites should do here I see not, unlesse the Singers or players upon Instruments, were set to give notice of strangers approaching to the City, and Levites sat there to heare causes with other Judges. But it is more probable that these, both Porters, Singers, and other Levites, were now recounted to see if there were of them a number sufficient to sanctifie and dedicate the wall and gates being now fully finished, the keepers of the gates, and their overseers next spoken of, onely being imployed about the gates, because, Chap. 12. 27. it is said, that Levites were sought from divers parts, for the dedication of the wall, both singers to praise God, and to exhilarate all that were present, and Priests and Levites to sanctifie the wall, gates, and people, and ver. 45. mention is made of the porters then present also. The first Hanani, whom Nehemiah called his brother most probably is the same spoken of Chap. 1. who first told him in what case Jerusalem was, the other a most approved honest man, in whom he might confide also to look diligently to this businesse, there being so many, both open and secret enemies about the City. And he is called the keeper of the House or Palace in Jerusalem, intimating that he was a man of note. In that he being so so highly commended, it is added, that he feared God more then others. Note, that the feare of God is the ground of all goodnesse and fidelity, he cannot safely have any matter of moment committed unto him, that doth not feare God. And when the gates were shut at night, he biddeth these to whom he committed the trust, to feele with their hands, whether they were made fast or no. The vulgar Latine and Greek, to see them shut and barred. And the keepers appointed were the inhabitants neere dwelling: but ver. 4. it is said, their houses were not yet built in the City, therefore Lyra understands it of Tents or Cottages, wherein they for the present kept, when it is said, every one right over against his house, but for so much as, Hag. 1. it is said, they dwelt in seiled houses, it is rather to be understood of whole rows of houses, for the houses yet built were but few, for the City he sayth was large, but the people in it few, because, as is most probable, the Heathen round about infested that place most, so that in other parts of the land they might more quietly follow their businesses to get their living. Now for so much as here was the Temple, where only Sacrifice might be offered, and this was the City which God professed to owne more peculiarly, the good rules Nehemiah applied his minde most seriously to study how it might be better peopled, after that it was thus fortified. Then God, he saith, putting it into his minde, hee gathered the Princes and Presidents together, that the number and names of the Jews who returned out of captivity being taken, a certainty of them from either part of the Land, might be appointed to come and dwell there, and that was as is shewed, Chap. 11. every tenth man. Now when he went about this, a book came to his hands, wherein they were set down by their Generations, who came first to Jerusalem with Zorobabel & Jeshuah the High-Priest, of which numbring see Ezra 2. for this is the same verbatim, but onely that in the numbers of divers families, here are recounted in some fewer, and in some more then there. For example, the sonnes of Arachi are there said to be 775, ver. 5. here 652, the sons of Phabath there 2812, ver. 6. here 2818, the sonnes of Zattu 945, ver. 8. here 845, &c. touching which difference we are not to hold with Pellican, that these differences happened by the negligence of the Scribes who wrote out this Register, for by this reason there would be no certainty of the truth in any copy, but rather with Junius and some others, that they, Ezra 2. were set down in Babylon, but the book which came to Nehemiahs hands was written when they were come into the Land of Judea, they gave their names to return whom Ezra recordeth, but some changing their mindes and not going, some dying by the way, and some comming in of some families, that had not given in their names, this caused a difference in the catalogue last written, and nothing else, for that it was not any part of Ezra his book, but another writing appeareth, because it is said, There was a Book found, wherein it was written: If it had been that of Ezra, he vvas then present, and so probably mention should have been made of him, as giving this light into this matter, and it is not likely that his book being Canonically Scripture, should have lyen hid so by this time, being but 13 years, as that it should novv come forth as a book accidentally found, and not one that all men knew of.

Note.

Verf. 4.
Lyra.

Verf. 5.

Pellican.Junius.

CHAP. VIII.

BEcause Nehemiah had spoken before of his intent to gather the people together from all parts, that he might the better provide for the peopling of this City, he novv sheweth before the putting of that his purpose in execution, that in the seventh moneth, the first day of the moneth, the people came together from all parts to Jerusalem, yea, they vvere there assembled that day, to heare the book of the Law read by Ezra, because that day vvas a feast of blowing Trumpets, according to the Law, Levit. 23. 24. and at such times the Priests used to read and expound the Book of the Law unto them, yea this vvas commonly done every Sabbath day. The place vvhich, vvas the street by the vwater gate, that is, sayth Lyra, the Court, into vvhich men assembled together to prayer and hearing of the Word, for this was right over against this gate, although not very nigh unto it, and resembled a broad and spacious street, for which it was thus called. And the people are said to have come altogether, as one man, to shew their great diligence, and to give us example, as also, where it is said, that both men and women assembled there, and did harken attentively from morning till noontide, which was a long time, whereas now the attention of many, will not reach unto an houre, but they give way to drowsinesse. What part of the Law was read now it is not said, but most probably the ten Commandements, and the threatnings added thereunto to transgressours, and exhortations to observe and keepe them, because the people are said to have wept vers. 10. And as Ezra being assisted with Priests on his right hand and left, read out of the book of the Law in one part of this Court, and blessed God, all the people standing and lifting up their hands, and then bowing their faces to the ground, and worshipping said, Amen : So certain Levites in another part, read the book of the Law distinctly to others of the people, for they could not all stand to heare one, being so many, and expounded it unto them, that they might the better understand. A notable president shewing, both how the Scripture should be read in the congregation, viz. with interpretation, and what reverence and affection should be shewed by the people, in standing, bowing, and saying, Amen , to the blessings and praises that are given to God by their teachers. And because when Ezra disposed himselfe to read, and teach the Law, he began with blessing of God: Lyra well noteth, that from his example we learn to begin our reading with prayer, and likewise our preaching at all times, as is commonly used by all our Ministers.

Verf. 2, 3.

A&amp;S 15.

Verf. 4.
Note.
Verf. 5, 6, 7.
Verf. 8, 9.
Note.
Lyra.
Verf. 10.	The people hearing the threatnings of the law for sin, and knowing their own guiltinesse wept for sorrow, being moved the more by thinking upon their late sufferings. But Nehemiah , Ezra , and the Levites forbade them to weepe, because it was a day of joy, for such was every new Moon, Numb. 10. 10. Here it is not to be conceived, that they spake altogether, for that had been a confusion, but some in one part of the assembly and some in another, as was necessary, that in all parts they might be heard. Whereas Lyra having sometime thus expounded it by & by recanteth, because it is sayd, they came together as one man, whereupon he inferreth, that they were not spoken to division, but altogether as if they had bin one man, & so expoundeth Ezraes and the Levites speaking, as if he only taught, & they assisted him, by repressing the noyse made amongst the people by their weeping, I cannot herein assent unto him, because it is expressly sayd, that the Levites also taught and gave the sense, and both Nehemiah , he and they admonished them to cease weeping at this time, &c. that is, each one where he might best be heard. Neyther did their comming together as one man hinder their being divided, when they were there, as necessity required, that they might heare the same things from divers teachers, which they could not all at once heare from one of the name Athersata , see before Ezra 2. 63.
Verf. 11, 12.	Also the people are bidden to goe home and make merry, and to give some of their good cheer to the poore, and the Levites especially looked to the stilling of them, that they might not continue in lamenting. So wee see there is a time to laugh and to be merry as well as to weep, and we must rejoyce in God in dayes of thanksgiving as well as weep in dayes of humiliation. And then do wee keepe times of rejoycing aright, when as we see our selves more liberally, so we feed the poore also, and thus it was appointed to be done at the Feast of Purim by Hester , and Mordecai , and Christ commands it, Luke 14. Yet in all Festivalls, and always we must keep within the bounds of temperance.
Note.
Verf. 13.	And the next day came the Princes of all the people and Priests and Levites to Ezra , &c. because Ezra was most expert in expounding the Law, even they that taught others came to learn of him, how some things, that were more doubtfull and difficult should be understood, that they might be the better able to informe the people. And here is a president given to men of understanding after hearing to enquire of the Preacher more, if they be unsatisfied, as touching the full knowledge of any thing by him taught.
Note.
Verf. 14.	Then having found the law of keeping the Feast of Tabernacles the same moneth moneth, they prepared for that also. But it is to be understood, that there were three times appointed in the Law to be kept holy in this moneth. 1 the Feast of blowing Trumpets, as Lyra sayth, in remembrance of Isaacks being delivered, when he was about to be sacrificed, the first day. 2 In remembrance of the sin of Idolatry committed in the Wilderness with the golden Calf, & for the expiation thereof upon the 10 day, which was appointed to be a day of humiliation for ever. 3 In remembrance of their dwelling in tents for the space of forty yeers, being all that time miraculously fed with Manna from Heaven, the 15 day. Now hee having shewed, that the first day was kept, omitteth to speak of the next, touching which yet some think, that it is to be presumed, that it was kept also, because they had so good a guide, viz. Ezra, although here passed over in silence. Lastly, hee sheweth, that the Feast of Tabernacles of seven dayes continuance was kept, and Chap. 9. 1. a day of humiliation immediatly after those dayes ended, for their great sin in making marriages with Idolaters. For the Feast of Tabernacles beginning the 15 day, the seventh was the 21 and the eighth, wherein was also a solemne Assembly the 22, after which in the 23 day, they separating themselves from such Wives as they heard by the Law read unto them, that they ought not to have taken, they came again together the 24 day to humble themselves in fasting and prayer therefore. So that it seemeth, the tenth day was not at this time kept for humiliation, upon what occasion we know not, but certainly there was some impediment necessarily hindring it, as the High Priests not being vveil, or accidentally polluted, or some other great cause; wherefore the 24 day was kept in stead thereof.

But to return to the Feast of Tabernacles now kept, it is sayd here, that it was not so done, since the days of Joshuah, the son of Nun, and the reason hereof is rendred, Verse 19. because now they kept holy seven dayes together the Law being read and expounded unto them every of those days, whereas by the Law made, Levit. 23. 39. they were required to rest only the first day and the eighth, and they rested now every day to attend unto the word through the great desire, which they had unto it, that by hearing it day after day they might be brought to take better heed unto it to live accordingly, by the neglect whereof they had hitherto suffered so great misery. Thus Junius, but Pellican referreth the preference made of this to the joy, which was novv greater, then at any time before by reason of their Walls newly built, which had lyen vast so long, and their deliverance from their enemies round about, so that they might novv so quietly keep holy dayes to the Lord, which they could not do in the long time of their captivity, viz. 70 years, nor since their return, because the City lay open to the assaults of the Enemy untill this time. Lyra understands it both in respect of all Israel novv gathered together as one man, the like to which hath not bin sayd before, and in regard of the case wherein they were being servants and tributaries to a forreigne King and poore, whereas formerly they were free, and rich, and prosperous, having mighty Kings of their own, and it is as if it had been sayd, never was such a Feast of Tabernacles kept by Israel in so poor a case, and yet so unanimously consenting about it. I think not for one, but for all these respects this Feast novv kept is thus preferred.

And the eighth day they made a gathering according to the right, so the vulgar Latine and Lyra, they gathered for necessities about the Temple, Junius a day of Interdiction, but the Hebrew word here used is קָוָה, signifieth retention, and nothing else is hereby meant, but holding of the Congregation together, as the Law appointeth, for there must be an holy convocation the first, and againe the eighth day, wherein no servile work must be done.

Levit. 23.
Lyra.

Verf. 18.

Junius.
Pellican.

Lyra.

Verf. 19.

CHAP. IX.

After the Feast of Tabernacles kept with so much joy, novv followeth a fast, or day of humiliation for sin the 24 day of the moneth, especially for their sin in marrying Idolatrous Wives, from whom, to shew their true penitency, they were novv separated; And hereby, and by that Ezra 10. it seemeth

Verf. 1.

Vers. 2.

Prov. 28. 13.

Vers. 3.

Junius.

Vers. 2, 3.

Vers. 4.

Vers. 6.

meth, that this sin cannot be sufficiently repented of without such a separation. For although, 1 Cor. 7. hee that hath an unbelieving Wife, is bidden not to part with her, unlesse she will, yet this is to be understood only of such a couple as were formerly both Heathens, but at the hearing of the Gospel one being converted, the other remayned an Heathen still. For in such a case it is not necessary to put her away, but onely when a man that is faithfull hath rashly against Gods Law, married a woman, an idolatresse. The ceremonies in this day of their humiliation used, were, fasting, sackcloth, and earth upon them, which seemed in those times to shew the greatnesse of their sorrow. Then they confessed their sins, and the sins of their fathers, which is the onely way to obtain pardon, for if wee confesse our sins and forsake them we shall have mercie. Then they, that is, the people, standing in their places, the Levites read in the Law, the fourth part of the day, and the fourth part confessed their sins, the people stood for reverence, and whereas it is said, the Levites read, the word Levites is understood by Junius, there being no more in the Text, but they being lifted up in their station read, &c. But because in the publike place, the Ministers of God onely ought to act that part, of confessing and reading to the rest, as appears, Chap. 2. 3. Joel 2. 17. it is to be understood, that they did so at this time, they onewhile set up some one amongst them to read, and then another and another, while they confessed their sins the fourth part of the day, that is, as Junius hath it, from the third houre to six, which was the time immediately following the morning sacrifice, they read, and again, from the six to the ninth they confessed, which time the evening Sacrifice immediately followed. So that the day being divided into foure parts, two were spent in offering the daily continuall sacrifices, and two in reading, confessing of sins, praise and prayer, as here followeth, ver. 4. The vulgar Latine then erreth, in which it is, foure times in the day, and foure times in the night, rather wee may hence gather, that after the morning sacrifice ended, by nine of the clock in the forenoon, the Levites fell to reading till noon, and then fell to confessing of their sins, which they saw, were against the Law, standing up in their places, and using a long forme of confession and prayer, till three in the afternoon, after which, the day was concluded with the evening sacrifice, whereas the first part of this dayes holy work, seems to have been performed by the people, ver. 2, 3. it is so said by a Prolepsis, usuall in Scripture, the thing done being related in generall, then more explicitly and particularly. The meaning then is, they confessed their sins, that is, such of them as by their callings were a mouth to the rest, and in like manner, it is to be conceived of their reading.

The Levites from an high place where they stood, crying unto God aloud, were Ieshuah, Bars, Cadmiel, &c. They then first all together stood up to praise God, and to beseech God that they might blesse him, and that he would exalt his own name. After which it seemeth that one alone, that he might be heard more distinctly, and understood of all, fell into a long and fervent Prayer, from ver. 6. to the end of the Chapter, & this is expressly said in the Septuagint & vulgar Latine, to have been Ezra. And Ezra said, thou art Lord alone, &c. but in Hebrew, no one particular is mentioned as speaking alone, yet most probably it was so, least all speaking so long together, it should make a confusion: yet not Ezra, for he is not here named, but one of those named in the Text, who be eight, and eight of whom it is not to be conceived that any stood up for cyphers, but confessed and read all, each one in his turn, most probably also expounding, though it be not mentioned of both these, see some grounds, 1 Cor. 14. 31. Nehem. 8. Act. 15. 21.

In this Prayer first, the great works of God in creating all things are commemorated to his praise. 2 His singular grace to Abraham, in bringing him out of Ur of the Caldees, and promising the Land of Canaan unto him. 3 His mercie to them, his posterity in Egypt. 4 His wonderfull acts in the Wildernesse towards them. 5 Their rebellions there. 6 His subduing Canaan unto them. 7 Their rebellions here. 8 His delivering them sundry times when they cryed unto him. 9 Their rebellions renewed, and punishments by the Assyrians, to whom they were now servants, in regard of which they were now humbled before him. And to move the Lord the more effectually to mercie in delivering them again from from forreign powers, they after this praying, add the making and sealing of a Covenant unto God, to become his servants for all time to come.

CHAP. X.

Here are the Princes, Priests, and Levites, first named, that sealed the Covenant, unto ver. 29. viz. Nehemiah the Kings Legat, and 22 Priests after him, then Levites 17. Vers. 9. that is, Princes or chiefe fathers of the Priests and Levites families, for others of them that sealed are mentioned, ver. 28. Lastly, Princes of the people 45. All these both subscribed and sealed, binding hereby all those that were under them, and were witnesses of the like Vow and Covenant made by all the rest, both Priests, Levites, and people, men and women, that were present, so as that they could not but think themselves most solemnly bound hereby. Here because that after Nehemiah and the Priests spoken of, it is said, these were Priests, some thinke that Nehemiah was a Priest also, but this evinceth it not, seeing a distinction is plainly made, in that he being named, it is immediately added to shew what he was, Athesfata, the Kings Legat or Deputy, whereas then after the rest named, it is said, these were Priests, this is to be understood onely of them that are named after him, over whom all, as over the Levites and Princes he was for the time set by the King as chiefe Governour. Moreover, if he had been a Priest, this would not doubtlesse have been omitted, no more then it was when Ezra was before sent over by the same King, Lastly, he would have been one doubtlesse, standing amongst the other Priests, to read and expound the Law, Chap. 8. if he also had been a Priest, seeing he was so pious. Here it may seeme strange, that neither Ezra, nor Eliashib the High-Priest, as he is called, Chap. 3. 1. are mentioned amongst the Covenanters. But haply, as in the Covenant made formerly before Ezra, no Priests or Levites covenanted; but onely such as had sinned in taking strange wives, so at this present some were not required to subscribe, as being of most approved lives, and undoubtedly set to walke in the wayes of God, as Ezra was. But Nehemiah would seale as the principall man, and leader to all others, or because they covenant here, not onely to put away strange wives, but also about other things, necessary for all to binde themselves unto, some are named who were guilty, but all others who were not mentioned onely in generall, ver. 28. amongst whom Ezra and Eliashib may be understood.

Now the particulars, which they covenanted, were first to keep all the Laws given by Moses, both Morall, Judiciall and Ceremoniall, both they and all such as were under their jurisdiction, that is, by Gods help and grace, and so far forth as their authority could prevaile to cause all to do so.

2 To refrain from mixt marriages, which was a thing so much impugned by Law.

3 Not to buy or sell upon the Sabbath, which was a worke forbidden in the fourth Commandement, and often spoken against by the Prophets.

4 To observe the seventh year as the Law commanded, by making it Sabbathicall.

5 To pay for the use of the Sanctuary yearly the third part of a shekle, that is, as Vers. 33. is expressed, to buy burnt offerings for the Sabbaths, new Moons, and other Solemnities, and for the daily continuall sacrifice and shew-bread. And this they speak of, as a thing imposed upon themselves, because this service must be maintained according to the Law, Exod. 30. and Numb. 28. 29. but how otherwise, to provide for the maintenance of it they could not tell. For whereas Exodus 30. 12. halfe a shekle is appointed to be paid by every one when they were numbered, which was to be layd up in the Sanctuary, that is, thought by Aben Ezra, not to have been sufficient at this time, the people being so few, and therefore they added hereunto the third part of a shekle more. For although Iunius denyeth that halfe shekle to have been for this expence, because Vers. 16. it was to be layd up in the Sanctuary for a Monument, yet it hath been shewed upon Exodus.

Vers. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, &c.

Vers. 9, 10.

Vers. 14, 15.

Ezra 10. 18.

Vers. 30.

Vers. 31.

Vers. 32.

Iunius

	du 30. 12. that the sacrifices, &amp;c. were hereby to be mayntained, and that to this end this tribute was also rayled yearly, which Iunius denyeth too, but the Hebrews all consent about it. And reason sayth, it must needs be so, because otherwise a charge was appointed, but not how or by whom it should be borne. For the laying of it upin the Sanctuary, this is not to be imagined to have been done that it might perpetually lie there, but to be spent upon this service as need required. And that this service might be duly executed, which by this Impost was to be maintained, they cast the lots of the Priests and Levites, and of the people for the wood of the offerings, that they should bring it into the house of the Lord, from yeare to yeare, that is, sayth Lyra, because it pertained to the Priests office to maintain fire continually burning upon the Altar of burnt offerings, they had their turns assigned them by lot, which weeke every course of the 24 instituted by David, should attend upon this service, and because the Levites were given to the Priests to serve under them about the Altar, they had their courses appointed them also, that they might be ready to bring this wood at all times to them, and under the name Levites, he understands the Nethinims also, who were to serve under the Levites, by hewing and preparing the wood for them, for they were the Gibeonites mancipated by Joshuah to this service for ever. And the people are spoken of because they were to finde wood for the Temple, and therefore they had times by course assigned to them to bring it thither. But Iunius by the people understands the Nethinims, improperly, I thinke, because not they, but the common sort of the Israelites, called the Laity, are always meant by the word people.
Vers. 34.
Lyra . Levit. 6. 1 Chron. 24.
Iosh. 9.
Iunius .
Vers. 35.	6 They covenant to pay the first borne of the Land, and the first fruits of their fruits and trees. The word in Hebrew is the same, בכור first borne, or first fruits, but when it hath reference to men or beasts, it is rendered first borne, when to other increase, first fruits. And these first fruits were the 50 part, and if any would be more liberall in paying, the 40, or being poorer the 60 part. Now because the first borne of the Land, were to be distinguished into such as must be redeemed or brought in kinde, it is added, for explication of the words, The first borne of the Land, the first borne of men and beasts, that is, of unclean beasts, which must either be redeemed, or the neck thereof broken, and the first borne of neate and of sheepe, all which were appointed to be paid for the Priests maintenance, together with certain parts of the Sacrifices, and things vowed. Of paying the first borne, the cause was Gods destroying of the first borne of the Egyptians, preserving theirs, in thankfulness for which they were injoynd this offering for ever after from yeare to yeare.
Lyra .
Vers. 36.
Numb. 18.
Vers. 37.
Numb. 15. 20.
Numb. 18. 21.
Iunius .
Vers. 38.	The first fruits of every minse also, that is, a cake of the dough, of the yeare first baked: and our oblations, the fruit of the tree, wine and oyle. Besides the first fruits of the olive and vine, they covenant to bring in the first made wine and oyle, for of the first fruits of all trees as they grow, it was spoken before. And to the Levites to pay the tithe of all the Land, for so the Law appointed, and the tithe of the tithe, was by them to be paid to the High-Priest, and the Levites say they, shall have the tithe of all our labours in every City, in Hebrew, of all our services, Iunius renders it, of all our tillage, the vulgar Latine of all our works, which comes neerer to the originall, and hereby it appears, that tithe was paid without deduction, in consideration of the husbandmans labour, yea, of the tradesman, who had nothing else to pay. Vers. 38. And the sonne of Aaton the Priest shall be with the Levites, when tithe is given to the Levites: in Hebrew, in tithe to the Levites, or of the Levites, as the vulgar Latine, Iunius, when the Levites pay tithe, that is, the tithe of their tithes, as in the next words, appointing them to be brought into the store-house of the Sanctuary, towards the maintenance of the Priests. The meaning is, that the High-priest, who was ever the eldest sonne of the family of Aaron, should be present when tithes were paid to the Levites, and they paid tithe out of them again, because this tithe of the tithes, was to be altogether at his disposing.
Numb. 18. 26, 27, 28.
Vers. 39.	To the chambers of store shall all the children of Israel, and of Levi bring their offering of wine, and oyle, &amp;c. That is, the offerings before spoken of, viz. their first first fruits towards the Priests maintenance, which must be paid not onely by the people, but by the Levites also. And here it is appointed, that the vessels which were of use in the service of God should be placed, and finally, they vow to maintain, about the Temple continually, Porters, Singers, Priests and Ministers, alwayes, that the service of the Lord may never more be intermitted. And in making this Covenant, they had the Law of God for their warrant, which commanded all these particulars, so that according to this president, a Covenant or protestation should be onely of things specified in the Word of God, they being named either generally, as in the time of some godly Kings, or particularly as here, that every one may understand, what he professeth to and doe accordingly.

CHAP. XI.

After these things thus done, to move God to be propitious unto them, they considering how few dwelt in Jerusalem in respect of the greatnesse of that City, the reason whereof is conceived to be, the enmity of the Nations round about to it, above all other parts, through which it was most dangerous dwelling there, cast lots for the tenth man of all the Jews to come and dwell there, that this City might be better peopled, as being the seate of the Temple, and peculiarly chosen by God for them all to resort unto, to keepe their solemne feasts, and bring their sacrifices thither. To shew how few yet dwelt there, it is said, that the Princes dwelt in Jerusalem, but the people in other parts. But now by this means this City was well replenished, and it is commonly noted, that besides these there were others, that voluntarily offered to dwell there, because, Verf. 2. it is said, The people blessed all those that offered themselves willingly, &c. and that because this tended to the strengthening of Jerusalem the holy City, and shewed zeale in them to the service of God, and to his glory.

Then the numbers of them that dwelt in Ierusalem are set down, it being given in a parenthesis, to understand, that the other parts of the land of Judea were inhabited by the residue of the Israelites, Priests, Levites, Nethinims, and the posterity of Solomons servants, that is, those of the Canaanites, Hivites, &c. who were not put to death, but made tributaries by Solomon, 1 King. 9. 29. And first the children of Judah now inhabiting Ierusalem, were 468: Then the children of Benjamin, 928: Then of the Priests, 822 of the families of Idajah and Sarajah and their brethren: and 242 of the families of Adajah and his brethren, and 128 of the families of Amassay and his brethren: Lastly of the Levites 284. The totall of Priests and Levites 1476, and of Judah and Benjamin 1396, so that there were more Priests and Levites, then of the Lay people, which shewed their zeal then to be greatest, for besides these there were also 172 porters, who were all Levites. The residue of the people, both Israelites, Priests, Levites, and Nethinims, dwelt in other Cities in their own possessions: for so God of old had distributed them amongst the Tribes, that in all places they might have teachers of the Law of God amongst them.

And Nethinims dwelt in Ophel, that is, not in the Towre in Ierusalem, called by this name, but in a Village neere to Jerusalem, that they might be the more ready to give their attendance about the Temple, as their Office required: and the like is to be thought of Siaba and Gaspha, so Pellican, but Iunius better, takes these two for names of men that were over the Nethinims, and therefore renders it, Siabah and Gaspha were over the Nethinims, but the vulgar Latine, of the Nethinims, deceived Pellican, for in Hebrew it is, על נתינים Super Nethinios, and so all others hitherto numbred, have in the end added to them their Presidents or Prince, who ruled over them, see ver. 14. 16. and because the Prince over the Levites is omitted before he is here next mentioned, ver. 22 being in the vulgar latine called the Bishop of the Levites, because, as Lyra sayth, he that is over Ecclesiasticall persons, is properly a Bishop, if they be Priests, but here he granteth, that this name is improperly by extention of it, put upon the Ruler over Levites, the word therefore used in Hebrew is better, Prapostinus, or the President.

Verf. 1.

Verf. 2.

Verf. 3.

Verf. 6.

Verf. 8.

Verf. 12.

Verf. 13.

Verf. 14.

Verf. 18.

Verf. 19.

Verf. 20.

Verf. 21.

Lyra.Pellican.Iunius.

Verf. 22.

Lyra.

- Verf. 23. And he is said to be Huzzi, of the posterity of Asaph the Musicians over the work in the house of the Lord, in Hebrew, over against the work, or neere the work, or ministry of Gods house, the meaning is, that the children of Asaph were set to sing within the house, as other Levites before spoken of without, ver. 16. Lastly, concluding about the Levites, hee saith, that this was done according to the Kings Commandement, which Lyra would have understood of King Darius, 1 Chron. 24. but others better understanding it of King Artaxerxes, say, that reference is herein had to Ezra 7. 21, 22, 24. where the liberality of that King for the maintenance of the service of the Temple is set forth, for here it is said, the Kings command was, that each one of them should have a certainty daily. Thus also R. Solomon. And to see this done, Petabiah, of the Tribe of Judah, was appointed by the King Artaxerxes, ample power being given him to take provision up for this purpose.
- Verf. 25, 26, 27, &c. From hence to the end of the Chapter, nothing else is shewed, but what other Townes and Cities were inhabited by other children of Judah and of Benjamin.

CHAP. XII.

- Lyra.* Being now about to relate the Dedication of the Wall of Ierusalem, hee first enumerateth the chief of the Priests and Levites, who were present at this work, beginning yet higher, Verse 1, 2. &c. with those that came to Ierusalem with Zorobabel and Ieshuah, many yeares before, but 1 Chron. 9. there is a more exact catalogue of them, and therefore they are the more briefly here passed over: yet they are here commemorated together, that we might know what high Priests here were from the return out of captivity during the reign of the Persians even unto Alexander the Great. Whereas Ezra is here sayd to be one of them, and yet Ezra 7. 7. he telleth of himself that hee went to Ierusalem the seventh of Artaxerxes. Lyra sayth, that having gone up to Ierusalem, at the first he returned again to Babylon, to obtain more favour of the Persian Kings, and having prevailed, he went again in this Kings seventh yeare. But because that from the first going up to Ierusalem, untill the seventh yeare of Artaxerxes were above seventy yeares, this is not so probable, because so it must needs follow, that Ezra was now above 100 yeares old, because men in those days scarce lived so long, and if they lived, were decrepit and so unable for service, as Ezra was not, Nehem. 8. I should think therefore, that in this enumeration of those, that came Zerubbabel, it is not meant, that Ezra was one, but as Iunius also hath it, two ascendings to Ierusalem are here put together, one with Zorobabel, the other with Ezra many yeares after. But an exact reckoning of the high Priests is made, Verse 10. from Ieshuah the first, that returned out of captivity to Ioiadabab, who is sayd to have lived, till the time of Alexander the Great. And these were Ioiakim, Eliafib, Ioiada, and Jonathan, the chief Priests and Levites, of whose times here follow in order, and first in the time of Ioiakim, Verse 12. 2 In the time of Eliafib Verse 22. 3 In the time of Jonathan, his sonnes sonne, Verse 23. And these are sayd to have been in the time of Ioiakim, and Nehemiah, and Ezra, so that they out-lived three high Priests, and now were present at the Dedication of the City. And other ordinary Levites were called from other parts to this Dedication.
- Verf. 10, 11. Then the Priests and Levites clenfed themselves first, and after that the people, the gates and the wall, that is, according to the legall rites of clenfing in case of uncleannesse contracted by the dead or otherwile. The clenfing of the Priests, sayth Lyra, was by fasting, abstinence from their wines, and sprinkling of the water made of the ashes of a red Cow, of the people by sprinkling only, and of the Levites both by it and one of the other. For more must be done to the clenfing of Priests then of Levites, and more of Levites then of the people. But because the Priests and Levites clenfing of themselves is first spoken of, then their clenfing of the people, hee noteth well, that who so would reform others must first reforme himself, according to which Christ sayth, First, cast the beame one of thine owne
- Verf. 16. Note.
- Verf. 27, 28.
- Verf. 30.
- Lyra.*

eye, and then thou shalt see, &c. And without cleansing no man is fit to beare a part, or to be present at the praying of God : for hereby a preparation to this Dedication was made

Then I made the Princes of Iudah to go upon the wall, &c. The Dedication was made by two precessions of Priests, Levits, Princes, and all sorts of people going upon the wall, and praying God with Trumpets, Voyces, and other Instruments of Musicke, as they went along, one company right over against another on the right hand, which was towards the South, and on the left towards the North.

After the precessions followed sacrificing in the house of the Lord, of which it is sayd, And two companies of them that praised God, stood in the house of the Lord, &c. that is, the same companies, that went before upon the wall, or some Princes priests, and Levits chosen out of them.

Lastly, Treasurers were at the same time appointed over the first fruits and tythes for the mayntenance of the priests and Levits, as David and Solomon had anciently appointed. And it is sayd, that all the people gave portions to the Singers and porters, and sanctified the Levits, and the Levits sanctified the sonnes of Aaron, that is, sayth Lyra, the people by paying tythes to them acknowledged their superiority to God ward, and they likewise by paying tythe of their tythes to the priests, magnified them as their superiours, as Abraham by paying tythe to Melchisedeck, acknowledged him to be greater, as is shewed, Heb. 7. But in the Hebrew text, it is not the people sanctified the Levits, &c. but they sanctified to the Levits, and the Levits to the sonnes of Aaron, which was done by setting them apart as consecrated for their uses.

Vers. 31.

Vers. 40, 41.
42, 43.

Vers. 44.

Vers. 47.

Lyra.

CHAP. XIII.

THE history of the acts of Nehemiah being hitherto set forth before his return to Artaxerxes, in the 12 yeare of his Principality granted him over Israel : now it is shewed, how he found things in Jerusalem at another time of his coming thither, by a second leave obtained of the King, ver. 6. So that the first words here, In that time it was read in the Book of Moses, in the audience of the people, &c. are to be understood of the time, when Nehemiah came again from the King to Jerusalem. The scope of this Chapter then is to shew, what abuses crept in amongst the Jews whilst he was gone. which put him to a new trouble at his coming again to reforme them, thus Junius, but Lyra saith, that by the time in which the Law was read, is meant, that Nehem. 9. when as according to that which they found written, they separated themselves from the Heathens. And then it is to be taken as a declaration more particularly made of that which was read at the same time against the Ammonites and Moabites in generall amongst other Heathens with whom marriages were forbidden to be made. For there it is said, that they separated from all that were of another off-spring, but here, that it was read in the Law in particular, that an Ammonite or Moabite should not come into the congregation, because they were not the children of Israel, &c. And this is thus commemorated for an introduction to the fault committed by Eliafib, by reason of a marriage made before by him with the family of Tobiah the Ammonite, as he is called Chap. 2. 10. and this was according to Pellican, by joyning his sonne in marriage with the daughter of Tobiah, for hereby such friendship came to be between them two, that Eliafib being over the chambers of the house of the Lord, let him have a great chamber there, which was onely to lay provision in for the Temple, for which he was greatly too blame. And this was the first abuse which crept in whilst Nehemiah was absent, whereat he was much moved when he came and saw it, as at a very grievous sin, and therefore he immediately cast out the utensils of Tobiah, purged the chamber, and brought in such things as were for the use of the Temple. Now the time when Nehemiah is said to have come again and done this, is said to be, at the end of dayes, certain years being past, Junius, at the end of his dayes or life, sayth Lyra, Vers. 1.

Junius.

Lyra.

Deut 23. 3.

Vers. 6.

Junius.

Lyra.

Fuccijs.

Vers. 9.

Vers. 10.

Vers. 11, 12.

Vers. 14.

Vers. 15.

Note.

Vers. 19.

Vers. 22.

Vers. 23.

Vers. 28.

Chap. 29.

Note.

Vers. 30.

when he now waxed old, he had a desire to goe and reforme things amisse at Jerusalem, and to die and lay his bones there, so likewise Fuccijs, the eighth yeare after his returne to Artaxerxes, which was also the last yeare of his reigne. But Varatius and Genebrad say, that by the end of dayes is meant, the end of a yeare, which seemeth not to have bin so, because Nehemiah at his departure from Jerusalem to the King, left all things in good order, & now they were greatly out of order, yea, even so much, as one cannot think they could have been in so short a time, as will appear by that which here followeth. For it was no finall, but a great chamber that Eliash made in this time for him, for so the word signifieth, which is, W and not onely he prepared, but now the stufte of Tobiah by Nehemiahs command being cast out, and the room purged, the vessels of the house of the Lord were laid in there.

Now besides this, there was another great sin committed, to the pejudice of Gods worship, and to the breaking of the Covenant, to which whilst Nehemiah was amongst them, they had subscribed and sealed, Chap. 10. 39. For whereas they there bound themselves to give portions to the Levites, and never to suffer the service of the Lords house to goe down, they since gave none of those portions unto them, by reason whereof they were gone, each man to his place in the Countrey, and so Gods service was neglected at the Temple. He therefore, secondly, gathered the Levites again together, and dealing sharply with the Princes of the people, caused the tithes to be brought into their storehouse, and set some to oversee and distribute them, praying that God would have in remembrance the good which he thus did, as he had prayed also before, Chap. 5. 19. Thirdly, finding that some were grown very prophane, for he saw some treading wine-presses, and some carrying burthens of wares upon the Sabbath day, he contested against them, that is, challenged them as impious for thus doing, and provokers of Gods wrath against that place, as appeareth, ver. 17, 18. He addeth also that they did not onely bring, but sold, and so kept markets upon the Sabbaths, and there were certain Tyrians dwelling there, who kept these markets, and sold at those times unto the Jews those wares. Whereby it appears that it was taken for a worke forbidden by the fourth Commandement, upon the Sabbath to buy and sell, for which Markets and Fairs upon our Christian Sabbath, have been well put down in our Land. And to prevent the like doings for time to come, he caused the gates of Jerusalem to be kept shut all the Sabbath day, that none might come in upon that day any more with their wares, threatening such with the stocks as came to the City notwithstanding. And he charged the Levites to cense themselves, and to look to the gates upon the Sabbath dayes.

Fourthly, Seeing Jews who had marryed Ammonitish and Moabitish women, by whom they had children, that spake Ahdodean and other Heathen Languages, he cursed and smote some of them, plucking off their haire, and adjuring them against such marriages, and shewing the mischief that had formerly come hereby. All which abuses, and specially the last, argueth strongly that Nehemiah was absent much more then a yeare before he returned to Jerusalem, seeing strange wives were in that time marryed, and children were borne of such marriages, and grown up to bee able to speake divers tongues.

Thus Nehemiah having told what hee did to the people sinning by mixt marriages, vers. 28. hee telleth, that there was a sonne of Iojadab the sonne of Eliash the High-priest, who by such a marriage became sonne in law to Sanballat, the Horonite, him hee therefore chased away, as committing a more foule sin then the rest, seeing he was more streightly bound to keepe the Law, being a teacher thereof, and of a most holy function, and by such an example others were corrupted. And not content to abdicate such a monster onely, he prayed to God against such polluters of the Priestly office. Corruptio optimi est pessima, and therefore no marvell, though Ministers of the Gospel being of scandalous lives, are now adayes most detested of all others. Ver. 30. Therefore I purged them from all strange women, that is, by causing them to be put away, and set the Priests and Levites in order, every one in his Ministry, reforming the abuse spoken of Vers. 10.

ESTER.

ESTER, CHAP. I.

*I*N the dayes of Ahashueroſh, who reigned from India to Ethiopia, over 127 Provinces. Which of the Persian Kings Ahashueroſh was, is not agreed amongst Expoſitours. For ſome, as Lyra ſaith, hold that he was the eighth from Cyrus, the next unto Darius Nothus.

But this he confuteth, by reckoning the years which paſſed before that time, viz, in Cyrus his reigne 12, in Cambyses 8, Darius Hiſtaſpis 36, Xerxes 20, Artaxerxes 40, Darius ſecundus, two moneths, Sogdianus 7, Darius Nothus 19, being altogether 135 before which Mordecai was borne, viz. before the Babylonish captivity, which laſted 70 years, as he proveth by the 11 Chapter of Eſter, being Apocryphall, and alſo Eſter 2.6. which is Canonically, where it is ſaid, that he came into captivity with Jechoniah, and if ſo, then he muſt be much above 200 years old at the beginning of Ahaſhueruſh his reigne, and yet live and come to honour long after, which cannot be. Therefore ſome hold him to have been Artaxerxes, as Joſephus, but neither will the time permit this, ſeeing too many years paſſed from the captivity hitherto, viz. 156. He therefore ſubſcribeth to R. Solomon, who ſaith that he was the next King to Cyrus, but even thus alſo the years will not agree, becauſe from the captivity to that time were 82 years, and ſome years muſt needs be yeilded to have been on his back at the time of the captivity, and ſome after the beginning of this Kings reigne, and ſo he could not be leſſe when he was firſt promoted to honour by Ahaſhueruſh then 90 yeares old, an age too great for ſuch affairs, as were after this managed by him. Moreover, that Ahaſhueruſh, otherwiſe called Cambyses, who reigned next after Cyrus, never had any love to the people of God, neither would he permit the Jews to proceed in building the Temple, whereas this Ahaſhueruſh having a Jew to his Queene, and Mordecai his Uncle in ſo much honour, would not doubtleſſe hinder them in a work which they ſo greatly deſired to doe. Funccius therefore holdeth that he was Darius Hiſtaſpis, as hath been already ſhewed, upon Ezra 6.14. But then we muſt not admit that Mordecai had a being in the time of the Babylonish captivity, according to Eſter. 11. except it were in the loynes of his father, as ſome ſay, whereunto alſo ſome light is given, Ezra 2.2. In ſome others but onely, that he was one of them that came out of it with Zorobabel, according to Ezra 2.2. As for his name differing, it was common for thoſe Kings to be called by divers names, as appeareth in his predeceſſour Artaxerxes, who was alſo called Ahaſhuerus. And to place this King next after Cyrus but one, will better agree with Mordecai's age; ſit to govern under the King, as he did, Chap. 10. 2. then if we take Artaxerxes, the next after Xerxes to be the King Ahaſhueruſh here meant. For ſo accounting Mordecai but 20 at the time of his return out of captivity, he muſt needs be 94 at the leaſt, when this King began to reigne, although we reckon but 18 to Cyrus and Cambyses, for add theſe unto his age of 20 at his return, and thereunto the yeares of Darius his reigne 36, and of Xerxes 20, and they altogether make 94. But allowing Darius Hiſtaſpis to be this Ahaſhueruſh, his being by this account at that time, not much above 40. But however, Funccius be herein backed by Carian, Buningius, Samerinus, &c. and by a concurrence of the times, the circumſtance of the feaſt, the largeneſſe of his Dominion, &c. all agreeing to this Darius, yet ſome except againſt it, averring, Artaxerxes Longimanus to be the man. Becauſe Herodotus who hath accurately written the ſtory of this Darius, and enumerated all his wives being five, yet he writeth nothing of Vaſhti, or any wife put away, or of Heſter Verſ. 1.

Lyra.Joſephus
Sallianus.Ezra 4.6.Funccius.Sallianus.
Joſephus, lib.
11. Ant. c. 6.
Sever. Sulpis.
lib. 2. hiſt.
ſacre.

or

or Haman in his time. 2 Because the names Artaxerxes and Ahashueroth, are promiscuously used to set forth one and the same man, but not of Darius. But because stronger objections lye against this opinion, as first, That some Provinces were falne from the Persian Kings in the dayes of Xerxes, so that he could not be said to reigne over 127 Provinces. Secondly, he was so much occupied in warre, and so long with the Grecians and Egyptians, &c. that he had no leasure to attend to feasting so many dayes together by his third year. 3 As was said before, the age of Mordecai not agreeing, I hold rather to Funccius, assuming Darius Hystaspis to be the man, although Herodotus omitteth this History in his time, for so he doth also in the time of Artaxerxes: and for Iosephus, he in many places of his History erreth so much, as that his relation touching this is but of uncertain credit. And for the exception taken to the name, it is of no moment, seeing all those Kings had divers names, whereas some will have Darius Nothus and Ochus to be understood by Ahashueroth, because Ezra maketh no mention of Ester, touching whom he would not certainly have been silent, if this history of her had happened in his time: this is of too little moment to weigh against the time, much lesse agreeing then to Artaxerxes Longimanus, besides that no memorable thing was done by him for the Jewes, as was by this Ahashueroth. Ianius differing from both theise, will have Xerxes to be the man, because that he in the second year of his reigne, having brought Egypt to his obedience, might well now for joy thereof, make this great feast: and for Darius Hystaspis he saith, that Herodotus reckoning up the Provinces that he reigned over, numbred not so many. But seeing Xerxes had no more then Darius left him, this makes as well against him, as against his father.

And thus much for the decision of the question about this King, now to proceed to his royall feasting.

Verf. 2.

Lyra.

Verf. 4.

Verf. 5.

Lyra.

When Ahashueroth sat upon his throne in the Palace of Shushan, in the third year of his reign he made a feast to all his Princes, &c. That in the Metropolitan City of the Persian Kings, the vulgar Latine to expresse this hath it, Shushan was the beginning of his Kingdom, that is, sayth Lyra, the chiefe City. And he is said now in his third year to have sitten upon his Throne, because he was now established therein, and he made this royall feast to win the more love amongst his Princes, by whose free election he had attained that Kingdom, as was shewed before, and that his glory and wealth appearing herein, might make them all the more willingly to live in subjection to him, so royall and munificent a Prince. The time of this feast was wonderfully long, viz. 180 dayes, and when the time of the feast was ended, he invited all the people of Shushan both great and small, to a feast of seven dayes, in the entrance of the Kings garden, in Hebrew it is, In the fulfilling of these dayes: For whereas it may seeme, according to the common reading, When these dayes were fulfilled, that another time of 7 dayes feasting is hereby set forth, for the Citizens of Shushan, and so many Expositours gather: The words in the Originall may well admit of another meaning, according to some, viz. that the feast time for the Princes yet continuing, upon the seven last dayes of those 180 the inhabitants of Shushan were invited, and because it was not fit for such a miscellany company of the common sort to be feasted in the Kings Palace, together with the Princes and greatest men of the Kingdom, they were entertained without, but in most costly Tents and pleasurable places, that is, in the Kings garden, affording all manner of delights. And then the words may be expounded thus, when the time of this long continuing feast was now expiring, viz. in the last seven dayes thereof, he made a feast for all the inhabitants of the City, the Princes feast also continuing still. And that it must needs be thus understood, is shewed, ver. 11, where the King is said to send for the Queen, to shew her beauty to the Princes and people at the end of these seven dayes, wherefore the Princes continued still feasting with him when this was done. But of all Expositours, Lyra seemeth to me to erre most about these times of feasting, in that he sayth, that this feast was in preparing 180 dayes, but the feasting was not till after these dayes expired, at which time both Princes and people were feasted together seven dayes. Because there is a plain distinction made of the time and of the persons feasted, the first Princes, &c. 180 dayes, then of the Citizens seven dayes.

of

The place where this feast was kept, is said to have been hanged with tapestry, white, green, and red, supported by pillars of marble, by strings of silke, and ringles of ivory. There were also beds of gold and silver for the guests to sit and eat upon, after the old manner, and the pavement was of Smarage and Marble of divers colours. And they drank in cups of gold, no man being compelled, but every one drinking what he pleased, and they had of the best wine. And it is said, the Kings Commandement was that none should be urged to drinke more then he pleased, that is, sayth Josephus, according to the custome of the Persians, who at other festivall times compelled men to drinke, but now the King forbad and provided that that custome might not be followed. And Lyra well declaimeth against it, as most unciwill and unseemly, and brought up first by Barbarians in Normandy, who came and depopulated that Countrey.

And whilst the King was feasting with the men, the Queen feasted the women in the Kings Pallace, and at the end of the seven dayes, the King being merry with wine, sent to have Queen Vashti brought unto him, &c. But shee refusing to come by the advice of his seven Councillours, the chiefe Princes of Persia and Media, shee was put away, and a decree made that every man should rule in his own house, and this was published in all Provinces in their own tongue. Here Lyra excuseth this Queen from contempt, holding that shee did it out of modesty, which forbad the wives of Persian Princes to be seen of any other men but their own husbands, so likewise Josephus, who excepteth also those of their family, yet Mimuchan tooke it for a contempt, as it seemeth, and the King likewise, and therefore put her away.

Now whereas the seven Princes are described by this, that they saw the Kings face, it is commonly expounded, that they conversed familiarly with him, and were daily in his company. Of the seven Councillours of the Persian Kings, see also Ezra 7. 14. And thus a feast celebrated a long time with great pleasure, ended in bitterness, for which some condemne this Council as most unjust, both because the law and custome of the Persians, to preserve modesty in great women, was not regarded, and a greater punishment was inflicted, then this refusall was worthy of, especially seeing sometime the shewing of a mans wife that hath been very beautifull, hath caused destruction to the husband, as to Candaules the Lydian. But although this was foolishly done, and unjustly in respect of men, yet God had doubtlesse an hand in it, both to turn the excessive pleasure in this long vainglorious feast into pain, and to cause it to bring forth such an unpleasing effect, and to make way thus for Esters preferment, and consequently for the preservation of his people Israel, as is hereafter declared.

For the mysticall signification, Rabanus and others doubt not, but that under this History, the mystery of Christ and his Church is set forth, by Ahasuerus Christs reigning far and wide, by Vashti the Jewish Synagogue, by Ester, the Church of the Gentiles, by Haman, the Devill, and by Mordecai, Paul and the other Apostles. More particularly, Ahasuerus making a great feast in his third yeare, setteth forth Christ in the third age of the world, making a spirituall feast by preaching the glad tydings of salvation to all the primitive believers, who as his Princes came thereunto, but towards the end of this feasting time, all, both great and small, inhabiting this royall City, that is, the Church, shall be feasted, when all enemies of the Church shall be destroyed. For unto a feast is the preaching of the Gospel compared, Mat. 22. and it should not seem strange that an Heathen King should be made a Type of Christ, seeing Cyrus also was one, and Solomon, that fell so foully, and Samson: For the Type lyeth not in the evill which was in any of them, but in some rare and excellent thing in them, as in this King munificence excelled and bounty towards all. The best wine of which the guests drank, and the bowles of gold, wherein set forth the greatest refreshing which is to the soule by the Gospel, and the riches of faith wherein it commeth: The hangings so delightfull and costly, and the beds and pavements so precious, the beauty of the Church through the whitenesse of charity, the greenesse of faith

Verf. 6.

Josephus.

Lyra.
Note.

Verf. 9.

Verf. 10.

The Mystery:
Rabanus.

Glos. ord.

that

that never fadeth, and the red of the bloud of Martyrs, and the firme foundation of the Church, and how the faithfull ſit here in heavenly places, as in beds of gold. Whereas no man was compelled to drink, this ſhewed, that none are againſt their wils made Chriſtians, but if thou wilt enter into life, ſayth Chriſt, goeſell, &c. they onely that would, ſold their poſſeſſions, &c.

The Queen ſent for, but reſuſing to come, did ſet forth the Church of the Jews, which was therefore put away, as ſhee by the advice of Memuchan, the laſt of the ſeven Councellours. For ſo the Jews were put away, as it were from being a people, when Paul, the laſt of the Apoſtles was made the mouth to pronounce, From henceforth we leave you, and goe to the Gentiles, and being now no longer a people, they are no ſpoule to the great King Chriſt Jeſus, as Hof. 2.

CHAP. II.

Verſ. 1.

Joſephus, lib. 11. antiq.

WHen the anger of the King was pacified, he called to minde Vaſhti, &c. That is, ſayth Joſephus, being grieved when he thought upon her beauty, and the great love which he formerly bare unto her, and upon the ſlight occaſion that he had taken to put her away, ſhee haply reſuſing to come onely in modeſty, not out of contempt. For the decree he could not reverſe, neither durſt he for feare of the Princes that would not endure it ſo to be done, but would thereupon have been ready to rebell againſt him, to the indangering of his Crown, eſpecially, he being not of the Royall bloud. But when his ſervants about him perceived his trouble, and the perplexity of his minde about this thing, they to remove it deviſed to make a pleaſing propoſition to him of another moſt beautifull woman, in whom he might moſt delight, by him to be choſen out of all the faireſt virgins in all his Dominions, whom he might make his Queen inſtead of Vaſhti. The King hearing this immediately agreed to it, and it was done accordingly. Now amongſt others that were gathered together to the Kings Palace, Eſter was one, being Mordecai his Uncles daughter, a very beautifull virgin, and under the government of Mordecai her kiſman, who after the death of her father and mother, adopted her for his daughter, whereas the vulgar Latine hath it, his brothers daughter, Salluſtus and Serrar: themſelves confeſſe it to be an error, ſuppoſing one word to be left out, viz. patris, ſeeing it ſhould have been his fathers brothers daughter, as it is in the Greeke. The family of which Mordecai came, was the ſame of which Saul came, viz. of Kiſh, of the tribe of Benjamin. But whereas it is ſaid that hee was carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar, when Jechoniah King of Judah was carryed away to Babylon, this was partly touched before, is to be underſtood in his fathers loyns, becauſe he muſt needs be then unborn, ſeeing the captivity laſted 70 years, and if he in perſon had been then carryed captive, and had been but ſeven years old, he was by the third yeare of Darius Hiſtaſpis here called Ahaſhueruſh, 98 years old at the leaſt, and ſo 102 by that time Eſter went into the King, for it was in the ſeventh yeare of his reigne, verſ. 16. which paſſed the age of man in thoſe times.

Verſ. 2.

Joſephus.

Or it that Artaxerxes who is called by Ezra Ahaſhueruſh be the King here meant, he muſt be above 90, which is as unprobable. Here he is alſo ſaid to have been of Shuſhan, but brought firſt into Babylon, whereupon Joſephus ſayth, that he dwelt in Babylon, when Eſter was taken for the King, but then for the love of her he removed to Shuſhan. But here it is ſaid, that he was then in Shuſhan. Wherefore it ſeemeth, that although he was brought in his fathers loyns to Babylon, yet his dwelling was now in this City. The Virgins gathered together, of whom Eſter was one, are ſaid to be many, and by Joſephus 400, which is not improbable, the Provinces out of which, being 127, and they were under the hand of Hege, keeper of the women. In whoſe eyes, becauſe ſhe ſeemed good, and obtained grace with him, he ſpeedily gave her her purifying and her parts, &c. The vulgar Latine hath it, and the King commanded the Eunuch to give her, &c. which Lyra, Pellican, &c. following, apply therefore not to Hege, but to the King, as if theſe words, She found grace in his ſight, had been ſpoken of the King, whereas Verſ. 8.

in-

indeed she came not yet into his sight, but as it is said, vers. 15. all that saw her praised her, so here, Hege was taken with her favour and beauty at her first coming, and did for his part all that he could to shew how well he conceived of her above all the rest, preferring her also to the chiefe place in the womens house to as bide in, till shee was prepared to goe in to the King. The parts given her were for diet, ornament, and purifying. Now the acceptation which shee found beyond other Virgins with him, with all others that saw her, and finally with the King, was by a secret providence of God, ruling in all hearts, and making her more amiable, that shee might being thus advanced become an happy instrument to deliver his people from the danger of destruction plotted against them by wicked Haman.

But shee shewed not her kinned; for Mordecai had charged her not to doe it; because, sayth Lyra, the Jews were captives and servant, and therefore if shee had been known to be a Jew, it was likely that shee should have been rejected. If it shall seeme strange that shee should be taken in without questioning about her kinned, it is to be supposed, that dwelling in Shushan shee was thought to have been a Persian, as others commonly were who dwelt in that City, and therefore no question was hereabout moved, and the rather because her exceeding beauty was such, that none had a desire any way to hinder, but to further her advancement to the Kings society, and also working in this matter, so as that they could doe no otherwise. And yet had her kinned been known, it was a royall race of which shee came, for Mordecai and shee were of the same family with King Saul.

For the manner of purifying the Virgins which were prepared for the King, it was six moneths with oile of myrrh, the vertue whereof, sayth Lyra, was to mundifie the flesh, and six moneths with sweet spices, to make her flesh to smell sweet. And good reason, sayth Pellican, that it should be thus done, and that shee should be fed also with a finer diet, because in those Countreys womens bodies, without means first used, were not haply so delicate, and some others of a meaner condition might have had to doe with them before. This being done, it was long yet before Esters time came to goe in to the King, for shee went not till the tenth moneth, in the seventh yeare of his reigne, which was the fourth yeare after the putting away of Vashti. It seemeth then that of these Virgins, some were brought into the womens house to Hege before others, who having been, many of them, with the King before her, yet the King tooke no such liking to any one, as to make her Queen as her, vers. 17. it is said, that he did to her. And this is said by Josephus, to have been done in the 12 moneth, that is, two moneths after the time of her first coming in unto him, but the Greek translation makes her coming in to him to be in the 12 moneth.

If it be demanded here, Was Ester so godly a woman brought in to the King as an whore? or how happened it, that shee consented to such a marriage, seeing the Jews might not marry with heathen Idolatours.

All the Virgins which came in to the King were his concubines, that is, wives of an inferiour ranke, which piety in a good woman did not abhor from in those times, when Kings commonly had both wives and concubines. And for her consenting to marry with an Heathen, 1 He was none of the Nations prohibited. 2 He was not meely Heathen, but was indued with some knowledge of the true God, whether he were Darius Histaspis, or Artaxerxes Longimanus, as their Histories in Ezra and Nehemiah doe declare. 3 There was hope that shee might be a meanes to further him in piety, and not be corrupted by him; seeing it may be noted indeed, that men have been corrupted by marrying idolatrous wives, but women never by such husbands, although it is true, that they are both alike forbidden, and Ester 14. shee confessed that shee delighted not in this worldly glory, and accompanying an uncircumcised man and a stranger, but was unto it necessitated. Therefore when shee went in to the King, shee asked nothing of Hege to set her forth the more, but took onely what he would have her, shewing that shee tooke no pleasure herein, whereas other Virgins were very curious, to give him all the content that they could, and therefore would have all things that they could think

H

Pellican

Vers. 10.
Lyra.Vers. 12.
Lyra.

Pellican.

Vers. 16.

Quest.

Answ.

thinke upon to adorne them, yet she had more grace in the eyes of all that saw her, because she was of her selfe very beautifull and withall modest, and of the best composed behaviur, and meek and silent, which are the greatest ornaments of a woman, the Lord working also in the Kings heart, that he could make none other his Queen but her.

Verf. 18.

Josephus.
Lyra.

When Abisuerus took Ester to wife, and made her his Queen, hee for the greater glory of this his marriage, and the gracing of Ester, made another royall feast to all his Princes and servants, and gave rest to all Provinces and gifts, &c. of what continuance this feast was, it is not here said, but Josephus reports it to be an whole month. The rest which he gave, sayth Lyra, is expounded by some to have been from labour, by others, from paying Tribute for a yeare, or halfe a yeare, which is the more probable, because to cease long from work would have been no benefit, but rather an hindrance to the common people, that lived upon their labour. It seemeth to me, because it is added, And he gave gifts magnifically, that with these gifts he caused them in all his Provinces to make merry at this time, which that they might doe, they kept an Otium, and rested for that time. Iunius renders it, dedit immunitatem, the Septuagint remissionem, others, tributorum cessationem, but the Hebrew word is rest, implying rest as at Festivals. The word rendered gifts, is in Hebrew a gift, expounded by Iunius, of some great gift given unto Ester, after the Persian manner; by others of the revenues of some City given unto her as a dowry. But because the giving of nothing to her is expressed here, I rather hold with some others, that although it be a gift in the singular number, yet the word is not to be so restrained, but that under it, all the gifts which he bountifully gave to every Province are to be understood. Wherefore the meaning is, he gave a gift to each Province, according to the magnificence of a King, seeing to cause them to rest and keepe holy dayes for joy of this marriage had been nothing, unlesse his bounty had been also extended towards them to beare them out herein.

Iunius.

Verf. 19.
Lyra.

But whilst the Virgins were gathered the second time, and Mordecai sat at the Kings gate. Here Lyra, because he could not see why otherwise there should be a second gathering together of the Virgins, sayth, that the King was offended with Ester, because that asking her of her kindred she would not declare it, in so much that he caused a gathering together of more fair Virgins to be made, pretending for this contempt, to make another Queen, and therefore it is said, vers. 20. that Ester shewed not her kindred, &c. But Iunius renders it, a gynaece regis ad suase singula reciperent, as if nothing else were meant, but their returning from the Court to their own homes: but for this purpose certainly it would not have been said, that they were gathered together the second time, but rather, when they were dismissed. Vatablus conceiving that as Virgins were gathered together for the Kings second marriage, so they had been for his first with Vashti, and therefore it is of this said, as done the second time, when that conspiracie against the King happened, which is related, vers. 21. But because Ester was at the time thereof Queen, and this second gathering together, when she was but yet in election, it cannot be so understood. But it is rather to be held, that the history of the conspiracie, vers. 21. doth nothing appertain to this time, when the Virgins were gathered together, neither is that congregating of them spoken of to intimate so much, but onely the constancie of Ester in obeying Mordecai that had brought her up, not onely at the first taking of her into the Court, but also the third year of her being there, till she came to be Queene and after, so that Mordecai as unknown in what relation he stood to the Queen, sat yet as an ordinary man at the Kings gate. Thus Sallianus both confuting Vatablus and confirming his own. But against this maketh, vers. 21. where it is said, in those dayes, plainly shewing this to have been the time spoken of, whilst the Virgins being gathered together for this second marriage, and Ester amongst them, Mordecai sat at the Kings gate. It is therefore more probable, according to Vatablus that here is a description of the time when the conspiracie was made, yet it is not said that Virgins were congregated the second time, implying that it was so done once before, for that is uncertain, but when the King was to take a Queen unto him the second time, and so it is as if it had been said, when the Virgins were gathered, viz. the second time that the King would take him a wife, he had put away Vashti the first, and now again Mordecai his sitting there, and Ester not bewraying her kindred, is repeated to make way to this relation of a conspiracie that happened before the marriage, but was hitherto omitted, whereas it hath been objected, that Ester was Queen, and she went and told the King, when Mordecai had disclosed it to her, this makes nothing against it, because it may well be thus understood. Mordecai knowing of this conspiracie, when Ester was yet a Virgin, but up on the top of her marriage, told her of it so soon as she was accepted of by the King, and she forthwith told it to the King. For that of Lya, because it is without ground. I passe it over.

Iunius.

Vatablus.

Sallianus.

In those dayes two of the Courtiers Bigthan and Theresh of the keepers of the Kings door were wroth, &c. The word here rendred by Junius, imanis, of the threshould, whereby we may understand the doore may better, sayth Lya, be understood of the household stuffe, for the word signifieth both, and if they were keepers of the household stuffe, they might more easily come to kill the King, than if they were Porters. I follow the common reading, and if they kept his chamber door, who knoweth not, but that no suspicion being had of them, they might easily come at the King: and it is the more probable that they were Porters, because Mordecai sitting at the Kings gate, most probably, by the acquaintance which he attained to with them, came to the knowledge of their conspiracie. And it is not to be doubted but that they kept their bloody intention secret, communicating of it only between themselves. What was the cause of this their conspiracie is not said, but some think because he rejected Vashti, some, because Haman being a Macedonian moved them unto it, that the King being taken away, the Kingdom might be translated to the Macedonians: and some, that the preferment of Mordecai was by them envied. Of which three the second seemeth to be confirmed, because Chap. 12.6. it is said, that Haman sought the destruction of Mordecai for his bewraying of these two conspiratours. But neither was Haman a Macedonian, but an Amalekite, neither was this the cause of his spleen against Mordecai, but because he would not for reverence rise up unto him, so that the adjections to Ester thus plainly contradicting the authentick History, plainly shew the ignorance of him that made them. And for the last, Mordecai his preferment could not be the matter of provocation to these two, because it was not till after this, seeing he yet sat at the Kings gate, and the first beginning of his promotion was the recounting of his discovering this treason for which they were executed. There can then be no other reason imagined, but the putting away of Vashti, and the preparing for another marriage. At this therefore they haply took indignation, and would have killed him; but Mordecai being full of hope, that Ester should be Queen, that he together with her might come into favour at the Court; learning this treason out discovered it. For the means of his coming to the knowledge hereof, Iosephus saith, that one Pharnabazus a Jew, that served one of these men, perceiving it, certified Mordecai of it. But R. Solomon that they spake of it between themselves in the Tharsian tongue, not thinking that Mordecai, who sat by, understood them, yet he not being ignorant of that tongue perceived it, and told the Queen, and thence the King, and so they were both, when it was found true, hanged, and this was entered into the Kings Annals by Mordecai his name. Howsoever Mordecai came to the knowledge of it, there was certainly a divine providence in it, that thus a foundation might be laid to his future preferment for the common good of the Jews, being then the Church and people of God: For the mystery of these things, many Virgins gathered together, and put under the hand of Hege, prefigured many Churches of the Gentiles under the hands of faithfull Ministers, amongst whom one Ester, that is, hidden, or Edeffa, that is, obtaining mercie, is chiefly beloved, to shew that amongst the faithfull, called together for Christ out of all Countries, there is a select company most gracious in his eyes, viz. which his Ministers are best pleased with, and therefore are most intent to give her, even without asking, all ornaments of instruction that may best set her forth to this King, and thence is finally crowned, and great joy and feasting

Vers. 21.

Lya.

Scravin.

Gorion.

Septuagint.

Chap. 5. 1.

Chap. 3. 5.

Iosephus.

Vers. 22, 23.

The Mystery.

Mal. 3. 16.

and rest is at this coronation in heaven amongst the holy Angels, and this is at the end of the world, when there shall be a perpetuall Sabbath. And all this comes not from merit, but because shee obtaineth mercie, for of grace we are saved. And to come in acceptably to Christ, prepared shee must be with sweet ointment and spices to take away all offensive corruption, which is, when shee is sanctified by the spirit, and that compleatly. The rest of them that are called together, when they have received the faith, goe into another house, that is goe astray by sin, so as that unlesse they be called home to Christ in particular by serious repentance, they never come into the Kings company any more, and these are a great number to one that stands, for which it stands us in hand, if we would be the best beloved, to be most godly, for thus the soule becomes exceeding fair, and if we have wickedly erred, to endeavour by earnest prayer and repentance, that we may come in again. The conspiratours against the King, set forth Hereticks, who conspire to kill Christ in the hearts of the faithfull, by corrupting the faith, but the vigilant Pastour set forth by Mordecai, findes it out, and so preventeth this mischance, the true faith being upheld, and they hang in hell for it, but Mordecai his fidelity is put upon record, when a book of remembrance is written, and his promotion shall follow after, when to him that had the Talents and used them well, it shall be said, well done good servant, thou hast been faithfull in little, &c.

CHAP. III.

1 Sam. 15.

Lyra.

Pellican.

Vers. 2.

Vers. 4.

Lyra.

Here is the History of Haman, of *Agag*s posterity, who had beene King of the Amalekites, the most deadly enemies of the Jews, and being for this destroyed without partiality by Saul, both young and old, males and females, there was now an inveterate hatred in such, as chanced to escape them, against all the Jewish Nation, which made Haman so readily to take occasion against them for Mordecai his sake, as here followeth. Whereas Chap. 15. Lyra sayth, that Haman is called a Macedonian, and troubleth himselfe about reconciling it, this labour may well be saved, seeing hee is neyther so called there, but Chap. 16. 10. and if he were, it is not the only error of those adjections bewraying the ignorance of him, that wrote them, as hath been partly touched before. Pellican assenteth not to this, that Haman was an Amalekite, although descended of Agag, because there might be a man of another Nation of the same name, but for so much as divers Nations have diversity of names, and seldome is a name peculiar to a man of one Nation, given to one of another, although in the same Nation oftentimes it is, and hee guesseth not at any other Nation of which hee might bee, and the Amalekites of all Nations hated the Jews most, I shall still hold according to the common opinion, that hee was an Amalekite. Unlesse it may be thought according to some, that hee was by the fathers side a Macedonian, by the mothers a Persian, being descended anciently of the Amalekites, and by place an Agagite: for Sulpitius sayth, that he was a Persian, and of Agag he is sayd here to come. But why did the King so highly exalt him above all others? Ans. Some imagine reasons, but truly no reasons can be given, but that which the King himself mentioneth, Ch. 13. 3. that he excelled all other men in wisdom and fidelity, so Joseph was advanced by Pharaoh, and Daniel by Darius, and Isaiah by Evilmerodah, although not for the same, but a divers reason, 2 King. 24. Whereas in this exaltation it is sayd, that all the Kings servants bowed their knees unto him, and worshipped him, for to the King had commanded, but Mordecai alone refused so to do, for he sayd that he was a Jew. It may be demanded what this worship was, seeing that of bowing the knee hath been commonly used amongst the Jews to great and honourable persons, as of Jaacob to Eson, seven times together, of David to Saul, Nathan to David, and of the Egyptians and *Joseph*s brethren to him. And Isaack in blessing Jaacob sayth, Let thy mothers Sonne bow unto thee. Ans. It was not civill but divine, for to the Persian Kings who would themselves be worshipped as Gods, most probably would have the same honour given to him, whom they pleased to advance, as their second, and this this is the cause alleaged by Mordecai himself of his refusal, Chap. 13. 12. and according to this those words of Mordecai, Verse 4. are to be construed, He told them that he was a Jew. that is, when he worshipped not Haman as they did, that they might herein rest satisfied, seeing it was commonly known that the Jews by their Laws might not worship any other, but the Lord their God, Deut. 6. 13. as it is rendred, Matth. 4. Pellican contrariwise holdeth, that hee might have adored him, as men commonly did the King, but because he thought this would be an humouring of him in his pride, hee refused, God singularly stirring him up thus to vex that proud Prince, that he might not have his ambitious desire fulfilled, but be crossed in his proud way to hinder his joy therein, and to make it seeme to him as nothing, and to make way to the magnifying of his power and his people, when upon occasion hereof their destruction was sought and they were so mightily deliverd. And if it be thus taken then, it is no example always to be imitated by others, and that must not be true, Chap. 13. 12. neyther must his telling them, that he was a Jew be taken, as having reference to Gods Laws but only as preparatory to the History following of Hamans attempts against the Jews, when hee knew this, and so no reason can well be rendred, why he told them of what Nation he was, I adhere therefore to the first. And if it be sayd, divine honour should also have bin denyed to the King, which how can it be conceived, that others as worthy men as Mordecai did not give, as Nehemiah, Ezra, and Zorobabel, seeing they had access to the Kings of their times, and access none might have without such adoration? Ans. It is most probable, that those Kings being favourers of those Jews; dispented with them, for their Religions sake, and so might Mordecai, and probably was afterwards dispented with by the King when he was advanced by him. But seeing the knee is bowed to Kings and other great persons in doing them civill honour, what more was required to be done to Haman, if the adoration required to be done to him were divine? Ans. There was doubtlesse no more done unto him or to the King himselfe, but yet it is sayd to be divine and unlawfull, because it was done in acknowledgment of some excellency super-humane; yea, divine in them, as the pride of their hearts put them on to require. Lysa to the same effect having argued much about bowing the knees to men concludeth it to be lawfull, and that the sin is only in the intention, when it is to honour man as a god. And for the like reason bowing the knee before an Image representatively, a god is unlawfull and abominable, because all worship done to that, which is set up meerly in relation to God is divine and so unlawfull and abominable: so that here is no place for civill worship, or douleia; but only for laupia, or divine. Some Hebrews say, that Hamans appaerell had Images upon it, which they worshipped that worshipped him, and some that man may be bowed unto with one knee, but not with both, that being too much honour, and peculiar to God only. Some that he had an Image hanging about his neck, and some that Mordecai looked at him as an Amalekite against whom the Jews must always be, by Gods expresse command, Exod. 17. and if so, then a Jew could not give honour to them.

Haman taking this refusal of Mordecai for a contempt of him, soon set his thoughts a work to plot the destruction of him and all the Jews. But that he might attempt this with the better successe, hee first caused Lots to be cast before him in the first moneth, the moneth Nisan, the 12 year of Abasurnus his Reigne, and thence forward from moneth to moneth unto the twelfth called Adar; that is, from March to February, so that he was plotting this mischief above ten moneths together, and to find out a good day, promising successe to move the King about it, and to prevaile herein, and it seemeth; that hee found the 13 day of Adar out as the best for this bloody execution. A Lot in the Persian tongue is called Phur, in Hebrew Gorall. Pagninus derives it yet from גור an Hebrew word signifying to break or bruise, for which a Wine-press is so called, and consequently the vessel, wherein Lots were cast, and Meionym: the Lot it self. Wherefore the vulgar Latine hath it Lots, in Hebrew Phur, and superstitious men were much addicted herunto, thinking thereby to be directed in choosing the best time for any enterprise, although by the example of Haman it appeareth to be plaine. He most probably Pellican.

Note.

Vers. 5, 6.

bably wrote the names of the twelve moneths of the year in severall papers, and put them together in a vessell stirring them together, and then one blindfolded pulled one out, having before prayed to the gods, that the moneth which first came out, might be the moneth for this execution, and the moneth Adar, which was the last was drawn, and the same it seemeth, being done from moneth to moneth, that moneth still comming out, at the last, when that moneth came, he by the like means found out what day of the moneth he should send out to have it done, and lighted upon the 13 day thereof. And herein his discretion is backed by Expositours, in that he laboured to finde out a good day for his end, but never considered that the King might deny him his request. But I see no cause, why we may not take his lot casting to be for both, viz. to move the King with success and to destroy the Jews, seeing he both moved and prevailed, and sent out about the execution, doing all upon the same day. But it is worth the noting, that when this cruell tyrant thirsted so much after the blood of the innocent Jews, he could not yet finde a time according to his own way to shed it, till almost a year after, so did the divine providence moderate even in his lots, and Ester had been wife now to the King five years to confirme his love towards her the more, and Mordecai was so little ambitious, that he would not have her yet to discover her people, and his relation unto her, that he might have come to a better place then to sit at the Kings gate amongst the common sort.

Note.

Vers. 8.

Haman having by lot found out a fit day, immediately moved the King against the Jews, saying, that they were a people that had singular new rites by themselves, that is, circumcision, adoration towards Jerusalem, and divers washings, and abstinence from some meats as unclean, and that they contemned the Kings commands, as this of bowing to Haman, whereby it might be gathered how stubborn they would be if they should be tried in other things. And he sayth, that they were dispersed in all parts of his Dominions, intimating that they might easily be destroyed by the people in every place where they lived, wherefore he besought him, that a decree might be sent out under his Signet, for the destroying of them, all their spoils being given to those that did the execution. And lest the damage which should hereby come to the King should make him averse from this motion, seeing a great tribute was hereby paid by the Jews, he offered to pay into the Kings treasury 10000 talents of silver in lieu thereof.

Vers. 10.

The King was no sooner desired, but without examining the truth of his allegations, he granted him liberty to doe what he would to them, so wise and faithful did he count him to be, and that he might have authority to doe so, he gave him his Signet, wherewith he immediately sealed letters written in to all parts in the Kings name, commanding this execution to be done upon men and women, young and old, upon the 13 day of the moneth Adar, that is, in the year following, because it required a long time before it could come to the knowledge of those that dwelt in remote parts, for Ephesus situated in the farthest parts of Asia, as Herodotus saith, was a journey of three moneths and seven dayes, and India as far from thence, and Egypt likewise all under the Persian King at this time, so that a years liberty was taken to send, and for the Jews enemies to prepare for their destruction, that they might be strong enough, and sufficiently armed against them, and the day of the moneth held now to be a fatal day for them kept for this enterprize without varying from it, lest if it should have been attempted upon any other day, it should not have succeeded. Thus it seemeth that when Haman sought out a fit day by lot, he intended it both to move the King, and to send out order for the execution and to have the said execution done. And thus a great doubt, which I see most Expositours to passe over in silence, may be relieved, viz. how the destruction of the Jews could be the same day in all parts that letters were wrote about it, and after this three dayes could be spent in fasting before it, and letters written two moneths after, viz. in the third moneth, time enough to prevent it, as they were, Chap. 8. 9. for betwixt the 13 day of the moneth Adar, in the 12 year of Ahasuerus, to the 13 of Adar in his 13 year, there was time enough for all these things.

Hieronym: l. 5.

2. 2. 2.

Vers. 15.

Things being thus ordered, the King and Haman were merry and feasted, but the the poor Jews in Shushan were full of perplexity, for there the Kings decree was first hanged up publicly that all might see it.

By Haman thus exalted signifying iniquity wee may understand mystically Nero, the first persecuting Roman Emperour, and such persecutors as succeeded him, who being most highly advanced, would have divine honour done unto them and to their Idols, but Mordecai, that to the Christian refusing to doe it in Rome, by and by persecution was stirred up against all Christian people in all places, which made them full of sorrow, although when they came to suffering for the truth, they were joyfull and patient, or if we understand the Pope by Haman it will better agree, for the Emperour advanced him as this great King did Haman, and he must by all be acknowledged Christs Vicar generall and adored. But the reformers refusing so to doe are destined to destruction, the Emperour being stirred up against them, first in Babylon, then in Germany, yet God preserved them, many of their enemies being destroyed by their hands.

The Mystery.
Lyra.

CHAP. IV.

Mordecai seeing what was done, rent his garments for sorrow, after the manner of those times, and put on sackcloth for more humiliation, and cried out against the injustice of this edict before the Court gate, but in he might not enter, nor any man in so base an habit. Pellican sayth, least the King seeing and hearing him might be moved with compassion to poor men in such distresse. The news of this was soon brought to Queen Ester by her maids and Eunuchs, for shee was kept in a closer place then they, not having the liberty of going abroad, as others had, because the Persians that were of highest quality, used so to keepe in their wives, and if they went forth at any time, they were carryed in a close chariot, so as that none could see them. When shee heard it, shee sent to Mordecai to take away his sackcloth, and to put better apparrell upon him, that he might come into the Court again, and he refusing to take it, shee sent Atach her servant to him, to know the cause of his thus doing. And when he had declared it, he sent him back again unto her with a copie of the decree, and to require her to make intercession to the King for her people. Shee sent a reply that this shee could not doe, till shee were called unto him, which shee had not been now in 30 dayes, for otherwise to enter in to him was death, unlesse he reached out his golden Scepter in token that he would have one to come in. Which provision was made for reverence to the King and his greatnesse, and the more to secure his person from treacherous attempts. Lyra thinketh that it was now onely so provided least any shewing the King of the pitifull plaints of the Jews, hee should reverse the decree, and so he takes it as a policy of Haman. And for the Queens being so long from him, it is to be conceived, that he had many more wives and concubines, with whom he would company also at times, for his greater pleasure in variety of women.

Mordecai not resting in this reply, sent to her again, not to frame any excuse, but to doe it, if not, he puts her in minde, that God had other ways to save his people, but shee with all her fathers house, must look by his just judgement to perish, if shee would not adventure her selfe in this case of so great necessity to speake for them, being the elect people of God, to whom so many gracious promises were made. He seemeth also for this her reply, to charge her with a neglect of all her brethren the Jews, as if shee cared not though they all were destroyed, so that shee might escape, in these words, Think not that thou onely shalt be preserved in the Kings house. Wherefore now he would not have her to conceale her kinned any longer, but to disclose of what stock shee came, that for her sake all the Jews might fare the better.

The Queen hearing this, to shew how deare her people the Jews were unto her, sent to Mordecai again to gather the Jews together, to fast and pray three dayes together night and day, promising that shee and her maids would doe likewise, and after this, she would goe in to the King, though with the danger of her life.

Verf. 1.

Pellican.

Verf. 4.

Verf. 5, 6.

Verf. 7, 8.

Verf. 10.

Lyra.

Verf. 12, 13.

Verf. 15, 16.

- Note. life. In extremity of danger, the holy woman fleeth to fasting and prayer, before shee would adventure her selfe, teaching us when we are to goe about any weighty work of life and death, to prepare unto it likewise. And it is to be noted, that shee is the author of this counsell to Mordecai, who was as her father, when as he ought rather to have first advised to this course. But sometime the woman directs the man, as also Sarah did Abraham, and he obeyed her voyce, and so did Mordecai Ester, as God pleaseth to imploy either to put on the other to doe for the best.
- Verf. 17. Here Lyra, although it be expressly said, eat nothing, neither drink in three dayes, sayth, that they did not certainly refrain from all food so long a time, for in this there had been no discretion, but so little once in a day, as was counted nothing towards a good meale, as Ethic, l. 2. And because, Chap. 5. 1. Ester is said upon the third day to have gone in unto the King, some thinke that three dayes are to be understood synecdochically, for two, and part of the third. How Ester in this time prayed, and how Mordecai, see in the adjections to Ester, Chap. 13. 14. which are in the Septuagint Xisti, inserted into Chap. 4. Junius renders it, The third day being compleat or ended, but in Hebrew it is upon the third day.
- The Mystery. Mytically, Mordecai his mourning, setteth forth the sorrow of faithfull Pastors for the flock, in the times of persecution, when both they and the people pray earnestly one for another, as Mordecai and Ester did, and Paul for the Ephesians, and willed them to pray for him. And Mordecai cryeth at the Court gate, when the Pastor prayeth earnestly in Gods house, whereas Lyra would have Ester to represent the Church triumphant, and gathereth by Mordecai his seeking to her to petition the King, that we should seeke to the Saints in heaven, and pray that in their praying for us they may prevaile, it is altogether from the scope of this place, unlesse we will straine Histories to Allegories contrary to Scripture, seeing Esay rejects praying to any departed, and refrains it to God alone.
- Lyra.
- Esay 63. 16.

CHAP. V.

- Verf. 1. Queen Ester being prepared by fasting and prayer, now adorneth her selfe royally, to put the more grace upon her, and to incline the Kings affection unto her, and so goeth into the inner Court, next to the place where the Kings Throne was right against the door, so that he might see such as came in, and if he pleased call any unto him, otherwise not one might presume to enter upon pain of death, and he used to call by holding out his golden Scepter towards the party called. To Ester therefore, so soon as he saw her, he held out this Scepter, and shee drew neare and kissed it for reverence to the King, so that Esters devotion was not without effect: for God being hereby inclined to pitty his people ready to perish, inclined the Kings heart towards her so soon as he saw her, which is expressly said, Chap. 15. The Queen in her royall apparrell went with two maids through all the doors of the inner Court, leaning upon the one, and her train being born up by the other, but then seeing the King in his glory, looking with a terrible countenance shee fainted, and her colour changed, this the King seeing, God suddenly changed his minde to mildnesse, and descending from the Throne, imbraced her and kissed her, &c. thus also Josephus, but the Hebrew Text saith no more, but that he reached out his golden Scepter to her, and spake to her comfortably, asking what her Petition was, and promised to grant it to the halfe of his Kingdom. She then desired that he and Haman would come to a Banket which she had prepared that day. And herein she did wisely, because she knew that the King delighted in feasting and bankets, and therefore she hoped by this means so to win him, that her request should be granted the more easily when he should be merry with wine. Moreover, Haman was not then present, and so it was no fit time to open her request, and others haply were present, who she was unwilling should heare it. But the Eunuchs were by and by sent to hasten Haman to this feast, and so both the King and he came. But whether it were to a dinner or a supper some question, they that are for a dinner urge the time that was after it the same day, for Haman to goe home and to consult with his friends about Mordecai, and to provide a gallows for him the same day: Josephus sayth, it was to a supper, but it is more probable that it was neyther, but a banquet in the afternoon, as the manner is at this day, and after it Haman might well doe all those things. The King being merry with wine asketh her; what her Petition was, making a large promise as before. She again being by this second offer further confirmed, yet wisely deferreth to open it, till the next day partly, that Hamans fall might be the greater, from such singular favours wherein he seemed to be both with the King and Queen, as none other Prince was, to the extraordinary rejoycing of his heart, to be put to such an ignominious death, to the terrour of all such enemies of the Jews as he was. And it is not to be doubted, but that a singular providence of God wrought herein, that the exaltation of Mordecai might intervene, as here followeth: for this could not but be taken by the Queen as bonum omen in respect of the Jews cause which she had in hand, seeing he was a Jew, and the most of all others spighted by Haman, and dearest to her, so that she might the next day with more assurance proceed to her Petition.

Haman by this second invirement, was cast into a fools paradise, for he went home most joyfully and told his wife and his friends of his surpassing glory, so as that the other Princes of the Empire might well envie him, but not one of them come neare him. But the more proud he grew upon this, the more irrespctive was Mordecai of him, for now he would not onely not bow the knee, but not rise up unto him from the place where he sate, because he knew that he machinated the destruction both of him and his people. At this Haman was so vexed, that he had not so much joy of all his honour, as griefe and disquiet in his minde therefore, so that all seemed nothing to him. Such is the misery of men in worldly honour, which sheweth that it is not worthy the desiring, for such bitternesse is often mixed with it, by meanes even of the poorest and most abject, that there is no true pleasure in it, and it is also most uncertain, and soon turned into the greatest dishonour, as is proved by this present example.

His wife and other friends being made privie to this his griefe, advised him to cause presently a gallows to be made 50 cubits high, that Mordecai might the next day be hanged upon it, and this was prepared accordingly. So Haman was let goe on in his malice, till it came to the highest, and Mordecai let come even to the pits brink, so that there was but one night betwixt him and a shamefull death, and then opportunely God strook in by his providence and saved him, and confounded the other, as the six and seventh Chapters sheweth: and thus let every godly person comfort himselfe against the practices of the malicious, when yet he seeth not how he may possibly escape, for God seeth, and let the proud and malicious feare, that when all things succeed according to their hearts desire, for the effecting of their malicious ends, the mischief which they plot against others, shall fall upon their own pates sodainly.

The gallows was made so high, sayth Lyra to put Mordecai to the more shame, when he should be hanged upon it to be seen by the more all about.

Mystically, the Queens inviting the King to a banquet, prefigured the Churches communicating with the King of Kings in the Lords Supper, unto which Haman also comming prefigured Julian the Apostate, who was at the first a Christian, but he had a false heart towards Christians who are the people of God, and persecuted them all, in particular, his spleen was most against Basilus a Bishop, that would not obey his sacrilegious commands, in so much as that he threatned at his return from fighting against the Persians to destroy his City and people, but God by cutting him off first prevented it.

Vers. 6.

Vers. 9.

Note.

Vers. 14.

Note.

Lyra.

The Mystery.

CHAP. VI.

IN the night before the second feasting day in the morning, whereof Mordecai should have been hanged, God would not give Abastumeroth any sleepe. Wherefore as a means to bring him into a sleep he would have the Annals read unto him, wherein the notable things happening in every Kings reigne were set down, and it was read to that which was recorded touching Mordecai, Chap. 2. 23. and this specially, as tending to the comfort of his faithfull servant, God would have read and marked by the King at this time, not suffering any sleep to come upon him till the morning. And having asked and heard, that nothing had been done to Mordecai in way of recompence for that his good service, he studied a while with himselfe, what he should doe for him. Then Haman coming into the inner Court, the King calls for him, and after some consultation about the honour to be done to him, whom the King would honour, he straightly charged him to doe it to Mordecai. And he having done it, with an heaue heart went home, sorrowing and ashamed, which is shewed in saying, with his head covered. And then both his Counsellours and wife and all could read his destiny, that if Mordecai, before whom he had begun to fall, were a Jew, he should by his means be brought to utter ruine.

Lyra.

Touching Mordecai not hitherto rewarded, Lyra sayth, that he was upon that occasion brought into the Court to wait for a reward, but it being now six years since, he had none. But this is contrary to the Text, Chap. 2. where it is said, that he sat at the Kings gate, before that he discovered the treason against the King, wherefore it is not to be thought that he waited there that he might be rewarded, but to be neare unto the Queen, that he might heare of her, and shew of him, and have directions from him from time to time, what to doe for the best, and that his exaltation came unexpectedly.

Vers. 4.

Josephus.

The time of the night wearing away, and the day coming on, whilst it was read unto him, and he talked with those about him touching Mordecai, Haman cometh to the Court early, but to no good for himselfe, according to the proverb, Early up and never the nearer. At that instant, sayth Josephus, the King asked his servants attending about him, what time of day it was, and they telling him that it was day light, he had one see, which of his Counsellours was come, for hee thought long to advise with him about the rewarding of Mordecai: for as the same Author also sayth, in reading some notable acts done by some others, had been recited before, and how each one was rewarded, but touching Mordecai, nothing was recorded to have been done for him, which made the King to aske about it. And in that the Courtiers about him answered nothing, but plainly, he had no reward, whereby the King might bethinke himselfe of some way of remuneration. It may well be noted, as a singular providence of God, seeing Courtiers commonly envie the preferment of one another, as thinking it prejudiciall to their own, that none spake a word against him, as a Jew, and most undutifull to Prince Haman, so contrary to the Kings charge, which might have been a bar to him, to keep him from preferment.

Note.

Vers. 5.

Vers. 6, 7, 8.

To the King asking about his Counsellours, it was answered, that Haman was come, and therefore when he had commanded him to be called in, he asked, what should be done to the man whom the King would honour. He answered, that he should be clad with royall robes, he should have the Crown set upon his head, and ride upon the Kings own horse, &c. thinking nothing lesse, then that the King would honour Mordecai, his enemy, yea, presuming, that this should be done to himselfe, as being in greatest favour. But now it falling out contrary, and the King giving him so great a charge to doe it presently to Mordecai, without failing in any thing, he was so stricken, that without replying a word, he went and did as the King had commanded. But as Josephus hath it, when he came to Mordecai clad in sackcloth, with a purple robe, Crown, and the Kings horse, bidding him to put off his sackcloth, and to put on that robe and Crown, he thinking that he mocked him, answered with indignation, Thou most wicked man, dost thou thus insult over the miserable, but when he had told him that indeed it was the Kings pleasure that it should thus be done to him, he put them on, and being mounted upon the horse, he rode through the City, Haman proclaiming before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the King will honour. And it was the highest honour indeed that could be done to a man in this world, who was a subject, as Haman knew well enough, and therefore his ambition carried him on unto it, although in his seeking it, he miserably failed. Hereby sayth Lyra, he shewed shewed, that he aspired after the Kingdom, because none else but the King, can have the Kings Crown put upon his head. Wherefore the King also, in answering to the things by him propounded, said, take the robe and the horse, as thou hast said, but of the Crown he makes no mention, it being hereby intimated, that he would honour no man so, no more then in setting him in his Throne, whereas, Chap. 8.15. it is sayd, that Mordecai came forth wearing a Crown of gold, that was another which a Prince might weare, but not the Kings Crown.

Lyra.

Haman having done to Mordecai as the King commanded, he returned to the Kings gate, but Haman with his head covered to his own house, as being now ashamed to look any body in the face. For he had done that which vexed him extremely, yet durst he doe no otherwise, in such a we had those great Kings, the greatest of their subjects. What Mordecai did with his royall robes and horse after this it is not said, but onely that he returned to his old place; and as some thinke, to his old habit again, but it is rather probable, that he now left that off, being full of hope, that as God had heard his Prayers to bring him out of danger, and to high honour, so he should now be able to help his brethren the Jews out of theirs also. For the ornaments and the Kings horse no doubt, but that he which brought them for Mordecai his use, took order to have them restored again. Haman being come home so full of shame, found little comfort there, for his friends and wife hearing what had been done, sayd, that if Mordecai before whom he had begun to fall, were of the bloud of the Jews, he should fall yet more before him. We need not here with the Hebrew glosse, cited by Lyra, devise this as a reason, why they sayd so, viz. because they had read in the History of the Jews, which they had in the Persian tongue, that God promised Abraham, that his seed should be as the stars of heaven, and another time sayd, that they should be as the dust of the earth, so that they hence gathered, that when they were not brought to nothing as the dust, they should be most highly exalted as the stars, for any man in reason could not but conjecture so much as they sayd, all the premises considered, and haply they spake herein by an instinct of the Spirit, as Balaam had done for his greater terrour, before he came actually to suffer the greatest extremity, unlesse with some we shall imagine, these his friends to have been Wizzards, with whom he used to consult, and into whose mouth the devill put this answer, for this is not improbable, seeing some such were before used by him to cast lots to finde out a luckie day.

Whilst they were thus talking, the Eunuchs came and hastened Haman to Esters feast, in Hebrew, They hastened to make him goe, which implyeth, that he delayed, and would gladly have been excused, as fearing now that it would be a fatall feast to him.

Mytically, Abashuer his not sleeping, prefigured the Lords not sleeping any longer, as now he may seem to doe, because hee raiseth not up himselfe yet to reward the righteous, and to punish all the wicked. But the time shall come when he will not sleep thus, but awake and remember the fidelity of the righteous, and honour them with robes and crowns of glory, making them to ride upon the heavens, as a most royall horse, and that publikely in the view of the world, and then every Haman, that is, wicked man, shall be put to confusion for ever.

CHAP. VII.

THe King and Haman being come the second day to Esters feast, he asked again what her petition was. Then shee declareth that it was for her life, and the life of her people, being ready otherwise all to perish; and that vvas by the cruell Decree sent out in the Kings name by Haman into all parts of the Empire, seeing all the Jewvs vverethereby to be destroyed, vvithout excepting any, and so the Queen her selfe vvas also in danger, for so much as shee vvas a Jewv.

Then shee amplifieth her Petition, by saying, that if they had been sold for servants and hand-maids shee vvould have been silent, because the enemy meditated

Vers. 12.

Vers. 13.

Lyra.

Vers. 14.

The Mystery:

Vers. 1, 2.

Vers. 3.

Vers. 4.

nothing to the damage of the King, the vulgar Latine, but now he is our enemy, whose cruelty redounds to the King, the meaning is, that she and her people would have patiently endured any abatement, if the Decree sent out had been to no other end, but that they should have been made bond slaves, money comming into the Kings coffers for them, that so he might not have been put to losse, as he must needs be by their destruction, whereby so many thousand of his subjects must perish at once, and so much Tribute which was now yearly received from these, be extinguished, and he must lose his dear wife, and faithfull subject Mordecai, by whose care he had once been preserved. But now if they were thus taken away, what could be expected next but the losse of his own life and Kingdom also, by this enemies treachery, that he might attain unto it. So that Esters petition when she came to utter it, could not but greatly affect the King, to stir up his wrath against him that attempted this; whatsoever, and how dear sœver unto him he was. And according to this exposition, the King declareth the foulness of *Haman*s attempt, in his letters written to reverse the sonner, Chap. 16. 11, 12, 13, 14. that he thought thus to destroy Mordecai that saved him, and therefore was most dear unto him, and his beloved and innocent Queen, and to take his life away also, and to translate his Kingdom to the Macedonians, according to his styling of him, Haman the Macedonian, Ver. 10.

Lyra.

R. Solomon yet expounds this otherwise, as Lyra sheweth, but rejects it, viz. he meditated nothing which stood with the profit of the King, but against it, because if the Jews had been appointed by him to be sold, much treasure would have thus come in to the King, or if they had been made to work as servants for him, great profit might hence have redounded to him, as did sometimes to Pharaoh, when by such means he had diverse strong Cities built him, but by the utter destruction of them none at all.

Vers. 5.

The King hearing the Queens complaint, enquired with all earnestness who this was, she answered, wicked Haman, he was presently confounded, and was no more able to look either King or Queen in the face.

Vers. 7.

And because the King could not endure to look upon him any more, as is most probable he went out into the garden in a great chafe, but by and by he returning again, and finding Haman upon the bed where the Queen sate, laying hold upon her with suppliant hands to move her to mercie, his wrath being now so great that he confuted all things to the worst, he challenged him for going about to force her, and immediatly his face was covered, as some say, the manner was, when the King of Persia was most highly offended, that he would not look upon such a man any more, but would have him counted unworthy to look upon him, his face was covered, and this was a certain forerunner of being put to a shameful death.

Vers. 9.

The King then being told of the Gallows prepared by him for Mordecai, commanded that he should be hanged thereon, that is, not unto death onely, but being fixed to it with nails, to abide there to his greater ignominy, to expresse which, the Septuagint renders it, let him be crucified, and so the curse of Darius, Ezra 6. 11. Let the timber of his house be taken, and let him be hanged by crucifying upon it, was in Haman fulfilled now, and soon after in his sons, see also what the King sayth of crucifying him, Chap. 8. 7.

Note.

When the Queen petitioned against Haman, she knew nothing of this Gallows, but it is to be noted, how that for the greater confusion of the wicked, vvhhen the time of their judgement commeth for one horrible sin, God vwill have more brought to light, that they may the more condignly be destroyed. For this did not a little aggravate his sinne, vvhich was brought to light by an Eunuch standing by, that he had prepared to hang up Mordecai to the reproach of the King, to whom he had shewen so great fidelity to the saving of his life, and that at the time when the King would consult what honour to doe unto him therefore. And upon this followed another, as it was taken, his attempting the oppression of the Queen, and that in the Kings own house, before his face.

The Mystery.

Mystically, by *Haman*s comming with the King to the feast, we may understand the wicked communicating with the Lord in the Eucharist, but it is to their own judgement and damnation. Hamans petitioning to the Queen upbraided, as an oppression of her, shewed that the petitions of the wicked suing for mercie at the last day, shall be so far from prevailing, as that they shall be taken for oppressions, the great Judge being hereby provoked to wrath the more.

CHAP. VIII.

IN that day Ahashuerosh gave to Ester the house of Haman, as being forfeited to him by his heynous crimes, that is, all his estate, as it is commonly understood, Josephus sayth, all his substance, and shee set Mordecai over it, and when shee had made known that he was her uncles sonne, to the King, he would have him enter in to stand before him, as one of his most honourable Counsellours, yea, and preferred him to be the chiefe of them all, as he had done Haman, in token whereof he committed his Ring, wherewith his letters used to be sealed, unto him, as he had formerly done to Haman, but now had caused it to be taken away again for the great wickednesse which he found in him, and so Mordecai that fate before at the Kings gate, as one of his Guard, as some think, was suddenly advanced to be Keeper of the Kings Seal, that is, Lord Chancelleurof all the Empire, and so the second to the King, and chief Ruler over the Queens estate. Thus light sometimes breaks out of darknesse, the highest honour succeedeth the greatest debasement and misery, for the comfort and confirmation of all Gods faithfull servants, with whom it shall be done likewise in the end, whereof not onely Mordecai, but also, Joseph, Job, David, &c. have been made examples unto us.

Haman being now hanged, and Mordecai advanced, Ester falling down before the King with tears, he reached out his golden Scepter again unto her, and then shee petitioned, that the Letters written by Haman might be reversed, by other Letters sealed with the Kings Seal, that her people the Jews in all parts of the Empire, might thus be delivered out of danger, which was immediately granted, and so Letters were written, that the former Letters sent out by the device of wicked Haman should not stand, and because, as Pellican sayth, it might be supposed, that some being most infest enemies of the Jews, would notwithstanding these, beare themselves upon the former, and so rise in Arms to destroy the Jews at the day appointed, authority was by these letters given unto the Jews, to assemble together and uniting their forces to destroy such enemies. For it could not be, but that they being a peculiar people, divers from all others, must needs have much hatred amongst Idolaters, that gaped after an opportunity of destroying them and their Religion, when they dwelt in other Kingdoms, as well as they had in times past, when they abode yet in their own.

And these Letters of reverse were written in the third moneth called Sinan, the 23 day, and so sent abroad with all speed throughout the Empire in their severall languages, that all might understand them: so that from the writing of the former Letters unto the time of the writing of these had passed two moneths and ten days, wherein Haman triumphed and the Jews mourned, but now contrariwise, Haman being cut off, his wife, children, friends and all that in their hearts consented to his wicked plot mourned, and the Jews rejoiced. If it be here demanded, why the sending out of these Letters was so long deferred? It may be conceived, that after the power obtained, and Mordecai his exaltation, no more haste was made, because there was time enough before the day appointed in the first Letters for execution, viz. nine moneths.

But how could this new Decree be safely published now, seeing the enemies of the Jews were many, and it might be feared, that upon the hearing of it, they might prevent that day, and rise up against the Ievvs and kill them up before.

Sol. I will not answer to this with some, that either they were immediately upon the coming out of these Letters, taken and put by the Magistrates in safe custody against that day, or that these Letters went secretly into every place, none knowing of them, but the Ievvs and Magistrates in every place. For ver. 11.

Vers. 1.

Note.

Vers. 3.

Pellican.

Vers. 9.

it is sayd, that they should destroy all their enemies that invaded them upon that day, wherefore they were not before in hold neither could they, because they were not known till that time. And Verf. 17. Many of the people of the Land turned Jews, because the fear of the Jews was upon them, therefore they knew what Decree was sent out against the Jews enemies. The true answer then is, that God, by whose power this was brought about, wrought in their hearts, that they durst not stir till the day appointed, and the meanes whereby he thus contained them, was the Kings authority, whereby one day was set, which they durst not transgresse for feare of the King, beyond whose decrees not one durst goe, see ver. 8. and because the Jewish Nation was so magnified in Mordecai, they feared to doe any thing against it, and because the Magistrates also every where tooke their part, Chap. 9.2.3. But yet it is to be thought, that many who were blinded with malice against the Jews, cared not for taking notice of these last Letters, and that they who went out with them were not so much directed to give all men notice, as the Jews in particular and their well willers, whom it most concerned to know it. But how can it be justified, that without any legall proceeding so many should be slain by their fellow subjects of the same Kingdom, and that not onely men, but their wives and children, as verf. 11. amongst whom some doubtlesse were innocent? Sol. For slaying them without proceeding by Law, it was but as naturall reason bids any man to doe, when the supreme power especially giveth leave, Vim vi repellere, to kill him, that would kill him. And for wives and children, seeing Gods hand was both in the motion, making for this, and executing the judgement. The justice thereof is not to be questioned, but he is to be looked at, that formerly would have all destroyed both male and female in Canaan, and destroyed them together in Egypt by his stupendious judgements.

Then Mordecai went forth attyred with filkes, and a Crown of gold, and great joy was in the City, that is, amongst the Jews, verf. 16. and likewise in every Province, verf. 17. they that for feare turned Jews, did it by turning to their Religion, and becomming Profelytes.

Mystically, Haman's house is given to Ester, when Christians possesse those Countries which the Gentiles formerly possessed, and Mordecai commeth to stand in the presence of the King, when faithfull souls departing hence, attain places in the Kingdome of heaven. Mordecai is set over Esters house, when the righteous are exalted in the Church, and Ester falleth down before the King, when the faithfull pray importunately for the deliverance of her brethien out of danger in time of persecution, as prayers were made by the Church for Peter when he was in Prison. Mordecai commeth forth in glorious apparell, when the Governours of the Church shine in vertue, and at the exaltation of such, all the people of God rejoyce.

CHAP. IX.

THe thitteenth day of the moneth Adar being come, the Jews did execution upon their enemies in all parts, neither durst any of them resist, seeing the very Rulers in every place honoured the Jews, and so did not hinder but further them herein, through that awe in which they stood of Mordecai, who was so great and so famous. Wherefore, whilst thousands of their enemies were destroyed by their hands, not one of them perished.

The number of them which were slain in Shushan onely were 500, besides the ten sonnes of Haman here named. But seeing it is sayd, Chap. 16.18. that Haman and all his family vvas hanged, vvhether the second Decree for the Ievvs vent our: Howv could they be slain novv? Some labour to reconcile it by saying, that all the rest vvere then hanged, both sonnes, and daughters, and vvife, but these ten vvere kept in prison to be novv executed, but howv good a reconciliation this is, let the Reader judge, all his family vvas hanged, and yet ten sonnes of his, vvho, most probably vvere the greatest part, not, and the rest hanged, vvithout any order before taken, but these not, till Ester had desired it in particular, after their death,

Verf. 5.

Verf. 15.

The Mystery.

Verf. 1.

Verf. 2,3.

Verf. 6.

Sallianus.

death, ver. 13. Therewith is, that this and other errors, occurring in those Chapters added evince, that they were not written by the inspiration of the Spirit, but by some inconsiderate man, that had not such a care to write onely the truth, and therefore neither they nor any other Apocryphals are sufficient for to ground our faith upon.

It is further here recorded, as a thing worth the noting, that when the Jews had slain their enemies; they laid not their hands upon the prey, as they were allowed to doe, Chap. 8. 11. But they refrained, lest it should be thought, that they slew them not out of zeale for Gods glory (that his power might be magnified; who appeared hereby able to bring it thus about; that the day appointed for their destruction, was turned into a day of their destroying their enemies in so great numbers); but out of a greedy desire of enriching themselves with their spoils. Thus Lyra, but whereas he also addeth; and lest the King should be offended; if they should have taken the spoils to themselves; that ought to have gone into the Kings Treasury, as confiscated goods; it standeth not with reason, sith there could be no danger of such offence taking; considering his free grant made unto them, and the like may be sayd to that other reason yielded by Junius, because they remembered the Law, that children shall not bear the iniquity of their fathers; for this is in case that the destroying of them be not particularly enjoined, as in the case of Achan, the Canaanites, and in this present case, Chap. 8. 11.

This destruction being made of the Jews enemies; upon the 13 day of the moneth Adar, the number of them that were slain in Shushan was indeed brought to the King, then he telling his Queen Ester, that 500 men, had been slain that day in Shushan onely; and also Haman ten sonnes, asked her, what shee desired more, then shee petitioned that the Jews might doe the next day as they had done that day; and that Haman sonne, might be hanged up, which was done accordingly; and so there fell in the City of Shushan 300 more upon the 14 day. Haman ten sonnes most probably were of the same malicious spirit against the Jews with their wicked father, and were counsellours also of evil things against them, and therefore the Queen would have the same disgrace done unto them after they were dead. The Hebrews, as Lyra hath it, in their Cedar Olam, say, that Haman sonnes were thus used, because they were of the counsell of the Samaritans, who hindered the building of the Temple in the dayes of Cyrus his sonne; whom they will have to be this Ahasuerus, because he is thus called; Ester 4. but because he reigned onely eight or nine years, and we have already heard in this book, of the 13 years of this King; that is, a manifest error. They were not then hanged up for such counsell giving; but because their father had been the most notorious enemy of the Jews, to make the punishment of his family above all others the most notable. But was not this a most bloody minde in Ester, to desire that another day should be spent in killing and slaying? Sol. Haply shee was informed that many remained still of the Jews enemies in that City, who would yet seeke to be revenged for the first dayes bloodshed, and had spoken some threatening words to that effect, wherefore that the work of destroying their enemies might not be left imperfect, shee petitioned thus the second time. Moreover, as Pellican sayth, man is not so much to be looked at herein, as God whose judgements are always just, though sometimes secret. He moved both the King to make a second offer to Ester, and her to request this, for the greater confusion of the Jews wicked enemies, in the place, where by the instigation of Haman and his sonnes, they had most probably carried themselves most insolently against them.

The slaughter made in Shushan in two dayes being thus distinctly recorded, the History now proceedeth to shew, that in other parts of the Empire there were slain 75000, but no prey taken in any place, and that all upon one day, viz. the 13 of Adar, and so upon the 14, they in those parts kept a day of feasting and rejoicing, but they in Shushan upon the 15 day, because they were busied in slaying their enemies both upon the 13 and 14 dayes.

The festivall being once voluntarily kept by all the Jews in all parts, Mordecai wrote it, and other things contained in this History, in a book, and sent it to the Jews dispersed every where, enjoining them to keep the 14 and 15 of the moneth

Adar

Verf. 9.

Lyra.

Junius.

Verf. 10, 11.

Lyra.

Pellican.

Verf. 15.

Verf. 19.

Vers. 26.

Pellican.

2 Tim. 3. 16.

Vers. 28.

Vers. 30, 31.

2 Machab. 15.
37.Cod. de Iudeis
& caliculis.

The Mystery.

Adar from year to year, perpetually as dayes of feasting and rejoycing, that the miraculous deliverance which God had wrought for them might never be forgotten. And hereupon Expositours generally gather, that Mordecai wrote this book of Ester, and not shee, although it be called by her name, for it is thus called, onely, because shee is the chiefe subject of this book.

According to Mordecai his writing, the jews bound themselves and their children for ever to keepe the feast of Purim from year to year, and also all that were of their Religion. But because no mention is here made of any thanksgiving that should then be used, or commemoration made of the deliverance by reading this History, or exhortation to trust in God in all times of streights, from the experience at this time had of his goodnesse, but onely of feasting and joy. Pellican thinketh, that from hence to the end, what is written, came from the pen of some other man, who was not guided by the Spirit of God, but wrote after the manner of men. But to hold thus, touching any part of Canonick Scripture, is of dangerous consequence, seeing by the like reason, when any passage misliketh us, we may say, this came not from the Spirit of God, and so all shall be made subject to mens cavils. And we have a more sure word to trust unto, which sayth, That all Scripture is of divine inspiration, and the exception taken to this is very weake, for even feasts ordained by God, are many of them not set forth with such circumstances of reading and exhortation as he speaketh of, it being presumed that at all such times the piety in Gods people will stir them to these things, as where unto they are obliged, upon all opportunities offered.

After the writing sent by Mordecai, a second Epistle for further confirmation was also sent both by Ester and Mordecai, and this was done, as the Hebrew Chronicle sayth, a yeare after the first, and hereby they were required, not onely to keepe a festivall, but before it always upon the 13 day, a fast with weeping and crying, as they had done before their deliverance. And this seemeth not to be without ground in this second Epistle, because vers. 30, 31. it is sayd, that the Jews took upon them to keepe the Purim dayes with joy, and to observe and keepe fastings and crying before them, and that this might never be forgotten; it was written in a book, vers. 32. Yet in the dayes of the Machabees, the 13 used before to fasting, was turned upon a new occasion into a day of feasting also. And some write, that in times long after, the Jews used upon the dayes of Purim, when this History was read, to make noises with voyces and knockings, as being moved with great indignation at the hearing of Hamans attempts, and then to take up a crosse, representing that whereupon Haman was hanged, and after they had some time carryed it about, to burn it. And not much unlike unto this, had they a custome since the crucifying of our Lord, to carry about and burne a crosse in despite of him and his Christians, as may be gathered by the Decree of Arcadius, and Honorius Emperours. Let the Governours of Provinces forbid the Jews using to carry about a crosse, and burning it in remembrance of Hamans punishment, to the contempt of Christ and Christians, so to doe anymore, or to mingle any thing of ours with their rites, or else they shall not be permitted as hitherto they have been.

Mystically, by the execution done upon the Jews enemies, understand the destruction of all the wicked at the last day, for which there shall be perpetuall joy and gladnesse in heaven, as is further expressed, Revel. 19.

CHAP. X.

Vers. 1.

Iunius.

Vers. 3.

After this Ahasuerus laid a Tribute upon the Countrey and Isles of the Sea. This is thought generally by Expositours, to have been done to make preparation against Greece, the parts whereof having a long time held peace one with another, began now to be formidable to the Persian King. But the Jews, as Iunius conjectureth, were free from this tribute, because Herodotus writing of it sayth, that a Countrey neare unto Arabia was exempt herefrom.

As for Mordecai, as his preferment was great so he continued in it, being always dear

dear to the King, and highly esteemed of amongst the Jews, as he was well worthily, for his constant endeavouring to procure good to all his seed, that is, to all his Nation.

The six Chapters added were made, as Lyra thinketh, by Josephus, or some other eloquent man, who could easily devise both the forme of a Decree, first against the Jews, and then for them, and with more words set forth the history of the manner of Esters going in to the King, feigning many things of his own, as also Jerom speaketh. To leave them therefore, as also the other Books of Ezra or Esdaras, wee may conclude this Booke with the mystery in Mordecai and Ester. 1 In his refusing to worship Haman, was prefigured, Christs refusing to worship the Devill. 2 Mordecai discovered the two Eunuchs, who probably were set on by Haman that he might get the Empire, and so they were hanged, but Haman still survived to increase his malice, in like manner, Christ by his Doctrine discovered the machinations of the world and the flesh against his Kingdom, so that they cannot destroy it, but are mortified to all the truly godly, the Devill yet, as Haman surviving, to practise against it. 3 Mordecai was honoured by his most deadly enemy, so Christ by the Devill, when he cryed out, I know thee who thou art, &c. 4 Mordecai was advanced, and Haman put down, when he laboured to hang Mordecai, so the Devill that was honoured formerly in Idols with divine honour, as Haman with kingly, after he had conspired the death of Christ by crucifying, soon fell with his Idolatry by vertue of the Gospel, and was made contemptible to all men, and Christ became in all places honourable. 5 Mordecai receiveth the Kings Seale, and power to reverse Hamans Letters, by writing others instead thereof, so Christ put out the hand-writing that was against his people, and fastened it to his crosse. 6 Mordecai was arrayed in shining silks, and with a Crown of gold, so Christ his garments shone upon the Mount, and he was crowned as the great Kings sonne, when the voyce came from heaven saying, This is my beloved sonne. 7 Mordecai instituted a feast in remembrance of this deliverance, so Christ, the holy Communion.

Now touching Ester, that which the Jesuites apply in her to the Virgin Mary, may well be applied to the Church, as being in the Church most true, but in the Virgin Mary, supposititious, onely without all ground for the most part. 1 Ester obeyed Mordecai as her father, so the Church Christ even after so high an exaltation to be wife unto the great King of heaven. 2 Ester was chosen of God to confound Haman, and to succour the poore Jews ready to perish, so the Church by prayer. 3 A great Feast was made at the marriage of Ester, and tributes were remitted, so at the conversion of the Gentiles, there was a great Feast of joy, all mens sins who were true beleevers, being forgiven them. 4 The King loved Ester so, that he bid her aske what she would, once, twice, thrice, so Christ loveth his Church, that he biddeth, Aske and yee shall have, 2 Seek and yee shall finde, 3 Knock and it shall be opened to you. 5 Ester obtained such favour with the King, that when he was terrible to all others, yet he courteously received her approaching, so God being terrible to the Jews, and to all the wicked in his judgments, yet to the Church of the godly he is kinde and meeke. 6 Ester wrote together with Mordecai, to stir up to praise God, and keepe a remembrance of his goodnesse, so the Church seconds the charge given to all Gods people, always to remember the passions of Christ, by celebrating the most holy Feast of the Eucharist for ever.

Hieron. Prolog. in Est.

The Mystery of Mordecai.

Col. 2. 14.

1 Pet. 1. 17.

K

A

A CONTINUATION OF THE HISTORY,

From Anno 40 of ARTAXERXES, in which NEHEMIAH endeth, untill the comming of CHRIST JESVS.

Anno Mundi
3539.

Anno 3599.
Iosephus Antiq. lib. xi. 7.

Nothing is by any Historian recorded, touching the affairs of the Jews after Nehemiah, till the time of Joannes, the sonne of Judas, the sonne of Elisib the High-priest, who, sayth Iosephus, had a brother called Jesús, to whom Bagojes, the Generall of all the Persian forces, being a friend promised to give him the High-priesthood. Hereupon Jesús carryed himselfe insolently against his brother in the Temple, provoking him so far, that he fell upon him and slew him in the Temple. Bagojes hearing of this was wrath, and going to the Temple upbraided the High-priest by this bloody fact committed in the very Temple, from the like unto which even Heathens abhorred, and therefore when they would have put him back from entring the Temple, lest it should thus be defiled, hee proceeded saying, it is not as much defiled by a body murdered and lying in it, as by my entrance? And by way of penalty he laid upon the Jews 50 drams to be paid every yeare for seven years, before they offered their daily sacrifices. For the reckoning of the time to this I finde nothing in Iosephus, but Fuuccius having given to Elisib the High-priest, that was in the time of Nehemiah, Chap. 13, 4. 41 years puts Iojadab for High-priest next unto him, instead of Judas, as Iosephus calls him, giving unto him 25 years, and after him to this his sonne Ioannes 24 years, reckoning this horrible murder to have been committed, Anno 16 of his pontificality. And the next Duke after Nehemiah over Judah Ioanna Ben Resa, 53 years, beginning Anno 33 of Elisib, then Hircanus, 31, beginning Anno 21 of Ioannes the High-priest.

Artax. Anno 35

Contentions in Greece.

Thucyd. l. 2.
& 3.

Within this time Artaxerxes yet reigning over the Persians, contentions arose amongst the Græcians, whereupon a long war of 27 years followed, called the Peloponesian warre. There had been indeed peace amongst them 15 years, but now great strife arose betwixt the two chiefe Cities of Greece, Athens and Lacedemonia. The first occasion whereof according to Thucydides was a conflict between the Thebans and the Eæcians the friends of the Athenians. For the Thebans entering into Plataea a City of Bætia, tooke it easily, although they were but 300 by yeilding, because the Plataeans thought that they had been many more, against whom, comming upon them on the sudden, they were unable to stand. But in the night, finding out that they were but few, they set upon them both men and women, and killing many, tooke 180 prisoners. Then other

Thebans

Thebans comming to rescue their fellows, took many of the Plataëans prisoners, and then agreed with the men of Plataea to exchange them for theirs, the Plataëans fraudulently consented, but would have theirs delivered first, promising, without delay, to deliver to the Thebans theirs, which they did indeed, but first having slain them all most perfidiously. Of this complaint being made to the Lacedemonians, they prepared to be revenged, setting out a strong power under Archidamus their Generall and King. But he first sent an Embassadour to Atheni, the Athenians would not admit of him, nor heare him, unlesse the forces brought into their confines were first withdrawn again. Then Pericles the Captain of the Athenians being glad of this opportunity, perswaded them to war against the Lacedemonians, bringing those things which they had in the fields into the City, and therefore defending themselves by land, and in the meane season to send out 100 ships against the Lacedemonians to Peloponessus. And to move them the more, he put them in minde of their great power and wealth. And this he did that he might not be called to an account for 8000 talents of the common treasure committed to his custody, whereof he had wasted much. And according to his advice a Navy was sent out, even when Archidamus was wasting their corn fields in their fight, at which the Souldiers in the City had great indignation, that they might not goe out to fight with them. But the Lacedemonians hearing of the great Navy sent out, returned at the end of the Summer to defend their owne. Then a great pestilence began amongst the Athenians, destroying many of them, whereby they were much weakened, and Pericles made the more unable with his Navy to invade the Peloponesians. And here Thucydides noteth, that when he was setting forth with this Navy the Sun had a great eclipse, at which the Governour of the ship in which Pericles was, being stricken into a feare, he casting his coat before his face said, that there was no more difference betwixt that which darkened the Sun and his face, but that it was greater. But he proved it by experience to be ominous when so many of his men were destroyed by this pestilence. For hee was hereby compelled with the remainder of them to return to Athens, being able to doe nothing by this expedition. Then the Athenians were incensed against him, as author of their miseries, and putting him from his office, they laid a fine of many talents upon him, and sent Embassadours to the Lacedemonians for peace, but they would not now consent to any peace, wherefore they sought againe to Pericles, as being thought the ablest and wisest Captain that they had, and hee with much perswasion used by Alcibiades his friend consented to their request. Then Phormio was sent out to Peloponessus with 20 ships, but the Plague raging amongst his men, he returned again, when he had lost above 1000 of them, and so two years ended, since the beginning of this warre.

In the third yeare Pericles dyed, and Archidamus with his Lacedemonians came against Plataea, and besieged it, but not being able to take it, he returned. Towards winter, leaving the Boetians and others to continue the siege. In the meane season Xenophon sent by the Athenians with an Armie against the Chaldeonians in Thracia confederates of the Lacedemonians, had no good successe, but was compelled when he had lost 400 men and three Captains, to return againe to Athens. But the Peloponesians had as ill successe in other places.

In the fourth yeare the Isle Lesbos revolted from the Athenians to the Lacedemonians, and Plataea was left by 200 of her inhabitants, who brake through the Army of their enemies besieging them, and escaped to Athens. In the fifth yeare they of Mistene, who had revolted from the Athenians, were brought again into their power, and then many of them were out off, after that it had been first determined that they should all have been slain. But the Plataëans about the same time, which still remained besieged, desparing of succour from the Athenians, yielded their City and themselves to the mercie of their enemies, and when they were come into their power, they were severally demanded, what good they had ever done to the Lacedemonians, for which they might be spared, and being not able to say that they had done any, they were all slain, and their women made slaves. A just reward for their treachery against the Thebans, spoken of before, in killing their men, and then delivering their dead bodies, after that they had agreed upon an exchange.

A vilifier of signes given from Heaven.

Diodorus Siculus.

Thucydides.

Note.

In the sixth yeare of this war, the Pestilence raged again amongst the Athenians, and the Lacedemonians comming out to waste the Atticke fields being of their confederates, were terrified with a great earthquake, and returned under Agis their King, the sonne of Archidamus. In the seventh yeare Agis went out again with his Lacedemonians against the Atruces, but hearing within 15 dayes that a place called Pilus of great consequence, at the further end of Peloponessus was taken by the Athenians and fortified, they returned to Sparta, and from thence went with a Navy to recover Pilus, but there came a Navy of the Athenians thither also, betwixt whom a great battell being fought, the Athenians got the victory. But the Lacedemonians weary of these wars, sued now to the Athenians for peace, and gave 60 ships for Hostages, whilst they sent to Athens about it, yet they prevailed not, and their ships were also kept from them, under a pretence that they had broken the truce. Then the warre was again renewed, and Cleon the Generall of the Athenians, was sent to the Isle Pilus, and after a long battell fought, the Lacedemonians, there being 292, yeilded to the Athenians, and were carryed away to Athens, at which all men wondered, because they thought that they would all rather have dyed in battell then have yeilded. Being brought to Athens they were put in chaines, neither would the Athenians again deliver them, although they were sought unto, or make any peace with the Lacedemonians.

Xerxes King of Persia.

Ctesias.

Sogdianus King of Persia.

2 Machab. 13. 5.

In the eighth yeare Xerxes, the sonne of Artaxerxes succeeded his father in the Persian Kingdom, after he had reigned 40 years. He had many other brothers, but they were all bastards except himselte, and amongst them, Secundianus or Sogdianus was one, and Ochus another. The one of these, viz. Sogdianus, being ambitious of the Kingdom, joynd an Eunuch, being a great man, called Pharmacias unto him, and they together slew Xerxes being drunken, when he had reigned but 45 dayes, so Ctesias, who also telleth of a strange thing touching the chariot horses appointed to draw the body of Artaxerxes away to the buriall, before the death of his sonne Xerxes, they would by no means goe forward, being tryed again and again, but now his body being laid also into the same chariot, they went away with them both together most willingly, so that they stayed as it were, knowing that they had not till then, all their load.

Sogdianus being King after the death of Xerxes, began to exercise his cruelty first against Bagoraxus an Eunuch, for he pickt a quarrell against him, because his fathers corps was no sooner carryed away, and caused him to be overwhelmed with stones therefore. But by this meanes, he purchased unto himselte great hatred, and for the death of his brother Xerxes. Then he sending for his brother Ochus to come unto him, he delayed so to doe untill that he had gotten a great company about him, the Captain of Sogdianus his horsemen also falling to him, and the President of Egypt, and the President of Armenia. Then comming to Sogdianus, he feared, but Ochus swearing to him, and speaking him faire, he came forth and was taken and cast into ashes, and so dyed, when he had reigned six moneths, and 15 dayes. Of this kinde of death they write thus, a Tower 50 cubits high being filled with ashes, by an instrument in it turning round, he that was adjudged to death, was turned into them, and so dyed, and was buried altogether.

To return to the Athenians, they went this yeare with 60 ships, and tooke the Island Cithera, lying neere to the Lacedemonians, whereby the Lacedemonians were brought into great streights, having their enemies now on both sides of them, for Cithera was on the one side, and Pilus before spoken of on the other. But after this they attempting somewhat against Sicilia were frustrated by the joyning of the Sicilians together in one, who were before divided, so that by this means they were by them put to flight and returned home. The Athenians lifted up with their former victories, thought sicorne of this repulse, and punished the Captains that returned, some by fines and some by banishment, as if they had played the cowards, or been bribed to depart. But this their pride was pulled down soon after, when Brasidas a Captain of the Lacedemonians came into Thracia, and many of the parts thereabouts revolted from the Athenians unto him, because he carryed himselte most justly and equally amongst them. For hereby they were drawn drawn to a desire of the friendship of the Lacedemonians, thinking them all to be like unto this Brasidas, and on the contrary side they feared the Athenians aspiring to a tyranny. The Boetians also fought by Land against the Athenians, and slew of them 1000 men, and Hippocrates their Captain, and the Corinthians overcame Demosthenes of Athens, killing and taking many of his men.

In this time Ochus having slain Sogdianus, reigned over the Persians 19 years, changing his name to Darius, and so was commonly called Darius Nothus.

In the ninth yeare of the Peloponnesian warre a truce was made betwixt the Athenians and Lacedemonians, to continue for one yeare, but even in that time some Cities revolted from the Athenians to the Lacedemonians, which occasioned much trouble.

In the 10 yeare a war began again at Amphipolis, Cleon being sent as Captain by the Athenians, and Brasidas by the Lacedemonians, in which after a cruell fight, the victory fell to the Lacedemonians, and yet Brasidas dyed of his wounds therein received, and Cleon also was slain, and of his Athenians 600, of the Lacedemonians but seven. Brasidas, for the great estimation in which he was had for his vertue, was honourably buried in Amphipolis, and had a monument built for him, by the men of that City, who afterwards prosecuted him as one of the Heroes, with divine honour. These two Captains being thus slain, both the Athenians and Lacedemonians were desirous of peace, and concluded a peace for 50 yerres. But because the Corinthians, and some others in Greece were not contenting, they linking themselves with the Argives, were enemies to them both, neither did the Athenians and Lacedemonians hold their peace long, but fell to variance again, and so the war was renewed: and about the 17 yeare of the Peloponnesian warre translated into Sicily, where the Athenians having long fought unhappily with the Sicilians and Syracusians aided by the Lacedemonians, were brought into great misery, and all their armies were lost in the space of three years, and their treasure wasted, yet repairing their forces again about Anno 21 of the said warre they came to fight at Peloponessus again, Anno 22. and then the victory fell first to the Lacedemonians, under the conduct of Hegesandridas, but Alcibiades (who had long lived out of his Countrey amongst the Persians, for some distaste taken against him) comming at the time of their fight with 20 ships, joyned himselfe with the Athenians, and so the victory was turned to them, and they carryed away, according to some 30, according to others 10 ships of their enemies. Alcibiades having obtained so great a victory, went to Tissaphernes Governour of a province under Darius, of whom he had thought to have been had in honour for this exploit, but he causing him to be apprehended, cast him into prison in Sardis. But he soone found means to escape and came to Sestus, where the Athenian navy lay, and there hearing that Pharnabazus and Mindarus a Spartan Captain were come together in Cizicum, he encouraged the Athenians to fight with all courage against them, but he taking 40 ships went before to draw the enemies from their harbour. They seeing no more, immediately came forth with 60 ships, and fought with them till that Alcibiades feigning a flight to draw them further, gave a signe to the rest as he had appointed, and then they comming to him, the Lacedemonians were soon overcome and put to flight. But Alcibiades following them till they came to land, and there fought a cruell battell, till that Mindarus was slain, and he got the City Cizicum and the whole Navy. But he stayed there onely 20 dayes, exacting of the Citizens great sums of money, and so without doing them any further harme he departed. The Lacedemonians being much dejected by this great overthrow, were comforted by Pharnabazus, bidding them not be troubled for the losse of wood, for the King had abundance, of which they might make new ships, and so they did, being also maintained by the Kings treasure in this work, and all the souldiers new coated, and pay given them for two moneths. But in the 24 yeare Alcibiades, having Thrassilas joyned with him went to Abdum, and there fought with Pharnabazus who came with many horse-men in ayd of the Lacedemonians, and put them to flight. Anno 25 he went against Chalcedon, and then against Bizantium, both which was brought under his power. But fighting long against Bizantium in vain, hee used this Thucyd. l. 4.

Diodor. Siculus.

Ochus, or Darius, King of Persia.

policie

police before that he could prevail, he feigned a losing of the siege by withdrawing his ships, but when he had landed many of his men upon a place convenient to assaile the City on the other side, he returned with his ships in the night, in which time his land forces assaulting the City, all the Souldiers within were drawn thither, and in the mean season, they in the ships with scaling ladders ascending the walls had an easie entrance. But they were soon strongly resisted, both by the Citizens and Lacedemonians, being there to aid them, till that Alcibiades had made it to be proclaimed, that he would not hurt any of the Bizantians, but the Lacedemonians onely. For hereupon they forbearing to fight more, the Lacedemonians were slain, who still stood to it, all but 500 that tooke sanctuary, and were carryed away to Athens. But in the mean season, the Lacedemonians recovered the Isle Pilus again.

Anno 26, Alcibiades being desirous to return to his Countrey, from which he had been absent now many years, came to Athens, where he was received with great honour, all the people thronging to see him, and then he was in such esteeme that they thought him fit to have all the government of their Armies committed to him, wherefore he went out again within a short time with a navy of 100 ships, and so many men as he desired. But not with that successe which he had in times past, for he assayed to win two Cities, departing from either without prevailing. In the mean season Lysander was made Generall by Sea, for the Lacedemonians, and unto his aid, Cyrus also, the sonne of Darius came with great store of men and money, yet he durst not goe against Alcibiades lying then at Rhodes, and he at Ephesus, but kept his ships, being 70 in that Haven. Then Alcibiades hearing that Thrasybulus was beyond Helespont, he sayled to him, committing his Navy in the mean season to Antiochus, with a charge not to goe out to fight against Lysander till his return. But he out of insolencie with a couple of galleyes went by Lysander at Ephesus provoking him to fight. Wherefore he first sent out a few ships against him, but more comming to his aid, more also came in of the Lacedemonians, and so Antiochus was overcome and slain, and 10 of the Athenian ships taken. Wherefore Alcibiades at his return seeing what was done, and conceiving how his credit at Athens would be hereby impaired, immediately with those ships which remained sayled to Ephesus, but could not provoke Lysander to fight. The Athenians hearing of their losse, began immediately by the instigation of some of Alcibiades his enemies, to vilifie him as much as before they had honoured him, and sent to remove him from his Captainship, setting up 10 other Captains in his stead. But he being moved with indignation hereat, went away, and hired Thracians with his own money, and did great acts for the benefit of all Grecia, and tooke great spoiles from the Barbarians. But Lysander's time of Admiralty being expired, the Lacedemonians sent Callicratidas to govern over the Navy in his stead. He although a valiant and good man, and one that prevailed greatly against the Athenians at the first: for he fought against Conon their chiefe sea Captain, and tooke many of his ships, driving him to a great streight, where he was besieged by sea and land, and when he having given notice to Athens hereof, 10 ships were forthwith sent to help him, he tooke them also, yet at length a great navy of above 100 ships being sent by the Athenians to aid Conon, under eight Captains, he incountring with them perished in a cruell fight, wherein 10 Athenian ships were lost, and many more of the Lacedemonians. But those Captains returning to Athens were ill rewarded, for they were punished both in their goods and lives, because they had left some of their fellows behind them, who were wacked and wounded, and some dead, taking no care of their buriall, which amongst the Athenians was counted an heinous thing. But indeed as they answered for themselves, they were beaten from them by a tempest, so that they could not. When Callicratidas was dead, Lysander was made Generall again, Anno 27. who having provided a mighty Navy, the Athenians also did the like, and came forth under Conon to fight with them. Lysander politikely kept him in the Haven at Ephesus, and would not come forth to fight, although the Athenians by hovering about upon the sea, daily provoked him. But he commanded some of his ships, when they went away, to observe them, which they did fourte

The mutability of the people.

fourte dayes, and by them Lyfander learning, that when they were at their own port, not far distant from him, they used to goe on shore to get provision, hee commanded that they should observe them again when they went on shore, and then hold up a shield for a signe, which they did, and then he comming in with all his power, they in haste returned to their ships, but in such confusion, and so unprepared through want of oares, that they were soon vanquished, and all lost saving one that escaped to Athens to bring the tydings, and eight with which the Captains remaining, fled into another Countrey for feare of the Athenians for this losse, if they should come into their hands. There were 3000 taken, and when they were accused to have threatned the Lacedemonians, to cut off the right hands of such as they should take, and to cast some down headlong from an high rock, they were all cut off except one Captain that had been against this cruell motion, and first of all one Captain that had made it, was put to a most cruell death. Lyfander then hastened to Athens, being now without ships and Souldiers, besieged them, and at length, forced them to yeild, and for ever after to come under the Lacedemonians, the government of Greece being in all places altered by Lyfander, and so an end was put to the Peloponnesian warre, and the pride and cruelty of the Athenians, who affected a tyranny over all Greece, was worthily pulled down and punished, and especially their ingratitude to Alcibiades, and tyranicall executing of the Captains before spoken of, whom they ought rather for their great valour and victorie to have rewarded, so pride goeth before a fall, and justice sleepeth not for ever.

About this time Darius Nothus departing out of this life, appointed his sonne Artaxerxes to be King, who was afterwards called Artaxerxes Mnemon, for the memorable acts that he did. Cyrus his other sonne hoping verily, that by means of his mother, he should have been made King, was greatly discontented hereat, and mediated how to kill him: But Artaxerxes having some intelligence of it, apprehended him, but at the intteary of his mother, with many teares, he was sent away to Lydia, to attend as Governour over the sea affairs. The reason why he expected to have been made King was, because although Artaxerxes were his elder brother, yet hee was borne to Darius before that he was King, Cyrus after.

This yeare also Alcibiades was slain by the Persians, at the instigation of the Lacedemonians their confederates, who thought, that the Athenians would not continue quietly in their obedience as long as he lived. The manner was thus, His house in which he was, as a friend amongst them, was set on fire, he seeing this, woond the coverlet and blankets of his bed together, and having cast them upon the flame, leapt down upon them with his drawn sword in his hand, and so escaped burning, but when none of the Persians were so hardy as to encounter with him, they yet pursued him, fleeing away with their arrows, till that he was wounded and slain. But to return to Cyrus, his brothers levity in dismissing and preferring him, was so far from pacifying his minde, that he might rest content with his estate, that he aspired the more after the Kingdom, and ceased not to plot the destruction of Artaxerxes to this end. But he covered his intention, and onely Abfalom like, first by his courtesie to every man to win their love, and under divers pretences for the good of the Commonwealth, raised forces in divers places, And at length having by his large offers, drawn to him an Army of 13000 Gracians, he marched with them and 100000 Barbarians towards his brother. But Artaxerxes hearing of his preparations by Tissaphernes a President of his, neare to Cyrus (although put out of his authority for Cyrus his sake, to enlarge Cyrus his jurisdiction) he gathered an Army together of 120000 foot, and 6000 horse, and met with him at a place called Cumaxa beyond Euphrates. Then a bloody battell begun, but the barbarous of the Kings Army, against whom the Gracians fought, were soon by them put to flight, yet the middle battell wherein the King was, stood un-assaulted, which Cyrus perceiving, set upon it with 600 chosen horsemen, having with him Clearchus a Gracian Captain. Now this battell consisted of 6000 horsemen about the King, and before them 600 foot: but Cyrus having soon overcome the footmen, set upon the horsemen, and made them also Malum consilium consultori pessimum.

The Athenians fall.
Pride and cruelty punished.

Artax. Mnemon King of Persia.

Alcibiades slain

So Xenophon.
Plutarch.

also to flee. Then he would have had Clearchus to have gone with him immediately against the King, but he being very cautelous, lest he and his men should have been by this means invironed by the Persians, pursued the horse-men fleeing, but Cyrus pressed on towards the King, and when he came in sight of him, hee cryed out with aloud voice, This is the man, ran immediately at him, and piercing through his breastplate, wounded him, but another with a speare, wounded Cyrus in the eye, then the King and Cyrus fighting together, and others comming in to the Kings aid, Cyrus was slain, and his head and right hand were presently cut off.

Diodorus Siculus.

God against the treacherous.

A cunning poysoning.

The Barbarians cruelties.

The Barbarians perfidiousnesse.

In this battell, sayth Diodorus, were slain on Artaxerxes his part, 15000, and on Cyrus his part, 3000, of the Gracians, a few were wounded, but none slain. Herein it appeareth that God is against the treacherous, to bring them to condigne punishment, how far so ever they may seeme to be from it. For in humane reason Artaxerxes was most likely to have been slain, for that he was first pierced by Cyrus his spear through his breastplate, he was also a man of greater courage, and had by his Gracian forces, put his enemies in a great part to flight, and by his own valour, and of a few about him, had broken the greatest strength of the King, and had not Clearchus the Gracian Captain then forsaken him, the King had been undoubtedly slain. But the divine justice wrought against him, when he was even come to the period of his victory, that all brothers and others might feare to be treacherous against their Prince. For no such ever prospered, but when any of their treacherous projects have taken effect, their Kingdom founded in blood never continued, as we may see in Athaliah and divers Kings of Israel, attaining the Diadem by bloodshed. When these Armies came first together to fight, Stasis the wife of Artaxerxes, brake out into virulent speeches against Parysatis his mother, because she had delivered Cyrus to breed this great disturbance, but shee to be revenged, tooke a course forthwith to poyson her, and effected it in this manner. Shee caused a knife to be poisoned on the one side onely, and herewith having divided a bird, whilst they were at meat together, shee ate the one halfe and gave her the other, and so she presently dyed. But the fault being laid upon the Eunuchs who attended her, and Ginges a wanton, that was familiar with her they were put to a tormenting death for it, but she escaped. After the battell ended, Parafites exercised horrible cruelty against one Cates, who vaunted that he had slain Cyrus, for she caused him to be tormented 10 dayes together, and then moulten brasse to be put into his ears till he dyed. Artaxerxes also, put Meistrdates to as cruell a death, because in his drunkennesse he vaunted that he slew Cyrus, which the King thought to be greatly derogatory to him, and would not have any take that honour from himself. For he caused him to be put between two boats, in the one being laid along with his face upward, and the other laid upon him, so as that all his body was covered, saving his head, hands, and feet, which hung out, then meat was given to him, and his eyes pickt, and honey and milke poured upon him, whereby swarms of flies were drawn to those parts, lying to the Sun till he dyed. But because they ceased not daily to feed him, whereby he was long in dying, the excrements comming from him, wherein he lay, bred worms in the mean season, that eat into his body, to the great increase of his torment.

The Gracians having lost Cyrus, were in a great streight, being in an enemies Countrey, and having no ships to return, and by the way to the sea in continuall danger of the Barbarians, yet they tooke their journey homeward, being led by Clearchus. Tissaphernes being unwilling that such enemies should escape, but not daring to enter battell against them, feigned himselfe their friend, and sware unto them for their more security, and so with a great Host of men went along with them into the Countrey of Cyrus, and by the way, Clearchus and the other Captains came to have such a confidence in him, that they feared no danger. They being come therefore together to his City, he permitted foure chiefe Captains, and 20 others, with 200 souldiers, by way of friendship to come in, and brought them to his Court, where the foure chiefe were called in, and the 20 within the gates, where they were forthwith all laid hold upon and slain, and then all the souldiers that were let into the City were destroyed. The other without seeing seeing what was done, through many dangers in a long time, got home into their own Country.

Tissaphernes being now for his good service made the Kings sonne in Law, had the Lordship over which Cyrus had been, added to his own, whereby he growing very great, required the Jonians, being Græcians, dwelling in Asia, that had been formerly subject to Cyrus, to yeild the like obedience to him; but they refused, and sent to the Lacedemonians for helpe against him. To this they readily yeilded, being put on by those their Countrey men who had been with Cyrus, and were now through many dangers returned. For they sayd, that there was nothing amongst the Persians, but wealth, and pride, and women, and that they were not able to stand against the Græcians.

An Army then was sent out by the Lacedemonians to help the Jonians under Thimbro, but when he satisfied not, because he did no great matters, another Commander was sent in his stead, called Dercillidas, and he called home, and grievously punished for suffering his souldiers to prey upon the Jonians. Dercillidas being a man prudent and active, was much feared by Tissaphernes, and therefore he made his peace with him, and therefore leaving him he went to fight against another President of the Persian Kings, Pharnabazus, and when he also preferred peace with him for eight moneths, he went amongst the Thracians for that time. And then returning again, he found Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus joyned together with a great Armie against him, of 20000 foot, and 10000 horsemen, he not having above 7000. yet so sensible was Tissaphernes of the Græcians prowess, since the last battell against Artaxerxes, that he came to Propositions of peace, and then Dercillidas returned to Lacedemonia, to know the minde of his Citizens touching them and Tissaphernes to Artaxerxes, to see whether hee would content: But now Agis, the King of the Lacedemonians being aged, dyeth, and a contention arose between Agefilaus his brother, and Ledychides, pretending that he was his sonne; but it was objected, that he was the sonne of Alcibiades, and not of Agis. And although he brought many witnesses that Agis acknowledged him for his sonne upon his death bed, and a Priest came warning the Lacedemonians from the Oracle, not to make a lame man their King, and Agefilaus was lame, yet by the help of Lyfander he was made King, and another interpretation made of the Oracle, viz. that one lame in respect of his descent from Hercules, of whom the Lacedemonian Kings came, should not be made.

Lyfander then moved the people to desire that Agefilaus might goe against the Persians, which was done accordingly, and so preparation being made, he with Lyfander and 30 Counsellours, which he tooke along with him, passed into Asia. Tissaphernes went to meete him, and there were propositions of peace made as before, that the Græcians in Jonas should live according to their own Laws. But about this he agreed first to goe and consult with the King, swearing to a truce for a certain time. But he sware deceitfully, for he went to the King onely to procure great forces, and then came contrary to his oath to fight against the Græcians. Agefilaus nothing dismayed here at sayd, that the gods he knew would help him, because although he perceived before the fraud of Tissaphernes, yet he kept his oath, but then would be against Tissaphernes because he was perjured. So a great battell was fought, and although Tissaphernes his Armie exceeded in number yet he was overthrown and put to flight, and the Persian King being certified hereof was hereby much incensed against him, and sent and beheaded him. Thus the perjured wretch that had not feared to swear fraudulently twice, once to Clearchus before, and now to Agefilaus, was justly cut off as hee was well worthy. In this time, it is also worth the noting, that Lyfander bearing himself upon the Kings favour, for his good deserts towards him, grew so ambitious, that he drew all such as had suits to the King, to seeke him by his mediation, so that he had far greater companies of men following him, and attending at his house, then the King at his Court, yea, Agefilaus was but as a private person in comparison of him. But the King perceiving it, both denyed all suitors that came by him, and granted to such as came without him, and when he was by Lyfander

Periury odious to the gods

Periury punishable.

Pride hath a fall.

Seeking to Christ by the mediation of Mary.

A King without the consent of the State can do nothing.

The Sun horned as the Moon.

challenged therefore, he answered that he dealt so with such onely as would be greater then himselfe, and so Lysander, who would be of greatest authority, and carryed it as a King, was not admitted to be so much as a mediator to a King. Much likedoe the Papiests daily to the Virgin Mary in greater multitudes frequenting her shrines then Christs, so that shee seemes to be the Queen, but Christ a private person. But let them looke to be dealt with, as they that came by Lysander to Agefilaus, that is, to be dismissed without a grant, when such as come without her mediation shall prevail. Tissaphernes being cut off, Tishraustes who succeeded him, sent to Agefilaus willing him to depart, seeing the author of these troubles was now cut off, and the Ionians should now be permitted to live according to their Laws, paying of their accustomed Tribute. He answered, that hee could doe nothing, untill that he had answer about it from Lacedemonia, but in the mean season he agreed to depart into Phrygia for 30 Talents and so did. Then having authority given him over the Sea forces, as well as over the Land, he regarded not to give answer to Tishraustes, but added unto his Land forces 120 ships, over which he set his wives brother. But Tishraustes being moved at this, sent Timocrates a Rhodian with 50 Talents of gold to Thebes, Corinth, and other places in Greece, hereby to provoke the Governours there to fall from the Lacedemonians, which they did accordingly, and the Athenians, though not waged, joynd with them also, being in hope by this means to erect their State again, and thus great troubles begun again in Greece. But Agefilaus, in the meane season, prevailed greatly in Phrygia and Paphlagonia, and so comming against the Countrey of Pharnabazus, the Persian tooke that also, but he soon came to an agreement with him, and departed out of his Countrey again, purposing to goe on and subdue other Countreys of the Persians, but the Lacedemonians being in this time indangered by the Athenians, Thebans, Argives, and Corinthians, to whom also the Spartans joynd themselves under their Captain Conon, were enforced to send for Agefilaus to his great grieve to return home, to which he immediatly prepared, leaving 4000 in Garisons in the towns which he had taken. But before he could come to Lacedemonia, a cruell battell was fought, an whole day together, betwixt the Lacedemonians and those that revolted from them, the victory falling to the Lacedemonians, there being slain of their enemies 2800, of them 1100.

The news hereof being brought to Agefilaus, and soon after that Conon with the help of Pharnabazus, had gotten a great victory over the Lacedemonians by Sea, he wisely dissembled it, and led on his Army towards his Countrey, the Sun appearing to him in the way like unto the two horned moon. Then comming to Bœtia, they of that Countrey, and the Lacedemonians with many more joynd unto him, and so he went and fought a bloody battell against the Thebans, in which he received many wounds, but put them to flight. Then he dedicated to God the rithe of the spoiles which he had taken at Delos, not lesse worth then 200 talents, and so was carryed home by water. But the Lacedemonians went on victoriously by land, from place to place, and Pharnabazus with Conon prevailed every where almost by sea. Yet at length Fideltas being made Captain by sea, knit the hearts of his souldiers so unto him by his offering to endure any hardship with them, that he thought now he might goe upon any desperate attempt. And therefore having but 23 ships, he adventured upon the great Navy of the Athenians upon the Iodain, lying at the haven Perinthus, the souldiers being for the most part gone ashore for their pleasure, and fearing nothing lesse, wherefore he tooke their ships with ease, and having sent them away to Ægina an Island neere, he went on and took many more as he met with them; some fishers; and some Merchants laden with wares; and by this means in a short time he grew so strong, that he did the Athenians much mischief. It was not long therefore after this, before that a peace was made again betwixt the Lacedemonians, Athenians, and their associates, and with the Persians also; because that Artaxerxes had other wars to intend, so that he thought it the best way to be at peace with all the Grecians. But the peace amongst the Grecians lasted not long, for wars again soon followed in divers places; untill that the Lacedemonians grew too mighty for them all. But yet neither did they continue long in that case, but the Thebans with

with their Confederates prevailed mightily against them, and slew many of them under their Captain Epaminondas, neither would a peace be made again in Greece as long as Artaxerxes lived, although the Athenians joining with the Lacedemonians greatly fought it. But the Thebans by Embassadors to the King, prevailing for a Decree, that the Athenians should not help the Lacedemonians, and that divers other States should separate from them, otherwise he by his irresistible forces would make war upon them, thought to attain to the Empire of all Græcia. but they were deceived, those States not being moved by the threats of the King to leave the Lacedemonians, and not long after Artaxerxes Mnemon dyed, leaving his Kingdom to his sonne Ochus, who called himselfe Artaxerxes Ochus, when he had reigned according to some, 40 years, to some 36, and according to some, but 21, whereof 11 with his father Darius Nothus, such diversity is there amongst Historians, about the time of this King. But going by the High-priests and Dukes of the Jews, according to Fucci, he dyed in the 16 yeare of Joannes his High-priesthood, and Artaxerxes Ochus succeeded him, about which time, the said Joannes slew his brother in the Temple, as hath been before declared. Artaxerxes Mnemon is reported to have been a peaceable King, but greatly taken with the love of over many women, for he had 360 concubines, and by them 115 sonnes, yea he tooke his own daughter Atossa and Amestris his daughter taken from Tribazis, to whom he had formerly given her in marriage. Ochus having attained the Kingdom, as Justinus sayth, by treacherously making away two brothers, that were in his fathers favour before him, left any of his brothers surviving should trouble his reigne, slew them all, sparing no age or sex, and so made war against the Caduceans.

Touching the Græcian affairs, Epaminondas with his Thebans, when they could draw none on the Lacedemonians or Athenians side unto them, desperately set upon Sparta, but Archidamus coming to the rescue of the City, they were forced by a few to retire, although they were many. Then his time being neare, that he must leave his Captainship, left his glory should be eclipsed, which he had formerly gotten, he resolved to fight against Manina, where the greatest forces of his enemies were, and so, if he prevailed to doe away the dishonour which he had formerly gotten by fighting without successe, or else in fighting valiantly to dye. Wherefore he with all his forces drew neare to that City, and began to intrench his Army, which the enemies seeing, supposed that he would not yet fight against the City, but after the finishing of his trench, and therefore letting their Armes and horses be here and there, they walked carelessly about. Epaminondas therefore when he saw it fall out according to his expectation, sodainly drew out his Forces, went against them and slew many, whilst they were getting their Armes and horses, but at length when he had put them to flight, in pursuing them he was mortally wounded, and being carryed to his Tent, when the weapon was drawn out of him, dyed, rejoycing for the victory, although he in getting it lost his life, and his father Xenophon being nothing daunted, when news was brought him of his death, sayd, Novi me cum genuisse mortalem.

After this great battell, the Greeks in all parts grew weary of warre, and inclined to termes of peace, and agreed to an universall peace, all but Lacedemonia, by reason of the Messenians, whom they would not have left free, seeing they had subdued and held them under now these 20 years. And by this means wars soon began again. At this time also there were great stirs in Persia, for many of his Princes neare the sea, revolted from him, and Tachos the King of Ægypt revolted also, and asking help of the Lacedemonians, they sent unto his ayd Agésilas their King with 1000 men compleatly armed, and when he came Tachos added to his number, 10000 more, and set forth his sonne Nectanebus with 80000, which Armies, together with the Princes in Asia that revolted, and their forces, would greatly have indangered the Kingdom of Persia, but that they were soone divided amongst themselves, whereby all their preparations were frustrated. For Orontes to whose leading all the other Princes committed their forces, to regain the Kings favour, apprehended and sent many of them bound to the King, and Reomithres who was set over the Navy, did the like. And when the King of Diodorus.

Euseb Chron.
Fucci more.
Anno Mundi 3599.

Plutarch.
Q. Curtius.

Heathen Marriages.

A Stratagem of Epaminondas.

Egypt was gone forth to war, being in Phœnicia, he heard that the man whom he had made Viceroy in his absence, usurped the Kingdom, and sent to his sonne Nactanabus to come back with his Forces to take his fathers Kingdom, which he immediately did, and then Taches fled to Artaxerxes, and craved pardon for his fault, which was both granted, and he made Generall of all the Forces to goe and fight against his sonne. He came therefore to Agelans, and so together they marched with their Armies towards his sonne. But he comming forth with 10000 against him, Taches durst not fight but withdrew himselfe to a City, which yet when Nactanabus besieged, Agelans going forth against him, put him to flight, and restored Taches to his Kingdom again, but because he was not made Generall of all his Forces, he being sought unto by Nactanabus, went to him, and removing Taches again, made him King, being therefore rewarded with 230 Talents of silver, but in his return homeward he dyed, when he had reigned 41 years.

Euseb. Chron.

And now we are come to the fourth yeare of Artaxerxes Ochus, wherein Philip the sonne of Amynas began to reigne over Macedonia, it will be necessary, because Alexander the Great came of him, who subdued the Persian Monarchy, and erected the Græcian, to looke back to the beginning of this Kingdom, and to shew the state thereof in the dayes of this Philip. Caranus of the stock of Heraclidas was the first that united divers peoples into one, calling the whole Region Macedonia, being as, some say, directed thither by the Oracle, with many Græcians, and he reigned 28 years, him Carnus succeeding reigned 12, then Turymas 38, then Perdicus 51, Argens 38, Philip 30, then Ereopus who came to the Kingdom being a childe, but there being war then between the Illyrians and Macedonians, in which the Macedonians were put to the worst, they went again into the field carrying their King with them in his cradle, and so fighting the more courageously, gave the Illyrians a great overthrow. Then, as Justinus sayth, reigned Amynas, but Eusebius putteth nine more before him, and this Amynas was father to Philip. How weake the Kingdom of Macedonia was in his time and before, appeareth in that it was of no fame, but whilst the wars were in Greece, they always sought to joyne with the strongest side, and when Amynas was King, by the Illyrians comming against him, he was driven out of his Kingdom, and was without hope of recovering it again, till that he was by the Thesalians and Spartans restored to it again, yet still he was a tributary to the Illyrians, reigning first and last 18 years, and for his fidelity to the Illyrians, he gave them his youngest sonne Philip for a pledge. Then he dying left foure sonnes, Alexander, Alorites, Perdicus, and Philip, who being given for a pledge, was brought up at Thebes in good literature. Alexander succeeding in the Kingdom, was slain treacherously by Alorites, when he had reigned one yeare, and Alorites likewise by Perdicus, when he had reigned foure; then Perdicus having reigned six years, attempting to shake off the Illyrian yoke, was slain in a cruell battell, and with him 4000 Macedonians. The Kingdom being by this means without a King Philip, by a wonderfull providence, escaping from Sparta, came and tooke the Kingdom upon him. yet at the first rather acting the part of a tutour to the sonne of Perdicus a childe then of a King, till that necessity inforcing it, he being chosen and desired by the people, reigned in Macedonia. But then he was in a very uncertain and dangerous estate by reason of other competitor, as Pausanias a kinsman, who sought the Kingdom by the help of the King of Thracia, and Argans by help of the Athenians, with these therefore he agreed by gifts and fair promises in part, namely with the Pæonians, abettours of the said Argens, and when Argens came, notwithstanding with the Athenians to try the Macedonians whether they would revolt unto him, they refusing, he retired, and being pursued by Philip, many of his men were slain. Philip then sent to Athens, and because he yielded up Amphipolis unto them, of which they were greatly desirous, he easily prevailed with them not to molest him any more. And as touching Pausanias, he by sending gifts to the King of Thracia, stayed him from comming against him. He was also a man apt to win good will, because he was both of an excellent wit, and well spoken. Having therefore by these his gifts and speeches made unto his Iustine.

Ma-

Macedonians to encourage them, put them in good comfort and expectation of greater matters to be done by him for the good of that Kingdom, and by the prophesie which then went of the sonnes of Amyntas, that one of them should greatly enlarge that Kingdom, he first made war upon the Paonians, taking the opportunity of their Kings death, because they had formerly wasted the fields of the Macedonians, and subdued them, then he went against the Illyrians, the old enemies of his Kingdom, sending first Embassadors to Bardiles their King requiring him to restore those Cities, which had been formerly taken by the Illyrians from the Macedonians, which when he refused to doe, they came together to battell, Philip bringing with him an Army of 10000 foot, and 600 horie. They fought valiantly on both sides, but in the end Philip got the victory, and of the Illyrians there were slain 7000, wherefore the Illyrians were glad to sue for peace, and when they had left all the Macedonian Towns, as was required, it was granted. After this he fought against Amphipolis and wan it, because since his leaving of it, they being under the protection of the Athenians had shewed great enmity against him. Then he subdued Pydna to the Olynthians, that he might enjoy their friendship, and Potidaea also. After that he tooke Cremidas, which he called after his name Philippi. There he finding mines of gold by building works, brought them to be worth to him above, 1000 Talents per annum, and hereby being greatly enriched, he increased his Army. Then an opportunity offered it selfe, to draw him with his forces into Thessalia, for Alexander Pherus, the Tyrant being slain by his wife and brethren, and his said brethren exercising the like tyranny, the Nobles of the Land called in Philip thither to ayd them against these tyrants, wherefore he went and subdued them, and by this means had the Thessalian horsemen, which were the most excellent of all others, to assist him in his wars always after, both he and his sonne Alexander, when he was dead. And now Philip tooke to wife Olympiad, the daughter of Neoptolemus King of the Molossians, by whom he had his sonne Alexander.

Georg: Gemistius.

Diodorus

In this time there were two things onely memorable touching Artaxerxes Ochus the Persian King. 1 There was one Datames a great Prince under him, with whom he had been greatly offended, but he was at length in shew reconciled, continuing still desirous to have him taken out of the way, and to this end using many policies, which he still being very wary avoyded, at length one Meithridates, the sonne of Artobazanes undertooke to fulfill his desire, so that he would give him his right hand and promise, that whatsoever he should doe to this end, he would never punish him for it. This being done, he feigned a defection from the King, and invading the Kings Territories he tooke Castles, and carrying away great preyes, sending part to Datames, as one that greatly desired his friendship. When he had thus done long, Datames believing that he was revolted from the King indeed, esteeming him a true friend, and therefore Meithridates sending to him, to desire a meeting with him, to consult how to prosecute the war begun with greater Forces against the King, he appointed a place and time of meeting, but to that place Meithridates went, with one trusty friend before, and hid some swords, and so when they met and had conferred, and were now parted, he returning took a sword, and hiding it under his coat, called back Datames, as if he would speake a word more with him, and then unawares slew him. 2 Great wars being betwixt the Athenians and Rhodians, Chians and other States that revolted from them, Chares was made Generall over the Athenian forces by sea, being 60 ships, and unto him were soon after joyned Iphicrates and Timotheus, who brought 60 sayls more. Now when these together would have set upon Bizantium, which was one of the revolters, a suddain storme came with such violence, that they were by force hereof beaten far away. Hereupon these two advised not to return to fight against Bizantium again, but Chares would return, and when he could not bring them to agree to him, he wrote to the Athenians so against them, that they were called home, and a mulct of many Talents was layd upon them, and Chares alone was made Captain over all. Wherefore he to ease the Athenians of the charge of the wars what he could, hastened to Pharnabazus, a Prince of the Persians, who had revolted from the King, and now

The Persian affairs.

A subtille policie.

A new friend not to be trusted.

was Philip of Macedonia.

was ready to be set upon by 7000 sent out against him, when his forces were but small, and joining his forces with them obtained a great victory for him, for which he was rewarded with great treasure, that sufficed to pay his whole Army. The Athenians hearing of this were joyfull for a time, but the King of Persia was so provoked hereby, that he expostulated with them by his Embassadors for it, and sent 300 sayls to ayd the Byzantians, &c. This being heard at Athens, they immediately sought peace with the Byzantians, and Rhodians, and others which had falne from them, and without much difficulty obtained it.

To return again to Philip of Macedonia, the Illyrians and others whom he had subdued, being vexed that they were thus brought under, now meditated revenge by joining all together against him, to expell him out of his Kingdom, but he hearing of their plot came suddainly upon them, and compelled them to continue in their obedience, then he overcame Metkon and Pogás, which last belonged anciently to Macedonia, but in winning Metkon he lost one of his eyes, by a shaft shot by one Aster, having written upon it, Aster Philippo telum jact mortiferum, but Philip returned him another with this inscription, Asterem Philippus captum faciet pensilem: and having won the City he razed it to the ground, but whether he hanged Aster or no, I read not. After this he was desired again to return into Thessalia, because Lycophron, one of the Tyrants by him formerly subdued, had taken the Kingdom again upon him, being ayded by Onomarchus with an huge Army, and Phailus his brother having another Armie of 7000. These fighting against Philip overcame him once or twice, whereby he was put in great danger, and compelled to retire to Macedonia. But he having renewed his Army, went again into Thessalia against Lycophron, and Onomarchus being by him desired, returned again to help him, with 2000 foot and 3000 horse of the Phocians, whose Captain he was, but not with his former success. For now Philip prevailed, and put his whole Army to flight, killing 6000, and taking 3000, amongst whom Onomarchus being one, was hanged, through a just judgement, because he was Captain of those that had robbed the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, and taken away the great treasures thereof. For although he were no God, but a Devil, yet because the Grecians generally revered him as a God, sacrilege was thus punished in him, and the 3000 taken with him, were for the like cause cast into the sea, none of them being spared. But to recite the History of this sacrilege from the beginning.

Sacrilege punished.

After the Mantinean battell before spoken of, there was a common Councell of twelve peoples of Greece assembled to settle the whole country in peace. There the Thebans accused the Lacedemonians for taking a Castle from them in time of truce, and the Phocians for taking away a great tract of dedicated ground, for which they were adjudged to lose their own land to make satisfaction. Philomelus a chiefe man amongst them, being impatient of this great mulct, exhorted his country men to take the Temple at Delphos, seeing that was within their bounds, whereby they might be supplied with money enough, to wage Souldiers to defend themselves against all Grecia, and when they consented, he imparted it to Archidamus King of the Lacedemonians, desiring his aid, and having obtained of him 15 Talents, and putting to as many of his own, with many of the Phocians, and 1000 hired Souldiers, he went and tooke that Temple. For this the Locrians first being angry with him, went against him to battell, but with ill success, wherefore they called the Boetians to their ayd, and the Boetians thought to stir up all Grecia. But the Lacedemonians tooke part with the Phocians, and some also of the Athenians, and when great Forces were raised on both sides, a cruell battell was fought, and Philomelus was put to flight, and so hard pursued, that to avoid taking, he leapt from an high rock and killed himselfe, thus paying for his sacrilege. Then Onomarchus being made Captain of the same sacrilegious rout for a time prevailed, but at length had his condigne punishment also, as hath been shewed. But yet the Sacrilegious ceased not to prosecute their begun warre, for they made Phailus, brother to Onomarchus, now their Captain, who converting all the gold and silver in the Temple at Delphos into money, hired great Forces therewith, and went against the Boetians. For he broke up, as Diodorus sayth, Diodorus.

100 pavements or bricks of gold, given sometime by Craſus to that Temple, and tooke 360 golden Vials, a golden Lyon and a Woman, comming altogether to 30 Talents, and of silver gifts, as much as made them up 10000 Talents. So that now by the large stipends profered, viz. double wages, he drew so many from all parts unto him, that his power far exceeded any that had been raised before. And the Lacedemonians sent also to him 1000, the Athenians 5000, and 400 horse, the Achei 2000, and Lycophron expelled by Philip out of Thessalia came to him with 2000, yet with all this Army he could not prevail, God being against him for his sacrilege, but within a few dayes, being smitten with tormenting pangs, when he had lyen long consuming under them he dyed in the space of one year after. But this I rather think came upon him from the Devill, God permitting it, seeing both he and his Souldiers had mancipated themselves to his service, being all Idolaters, and an Idoll being nothing but a Devill, as Saint Paul teacheth. He being dead, yet this war ended not, but Phaeachus was made Commander, being the sonne of Onomarchus, and because he was very young, one Mnaseas was joyned unto him, as a tutor. Against them Philip returning from Thessaly, bent his course, but being hindered by the Athenians at the streights of Thermophile (they fearing that if he were employed in these wars, that they should all be in danger of being brought under by him) he went into Macedonia. But this young Commander seeking rather to enrich himselfe with the spoiles of the Temple, then to prosecute any Wars, was at length found out and put from his Office, and three others set up in his stead, by whom all the Captains that had an hand in that buſinesse were made miserably to perishe. Then the Phocians went against the Bœtians and Thebans, and they fearing their own strength, sought to Philip of Macedonia for ayd, who came with his Army, and gave the Phocians a great overthrow, in so much that whilst they fled, some hither, and some thither, 500 of them fled into the Temple of Apollo, and then there being much straw neere, which was fired, the Temple was also therewith burnt, and all that fled into it together. But they which still remained, sent for ayd to the Lacedemonians, and obtained it, whereupon Philip was sent for again, and came with a great power of Macedonians and Thessalians. The Phocians then being terrified, sought peace, and thus an end was put to this warre, which had now lasted nine or ten years; Philip referred it to the Bœtians and Thebans, upon what conditions peace should be granted to them, and they would have this judged by the generall Councell of Greece, wherein Philip for his valour had a double voyce granted unto him, which the Phocian State was wont to have, and that for ever deprived thereof, and of the Temple, and three of their chiefe Cities were judged to have their walls beaten down, and that they should not possesse any Armes or horses any more, till they had made recompence to that Temple for the harmes done to it, and till this were done, pay 60 Talents per annum to that god, and both theirs, and the Armes of their hired Souldiers should be broken in peeces, in detestation of their wickednesse.

Whilst these things were in doing in Greece, the King of Egypt, Nectonabus revolted from Artaxerxes Ochus, and by his example the Phœnicians and Cyprians, being hardly used by the Persians revolted likewise, and sent to Nectonabus to joyne with him, making all manner of preparations for war. And to the end that the King might not want matter of provocation, they spoiled his gardens, burnt up his hey, and abused his Officers, wherefore Artaxerxes prepared a mighty Army both of horse and foot to goe against them, first sending out the Kings of Syria and Cilicia, who being incountered by Tennes King of the Sydonians, or Phœnicians, holpen by Mentor a Rhodian with 4000 Græcians were beaten out of the Countrey again. But when Ochus approached, such a terrour was stricken by the excessive greatnesse of his Army into them, that Mentor sent Thesalus a faithfull friend privately unto him, to promise him to deliver the Sydonians into his hands, and by his experience that he had of the Egyptian affairs, to help him to conquer that Kingdom also, if he would accept of him. The King giving him his hand, promised a great reward if he did thus, then he drew Tennes to the same conspiracie with him, upon hope to regain the Kings favour also. He therefore

The riches of Apollo his Temple.

A Decree against the sacrilegious Phocians.

The Persian affairs.

The reward of treachery.

Funcinus.

P. Orosius.
The Jews
place in Hircania.

Alberamus.

Ælian. varie hitor.
Artes King.
Anno Mundi 3608.
Iaddab High-priest.

Josephus, antiq.
lib. 11. c. 8.

therefore first tooke 100 of the chiefe Citizens of Sidon, as authors of the revolt at a meeting pretended to be for consultation, and delivered them to Ochus, who used him friendly, but slew them forthwith. This being done, 500 of the Sidonians came humbly with olive branches to sue for peace, but when Ochus had consulted with Tennes, and was by him advertised, that he might take the City without conditions, he tooke and slew all these also. Then by his means he coming to be let into the City, and having gotten it into his possession, he smote the treacherous King also, as thinking him no further serviceable to him, as he was well worth, seeing that instead of a Protector he played the Traytor to his Kingdom. Sidon being thus gotten, all the rest of the Towns about readily yielded, but the Citizens seeing in what case they were, shut themselves into their houses with their wives and children, and setting fire upon them, were together with the whole City burnt, the very floors of their houses being covered with melted gold and silver, of which Artaxerxes Ochus made many Talents. Then the King wrote to Idricus a Prince, to raise forces against the Cyprians, which being done, they were easily brought to submit themselves to the Persian again, although they were nine Cities, every one having a petty King. After this he passed on to Egypt, having many Græcians added to his Army, and the Egyptians had likewise 20000 Græcians in his Army, and 20000 Africans, and 60000 Egyptians, wherefore the battell was stoutly upheld for a time at Pelusium, but when they heard that Nectanabus their King was fled out of Pelusium to Memphis, that City was soon yielded. Mentor also by promising courteous usage to all that would return to Ochus, but threatening such destruction to all that stood out, as came to the Sidonians prevailed to bring in many other Cities, and then Nectanabus not daring to abide at Memphis to defend his Kingdome by battell, but utterly despairing of holding it any longer, fled into Ethiopia, there to live in exile all the rest of his dayes. Thus Ochus easily brought that whole Kingdom under his obedience again, and having broken down the walls of their Cities, and spoiled their Temples, he returned full of rich spoils to Babylon, leaving Pheendales to govern over Egypt. But Funcinus relateth before this out of Eusebius his overthrowing of Apodasmus a City of the Jews, and carrying them to Hircania, by the Caspian Sea, and placing them there. But Paulus Orosius sayth, that they were carryed out of Egypt thither; and therefore this being the first time of this Kings coming into Egypt, it must needs be at this time and no sooner. The King being returned home from the Egyptian warre, began to reward Mentor with 100 Talents of silver, and the Prefecture of all the Asiatick Coast, and he accordingly did him great good service in subduing partly by fraud, and partly by force, many of his rebels. From henceforth I finde nothing more memorable touching Ochus, but that as he began his reigne in blood, by killing of his brethren, so he continued cruell and bloody to his end, in so much that Athenaus propounds his saying to his son, when he asked him how he had held this Kingdom so long, Pietate erga Deos, & iustitia in homines, for a paradox. And as his life had been, so was his death, by a just judgement his life was also taken away by poysoning, when he had reigned according to some 23, according to others 26 years. And this was done by Bagoas an Egyptian Eunuch, who he had made Tribune of his souldiers, reposing the greatest trust in him, that he did in any man. The cause was an hatred conceived against the King, because when he subdued Egypt, he derided their superstitions, and caused Apis their god to be killed, and part of his flesh to be eaten at his table, wherefore after divers years he wrought his death by his Physitian, whom he corrupted with gifts to poyson him. Being dead he cut his body in pieces and cast it to cats, as Ælian sayth, and of his skin made scabbards for swords.

He being dead, he set up his youngest sonne Artes, killing all the rest of his brethren. To return a little to the Jews, In the tenth yeare of Ochus, Iaddab was made their High-priest, and solived two years, that is to the time of Alexanders Monarchy. He had a brother called Manasseh, who contrary to the Law of God married the daughter of Sarballat, Prince of the Samaritans, at this, the Elders of the Jews being grieved, came to the High-priest, and desired that either

either he should put away his strange wife again, or else be put from the Altar. Manasseh therefore went to Sanballat, and told him, that although he loved his daughter well, yet he would not for her sake be put from the Priesthood, which was amongst the Jews counted a great dignity. He answered, that if he would keepe her still, he would obtain of Darius the Persian King, leave to build him a Temple upon Mount Gerizim in Samaria, in which he should be High-Priest as his brother was at Jerusalem. Now whilst this was plotting, Alexander came against Darius, and having overcome him, Sanballat turned to Alexander, with 8000 men, and of him he being friendly received, obtained leave to build a Temple upon Mount Gerizim, and to make Manasseh High-Priest there, pretending, that it would make for the Kings benefit, because thus the power of the Jews might be divided, and the more easily subdued. Manasseh being thus advanced, many resorted to him that had married strange wives, or been otherwise delinquents against the Law; by which means he was the more confirmed in his Pontificality, and so continued all the time of King Alexanders Reigne and after.

But to proceed in the History of Philip where we left it, there was now peace made betwixt Him and the Athenians, in the time whereof he removed the inhabitants of one Countrey into another by exchange, and so made one large Kingdom of Macedonia of them all, thinking by this means to keepe them the more quiet. And at this time came Aristotle to him, and was made Tutor to his Son Alexander, being then 14 years old. Then Philip with a mighty Army invaded the Illyrians, and having wasted their fields, and overthrown many Cities, returned home with a rich prey. At which time Alexander being but a youth, hearing it, is sayd to have greived, saying, that his Father would leave nothing for him to doe whereby he might win any glory.

The next memorable thing done by Philip was his war against Chersobleptes the King of Thracia, for when he invaded many Cities of Greece about Helespont, Philip went with a great Army against him, fought many battels with him, and brought them so much under, that the Thracians thenceforth pay their tenths to the King of Macedonia: And he built some strong places in Thracia, whereby the better to keepe them in aw, whereby the Grecians hearts were so wonne unto Philip, that they willingly associated themselves unto him in his wars, thus Diodorus, but Justinus sayth, that he circumvented the Thracian King by fraud, and so made a prey of him. Things succeeding so well unto Philip, he cast in his minde how to win all Gracia, and because Byzantium stood so, as that no corne could be transported thither but by this City, and without it they could not live, he first bends his Forces against Byzantium and Perinthus neere unto it, and being, as it were, the base Town thereof. The men of Byzantium seeing the great Forces brought against them, sent to Athens for aid. The Athenians taking this invading of Byzantium for a breach of the peace on Philip's part, by the perswasion of Demosthenes sent a great Navy of 120 ships to ayd them, which Philip seeing, renewed his peace again with the Athenians, and departed towards Scythia, being sent for by Marthea the King to ayd him against the King of the Isthians, promising to make him his successeur in that Kingdom. But whilst he was upon the way, the King of the Isthians dyed, and then the Macedonians were sent away derided, and unpaid their charges. Philip being much displeased at this, thought to be revenged, but for a colour he sent to the King of Scythia, that he might have leave to come to the mouth of Istrus, and set up an Image to Hercules to procure his favour in his wars. The King smelling out fraud herein, returned answer, that if he would send an Image to beset up he would see it done, but if otherwise he would come against his will to set it up, he would surely pull it down again, to make arrow heads to shoot at him. Philip yet being unsatisfied made great preparations to goe against the Scythians, and then went and took great spoils, when he had overcome them 20000 women and children, and 20000 excellent mares for breed: but in his return, the Scythothracians would not let him passe, unlesse he would give them part of his prey, whereupon an hot battell was fought, and Philip was wounded on his thigh, through which his horse was slain under and the Athenians peace.

Betwixt Philip

Justinus l. 8.

Alex. pueri fortitudo.

Diodorus.

Philip's great danger.

Justin.

Alexander
mocks Philip.Deriding Parents.

Pride punisht.

Diodorus.

Justin.

A womans cruelty being by her husband put away

him, and whilst his men thinking that he had been slain, came about him, the prey was carried away, and Philip lost all that he went for, indangering his life also. But when he was healed of his wound, the peace betwixt him and the Athenians being broken, he went to war against them and the Thebans with 30000 foot, and 2000 horsemen. They likewise came to fight against him with a greater number in Cheronea of Boeotia. Then Philip leading one wing, committed the other to his son Alexander, being now 19 years old, who behaved himself so valiantly, that when he had fought long and could not prevaile, at length he brake in amongst his enemies, and made them to flee after great slaughters. Philip seeing this, enforced himself likewise, and beat back and overthrew those that were placed against him, and so after the fall of 2000 and 2000 taken prisoners, he got the victory, and by that means the Empire of all Gracia. But the way whereby he compassed it was this. Making the Thebans subject to him, and selling the Captives taken of them, and placing Magistrates over them, he sent to make a league with the Athenians, and restoring their Captives gratis, he sent to call a Council together of all the Gracians, wherein he complained of the wrongs done to the Greeks by the Persians and to their gods, saying, that he had in his minde to goe into Asia, and to be revenged therefore, if they would choose him Emperour of all Gracia. And when he had obtained this, he mustered the forces of Gracia, to prepare for his expedition into Asia, and found them to be 200000 foot, and 15000 horse, besides his Army of Macedonians. Whilst this preparation was making, Philip put away his wife Olympias, for suspicion of adultery, and married Cleopatra, the neece of Attalus, one of his greatest Commanders. At this marriage, when Attalus was merry with wine, he told the Macedonians that they should now pray to the gods for a worthy successour to Philip by this marriage. But Alexander being vexed at his words sayd. Et quid nos tibi sumus scelus, num adulterini videmur? and taking up a cup, was ready to throw it at him: Philip being moved at this, rose from his place with his sword drawn to strike at Alexander, but by the way he stumbled and fell, at which Alexander mocking, sayd, is he likely to lead the Macedonians into Asia, who cannot goe from one bed to another without falling? which was the part of an undutifull sonne, howsoever he was provoked, and therefore God suffered him not to live long, as he hath promised to children, that honour not their parents. Hereupon Alexander placing his mother Olympias in Epyrus, with that King her brother went away into Ilyria. Philip then sent Attalus, Pharmacia, and Amintas, with part of his Army into Gracia before him, but staying still till the next yeare, called home his son Alexander to him again, by the perswasion of his friend Damarratus. Philip then gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage to Alexander King of Epyrus, who was her uncle, and for the solemnization of this marriage, made great preparations. Amongst other shews then prepared, there was one of the twelve gods of Gracia most curiously wrought, carryed about with great solemnity, and after them a thirteenth of Philip, in like manner adorned, whereby the proud man tooke now upon him, as if he also were a god. But for this his pride he soone perished by the hand of a young man, one Pausanias who was angry with him, because that being made drunken by Attalus, and then his body exposed to grosse abuses by him, he coming to himselfe had complained to Philip without any amends. When the King therefore was most secure, and walked without his guard about him in a long white robe between two Alexanders, the guard being commanded to follow after him, Pausanias tooke his time to thrust him through, and then fleeing towards his horse, which was ready at the gate, his foot was snarled in a vine, and so Pausanias coming upon him with others, slew and cut him in peeces. Thus Philip dyed, Anno 25 of his reigne, of his age 47. And Justin sayth, that Pausanias was thought to have been moved to this murder by Alexander and Olympias his mother mad for the divorce, when he complained to them of the wrong done unto him without punishment. And some signe there was hereof, because the mangled body of Pausanias being hanged, Olympias sent a Crown of gold to beset upon his head, and when the Kings body was burned, according to the manner, shee caused his body to be burnt upon it, and and his aſhes to be buried in the ſame place with his. And touching Cleopatra and the child which Philip had by her, which Iuſtine calls a daughter, Diodorus ſays a ſon, ſhee having killed the child in the mothers boſome, ſayth Iuſtine, ſhee hanged her: but Panſanias ſayth, that ſhee put them both into a veſſell of braſſe, and ſo making a great fire about it, tormented them to death. If Alexander had any hand in this murder, here was another evident cauſe why he was ſo ſoone cut off.

Whiſt Philip was thus preparing againſt the Perſian, Narſes the King thinking not to take away Bagoas for his inſolencies, was by him prevented, when hee ſmelt what he went about, and treacherouſly ſlain, both he and his children when he had reigned three years. Then Ariſtanus a valiant man was choſen King, ſay ſome, there remayning neither brother nor child, but Diodorus ſayth, hee was the ſon of Ariſtanus the brother of Artaxerxes Ochus, his name Darius; but the other, that this name was given him for the more honour. He being King, when Bagoas had thought to have made him away alſo by a poiſoned Cup, hee called him friendly to him, and then compelled him to drink it, and ſo hee was at length taken in his own trap. Darius hearing of the Macedonian preparations againſt his Countreys, began both diligently to make ready his forces againſt the Grecians, that were come into Aſia, and by great gifts to ſtirre up the Athenians, Thebans, and other peoples in Greece, againſt the King of Macedonia, to effect which he alſo hired Demosthenes with 70 Talents. But when hee heard, that Philip was dead, he had at the firſt no fear of Alexander for his youth, yet Alexander at the firſt entrance into his Kingdome doing great exploits againſt the Illyrians, Thracians, and others in thoſe parts, whom hee thought it not ſafe to leave, but firſt wholly ſubdued, when he ſhould go into Aſia, Darius began again to look about him, and by his instruments and gifts wrought many Greek States to a revolting from Alexander, whiſt he was abſent, & to move them the more, if was given out, that Alexander was ſlain in Thracia. But he with great celerity having ſubdued thoſe parts returned into Grecia, which made his enemies to feare, and the Athenians having ſoon reconciled themſelves unto him, the Thebans yet ſtood out againſt him. Wherefore he came againſt them with 9000 foot, and 3000 horſemen: but the Thebans being moſt valiant and reſolved to die in battell for their Countreys liberty fought ſtiffly a long time, and made many of the Macedonians to flee. This Alexander ſeeing, oppoſed them with his hand ſo fiercely, that he by and by turned the fortune of the battell and drave them into the City, ruſhing in together with them, and ſo obtained a wonderfull victory, 6000 of them being ſlain, and 3000 taken priſoners, who were ſold for 440 Talents of ſilver. Then the walls of Thebes were beaten down, the King being ſtirred up to make an utter deſtruction of this State by the Phocians, Plateans and others, who had holpen Alexander in this war, complaining of their treacheries and wrongs done formerly to them, and their complying with the Perſian King to betray the liberty of all Greece, wherefore he would ſhew no favour, but ſelling for ſlaves all that remained, he diſtributed their Lands amongſt his Macedonians. Yet when his hear was over, he was ſorry for that which he had done, and laid all the fault upon the Phocians, &c. and uſed ſuch Thebans as afterwards happened to come into his hands more gently. The Athenians hearing what was done, were greatly terrified, but ſent ten of their principall men to Alexander to congratulate his victory, and then he demanded nine of them to be delivered unto him, whereof Demosthenes was one, for being authors of former troubles, and of their revolt from him in that City. Phocion then an enemy to Demosthenes moved that they might be delivered, and ſayd, that it was an unworthy part in them to reſuſe to die for the ſafety of their Countrey. But Demosthenes having made an Oration, Dametes the Preſident was ſo moved hereby, and by five Talents given unto him by Demosthenes, that he undertooke to goe to Alexander, and to pacifie him touching theſe men, which he did and prevailed. Then Alexander returned into Macedonia, and conſulted with his Princes about his going to war into Aſia: but Antipater and Parmenio his two ſpeciall friends, adviſed him firſt to take a wife, by whom he might have an heir, and after that to paſſe thither. This counſell his ſtirring and valiant minde Pauſanias.

Narſes the King of Perſia murdered.

Diodorus. Darius King of Perſia.

The treacherous perſhing in his own device.

Iuſtinus.

The force of Oratory. Ariſtanus. Diodorus.

Justinus.

would by no means embrace, wherefore resolving the spring following to goe into Asia, he spent the winter, in the mean season, in many pleasures. And before he went, he caused all the kindred of his mother in law, whom Philip had highly advanced, to be slain, not sparing those that were of his own kindred, left any new stir should by their means in his absence arise; but this his cruelty went not long unrevengeed. He also sent Hecataeus into Asia to take Artalus, who being Uncle to Cleopatra, *Philip*s second wife, had been by Philip sent thither with an Army before, or to kill him, because he had heard that Demosthenes had written to him before to run from Alexander to the Gracians.

Justinus.

Justinus.

Justinus.

Artalus hearing that Alexander was displeased with him, sent him Demosthenes Letters, and wrote also flatteringly to him; yet Hecataeus intended his charge so well, that he soone cut him off unawares. In the spring, Alexander having committed Macedonia and all Gracia to Antipater sailed over into Asia, in 30 long ships, having with him 30000 foot, and 5000 horse-men. So soone as he came on the shore he stuck down his speare, saying, that the gods had subdued unto him all Asia; and vowing the erecting of 12 Altars for good successe, as if he had already the possession, he distributed all that he had in Europe to his friends, saying, that Asia alone would suffice him. The Persian Captains hearing of *Alexander*s coming, entered into counsell. Memnon the Rhodian perswading to spoyle all the Countrey before them a great way, that the Macedonians finding no provision, might be forced to return home again, and to send Forces over into Greece, that hereby they might be moved, but others to fight with them, to avoyd the imputation of cowardize, and to save the Countrey from spoiling, and this prevailed. Then they marched into Phrygia towards Helaspon, by which way Alexander came, pitching their tents so, that they might have the River Granicus on one side for a defence, and kill the Macedonians as they should come over to them. But Alexander hearing where they were, came with speed to the place, and got his men so early over the river the next morning, that the Persians could not be ready time enough to resist them in their passage. Then a bloody battell began, first between the horse-men, being on the Persians side 10000, and their foot 100000, wherein Alexander was so forward, that he soone spurd his horse amongst the Persians, and encountering hand to hand with Spithrobatas Darius his sonne in law, slew him with a small hazard to himselfe, and then forced the rest to flee, killing 10000 foot and 2000 horse-men, and taking 20000 prisoners. The terrour stricken into men by this victory, made the Sardians to yeild to Alexander as soone as he came at them, and Ephesus, and many Aeolicke, and Ionicke Cities more. Then he marched to Milium, a City to which Memnon and the rest fled, besieged it and tooke it in a short time, the Citizens falling at his feet were spared, but the Souldiers were many of them slain, many taken and made slaves, the rest fled with Memnon to Halicarnassus, the greatest City of Caria. Alexander following besieged them there, and began to batter the walls, till that the Persians making an irruption out in the night, fired their engines, and slew many of the Macedonians coming to quench them, and soon after Ephialtes a mighty man an Athenian, issued out with 2000 most valiant, killing many, and after him came Memnon with other fresh supplies, making the Macedonians to give way, and putting Alexander himselfe to his trumps. But at length the old Macedonian Souldiers taking new courage to them, set upon the Persians so valiantly, that they compelled them to flee into the City, and that night Memnon with his Army forsaking it fled into the Isle Con, leaving onely some of his men in the Tower to keepe that. The winter then comming on, Alexander after that he had taken almost all the Maritim Towns either by force or yeelding, resting in those parts, sending over some of his young men to winter in Greece, and to bring with them at their return, as great Forces more as they could get. Memnon in the mean season declaring to Darius, how his counsell of invading Greece was rejected; whereupon things succeeded so ill, obtained of him a great masse of money, wherewith he prepared 300 sailes to goe against Greece, and subdued Chios, Lesbos, and almost all Enbea, and many more parts of Greece, some by force, and some by gifts, so that *Alexander*s case now seemed to be somewhat doubtfull. But Memnon soon sickned and dyed, and then great consultation was entered into between the King and his Princes, who should succeed him as Generall, and when some would have Darius to goe in person, Charidemus an Athenian Captaine, whom Alexander had expelled thence, being fled to the Persians, withstood it, because of the danger which might be to the whole Kingdom, by the Kings hazarding of his person, offering himselfe to this service, and when contention hereabout grew betwixt the Persian Lords and him through their envie, the King in an anger caused him to be put to death, and thus having lost two such famous Gracian Captains as Memnon and he were, he soone came to ruine. Darius then being much grieved, but too late, for Charidemus, gathered an Army together of 400000 foot, and 100000 horse, and so went from Babylon towards Alexander, together with his wife, sonne, and two daughters, whilst these things were in doing. Alexander had a great sicknesse, by which his life was indangered, and being recovered, another danger hung over his head, by another Alexander, Captain of the Thessalian horse-men, who offered for a reward to Darius to kill Alexander, sending him this word by Amymnus a Gracian runnaway, whereupon he sent Aspistes to him, to promise him in his name, that if he did it, he would make him King of Macedonia, and give him 1000 Talents of gold. but Aspistes being taken in his passage by Parmenio, confessed all unto him, and that Alexander was taken and put in prison, that he could not effect his devilish designe. Darius then went on with his Army, and when Alexander heard that he with his huge Army was within 30 furlongs, he prepared to fight, making an exhortation first to his Souldiers to be courageous, and then he leading one wing, committed the other to the Thessalian horse-men, and comming on, he bent himselfe wholly to that part of the Army where Darius was, where great slaughter by most valiant Souldiers was made on both sides. Then Orabrus the brother of Darius, seeing the danger wherein the King was, hastened to rescue him, and after heaps of dead carcasses made by fierce fighting on both sides, the Kings chariot horses at length were wounded, then he being removed into another chariot fled, and his whole Army after him, they being then slain and trodden down by the horse-men, pursuing them to the number of 120000 foot, and 10000 horse-men, but of the Macedonians there fell but 300 foot, and 150 horse-men. Darius that he might flee with the more haste, left his Chariot and rode on horseback, changing often till he was out of all danger. Then Alexander took his Tents, wherein hee had 3000 talents, besides other riches in abundance, and his mother, wife and children, and many other great Princesses and Ladies. And when they lamented their condition, Alexander shewed the greatest courtesie and continency towards them, that ever any Prince did in the like case. For he neither offered to do any of them the least dishonour, neither would he suffer any other, although he were young without a wife and they most beautifull: but he embraced the Kings son, being but six yeates, and kissed him, and carried himself towards Darius his mother, as to his own mother, and towards his wife, as towards his sister, inasmuch, that Darius hearing of it, fell down upon his knees and prayed unto the Gods, that if it were their will, that the Kingdom should now go from him, no other man might have it, but Alexander. Then he wrote unto Alexander to take one of his daughters to wife, offering with her all that part of his Kingdom, which lay next unto the Sea, unto which motion yet he was not willing to hearken, being desirous to winne the whole World, unto the great spoils gotten in the tents of Darius, there were soon added more treasures laid up at Damascus, by the treachery of the Governour of that City, who to win favour with Alexander, sent unto him an offer to betray the City unto him, so he sending Parmenio easily took it, but the traitour was punished in his kind with the losse of his head, which one of his fellows cut off, and carried to Darius. Then Alexander had many other places for feare yielded unto him, and the Sidonians also submitted themselves, and they of Tyre made a shew of submission by their Embassadors, offering to do his commands, but when he returned answer, that he would come to Tyre to sacrifice to Hercules, they denied him leave so to doe, whereby hee was greatly exasperated, and thought

Diodorus.

An Heathens moderation towards women.

Treachery punished.

thought how to be revenged by taking Tyre. But it was both by nature and art so strong, that this might seem impossible. For it stood upon a little Island foure furlongs from land, and was compassed with high and strong walls, had a mighty Navy and all manner of provision and wealth enough. Yet Alexander attempts it first by pulling down old Tyre, that stood upon the Continent, and herewith landing up the Sea towards it, in which worke although he met with many difficulties, and especially when he brought it neare the City, by their shooting from their walls at his men, yet at length he effected it, and battered and made breaches in the walls, and finally, although with great losse of men, and danger of his own person, tooke it after seven moneths, and then he slew all the armed men within the City, being 6000, and hanged up 2000 of them upon the shore, and made the rest slaves, and fired the City. But in the time of this siege, so active was he, that he tooke some of his forces and made an excursion into Antilibanus in Arabia, and tooke it, returning again in ten dayes. Then he also sent to Jernsi, to Jadduah the High-Priest to help him, and to doe so towards him, as he had formerly done towards Darius, but he answering that he was sworn to Darius, and therefore could not, during his life, ayd any other against him. Alexander was full of wrath, and threatned, when he had overcome Tyre, to leade his Army against Jernsi, that all men might know to whom they ought to keepe their oath. Tyre being destroyed according to the threatning of Ezechiel, Chap. 26. Alexander subdued also with ease other parts towards Egypt, but Gaza in the way towards Jernsi, stood out and would not yeild, but he having overcome it in two moneths, marched towards Jernsi, at the hearing of which, Jadduah the High-Priest was stricken with great feare: but fleeing to God, by assembling the people together to sacrificing and prayer, he had a dream the night following, wherein he was much comforted. For the Lord appeared unto him and told him, that Alexander should not do him or the City any harm. Wherefore go forth, sayth he, to meet him clad with thy Priestly garments, and the other Priests according to their manner and the people in white, being secure of protection by my providence. This being by him related, they all rejoiced, and so the gates being opened, he went forth with a reverend train following him, untill that he came neer Alexanders army. Then Alexanders followers expecting, that he would have permitted him to their abusing, because he was incensed against him, it fell out clean contrary. For Alexander no sooner saw the High-priest in his ornaments and Mitre with the plate of gold upon his head, wherein the name of God was written, but hee alone went out to meet him, and reverently saluted him, all men about him wondering at the thing. Then Parmenio asking him the reason, hee answered, that when hee was yet in Dio in Macedon: deliberating with himselfe about this expedition into Asia, God appeared unto him in such a likeness, bidding him to be of a good courage, and to passe over into into Asia, for under his conduct he should obtaine the Persian Empire: wherefore he now honoured him in honouring his High-priest. Then going into the City, and to the Temple, hee sacrificed and bade the Jews aske, what they would have him doe for them, Jadduah asked, that they might live according to their owne rights, and be free from tribute every seventh yeer, which he immediately granted. The Samaritans then seeing, how well the Jews sped, came and intreated him to visit their Temple, saying, that they also were Jews, and therefore craved of him the like Immunities, but he suspecting, that they were not Jews, and more strictly questioning, whether they were or not, they denied it, and so he deferred answering their petition, till afterwards. Jadduah also shewed Alexander the prophesie of Daniel, which spake of him, and hereby being filled with more confidence, he departed towards Egypt, where Masaxes the Viceroy under the Persian, having heard of Alexanders former great victory, soon yielded that Country unto him, receiving him most friendly into it. Then Alexander went to visit the Temple of Jupiter Ammonius, which was an Idoll composed of Margarites and other precious stones, carried upon the shoulders of 80 Priests in a ship of Gold. This Temple stood in the midst of a most pleasant place, abounding with all manner of fruits, and cleer springs, the compasse of fifty furlongs. But to come to it, hee must Iosephus.

Arrianus.

must needs passe over most dry and sandy places, where the sands driven by the winds, made the passage most hard to be found, because there was no beaten way for which that Idoll was called Anmon. But Alexander had water given him from Heaven, as he went, and Dragons and Crovvs went before him to direct him the way.

A Spring is also said to be neer that Temple, the water whereof is warm in the morning, but waxing coole by degrees, it is very cold by noone, but at night it waxeth warm again; and so by degrees commeth to such heat, that by midnight it is very hot. Alexander being come to the Oracle, is first saluted thus by the chief Priest, Salve fili, & hanc à deo appetet: habe. Alexander answered, accipio pater, & tuus appellabor, modo imperium totius orbis mihi concesseris. Then a voice came unto him saying, that this god would most certainly effect that. Alexander then inquiring, whether the murderers of his father were all cut off, it was answered, that none could hurt his father but the murderers of Philip were all destroyed, and that none should ever be able to overcome Alexander, till he came amongst the gods. Lastly, to his followers, it is sayd, that a voice came, saying, that from henceforth they should worship him, not as a man but as a god. And all this was done, sayth Iustin, according to instructions given before by some sent by Alexander, he ambitiously seeking to turn that infamy which was upon his mother, whom Philip had put away for suspicion of adultery, into a glory, her being with child with him, being by this means taken to be by Jupiter, and he, if shee were adulterous, who was a bastard, for a god. For Philip, sayth hee, a little before his death, disclaymed him, as none of his son, and whilst by this means he sought to wipe away the infamy of bastardy, hee gave occasion to all men to hold him such and his mother an Whore. Orosius also sayth that when he came to that Temple, hee calling the chief Priest aside whispered unto him, what he would have him say, which was done accordingly, and thenceforth Alexander would be called the son of Jupiter. Then he returned to Memphis, and went to the marriage of Mareotis, where hee built a City of 80 furlongs compass, upon all the ground betwixt that marriage and the Mediterranean Sea, and called it according to his own name Alexandria. Then he called many of the Jews thither to inhabit it, giving as much honour to them as to the Macedonians.

After this Alexander having set a Governour over Egypt, returned to Tyre, and from thence to Thapsacus a City of Syria by Euphrates, to which River when he came, Mazens, who was set there with 3000 horse men to defend the passage, fled away. Wherefore hee without any trouble having conveyed over his army marched on towards Babylon, having Euphrates on the one hand, and the Armenian Mountains on the other, and within a few days hearing, that Darius was at the River Tygris, with an huge army hee marched thither. But coming hee found no resistance there, so that hee passed over that River also with his army without resistance, thence marching along having that River on the one hand, and the Sogdian Mountains on the other, through Assyria hee took some of Darius his horsemen, by whom he learned, that he was not far off, namely, at Arliela with an army of 40000 horse and 100000 foot, and 200 Chariots barbed with iron, and 15 Elephants, whereas with Alexander were only 7000 horse, and 40000 foot. Then Darius sent Embassadors to him to thank him for his courteous usage of his wife and children, offering again all that part of Asia, which lyeth over the other side of Euphrates, unto him and his daughter to wife, and 10000 talents of Gold, and succession to all his dominions. This offer Parmenio hearing said, that if he were Alexander hee would accept of it, the King answered, so would I, if I were Parmenio, then turning to the Embassadors he bade them tell their Master, that the World could not beare two Suns, nor the earth two chief Princes, wherefore either wee must fight again for the Chieftie, or Darius must acknowledge Alexander to be his superiour, let him then either yield to day, or prepare to fight too morrow. Darius seeing then, that there was no remedy, kept many of his horsemen in arms all night, lest Alexander should come upon him unawares. And indeed Parmenio would have had him so to do, but hee said, that he would not overcome after the manner of thieves; neither get the victory, as if hee

A strange water.

Iustine.

P. Orosius.

Ioseph. lib. 2. contra Appionem.

he were ashamed of it. And this turned not a little to his advantage, for by this meanes Darius his men were weary with watching, before they came to the fight, but Alexanders taking their rest all night, fresh and active. The next morning the fight begun, and the chariots greatly troubled Alexanders Army, making a part of it to begin to flee, as not able to endure the violence thereof, so that they perced even to their carriages, which whilst the Macedonians endeavoured to save. Alexander fearing the losse of the victory by this meanes called them off to the fight. Then the battell being fought with all earnestnesse on both sides a long time, the chariot driver of Darius was slain, whereat the King being troubled fled, and so did all that part of his Army. But Parmenio fighting in another part, was oppressed by his enemies, in so much that the Macedonians in his part were ready to flee, wherefore he called to Alexander for help, and whilst he came to their rescue, Darius got so far that he was past pursuing, and fled into Media. In this battell were slain of the Persians side 40000, of the Macedonians 300. From thence Alexander went to Babylon, into which he entered without resistance, being saluted by the name of the King of Asia, and had all Darius his treasures brought forth unto him, and after 30 dayes he went to Susis, which was yeilded likewise: And leaving there the mother of Darius and his children with such as might teach them the Greek tongue, for his wife was dead before, he pursued after Darius into Media, travailing divers times day and night, but at length despairing to overtake him, he rested five dayes, and then word being brought him that Darius was taken, and carryed bound in a chariot by Bessus, who had been under him Lord of the Bactrians, but now tooke upon him to be King of those parts, he hastened thither, and when they that were about Darius heard of his approach, they first mortally wounding the King fled, and of those wounds he dyed, before that Alexander came at him, when he had reigned six years, when he came to the place where he was he wept over him, and covering his body with his own coat, which was before clad in vile clothes, that he might not be known, caused him to be carryed to Susis to his mother to be royally buried, and always after used Darius his mother as his own, and his children likewise, and a brother of his, and such as being in great place, that had been faithfull to him, he continued in their honours, but pursued his murthers to be revenged on them.

Darius being dead, now began the Grecian Empire, so called, because Alexander a Grecian being Emperour before of Greece, now possessed the Empire of all Asia also, which before was the Persians, Anno mundi 3634, and in the sixth yeare of his reigne. Being come to this height of glory, his former most admirable continencie, brake out into most sordid luxury, for now he tooke him 360 concubines, as Darius had formerly, whereat his Macedonians were much vexed, and when he sought to pacifie them with gifts, but could not, he was forced to take up armes, and to leave that idle course of life again. And now also an occasion was offered by Bassias, Prince of the Bactrians, who had murdered Darius, and tooke upon him to be Emperour of Persia, and Satibarzanes Prince of the Areans, to whom Alexander continued his place after the death of Darius, supposing that he would be faithfull to him, but having treacherously slain Anaxippus, Alexanders freind, together with 40 horse men, who were associated unto him, revolted to Bessus. Wherefore he went with an Army into those parts, and first came into the countrey of the Areans with such expedition, that Satibarzanes having not gathered an Army of above 1000 together, was soon made to flee, and could not for that time be overtaken by Alexander, but after a while, having gathered more forces together, he fought against Alexanders Captaines, neither would the Barbarians give in, till that he was slain by Erigius fighting with him hand to hand. Then Alexander went against Bessus, who with 7000 men fled before him, and having passed over the river Oxus, and burnt the ships, and visited the Countrey of provision before his passage, thought that he was now safe, and in his cups mocked at the Macedonians. Alexander followed after him by the mountain Camasius, where all things were covered with frost and snow, and so travelled on with his Army in great want, inso much that they were constrained

The Grecian Empire, Anno 3634.

trained to kill of the beasts that were for carriage, and to feed upon them. And when he came to the river, having no other means to get over, they stuffed leathers full of straw, and so swam over upon them. When Bessus heard that they were come over, he fled, but Spiramenes his friend with two others, despairing now of his affairs, sent to Alexander to offer to deliver Bessus unto him. Then he sent Protonoe the sonne of Lagus, who with great speed came and compassed the City, in which he was, with his horsemen, offering that if they would deliver Bessus unto him, they should have no harme. Then Spiramenes went in to Bessus, and told him feignedly, that those two who were his fellow conspiratours, did together plot his destruction, and if he pleased he would apprehend and bring them both bound unto him. But indeed they were so bound, that they might loosen themselves when they would, and therefore when they were thus brought before Bessus, he looking with a cruell countenance upon them, commanded them to be put to a cruel death. But they loosing themselves, together with their bringers, layd hold upon Bessus, and bound him, and so delivered him to Protonoe. Then his treachery to his Master Darius being objected to him, he was scourged, and carryed to Bactria, his eares being theret cut off, and his nostrils slit, then he was delivered to Darius his brother to be tormented at his will, who after much contumelious usage, cut him into small peeces.

A plot of a conspiracie.

Diodorus.

But whilst this was in doing, the Macedonians rambling about to seeke food, the Barbarians to the number of 20000 came upon them, and slew many, and tooke more prisoners, but they were soone overcome by the Macedonians, and the prisoners restored, and their City yeilded, although Alexander were now grievously wounded with an arrow in his thigh, which brought heaviness to his whole Camp. And now the Sogdians revolted from him, against whom he sent out Forces, but they by a stratagem were brought to destruction, to 2000 foot and 300 horse. Yet Alexander set his minde upon greater exploits, viz. to subdue the Scythians, and therefore sent before to build a City of 60 furlongs compass, neare the river Tanais, that from thence he might with his Army goe against them, calling it after his own name, Alexandria, and it was built with incredible celerity, viz. in 20 dayes, that is, a wall of that compass, about the place where the City stood. The King of the Scythians hearing of it, sent to beat it down again, but Alexander being then almost recovered of his wound, put on his armes, and so put such courage into his Souldiers, that presently passing over the river, and he with them, they put the Scythians to flight, and pursued them far, till they had slain 1000, and taken 150 prisoners. But now also Alexander was again in danger of his life, by corrupt water which he dranke, when he and his men had laboured with want of water, the weather being very hot, all that day. When the report of his victory over the Scythians, who were thought invincible, was spread abroad, other barbarous Countreys also in the North submitted to him, and the Asians ready before to revolt, returned to his obedience: Then he sought to be revenged on the Sogdians, and returning against them, overcame and tooke many of them, amongst the rest, 30 of great stature being brought to Alexander to be slain, seemed greatly to rejoyce, and being demanded why, they answered, because they should be slain by so great a King, who had subdued all Nations, and so be gathered to their faith. Alexander hearing this was so moved that he spared them, and for this they were alwayes after most faithfull unto him.

Arrianus.

Heathens not fearing death.

Whilst the King was thus taking in countreys, two of his most faithfull friends who also had been much advanced by him, were cruelly cut off, Parmenio and Clytus, the one whom he had preferred to be Prince of Media, he being incensed against him for the treachery of Philotas his son, who together with others had conspired the death of Alexander, wherefore he being cut off, he sent one with such speed with Letters from Philotas to Parmenio his father, that he delivered them, before that he heard of his sonnes death, and withall thrust him through whilst he was reading them, as Alexander had given him in charge. The other whom he had set over another province he slew, when he was drunken at a feast which Alexander held with his Princes. For then Alexander extenuating

The dangers of Kings Favourites.

The rage of drunkennesse.

the worth of Philips gifts, extolled his own, but Clytus contrariwise extolled Philips, as wherein he and Parmenis had a part, and extenuated Alexanders, saying, that Philips fought against men, but he against women, for such weaklings he counted the men of Asia. At this Alexander being enraged, tooke up a Javelin to thrust him through, but two of his Princes held him, and then two others tooke the Speare out of his hand. Hereupon the King cryed, that he was taken by his own men, as Darius had been, and called for his Souldiers to help him, then they fell down upon their knees, beseeching him to repress his rage, and to defer execution till to morrow. But he impatiently ran to the doore it being now darke, and taking a Javelin from a porter standing there, asked each one who he was, as he came forth, and when Clytus offered to goe out last of all others, asking him, and he saying, that he was Clytus, he presently thrust him through. But when he came to himselfe again, and saw what he had done, he tooke the same speare out of his dead body, and would have slain himselfe also therewith. But being held by his freinds, he cryed out most lamentably, desiring them not to suffer him to live, now that Clytus his freind was by his hands dead. Then finding no other way to come to his death, he refused to eat any thing for three dayes, till at the last being perswaded that Clytus had suffered justly, because he was so bold to oppose and contradict his King, to whom he owed all subjection, he did eat and drinke again, but came no more abroad for shame in ten dayes.

Alexanders pride.

After this Alexander prepared to goe against the Indians, to subdue their countrey also, taking for pledges many young men with him of those countreys which he had conquered, that he might thus secure them in his absence. His whole Army consisted of 120000, which that they might bequall to the Indians in pomp, had targets plated with silver, and bridle bits of gold. But whilst this army was in preparing, Alexander in great pride aspired after divine honour, as the sonne of Jupiter, and some sycophants there were, which sought to move the people to give it to him, praising this new Deity as greater then Hercules or Liberus. Onely Calisthenes a wise and grave man, sent by Aristotle to write his gifts, shewed his dislike thereof. But this bred an enmity in the King towards him, inasmuch that when Hermolaus and others conspired to kill Alexander, which was in due time discovered, and some of them suffered death therefore, Calisthenes, although innocent altogether of that crime, was amongst them apprehended and put to death also. The cause of this conspiracie was, because Hermolaus one of the Princes sonnes that attended upon Alexander, killed a wilde Boare in Alexanders presence, which he had thought to have smitten, and the King being offended at it, caused him therefore to be beaten. For Hermolaus tooke this so heinously, that having drawn Sofratius to him and some others, they layd wayt together to kill the King. But so it fell out, that upon the night wherein they had thought to have done it, Alexander continued drinking so long, that Epimenes who was one of them, suspected that they should have no opportunity that night, and by delaying there would be danger of discovering it, went and told his brother Encilocus of it, and he immediately laying hands upon his brother, carried him to the King, to whom when it was discovered, he well rewarded Encilocus, pardoned Epimenes, and tooke and committed the rest the same night, delivering them the next day after some expostulation, to their own band, who to please Alexander cut them in peices.

The revenge of disgrace.

Conspirators against Alexander punished.

Then Alexander leaving those parts to the government of Amynas, departed towards India, where when he arived, many petty Kings came and submitted themselves to him, as the sonne of Jupiter. But against the rest he sent out Ephestion and Perdiccas, he in the meane time going against the City Nisa, which was soon yielded. The people hereof boast, that they came of Liberus, whom Jupiter brought forth out of his thigh, but the truth is, Nisa signifieth a thigh in the Indian tongue, and because he was borne there, this fable was raised. From thence Alexander went against Masaga, in besieging which he was sore wounded, and thereupon sayd, I am called the sonne of Jupiter indeed, but doe feeble the pain of a sick body, yet when they within despaired of holding the City against the King, their Queene Cleope came forth unto him, and a number of Ladies Curtius.

Arrianus.

Alexander wounded.

following her with cups of gold in their hands, and so obtained favour to hold her royall dignity there still. Passing on from thence, he heard that divers peoples forsaking their Cities, fled to a rock called Aornon, which they thought to be invincible, because Hercules once attempted to take it, but could not. This stirred up Alexander the more to attempt it, and after the losse of many of his men, by the incredible courage of the Macedonians, he tooke it, and built Altars there to Minerva and Victoria, and sacrificed. Then he went to the River Indus, where he found Ephesion and Perdiccas, with all things ready to passe the river, boats being made which might be dragged from one river to another, because they must passe over many.

Taxiles the King of those parts fearing the power of Alexander, sent to submit to his will, and meeting him with a great company, gave him for a present 56 Elephants, 3000 Bulls, and Chains of gold for him and all his friends, besides 80 talents of silver. And Alexander gave to him 30 horses trapped, and 1000 talents. From thence he went to the River Hydaspis, beyond which were two Kings, Abisares and Porus, the one of which presently submitted by his Embassadors, but Porus being sent unto to do the like, and for that end to meet Alexander at the entrance of his borders, he answered that he would meet him, which hee did indeed with 85 Elephants, 300 Chariots, and 30000 foot, but to fight, not to yield, as he expected. And he met at the River Hydaspis which was so broad that it was like a Sea, four furlongs over, to hinder his passage, yet Alexander by his policy, when he had by sending forces another way, as if he would get over there, drawn away Porus, passed over, & having fought long doubtfully, at length obtained the victory, & took Porus having nine wounds given him in the battle, & used him for his great valour with all curtesie, taking care of his healing, as if he had fought on his side, and raking him to the admiration of all about him, into the number of his friends, gives him also a large Kingdom, wherefore he was always faithfull to him afterwards. Alexander then marched into the furthest parts of India, all Countries yielding unto him, except the Cathians a most warlike & stout people. But after a sharp fight, wherein 17000 of them, & 100 Macedonians were slain, and 1500 Macedonians wounded, he wan the City and rased it to the ground, now thinking upon a return into his own Country. Yet his ambitious minde desirous to leave no parts unsubdued would not suffer him, untill that being constrained by his Souldiers resolute deniall to go any further with him, and urging him to give fighting over, with which they had been already over-wearied, hee unwillingly after awhile condescended to return. For having made Oration after Oration unto them to go on with him, but in vain, he at length sacrificed, and by the Wizards beholding the entrails of the beasts forewarned of ill successe, if he proceeded, he caused it to be proclaimed through the Campe, that they should prepare to return to the great rejoycing of all their hearts, as their acclamations then made did declare. But first he would have twelve altars built like towers for a monument of his conquering so far, upon which he sacrificed to his Gods for his preservation and victories hitherto obtained. There also he caused beds to be made five cubits long, and a trench three times as great as needed for the compassing in of his to deceive posterity. These things being done, he returned to the River Hydaspis, preferring Porus over all the Countreys of the Indians, which hee had conquered, being seven, and the Cities being 2000. And here he prepared a Navy to passe down the River to the Ocean, in which passage he took more Cities of the Indians; some by force, and some by yielding. Then hearing of a people called Malls and Oxidates he hastened to them, before they should unite their forces together, because they were the most warlike of all the Indians, and comming neere them within five dayes, hee hardly escaped drowning. But comming on land, he went with the third part of his Army against the Malls, appointing another third part under Ephesion, to go by water, and another third to follow that three dayes after. Then he comming suddenly upon the Malls, slue many and put the rest to flight, who in great multitudes came to a certain strong City, which he therefore besieged, and in a short time brake in. Then the people betaking them to the towver, Alexander set up scaling ladders, and came first up to the top of the Walls thereof, making those Curtius.

Valour in an enemie honour-red.

Curtius.

Alexander's piety.
His Monument.
Curtius.

Death joyfully undergon.

that kept them to flee, after that he had slain some of them, then he leaping from the Wall to the towver, fought alone some time against them and slue their Captain, which caused, that none of the rest durst come neer him any more, but only darted and shot at him a far off, and such of his men, as by this time were come to him, of whom some being slaine, Alexander himselfe at length was mortally wounded in his brest with a forked arrow, insomuch, that his spirits failing and his eyes darkned, hee fell upon his shield. But his Macedonians seeing it slue all that they could come neer, and then bare him out of the battle, upon the shield. The Physician beholding the wound with the arrow sticking in it feared greatly, till that being animated by Alexander, hee opened the wound wider, and took out the forked arrow, hee sitting still and patiently bearing it all that time. But then so much blood came forth; that his spirits again failed him, till that the blood was stenchd, and within seven days he recovered so, that he shewed himself again to his army, who exceedingly rejoiced at it. Then those peoples submitted unto him and sent him gifts, receiving Philip, whom he appointed to rule over them, and giving 1000 pledges. After this many other peoples were by Alexander subdued, but not without great losse of his men and beasts, by reason of the dry and barren places through which they passed. Finally, his navy being prepared, hee returned into Persia, where Calanus one of the Wisemen of the Indians, who had hitherto accompanied Alexander, fell sick, but would not after the manner of other men lye by it, but desiring of Alexander that a fire might be made, and he might be brought unto it, that therein he might end his life, because he would not continue here to go from the felicity, wherein he had formerly lived, Alexander at the first dissuaded him, but seeing his resolution, hee gave way to him, and so a fire being prepared, he was brought unto it, and being deckt after his Countrey manner, hee joyfully leapt into the flames, the trumpets sounding and the souldiers shouting, as he desired.

Then Alexander came to Susis, and there married many of his Macedonians, to 80 of the daughters of the most noble families of the Medes and Persians, giving to every one gifts, and to 1000 others also of his Countreymen, that married in those parts, he gave gifts. He for his own part marrying, besides Roxanes, whom he had before, only Parasitis the eldest daughter of King Darius, and the youngest daughter of Ochus. And he added this to his Kingly magnificence, that he paid all the debts of his souldiers, amounting to 20000 talents, yet his Macedonians were not satisfied, because he did so much for those of Asia. After this, having dismissed many of them, who for age or other infirmities were unfit to follow the wars any longer, paying for their charge of return, and providing, that they might be honourably used in Greece, hee also gave liberty to all the banished to return whereunto all other States of Gracia obeyed, but the Athenians would not, whereby the King was much moved against them, and thought to be revenged. But he was herein soon prevented by death, touching which hee had been forewarned by his Wizards, if he went to Babylon. Their warnings he at the first regarded, thinking therefore not to come there, but when many Embassadors from foreign parts were come thither, he went to welcome them, and by excessive drinking amongst them day after day, both day and night hee fell into a fever, and so into a phrensie and dyed. But some say that he was poisoned, and that by Antipater, sayth Naucles: fearing otherwise such cruelty, as other worthy men had suffered at his hands, which Plutarch confuteth, because no signes of poisoning appeared after that he was dead. And this his death hapned soon after the death of his dearest friend Hephestion, for whom he sorrowed excessively, and raged against the Physicians under whose hand hee dyed, insomuch that hee slue them and against the place, casting it to the ground, and was most profuse in his cost about his funerall. He dyed, when he had been King of Macedonia 12 yeers, and Monarch six yeers, neyther did any thing more worth the remembrance happen to the Jews in his time, but only, that when hee was in Babylon, and would have all men to help build the Temple of Belus being fallen down, they refused and were therefore punished, but afterwards pardoned and sent into their own Province, where they beat down Idols houses and Images, for which they were also compelled to pay great sums of money.

Next

Anno etatis sue 32.

Ioseph. lib. 1.
contra Appion.

Next after Joannes, of whom about the beginning of this History, Jadduah was High Priest 27 years, beginning Anno 5 of Duke Hircanus, so that he attained to Alexanders reigne, and continued till his fifth yeare, or rather his sixth, then he dying, Onias succeeded in the High Priesthood, Anno 7 of Alexander, and continued 27 years. But Duke Hircanus being dead a little before, Joseph became Duke of Judah seven years. The death of Alexander, according to Funckius, fell out Anno mundi 3640. So loone as he was dead, sayth Iosephus his Kingdom was divided into divers, as into the Kingdom of Asia under Antigonus of Babylon under Seleucus, of Helleſpont under Lyſimachus, of Macedon under Cassander, Egypt under Ptolomee the son of Lagus. And by this means great contentions arose and many men were slain, especially in Syria by Ptolomee, falsely called Soter. He also came cunningly into Jerusalem upon a Sabbath day, when the Jews rested, suspecting nothing, as if he came onely to their sacrifices, and then sealed upon the City, and hardly handled the Jews, and carryed many of them away into Egypt, commanding them to abide there. And when he understood how constantly they stood to their Oath made to Alexander, he set divers of them over his Towers, dividing the trust equally betwixt them and the Macedonians. Then many other Jews also came into Egypt, and being taken with the fruitfulness of the Countrey, settled themselves there. But at home great contentions, and often fightings arose betwixt the Jews at Jerusalem, and those of Samarita, the one affirming that all Sacrifices ought to be brought to the Temple at Jerusalem, but the other to the Temple at Mount Gerizim, hitherto Iosephus. But others writing the same History more fully, say that Alexander was desired by his Princes to name his successour in the Kingdom, to whom he answered, let the most worthy man take it, but before he dyed, he gave his ring to Perdiccas, whereby all were moved to looke at him, and offered the Kingdom to him. But whilst he, immodestly for a time refused it, one Meleager drew the people to Philip the brother of Alexander, as to whom, by the Law of Nations, the Kingdom belonged, and he was immediately saluted as King. But the Princes determined, that for so much as Roxane the Queene was with childe, it, if a sonne, should be King, and Perdiccas and Leonatus, who were of the blood Royall should be Governours. Philip hearing this was terrified, and so was Meleager, but the people proceeded to set Philip in the Throne, and to put Alexanders garment upon him, Meleager then meditating nothing, but how to destroy Perdiccas and the Princes adhering to him, to which whilst he was intent, Perdiccas gathered Forces, slue 200 of his followers, and he fleeing to a sanctuary was slain there. Then the Kingdom, sayth Ierem, was divided into foure, according to the Propheſie of Daniel, who set forth Alexander under the similitude of a gate having one great horne, but that being broken off, foure hornes towards the foure parts of the world came up in stead thereof: For Ptolomee obtained the Kingdom of Egypt, which was Southward, Philip the Kingdom of Macedonia, which was Westward, Seleucus Nicator the Kingdom of Syria and Babylon, which was Eastward, Antigonus the Kingdom of Asia and Pontus, which was towards the North. So none of his posterity had his Kingdom, as Daniel sayth, for the childe that was borne of Roxane called Alexander, was together with his mother poyloned by Cassander, another son which he had by Barsine, called Hercules was slain at 17 years of age, by Poliſperchonte, being hereunto allured by the sayd Cassander, when he was seeking to make him King, And his brother Philip, otherwiſe called Aridaus, although he had the Kingdom of Macedonia, yet he was rather a shadow of a King then a King, as Plutarch speaketh, because although he were King, yet Antipater ruled, and he was by Olympias the mother of Alexandria, together with Eurydice his wife cruelly slain, and then ſhee having a while reigned was slain by Cassander the sonne of Antipater, who also poyloned young Alexander and his mother Roxane, and so he reigned over Macedonia 19 years. Of all these foure Kings before spoken of, Ptolomee and Philip were the first that became Kings, and although Philip were soon cut off, yet Ptolomee continued King 40 years. Antigonus came not to his Kingdom of Asia till six years after, and he reigned 18 years. He made war upon Ptolomee and Cassander, and af-

Jadduah High Priest.

Onias High Priest.
Ioseph Duke.
Funckius.
Iosephus, antiq. lib. 12. c. 1.

Two Temples occasion much strife.

Dan. 8. 9.

Plutarch.

Funckius.

af-

Naucrerns.

Vpon Cassandar revenge.An evill conscience.

Pausanias.

Murder punished remarkably.

afterwards Ptolomee made war upon him. Antigonus dying left his Kingdom to Demetrius his son, who reigned 17 yeares, and then yielded up his Kingdom to Seleucus King of Syria, and so the Kingdom of Asia was extinct, comming under the King of Syria. But he first obtained the Kingdome of Macedonia, Anno 7 of his reigne after Alexander, and Antipater who had reigned foure years next to Cassandar. This History is related by Naucrerns thus. Demetrius having by treachery circumvented Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, and slain him, called together an Assembly of the Macedonians, and declared unto them that this Alexander was worthily cut off, as being the off-spring of Cassander, who had cruelly murdered the children and such as were neere to Alexander the Great. But his father had always been a deare freind and fellow Souldier unto him, and therefore his royall off-spring being now extinct, he might most justly of all others lay claime to the Kingdom of Macedonia, and so he was received for King. But when Ptolomee and Seleucus, and Lysimachus, joyning all their Forces together, came against him, and he knew not how to escape, he yielded himselfe to Seleucus, who spoyled him of the Kingdom of Asia, so that it ceased to be a Kingdom any more, there remaining now no more of the foure before mentioned, but two, that is, the Kingdom of Egypt, and the Kingdom of Syria, being called from him Regnum Seleucidarum ever after. But it is reckoned to have begun 12 years after Alexanders death, it being so long before that Seleucus, called also Nicanor, came to be King. Neither indeed did Ptolomee of Egypt take upon him the title and ornaments of a King, as long as any of Alexanders children lived, but when they were murdered, as hath been already shewed. And it is to be noted that Antigonus of Asia, and his sonne Demetrius, first of all others tooke upon them to be called Kings, and their Kingdom had first an end put unto it. The occasion which Antigonus tooke to proclaim himselfe King, and his sonne Demetrius also, was the good successe of Demetrius first in Greece, whereat Athens and divers other places, he restored the people, who were kept under by Cassander, to Ptolomee, to their ancient liberties, and therefore was over honoured by the Athenians: Then in Cyprus against Ptolomee, whom he overcame, killing many of his men, and taking many prisoners, so that Ptolomee fled away with a few ships onely into Egypt. For when Antigonus heard the news hereof, he would thenceforth that both he and his son should be called Kings. and when Ptolomee heard this, he being nothing dejected in minde for his former overthrow, would be called King also, and the like did Seleucus, Cassander, and Lysimachus of Hellespont. And this was about the 18 yeare after the death of Alexander the Great, to which time almost, Alexander the sonne of Roxane living, and Cassander thinking it high time to make him away, that he might continue absolute in that Kingdom, found means to effect it, and shortly after wrought so with Polypercones, who had Hercules his other sonne with him, that he was murdered also, as hath been before shewed. But the wretched murtherer Cassander, had both an hell in his conscience after this (for comming where Alexanders image was, he was taken with so great feare, that he was ready to fall down dead) and his children enjoyed his Kingdom but foure years after him, being then treacherously slain by Demetrius, as he had slain the children of his Master Alexander; But of the revenge taken upon him and his family, Pausanias sayth, that when he had reigned in much trouble 17 yeares, soon after that he had committed the foresaid horrible murthers, he fell into the dropsie, worms being bred hereby, and breaking out of his skin, and so being consumed with misery he dyed. After his death his eldest sonne Philip dyed also forthwith of a consumption, his second sonne Antipater observing that his mother Theffalonica favoured his brother more then him, slew her with his own hands, but was soon himselfe slain therefore by his father in Law Lysimachus. Then his third and youngest son Alexander, calling Demetrius to help him to be revenged for his mothers death, whilst he devised how to cut him off, was by him prevented, and suddainly slain. The death of his mother was not indeed revenged upon Antipater before Demetrius came, yet when he came Alexander was much grieved, as suspecting him that had beene his fathers enemy, wherefore feigning love, he entertained him, but preparing a fealt for him, he meditated the cutting of him off by treahery, when he should come unto it. This being discovered to Demetrius, he handled the matter so, that he avoyded the danger at that time, and inviting Alexander, caused him to be slain. As for Demetrius who thus attained to the Kingdom of Macedonia, he had formerly made war upon Cassander, and brought him into great danger, when he restored liberty to many Cities of Gracia, but Cassander seeing the danger wherein he was, for Demetrius had so great an Army, that he could not resist, sent to Seleucus King of Syria, to Ptolomee King of Egypt, and to Lyfimachus King of Helespont to consider their own case by his, and therefore to joyne together against the King of Asia, lest he coming upon them one by one, should bring them all under, and so make himselfe Monarch over all. They hearing this prepared to goe against Antigonus the father of Demetrius, being now a most aged King, viz. 80 years old. Wherefore he sent to call his son out of Greece, willing him to make peace with Cassander as well as he could. He being returned, a great battell was fought, and Antigonus was slain, and Demetrius fled into Greece, thinking to have ayd from the Athenians, by whom he had formerly been unreasonably honoured, but now they shut him out of their City. Then Seleucus ceased upon Asia and Babylon, and Ptolomee upon some part of that Kingdom, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, being for his and his fathers pride and cruelty shut out. For upon former victories they waxed so proud, that they would have none called Kings but themselves, others onely Presidents and Governours. And Antigonus did a most cruell and treacherous act against Cleopatra the sister of Alexander the Great, for which it was to be expected, that he should by the just judgement of God be cut off. For when the sonnes of Alexander were dead, both he and Seleucus and Ptolomee, desired each one to strengthen himselfe by a marriage with her; and when Antigonus in whose Kingdom shee was, perceived that shee tooke better liking to Seleucus then to him, he imployed some to slay her as shee was passing towards Syria, but this being done, he dissembled griefe therefore, and tooke the instruments and put them to most cruell deaths, and then most sumptuously buried her. Thus he cunningly hid this wickednesse of his before men, but God found him out at length to be revenged upon him, and to expose his Kingdom to the dilacerating of others, whom he little feared in times past, when by warring upon them he brought some of them so low. Thus both the Kings Cassander and Antigonus that had imbrewed their hands in blood seeking hereby to advance and stablish their own greatnesse, overthrew both themselves and theirs, and likewise whatsoever Kingdom is founded in blood shall not long continue. Contrariwise Ptolomee is noted to have been kinde and loving, whereby he won all mens hearts where he reigned and so was Seleucus, and therefore they flourished and left their Kingdoms much increased to their posterities for many Generations.

To return to Demetrius, vhen Alexander was slain, hee was soon accepted by the Macedonians for King, but Lyfimachus, whose daughter Antipater had married held part of the Kingdom in the right of his son in law, yet Demetrius increasing in power, and he having also other enemies ready to fight against him, restored the part, which he held to Demetrius, to enjoy his friendship. Then his son Antipater complayning, that he had taken his Kingdome from him, slue him. But Demetrius enjoyed not the Kingdome of Macedonia above fixe or seven yeeres. For being putt up with his good successe in attaining it, hee now meditated the recovering of his Kingdom of Asia again, and to this end prepared an army of 100000 foot and 12000 horse. Seleucus hearing of this joyned with Ptolomee and Lyfimachus, & these three kings altogether, wrote to Pyrhus King of Epyrus, a mighty man, to invade Macedonia promising him aid, moving him the rather hereunto, because his wife upon a dislike was gone from him, and married to Demetrius. Pyrhus therefore invaded Macedonia, and Demetrius falling sick, won it with it ease, the people being in love with him for his great valour revolting unto him. Demetrius then disguised himself and fled, but afterwards gathering more forces he went against Seleucus, and when hee was not able to stand against him he yielded himself unto him, but not being admitted to his presence, he was

The mutability of people.

Cruelty revenged.

Pride pulled down.

A Kingdom founded in blood.
Kindnesse in Kings a sure foundation.

By the desire of more a Kingdom lost.

was yet royally maintained with a strong guard placed about him, as long as hee lived, which was three years after. Pyrhus having gotten the Kingdom of Macedonia, held it not a whole year before he left it again to Lyfimachus, because hee durst not trust the Macedonians, whom Lyfimachus had sought to win from him by telling them, that it was a shame for them to be subject to the Egyptians, who were strangers, and always formerly under the Macedonians. Thus then that kingdom came to a fifth alteration, since Alexander's death, 1 to Philip Arideus, 2 to Cassander, 3 to Demetrius, 4 to Pyrhus, 5 to Lyfimachus King of Thracia.

In this time Joseph Prince of the Jews being dead, Abner Semei succeeded him, and ruled 11 years, and after him Mattathiah 12 years. And after Onias was Simon High-priest 13 years, and after Simon, Eleazar his brother 20 years, so Funccius, because although Simon left a son called Onias, yet he was but a child, when his father dyed. In the beginning of Eleazar's High-priesthood, Seleucus the king of Syria removed many of the Jews to certain Cities, which he had built, as to Antioch, Laodicea, Selencia, &c. to the number of 120000 of them, making them equall with the Macedonians, in so great favour were they with him for the good and faithfull service which they had done him in his wars. To return again to the kings, Pyrhus having left Macedonia to Lyfimachus, lived after this in quiet in his own kingdom, till that he had war with the Romans, but Lyfimachus made war with Thracia and Heraclea, Ptolomee Lagi having first made Ptolomee Philadelphus his son king, dyed, after that he had held Egypt 40 years. Then reigned his son 40 years also, being called Philadelphus per anisphasin, because he had slain both his elder brethren. He being king grew to greater power, then ever his father did, for he had 200000 foot, and 20000 horse, 2000 chariots, and 400 Elephants, 1500 long ships, and 1000 others to carry provision for his army. He also received out of Egypt yearly, 14800 talents of silver, and of corne, 5000000 Artabs, being a measure that containeth three bushels, and a third part, thus Jerom, who therefore applyeth that of Daniel, touching a Prince of large dominion to him. By his desire was the Bible translated out of Hebrew into Greeke, which translation is called the Septuagint, because 70 of the Elders of the Jews, sent by Eleazar the High-Priest to Ptolomee, did severally translate it, neither was there any difference amongst them all in anything, see Josephus, more at large upon this Lib. Antiq. 12. Cap. 2. About the same time that Ptolomee Lagi dyed, hot wars grew between Seleucus and Lyfimachus, Lyfimachus being 73, and Seleucus 77 years old, and these two were the longest lived of all Alexander's Captains, and now the desire of glory in their old age, brought them into the field against one another, the one being King of Asia and Syria, and the other of Macedonia and Gracia, yet neither of them content with his own most large Dominions, but ambitious of all. In this battell Seleucus prevailing, Lyfimachus was slain, as he was well worthy, for his unnaturall murdering of his own sonne Agathocles, who had with good successe fought many battels for him, but at length caused by him to be poysoned, and so were many of his sonnes more, being 15, inso much that he had scarce a sonne left him when he dyed, and the like tyranny he exercised towards many of his Nobles, which made many of his subjects to revolt from him to Seleucus, to his great disadvantage in this his last battell. Seleucus had but short joy after this victory, for within seven moneths he also was slain by Ptolomee Ceraunus brother to Lyfimachus his wife, who thus came to enjoy the Kingdom of Macedonia, and Antiochus Soter the Kingdom of Syria, by the death of his father. Ptolomee having attained to the Kingdom of Macedonia, was much troubled about the establishing of himselfe therein, for he feared in respect of Antiochus, whose father he had slain, of Lyfimachus his children, whose it had lately been, and of Pyrhus, and the sonnes of Demetrius whose it had been before. But Pyrhus being now to make warre against the Romans, he made his peace with him, by ayding him with men and horses for that expedition. For the family of Lyfimachus, he sought a marriage with his widdow Arfino, being his own sister, promising to be a tutor and father to her children. But contrariwise having prevailed in his suit, he slew her children, and

The Princes of the Jews.
Anno 3662.
Simon High Priest Funccius
chron.
Josephus, antiq.
lib. 12. c. 3.

Plutarch.

Dan. 11. 5.
The Septuagint translation.

Tyrants soone cut off.

Iustin.

and drew her out of her City Cassandria; banishing her into Samothracia. But this treachery went not long unrevenged, for before that he had continued a year in his Kingdom, the French comming against him, overcame and slew him, and cutting off his head, carryed it about upon a Spear. So God never suffereth bloodshed and treachery to goe unrevenged. And the like may be observed of Arfinoe, when shee was forced to see the death of her children, for shee before was the instrument, whom Lyfmachus her husband had used so unnaturally to poyson his worthy sonne Agathocles, and some other of his children also, to whom shee was step-mother, and therefore forward to make them away, that hers might be the more favoured. Ptolomee being dead, the French proceeded to waste and spoyle the Countrey of Macedonia, but one Sosthenes a Macedonian, gathering forces together, set upon the French, and drave them away, and so having saved the Countrey from spoiling, obtained that Kingdom. About this time the Jews whilst Eleazar was High-Priest, came into such favour with Ptolomee Philadelphus, by meanes of the Bible, which by 72 Elders was translated into Greeke at his request, that they being 120000 of them dispersed in his Dominions, were set at liberty, and so returned home into their own Countrey. And whereas many of them were in bondage, and so without injury could not be taken from their masters, without paying their redemption money, he frankly payed for them all 460 talents of silver. But to put him on to this, God by his providence first stirred up Demetrius Phalerus the keeper of the Kings Library, when the King upon a time asked him how many books he had gotten together, and he answered 200000, and that he hoped ere long to make them up 500000, to tell the King that there were certain excellent books which the Jews had in their own tongue, moving him to send to Eleazar the High-Priest for them, and six Elders of every Tribe, who had skill both in the Hebrew and Greeke Tongues to translate them. And when the King liking well the motion, prepared to send one Aristeus a good man, and in great esteeme with the King, moved him to set these men, whose God he acknowledged to be so worthy, and books so desirable, at liberty from their servitude, being seconded by Sofibias and Andreas, Captains of the Guard, whom Aristeus had desired before to be assistant unto him, when Ptolomee Philadelphus sent for the translators, he also sent great gifts to the Temple, viz. 100 Talents to buy Sacrifices, and other necessaries for the Temple, 20 golden vials, 30 of silver, and five goblets, and a precious table to be dedicated, in describing the sumptuousnesse of all which, Josephus is very large.

To return again to the Macedonians, the French increasing their Forces, sayth Justin, to 150000 foot, and 15000 horse under Brennus their Captaine, entered Macedonia, and then easily overcame Sosthenes with his small Forces that came against them, and made them flee into their Cities, they in the meane season, wasting and spoiling their Countrey. And not being content with these spoyles, Brennus applyed his minde to rob the Temple at Delphos also, saying in a scoffing manner, that the gods being rich ought to lend unto men. They of Delphos being but 4000, being assaulted by 65000, slue many of them by casting down stones upon them, and then by an earthquake, a peice of the mountain falling upon them, most of them perished, others being wounded at Brennus his perswasion slue one another, and he being moved by the anguish of his wounds slue himselfe, of the whole Army all that remained being but 10000 were destroyed in divers places as they returned homeward. Thus presumption upon their own strength was punished in these French and contempt of the Deity, although he whom they contemned were no god, but a devill, yet because they knew none other, they escaped not.

Whilst these things were done in Macedonia, Pyrrhus King of the Epyrots being desired by the Tarentines, went and made war with the Romans. But although he were of great valour and had many Elephants, by which he much prevailed at the first, because by them their horlmen were disordered, yet hee never fought against them without great losse, so that even when he had sometime the victory, he yet sought peace with them. But they would by no meanes agree to treat about it, unlesse he would first go out of their Countrey. At length Legats comming Murther punished.

Sin punished in the kind.

Justin.

Ioseph. lib. Antiq. 12. c. 2.

Friends to Gods people amongst the heathen.

Justin.

Contempt of God punished.

from Sicily to Pyrrhus, to offer unto him their Countrey, and desiring him to come and help them against the Carthaginians and Tyrans, that invaded their Island: although hee was at the same time by letters out of Macedonia certified, that Ptolomee Cerannus was slain, and Softhenes consumed by the French, and invited to return and repofesse that kingdom, he yet chose rather to go to Sicilia, and leaving some forces behind for the defence of Tarentum, went into Scicilia with 30000 men and upwards. When he arrived there, all the Cities readily yielded themselves unto him, and such successe had hee in fighting against the Carthaginians and other their enemies, that he soon made them flee into their own Countrey. Then he called himself King of Epirus and Sicily, and appointed one of his sons to be King of Sicily, and another King of Italy, and waxing proud hee degenerated into a Tyrant. Hereupon the Sicilians began to revolt from him to the Carthaginians, insomuch that he at that time being sent for to succour the Tarentines again indangered by the Romans in his absence, took this occasion to depart, saying, when he went, I leave Sicily for a Palæstra to the Romans and Carthaginians to fight in, as indeed it afterwards fell out. In his return to Tarentum the Mamertians fought against him, but when one of them challenged to combat with him, he was so enraged, that with his sword he presently cut him asunder in the midst, wherewith the rest being amazed durst not assault him any more. Comming to the Tarentines, he fought again with the Romans, but was overcome and therefore being weary of these wars, in which he had now been busied, and in Sicily six years, he returned to recover the Kingdom of Macedonia, upon which Antigonus the son of Demetrius had entered after the death of Ptolomee Cerannus and Softhenes, as being his right from his father. When Pyrrhus was come, he spoyle the Countrey, and giving battail to Antigonus, overcame and put him to flight, and when Antigonus had renewed his Army again, he was encountred by Ptolomee the sonne of Pyrrhus, and so overcome and put to flight, that he had not above seven men left him, with whom he sought now rather lurking places to hide himselfe, then the Kingdom any more. Pyrrhus then being greatly puffed up with this victory, and because that hereupon Embassadours of the Athenians, Achivis and Messenis, were sent to congratulate him, set his minde upon the subduing of all Græcia, and Asia, scoffing at Antigonus, as more fit for a pall than a purple. But such pride went not long without a fall, which thus came to passe, Cleonymus who had right to the Kingdom of Sparta, for his harsh carriage, being rejected by the Citizens, and Arens his brothers son made King, sent for Pyrrhus to come and help him. This he delayed not to doe, but went streight with an Army of 25000 foot, and 2000 horse, comming to Lacedæmonia towards night, he thought it not safe to doe any thing against it till morning. The Lacedæmonians or Spartans, that they might the better be able to encounter with him, and hold out, would have sent their women away in the night, but they refusing to live after the City destroyed, fell to working, together with the old men and boyes, all night in making of a Trench, all that were to be employed in the fight next day, resting in the meane season. When day appeared, the Spartans came to defend the trench, and fought against Pyrrhus and his men all day most desperately. The next day the battell being renewed, a Captain of Antigonus came thither, with a power from Corinth and Arens the King, with 2000 men out of Crete. But Pyrrhus having filled up the trench, so that he could ride over, entred the City, then his horse being wounded with a Cretean arrow, fell down under him, and he hardly escaped by retreating. At the same time hearing that Aristippus and Aristias, two prime men of the Argives were fallen out, because Aristias was for Pyrrhus, and Aristippus for Antigonus, he hastened thither, being pursued far by the Spartans, and annoyed much by Arens in the way. To stay their pursuit he sent his sonne Ptolomee with some Forces against them, but he fighting manfully was slain. Then his Forces fled after Pyrrhus, the Spartans pursuing them. But Pyrrhus hearing that Ptolomee was dead, turned and revenged his death by the slaughter of many of them, then passing on to Argos he came thither, and finding the gate set open by Aristias, entered the City in the night. Antigonus then being in the upper parts, came down against him, and Arens with 1000 men entered after

Plutarch.

Insulting over the distressed.

By rigour a Kingdom lost.

Women courageous.

after him, where they fought confusedly till day light. At what time Pyrrhus seeing all full of armed enemies, and upon the gate a wolfe fighting with a bull, portrayed in brasse, he was stricken, and thought to goe out of the City again; because it had been foretold him, that when he should see a wolfe fighting with a bull he should die, but whilst he was endeavouring thus to doe, his own Souldiers that were without with his sonne Helenus not knowing his minde, rushed in at the gate, and meeting his company striving to get out, they hurt and slue one another, then an Elephant falling in the gate, they which were come in could not get out again, although they endeavoured it, nor any more come in to them. This Pyrrhus seeing, turned again to fight with his enemies, but receiving a wound from a common souldier, he immediately assaulted him to kill him, but in the instant a woman above, who was mother to that Souldier, fearing her sonne, cast down a great stone upon his head, whereby his scull was crackt, and then by another was his head cut off, and being gotten by Antigonus his sonne, he hastened with it to his father: But he was so far from joying in that fight, that he rated his sonne and wept, and caused it to be magnificently buried, then he tooke his sonne Helenus, and sent him away to his fathers Kingdom of Epyrus to reign in his stead, herein giving a notable example of moderation in victories, considering the uncertainty of the event of wars. And thus Antigonus re-obtained the Kingdom of Macedonia. And when the death of Pyrrhus was known at Tarentum, that City was soon yeilded to the Romans, and they ere long became masters of all Italy. Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, called Antigonus Gonatus, did not long enjoy his Kingdom of Macedonia in quiet. For the French men who had seated themselves in Greece, being called therefore Gallogræci, fought divers times against him, but at length, when great distraction was foretold unto them by their South-sayers, they desperately killing their wives and children first, thinking thus to appease the gods, and fulfill the prediction, rushed in to the battell and were all slain, as such unnaturall murderers were well worthy. Antigonus seeing his men feshit with this victory, thought it best to put them forthwith upon other atchievements, and therefore he led them against the Athenians, hoping if he could subdue them, to make himselfe King of all Græcia. But Ptolomee Philadelphus not willing to have him grow so great, sent to help the Athenians, and Arcus also, the King of the Spartans came to help them. But so strongly were they besieged on every side, that these helps lost their labour, and notwithstanding them, the Athenians were compelled to yeild to Antigonus, and he placed a Garrison over them and departed to Macedonia again, where he found Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus invading the Countrey, but according to Justin by the transition of his souldiers, he soone lost both his Kingdom and Army.

As for the Romans, they about this time growing most mighty, suffered by a very great pestilence, and inquiring the cause, it was answered, that a certain vestall virgin was corrupted, whereupon they thought to have buried her alive, but shee hanging her selfe prevented that. But it is to be noted hence, how odious a thing it is for such as by their profession should live most chastly, to defile themselves by fleshly pollution. For not long before the like judgement followed upon the like occasion, as they of Rome conjectured, because such wickednesse being in another vestall virgin found out, and shee buried alive therefore, a terrible pestilence came soone after, destroying many people, but specially, women with childe.

Touching Ptolomee Philadelphus, he had a brother called Maga, who reigned over the Cyrenæans, and having married Apame the daughter of Antiochus the King of Syria, he for envie perswaded him to make war upon his brother, but Ptolomee being aware of it, raised great forces, and sent them against Antiochus, whereby that expedition was prevented. And now was the time of the war begun between the Romans and the Carthaginians upon this occasion. The Mæmertines being invaded by the Syracusians, under the leading of their Captain Hiero, by whom they suffered much, (but Hiero for his valiant exploits, returning to Syracuse, was made King) sought some of them to the Carthaginians for help, and some to the Romans, for both were so mighty, that betwixt them was the dominion almost of all the world. The Romans debating long whether they

Pyrrhus his death foretold Moderation in victory.

Murderers ill successe in war.

Justin.

Fleshly uncleannesse judged.

Polybius.

Zonaras.

Diodorus.

should helpe the Mamertines being robbers of their neighbours the Syracusians, and thereupon invaded by them, at length were over-ſwayed by the multitude, and did ſend to help them by Appius Claudius, one of their Conſuls, proſtit thus prevailing more then juſtice, becauſe the Carthaginians by gaining the Mamertines Countrey, were likely to be maſters of all Sicily, which the Romans thought would be dangerous unto them. But the Carthaginians fearing them, made peace both with the Syracuſians and Mamertines, having their City delivered unto them, and ſent a power to keepe the narrow Seas to prevent the Romans comming. Wherefore when Appius Claudius ſent C. Claudius before him with a few ſhips, he ſeeing the great power of the Carthaginians durſt not come at them, but with one little ſhip went to another place called Meffana, and there ſpeaking with the Mamertines, told them that the Romans would onely help them againſt their enemies the Syracuſians and ſo depart home again. Hereby the Mamertines were ſo moved, that the affection of them all was drawn towards the Romans, and Hanno the Captain of the Carthaginians was glad to perſwade Claudius to make peace with the Carthaginians, but he reſuſed, and thereupon Hanno threatned, that he would ſo drive away the Romans, that they ſhould not be able to come by ſo much ſea water as wherewith to waſh their hands. But by the help of the Mamertines, whilſt Hanno was in the Aſſembly, he was apprehended and imprifoned, and then being ſent away, was by the Carthaginians hanged. The Romans then were commanded by Heralds ſent from the Carthaginians, to depart from thence by a day. But they contemning this beſieged Meffana, where alſo Hiero lay with his power, and then the Conſul feigning a departure towards Rome, returned again ſecretly in the night, and overcame Hiero, before that he knew of his comming. Then Claudius purſued him to Syracufe, but when he wanting proviſion, was out of hope to win it at the preſent, he returned to Rhegium. The next yeare the Romans ſent both their Conſuls into Sicily, Maximus & Craſus, who having taken many Cities ſome by force, and ſome by yeilding, came at length to Syracufe, where Hiero having fought ſome time againſt them, fearing their power deſired peace, and obtained upon condition of paying 100 Talents, and ſo he ſtill enjoyed his Kingdom, and was thenceforth aiding to the Romans to his end, and they fought againſt the Carthaginians, joyning his forces with theirs, and by this means left ſome of their own at home. The next yeare the Carthaginians fortified Agirigentum, another City in Sicilia, and put therein great ſtore of proviſion, and 50000 men, wherefore the Roman Conſuls being Leſtumnus and Manlius, with their Legions beſieged it, and after five moneths proviſion growing ſcarce, both amongſt the beſieged and the beſiegers, after that Hannibal comming with a new Armie of above 30000 men, had cut off the proviſion that uſed to be brought to the Romans, they agreed on both ſides to come to a battell, and fought long on both ſides, till at length the Romans prevailing, great ſlaughter was made of them, and they who eſcaped fleeing into the City, iſſued out in the dead of the night, and ſo the City came into the hands of the Romans, which was an occaſion of a triumph at Rome, when theſe Conſuls returned. Thus the Romans prevailed by land, but the Carthaginians in the meaneſeaſon in all maritim places, by reaſon of their great ſtrength at ſea. This the Romans conſidering, they alſo began to prepare them a navy of ſhips, whereof hitherto they had but few, then Amilcar being made Ruler inſtead of Hanno, he ſent Hannibal to make warre upon the Romans on the coaſts of Italy. But he having by ſome of his Navy prevailed at the firſt againſt ſome of the Romans, when both the whole Navies came to the fight, was overthrown, and loſt 50 of his ſhips, and ſo returned with the reſt, being 100, unto Carthage. And this victory by ſea fell to the Romans by a new device of Drullus the Conſull, who had cauſed all the Roman ſhips to be armed with hookt irons faſtened to them, which were called Corvi, whereby they layd hold upon their enemies ſhips, when they approached unto them ſo faſt, that they could not get from them again, and ſo they boarding them fought and tooke them, whereas at the firſt the Carthaginians deſpiſed the Romans Navy for the rudeneſſe, and ſtrange ſetting forth thereof.

About

About this time Antiochus Soter King of Syria and Asia, dying, Antiochus his son called Theos, succeeded him, betwixt whom and Ptolomee Philadelphus there were divers and great battels, but at length an end was put hereunto by a marriage betwixt Antiochus and Berenice, Ptolomees daughter: of this see Dan. 11. 6. and how little this availed for the making of a firme peace. For as Jerom upon that place hath it, he did upon the taking of Berenice, put down Laodice, whom he had before into the place of a Concubine, but afterwards being overcome with her love, he took her again, yet she fearing him for his inconstancy, provided poison to be given unto him by some of his ministers, and so he dyed. For the Roman matters after Drausus his departure Amilcar fortified Drepanum, and least it should be an advantage to the Romans, overthrew the City Ericonum, and subdued almost all Sicily, but he was stoppt in these his proceedings by Florus, and in a short time all Sicily almost becoming subject to the Romans, they now feare not to make war against Carthage it selfe. Wherefore they set forth towards Africa, with a Navy of 330 ships, under the conduct of Attilius and Manlius Consuls, and the Carthaginians came out to meete them with 350 under Amilcar and Hanno. When the two Navies were met, they fought a long time with great courage on both sides, but at length the Romans having lost 24 ships, and 30 on the Carthaginians part being drowned, Amilcar fled, and 65 ships more came in to the power of the Romans, who being animated by this victory, when they had repaired their Navy, went onto the Carthaginians Territories. Comming to their coast, there was a City called Clypea, which they first set upon and tooke, and after that many Towns and Castles, and many prisoners, whom they at their return caryed to Rome, being 27000, when they had won Clypea, they sent home to the Senate to certifie what they had done, and to know their further pleasure. The Senate willed one of the Consuls, Attilius Regulus to stay still with a competent army, and Manlius to return to Rome, which was done accordingly. The power remayning was 15000 foot and 500 horse, and 40 ships, the rest returned with Manlius Regulus, with these fought against all the forces of the Carthaginians, under their three Captains Hannibal, Hafdrubal and Bostroatus, and overcame them killing 18000 of their men, taking 5000, eight Elephants, and 73 Cities or Towns, so Entropius. Approaching then to Carthage, because he thought, that he should not take it, during the time of his Consulship, and that his successor should have the glory of it, hee delayed the time about a treaty concerning peace, but his terms were so hard, that it was to no effect. But whilst hee being puffed up with his victories, (for he wrote boasting to Rome, that hee had made the Carthaginians to shut up their gates for fear) and look for no enemy to make head against him, behold Xanthippus a Lacedemonian hired by the Carthaginians, being come to the City, drew out theirs and his own fears, and gave Regulus battell where he thought the ground fittest for the Elephants, and first by their means having overthrown the Roman horsemen, and slain many of them he prevailed also against their whole army, and took Regulus prisoner, and 500 others, Entropius sayth, that there escaped not above 2000 of the Romans, that were in Regulus his Army: But the Carthaginians requited Xanthippus ill, by putting him into a leaking ship when he returned to Greece, being outwardly pitched over, that he might be drowned by the way, being willing that he should perish, lest he should carry away the glory of that victory. But he espying their deceit, went into another ship, and so returned. But this their grosse ingratitude went not long unpunished. For the Romans hearing what had happened, immediately prepared and sent out a great Navy of 350 ships against the Carthaginians, and they with 200 under Amilcar, went to meete with them, although with ill successe. For they were soone put to flight by the Romans, and 114 of them taken. Then the Romans bending their course homeward again to triumph for this victory, met with a Tempest which wracked and drowned almost all their ships, even 284. The Carthaginians hearing of this great destruction of the Romans, tooke heart again, and sent out Hafdrubal with 300 ships, and 160 Elephants into Sicily, who tooke Agri-genium and burnt it. The Romans so soon as they could repair their Navy, by building 120 new ships, joyning them to those that escaped the former ship-

Antiochus Theos.

Zonaras.

Eutropius.

Pride for victories hath a fall.

Ingratitude
punisheth.

A Triumph prevented.
Orosius.

shipwrack hattered with them being: 200 to Sicily, where they besieged and tooke Panormus the chiefe City of the Carthaginians in all Sicily, and many other Cities yielded unto them. But passing from thence into Africa, they were repul- sed, and having stickt a time in the quicksands, when they got off again they re- turned to Panormus, but at the very comming thither such a tempest arose, as cau- sed 150 of their ships to perish. Thus these great conquerours had their Forces sundry times sore shattered and broken, wherefore the newes hereof comming to the Senate, they supposing that those which went with their ships had not skill enough, made a Decree that thenceforth they would keepe no more but 60 ships to defend the coast of Italy, and so they ceased for a time from their Sea fights.

Funiculus

Annorum 3695, Eleazar the High-Priest being dead, Manasseh was High- Priest 27 years. And after Mattathias Asarmahat was Prince of the Jews nine years, then Artaxad Nagid 10 years, and after him Hagajeli 8 years, then Masorb Nahum 7 years, in whose fourth yeare Manasseh begun. But for any thing done more touching the Jews all Manasseh his time, no remembrance is made by any writer.

Orosius.

Zonaras.

The conscience of an oath in an Heathen.

To return to the Romans, they having by reason of their late great losses at sea, forborne to doe any thing against the Carthaginians two yeares, the Cartha- ginians now thinking them fearfull and unable, sent forth Hafdruball with an Army of 30000 horse and foot, and 130 Elephants, who came to Panormus in Sicily, where Metellus the Consul was, and without any hinderance on the Ro- mans part, approached neere the City. But there without in the ditches, men being placed with darts and arrows, galled the Elephants, in whom their greatest trust lay, so as that partly by the wounds received from them, and partly from those upon the walls, they were turned into a fury, and killed many of their own men, and disordered their Army. This being by Metellus perceived, he present- ly came out of the City with his men, and slue and put to flight the whole Army of the Carthaginians, some of the Elephants also were slain, and above 100 taken and sent to Rome. The number of Carthaginians slain is sayd to have been 20000, but to be revenged upon their Generall Hafdruball, they condemned and hanged him. Then they sent Attilius Regulus, whom they had kept prisoner five years together with other Embassadors to Rome to sue for peace and the exchange of prisoners, swearing him first, if he prevailed not, to return to Carthage again. He therefore having done his embassy, and being called into the Senate, to which he would not goe without the other Embassadors leave, sayd unto the Senatours, that it was not for the profit of their Common-wealth to make peace, seeing they were so weakned by the destruction which was lately made by the Romans amongst them, that they were not able any longer to withstand their force, and as for changing of prisoners, there was no reason they should harken to that, seeing they had many, but the Carthaginians no more but him an old man, and a few others. And when notwithstanding that which he sayd, he saw the Senate inclining for his sake to agree upon a change of prisoners, he told them that he had drunke poyson, and therefore could not live long, and so at his own importunity being permitted, he returned to Carthage, and was put to a most cruell death, by being set in a narrow vessell full of pricks most sharpe on all parts whereby he was compelled continually to stand upright, and so dyed for want of sleepe. The Romans so soone as they heard of it, delivered the chiefe of Carthage whom they had prisoners there into the hands of Regulus his sonnes, who put them likewise to a cruell and tormenting death.

Peace offered and refused succeeds ill to the Romans.

These things being done, the Romans prepare a great Navy again of 200 ships, and send with them their two Consuls into Sicily, and there they besieging Leli- bens, which was a strong City with walls, ditches and towres, were manfully re- pulsed by Annibal the son of Hamilcar, who was sent with 4000 Carthaginians to defend it. Wherefore the Romans prepared for a longer siege, which being heard at Rome, another new Consul P. Claudius was sent with a supply of 10000 more, who came to Drepanum by the way, thinking to oppresse Aderbal that kept the City unawares. But he seeing the enemies comming, although unexpe- ctedly etedly, took courage to fight against them, and suddenly having exhorted his men to fight courageously set upon them, which Claudius seeing, who lookt for no resisting but yielding, he being much dismayed caused his navy to turn back, but the Carthaginians being nimble and more expert at Sea-fights, and knowing the place better soon slue and took many of them, and 93 of their ships, Claudius escaping with only 30 ships. Diodorus speaks of more then 100 ships taken, and yet there were but 90 Carthaginian, and sayth, that in this battell 8000 Romans were slain, and 20000 taken prisoners, but not one Carthaginian slain and few wounded, which purchased great glory to Adherbal amongst the Carthaginians, and much hatred against Claudius amongst the Romans so that hee was adjudged to death. Florus sayth, that Claudius had in contempt of a divination by chickens let out of a cave, that would not eat, bidden them to be cast into the Sea, saying, if they will not eat, I will make them drink. But it was noted, that in the same place his Navy was overthrow, and so he had sorrow for his prophane mirth, as it was by those heathens accounted. In the mean season, whilst Junius was bringing provision by Sea to the Roman army, which besieged Lelibens, Adherbal sent a way Cathalon with 30 ships to the Lelibeian coast, adding also thereunto 70 more, which came from Carthage. This bred great troubles to the Romans: for now the Questors, who were sent before by Junius, being neer the Coast were chased away by Cathalon, fleeing to land in another place, and at the hearing of this tumult, the Governour of Lelibens came forth with his army upon the Roman besiegers, and overthrew them, and after this Junius the Consul coming on with the rest of his Navy, not knowing what had hapned, was also made to flee desperately to a dangerous part of the Sea, where the Carthaginians durst not follow, but there they were so shattered amongst the rocks, that they all perished, that is, the ships with their provision, but Junius by reason of the shoate being neere escaped and came to Syracuse, and so did most of his men. Then bethinking himself, what course to take to redeem his credit he got Eryce in Sicily by treachery, whereupon hot Wars arose between the Romans and Carthaginians divers yeeres, but no notable exploit was done on eyther side all that time, the Romans since their great losses at Sea wanting a Navy.

In this interim Ptolomee Philadelphus dyed, when he had reigned 40 yeeres, and soon after Antiochus Theos, King of Syria and Asia by poyson; as was sayd before. In the Kingdom of Egypt, Ptolomee Euergetes succeeded his father, and in Syria Seleucus Callinicus obtained the Kingdom, who was the son of Laodice his wife, which had poysoned him. He being King by the instigation of his mother put Berenice and her son to death, that he might reign the more securely. The manner was thus, she fled with her son into Daphne in the Suburbs of Antioch of Syria, and took sanctuary in Apollo his Temple. But being by Seleucus besieged there many came to ayd her, and her brother the King of Egypt also prepared a great power to help her, but when Seleucus could not by force, he took her by policy and slue both her and her son before that Ptolomee could come. To be revenged for this murder Ptolomee coming into Syria, drew many of Seleucus his subjects to take part with him through a detestation of that his wicked deed and his mothers; for they hated them for their cruell murders. Then hee took Laodice and put her to death, and subdued a great part of Syria, and invaded Babylon, yea, Jerom commenting upon that part of Daniel where this is prophesied of, sayth, that hee took also Silicia, and carryed away into Egypt at his return 40000 talents of gold and precious vessels, and 2500 Images, which had been formerly carryed out of Egypt by Cambyses, when hee took Egypt, for which the Egyptians gave him the surname of Euergetes, or Benefaetour. And had it not been for the news of dissensions arising at home, which came unto him, causing his return, hee would have spoyled Seleucus of all his Kingdom, so just are Gods judgments even amongst the Heathens for cruelty and murder. For the Jews matters, Manasse the high-priest dying about the time of Philadelphus his death, a new high-priest succeeded called Simon Justus, who lived after this 28 yeeres, so Eusebius, but Josephus placeth Onias, the son of Simon Justus next unto Manasse, saying, that hee was pusillanimous and covetous, inso much that hee would not part with tribute to

Ptole-

*Diodorus.Florus.*A contemner of Divinations*Eutropius.Ptol. Philadel-* phus dyes.
Antiochus
Theos dyes.*Iuliane.*Murther revenged.

Anno Mundi

3722.

Eusebiuschron.Josephus, antiq.

lib. 12. c. 3.

Ptolomee Energetes being now by the conquest of Syria become Lord of Juda a also. But Ptolomee sent unto him to threaten him, if he paid it not, to divide his Countrey amongst his Souldiers, and to bring in new colonyes. And when Onias was not moved by all this, but neglected the message, come what would come, there was one Joseph his sisters son by Tobias, that was much grieved at it, and therefore expostulated with his Uncle about it, and desired him if he were moved so much at parting with the money, to goe to the King, and to get part of it remitted. But he refusing so to doe, he with his leave, undertooke the Embassage, and having first comforted the people, and entertained the Kings Embassadour, and given him precious gifts, whereby his affection was much moved towards Joseph, followed after him into Egypt. The King being before his coming stirred up by the good report of the Embassadour, to a desire to see him, entertained him very courteously when he came, bidding him to come up into the chariot. Then the Embassadour being present, began to accuse Onias of great neglect, but Joseph answered that he was an old man, and old men and children had oft times mindes alike, but sayth he, we young men will not be wanting to doe our duty, so that there should be any just cause to complain. With this the King was so moved in his affection towards him, that he was lodged in his Pallace, and eat bread before him. Now it happened so, that Tributes at this time were brought in from Calefryia, Phenicia, Juda a and Samaria, unto 8000 Talents, but Joseph saying, that they had consented together to deceive the King, for theremight twice so much be raised in those Countreys, and he would undertake to doe it, the King asked him what surety he would put in to doe so, and he answering, good and honest persons, even the King and the Queen, which should be sureties to one another for him, the King laughed, and without sureties committed the gathering of Tributes to him. Then he desiring had 2000 horsemen allowed him, and coming to Askelon, where they detided him, he tooke and put to death 20 of the chiefe, taking their goods to the value of 1000 Talents, and sent them to the King. Others being warned by their example, opened their gates unto him, and so he gathered very much money, which he sent to the King and Queen, and great gifts to divers about the Court, whereby he got himselfe many freinds. And so he lived 22 years in great honour and reputation, in which time he begat seven sonnes of one wife, and one called Hircanus, of his brothers daughter, whom he tooke to wife upon this occasion. Being at Alexandria, where he saw a faire woman at a feast, come up to dance before the King, he was taken with the love of her: but because shee was an alienigena, and so it was unlawfull for him to marry her, he dealt with his brother, who had a daughter there marriageable, by some means to procure him the enjoyment of that dancer, he promised to doe his best, but preparing his own daughter brought her to his bed, and so he lay with her, and having done so divers times, and being more inflamed with love towards her, he complained to his brother, that he knew not how to get his affection off from this woman, then he sayd, that he should not need, for hee might have her to his wife, being his daughter. Joseph being glad to heare this marryed her, and the son Hircanus, whom hee had by her in wisdom excelled all his brethren. Therefore his father having tryed him and them, when he was but thirteen years old, acknowledged him his only genuine son. Now he tryed them thus, hee sent them to, bee taught by skilfull Masters, but after much time finding, that they profited not, hee gathered, that they wanted wit: then hee sent Hircanus with 300 yoke of Oxen as far off to plow and sow, but secretly withdrew the leather thongs, wherewith they should be tyed together. The husbandmen, that went with him missing these would have had him sent one home to his father to fetch them, but he loth to lose so much time would not, but caused ten Oxen to be killed, and of their hides thongs to be made, and with the flesh he fed the men. This his father hearing applauded his wit and loved him above all the rest, for which they hated him and sought his death. Unto this Joseph Fancius reckoneth 60 years, but Josephus speaks only of 22 years, in which hee continued Tribute-gatherer to the King of Egypt, and sayth, that his Uncle Onias the High-priest dyed about the same time that he dyed, his son Simon succeeding him, and that after his ibid. 112

Fancius.

ibid. 112
Fancius.

his death Ioseph sons sought the life of Hircanus, but he leaving Ierusalem dwelt beyond the River Iordan, where hee fortified himselfe and made daily excursions upon the Arabians, and having lived thus seven years, till the King of Egypt was dead, and Seleucus the King of Syria also, whom Antiochus Epiphanus succeeded, he fearing his power, because he had sroyled the Arabians, slue him selfe, and so all his possessions came into the hands of Antiochus Epiphanes. Hitherto Iosephus.

To return to Seleucus the King of Syria, when he lost so much of his Kingdom by Ptolomee, the Parthians also revolted from him, and set up a King of their own called Arsace, from whom all the Kings of Parthia since have had their names. After that Ptolomee was returned into Egypt, Seleucus prepared him a great Navy to bring those Cities again to his obedience, which had revolted from him to Ptolomee, but a tempest arising they were all broken, and his men for the most part drowned, which is to be noted, because he had formerly murdered Berenice and her sonne, whose innocent blood cryed for revenge. But the people who had false from him, after they saw him thus punished, did voluntarily taking compassion upon his misery, submit themselves again unto him: But little joy had he of this, for he now meditating revenge upon Ptolomee, prepared an Army to fight against him, but was soon overcome and made to flee into Antioch the chiefe City of his Kingdom full of fear. From thence he wrote letters to his brother Antiochus, desiring his aid against Ptolomee, and offering him all Asia within the mountains of Taurus for his help. Antiochus hereupon, although he were but 14 years old, immediately began to think with himselfe, how he might get his brothers whole Kingdom from him, and therefore hiring many French men, he instead of helping, made war against his brother, having from hence the name of Hierax or Hanke. In that battell Antiochus prevailed, then the French thinking Seleucus to be slain, sought to kill Antiochus also, that they might more freely pillage the Countrey, but he perceiving it sent them away, giving much gold unto them. Of this dissention Enmenes the King of Bythinia taking advantage came against Antiochus and overcame him, and so possessed a great part of Syria, but the two brothers still seeking the destruction of one another, fought another battell, wherein Antiochus was overcome, and fled first to his father in law Artimenes King of Cappadocia, and when he could not be safe there, he went and yielded himselfe to Ptolomee Energetes, who put him in safe custody: but he by the help of an vvhore escaping, vvas slain by robbers as he fled avway. And Seleucus his brother, vvhhen he had lived obscurely 20 years King, having lost his Kingdom by falling off his horse, dyed about the same time. Thus both he that perfidiously hauked after his brothers Kingdom, and his brother that feared not to reign the more securely to imbrow his hands in innocent blood, had their reward for a warning to all others.

To return again to the Romans, they having hitherto wanted a Navy, since the great losse sustained by Junius, now after divers yeers took heart to prepare one and to set to Sea again, the first occasion whereof was the revolt of certain French men from the Carthaginians for their ill usage of them, to the Romans, who all so betrayed a Garrison unto them, committed to their custody. For to some ships thus obtained, and some of private Citizens they added many more. And now first they hired foreigners also to serve in their Wars, which they never did before, when all their publike treasure was spent in making ships, private persons at their own cost made some one, some two and some more Quinqueremes, after the Carthaginian manner, conditioning, if they had good successe, to be repaid their charges again. Thus their Navy became 200, according to some 300, according to others, many more, when it was ready, Posthumus being Consul was held by the High-priest Metellus, because he was also a Flamen of Mars, to attend upon the sacrifices, so that hee could not go out with it. Wherefore two Prators were made, which might go forth, the one with the Tribune to war, and the other remain at home with the other Tribune to govern the City, and therefore after this there never went out two Tribunes to War together any more. Pretors being made, Valerius one of them went with Carulus a Tribune, taking this whole Apian.

Murtherous Seleucus judged.
Infin.

Antiochus Hierax.

Perfidie pun-isht.

Navy with them into Sicilia, where they first set upon Drepana, and when they had battered the walls, and almost taken it, Catulus was wounded in the thigh, being with much adoe, carryed out of the fight. The Carthaginians hearing of the Romans comming forth again with a Navy, prepared theirs without delay, consistting of 250 ships, wherein they also carryed great store of provision, thinking therewith to victuall Eryce, and then the ships being lightened to fight with the Roman Navy. But Catulus fearing this, prepared to encounter with them, whilst they were heaue with their loading, and did so, and prevailed so far against them, that he sunke and tooke most of them, and Hanno the Generall of the Carthaginians fleeing back to Carthage with a few ships, was at his return taken and hanged up. The Carthaginians having their Forces thus broken, sent an Embassage to the Tribune, suing for peace. This he granted, being also sore shaken in his Forces by this fight, but his conditions were these. The Carthaginians wholly to leave Sicily. They must make no war with Hiero. They must not arme against the Syracusians. They must restore all Captains of the Romans gratis. They must pay 2200 Talents to the Romans in 20 years. But the Senate being consulted with, ten Embassadors were sent, who added that they should pay 1200 talents more soithwith, and 2200 before mentioned in 10 years, and leave all the parts between Italy and Sicily. Thus sayth Polybius, the warre which had lasted 24 years between the Romans and Carthaginians, had an end. But yet neyther were the Carthaginians free from war after this, nor yet the Romans. For the Carthaginians were vvasht with a civill vvar against their stipendaries, vvho being dismissed by Hamilcar, and not payd as he appoynted, that they might return every one to his own home, made an head, and fought against the Carthaginians many bloody battells, and this was called the Lybian War, vvwhich according to some lasted three years, according to others foure, in all vvwhich time the calamities suffered by the Carthaginians were very great, but at length the stipendaries were overcome by Hamilcar, and fled avway into Sardinia. During the time of this Lybian Warre, some of the Romans brought provision over to the stipendaries, but they were by the Carthaginians beaten at Sea, and their laded ships taken, and vvith them 500 men, vvho were put in prison. This vvvas at the first taken ill by the Senate, but afterwards upon an Embassage sent by the Carthaginians, all men were prohibited carrying any more provision to the stipendaries, but allowed to carry vvhat they vvould to the Carthaginians, and they sent home all the Carthaginian prisoners also, vvhom they had taken at the Sicilian Warre. The Romans vv whilst the Carthaginians had civill vvvars vvith their stipendaries, had a short vvar vvith the Falisci, a rich people then in Italy, because they had abused a Tribune, a Tribune of the people. But the Consuls going both to fight against them, ended it vvithin six days, slaying of the Falisci 1500 men, punishing them vvith the losse of halfe their land, and razing their City. And then first vvvas the gate of Ianus shut, in token of the cessation of vvvars, but the next yeare it vvvas opened again. Novv Numa Pompilius vvvas the second King of the Romans after Romulus, Anno Mundi 3251, and this shutting of the Gate of Ianus his Temple vvvas, Anno 3727, that is, 476 yeares after, vvwhereby we may see both vvhat a long time the Romans were in grooving to this greatness, and vvhat an unquiet and turbulent Nation they have alvvays been since Romulus their first King, from vv whom they take their name, who was both before his reigne, and all the time thereof a great warriour. Before him, Italy was called the Kingdom of the Latines, being first founded by Kneas a Trojan, who came from Troy after the destruction thereof, to Latinius a King here, whom Fuuccius calls his father in law, Anno Mundi 2786, and therefore after his name it was called Latium. In this Kingdom reigned Eneas three years, and after him his sonne Ascanius, and after him others to the number of 15, of whom Amulius Silvius was the last. For he having a brother called Numitor, that had one only daughter, to whom of right the Kingdom belonged, as being his elder, expelled him from the Kingdom, and that there might be no hope of issue by his daughter, he made of her a veltall virgin. But shee Anno 27 of his reigne, lost her virginity, and brought forth two children at a birth, called Romulus and Remus, for Polybius.

Polybius.
Diodorus.

Plutarch.

The Latines.
Fuuccius

for which shee was buried alive, as the manner was, but her two children were exposed upon the banks of the River Tyber, and being found by Fanstulus the Kings cowheard, they were brought home to his wife, whom the neighbours for her rapacity called Lupa. shee also being beautifull playd the whore for gain, and therefore from her to this day, the Stews are called Lupanaria. When these youths were but 17 years of age, they tooke Armes, and having gathered together a company of shepherds and robbers, they fought against Amulius, and having slain him, restored their Grandfather Numitor to his Kingdom. Then they built Rome, and after Numitor, Romulus reigned there 37 years, subduing divers peoples about, for which he triumphed thrice. Numa Pompilius succeeded him, and reigned in great peace 43 yeares, till that he dyed with age. He was a most vertuous and moderate King all his dayes, giving himselfe wholly to sacred busineses, and to promote husbandry whereby sustenance might come in for the feeding of the people after him. Tullus Hostilius was the third King of the Romans 32 yeares, being at the last burnt with all his family in his own house falling on fire. Ancus Martius the fourth King 34 yeares. Tarquinius Priscus the fifth King, 38 yeares. Servius Tullus the sixth, who subdued Heitruia 44 yeares, and then was slain by Tarquinius Superbus, and he became the seventh and last King 25 yeares. From thence forward the City was governed by Consuls from Anno 245 of the Cities building, to 346. From thence Tribuni Mil. ruled untill Anno 388. From thence the government returned again to Consuls, untill Anno 707, at which time Julius Caesar became Emperour. Questors were ordained as before is sayd, in the time of Consuls, and Dictatours were before Emperours.

To return to the history of the Romans and Carthaginians, the stipendaries that escaped in the Lybian Wars, fled to Sardinia, and invited the Romans thither to their ayde. They being willing to take any opportunity to enlarge their Empire, raysed forces and went to Sardinia. The Carthaginians under whom Sardinia had hitherto been, fearing, after that they had been so much waisted with Civill Wars, to encounter again with so potent an enemy, although manifest wrong were here in offered unto them, yielded them Sardinia, and to pay moreover 1200 talents to continue their peace. But they sent out Hamilcar into Spain to subdue those parts, beginning also to revolt from them, who took with him his son Hannibal being but nine years old, and made him sweare alwayes to be an enemy to the Romans. In Spain Hamilcar having prospered nine yeares, at length was put so hard to it by King Otiffen, at the siege of the City Helsce, that he was forced to take into a River and was drowned there. Then Hasdrubal his son in law succeeded him, and having subdued 12 Cities in Spain, he built a City there by the Sea coast, and called it Carthage, but when hee also had fulfilled nine yeares, hee perished by poyson treacherously given unto him by a familiar friend. All this while the Carthaginians enjoyed peace with the Romans, who were glad to renew it by reason of the French, of whom they were continually affraid. For they made great preparations against them, and therefore they were now busied altogether in preparing to resist them. At length the Romans had certain news of their coming beyond the Alpes by Heitruia, at which both Rome and all Italy was terrified. For they had answer from their South-layers, that the French and the Grecians should passe the City, whereupon they took a French man and woman, and a Grecian man and woman, and buried them alive in the Boian Market, thus seeking to fulfill the prophesie. But yet they could not but feare greatly, and send to the Venetians for ayd and to other peoples neer the French, by reason whereof the French came but with 50000 foot and 20000 horse, the rest of their army being left to oppose the Venetians and others, if they should attempt any thing against their Countrey in their absence. But the Romans went forth with all the power that they could make in Rome and in all Italy, neyther old men, nor Priests being spared. So there were of their whole forces 700000 according to some, 800000 according to others, whereof part went to Ariminum, under L. Emilius Consul, part to Heitruia with a Pretor, and part to Sardinia with Attilius the other Consul. Those that went to Heitruia with the Pretor, came first to the enemy towards night being 50000 foot and 4000 horse. The French in policy caused their foot to march away in the night, commanding their horse to follow them in the morning. The Romans when it was day light seeing none but horsemen set upon them, and as they went away pursued them. But when they were come to their footmen, they altogether fell so fiercely upon the Romans, that they slue of them 6000, and pursued the rest unto a certain hill to which they fled. But in the night following, hearing of another army that was coming against them, they consulted about going away with the huge prey, which they had already taken without staying at this time to fight any more. For the Consul Emilius was now come out of Ariminum to help the Pretour with his company upon the hill. Hee therefore finding, that the French were gone, pursued them, but whilst they were fleeing before him, behold the other Consul Attilius came also with his army out of Sardinia, and having learned by some fore-runners of the French army, whom he took, that the French were now inclosed betwixt his and Emilius his army, he set so hastily upon them that hee was slain, yet the battell in time went against the French, who fought most valiantly for their lives, and there were slain of them 40000, and 10000 taken prisoners, whereby the Romans were delivered from all their fear of them.

Zonaras.

To return again to the Kingdom of Syria, Seleucus Calin: and Hierax his brother being dead, Seleucus Cerannus succeeded in that Kingdom, being son to Seleucus Celimachus. And finding that Attalus King of Pergamus had taken away a great part of his fathers kingdom as far as the mountaine Taurus, hee first prepares to fight against him, joyning with him Acheus a Prince, his kinsman, but when he had with him, and a great army proceeded as far as the Syd mountain, he before any battell fought perished by poyson. Acheus his kinsman took and executed the traitours, and behaved himself so in managing this War alone, that he recovered again that part of Asia from Attalus, and when the people would have had him for their king being moved by his great wisdom and valour, hee was so far from ambition, that hee refused it, and kept it for the other son of Seleucus Calin: being yet very young, called Antiochus Magnus. And being by him set over those parts he was faithfull unto him for the space of two years. But then partly being prickt with ambition for his good successe, for he had driven King Attalus into his City Pergamus, taking all the Countrey home to Pergamus from him, and partly by the instigation of others, hee tooke upon him to be King. Antiochus hearing of this, and being yet but a youth, he was advised by Epigenes the chief Captain of his army to take his forces, and in person to go and fight against his rebels: but Hermias, the Governour of the Kingdom of Syria under the King, being a wicked and cruell man, and hating greatly Epigenes, cryed out against him, as seeking to draw him forth with a few to the hazarding of his life, and perswaded him rather to bend his forces against Ptolomee to be revenged for the wrongs done to his father, and to recover from him that part of Syria which he had taken away. And for Acheus he devised a letter, as if it had been by him written to the King, wherein he certified him, that Ptolomee had sought to move him to take the Crown upon him, promising great ayd of men, money and ships. Hereby the young King coming to a better opinion of Acheus and his complices followed the counsell of Hermias, and prepared to goe against Ptolomee. But one Molon, who together with a brother of his, had conspired with Acheus fighting against the Kings Captains in those parts, overcame them, and tooke certain Cities, of which Antiochus being advertised, he thought to desist from his enterprize against Ptolomee, and to goe in person against his rebels. But Hermias again perswaded him that it was the unskilfulness of the other Captains which caused their overthrow, and therefore to send another more expert against them, and hold on in his way against Ptolomee, saying, that it was not fit for a King in person to goe against Captains, but against a King. But when a new Captain was sent, he at the first encounter was also slain. Then the King consulted again with his Officers, and resolved to goe in person against the rebels, Hermias also being forced to yeild unto it. But when they were upon the way money failed to pay the Souldiers, at which the King being much troubled, Hermias offered to supply him, if so be that he would send away Epigenes, because Void of ambition.

Polybius.

Counterfeit Letters.

he sayd, they two should never agree. To this the King, though very unwilling, consented, and charging Epigenes to stay in Apamea, where they then were, he himselfe with Hermias and his Army being now payd, advancing forward, Hermias set a trap for Epigenes, by Alexis the keeper of the Tower of Apamea, whom he corrupted by gifts, so that he wrote Letters as comming from Molon to Epigenes, and procured a servant of his to put them secretly amongst other writings of his Masters. Then he challenged Epigenes for receiving Letters from the Rebels, but he denying it, Alexis sought amongst his papers, whereby he convinced him, and so he was executed. The King came to Antioch, and having wintered there, in the spring he went against the Rebels, till he came neere unto them. Molons forces having begun to skirmish with his, he presently fearing the revolt of his Souldiers to their King, retired five miles back with his Army, and in the night attempted to set upon the Kings unawares. But this project not succeeding, because it was discovered, he was forced next day to fight with the King, but in the fight the left wing turning to the King, he despaired and slue himselfe, and so did many more of his complices. And this was a common remedy in those dayes to men that were in a desperate condition. For Cleomenes also the King of the Spartans, together with 13 others with him, when they were in danger in Egypt to be taken by their enemies, and saw no way to escape, did the like. Antiochus joyfull of this successe, tooke the spoyle, and pardoned the common Souldiers. Then he sent to Achens to challenge him for his treachery, but because he had a greater desire to recover Syria out of the hands of the King of Egypt, he deferred to goe against him, and turned to make this recovery. But by the way I cannot omit the just judgement of God upon Hermias, that out of his hatred against Epigenes, had procured his death most treacherously, as hath been before shewed. Apollonides the Kings Physician being deare unto him, fearing least he might sometime be served by him, as Epigenes had been, upon a time told the King, that he had need looke to himselfe, least by the treachery of Hermias, both he and his freinds should be brought to destruction, telling him how he had dealt with his freind Epigenes. The King confessed that he hated him, and therefore tooke his Physicians counsell to feine himselfe sick for a time, that his Princes might withdraw, and onely one by one take their turns to come and visit him. When Hermias came, it was so ordered, that the Physicians commanded the King to walke out to take the aire, Hermias went with him, and the King after a while withdrew himselfe as weary: whilst Hermias waited his comming out again, he was suddainly dispatched by the Kings attendants, being thereunto before appoynted, and when his death was heard of, so great was the peoples hatred commonly against him, that the women fell upon his wife, and their children upon his children, and stoned them to death. To return to Antiochus his expedition to recover his Kingdome of Syria from the King of Egypt. Ptolomee Energetes was dead, and Ptolomee Philopator was King, invading, as Iustin sayth, the Kingdom by making away both his father and mother, for which cause hee was per antiphrasin called Philopator, a lover of his father. But Polybius sayth, that Ptolomee Energetes dyed of his naturall death, and Philopator succeeding gave himselfe to nothing but to luxury and sensuality, having no regard to the affairs of the Kingdom, but committing them to others. Wherefore Antiochus having great advantage given him hereby goeth to War first against Hyppodromus in Syria, which he took partly by force, and partly by rewards and fair promises drawing some of the chiefe to his side. From thence he was invited by letters from Theodoros a Captain of Ptolomee, who was discontented at him, and meditated revenge, to come to Peolaminis, and had it soon delivered to him, and after that Tyrus and many other Cities. Ptolomee therefore leaving his pleasure gathereth a great Army of 70000 foot, and 4000 horse, and many Elephants, and Antiochus with the like forces came to fight against him neare the City Raphias, upon the borders of Syria. Here many being slain on both sides, the victory at length fell to Ptolomee. Wherefore Antiochus fearing, least being thus foiled by the Egyptians, and Achens also rebelling against him, hee should prove contemptible to his people, sought and made peace with Ptolomee, that he might bend Counterfeit Letters destructive.

Selfe murders many.

Treachery revenged in the kind.
The hatred of the people.Iustin.Polybius.

Against pro-phaning the Temple gods judgments.

3 Machab.

The miraculous working of God for the saving of the Jews.

They that would save life lose it.

bend his forces against Achem, who was then at Sardis. He made a league also with the King of Pergamus, Achem his enemy, and then setting upon Achem, prevailed and slue him. Ptolomee in the mean season sacrificed to the gods for his victory, & coming to Jerusalem he also sacrificed there. But when he would have gone into the most Holy place, Simon the High-priest and the Elders besought him not to presume so to doe, because the Lord had streightly forbidden every man to enter in there except the High-priest, onely once in the yeare, yet he being nothing moved by their intreaties would enter, till that Simon having prayed unto God to keepe his house from being prophaned by the Gentiles; he was suddenly smitten with such feebleness, that they who attended upon him, thinking that he would presently have dyed, carried him away. Being removed to another place, and recovering his strength again, he raged against the Jews, for their keeping of him out of the Temple, as a great indignity offered unto him, and therefore he would make them either to alter their Religion, and to conforme to the Egyptians, or else destroy them all. Wherefore many for feare turned, but most refused, and by earnest prayer sought unto God to avert this great danger. Yet gathered together they were, and Elephants were prepared by drinking much wine, to stir them up to more fierceness to destroy them, and many people round about were gathered together to see the execution. But upon the day appoynted, Ptolomee was taken so with sleepe, that he arose not till late, and forgot what he had determined. But being put in minde of it by the Officers appoynted over this matter, he set the next day for the execution, and when that was come, he thought no more upon it, till that he was likewise stirred as before by his Officers, but then he reviled them and sayd, that the Jews were his most faithfull Subjects, and threatened those that spake against them. Yet after this againe he bent himselfe to destroy them, and caused his Elephants and men to be prepared, and upon a set day went forth with them towards Jerusalem, but the Jews humbling themselves and praying to God, two terrible Angels appeared against his Army, whereat both he and his company were all amazed, and stood still, not able to goe further, then the Elephants were turned back in a fury upon his men, and slue many of them. The King escaping this danger, turned most kinde unto the Jews, and feasted them seven dayes, and at their request gave them leave to proceed against them that in the time of danger had revolted from their Religion, and so many hundreds of them were put to death, and the Jews in remembrance of this deliverance, instituted a feast of 40 dayes to be kept by their posterity, from the 25 of Pachon to the 4 of Epphus.

To return now again to the Romans, after their great victory over the French, they sent forces to invade them in their own Countrey, and the Insubrians their neighbours, slaying many thousands of them. At length the French sued to the Consuls for peace; and when they could not prevail, they hired more Souldiers to the number of 30000, but being again overcome they yielded themselves to the Romans, and so an end was put to the French war.

Touching the Carthaginian affairs in Spain, Hafdrubal being dead, Hannibal although very young being the son of Hamilear, was by the Carthaginians made Generall, who presently began to be famous for his subduing of the Olcads, another rich Nation in Spain, within the river Iberus, where were Mines of Gold and Silver, from whence he proceeded against other parts beyond Iberus, and although he were most strongly opposed, yet he subdued them all. Then he lead his army being 150000 against the Saguntines: for whom because they were Confederates with the Romans, they sent Embassadors to declare so much to Hannibal, and therefore that he should desist from molesting them. But Hannibal not so much as giving them audience, battered the Walls of Saguntum, and at length wan it, but the desperate Citizens had first made fires in the City into which they cast all their Gold and Silver, and some themselves, so that the Carthaginians enjoyed no great prey, when they had taken it. The Roman Embassadors being thus slighted by Hannibal, went first into other parts of Spain, to move them to jyn with the Romans against the Carthaginians then into France, but in vain. Wherefore they returned to Rome, and having told of the destruction of the

SA-

Saguntines, the whole City was greatly moved at it, and grieved that they suffered their associates to perish, and sent no help unto them. Wherefore Embassadors were immediately sent away to Carthage, to complain of this wrong against their league, and to require Hannibal to be delivered unto them, or else to denounce War. The Carthaginians denied any wrong to have been done to the Romans, by the destruction of Saguntum, because it was not mentioned in the league. But the issue was, one of the Embassadors sayd, hee brought in his bosom both War and Peace, and bad them choose, whether they would have, they answered, War, and so preparation was made to a second Carthaginian War, which lasted many years. For Hannibal leaving another Governour, and part of his army in Spain, passed into France and having obtained licence to go through that Country with his army, he by most difficult journeys passed the Alpes, to the losse of half his men. Yet when he came to fight against the Romans, many of the French revolting to him, he at the first prevailed so, that Scipio their valiant Consul was grievously wounded and many slain, inso much that the night comming on, wherein there was a cessation from fighting, he removed away by stealth to a strong hold, to which when Sempronius the other Consul was come with a great Army, another fierce battell was fought, to the destruction of very many on both sides, but specially of the Romans, who were so beaten, that the whole City was put into a great feare. For the Romans being greedy to fight went on with speed against the Carthaginians, of whom Hannibal had placed 1000 horsemen, and 1000 foot in ambush, who came forth in the midst of the fight, and then the victory fell soon to the Carthaginians, but they lost almost all their Elephants, and many men, so that Hannibal had no great joy hereof. It seemed good then to the Senate to send Cn. Scipio into Spain, who overcame Hanno and tooke him prisoner, and partly by agreement and partly by force, tooke all to the River Iberus. And Sempronius was again sent against Hannibal, but nothing memorable was done more in Italy, till that Flaminius and Servilius were Consuls. Then Flaminius going out first to fight against Hannibal, was drawn by his policie into such a place, between high mountains and a marish before them, that they were by the Carthaginians on all parts comming upon them easily slain, unto 15000, and 10000 by force breaking through, were scattered about the Countrey by divers ways returning to Rome, and Flaminius himselfe was also slain. Then Servilius comming with 4000 to helpe his Colleague, not knowing what was done, was encountered by Hannibals brother, and put to flight, when he had lost most of his men in the fight. The Senate hearing of these things knew not what to doe, but they soon resolved to make Qu. Fabius Dictator, that he alone might raise Forces, and order all things for the best for the defence of the City, against which they feared that Hannibal would come next. Fabius then joyning to the Forces which Servilius had, two Legions more, some say foure, went with his Army to the Picen field, where Hannibal was wasting and spoyling the Countrey, wisely taking order, that in all places that were undefenced, the people should depart, and leave no provision to be gotten by Hannibal, even burning that which they could not carry away. So soone as hee was come neere to Hannibal he brought forth his forces to fight, but Fabius kept him together at a distance, still marching in open places, and being alwayes carefull about searching the wayes before he removed, lest his Souldiers should be circumvented. Yea, when the Carthaginians fired the fields in his sight, to provoke him to fight, yet he would not suffer his Souldiers to stir out of their Tents, inso much that Minutius chiefe Captain of the horse did openly blame him of cowardize, and so did many Commanders more, and even at Rome he was for his delaying much traduced. But he drove out the Sommer by such delays, whereby he got the name of Cunctator, and in winter was called home to Rome, Minutius being left with the whole Army alone. When he was gone, Minutius being provoked by Hannibal, fought with him, and slue 6000 of his men, but with the losse of 5000 of his own, yet hereby he came to be in such credit, that thenceforth the power was divided betwixt him and Fabius, wherefore Fabius returning again in the spring, divided all the horse and foot equally betwixt him and Minutius. This was no sooner done, but Hannibal comming again to provoke

Polybius.

Cunctando re-sistuntur.

Hannibals po-
licie.

Hannibals po-
licie.

Gold refused in want.

provoke to the fight, he with his forces went against him, and was brought by Hannibals policie into great danger, many of his men by ambushments being destroyed and his whole Army was then in danger of perishing, but that Fabius seeing it came in with his power and so saved them, slue many of the Carthaginians, and put Hannibal to flight. Hereupon Mimnius acknowledged the wisdom of Fabius, and called him his father and saviour, and abdicating the power committed to him, left all again to the Dictatours disposing. And Hannibal himselfe extolled Fabius, saying, that he had overcome Mimnius, but was by Fabius overcome, and that the cloud which hung so long in the aire, had now rained abundantly. But before this, when Fabius was gone to Rome, because he feared him for his wisdom, he sought to procure him envie, and so to be discharged of his office, by sparing his field which was in his way from spoiling. For by this means he thought it would be conceived that there was some confederacie betwixt them two: But Fabius wisely prevented this by selling the sayd field, and with the price thereof redeeming almost 300 Roman Captains, to his great praise and glory.

Marvellous also was the policy of Hannibal, for besides other stratagems of War, he having many Italian prisoners told them, that hee came northither to fight against them, sent for them and to set them at liberty from the Roman dominion, and so he sent them home gratis to move the minds of their Countrymen to incline towards him, and to revolt from the Romans. At this time the Neopolitans sent 40 dishes of Gold of great weight to Rome, because they were grown poor through these Wars: but thanks being returned, they took only one of them of least weight and let the rest go. And the like they did to those of Vestus, presenting them with the like treasure. Because they thought it not fit, that Rome, the Lady of the World should be beholding to any inferiours for any gifts.

After Fabius, who had done so worthily, great contention was amongst the Romans, about new choosing Magistrates. But Varro by the help of his friends was made Consul, and L. Aemilius his Colleague, the one rash and proud, who detracted from Fabius, the other grave and wise, to whom also Fabius gave wise counsell, instructing him about the manner of Hannibals fighting. These Consuls together with those of the last year marched with a great army of 80000 against Hannibal, whose forces were not much more then half so great. And at the first the Romans skirmishing with some of them that were gone out for booty, slue above 1000, not above 100 of them being slain, at which losse yet Hannibal was not much grieved, as thinking it would be an occasion to make his plot against the Romans, the better to take. He therefore caused his men to forsake their tents, as if they had run away and to hide themselves behinde the mountains, that if the Romans should come to take the spoyle, they might from thence be suddenly upon them and overcome them. Varro hearing of their departure would have presently gone with his army against their tents, but at that time he was stayd by Aemilius, who would needs first have certain horsemen sent out for more certain intelligence. Hannibal then seeing that his plot was discovered returned to his tents, and making fires removed again from thence in the night, leaving some few tents only standing, that the Romans being held with a suspition of treachery might be kept from pursuing him, whilst hee went into Apulia, to get prey for the sustenance of his army, being then in a great stright for want. The Romans after awhile perceiving, that he was gone indeed, pursued him and found him neer a Town called Canna, having pitcht his tents so, as that he had the advantage of the dust blown by the winde in the face of the enemy, and of the Sun dazeling their eyes. When they approached, he provoked them to fight by his Numidian horsemen, but that day Aemilius ruling, he would not begin to fight. The next day, Varro ruling, he without any consultation had with his Colleague prepares to fight, and so Aemilius must needs go with him. The battell was first begun by the horsemen, and the Numidians prevayled, then the foot joyned battle, and Hannibals army being ordered so, that it comes out on both sides with horns like the Moon, soon inclosed the Romans, and overcame and slue them to the number of above 40000, and 3000 were taken prisoners. Aemilius also being first wounded and refusing to flee was slain, and the two Exconsuls, many Tribunes, &c. but Varro with his men fled. This was he, who a little before had brag'd, that if Fabius had been there still, Hannibal would always have stickt to the ribs of Italy, but he would overcome him the first day, that he should come to the sight of him. When Varro had gathered together 10000 of the scattered army to him to Cannus, he certified the Senate of the event. Then such feare came upon the whole City, as never did hitherto, for they thought that Hannibal would soone be at the gates of the City. And so indeed Adherbal one of the great Captains of the Carthaginians advised him to do, but when he refused, he told him, that he knew indeed, how to overcome, but not how to use the victory. The Senate then chose another Dictator M. Junius, and a new Generall of the Horse, Sempronius, who renewed the army with all diligence, and tooke spoils formerly gotten out of the Temples to buy 8000 slaves also for the War, choosing rather to use them, then to redeeme their captives, being by Hannibal offered: for they sayd, that they had no need of such men, as would be taken by the enemy, when they were armed, wherefore hee put the Roman captives to death, and dismissed their sociall helps gratis. The Dictator took up also 6000, who in divers places had been committed for great crimes, sparing their lives upon condition that they should go to this Warfare, and before they went there was according to their superstitious manner sacrificing of men to pacifie the Gods and severe punishments executed upon the Vestall Virgins, that were any way corrupted. Hannibal in the mean season went from one City to another, and took some and some yielded, but others stood out and were kept out of his hands. And to the Carthaginians he sent a messenger to declare his victory, and to ask more ayd, and with him he sent a measure full of Gold Rings taken from the slain Romans, in token of his victory. Junius the Dictators army of 25000 being ready marched out of the City. And now Hannibal with his souldiers having lyen in Capua all Winter, they degenerated so into tendernesse, that at sundry skirmishes many of them were consumed, whereby it appeared, that pleasure and ease do souldiers more hurt then cold frosts and snows and hard travell: for after these in the Alpes *Hannibal*s men were invincible. But now Marcellus being sent to keep Nola, which was ready to fall away to the Carthaginians, Hannibal besieged him there, but Marcellus, when they had beset the City, went out suddenly upon them, and for that time being beaten back by a terrible storm, he went forth again the third day after, when he knew, that many of *Hannibal*s souldiers were absent, and fought so fiercely against him, that he slue 1000 of his men, and took 1600 prisoners, and returned into the City, and then Hannibal was yet more weakned by the revolt of 1200 Numidians and Spaniards, from him to the Romans. Yet when he was sought to by the Samnites to come to Nola, hee brag'd that he would obscure the victory of Canne with that, which hee would win at Nola. And much more did the Scipios in Spain, prevail in Hastubal, so that the Carthaginian affairs began now to decline greatly. The next yeartwo great victories were gotten, the one against Hanno at Capua, by Sempronius, from whence he only escaped of all the army with 2000 men, all the rest being slain or taken, the other against Hannibal by Marcellus, neer unto Nola, where were slain 1000, the getting of a greater victory being hindered by Nero, the Captain of the horse, who came not in to help the foot, as he was appointed. After this Hannibal having kept in his tents a day or two, departed towards Tarentum an haven Town, having great hope, to take it, because some of the chief had been, with him a little before to invite him thither. But hee was prevented by a Roman Garrison put in before his coming, so that he was constrained to go from thence without doing any thing. The Numidians also now turned enemies to the Carthaginians, and joyned with the Romans, their King associating with them. But the Tarentines soon after this revolted to Annibal, which was a beginning of divers victories to the Carthaginians, and overthrowes to the Romans. The occasion was the cruelty used by the Romans against their hostages at Rome: for when they sought to escape away, they being taken being first beaten with rods were cast down headlong and slain. Thirteen therefore of the chief conspired to deliver the City into *Hannibal*s hands, and wrought so cunningly to elude the Roman Governour and

was

Gloviostis Thersa.

Captains
hardly censured.

Brags fore-run
overthrows.

Cruelty lost the Romans
Tarentum.

Fighting hindered marvelously.

Archimedes without all feare of the sword.

Garrison there, pretending to goe forth onely to hunt, that at length Hannibal got in and took it, but the Towre still held out a long time, yet at length Hannibal by craft tooke it, so Naucerus, but according to Livy, the Towre held out till the comming of Levinus the Roman Consul, who tooke Tarentum again, and so all Sicily soone yeilded to the Romans. Whilst Hannibal tooke Tarentum, the Romans besieged Capua, a delectable City, and the next unto Rome in all Italy. The Capuans sent for Hannibal to come and raise the siege, this he attempted with all his might, but in vain, wherefore he removeth to Rome, thinking by this means to draw them away from Capua. But the siege was continued still, and when the Roman Forces came forth to fight against the Carthaginians, such a tempest arose when both Armies were ready to joyne battell, that they were hereby hindered that day. The next day when they were ready to fight again, they were parted by another like sudden tempest. Hannibal seeing this sayd, sometime he had power to have taken Rome, but no minde, now he had a minde to it, but no opportunity; wherefore provision also being scant with him, he removed to the Brutians and Lucans, and left Rome. This the Capuans hearing, despaired of keeping their City any longer, and therefore yeilded it to the Romans. But the chiefe of them fearing the Romans cruelty poyioned themselves.

About this time also Syracuse was taken by the Romans, wherein was Archimedes the Geometrician, who by his art had long defended the City, but then was slain, whilst that he not regarding the enemy breaking in, was busie in making lines upon the ground in the dust. About the same time also the Romans had wars with the Sardinians and subdued them, and with the Macedonians, by reason that Philip then King of Macedonia was confederated with Hannibal against them, when he heard of his great victory at Cannae, whereby the Romans forces were so broken, that it was thought that the Carthaginians would now utterly subdue them, for hereupon many other places fell away from the Romans, amongst which Syracuse was one, with the King thereof, the sonne of Hiero, who had long lived a friend of theirs, and so dyed. But this King who fell away was soone slain, and Syracuse taken and spoyled, as hath been sayd, although five times as great as any other City except Rome, the spoyles thereof equalling the spoyles of Carthage, when it was afterwards destroyed. Things also succeeded well with the Romans in Spain, under the two Scipioes, Pub. and Cneius brothers. For they got many victories, but about the seventh or eighth year after their comming thither, they were both slain, one within a few dayes of another. For when the Carthaginians Generall Hasdrubal perceived that the Romans were but few, and that their chiefe strength stood in the Celtebrians, he craftily drew them from the Romans to him, at which time the two Scipioes were in severall places. And at the same time Masaniissa King of the Numidians comming to help the Carthaginians with his Numidian horsemen, set upon the Romans with Pub. Scipio being in fight with another Army, and the Carthaginian Forces also came in, so that he had to fight with three Armies of his enemies at once, whereby he was soone oppressed and slain, and his Army seeing this fled, but being pursued fell in great multitudes, neither had any escaped but for the night comming on, vvich caused the enemy to retreat. The next morning early the Carthaginians hastened to Hasdrubal, to goe against Cn. Scipio, the Numidian horsemen came to him the same night, although he fearing this danger, made all the haste that he could away. And the next day two Armies more comming against him he was soone overcome and slain, but a great part of his Army by fleeing escaped. By this means the Roman affairs in Spain grew desperate. But Marius the son of Septimus a Roman Knight, vvho had long vvarrd under Cn. Scipio, soone restored them again. For he gathered together the scattered forces of the Romans, and so made up an Army again, by vvithdrawing some also out of the Garrison Towns. Then understanding that Hasdrubal was at Iberus to destroy the remainder of the Romans there, he came upon him unawares, wondering how the Romans should have an Army and Captain again so soon, and put them to flight, and in the night following, he set upon their Tents in one place, for they pitched their Tents in two parts, the one six miles from the other, placing an ambush ambush in the way between. Here the Carthaginians being taken asleepe without any watch, were so slain and confounded, that they knew not what to doe, such as could get away fled towards the other Campe, but the ambush cut them off by the way. The Romans then hastened to that Campe, being animated with such a victory, and there finding all secure, slue them likewise, and tooke many. Nauclerus sayth there were 27000 slain and 800 taken. Thus they being brought low on both sides, were glad to rest for a time, till that the Senate hearing of the death of the two Scipios, and after that none could be found that was willing to undertake that charge, appoynted P. Cornelius, Scipios sonne, who was then 24 years old unto it, who joyed the hearts of all men when he offered himselfe. He therefore being set forth with 10000 men went with 30 sails into Spain, & joyned Martius his forces with them, whom he also used with all honour. He came then to Tarracon, and from thence to New Carthage in the midst of Spain, being the greatest City of importance in all the Kingdom, as abounding with all manner of provision and munition. And to this City he no sooner came, but he overcame it the same day. For Hanno the Governour having placed forces in all parts where he thought any danger to be, set open the gates, and sent out an Army against the Romans Scipios Army, for so he was also called. Pub. Corn. Scipio consisting of 25000 foot and 2000 horse, fought so valiantly that they beat the enemy back, and were even ready to enter the City with them retyring, but that Scipio caused a retreat to be sounded, whereby they were stayed. But presently he perceived such a feare to have surprized the Citizens all within, that he attempted it again, and whilst with some of his men he maintained the fight about the gates, he learning that the marish which lay on one part of the City was dry and passable, went with the rest by that way, and scaled the walls unexpectedly, none resisting, and so tooke it, and Hanno, whom he sent to Rome, the Citizens he set at liberty, and shewed himselfe such a pattern of courtesie and chastity, as that he was beloved and admired of all men. An ancient woman a Princessse making request unto him for his sonnes daughters committed to her keeping, he gave such a charge of them that they were kept safe from all injury. And a very beautifull young woman being presented to him, when she was taken, he by enquiring, learning that she was a Princes wife, sent for him, and restored her to him, and when her father being there with a great summe of gold to redeem her, saw it, he notwithstanding offered him the gold, but Scipio receiving it, called to him her husband again, and gave it all to him, whereupon his heart was so wonne, that he both most highly extolled him in all places, as being like unto the gods, and shortly after came unto him with 1400 horsemen to serve him. Scipio returned after this and the treasure sent to Rome, which he tooke in this Carthage to Farracon, and having spent the winter in reconciling the Spaniards mindes unto him by restoring their pledges which he had taken in Carthage, the next spring he went out to fight against Hasdrubal. But he hearing of it, tooke the advantage of an hill, upon which he placed his Army, fearing upon equall terms to fight with Scipio. For now the Spaniards were by reason of the great humanity of Scipio alienated from him, being also weary of the Carthaginian tyranny. For when they had slain the two Scipios the Father and Uncle of this man, making account that all Spain was now their own, they exacted tribute of them, and tooke for pledges the very wives and children of the chiefe. Hasdrubal therefore placed himselfe at that advantage, but Scipio having encouraged his men from the feare appearing in the enemy, set upon them and slue 8000 of them, and tooke 10000 foot and 2000 horse, but such amongst these as were Spaniards he dismissed gratis, the Carthaginian Captains were sold. After this the three great Captains of the Carthaginians meeting to consult, it was resolved amongst them that Asdrubal should goe into Italy to Hannibal, carrying such Spanish forces as they had with him, lest they should revolt to the Romans, and the other Hasdrubal, the sonne of Gnisco, and Mago who had hitherto kept in the further parts of Spain should hasten thither, and Massinissa King of the Numidians should abide with his 3000 horsemen in the higher parts to hold the Romans play.

Whilst these things were doing in Spain, Hannibal and Marcellus had another

Livius.

Dangers foretold by Southsayers.

great battell in Italy, where at the first encounter there were of the Romans slain 2000. But Marcellus having by Oration stirred up his Souldiers to redeem their credit again, they were ready the next day to fight a second battell, and then there were slain of the Carthaginians 6000 men, which caused Hannibal to retire to another place. And thus with divers successe the wars of Hannibal in Italy had continued 10 years, which made the people so weary, that many Collonies would pay no more money, but would have peace made with the Carthaginians, which much troubled the Senate, but that many more were willing to contribute and brought in great summes of money. Marcellus then being made Consul the fifth time, and Crispinus were appoynted to goe against Hannibal in Apulia. But as part of their Army came from Tarentum towards the siege of Locri, Hannibal placing an ambush in the way, cut off 2000 of them, and tooke 1200, the rest fled back again to Tarentum. Moreover, he espying a certain hill betwixt his Tents and the Romans, which he thought not fit to let his whole Army upon, he sent some Numidian troops of horsemen thither in the night, who keeping close, the two Consuls thought to goe and view the hill, and to take it, before that Hannibal's Forces should come at it. But going with 220 horsemen onely, the Numidians were suddenly upon their backs, and slue Marcellus and wounded Crispinus, and put the rest to flight. Thus he that thought himselfe the onely man able to deale with Hannibal, for want of providence was cut off, when he had so long been acquainted with Hannibal's stratagems, but could never in all that time circumvent him. For Hannibal as a most wise Captain, was ever so wary that, as it became a Generall to doe, he always kept himselfe so as that no unexpected danger could come upon him. But thus did not Marcellus, who also at this time had been warned by the South-sayers, and by dreams of this danger. Hannibal having gotten the corpes of Marcellus used it honourably, and being burnt, sent his ashes in a silver Urne crowned with gold, to his sonnes to be interred. Then the siege of Locri was soon dissolved, and Crispinus dyed of the wounds which he had received. The Roman Senate hearing of the death of their two Consuls, propounded Claudius Nere, and Lucius Salinator to be chosen, as the fittest men which they had, one of these, that is, Lucius, refused, because being Consul once before he tryed the levity of the people, but at length he was perswaded to hold. Then was he sent against Hasdrubal who was now come over the Alpes with a great Army to joyne with his brother Hannibal. But Nero against Hannibal, who had been foiled by Hofilius before his coming, and lost 4000 men. Not being far from the enemy he layd an ambush, and next day provoked Hannibal to fight, which he speedily did, but in the time of the battell the ambush arising, strooke such terrour into the Carthaginians, that they fled and were slain to the number of 8000, and 700 taken, after that in another skirmish he lost 2000. At what time Letters from Hasdrubal to Hannibal were intercepted and brought to the Consul, shewing where he would meet him and the time. Therefore Nero choosing out 6000 foot and 1000 horse, hastens to the other Consul Lucius to acquaint him with it, and to joyne those forces with his against Hasdrubal. And so they together encountering with him got a great victory, Hasdrubal himselfe also being unwilling to live after so great a losse, fighting valiantly amongst the thickest, was slain. The Carthaginians perishing in this fight were fifty thousand, of the Romans eight thousand, the prey taken very great, the news hereof coming to Hannibal, affected him with wonderfull grief. For Nero bringing his brothers head away with him, cast it down in the sight of his African Captains, and set two of them at liberty to goe and tell Hannibal hereof. He then removed his tents to the Bruttii in the uttermost parts of Italy. And the Romans hearing of it rejoyced exceedingly, and gave their Gods thanks in all places. New Consuls were then made, as the old desired, Philo and Metellus, and were both sent against Hannibal. But for so much as Hannibal attempted nothing against the Romans that yeare; they passed their time in doing nothing memorable against him. The next year P. Cor. Scipio, having subdued Spain, returned to Rome, and was with great applause made Consul, that hee might end the Wars with Hannibal in Italy, and so passe over into Africa to subdue Carthage.
And

And therefore Sicily was assigned to him for his Province, from whence the passage was readiest to Africa, when hee was come into Sicily, hee being put in hope to gain the City Locri by certain workmen, that used to work there in the towre, sent with them two Tribunes of the people, and with them 3000 men, who being let in in the night began to kill the Garrison sculdiers, but through the noyse, that was made the rest being stirred up cryed to arms and came in so great multitudes against the Romans, that they were in danger of being oppressed, but that a noyse was heard out of the towre, as if it had been full of Romans, which made them remit off their fiercenesse, untill that Amilcar came on the Carthaginians side, and Phœnicians on the Romans. Hannibal also came another way against them with his men, but Scipio hearing of the danger, wherein the Garrison was hastened from Sicily thither, and came upon the backs of Hannibals men, and the Locrians vveary of the pride and covetousnesse of the Carthaginians revolted to Scipio, whereby the Carthaginians were soon overcome, and were by Hannibal called back into their tents, and so the City came into the Romans hands again. After this a prophesie of Sybil comming forth, that if Idea, the mother of the Gods were brought to Rome, they should be able to drive the forreine enemy out of Italy. Embassadours were sent to Attalus King of Pergamus to fetch her, and and by the vway, the Oracle of Apollo being consulted vvith, hee answered, that they must haue a care to bring this Idea into the Worthiest mans house in Rome. Wherefore with great solemnity P. Scipio, the son of Cn. Scipio being judged the Worthiest, was required to meet the Idoll, being then within 50 miles of the City, together with a company of Matrons, who brought it by turnsupon their shoulders all praying, as it entred, that it would willingly enter and be propitious unto them. But Corn. Scipio having once beaten Hannibal vvith his army into Africa, vvhich much terrified Carthage, and all the parts about. The Carthaginians therefore rayse forces, shut up their gates, and place men upon the Walls. They also sent for King Syphax to Rome, and help them, and for Hanno, the one having 50000 foot, the other 30000 besides horsemen: but Massanissa King of the Numidians, vvith a few horfmen was for the Romans. Scipio then besieged Utica, but being too strong to be taken, he withdrew his army, and because Syphax had sometime tyed himself to the Romans, he tried again to see, if he could win him. But Syphax vvould not upon any other conditions agree, but that a peace must be made between the Romans and Carthaginians, the Romans and their forces going out of Africa, and the Carthaginians out of Italy; each one leaving the other to enjoy the Countreyes now severally possessed by them. But Scipio understanding in the time of this parle, that the towres of Utica vvere made of vvood, vvhen the time of truce was over, caused them in diuers parts in the night to be set on fire, placing his forces so, as that they might knock down such as fled, vvhereby it came to passe, that 40000 of the Carthaginians vvere slain, and 6000 taken prisoners, amongst vvhom vvere many Nobles and Senatours. After this the Carthaginians sought peace again, but in the very time of the truce a Navy of theirs at Sea surprized certain ships of the Romans, vvhereby the peace was hindered. And finally, Hannibal comming, and at a place appointed, having conference with Scipio, so hard conditions vvere by him propounded, that to fighting they went again with all their power & skill, till the Carthaginians were quite overthrowen and slain, or taken. Hannibal only with a few escaping into the City. Syphax also was taken by Massanissa a King confederate vvith the Romans; he had been King of the Numidians, but whilst he vvvas in Spain aiding the Romans, Syphax tooke his Kingdom away and added it to his ovvn. This his vvife hearing came and prostrated herselfe at his feet, craving his protection from the Romans, that shee might not be brought into their power. Massanissa overcome vvith her entreaty and teares, seeing also her admirable beauty, fell in love vvith her, and consented conditionally that shee vvould become his vvife, vvhich shee did, but they enjoyed not one another long. For vvhen Massanissa came to Scipio, he vvvas by him so taxed for this, telling him that as shee had drayn Syphax, so shee vvould him from the Romans, unless he put her avay again. Wherefore hee sent by a trusty servant poyson unto her, telling her, how the case stood.

Idea, the Mother of the gods.

Of beauty the power.

A wife poysoned in love.

stood, which she with an undaunted courage having taken dyed. Then Syphax with other principall prisoners were sent to Rome, with great treasures which were taken in Hannibals Tents. And Scipio prosecuting his victories prepared to besiege Carthage both by sea and by land. But 300 of the principall men of the City were sent out unto him in most submisive manner to sue again for peace, which Scipio fearing lest he should not finish his conquest of Carthage, being so large and strong, before the time of his Consulship was out, condescended unto, but whereas one of his conditions was to have Hannibal delivered alive unto him, it was answered that he was not in Africa, for he was gone with foure horsemen onely to Antiochus. Thus a peace was concluded after the wars begun, and continued by Hannibal in Italy 18 years upon most hard conditions, and a tribute of 200 Talents for 50 years, and many of their ships burnt in their fight. So Scipio returning to Rome held a most glorious triumph, being ever after called Scipio Africanus. But Hannibal coming to Antiochus the King of Syria, was at the first most joyfully received by him. But when he advised the King to make war against the Romans in Italy, offering to goe thither with 100 ships and 10000 men, some of his great ones, lest Hannibal should have all the glory, dissuaded from it, and when Embassadors from Rome came to Antiochus about peace, they cunningly had often conference with Hannibal to make him suspected by the King, which tooke so amongst his adversaries, that they hereupon brought him into suspicion indeed, and the King refused to follow his counsell, to his own great hurt. And then Hannibal fled to Prusia to the King of Bythinia, who had war with Eumenes, and after some battels fought between them, by the mediation of the Romans they were reconciled, and Hannibal was required to be delivered unto them, but he hearing this poysoned himselfe. And the same yeare dyed Scipio also in exile crying out upon his ungratefull Countrey, which did not give a Sepulcher unto him for all his conquests made for them. The occasion of his going into exile was, for that he was accused to have defrauded the State of the treasure which he tooke in Syria, when he overcame Antiochus, for this was by him so heinously taken, that he went voluntarily into exile, and there dyed.

To return now again to the King of Egypt, Ptolomee Philopater, he having reigned 17 years dyed, after a life most luxuriously led amongst harlots, of whom Agathocles was the chiefe and of greatest power, together with her brother Agathocles, a faire young man, with the love of whom the King had been taken also. When the King was dead, Agathocles leasing upon his treasure was slain, and his whores were hanged, although not immediately, but in the first yeare of Ptolomee Epiphanes who succeeded Philopater his father in the Kingdom of Egypt, being but foure years old. For Philopater being dead, Agathocles tooke the administration of the Kingdom upon him, as tutour to the young King, but Antiochus King of Syria, who had prepared an Host to come against Philopater, came therewith, he being now dead, against his sonne, and joyning with Philip King of Macedonia, they thought together to take the Kingdom of Egypt, and to divide it between them. But the people rising against Agathocles slue him, and put the women to death, who by reason of their alliance to him and to the King, took any authority upon them, both Agathocles the mother of Ptolomee Epiphanes, and her mother, and all the cognation. Thence an Embassage was sent to the Romans, desiring them to take the Orphan King into their protection, which they readily did, and sent Embassadors to the two Kings, requiring them to abstain from the Kingdom of Egypt, and M. Lepidus to be tutour to the young King. But the Embassage being despised, Antiochus went on, and tooke Phoenicia belonging to Egypt. And then sayth Jerome, Judea being between the Forces of Antiochus and the Captains of Ptolomee, was divided, some taking part with Antiochus and some with Ptolomee. Then Onias the High-priest with many Jews went down into Egypt, and being well received, had Heliopolis granted unto them, and there he built a Temple. Next unto Phoenicia Antiochus tooke Calasria, then Ptolomee sent out Scipio with a great Army against him, who was overcome, and thereupon the Jews in Jerusalem revolted all to Antiochus, re-

Naucler.

Scipio dyeth.

Justin.

Hieronymi.

receiving him into their City, and helping him to win the towre, which was still held by the Egyptians, for which he gave them thanks. All this while the Romans were in warre with Philip of Macedon, with whom they begun, the rather because he had formerly been in league with Hannibal against them. But at length he being overcome, and seeking peace with the Romans and obtaining it, Antiochus sent an embassage to them also to shew that he was now about to make peace with Ptolomee, and to give him his daughter Cleopatra to wife, and to restore unto him all the Provinces which he had taken from him. And accordingly this contract was made with him the seventh year of Ptolomees reign, and accomplished, Anno 13.

To return again to the Romans, peace was no sooner made with the Carthaginians, then they began a War against Philip the King of Macedonia, which was called the Philippick War, when Sulpitius and Aurelius were Consuls. The cause, as hath been already touched, was, for that Philip entered into a league with Hannibal, when he was in Italy, hoping by his help to subdue the Romans, and not to be subject to them, as in times past the Macedonians were not subject to any, but extended their Dominion far and wide over all others. When this War was propounded by the Senate, and the question was put to the people, they by their Tribune cryed out against it, desiring now at length after so much Warre, to live in peace. But Sulpitius who was to be over this War, consulted with the gods, and had answer that it should succeed well, wherefore by an Oration he moved the people, shewing them great and weighty reasons of it, and so prevailed with them. But whilst these things were in agitation, and prayers were made for their good success, news suddenly came, that the French under Amilcar, to the number of 40000, had come and taken Placentia, and were marched to Cremona, wherefore Aurelius with his Army was sent against them, and his Army going before, joyning with L. Lucius, whose forces were 5000, he with them to the offence of the Consul before his coming, being provoked by the French, greedy of battell, fought with them and overcame them, slaying and taking 35000, together with Amilcar himselfe, and three other great Captains who then perished. Sulpitius the other Consul in the meane season sayled into Macedonia, and because winter was then beginning, he did nothing till the spring following, but upon a Petition made unto him by the Athenian Embassadors, whose City was then in danger to be besieged by King Philip, he sent unto him to will him to refrain from the Cities of Greece and Ptolomees Kingdom, and to submit himselfe to the judgement of the Senate for wrongs done unto the Rhodes, or else the Romans would make war upon him. Philip answered, that he wished that the Romans would not breake their Covenant with him, and if they did, he would prepare valiantly to resist them. Upon this answer they prepared on both sides to the war, but Philip being divers times overcome, when he had sometimes before sought peace in vain, because he would not agree to the terms of the Roman Consul, at length sought peace, submitting himselfe to such terms as were propounded and obtained it. Then all the States in Gracia, before held under by him, were set at liberty, which did strike them into a strange admiration and applause of the Romans vertue. Then Embassadors were sent to Antiochus King of Syria, to make friendship with him, if he would also permit the Greeke Cities under his dominion to be free. About which there was much and long disputation sundry times, till at length both he prepared to fight against the Romans, and they against him, but they first by sacrifices consulted with their South-ayers, and when they promised all good success to be shewed by the entrails, they with confidence, and yet great care and circumspection proceeded, and thus they commonly used to doe, and when they had prevailed against any Nation, appointed dayes for solemn thanksgiving to their gods, as they were then blindly led: as after the subduing of Macedonia, there were five dayes appointed. Acilius the Consul had the care of this war with Antiochus committed unto him, who therefore sayled over into Greece, according to some with an Army of 10000, according to others of 20000. Philip King of Macedonia, and Ptolomee of Egypt, offered their helpe to the Romans, but they had onely thanks, and their help

The piety of the Romans.

help refused. Antiochus because he also had but a small Army of 10000 foot, and 500 horse, takes the advantage of the streights of Termopylae to fight in. But even there having fortified himselfe most strongly, he was so overthrowen, that he fled away onely vvith 400 men, the rest being slain.

Then Acilius fought against the Etolians, the associates of Antiochus, and having subdued them would have followed him over into Asia, where hee thought himselfe secure. Yet by the perswasion of Hannibal, who was yet with him, hee made great preparations for the War, which was first begun at Sea by Livius Admirall of the Romans, and the Antiochians were beaten, many ships being taken, some drowned, and the rest put to flight. But the Kings Navall forces being renewed again by Polixenidas his Admirall, hee fought by policy to circumvent the Navy of the Rhodians, consisting of 25 ships, over which was Pausistratus. For hee himselfe was a Rhodian, and bare an hatred against Pausistratus, ever since his banishment from thence. Wherefore hee now meditating revenge sent unto him an offer to deliver all Antiochus his ships under his government into his hands, requiring no recompence but restitution to his Countrey, Pausistratus accepted the offer and the time in the night appointed, when hee comming secretly according to appointment was suddenly betet round with 70 ships, and his Navy taken, and he valiantly fighting slain. This notwithstanding, the Rhodians desirous of revenge sent out 20 ships more, which being joyned to the Romans, fought against the Antiochians, and overcame them, and finally, gat the dominion of the Sea. But before this, Acilius his time being expired, and another Consul, Scipio comming in place, he delivering his forces over to him returned to Rome, and Scipio after some delay in Gracia, whilst these things were doing, sayled into Asia, which strook such terrour into Antiochus, that hee sent Embassadours to him to sue for peace, leaving Antiochia a chief City in Asia, full of all manner of provision, and munition unto him. Scipio propounded conditions so hard beyond these that Antiochus offered, that he was forced to fight. Wherefore he gathered together a great army consisting of more then 70000 men, the Consul having not full 30000, so Appian: but Livy addeth 12000 horsemen, and Nauclerus sayth, that his whole army was 30000: yet when they joyned battell, although they fought valiantly, and sometime purfome part of the Roman army to flight, yet they by the encouragement of other Captains comming on again strook such terrour into their enemies, that they soon overcame and routed the whole army of Antiochus, slaying 50000 men, and putting the King to flight, so that he ceased not, till he was gone out of Asia into Syria. Then he sent Embassadours again to sue for peace, giving them power to conclude upon any terms. Scipio then granted him peace upon condition first to pay all the charges of the War, viz. 15000 talents, whereof 500 down, and 2500 when the Senate had confirmed the peace, and for 12 years 1000 talents per annuum. 2 to abstain from all Asia on this side of the Mountain Taurus. 3 to deliver 20 hostages, whereof Hannibal to be one, but he escaped to the King of Bythimia, as was sayd before. 4 to pay to Eumenes, King of Pergamus, 40 talents for his damages. When the hostages were sent, the Kings younger son, called Antiochus, was sent for one. Before Antiochia left by Antiochus, hee might have agreed upon easier conditions: but after not, because, sayd Scipio, the case now differed. Thus Lu. Scipio chosen Tribune purposely, his brother Corn. Scipio being joyned as Legat vvith him, having prevayled over Asia, had the name Asiaticus given unto him, as his brother had Affricanus: but they were both evill rewarded at the last by the people, who accused them for defrauding the State of the the treasure vvwhich they had taken in those Wars. When Antiochus was thus confirmed to his Kingdome of Syria, he sayd, that he thanked the Roman Consul for easing him of so much care and trouble as was before upon him, no more now being to be taken by him, then his own Kingdom of Syria required. When the news of this conquest came to Rome, three dayes vvere appointed for thanksgiving, and 40 greater sacrifices. But still the Etolians remayned unsubdued, vvherefore Fulvius a new chosen Consul was sent against them, who came vvith his army against the City Ambracia, where he vv as a long time valiantly resisted. But at length, the City being in danger to be taken, the Etolians sought peace and obtained

A stratagem.

This delay was in Helle-spont, where when P. Scipio came, the days of sacrificing being then, he for so much as he was a Salian, ought not to go away in 30 days, wherefore he stayed there so long.

The peoples ingratitude.

Thankfulness for dominion lessened.

teined it for 500 talens, whereof 200 to be payd down, and the other 300 in six years, and it was conditioned that they should never doe any hostile act against any City in league with the Romans, and for performance of this, 40 hostages to be given, none of them being under 12, and none above 40 years old. Antiochus the King of Syria, after the losse of Asia, and his becoming tributary, dyed the second yeare, Anno Regni 27, and Seleucus Philopater his sonne succeeded him, happily being called Philopater, for the wars which he had valiantly fought in for his father against the Romans and others: but during all the time of his reign, which was 12 years, he lived idly, and did nothing worth remembrance, but that he sent Demetrius his sonne for a pledge to Rome, instead of Antiochus his brother, and called him home. But this was ill requited, for within a short time after his brothers return, he was slain by Heliodorus through treachery. Yet Polybius sayth, that Antiochus had no hand in it, for he was but upon the way in returning from Rome, and that Heliodorus did it out of ambition, thinking that whereas hee had ruled hitherto over all under the King, he would now, the King being taken away, make himselfe King. But he was prevented, for Eumenes King of Pergamus, together with his brother Attalus, came upon him, and slue him, and brought in Antiochus to be King, thus making him their friend. And this Heliodorus is thought to be he that came into the treasury of the Lords house so proudly to rifle it, to gather money for the King, wherewith to pay his tribute, and so, it may be noted, how justly God cut off the King by the same man, that he had used to rob God for him. The History is set forth at large, 2 Machab. 3: whereby we may also understand in what state the Jews were in those dayes.

Touching Philip the King of Macedon in those dayes, he having made his peace with the Romans, as was formerly sayd, could not through the haughtinesse of his minde, long endure the conditions of peace put upon him. For a time indeed he was so obsequious and liberrall towards them, and fought so courageously for them, that his sonne Demetrius was restored to him, whom he had sent as a pledge to Rome, and his tribute was remitted, and he received as a friend. But then he did many things against the Athenians and others, for which he was complained of before the Senate, and therefore sent his sonne Demetrius to answer for him. He behaved himselfe so well and so discreetly sought to salve his fathers faults, that the Senate rested satisfied, and sent him back with this answer written: that for the sake of Demetrius they were content to passe over all his offences, and that he should have peace still. At this Philip was not a little offended, seeing his sonne to be preferred before him, which made him jealous, that by the help of the Romans, he might be set up shortly for King. Persens his other sonne perceiving this, sought to stir up his father more and more against him, till that a means of his destruction was found out, and a colour to justify it, viz. that he meditated to flee to the Romans, and so he was by one appoynted to keepe him company by his father circumvented and poysoned at a sacrifice, which was instituted purposely. But this cruell and unnaturall act of his father went not unrevenge, for he was soon after much troubled for it in his minde, and sometimes terrified by his ghost appearing unto him and his sonne Persens, whom he so much loved, that had stirred him up against his brother, came to be hated by him, in so much that he sought his destruction also. But he being aware of it fled and kept so far off that he could not take him, yet he determined to prevent him of the Kingdom after his death, by setting up one Antigonos to be King. But before that he could doe this, he being over oppressed with sorrow and misery ended his life, and Persens came with speed, and tooke possession of the Kingdom.

In this time Ptolomee Epiphanes the King of Egypt dyed, when he had reigned 24 years, according to some 23, and left his Kingdom to Ptolomee Philometor his sonne who was so called per antiphrasin, because his mother hated him so much, that shee procured his banishment in his fathers life time, that shee might have opportunity to prefer her younger sonne Phiscon to the Kingdom. But the father being dead, Ptolomee got the Kingdom, and his mother Cleopatra was afterwards slain by Phiscon, who shee had so much loved. And about foure years

Seleucus King of Syria.

Polybius.

Murther revenged.

Gods judgements iust.

A father against his own son.
Sacrifice abused to poysoning.

Ptol. Philom.

Eunucius Onias
High-priest.
Anno Mundi
3750.

2 Machab. 4.

1 Machab. 10.

Iosephus. antiq. lib. 12. c. 6.

Persus King of Macedon.

Cruelty in Persus.

after Antiochus called Epiphanes, the brother of Seleucus obtained the Kingdom of Syria. Demetrius his son being then but a child of 10 years old, & a pledge at Rome.

Touching the Jews affairs, Onias, according to Eunucius, succeeded his father, called Simon Justus, in the High-priesthood, in which he continued 39 years, beginning, Anno 8 of Ptolomee Philopater. Of the sufferings of the Jews in his time by Ptolomee, and their miraculous preservation, see before, as also, into what danger Iudea was brought through the covetousness of Onias, but delivered again by Ioseph his nephew, which Ioseph was Prince of the Jews sixty years. And after him succeeded Ianna Hircanus second, 16 years, who was the last Prince of the house of David, and was slain by Antiochus Epiphanes in the assault of a Castle which he had made upon Jordan, but this Hircanus, who was the son of Ioseph, seeing that he was in danger by Antiochus, slew himself, as hath been before shewed, according to Iosephus, Ant. lib. 12. cap. 5. After this, the High-priests were the chief Governours amongst the Jews, and Onias being dead, they were made by the Kings of Syria both Iason, who sat three years, and he instituted a Gymnasium in Ierusalem, for the exercising of youth after the Heathen manner of the Græcians, and Menelaus 12 years, and Alcimus four years. Then the High-priesthood having ceased five years, fell to the Asmonai, viz. to Ionathas brother to Judas Machabeus, who held it 19 years, thus Eunucius briefly, placing yet the beginning of Iason, anno 6 of Ianna Hircanus. But Iosephus more at large sayth, that Onias being dead, Antiochus gave the High-priesthood to his brother Iesus, who called himself Iason, and then upon some displeasure taken against him, he being put down, his youngest brother Onias was preferred, who called himself Menelaus. Then the people took part with Iason, and Menelaus fled to Antiochus, and offered to set up the Heathen exercises of the Græcians at Ierusalem, and to cause the people to turn Græcians. Upon these conditions he was sent back to Ierusalem, and the contrary faction was threatened, so that many forsaking Gods Ordinances, lived after the manner of Heathens. And Antiochus growing more powerful by the subduing of Egypt, came to Ierusalem and took away the treasure of the Temple, and commanded swines flesh there to be sacrificed, forbade all circumcising of their children, and other things to be done contrary to Gods Laws, for disobeying which, many suffered cruel death, and others were for feare corrupted. Then the Samaritans who had a Temple upon Mount Gerizim, having hitherto affected, to be counted the Jews kintred, and such as descended of Abraham, sent Embassadors to Antiochus to let him understand that they were not of the Jews kintred, but came of the Medes, and that they would be all one people in manners and Religion with the Græcians, calling their Temple no more the Temple of the Lord, but the Temple of Iupiter of Greece, whereupon he granted them peace.

To return to Persus the King of Macedonia, he having attained the Kingdom, sought the friendship of all the Countries of Grecia and sent to the Carthaginians to enter into a league with them, that he might be able to rebell against the Romans, which his father Philip had meditated before, and he since, because his brother Demetrius had been in so much favour with them, he should by their helpe have been preferred to the Kingdom. He was also a most wicked man, for he murdered his own wife, and sending for the man, who had poisoned his brother Demetrius, under a pretence of rewarding him, he put him to a cruel death. And hearing that Eumenes King of Pergamus, a confederate of the Romans, had been at Rome to inform against him, he by treachery, as he returned, sought his destruction. Yet he sent Embassadors to Rome, pretending a desire to continue in their friendship, but they were rejected, and so the Macedonian War began the second time, which was fought with divers fortune, Persus at the first, prevailing, and killing and taking many of the Romans, but soon after he was put to flight, and his men to the number of 20000 perished, and in four years he was brought to that passe, that he fled out of his Kingdom, leaving it as a prey to the Romans, and then being pursued, and forsaken by all men, he finally delivered himself into their hands, and was carried away to Rome, and so the Macedonian Kingdom ended in him, being the 16 from Alexander the Great, when it had continued 153 years.

A marvellous thing happened about that time viz. a totall eclipse of the Moon, as Pliny writes, and this was foretold by Sulpitius a Roman Pretor, and afterwards Consul.

To return now again to Antiochus Epiphanes, he comming to the Kingdom of Syria after the death of his brother, as was sayd before, Demetrius being put by, who being but ten years old, and then at Rome was the right heire, tooke it upon him at the first, but as a Protector in the minority of Demetrius, but after a while he reigned as King. Then having a pretence, because Ptolomee Philometor was very young also, he sought the Protectorship of that Kingdom, because Ptolomee was his sisters sonne, and being herein resisted by the Lords of Egypt, he prepared to war against them, and prevailed. Then making a fair shew to Ptolomee, in his name he had almost all the Cities of Egypt yielded unto him, and placed in them new Governours, and carryed away great riches from Egypt, so as none of his predecessours the Kings of Syria, had ever done before, according to Dan. 11. 24. But Alexandria, wherein the younger brother of Ptolomee was, that by his mother had been set up against him, he having a while besieged in vain, pretending to bring it to the obedience of Ptolomee the eldest, he was constrained at length to leave, and to return into Syria. Then Ptolomee sought to be reconciled to his brother, and by means of friends was, and they two divided the Kingdom between them. Antiochus hearing this, soon bewrayed his dissimulation, formerly used towards Philometor, in that he was so far from shewing a good liking of this agreement of the two brothers his nephews, as that he was more enraged, and prepared to make fierce warre against them both, being the bolder so to doe, because the Romans were now busied in the Macedonian warre, so that Ptolomee could not have helpe from them. At that time strange signes were seen over Ierusalem, of Armies fighting 40 dayes together, after which followed great slaughters in Ierusalem by means of Iason, who had attained the Highpriesthood for money, which he promised. For he not like a Priest but a Tyrant, secretly armed 1000 men, and comming suddenly upon the City, slue very many, untill that the Citizens being gathered together made resistance, and drove him out of the City, after which he fled from one Courtey to another, till he miserably perished in Lacedemonia. In the spring, vvhhen Antiochus had all things ready, he set forward towards Egypt, and the two Ptolomees hearing of it, sent Embassadors to him to stay him, by offering to give him satisfaction, if in any thing they had given him occasion to come against them. He answered, that he vould come on vvith his Army, unlesse all Cyprus vvere yielded to him, and Pelusium, and the grounds about the Pelusian mouth of Nilus, &c. appoynting also a time within vvch they should bring him answer. But the Ptolomees had also sent Embassadors to Rome, to desire Legats to be sent to Antiochus, to forbid him to invade Egypt, vvch thing they speedily obtained, and Popilius vvith others vvvas immediately sent, vvho made such haste that they met Antiochus, vvhen he vvvas going against Alexandria, and after salutation, Popilius immediately delivered the writing of the Senate unto him, requiring him to make answer, and vvhen the King delayed, saying, that he vould consider of it, he vvwith his staffe made a circle round about him, telling him that he should make answer, before that he vvvent out of that circle, or else not at all. The King hearing this vvvas much troubled, but not daring to doe otherwise, answered, that he vvould obey the vvwill of the Senate, vvhereupon Popilius gave him his right hand in token of friendship, and so he returned out of Egypt again. And of this Daniel prophesied long before, saying, He shall return to the South after a certain time, but the last shall not answer to the first: for the tryers of the Romans shall come upon him and smite him, that is, with terror, in case that he goeson, and so he shall return, &c. Antiochus comming out of Egypt again, vvvent against Ierusalem, because hee vvvas told, that hee vvvas there reported to bee dead, and the Citizens rejoiced at it, hee also conceived that they vvould bee ready to fall to Ptolomee King of Egypt, rather then to live under his obedience. Wherefore hee brake vvwith his Army into the City, and slue men, vvomen, and children, three dayes together, to the number of eighty thousand,

Sights appear in the ayre.

2 Machab. 5. 9.

The Romans power over Kings.

Dan. 11. 29.

and tooke 40000, whom hee sold for slaves. Then hee spake proudly against the Jews and their God, and of his own power, and entered into the most holy place. Menelaus, who was then High-priest, going before him for Honours sake. And taking from thence all the most precious things, to the value of 180 Talents of gold and silver, he returned into his own Countrey. And after two years he sent two Governours to Ierusalem to prophane the Temple with impure Sacrifices, to make the Jews to eat swines flesh, to prohibit them circumcising, and to have the books of the Holy Scripture, and with whomsoever they were found, to put them to a cruell death, and likewise such as would not transgresse in other things before named, or refuse to sacrifice to Idols. These comming therefore with great forces, burnt a great part of the City, and brake down the walls, and slue many of the Jews that would not goe from the Law of their God, amongst whom some were singular, as Eleazarus an old man of 90, and a woman with her seven sonnes, who were put to greatest torments, as is shewed in the Machabees. Now when the condition of the Jews grew desperate, Mattathias and his sonnes who fled from Ierusalem, stood for the defence of the Law of God against their enemies. This Mattathias was the sonne of Iohn, the sonne of Simeon, of the sonnes of Iosab, who was the first of the 24 divisions of Priests, comming of Aaron in the dayes of David, and his great grandfathers name was Assamoneus, from whom they were called, Assamoneans, who were of that family. He had five sonnes, Iohn, Simon, Indas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. The place unto which he fled with his sonnes was Mount Modin, which was a Village. And it being heard by the Heathen, Bacchides a bloody man was sent to compell the Jews there to sacrifice to Idols. Then he with many words exhorted Mattathias to sacrifice, promising that if hee would so doe, he should be numbered amongst the Kings friends, and when he could not prevaile, a Jew was brought, who sacrificed before his face, that by his example hee might be moved. But Mattathias enraged at it, ran upon him and slue him, and the party that brought him also, then he fled with his sonnes out of Modin to other solitary places, crying out when he went, to all such as had any zeale for the Law of God, to follow him, and so many of the Jews followed and joyned with him, and their wives and children. But when the Heathen knew of it, they assaulted them upon the Sabbath day, when they would make no resistance, and slue a thousand of them, but Mattathias with his sonnes escaped, and unto them resorted the Synagogue of the Assideans, who are thought to be Essenes, men of great zeale, and a most strict life. Then they resolved hereafter, if they should be set upon on the Sabbath day, to fight in their own defence. And they went about and beat down the Altars which the Heathens had set up, and slue many of those that had revolted to idolatry, and then Mattathias being very aged, dyed, committing the Captainship to his sonne Indas, who was surnamed Machabees, as being most valiant, adjoyning Simon who was most wise unto him for a counsellour, exhorting them to stand constantly for the Law of God, and blessing them, and promising successe, and that the Tyrant Antiochus should come to ruine shortly.

Iosephus Getionides sayth, that Mattathias before his death took an horn of oyle and anointed his son Judas High-priest, a trumpet being sounded and all the people crying out, vivat nobis. Egysippus sayth, that he was anointed by Iosephus in his fathers presence with great acclamations of the people, and Iosephus acknowledged him to have been his eldest son, but yet no High-priest, but a Prince and Captain, the High-priest at this time being Menelaus, and after him, Alcimus, then 5 years comming between, as was layd before, out of Fnuccius, Jonathan, but elswhere he maketh Judas the successor of Alcimus in the high-priesthood, who sate three years. To leave this therefore whether hee were now made High-priest or no, as uncertain, because in the Machab. History his principality is only spoken of, which began anno 1799 of Menelaus his High-priesthood, anno 10, and continued six years; hee succeeding his father, who had continued Captain one yeere, gathered together of such Jews as feared God and stood for his law 6000, and with these he made many excursions against divers Castles in thenight, and de bel. iud. cap.

*Ios. ph. lib. 1.
1.*

*Lib. 2. cap. 8.
Lib. 12. fin.*

slue many, and took spoils. Then Apollonius Prince of Syria hearing of it gathered a great army and went against him, but Judas with his men soon routed his army, and slue Apollonius himself, and took his sword, wherewith he fought ever after. Then Seron, who was chief under Apollonius renewed the army and sayd, that he would go and slay Judas and those, that were with him and get him a name. And when he came neer with a number of wicked men, the army of Judas seeing so great a multitude was much affraid. But hee having encouraged them fell suddenly upon his enemies, and slue Seron and many of his army to the number of 800 pursuing them in the descent of Bethoron, and the rest fled into the land of the Philistims, leaving unto Judas and his men great spoils, which they divided amongst them. By this means Judas his fame was spread into all parts, and he became terrible to all his enemies. The news of these things being brought unto Antiochus, he was greatly incensed against the Jewish Nation, and therefore gathered a great army, and brought his treasures wherewith it might be paid for an whole year. But then finding his treasures so vvasht that hee could not subsist without a new supply of money, he taking half of his army went into Persia to gather more tribute there, and committed the other half to a kinsman called Lysias, bidding him to send them out against the Jews, and to root them out from being a people, and to bring in new inhabitants into their Countrey, he remayning to govern his Kingdom untill his return, and to educate his son. Lysias then appointed Nicanor, Ptolomee and Gorgias, mighty men, and of the Kings friends to go against the Jews, delivering unto them 40000 foot and 7000 horse, and commanding them to kill up all the Jews, and out of their spoils to pay the tribute of 2000 talents due to the Romans. Judas Machabeus hearing of this together vvith the Jews, assembled together in Maspah, to fast and pray in sackcloth and ashes, because Ierusalem lay desolate, being inhabited only by strangers. And having prayed he encouraged his men, whom he divided amongst his brethren, vvhom he made Captains, by putting them in minde of the great overthrow of the Assyrians in *Sanneherib*s time, vvhen he came against the Jews, and of a more late overthrow of 120000 Galatians, given by 6000 Jews, vvith vvhom indeed many Macedonians were, but fought not. Whilt the Jews were thus preparing to fight, Gorgias took vvith him 5000 foot and a 1000 horse thinking to come upon Judas by night. But he having some notice of it, prevented him by comming against his vvhole army, being yet confused and overcome, and slue of his men 9000, wounded many more, and put the rest to flight, that is, not the men with Gorgias, but the rest of the army left with Nicanor. For in the night, wherein Gorgias thought to come upon Judas, he went away with 3000 men, and came the next morning to *Nicanor*s host unexpectedly, Gorgias being gone, and gave them this great overthrow. And not staying to take the spoyle they prepared to fight with Gorgias, who was comming to rescue Nicanor, but so soon as his army came within the sight of the Jews, they were greatly affraid and fled, seeing also the tents on fire. Then Judas and his Jews returned and took the spoils which were great, and keeping the Sabbath the next day, prayed God and prayed unto him to perfect their deliverance from their sins and enemies. But Nicanor fled to Antiochia alone, carrying the news of the armies overthrow, and saying, that God fought for the Jews, & that they were innumerable, which affected Lysias with wonderfull grief, because he feared the wrath of Antiochus. Then Judas had a battell also with Timotheus, destroying his army consisting of 20000 men. This Timotheus was Captain of all the forces which came against the Jews in Gilead. 1 Mac. 5. 11. But Gorgias being vexed for his overthrow, gathered a greater army together then before, viz. of 60000 foot and 5000 horse, and went to fight against Judas, but he having first prayed with 10000 men set upon them, and prevayled so that he slue 5000 of his enemies and the rest fled. Wherefore Judas came to Ierusalem, and having exhorted his brethren fell to repaying of the Lords Altar, and to purging of the Temple, and to rebuild the decayed places thereof, as is more largely shewed, 1 Machab. 4. oblations being then made there, and the Temple dedicated, & the Feast of the Dedication instituted. The time, when these things were done, is sayd to be the 25 of the moneth Kislee, being the ninth moneth, upon the day that that the Heathens first set up the r abomination in the Temple. But how long it was from the time of prophaning it to the time of purifying it, wee must gather from 1 Machab 1. 21, 30. and Chap. 4. 52. where it is said, that in the year 143 of the Greeks reign, Antiochus the Illustrious, who had begun to reign anno 137, came and destroyed the Jews, and robbed the Temple. And two years after hee sent a Governour to rule there, who immediately converted the Temple to an house of Iupiter, setting up that Idoll there. But anno 148, the Temple was again purified: so that from the polluting were three years, but according to Daniel 1290 dayes from the taking away of the daily sacrifice, that is, three years and 95 days, and if we allow so many dayes to come between the sacrifice ceassing and the setting up of this abomination in the Temple, there will be no difference. Then Judas and his Jews built the ruined walls of Ierusalem again, and went out and fought with and subdued the Edomites and Ammonites, and many other peoples round about, dividing part of his army to his brother Simoon, whom he sent into Galilee, and he went into Gilead, 1 Machab. 5. and the cause of this his expedition is sayd to be, because they conspired together to destroy the Jews, after that they heard of their repaying of the Temple and City, being greatly vexed at it. When these things were thus done, Antiochus Epiphanes hearing thereof was so stricken, that he fell sick, and having lyen so many dayes, seeing death approach, hee confessed that his cruelty towards the Jews was the cause, and then committing his Kingdom to Philip, he dyed anno 149. of the Gracian Empire, and his son Antiochus Eupator reigned in his stead, so that this Tyrants whole time was but 12 years, and although God for the punishment of his peoples sins permitted him not only to destroy them, but also to offer contumely to his own Majesty by blaspheming him, and proudly committing insolencies against the place of his habitation, which in times past he punished immediatly in Heliodorus, Selencus and Ptoleme Philometor, yet he suffered him not above five years, and after the great prophanation of the Temple but three years and odde dayes, then by his judgments extorting a confession from him took him away, when he had been vexed long at the losse of his men, and his great expences to his extreame disgrace. Now this Antiochus was plainly a fore-runner or figure of Antichrist, who sits in the Temple of God, as he entred it, and exalts himself above God as hee did, and prevayleth 1260 dayes, or three years and an half, as hee did, but then comes to perdition, being cast into the lake, where the smoake of his torment ascends for ever, as he is further declared to have dyed in great torment and misery, 2 Mach. 9. being first smitten, when he raged most against Ierusalem, and threatened to make the whole City a burying place, as is there more at large to be seene. Antiochus Eupator succeeding his father, being made King, when he was young by Lysias, whom his father had made Viceroy in his absence at Antiochia, went on in the steps of his wicked father against the Jews, and was soon cut off also. But he was first instigated against them by those of the Towre of Zion, who having hem'd in the Jews about the Sanctuary, were assaulted by Judas Machabeus, and being in danger sent to Eupator to crave his help, complaining greatly of the Jews unto him. Upon this he being stirred up, prepared an Army of 100000 foot and 20000 horse to goe against them, together with many Elephants, viz. 32, and came to Bethzura, where Judas encountered with him, and slue 600 of his men, but seeing his great power, he departed from him to Ierusalem to fortifie it, and then Bethzura being yeilded, the King went on against Ierusalem and besieged it, so that the Jews within were brought to a great streight for want of victuals. But such was the providence of God over them, that news now came, that Philip a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes, and by him appoynted before his death to be tutour to his sonne, was returned from Persia, to take under this pretext the Kingdom upon him. Wherefore Lysias hearing it, perswaded Eupator to agree with the Jews, and to return, as the affairs of the Kingdom required. Yet when he had joyned hands with Judas, and given him his faith, and both he and his Princes had sworne unto him, whereupon the Jews left the Towre of Zion, he seeing the strength of the place, contrary to his oath, brake down the walls of Ierusalem, and departed to Antiochia where Philip reigned, but vvas soon expelled by

1 Mach. 6.

Quod deferitur non auferitur.

Antiochus Eupator.

1 Mach. 6. 18.

Perjury not long unpunished

by Eupator taking the City by force. Yet he enjoyed it not, for Demetrius the son of Seleucus, to whom of right the Kingdom of Syria belonged, being hitherto an hostage at Rome, now though not permitted to come home, and taking the Kingdom upon him, his subjects apprehended Antiochus Eupator, and Lysias, and brought them unto him, but he not willing, that they should come into his sight, commanded them to be carried away and slain, which was done accordingly, and this was anno 151 of the Græcian Kingdom, so that this enemy of Gods people, and perjured Truce-breaker reigned not any longer, then from anno 149. to anno 151, which was not full two yeers, but all this is otherwise related, and with difference in the times, 2 Mach. 13, 14. and before that, Chap. 9. 10, 11, 12. are divers other Histories of ayd sent from heaven to help Judas, and many other things, which because I see not, how they can be reconciled with 1 Machab. I omit, as fabulous. For the manner of Demetrius his coming from Rome. Polybius hath it thus. He having spoken for himself before the Senate to be sent home into his Kingdom, being now 23 yeers old, and his request denied, and Uncles son made King, stole away from Rome, and obtained his Kingdom, as was aforesaid. Demetrius being King, Alcimus an ambitious man, and many other Jews with him came unto him with a complaint against Judas for destroying the Kings friends, and to desire of him the High-priesthood. The King hearing them granted his desire, and sent him to Bacchides a Ruler under him in those parts; that he with his forces might joyn with him against Judas. Then Bacchides went feigning, that he came peaceably, but Judas suspecting him would not come at him, yet others both Priests and Elders were deceived by him and circumvented, and slain to the number of 60 persons. This the Jews took so heinously that they banded together against Bacchides his men, and Alcimus with whom he left them for his ayd to attain the High-priesthood, he himself going to the King. And when Alcimus saw, that he was not able to withstand the force of the Jews under their Captain Judas Machabæus coming against him, he also returned to the King and exasperated him more, so that he sent Nicanor against the Jews with a great army. But Judas having prayed, encountered him with only 3000 men, and slue of his 500. Then Nicanor went to the Towre of Zion, and thither resorted to him divers Priests and Elders seeking peace, and telling him, that they offered sacrifice for the King, but he deriding this, threatned, that unless they would deliver the City unto him, he would burn their Temple. Then earnest prayers with fasting were made before the Lord in his host, and Nicanor going forth to fight, Judas again encountered with him, and obtained a great victory, proud Nicanor, who was most infest against the Jews, being the first man, which was slain, and such of his forces, as fled, the Jews gathering themselves together from all parts slue, so that none of them escaped, and his right hand and head were cut off and hanged up at Ierusalem, prayse being given to God, and a day kept for thanksgiving from year to year for this victory.

But when Demetrius heard, that Nicanor was overthrown, he appointed Bacchides to go again together with Alcimus against the Jews, and to take the right horn of his army with him. In the mean season Judas knowing of what prowesse the Romans were, so that all Kings stood in awe of them, he sent Embassadors to Rome, to make a league with them, which was done accordingly, and Demetrius was forbidden to fight any more against the Jews, as the Romans friends and Confederates. But before the return of the Embassador Bacchides with Alcimus, and an army of 20000 men came to seek Judas to fight with him. Now Judas had with him only 3000, who when they saw the multitude of their enemies withdrew themselves from him, so that 800 only remayned. Then hee stirring them up to the battell, they advised him rather to go first and gather their brethren together, because they being so few, were not able to fight against so great an army. But Judas abhorring from this, as an obscuring of all their former glory, exhorts them to fight it out unto the death, and so joyning battell with the enemy, he at the first prevayled & slue many in the right horn where Bacchides was, and pursued them far, but then the left came upon his back, and his army fell, and Judas was slain also, anno 152 of the Græcian Empire. Thus the embassage sent to Rome stood 1 Mach. 7. 3, 4.

Judas

1 Mach 7. 32.

Pride and malice punished.

1 Mach. 8.

1 Mach. 9.

Rupert.

Judas in no stead, neither doe we read of any helpe the Jews had from them after his death, so that Rupertus noteth some offence to have been in Judas, his seeking help from Idolaters, when God had hitherto so mightily holpen him. For hereupon, first, God tooke away the courage of his men, when as with 3000 he had overcome Nicanor before, having a greater Army. 2 he withdrew the spirit of prayer, so that contrary to his wonted manner, without praying, he rushed into the battell. 3 without speaking of God, and his miraculous acts done formerly for his people, he was left to run upon the enemy, onely with resolution to die in fighting valiantly, that the glory of his valour hitherto might be nothing eclipsed by any shew of cowardize at this time, after the manner of another heroicall spirit, that hath nothing but nature in him, yet I doubt not but that these his errors were pardoned, and he dyed Gods faithfull servant, and his admirable courage through faith still liveth, as Samsons, and the memory of his zeale to the Law of God, to stir up others to the like.

Anno 1805.
Jonathan Prince 18 years.

Sanctuary violation iudged.
1 Mach.9.54.

Wickedly got. ten not enjoyed.
1 Mach.9.48.

Appian.

Judas Machabeus being dead, great lamentation was made for him by the Jews, and with one consent they made Jonathan his brother their Captain in his stead, who together with his brother Simeon, did fight often against their enemies with good successe, so that at length Bacchides sought to make peace with them, and did, and then departed into his own Country. But Alcimus before this having broken down the wall of the outward Court of the Lords house was smitten, so as that he dyed in great torment, anno 153 of the Greeke Empire, first becomming dumb through a palsey. The wall broken down by him is sayd to have been the worke of the Prophets, because built, as is thought, at the prophesying of Haggai and Zachary. But God suffered him not to live to break it all down, for it is sayd, when he began to breake it down, he was smitten with a palsey, &c. Thus a wicked man usurping the High-priesthood, through the favour of the Heathen King Demetrius, when with much difficulty and danger he came to the possession of it, Judas being dead, and Jonathan at that time fled over Jordan from Bacchides, when he saw that he could not prevail against him, was by the hand of God cut off, when he thought himselfe out of all danger.

To return to Jonathan, he now enjoying peace, sought to root out the wicked of the land, neither is any more sayd of him till Anno 160 of the Greeke Kingdom, that is, for six or seven years, in which time a great and long warre begun between the Romans and the Celtebrians in Spain, which lasted 20 years. The occasion was for that Segeda a City of theirs, taking in other Villages into it, built a wall about all of 40 furlongs compasse, the Senate hearing of this forbad it, and required tribute formerly layd upon them, and when they persisted notwithstanding in their building, because although in their Articles it was sayd, that they should make no more new walls, yet it was not denyed them to repair their old. But the Senate unsatisfied with their answer, sent one Nobilior against them with 30000 men. The Segedians hearing of their coming, because their wall was not yet finished, sent their wives and children away to the City Arbaccos where they were well received, and one Catus was chosen Captain to goe against the Romans, who set forth the third day after his election with 20000 foot and 5000 horse, placing himselfe so as that he might the most unexpectedly set upon the Romans, which he did, and slue of them 6000 men. But whilst he pursued them disorderly, the Roman horsemen coming upon him, slue both him and 6000 of his Army. Wherefore the Arbaccians choosing two new Captains Ambo and Leuco, prepared again to fight with Nobilior at the strong City Numantia, and he having received 300 Numidian horsemen from Massaniassa approached the City, having alio ten Elephants placed so in the Army, that at the first they could not be seen by the enemy, but they coming forth to fight, the Elephants were put forth amongst them, whereby their horses were made to run away with their riders amongst the foot, and thus their whole Army was soone disordered, and compelled to seeke by flight to save themselves in the City. The Romans then coming with their Elephants neere the walls, one of them happened to be wounded on the head with a great stone cast from the wall, whereupon being enraged he made a great noise, and ran upon the Romans, tossing up with his trunk trunk such as he met with, and the rest hearing him did likewise, whereby their whole Army was made to flee. The men in Numantia seeing this, issued forth with all speed and pursued them, till they had slain 4000. and taken three Elephants and many colours, but there perished of them 2000 also. And in all other attempts, Nobilior went by the lesse, and when cold winter came on, many more of his perished with the cold, and other Cities seeing this, revolted from the Romans also, which brought them into a great streight, but at length being overcome by Marcellus, he imposed a mulct of 600 talents upon them, and so that war was ended. Whilst these things were doing in Spain, new troubles arose in Syria. For one Alexander, termed to be the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes, commeth against King Demetrius to get the Kingdom from him, as his inheritance from his father. And this he was put on to doe being an ignoble fellow by birth and education at Rhodes, by Ptolomee the King of Egypt, being also holpen by his wealth, and by Attalus King of Asia, and Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia. for all Historians agree, that he was not the true sonne of Antiochus, though some say that he begat him of an whore. However, Demetrius was so hated by these Kings, that they agreed to make him King in his stead, by the name of Alexander sonne of Antiochus, and for this purpose hee was first sent to Rome, and with him Heraclides, to move the Senate for their assistance, because Antiochus his pretended father was their friend, and Demetrius had taken the Kingdome upon him against their will, and if hee might not have their assistance for their leave, that hee might goe into Syria, and use the help of his friends to obtain that Kingdom. The Senate consented to aid him, and so he comming to Ptolomeis tooke it, and reigned there. And yet when they did this, Demetrius had his young sonne Demetrius at Rome, whom he sent as an hostage to win their favour. When Demetrius heard of Alexanders comming, he wrote most kindly to Jonathan and the Jews, that he might have their aid, promising them many things, and Alexander wrote also unto them, making more ample promises. Therefore Jonathan remembring the enmity of Demetrius formerly shewed to the Jews, leaving him, went to Alexander, because he beleeveth not Demetrius, but tooke his great proffers to be made in dissimulation.

Then Jonathan was made High-priest by Alexander, who sent him a Purple and a Crown. Anno 160 of the Greeke Empire, from which time he continued nine years, foure of his former, nine since he was Prince being spent in Alcimus his time, and five in the vacuity of the High-priesthood, as was touched before. Alexander assisted by the Jews, then fought with Demetrius, and gave him a great overthrow, and slue him the same day. By this means he having obtained the Kingdom, sent to Ptolomee King of Egypt, certifying him of his victory, and desiring to make affinity with him by marrying his daughter Cleopatra. To this hee readily condescended, and comming with his daughter into Syria, Alexander tooke her to wife, and there was Jonathan greatly honoured by both the Kings, and so returned to Jerusalem with joy.

But Alexander had not continued King full five years; before that Demetrius, the sonne of Demetrius came out of Crete to recover his fathers Kingdome, and hee made Apollonius his chiefe Captain, Anno 165 of the Greeke Empire. This Apollonius begun first with Jonathan, provoking him to battell, but to his own losse, for Jonathan taking with him ten thousand men went against him, his brother Simeon comming to his ayd, and put him to flight to Asdod, where he set the house of Dagen on fire, so that eight thousand of the enemies perished, and he returned to Jerusalem with great spoils: Alexander hearing this, sent to honour Jonathan yet more with a golden button, used only to be given to the Kings kinsmen, and giving him Ekrón for a perpetuall inheritance. Ptolomee the King of Egypt hearing of the comming of young Demetrius, came with a great army pretending friendship to his son in law, but meditating in his minde how to get away his Kingdom. But because hee was father in law to Alexander, he gave order that he should be received into any City to which he came, and so he was, and as he went placed Gartifons. Then comming to Justin.

1 Mach. 10.

Anno mundi, 3813.

1 Machab. 11.

Antioch, he sent to Demetrius offering him the same daughter which he had formerly married to Alexander, for he sayd it repented him that he had given her to him, because, he sayd, he sought his life, and so he tooke her from Alexander, and gave her to Demetrius to wife. Then he set two Crowns upon his own head, of Egypt and Asia, and Alexander full of fear fled into Arabia, where he was slain, and his head sent to Ptolomee, but he dyed the third day after, and so Demetrius was King, Anno, 167 of the Greeke Empire, and the Garrisons set by him in divers Cities were destroyed after the death of Ptolomee, by the men of those places. Jonathan now besieging the Fort of Zyn, certain wicked men complained against him to Demetrius, wherefore hee sent for him to come to Ptolemais, which he did, carrying presents with him, whereby when he came he obtained so much favour of the King that he honoured him greatly, and confirmed the High-priesthood unto him, and granted him to weare purple and other Ornaments, as the Kings his predecessours had done, and at his request for 300 talents, gave him besides Judaea three other Toparchyes. These things being done, and Demetrius having peace, he dismissed his forces, at which they being offended were drawn by one Tryphon to goe to an Arabian, who kept Antiochus a childe, the sonne of Alexander, to set him up for King, this Demetrius hearing wrote to Jonathan to come and help him, which he did, sending unto him 3000 Jews to his City, where 12000 men were gathered together against the King, but the Jews comming so dispersed themselves in the City, that they slue 100000 men, and then the rest intreated the King for favour. Iosephus Lib. 13. Cap. 9. telleth this story so as to make it more probable, saying that the Jews being come were beaten back by the multitude of the Antiochians into the Kings Pallace, from whence being high, they shot at them, and cast fire upon their houses, which whilst they laboured to save their wives and children from, they came upon them and so were made to yield. Thus Demetrius again had peace, but he requited Jonathan ill for all the good that he had done him, exacting tribute of him: yet this went not long unreverged, for young Antiochus hearing of it, wrote lovingly to Jonathan, making him many fair promises if he would be for him. Jonathan then consented, and raising a power tooke divers places, and then being incountered by a great Army of enemies his forces fled from him, so that he was left alone with only two of his Captains. But having humbled himselfe to God, and put earth upon his head and prayed, he set upon them and began to make a great slaughter. This his forces seeing, immediately returned to him, and so there were slain of the enemies 3000 men the same day. Iosephus more probably sayth, that Jonathan comming into the field, As for with his Army, where the Demetrians lay in ambush, was by and by assaulted by them, unexpectedly on every side, here-upon his men fled from him, and he was left alone with two Captains only, and 500 of the most valiant men of his army. Then he humbling himself to God prevailed, as was sayd before. Jonathan after this being quiet, sent Embassadors to the Romans, to renew the league formerly made with them, which was well accepted & granted, and the same Embassadors having order to return by Lacedemonia, they did so, and renewed the friendship betwixt them and the Jews, as being before by them declared to be their kinsmen. But Jonathan lived not long in quiet, for the Demetrian forces, that they might be revenged upon him for their former overthrow, came against him in a greater number then before: he hearing this went out against them to the borders of Amathaea, or Hamath, of whose comming when they heard, and so perceived, that they could not fight against him but upon advantage, they made fires in the night and departed, because they despaired of doing any good against him in an equall battell. At this time, sayth Iosephus, arose the three Sects amongst the Jews, of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, of whom see more upon the Gospels. Jonathan seeing that the enemies were fled pursued them, but when hee could not overtake them, hee went into Arabia, and smote the Nabatheans, and tooke their spoyles, and from thence to Damascus, and divers other places, taking them. At length returning to Ierusalem, he consulted with the Elders about the building of the wallis thereof, and the Fortifications. But Tryphon began now to meditate how hee might *Ioseph. lib. 13.

cap. 9.*

1 Machab. 12.

Three Sects
of the Jews.
Anno 3820.

set the Crown upon his own head, young Antiochus being made away, and fearing that Jonathan would herein be a let unto him, hee raised an army to goe against him, & Jonathan hearing of it, went against him with 40000 men to Bethsean, Tryphon then fearing his power feined to come in friendship and received him with all honour, telling him that he came forth towards him as to a friend, and therefore that he was too blame to put all those men to this travell, perswading him to send them back again, which he did, and retained only 1000 men with him, and of those that returned he sent 2000 into Galilee. Then Tryphon led him to Ptolomais, pretending to make him Lord thereof, but when he and his men were come into the City, they shut them in & slue them all except Jonathan, after which Tryphon also sent to Galilee to slay them, that were there of Jonathan's retinue, but they hearing before what was done to Jonathan, stood upon their own defence, which their enemies seeing would not adventure to meddle with them, & so they returned to Jerusalem, where great lamentation was made for Jonathan and his men, but the Heathens about rejoiced, thinking now, they being without a Prince should not be able to stand against them, but they should easily root them out from being a people. Simeon then, a third brother offered himself to be Captain for the Jews, and to spend his life for them, and the Law of God, as his two brethren Judas and Jonathan had done, which offer of his was joyfully accepted, and he began his Principality and Highpriesthood, anno 170 of the Græcian Empire, & immediately gathering men together he fortified Jerusalem. But Tryphon having Jonathan alive yet with him, went towards Jerusalem with his army, & Simeon towards him. This Tryphon seeing sent unto him to tell him that he held not Jonathan for any other cause but for an 100 talents of tribute which he ought to the King, therefore if he would send him this money, and Jonathan's two sonnes for pledges, he would set Jonathan at liberty again. This howsoever Simeon thought to be spoken in deceit, yet to stop the mouthes of clamorous people, he sent the money, and pledges, but Jonathan was kept still, and within a while after slain, as Tryphon was coming with all his horsemen in haste to relieve the Fort of Sion, but was stayed by abundance of snow falling at the same time. Then Tryphon returned into his own land, and having by treachery slain young Antiochus, he tooke the Kingdom upon him. But Simeon sent and tooke the bones of Jonathan his brother and burnt them in Modin, erecting a faire monument there, and upon it seven Pyramides to his father and mother, and his foure brethren. Then he sent to King Demetrius, desiring to have the Tribute released, and freedome to Jerusalem restored, which was immediately yeilded unto, and many other favours offered by the King unto the Jews, and so the Jews that had been always under Heathen Kings from their return out of the Babylonish Captivity, now became free in the first year of Simon, being now subjects no more to these Kings, but their friends, and this was Anno mundi 3823, that is, 397 years after their return, which was, Anno 3426. Hereupon Simeon tooke courage, and set upon Heliopolis, so that they soon yeilded the City to him, and likewise upon the Fort of Zion, which was also yeilded, and purged both these places from Idols, setting up the worship of the true God there. After which he lived long in peace, and in great glory, and the Jews lived happily in all his Dominion, sitting every one under his vine and figtree. Demetrius then pursued Tryphon, but coming into the Kingdom of Arfaces, King of the Medes and Persians, he sent and tooke him alive, and so kept him prisoner. For King of Persians, Justin hath King of Parthians, and that more rightly, because the Parthian had now those parts. For the cause why Demetrius went thither; Josephus sayth, that he was moved by many Embassages of the Græcians, over whom Arfaces tyrannized, to come, and when he came he was supplied with a great Army, but fighting against Arfaces, he was overcome and taken alive.

Then Antiochus the sonne of Demetrius wrote from the Islands of the Sea to Simeon, to induce him to his friendship, granting him all that ever was granted to him or Jonathan before. But when as gathering great forces he had brought Tryphon to a streight, being aided also by 2000 men sent from Simeon unto him, he himselfe pursuing him, as he fled he sent Kendebeus a Captain with a great part of his Army to challenge Simeon for usurping dominion over Ioppe, and 3823.

Anno mundi,
1 Machab. 13.

Lib. Antiq. 13.
cap. 9.

1 Machab. 15.

1 Machab. 16.

Iochanan or Hircanus high-priest.Ioseph. lib. 13.
cap. 15.

Florus.

other places, requiring him to deliver them, or else he would destroy the Jews, and if he would still hold, and take the tribute of those places, to send him 500 talents, and 500 more for the damages done there. And because he would not, alleaging that those parts belonged to the inheritance of their fathers, but only offered to give 100 talents, Kendebeus began to assault the Jews about Iamnia. This being told unto Simeon, he being now old committed the managing of the warre to his two sonnes Iudas and Iochanan, exhorting them to be valiant, and praying for them. Then they went out with 20000 foot and some horse, and encountering with Kendebeus, routed his Armie, and slue many, but Iudas was wounded, yet Iochanan pursued them to Gadara, killing many more, and so returned to Ierusalem. Of the cause of Antiochus his perfidy towards Simeon, nothing is sayd in Machabees, but it is implied in saying, that the Forces of Tryphon revolted to him, by which means he thought easily to overcome him, and so he should have no need of Simeon's ayd. There was then one Ptolomee, the sonne in law of the High-priest, who was Governour of Iericho, he ambitiously aspiring after the Principality, plotted how to cut off Simeon and his sonnes, and when he had invited him and his sonnes Mattathias and Iudas to a feast to Iericho, he caused them to be treacherously slain whilst they were drinking with him, Anno 177 of the Græcian Empire. Then he sent to Antiochus for forces, promising to deliver the Countrey unto him. And others he sent to kill Iochanan, but he being forewarned tocke them when they came and slue them. Thus the three sonnes of Mattathias the Assamonean, after many glorious victories obtained were all slain. But treacherous Ptolomee obtained not his end. For Iochanan, whom Iosephus calleth Hircanus, taking the High-priesthood upon him, after that he had fought unto God, gathered an Army, which readily flockt unto him, for the love of his father and hatred of Ptolomee, and herewith he besieged him, and could easily have taken the place, which was a Towre called Dagon in Iericho, but only Ptolomee having Iochanan's mother with him, when he was assaulted, caused her to be openly beaten on the walls with whips, at which Iochanan relenting languisht in his sight, yea although shee sought to move him to goe on without regard unto her, to get so trecherous an enemy into his hand, that he might suffer according to all his wickednesse, yet he beginning a fierce assault again by and by languished, when he saw her misused again as before. And so, much time being spent in vain, the seventh yeare, which was to the Jews a year of rest, came on, and then Iochanan intermitting the siege, Ptolomee first killing Iochanan's mother, escaped away to Zeno the Tyrant of Philadelpia.

Touching the Romans, although there was a league betwixt the Jews and them, wherein they were called their friends, and all Kings were strictly charged to take notice hereof, and not to molest them: yet they never had any benefit hereof, neither did the Kings of Syria any whit the more for that forbearance to fight against them, when their malice put them on to it. Besides the Ceteberian warre in Spain before spoken of, they had none other worth the speaking of, but onely about the end of the reign of Demetrius the sonne of Selencus, war began again the third time betwixt them and the Carthaginians. The occasion was for that King Massanissa had done them many wrongs, wherein he was born withall by the Romans, whereupon they prepared Armes and munition for their own defence. For this cause Embassadours were sent over to Carthage to see what was done there, and when they had seen their warlike preparations by land and sea, they reprov'd the Carthaginian Senate therefore, and propounded termes of peace betwixt them and Massanissa the Numidian King, viz. that he should depart from that land about which their strife arose, leaving it unto them. To this the Senate would have agreed, but Gisco the sonne of Amilcar being then Magistrate, stirred up the people so against the Romans, that their Embassadours were faine to save themselves by fleeing away, vvhcreby the Roman Senate before distasting their doings, vvas the more provoked against them. Then the Carthaginians, the Roman Embassadours being departed vvith Gulussa the sonne of Massanissa, went against Massanissa, but he, although about 90 years old, came in person against them and overcame them. The Roman Embassadours returning acquainted the Senate with the preparation at Carthage, which Cato exhorted to be a breach of the league, & sought therefore to stir up the Senate to war against them. But Scipio thought not this yet a sufficient cause of making War upon them, so it was agreed, that if they would burn their Navy and dismisse their Forces they should have peace. But this Decree stood not by reason of the Uticenses, a people not far from Carthage, yielding themselves by their Embassadors to the Romans. For then the Senate resolved to warre upon Carthage, till it should be destroyed. And although Ambassadors sent from Carthage to prevent this yielded to their demand of 300 pledges of Senators sons to do all things which they should command, and these were to the great grief of their kindred, and specially their mothers delivered at Lelibeum, and from thence carried to Rome, yet the War went on, and a great army was sent against Carthage, which was already much weakened by the late fight had with Mussa, wherein perished after agreement through the revengfull minde Gulussa his sonne neer 50000 men, setting upon them weary and unarmed, as they were returning homeward. Ambassadors were then sent againe to know of the Consuls that led the army, what they would have the Carthaginians doe more. They answered, that they must bring forth all their armes, and deliver them up. And this also being done, they were required in the last place to go all of them out of the City, leaving it to be razed down, and seek a new place of aboad, and that at the least 80 furlongs from the Sea. This answer being given by Censorinus the Consul, the Ambassadors were so perplexed, that they lay down, desiring rather to dye there, then to return with so sad an answer. And comming to themselves when they had pleaded what they could, they were caused to depart with this peremptory answer, that the Senates Decree was, that Carthage should be utterly demolished. When this news came to the City it is unexpressable with what passions the Carthaginians were moved, some crying out upon the Ambassadors and raging against them, and some against the Senators for delivering up their arms, and many mothers for their children now at Rome, ready to be murdered, and because all these things were done without knowing the conditions of peace. But after much passion and bitterness expressed, they shut up their gates, and fell to making of new arms with incredible celerity, all both men and women working with all their might, and the women cutting of their haire to make bow-strings. So that whilst the Romans let them alone thinking now to take the City when they lifted, they both reconciled themselves to Asdrubal, hitherto keeping aloof with 20000 men ready armed, because he was by the Senate condemned to please the Romans that they might have his assistance, and armed a great many more. Inomuch that when the Romans came to assault the City, they came out ready armed to their admiration, and gave them hot battle, and from time to time defended their City so, that the time of the two Consuls, that then were expired without doing any more hurt then they received. Wherefore Scipio even before that he could by the law by reason of his age, was made Consul and sent over with more forces. And he although most wise and valiant, so that the Romans had none other like him, could nor in his yeer prevail, but having his Consulship prorogued, hee brake into the City the next yeere, and so with much spoyle and bloodshed wan it, and dismissed of such as yielded, at length 45000 of men and women, many of the rest desperately setting fire upon the houses wherein they were, and burning themselves. Amongst whom Asdrubals wife was one, whose husband fled with an Olive branch to Scipio for mercy, but shee disdainning this his cowardly heart, first killed her two children, and then cast her self in his sight into the fire. Thus Carthage, which had stood as a great Lady City of the World 700 yeers was in three yeers utterly ruined; at the sight whereof even Scipio himself wept, presaging in his minde what Rome also might one day come unto. Now the thing most remarkable in Scipio, whereby hee prevailed, when others could not, was his strict discipline towards his souldiers keeping them always in good order, without which he knew, that he could do no great matters. This famous conquest being made, Scipio first doing sacrifice to his Gods, returned to Rome and triumphed, in which triumph Asdrubal was led and then kept in prison, the pledges although kept there, had great liberty. Then by the Senats decree Scipio went again and demolisht what remaind of Carthage, and brought under tribute all such as had assited Carthage, and gave much of their lands away to their friends the Miscenes, so that Countrey was reduced into the State of a Province, anno of the City of Rome built 607, anteque munda 3820, towards the end of the High-priesthood of Jonathan. And Scipio, as his progenitour had now the name of Africanus given to him also. And the Senate strictly forbade any more building, and specially of a Burse in that place for ever, cruelly threatening such as should break this decree. For the first building of this City, some attribute it to Zoro and Charchedo Tyrians 50 years before the destruction of Troy, some to Dido, Charchedoes daughter cyther in Dauids time or in Solomons, and some in the time of Amassia.

Of military discipline.

pledges

To return again to the affairs of the King of Syria, and of the Jews. Antiochus the King ceased not pursuing Tryphon, till that hee had driven him into his Castle Orthosades, and there put him so hard to it, that he slue himself, as Strabo writeth, but Iosephus sayth, that he was slain in Apamea three yeets after hee had begun to reign. Antiochus being freed thus from his Antagonist Tryphon, called to minde the overthrow given to his forces under Kendebeus, by Hircannus, having now also an opportunity against him through his treacherous kinsman Ptoleme before spoken of, who having slain his father Simeon, and other brethren sent for Forces to Antiochus, he went with a great Army against him and drave him into the City, that is, Jerusalem, in the fourth yeare of his reign, the first of Hircannus his high-priesthood, then he layd siege to the City, and built Towres against it, the Jews making often excursions upon his men, and killing many. The siege being continued, Hircannus feared lest scarcity should be in the City, and therefore hee put out all the weaker sort, but when Antiochus seeing this would not let them passe, but kept them up neer the walls, the Feast of Tabernacles then approaching, he took them in again in pity, lest they should be famished without. Then he sent to Antiochus desiring a truce for seven dayes whilst they kept the Feast, to which he yeilded, and sent him also fat buls with their hornes gilded for sacrifice, and boules both of silver and gold full of sweet spices, and made a feast for his Army, from which piety of his he attained the name of Antiochus Pius. Hircannus being much offended herewith, sent to treat with him about peace. To this he agreed upon condition, that he should give unto the King 500 Talents, leaving the Tribute of Joppe, and some other places before spoken of unto him, and receive a Garrison into the City, and so the Jews should live still according to their own Laws. To all these he consented, but only touching the Garrison, because they would not have people of other Nations to live amongst them. And so a peace was concluded, and the siege raised. And to raise this money, Hircannus opened the Monument of David, wherein he found 3000 Talents. Then he hired also many Souldiers from forreign parts, and making a league with Antiochus, received him, and liberally enterreined him in the City, and after he going to warre against Arface King of the Parthians, he with his forces followed him, but when they came to joyne battell, Antiochus was overcome and slain, and Demetrius, who before had been taken by Arface, was, at Antiochus his comming set at liberty, and so he came again to his own Kingdom. But this last of Antiochus being overcome and slain by Arface the Parthian King, Iustinus setteth forth more fully, saying, that Antiochus carryed with him 80000 men to this warre going out with 30000 cooks also, and other necessary attendants, furnished with vessels of silver, and all the Army most richly set forth, for fear of which preparations, many places yielded unto him, and comming to fight with Phraates the King, for so he calleth him, he overcame him thrice, insomuch that the King of Parthia was now forced to retire within his own bounds. But Antiochus by wintering in those parts became so burthenome unto the people that they repented of their yielding to him, and consented together in favour of the Parthian to kill up his Souldiers where they lay billeted in severall places, and when they were doing it, the news hereof comming to Antiochus, hee hastened with the forces which he had to help his Souldiers that were neereest unto him

Strabo.

Ios. lib. 13. 16.

Iustinus

him, but in the way, Phraates meeting him, slue him, fighting valiantly, even when his men ran away from him. Then the King of Parthia repented him; that he had dismissed Demetrius, he being moved to this only for fear of Antiochus, when he prevailed against him, that by this means he might be drawn home again to defend his own Kingdom. Wherefore Antiochus being slain, he sent after Demetrius to fetch him back again, but in vain, for he was now gotten into his own Kingdom of Syria again.

Hircanus, who had this name, as Josephus sayth, for his killing of a great man so called, Eusebius for his expedition against, and overcoming a people called Hircan. So hearing that Antiochus was dead, returned with his Army into Syria, and after a siege of six months tooke Medaba, then the City of Samega, and Sicma, and Gerizim, where the Temple stood built by Manasseh in opposition to the Temple at Ierusalem, as was layd before, and having now continued 200 years was again demolished. He subdued also the Edonites, and caused them to be circumcised, and hereupon they became one people with the Jews. As for Demetrius he had learned such cruelty of the Parthians whilst he lived in exile amongst them, and was so proud that he was hated of his own people, to whom he had returned, inso much that they desired Ptolomee Physcon King of Egypt, to send them one of the family of Seleucus, that might reign over them. He sent them therefore Alexander Zebina, who presently being made King fought against Demetrius, and overcame him. Then he fled to Ptolomais where his wife Cleopatra was, but being by her excluded he went to Tyris, and there being taken by his enemies, after many abuses offered unto him, he was slain. So that although he would willingly have made War upon Hircanus, yet he could not, and by reason of Wars betwixt Alexander and him, the Jews were quiet, and then Hircanus tooke the opportunity to send Embassadors to Rome to renew the League with the Romans, and to desire that by their authority, Ioppe, and other places which he had yielded to Antiochus whilst he lived, might now, he being dead, be restored again unto him. To all which the Senate assented, and gave out of their love to the Embassadors, money where with to beare their charges homeward. Alexander being now King of Syria, the Parthian King sent home the corps of Antiochus in a coffin of silver, and he feigning great sorrow for his death, bestowed him honourably, and hereby he wan much love amongst the people, as being for this thought to be one of the Selucidan Family, when he was but a counterfeit. Alexander then entered into a league with Hircanus, but Antiochus Gryphus the sonne of Demetrius, raised forces against him, and overcame and slue him, and reigned in his stead. Of this Antiochus Gryphus Iustine sayth, that he had this name because his nose was great and hooked, after the manner of a Gryphins bill. And it was by the helpe of Ptolomee King of Egypt, that Antiochus so soone prevailed against Alexander: For when Alexander was King, he waxed proud, and despised Ptolomee by whom he was made. Therefore he having indignation at this, reconciled himselfe to Cleopatra the mother who had let up this sonne, and sent her ayd, and gave his daughter to Antiochus to wife, whereby the people were drawn much unto him, and to leave Alexander. And Iustine addeth, that Alexander wanting money to pay his Souldiers, caused a masse Image of Insipier of gold to be taken down, and converted it to his own use. But his Souldiers detesting this Sacriledge revolted from him, then he fled by water, and by tempests was beaten to land, where robbers tooke him and delivered him to Gryphus, and so he was slain. He then would have fought against Hircanus, but he feared a brother of his own name, who he heard was coming against him, called Antiochus Sizicanus, from the place where he had been brought up, and therefore was constrained to spend much time in fighting against him, whence it came to passe that Hircanus lived long in peace, and prospered greatly. Now whereas this Antiochus is sayd to be brother to Antiochus Physcon, Josephus sayth, that it was by the mother Cleopatra, who had been wife both to Demetrius, and to his father Antiochus Soter, that dyed in Parthia. Now the time of the reign of Demetrius before his captivity was 12 years, and after his return foure years, and Antiochus his brother between thesetimes 12 years, Alexander that slue Demetrius, *Josephus lib. 13.

cap. 17.*

Iustin.

*Funccius
Chron.*

*Iosiph. l. 13.
c. 18.*

Pharisees and Sadducees what.

Iustine.

Appianus.

Ptol. Lathyrus King of Egypt.

The cruelty of women.

two years, Antiochus Gryphus, the son of Demetrius, who slue him 29 years whilst the two brethren were in war one against the other, Hircanus took his opportunity to besiege Samarina, building Walls and Forts about it, whereby those of the City were brought into a great streight for want of victuals, and therefore they sent to Antiochus Sizzicenus to come and rayse the siege, which hee attempted to doe, but was overcome and put to flight by Antigonus and Aristobulus the two sons of Hircanus, whom hee had set over the siege. Then the siege continuing they sent to Antiochus again, who came, but after the manner of a robber spoyling Hircanus his fields, that by this means he might draw his forces from Samarina. But of his men many being, as they ranged about, slain by the Jews, he returned to Tripolis, committing this War to two Captains Calmander and Epicrates. Of these then one Calmander being so hardy as to fight a battle with the Jews was soon slain, and the other turning treacherous to his master for a bribe betrayed Scithopolis to Hircanus. Hircanus then continuing the siege in the space of one yeer won Samarina, and layd it even with the ground, and having lived in great glory 31 years High-priest and Prince hee dyed, leaving the Principality to Aristobulus his son. Hee was also famous for revelations when he was in the Temple one time, the Lord speaking unto him, and telling him of the victory which hee had given to his sons against Antiochus, whereof when hee coming out had spoken to the people, news was presently brought to the City. And he foretold the short continuance of those his two sons in this life, which fell out accordingly. Yet being so worthy hee was not esteemed amongst the Pharisees, a kind of Sect amongst the Jews most accounted of by the common people, inasmuch that leaving them, after they had been long favoured by him, he went to the Sadducees, the difference between which two Sects was, that the Pharisee held, and did many things not commanded in the Word of God, but the Sadducee that it was not lawfull to hold or do so, but only what was prescribed in the Word. Touching Antiochus Gryphus, Iustine speaking more fully then Iosiphus sayth, that after he had subdued Alexander, his mosher Cleopatra, who made account, that he should but reign under her, now fearing that her power should be diminished, prepared a poysoned cup for him at his return home from exercising: this he having some notice of, when shee offered it unto him, desired her as in a filiall respect to drink first, she refusing he urged her, and told her, what he heard of the poyson in it, she denying it to be so, he would not be herewith satisfied, unlesse she drunk it, and so pressed her to it for the clearing of her self, that she drank and so dyed. A just reward, sayth he, for her wickednesse, because shee had slain her own husband before, and poysoned another of her sons, and now would have poysoned this. Gryphus being thus delivered from his enemies reigned in peace eight years, not once attempting any thing against Hircanus, becaule his power was great, and he was also a confederate of the Romans. But then hee endeavouring to take away Sizzicenus by poyson, which was timely discovered unto him, he fleeing to Sizicum, gathered forces and fought against him, and expelled him out of his Kingdom, sayth Appianus. The manner was thus. Ptolomee Physcon, or Euergetes King of Egypt dying, left his Kingdom to the will of his Wife to be given to whether of her sons she would, when he had reigned 29 years, the name of the eldest being Lathyrus, of the younger Alexander. Now her love was most to Alexander, but by the people she was compelled to make the eldest King, yet before she would do it, she compelled him to put away his Wife Cleopatra, and to marry her sister Selence, Cleopatra being put away went into Syria, and married Antiochus Sizzicenus daughter bringing to him an army with her, wherewith he might invade his brothers kingdome, who yet had married another sister of hers. But he fought with ill successe against his brother Gryphus, for he was overcome and made to flee to Antiochia. Gryphus following him besieged the City, till he had taken it. But Antiochus Sizzicenus elcaped out of it and fled, his Wife Selence being left behind. Her sister Gryphna the wife of Gryphus moved her husband to have her secured, but he speaking against crnelty shewing to her, a woman and a sister & now fled to Sanctuary, shee was the more fisy bent to execute her, and sent those that first cut off her hands, and then slue her there. But this cruelty

cruelty went not long unrevenge'd, for Sizicenus gathered new forces fought again with Gryphus and overcame him, then he took Gryphina his wife and slae her, and reigned 18 years after which he was yet again expell'd from the kingdom by Gryphus, and hereigned again till that he had made up from the beginning of his first reign 29 years. In the time of these kings, about the 18 year, Hircanus dying, his son Aristobulus took the government upon him, & was the first King of the Jews after their return from captivity, but he proved a very tyrant, imprisoning his mother & brethren, all but Antigonus, where she was famished to death because according to the appoyntment of his father she would have some hand in the government. Neither did he spare his brother Antigonus long, although for his love towards him, he made him at the first consort of his kingdom: for he being sick Antigonus went forth to war, and the victory being gotten, returned gloriously home, & so went up to the Temple. Then Aristobulus was by some informed of it, who said, that he had best look to him, or else he would soon aspire to the Kingdom. The King was not at the first moved at it, as thinking it false, but being urged with it, he gave regard to it so far, that he appoynted armed men to stand in a certain place secretly, by which Antigonus was to passe to come unto him, commanding them if he came armed to slay him, if not to let him passe. Now Salome the Queen & some others, treacherously told him that the King was desirous to see him in his arms, because he had heard of the excellencie of his Armor, wherefore he went in his Arms and was slain, but the King soon after was so stricken with grief therefore, that his sickness increased more and more, and he vomited blood, which his servant carrying out, by chance spilt in the place where Antigonus had been slain. At the sight of this, many seeing it, gave a shout, which the King hearing would needs know the cause, and being told, he was yet more pricked in his conscience, as taking it to happen by a divine providence, for his murdering his brother and mother, and so grievously crying out upon his own bloody facts, he yielded up the ghost, when he had reigned only one year. But in his time the Empire of the Jews was much enlarged, by the adding of a great part of Ituraea unto it, the people for fear of banishment being by him compelled to be circumcised, and so to be as one people with the Jews. Aristobulus being dead, Salome his wife let his three brethren out of prison, and made the elder of them Alexander King, concerning whom it had been before revealed by God unto Hircanus his father that he should reign, whereat he was nothing well pleased, because Aristobulus and Antigonus best. He being King, slue one of his brethren that aspired after the Kingdom, and the other being content to live quietly in a private estate, he loved well, and after his entering upon the Kingdom, he reigned 27 years. But all his time was full of trouble, and now that from High-priests the Jews governours were turned into Kings, they much degenerated from the virtues of their Ancestors, and so their times were full of bloodshed and many miseries. Thus in the short time of Aristobulus, how it was hath been already shewed, and now touching Alexander it will much more appear, Ptolomais and Gaza only remained of Maritim Towns that refused to obey the Jews. He therefore besieged Ptolomais, the Citizens having no hope of help from the Kings of Syria, in whose dominion they were, sent to Ptolomee Lathurus King of Egypt for ayd. Now this Ptolomee was the sonne of Ptolomee Philometers son, that is, of Ptolomee Energetes, made King by his mother Cleopatra against her will, as I have shewed a little before, compelling him first to put away his wife, and to marry her sister Salome when he was King, she not being content to reign together with him, because she loved her younger son Alex. better, seeing also that he had two sons by Salome, she took her from him, and banishing him, made her son Alex. King. But Lathurus fled into Cyprus and lived long there as King. To him therefore now the Ptolomaidans sent for ayd, & he with an army of 30000 men, came to raise the siege. But before he came the men of Ptolomais repented that they sent for him, because thus they must necessarily be subject unto him, if he prevailed against the Jews, & then should come also into the danger of Cleopatra Q. of Egypt who would be offended at the increase of his Dominion, seeing she attempted to expell him out of the kingdom of Cyprus before, wherefore they excluded his Embassadors that came before out of their City, whereat the K. was greatly perplexed. But the Gazeans seeking also to him for

Aristobulus King of the Jews.

Ios. lib. 13. c. 19.

Treachery.

Bloodshed terrifying.

*Ioseph. lib. 13.
cap. 20.
Anno 3863.
Alexander king of the Jews.*

Ptolomee Lathurus.

Iustin.

Ioseph. l. 13.
c. 21.

Strange cruelty.

Iosephus lib. 13.

against the Jews, he went on, which Alexander hearing, immediately raised his siege, and departed home to Jerusalem, and sent secretly to Cleopatra of Egypt to stir her up to come against her sonne Lathurus. Yet at the same time he feigned a desire of making friendship with Lathurus, and promised him 400 talents to take and cut off Zolus the Tyrant of Gaza, then he did in part, for he tooke Zolus, but hearing of Alexanders underhand dealing he was so moved, that leaving part of his Army before Ptolomais, he hastened with the other part to waste the Region of Judea. Alexander likewise knowing this, gathered together an Army of 50000, some say 80000, to goe out to meet him. But such haste did Lathurus make, that he came suddenly to Asochus of Samaria on the Sabbath day, and tooke and pillaged it, and carryed away from thence 10000 Captains, then going on, he met Alexander with his forces neer the River Jorden, & pitched his Tents on the one side of the River, and Alexander was on the other. But next day Lathurus his Forces passed over the River, Alexander permitting them quietly so to doe, as making no doubt, by reason of his great number, but that it would turn to his advantage, seeing the River being behinde them, they could not flee away. But when they had joyned battell, although they fought stoutly and with equall successe on both sides for a time, yet at length one wing of the Jewish army was made to yield and flee, and the rest seeing this fled also. Then the enemies pursued and slue of them, till their hands were weary, and their swords blunted with killing, insomuch that there fell of the Jews that day 30000 men. Then Lathurus wasted the Jews Countrey far and wide, and killing up women and children where he came, he caused some of them to be cut in pieces, and to be boyled in pots and cauldrons, that such as should come and see it, might thinke that his army fed upon mans flesh, and feare him the more. Cleopatra his mother hearing of the increase of his power, thought it necessary with speed to goe against him, and for this end making great preparation both by land and sea, sent her forces out unto Ptolomais, under two Jewish Captains, Chelcias and Ananias. Lathurus hearing of this, thought it now a fit time for him to recover his Kingdom of Egypt, whilst it was empty of military forces. But comming thither he prevailed nothing, for the Queen sent a Captain with a great power after him, and by him he was again expelled out of Egypt. Alexander the King of the Jews, in the mean season came to Cleopatra, and was honourably received by her, and although in distresse, so that she might have made a prey of his Countrey, and was by some moved to it, yet by the perswasion of her Jewish Captain, she did not, but he found favour with her, and having made a league with him, she dismissed him, and Lathurus being returned into Cyprus she returned into Egypt. Alexander being thus delivered from the fear of Lathurus, makes war in Callosyria, and after ten moneths siege takes Gadara, and then Amathunte, and from thence passing to Gaza he besieged it, and with much losse of his men tooke it, because the Citizens were desperate, and would rather die then come under his power, wherefore many of them fired their houses and themselves together. After this, Alexander returning to Jerusalem, when the Feast of Tabernacles was kept, there was an insurrection made of the Jews, his own subjects, against him, who railed upon him as unworthy for his wickednesse to sacrifice, and offered other indignities to him, whereat he being provoked, fell upon them with his men of war, and slue 6000 of them. After this he had war with the Arabians, but the Arabian King comming against him, he was drawn by treachery into a dangerous place, & so hardly escaped with his life. Returning to Jerusalem again, he had wars at home with his own people six years together, hiring foreigners to serve him, and in these wars, at divers times, he slue 50000 of them. Yet even then, he speaking to them of reconciliation, they were the more incensed against him, he asking what they would have him doe, they sayd, to kill himselfe. Then they sent to Demetrius Encelus, to come and ayd them against him, and hee comming with a great power fought with Alexander, who had besides 20000 Jews, 6000 mercenary souldiers in his Army, against 40000 foot, and 3000 horse in the Army of Demetrius. After a long and bloody fight, Demetrius got the victory, and all the mercenaries of Alexanders Army were slain, and many of the Army of Demetrius also.

Alex-

Alexander then fled to the Mountains and six thousand Jews more resorted to him in pity, which Demetrius seeing left the Country. Then the Jews alone warred against him, but he always put them to the worst, killing many of them. And at Verboma, to which many of the greatest of them fled, he nayled 800 to gallowses, causing their wives and children to be slain before their faces, whilst they yet lived in revenge of their obstinate rebellions. After this hee having run through many hazards of War and subdued many places, fell into a quartan through intemperance, and at three years end dyed. But before his death his Queen being grieved to think, what should become of her and her children, seeing hee was so much hated of the Jews, he counselled her to offer to the Pharisees to do whatsoever they would have her, shewing her self sorrowfull, that her husband had been so harsh towards them: and to deliver his dead body to them, if they would, to be revenged upon it. Now such was the power of this Sect with the people, that when the Queen did thus, they were won so unto her, that they magnified Alexanders exploits amongst the people, and prayed him for a just King, and hereby the people were so stirred up, that they greatly lamenting for the losse of him bestowed a most honourable buriall upon him. Queen Alexandra then was permitted to reigne, although she had two sons, Hircanus and Aristobulus. The one of these, Hircanus being unfit for war, she made Highpriest, intending the Kingdom haply to the other after her decease. But though she were Queen, the Pharisees bare all the sway, and the Rites abrogated by Hircanus Alexanders father, were confirmed again as traditions of the Elders. And to that height of authority the Pharisees grew, that they questioned all those, that had given the King counsell to exercise such cruelty against the 800 before spoken of, and began to cut them off, sometime one, and sometime another. This they that survived seeing, being men of the best sort joyned with Aristobulus her sonne, and went to the Court, and expostulated with the Queene about it, shewing her, how indigne a thing it was, that her husbands best friends should now be permitted to the will of their enemies to be by them killed up like beasts. Wherefore they desired cyther leave to depart and live where they could, or else in some of her Castles. She consented to this last, that they should have all her Castles but three, where her treasures lay, Hircania, Alexandrinum, and Macharnutis. The Queen after this falling sick, Aristobulus taketh his opportunity to strengthen himself to the getting of the Kingdom, and therefore went from the Court only with one servant to one of the Castles, where he was willingly received, and it was yielded unto him, and after it many Castles more to the number of 22. Then he endeavouring to gather an army, men flockt unto him in great numbers. This stirred up Hircanus and the Elders to resort speedily to the Queen, but shee being now ready to dye, willed them with her attires and wealth provided in abundance to take the best course they could, and so dyed being seventy three years old, and having reigned nine years, and that in great wisdom and justice shee began anno 3890, and dyed 3899.

But before I proceed further in the Jewish History, I will fetch up that of the Syrian Kings. Antiochus Gryphus, as was sayd before, continued 29 years after his first beginning to reign, and then was slain by the treachery of Heracleon, and Seleucus his son succeeded him, and fighting with his Uncle. Sizicenus slue him. Then Antiochus Eusebes, the son of Sizicenus came to Aradum, and took the Crown upon him, and he fighting with Seleucus expelled him out of Syria, who fled then to Cyrcia, and comming to the Mopseus where he was received as King, when he exacted tribute of them, hee was burnt by them in his Palace together with his friends. Then the brother of Seleucus called Antiochus gathered forces against Eusebes, but being overcome hee lost his life and army. Then Philip, a brother of his reigned over part of Syria, and Ptolomee Lathurus made another brother called Demetrius Eucetus King in Damascus. Both these joyning against Eusebes, hee for a time withstood them stoutly, being called to the aid of Ladices Queen of the Galadens, against the Parthians, hee was slain fighting stoutly in the midst of his enemies. And for the Kingdom of Syria was between two brothers, Philip and Demetrius. And they living also in cruelly.

Barbarous

Ioseph. l. 13. 23.

The policy of Alexan. dying.

Ioseph. 13. 24.

Anno mundi,
3890.

Ioseph. lib. 13.
cap. 21.

Seleucus King of Syria.

Tullin.

The Romans.

Orosius.

This was the antrum Tolossanum, of which it is sayd, That who so had any part of it could never prosper.

Velleius.

Oros. Livius.

Plutarch.

dissention, the Syrians grew weary of them, and therefore offered the Kingdom to Tygranus King of Armenia, who came and tooke it, ten years after the decease of Gryphus, and reigned 18 years, that is, till three years after the death of Alexandra.

Touching the Romans affairs, they having utterly subdued Carthage, had wars with the Numidians a long time in the dayes of Jugurtha the son of Mas-sanissa, but at length the Numidians were subdued, and Jugurtha taken prisoner, and carryed to Rome by C. Marius Consul, for which he triumphed, and this was about the latter end of the reigne of Hircanius, or rather of his Principality. But immediately another dangerous War arose against them, The Cymbrians and many other peoples of the French and Germans, conspired together to ruine the Roman State by a just judgement, as Orosius sayth, because Capio the Pro-Consul had not long before taken Tho'onse, and robbed the Temples there of many millions of gold. This conspiracie being heard, a great army was sent against them, under the leading of C. Manilius Consul, and Capio Pro-Consul. But they being at variance between themselves, the enemies came upon them, and overthrew both their Armies, killing of the Romans 80000, and of the Colonies 40000, there being only ten men left alive to carry the heavy tydings of this great overthrow. This news coming to Rome, they were filled with great grieve and feare, Capio was condemned as the cause, and C. Marius had this Province, and a new Army allotted unto him, to goe against the sayd Cymbrians. &c. Now it happened so, that these Barbarians did not prosecute their victory by coming against Rome, which if they had done, the foundation of that Empire would have been shaken, but they went into Celiberia in Spain, first to subduethat Province, and in the mean season Marius had liberty both to gather together an army, and to train them up in good Military Discipline, that they might be the fitter for service. He being therefore by this means well prepared, the enemies dividing themselves into two companies, approached with one company to his Tents. But he contained his Souldiers within their trench, thinking by this means both to make his men the more desirous to fight, and the hideous clamours of the enemies the lesse terrible by their being some time accustomed unto them. The enemies seeing this, imputed it to cowardize, and therefore presumed to passe the Alpes by them to goe towards Rome willing them in mockage, if they would any thing to their wives to send by them. But Marius now tooke his time to come forth and follow them, whereupon a bloody battell ensued, the Cymbrians falling before the Romans in great abundance, and many Teutonians. But this victory being obtained, Marius was not yet secure, for innumerable enemies still remained, although the first Army being overthrown, their women, when they fled came in great numbers with swords and spears to the fight, being enraged against the men as betrayers of them, and against the Romans as their enemies, so that many of them being mingled amongst the armed bands, fell also. Marius therefore gave order that Marcellus should goe up to an hill neere to them with 3000 men, and he having refreshed his men continued with them in the Plain. Marcellus with his men being seen by the Teutons, they presently made towards him with all their power, not having the patience to stay till he should come to a fit place to fight in: but they smarted for their haste, Marcellus with his men having the advantage of the hill, but they upon the side hill, not being able to stand, were beaten down and slain to the number of 100000, according to some 150000, to others 200000, in so much that as Plutarch sayth, the Massilians made fences about their Vineyards with their bones, and their King Teutobarchus a mighty man, was taken and carryed to Rome to be shewed in triumph. But yet neither was here an end of this War, for Boerix the King of the Cymbrians, came with a great Army against Marius and Catulus, but with as ill successe as the former, for he also lost above 100000 men, especially by the vertue of Catulus and his Army, and so Italy was again delivered from all fear of these enemies, and Marius went away with exceeding great glory, so that they offered drinke offerings to the gods and to Marius, and he was called the second founder of Rome, and was the sixth time made Consul.

After

After this for some years the Roman State being quiet, at length civil Wars were made betwixt the Citizens and the Italians, whose chiefe men having long counted themselves Romans, and dwelt in the City, whereby they were capable of the like honour with Citizens born, were by a publike Edict of the Senate commanded to depart into their own Countreies. But they being grieved at this, laboured long to have it reversed, and to have as many Knights of the Countrey made Senatours as were in Rome, viz. 300, and when they could not prevail, they departed from the City, and combined together to revolt from the Romans. Forces were then prepared on both sides 100000 men, the Romans committing theirs to both their Consuls, and certain Legats whom they joyned with them. The Italians likewise erecting a Senate of 500 men at Corfinium, made two Consuls after the Roman manner, joyning unto them 12 Emperours, halfe of which should govern over one part of Italy, and the other halfe over another. And when they came to fight, the Italians greatly prevailed at the first, & many great men of the Romans were slain. But Sylla who was one joyned to the Consul Cassius, fought prosperously in one part of Italy, and Pompey, who was a Legate joyned to the Consul Rutilius in another, slaying many of the Italians, and taking divers Towns and Cities. But at the same time the Romans had War with Mithridates in Asia also, who prevailed greatly against them, as being a King of very great power, and destroyed of them in divers parts at one time 150000 by writing his letters secretly to instigate his people to this Massacre, promising to the servant killing his Master freedom, and to debtors killing their creditors remission of halfe their debts.

But the Italick Warre, after the taking of so many places soon languished, after that it had continued foure years: and Sylla returning to Rome after his great victories was made Consul, and unto him Pompey was adjoynd. Then Asia was allotted to Sylla to goe against Mithridates, but before he went a quarrell arose betwixt him and Marius, whereupon he came with his forces against Rome, and having taken Marius sent him to prison, and after him one to kill him, whose life he had before saved in the Cymbrian Warre. But he coming to the prison where he saw Marius, threw down his sword and ran away, at this, they that were about him were so moved that they tooke him out of prison, and by ship conveyed him into Africa, being now 70 years old, where he led a poore life many dayes. Thus he who had been honoured with the Consulship six times, was at length brought very low, that all may learn the vanity of worldly wealth and honour, and not be so affected with them. Sylla then set forth against Mithridates, and having subdued Athens and other places in Greece by the way, at length Mithridates came against him with 120000 men, but he not having above the third part of this number refused to fight, till that having the advantage of a narrow passage he suddenly set upon him, when he little expected it, and overcame him, killing 10000 of his Army. In the interim Cynna being made Consul at Rome in favour of Marius opposed himselfe against those, who to appease the tumults in Italy, had consented to receive men of other Cities as Romans. Wherefore against him Octavius was made Consul, whereupon he departed out of the City, and having gathered an army, returned and besieged Rome, Marius also hearing it, being now come from his banishment, and many flocking unto him. By this means Rome was soon brought to such a streight by famine, that Cynna was sued unto for peace. But hee and Marius entered the City, killed Octavius and many of the Senatours and others, and some of great command to escape their hands killed themselves. Cynna then and Marius made themselves Consuls, but Marius dyed within 17 dayes after, exercising much cruelty to his very death, and the valiant Flaccus was by Cynna made Consul, but he being sent to the Mithridatean Warre was soon slain, and then Sylla tooke Carbo to him for his fellow Consul. Sylla in the mean season was sought unto by some Senatours which were fled unto him, to return and rescue the City ready to perish, but he prosecuting his Wars against Mithridates prepared to another Battell, unto which seeing his men unwilling, he leapt down from his horse, and laying hold of an Ensigne he went between both the Armies, his guard following

The good of one saved from death.

The fall of Marius.

him

Fimbria murders himself.

him, and cryed out, if any shall aske you (O yee Romans) where yee lett your Emperour, say, fighting at Orchomenon. His Captains then being moved at this, hastened with their bands to the battell, and overcame and killed of the enemies 15000, whereby Mithridates was so troubled, that he sought peace with Sylla, and upon some conditions obtained it, and the rather because Sylla was now proclaimed an enemy to the Roman State, and could expect no more ayd from thence. Besides, there was an Army not far off under the leading of Fimbria, who had been sent forth by Cynna with Flaccus the Consul, as his assistant, wherewith he saw that he must shortly encounter. Having therefore concluded a peace with Mithridates King of Pontus, one condition being that he should from thenceforth contain himself within his own Kingdom, he went against Fimbria. & so soone as he came neere unto him, the Souldiers of Fimbria in great multitudes revolted unto him, whereupon Fimbria being full of fear, sent to desire the speech of Sylla, but he had sent a servant secretly before to kill him, who being discovered and taken confessed it, therefore Sylla denyed to goe, and sent only another to offer him one condition, whereupon he should be saved, viz. if leaving his Army he would depart out of Asia, whereof he was Pro-Consul. Fimbria hearing this sayd, he knew a better way, and so he went to Pergamus, and in the Temple of Esculapius, thrust his sword into his own bowels, but his wound not being mortall, his servant at his intreaty dispatched him, and then slue himselfe. This being done, all his Army remaining went to Sylla. Then he settled the matters of Asia, and having exacted in all Asia 20000 talents, he went with his Army towards Italy. His coming being heard of at Rome, the Senate and City were much troubled. But Cynna and Carbo the Consuls went forth to gather up Souldiers and money to goe and meet with him. But Cynna in a mutiny of the Souldiers by the way was slain, and so Carbo returned to Rome, continuing Consul alone that year: In this time Metellus a Pro-Consul came with his forces to Sylla, and Cn. Pompeius, called afterwards the great, and Cethegus, who had formerly been his great enemy, and were all received by him at Brundisium, to which place he was come with 40000 men.

Narbo and Scipio being then made Consuls, went out with great Armies against Sylla, and first Narbo fought unhappily against him, there falling of his men 6000, and 7000 taken, and of Sylla his Army but 70. Then Scipio preparing to come on, his Souldiers being more desirous of peace, after some communication had with the Syllians, went all away from him to Sylla, who being left in a manner alone, was permitted by Sylla to return quietly to Rome. Thus the hearts of many by his humanity were won unto Sylla, and because he was carefull as he passed, that no hurt should be done to the people, insomuch that Narbo sayd of him, that he had to deale with a Lyon and a Fox, conjoynd together in him, The next year Narbo's Consulship being continued, another C. Marius, being but 20 years old was adjoynd unto him, but Narbo after many battels, his souldiers revolting daily from him to Sylla, whereby he gathered that none would be constant to him, sent first to Rome to kill such as favoured Sylla, and then after such cruelty shewed to others, killed himselfe. Marius likewise having fought unhappily against Metellus, and seeking to escape secretly was slain, and his head brought to Sylla, upbrayding him by this, that he would take upon him the government of the ship, before that he had acted any of the Mariners part. Then Sylla easily tooke the City, and exercised most horrible cruelty, in proscribing 40 Senatours at once, and above 1000 Knights and principall men, even all that he heard tooke part with Narbo or Marius, so that who so would might kill them, and he that killed one was promised two talents, and a reward was promised to him that discovered any of them, and such as hid them were threatned with death. Sylla having now all at his will, would be made Dictatour, and was, and reigned most tyrannically, yet to retain the old form, he caused also two Consuls to be chosen, and replenished the Senate with such as he thought good, and then triumphed for his victory over Mithridates. Pompey also who pursued Scipio at his appoyntment into Africa, and slue him, and got other victories, being but 24 or 26 years old, returning triumphed also, though at the first demand denyed it by Sylla.

After

After all this Sylla having been Dictatour three years, and now giving leave to choose new Consuls, and he being chosen by the people, to flatter with him, he refused and set up two others, Servilius and Claudius, and then publicly deposed his Dictatorship to the admiration of all men. Because that he having been the death of so many, might now being divested of his authority feare hard measure at some of their friends hands, there having perished above 100000 men of the adverse faction, 90 Senatours, 15 Consuls, 2600 Knights, by his means. Yet he fearing nothing, as having 150000 in divers parts, that had been employed in his wars, and enriched by him, went to his Cumana, and there led a private life, recreating himselfe with hunting and hauking. But he continued not thus any longer then to the year following. He dedicated the tenth part of his estate to Hercules, and then made a great feast for many dayes, in such excessive manner, that such meat which could not be eaten, was cast into the river, and the wine then drunk, was 40 years old. In the midst of these dayes, his wife Metella dyed, and he married the daughter of Hortensius, who bare him a sonne after his death, called Posthumus. Sylla then giving himselfe to all manner of pleasure, having divers Musicians and jesters about him, with whom he set up drinking in the night, fell into a disease, through which he swarmed with lice, which increased faster then they could be taken away, till at length he vomiting much blood, gave up the ghost, as he was well worthy, for having been the author of so much cruelty and bloodshed, the Devill also appeared unto him for his greater terrour, and yet this man for his admirable successe in all things attempted by him, assumed to himselfe the name of Felix, as accounting himselfe happie therefore. And indeed so he was, as much as this world could make him happie, as having been always successefull to this 60 year of his age, wherein he dyed. And after his death although Lepidus then Consul withstood it, he was by his friends buried after the Roman manner in Martius field, where none but Kings used to be buried in great pomp. For he was carryed out in a chest of gold, many Trumpeters sounding before him, and many Minstrels placed here and there amongst the people, singing mournfull songs as they went, and thus he was carryed through Italy to Rome, where the Senatours, and great multitudes of others met him, and above 1000 crowns of gold were presented to be carryed before him, and above 200 pounds of sweet spices were brought by women to burn with him, and Serjeants, as when he was Dictatour, went before him, and finally in Martius field, he was in a short time burnt to ashes, when the most eloquent man in the City had first made an Oration in his praise.

In their return from his funerall, Lepidus then Consul being of the Marian faction spake against this pompous funerall of an enemy of the Roman State, and in prayse of it spake Carulus the other Consul, and Lepidus also threatned to release those whom Sylla had proscribed, and to take away the possessions in Italy given by Sylla to his men, and to restore them to their former owners. But Carulus opposed him, the Senate feared it might come to a civill War, and therefore bound them both from it by oath. Lepidus yet not fearing this gathered an army abroad, and came against this City, Carulus defended it, and overcoming Lepidus put him to flight, and soon after he dyed of a consumption, so they never prosper that break their oaths. Lepidus being dead, Porpenna with part of his army went to Sertorius a great Commander in Spain to joyne with him, as being both of the same faction, against whom therefore Metellus a Syllanian was formerly sent. But now Pompey was desirous of that Province, and having by much importunity obtained it of Carulus, he hastened thither, and at the first fighting with Sertorius he was put to flight and lost many of his men, and after this, though at the first he had the better of it, yet hastning the second time to the fight without Metellus his assistance he lost many of his men and had lost more, but that Metellus haply came in the instant, and then Sertorius retired. Whereby we may see, how ambitious men, whilst they seek all the glory alone are in danger to lose all. For this made Pompey to hasten alone to this battell, that Metellus being a coward might not share with him in the honour of the victory. But having renewed his army, he came on again, and put Metellus in such hazard, that he retired in-Appianus.

Plutarch.

Sylla a blood-shedder, dyeth vomiting blood.

The Romans manner of buriall.

An oath broken punished.

to Appianus.

Plutarch.

Severity in an army.The immense riches of Crassus.

to France, and Pompey wanting pay for his men towards Italy, but sending before to Rome for a supply of money. This though slowly, was granted, and now also Sertorius began to decline, through the revolt of many soldiers from him, who went away to Metellus, as being discontented, that he should preferre the Celteberians to be his Guard rather then them, his own countrymen. Thus Appianus, but Plutarch imputes it to the pride of Perpenna, his fellow, every where detracting from him. Yet Sertorius having the Celteberians fast to him for his great valour fought again against Pompey and prevailed. But hee growing more distrustfull and cruell by reason of their revolt was much hated by those that followed him, and then Perpenna with ten more conspired to kill him, which was accordingly done at a feast, to which he was by Perpenna invited. But when he was slain, their hatred towards him was turned into pity and against Perpenna, whereby he was in great danger, but by faire speeches and great gifts he escaped, yet that murder was not long unrevenge: for fighting with Pompey, within a few dayes after he was overcome, and fleeing and hiding himself, taken, and by the command of Pompey slain before that hee was brought into his presence, although he desired first to be brought, because he had sundry conspiracies in Rome to reveal unto him. But Pompey thinking, that thus an occasion might be given of new stirrs, wisely refused to heare him, and prevented this by cutting him off. Perpenna being dead, some of his men fled into divers places and were slain, and some submitted to Pompey and the Celteberians likewise, & thus after a War of 10 years peace again followed in Spain. But before the end of this War, another began in Italy by one Spartacus, called bellum gladiatorum: and a third Warre by Mithridates King of Pontus. For Spartacus with divers other Frenchmen to the number of 700 or 80 being Sword-players, & held as Captives since the Warres of France conspired together to go out of the City, and to get arms and fight for their liberty, which they did with such successe, that in short times their numbers increased to 7000, and afterwards to 10000, and encountering the forces sent against them, they grew formidable to Rome it self. Inasmuch that none durst take upon him to be Pretour, till that Crassus a noble and rich man offering himselfe made them all glad. Hee therefore with six Legions went out of the City in the third year of this Warre, and two Legions remayning of them, who had often fled under other Commanders before, began first to proceed severely against them, punishing every tenth man with death. Then setting forth to this War he fought at the first unhappily, for his men fled before their enemies, but he having exercised the like severity upon 500 of them, who began first to flee, by killing every tenth man, brought on his army again and prevailed; Spartacus fighting most valiantly in this battell being slain, and all his forces disperfed the fourth year after this War begun. Pompey then returning from Spain triumphed and was made Consul, and Crassus together with him, his consent being first obtained. And yet after they were Consuls, they kept both their armies on foot to the terrour of the City, fearing, suffering by their differences. But being perswaded they shaked hands and disbanded. And Crassus to shew his greatnesse made a feast to the Romans, preparing 10000 tables, and gave all the City bread corn for three moneths, when there were in Rome 450000 persons.

1. To return now to Mithridates, he having had peace granted him by Sylla, would happily have continued quiet, but that Sertorius sent from Spain unto him, as desirous to stirre up against the Roman State all the trouble that he could, one Marius to certifie him of the civill Wars in Italy, and of his own power in Spain, who would be a friend unto him in any thing that hee should desire, and to stirre him up to take this opportunity to invade the Romans Dominions in those parts. Wherefore, the King of Bythinia being lately dead without children, and by his last Testament, giving his Kingdome to the Romans, Mithridates with a great army first invaded Bythinia, which being weakly defended by Catta, came in a great part into his hands. But Lucullus being sent from Rome to this Warre according to his own desire, first beat Mithridates from thence: and afterwards he warring against Cizicum, a City which stuck fast to the Romans, he so cut off his provision, that he compelled him to rayse his siege, and in his return took his opportunity opportunity to cut off many thousands of his army, so that he fled into parts farther off, having lost almost all his Army, being at the first 30000, but the Romans Army not much above 30000: then he gathered a new power of 40000, besides many horsemen: but sending out his horsemen to take away all provision, that Lucullus might through want be brought to the like streight: that he had been before Cizicum, they were encountered by the Roman horsemen, and taken at such an advantage, that they were almost all slain, so that Mithridates being discouraged hereby fled, and all his Army without regard to any Leaders, and so he came to Tigranes King of Armenia, a King now of many Kingdoms, since the accession of Syria to his dominions and his son in law, yet so proud was he, that hearing of his coming, he only sent to direct him to a strong place within his Dominions, and not to his Court. But that was only whilst he was busie in warring in another place. For returning to Armenia, Mithridates came unto him. Then Appianus Claudius was sent Embassadour to Tigranes by Lucullus to demand Mithridates, to whom he coming, after long travell and delay, by reason of the Kings absence, required him to deliver Mithridates to be carried to Lucullus, but he denied, saying, that if Lucullus should come for him he would defend him. With this answer Appianus returned, telling of the great State of Tigranes, as having many Kings subject to him, and foure continually to attend him, wherefore he was offended at Lucullus his letters written to him without the style of King of Kings. Lucullus in this interim tooke the Cities and Towns of Mithridates, and with 11000 men took his journey towards Armenia. Tigranes preparing for him, gathered an Army of 250000 foot, and 50000 horse, insomuch that when Lucullus his Army came in sight, he asked whether they were Embassadours, and being told that it was the Roman Army, he sayd that they were too many indeed to be Embassadours, but too few for an Army. Then he wished that all the Roman Captains had been there, that he might have overcome them all together, so confident was he of the victory, by reason of his surpassing great forces. But Lucullus coming to joyne battell with him, handled the matter so politickly, that all his great army was soon routed, and he made to flee, and to cast away his Crown and Royall Ensignes, from him that he might not be known. For having set his horsemen to begin the battell upon the face of the enemy, he fetching a compasse with his foot came upon their backs, and soon routed the whole Army, killing about 100000 men, and losing only five of his men, and 100 wounded. The King then fleeing, Lucullus did forbear to pursue far, choosing rather to return and take the chiefe City of Tigranes, called Tigranoferta, which he did, and found 8000 talents therein. Thence moving to other great places, he fought against and overcame them. But the two Kings in the mean season gathered a new Army, which was committed to the leading of Mithridates, & then Lucullus his Souldiers mutining against him & many falling from him to a new Commander, sent from Rome to take his place, began to decline, and having sometimes fought unhappily, was left at length almost alone. And now a new war began, called the Pyraticall war, by means of certain Pyrats at the first sent out by Mithridates to take what prizes they could by sea from the Romans, which in the time of these troubles grew into great numbers, and became formidable to all that travelled by Sea and Maritim Towns. The Senate therefore being much perplexed at the hearing of it, thought of sending out a power against them, whose rendezvous was in Cilicia. And upon whom should the whole state now pitch, but upon Pompey, as being grown most famous of all others. But the Senate fearing lest he being let up, should become another Sylla, yet the people consenting about him, because he stood for the restoring of the Tribunes, whom Sylla had put down, he had full power given him for three years, to gather what forces he would, and to rule both by sea and land, wherefore he prepared many ships, and made many Captains, committing severall parts unto them, and power as Emperours in those parts, reserving to himselfe a power over them all, to overlook them, & to be ready to help any of them, as most need should require. By this means the Pyrats being in dangered in every place at once, soon submitted themselves to Pompey, and so this war with little fighting, was ended in little more then 3 moneths, and the Pyrats had the mercy to be spared their lives, but were sent to live in places most remote and unpleasant.

The fall of pride.

Happinesse here fading.

Then Pompey passed over into Asia to the Mithridatean war, although the Senate was very unwilling, partly for the reason before going, and partly because Marcus his year, who was sent last thither, was not yet ended. Pompey meeting with Lucullus in Galathia, after some expostulation between them took away all his men, but only 1600, whom he knew to be discontented with him: then he went against Mithridates, who retired with his forces into the inner part of the kingdom, and Pompey followed, commanding provision to be brought after him, lest his army should want, and by a long trench kept Mithridates his Army from coming abroad for provision, so that they were almost starved. Therefore he went away in the night through rockie places to a most strong hold, but even there he was overcome and his men slain, and he by fleeing escaped, and travelled into all parts for the renewing of his Army, but could never gather together any power more. Tigranes also his son in law rejected him, & forbade him coming into Armenia, because he thought him to be author of his sons rebellion against him, who was now fled for ayd to Phraates King of Scythia, but Phraates perswaded him to go to Pompey, which he did, and Tigranes hearing it, went himselfe also, trusting to the equity of Pompey, for which he was grown famous. Coming neer by Serjeants, that were sent out to meet him, he was bidden to alight from his horse, and did so, and delivered his sword unto them, and came and cast his Crown down at Pompeys feet: but he arising took him by the hand, and made him sit down by him on his right hand, and his son Tigranes on his left. Then after the Kings relation heard, Pompey determined that the son should have Armenia the lesser, and the father the Kingdom of Armenia, leaving it to him as his heir after his decease, and that Tigranes should leave Syria which he then held, and pay for the charges of the Mithridatean war, of which he had been in part the cause, 6000 talents. All which he did, and more, & so Syria was thenceforth made a Province. But young Tigranes ungratefully crossing Pompey, and using his father unreverently, did not only not enjoy that which was given him, but it was restored to his father again, and he was sent bound to Rome, and being there in prison when it was found that he wrote to the Parthians, to stir them up to war against the Romans, he was slain in prison. About two years before this Alexandra the Queen of the Jews being dead, Hircanus her son who had hitherto been High-priest attained to the kingdom. But Aristobulus his younger brother gathered great forces, came against him and overcame him, who fled to the Castle, wherein the wife and children of Aristobulus were. Therefore the brethren came to a parley, and it was agreed that Aristobulus should be King, & Hircanus should lead a private life. But Hircanus not long after through the perswasion of Antipater an Idumæan & a rich man, sought the kingdom again, as his due. He therefore fled with the sayd Antipater to Aretas King of the Arabians, to whom he had made large offers, to help him to his Kingdom again. Then Aretas preparing an Army of 50000 horse and foot, went with Hircanus against Aristobulus. He being in Jerusalem made strong resistance against the enemy, inasmuch that there being a most holy man, Onias, who had before prevailed for rain in time of drought when hee prayed, they fetching him to the Arabian Army would compell him to pray against Aristobulus, this he long refused to doe, but being over urged, he at length prayed thus. O God, the King of the whole world, for as much as they that are with us be thy people, and they which are besieged by them are thy Priests, I beseech thee that thou wouldest neither hear these praying against them, nor them against these. The wicked Jews in the Army hearing him say so, were enraged against him and overwhelmed him with stones. Then the Feast of the Pasche being come, and the Priests within wanting sacrifices to offer, they prayed some of their brethren without to help them to beasts for their money, they asking 1000 drams a head, promised so to furnish them. But having taken their money, they derided them and would not doe it. Hereat the Priests being greatly moved, prayed God to shew some judgment upon them, which he did soon after, by sending such a storm as marred the fruits of the earth, whereby a great dearth followed, and so the siege could be no longer continued. Soone after this, Pompey coming from Armenia, sent Scaurus before him into Syria, to whom coming to Damascus, both Aristob. and Hircanus sent Embassadors, craving the

Ro-

A son rebellious punished.

Anno mundi, 3900.

Ioseph. l. 14. c. 1. 2.

Cap. 9.

An honest Prayer.

An horrible murder of an holy man.

Romans friendship and aid. But Aristobulus, for 300 talents obtained his favour, so as that he sent to Hircanus as he tendered the Romans favour to abstain from warre with his brother and to goe out of Judæa, which he therefore did, and returned with King Aretas again into Arabia. Then Aristobulus having gathered together an Army went against them to a place called Papyron, and fighting with them got the victory, slaying 7000 men. And hearing that Pompey was now come to Damascus, both he and other Princes sent rich presents unto him: his being a golden vine of 500 talents, sent by Nicomedes his Embassadour, and Antipater came Embassadour for Hircanus. The one pleaded that he was the elder brother, and wrongfully by the younger put out of his Kingdom, the other that for his sloth and want of courage, he was cast out by the people, so that either he must take the Kingdom, or else it would lie open to the taking of some other. Pompey having heard them, sayd, that when he had settled the matters of Arabia he would come into Judæa and end their difference, using Aristobulus especially most kindly, and willing them both to be quiet in the mean season. Aristobulus notwithstanding being afraid of the worst, returned and sought to strengthen Judæa against the Romans comming. Pompey hearing this left his journey into Arabia, and calling his forces together marched towards Judæa, Hircanus and his friends being with him and urging him so to doe. Aristobulus fled to a Castle, but Pompey approaching, he descended to him, and offered both himselfe and Kingdom to his disposing, promising to let him in to Jerusalem, and to give him 700 talents. But Galinius being by Pompey sent for the money, was both denyed to enter, and returned empty. Pompey therefore bound Aristobulus and laid siege to Jerusalem, some that were on Hircanus his part perswaded to let him in, but they that were for Aristobulus denyed. Yet by Hircanus his faction he was let in & then went to the Temple where his enemies were, and having battered it three moneths he took it, and his souldiers breaking in slue 12000 of the Jews, the Priests in the mean season nothing daunted hereat, standing still in their places to do the offices belonging to the day, being a fasting day, so were they moved with Religion, more then with the fear of death. Then also as Josephus sayth, all the people within the Temple shewed great piety, because that during the time of the siege they did nothing upon the Sabbath day in seeking to hinder the Romans, and to beat them from their works made before the Temple, as holding it unlawfull for reverence of that day, although they held it not unlawfull to fight in their own defence, if their enemies assaulted them upon that day, but this difference putting was not without superstition. Pompey having won the Temple entered in and saw the golden Table and Mercie Seat, and 2000 talents in the treasury, but tooke nothing away for reverence of the place, and having caused the Temple to be purged, he made Hircanus High-priest, who so continued 22 years. Thus Judæa, which had been free now 80 years, and under her own governours, became tributary to the Romans paying, as Josephus sayth, 10000 talents and being deprived of the parts of Cælosyria formerly subdued by the Jews, because Pompey made them free, and commanded that they should live under their own President, and this came to passe through the dissention of two brothers about the kingdom. For it was made free in the first year of Simon Prince & High-priest, viz. anno 3823 and was now again brought under tribute, anno 3903. Pompey having settled these things left Syria, and hastened towards Rome, as Josephus sayth. But according to others he first composed the difference between Tigranes King of Armenia, and Phraates King of Parthia, and then addressed himselfe towards Mithridates King of Pontus, who had now gathered together an Army again of 36000. Yet he sent Embassadours to Pompey for peace, but he willed that he should come himselfe, from which he desired to be excused, feigning that he was broken out in his face, & therefore suffered no man to see him, but only three Eunuchs that tended upon him. And when this would not satisfie Pompey, he thought to send to the French & so to passe over to them to war against Italy, but his people wearied with his exactions to maintain his Army revolted from him, and his eldest sonne Pharnaces together with many of his Souldiers, conspired against him, and when they were about to take him, he would have poysoned himselfe, but because he had oft used means of preservation, the poylon would not work upon him, and therefore he killed him.

Ioseph. l. 14. c. 8.

The Jews Superstition.

Anno 3903.

Orosius. Appianus.

himselfe with his sword, according to some, according to others, procured a friend to doe this execution, fearing that if he were taken, he should be carryed in triumph at Rome. His Body then was sent by Pharnaces to Pompey, who also submitted himselfe and Kingdom to him, and so was taken for a friend to the Romans, and had the Kingdom of Bosphorus given him. But Pompey insulted not over the dead body of the King, but committed it to the buriall, so Mithridates after 27 years wars with the Romans, dyed, Anno 68 or 69 of his age, when he had reigned about 50 years.

After this Pompey prepareth to return home to Rome, sending before Piso to demand the Consulship after Cicero his year expired, for he and Anthony were then Consuls, but their time was almost out. The Fathers and all the people for fear of Pompey, presently chose Piso Consul. And Pompey tarried still in Asia, he built divers Cities, that he might leave behinde him a memoriall of his victories. In the year of Cicero his Consulship, Catalin with many more conspired against him, and again disquieted the Roman State, but his conspiracie being discovered, some of his chiefe associates were taken in Rome and exempted, and hee soone in battell slain. For the Jewish affairs. Alexander the sonne of Aristobulus after Pompey departue, who carryed his father away bound with him, gathered together an Army of 10000 foot and 1500 horse, wherefore Gabinus was sent against him, and other Roman Captains, who together with the Jews that continued in obedience to the Romans, fought against him neer to Jerusalem, and slue 3000 of his men, and tooke 3000, then he pursued him to Alexandria, to which City he had fled. But Alexander soon yielded, and so the City was beaten down, and others that lay desolate before were rebuilt, and five Lords being set to rule over that whole Region, the Romans departed thence. One of these had his seat at Jerusalem, another at Gadara, the third at Amathuntis, the fourth at Jericho, the fifth at Saphora. And now the time came of Pompey return to Rome, when all feared that he would use his power to set Sylla his part over again, and Crassus in particular fearing it, conveyed himselfe and his family and goods out of the City. But he contrariwise when he came nigh to Rome, dismissed his Army to their own houses, willing them only to be present at his triumph. This being heard in Rome, did so affect the Senate and City, that they went forth in great abundance to meet him, and conducted him into the City with all joy. Then at his request again new Consuls were made, Afranius and Metellus Celer, and he triumphed most gloriously, as Conqueror of all the parts of the World, about 35 of his age. But to shew the instability of this worlds glory, so soon as his triumph was over his enemies began to oppose him, so that now he repented his so sudden dismissing of his Army, for first Metellus, by his means made Consul, opposed him for his sisters sake, whom Pompey for her light behaviour had put away, after her returning out of Syria. And for Afranius, the other Consul, hee gave his minde so much to musick, and dancing, and pleasure, that he stood him in no stead. At that time I. Caesar began to be famous for his victories in Spain, and bringing the whole Countrey into the subjection of the Romans. Returning therefore to Rome he would have triumphed, but because he had not yet been Consul, and so could not, he omitting that sought the Consulship, and attained it. Bibulus being made his Colleague. Then Caesar ambitious of honour and dominion, thought it necessary first to joine in friendship with Pompey and Crassus for their great power with the people, then he sought to come into grace with the people, by propounding a law for the dividing of the common field amongst them, which he had so equally prepared that none could speak against it, yet neither would Bibulus, nor many of the Senatours consent unto it, and after this hee sought to come in grace with the Knights, by propounding a Law of remitting to them the third part of their tributes, which passed, and to make that for the people to passe also, he called Pompey and Crassus, and publicly asked what either of them thought of that Law: They both, as he knew well enough before, applauded it, and then an Ordinance was made, that upon pain of death every one should be sworn to it, whereupon for fear, all the Senatours yielded. Thus Caesar prevailed in the time of his Consulship, and when his time was out he procured *Ioseph. lib. 14.

cap 10.*

*Salustius.
Plutarch.*

Gabinus, whose daughter he had married, and Piso that had married his daughter to be the Consuls of the next year, and to him was assigned the Province of France. But Cicero in the mean time went down by means of Clodius, Tribune of the people, who was very sharp against him, and brought him in danger of his life by a Law that he made of putting such to death as had caused any to be cut off without the consent of the people, as he had not long before done. Wherefore he having first basely sought to every one whom he met of the common sort, and not prevailing, went into voluntary exile, and Cato his chiefe friend was sent away to be over the affairs of Cyprus. But he continued not so long, for Pompey falling out with Clodius, obtained of the Senate to spight him, that Cicero was called home again, and Clodius his Law was reversed. Then their being great scarcity of coine in Italy, Pompey had power given him over all the World in that matter. Cæsar in the mean while prevailed mightily in France, and against the Germans and Belgians, by slaying at sundry times many thousands, and taking many prisoners, bringing them all under obedience, in all which battells, the great expedition that he made gave him the most advantage. His fame then by his victories increasing, when the first three years of his being over that Province were ended, he had five years more granted him, and it was agreed by 200 Senators, and 120 Serjeants that came to him with other great persons to Luca, where hee wintered, that Pompey and Crassus should bee Consuls, which was also, though with great contention, done accordingly. Cato a wise Senatour and a lover of the Common-wealth, who was now again with great glory come out of Cyprus, seeing this feared a tyranny to ensue, and therefore desired to be made Pretor, which for the great respect wherein he was had by the people, was granted, but so earnestly opposed by Pompey, that he found means to set up Vatinius for Pretor, and Cato was rejected, who thereupon foretold the evils that were like to ensue to the State by these Consuls, when they feared to have him Pretor. A law then was made by the Tribune of the people, that Crassus should go to Syria, where Gabinus had hitherto been, and Pompey to Spain. Cæsar having his time prolonged, prepared to sayl over into Brittain, because hee heard, that the Brittons had sent supplies to the French against him. He passed over therefore with his army, where the Sea was narrowest, but not without losse of some of his ships, the Brittons then came to him to sue for peace, but when his Navy lying at anchor had suffered shipwrack by a great tempest arising at that time, they armed to fight against him. But being overcome, they soon sued to him again for peace, which he granted, and requiring hostages to be sent after him into France, which they promised, returned thither again, and then went against the Germans and Svedes, and prevayling every where, because two Cities only sent him hostages from Brittain, he sayled thither again, but with great losse in his Navy, as at the first. Yet he so prevailed, that then he made tributary Brittain to the Romans. But for Crassus, he being appointed to Syria out of his covetousnes and ambition, bent his mind rather to go against Parthia, where no Roman Commander had hitherto been, thinking therefore by subduing the Parthians to get him the more glory and riches. But most unwisely when he had made known this his intent, he went first into Syria, giving the Parthians time to prepare for him to his own destruction. Then coming to Jerusalem he robbed the Temple of that treasure, which Pompey for reverence to the place could not touch, viz. of 2000 talents of Gold, and 8000 more layd up there, as Josephus sayth: neyther was this all, but a beam of Gold weighing 300 pound, covered over with Cedar board, of which none knew, but Eleazar, the keeper of the ornaments, and it was by him given to Crassus fearing, that hee would otherwise take away all precious utensils of the Temple, Crassus swearing to him at the same time to the contrary. But notwithstanding his oath he carried all away, yet he had not long joy of it. For going from Syria towards Parthia, when he would by no means be stayed from that expedition, it turned to the overthrow of his whole army and his own destruction also in the end. For Ordes the Parthian King sent Embassadors to him before his setting out to know the cause why he would make war upon him: but he contemptuously answered, that he would make the cause known, when he came to Seleucia, where-

10f. lib. 14. c. 12.

Sacrilige punishment.

unto unto Vasiges the chiefe Embassadour answered, saying, here shall sooner grow haire, holding up the palme of his hand, then thou shalt come to Seleucia. Then Orodes sent out forces to reduce such places to his obedience; as had revolted from him, and also to keep the King of Armenia from helping the Romans. By this means some of the Romans, who were left to keep those places, had a taste of the Parthians valour, and fleeing with great feare came and told Crassus, whereupon the Captains and Souldiers dissuaded him from that War. But hee being resolutely bent would harken to none of them, and so comming to battell, the Parthian bowmen sent forth such a shoure of arrows, that many of his men were slain, whilst they were but approaching towards them. Crassus then hoping, that this storme would not last long encouraged his men hereby, but when news was brought him, that there weren any Camels laden with arrows wherewith the Parthians were again supplied when their first were spent, he put on to come to handy stroaks, but the Parthians retiring kept them still at a distance killing and, slaying as they did before, and when the Romans came up to them, they came with such violence, pierc'd them with their spears, that sometimes they thrust through two of them at once. The night comming on ended the battell, and in the night Crassus with only foure bands of men in silence fled. The next day the Parthians pursued him, but he had placed himselfe and men, so that the Parthian horfemen could not come at them, wherefore Syrenas the Parthian General dealt politickly, by going and offering to make peace with the Romans upon reasonable terms, if Crassus would come forth unto him, to whom he offered his hand for assurance. But Crassus suspecting fraud refused, yet so desirous of peace were his souldiers, that they urged him to go and hee went, though unwillingly and then in a short time hee had the reward of his sacrilege and covetousnesse by being slain, when hee was mounted upon an horse trapped with Gold given him by Syrenas in the Kings name. Being dead, his head was cut off, and his right hand, and his mouth filled with Gold; caried about with contempt. Then almost all his men, that remayned with him were destroyed also. But neyther Syrenas nor Orodes his Master went long unpunished for this their perfidy, for Syrenas was slain by Orodes enuying this his glory, and Orodes soon after lost Pacorus his son in battell against the Romans, and then his other son Phraates gave his father poyson, and when it wrought away by reason of the hydropicalnesse of his body doing him more good then hurt he strangled him, till that he dyed.

Touching the Jewish affairs, when Gabinus having overthrown Alexander the son of Aristobulus, as was sayd before, thought, that novv the Jews would be quiet, Aristobulus being hitherto a prisoner at Rome, escaped from thence and came again to Judaea, and entring into Alexandria, attempted to fortifie it by the help of many Jews, that flockt unto him: but Gabinus sending out forces hindered him from that, then he fled to the Castle of Macherntis, taking only 8000 men vvith him. But Gabinus comming thither with his army, it was vvithin two days taken and Aristobulus being diversly vvounded, came again into the Romans hands together vvith his son Antigonus, and was the second time sent prisoner to Rome. Then Aristobulus his son Alexander gathered nev v forces to the number of 30000: but Antipater was sent to the Jews to persvade them to peace, and vvhen he could not prevail vvith Alexander, another battell was fought betvvixt him and Gabinus, vvherein Alexander was again overcome, and 10000 of his army slain, the rest being put to flight. So Gabinus, his time being expired, hee committed the ordering of things there to Antipater, and returned to Rome. Then Crassus comming to governe in Syria, robbed the Temple of infinite riches, as was sayd before, and Josephus to prove it true, that the Temple had then in it so much treasure, alledgeth Strabo and some other reason to make it probable, which I omit, as thinking it almost incredible for the vastnesse of the sum, the Temple having been often pillaged and poled before by other Tyrants. Crassus then by going against the Parthians, brought himselfe to ruine, and Cassius escaping out of that war came to Syria, and being thither pursued by the Parthians he defended the Countrey against them, and repelled them. Then he fought against those Jews that held vvith Aristobulus under Ptholans his Captain, and slue both him, and Perfidy punished.

Joseph. lib. 14.
c. 11.

many many of them, being specially stirred up by Antipater, who was the father of Herod, afterwards King, for he was a man of great authority amongst the Arabians, having to wife Cyprien an Idumæan of a most Noble Family, of whom came King Herod Phasaelus, Josephus and Pherotas, and by confederating with other great Princes, especially Arabians, he grew very potent. And he himself as Josephus sayth, was an Idumæan, rich and factious, and the first occasion of setting Aristobulus the King of Judea, and Hircannus together by the ears, whereby that Kingdom was again brought under tribute by Pompey, as was shewed before. And by this means he came into grace with the Romans, as siding with Hircannus, who was always more yielding and submisse towards them, then his brother Aristobulus, whereby he layd a foundation of his sonne Herods future rise to the Kingdom.

To return to Rome, whilst Cassius Questor to Crassus, after his death, ruled in Syria, and Cæsar continued still in his wars in France and Germany, great contention happened between Milo and Clodius at Rome, and Clodius in this dissention being slain, those that were on Clodius his side, armed and came to the Senate, where Milo was, excusing himselfe, so that he was slain speedily to flee disguised, and hereupon followed other great tumults in the City, the rude multitude under colour of seeking Milo from house to house, robbing and spoyling many. Then the Senate not knowing otherwise what to doe, first thought of a Dictator, but fearing to set up such a Magistrate, when they remembered Sylla and his tyranny, by Caro's perswasion it was agreed, that one man should be Consul alone, and that Pompey for his valour, justice, and love, should be the man. Then Pompey with his forces comming into the City, soon quieted all things, and then married the daughter of Scipio, and took him into the fellowship of his Consulship, and soon after obtained the Province of Spain for foure or five years. In the mean season Cæsar by reason of these tumults at Rome was put to much trouble in France, many Cities then taking heart to rise up in Arms again and to fight for their liberty, supposing that he would hasten to Rome to quiet those stirs. But he hearing thereof, and withall that Pompey by his wisdom had settled the Roman affairs, betooke himselfe again with all speed to his forces, and gathered them together, and went out with such celerity in the dead time of winter, that he was ready to give battell to his enemies before they thought him to have been returned, and after many fights so brought them under again, as that both they and their King were at his mercie, whereby he got abundance of treasure, and then it being granted that he should be the second time Consul, he shewed so great liberality to the people and souldiers doubling their stipends for ever that hee wonne their hearts, and so laid a foundation to his rise to the Empire. At Rome the news of Cæsar's victories being heard, Letanies, or Thanksgivings were determined for 20 dayes to be made unto their gods. But after this Cæsar still stayd in France, & Pompey not being yet gone out of Italy into Spain, new Consuls were made after his time expired, viz. Marcellus and Salpistius. Then Cæsar sued to be continued in his Province sometime longer, fearing least if hee left it and returned to Rome to a private condition Pompey would be to mighty for him. But Marcellus being for Pompey, would not permit it, of this Cæsar being informed, sayd, then this shall doe it, pointing to his sword: yet nothing was done, till Marcellus his time was expired, then succeeded in the Consulship another Marcellus and Paulus, the one an enemy to Cæsar, the other wonne unto him by his profuse gifts, and Curio was Tribune of the people, who also seemed to be an enemy but was indeed a friend. For not long after upon some dissention Marcellus going to Pompey, and of his own head, without the consent of the Senate, committing the government of the City to him he went to Cæsar, who having first settled things in France and Belgia, returned into Italy, where he was joyfully received of the people. But he stayed at Ravenna, till he had sent Letters to the Senate by Curio, & received answer. Therein he offered to lay down arms and to dismisse his forces, if Pompey would do the like, if this offer should not be accepted, he would come with his forces to be revenged upon his enemies. This was presently taken; as a denouncing of War, and immediatly great treasures were delivered to Pompey, and souldiers diers were raised in all parts, although Cæsar had also offered, if the Senate should think good rather, that Pompey should go forthwith into his Province of Spain, he would continue in France with only two Legions, till hee were declared Consul for the next year, which he had now long desired. Cæsar hearing of their preparation spake unto his souldiers, who had been under his Empire 10 or 11 years, exhorting them to stick to him to defend him from his enemies, which were only the 13 Legion then present. They readily assenting, he presently calling more out of France, set upon divers Cities in Italy, and took them, inasmuch that the report hereof comming to Rome they greatly feared, neyther durst any come forth against him, wherefore he over-ran all Piceum, the Towns and Cities all readily yielding to him. Then he went to Corfinium, where Domitius, a Captain of Pompeys was with 20 bands of men. He then preparing to besiege the City, Domitius sent to Pompey for ayd, but having a negative answer, and that hee should get away as well as he could, and come with his mento him, he prepared so to do, but his souldiers turned to Cæsar, and delivered him into Cæsars hands the next day, and then many Senators and Knights present there yielded themselves, all whom and Domitius hee dismissed without hurt, although Domitius despayring tooke poyson first, but then seeing his humanity repented, and the supposed poyson wrought no further, but to bring him to a sleep. Cæsar also let him carry away with him great treasure, which lay there for the pay of his army. This kindnesse and bounty of Cæsar drew many more of Pompeys souldiers daily to him. Cæsar then went against Pompey, who fled before him to Brundisium. Cæsar followed him thither and besieged the City yet he invited Pompey first to a Colloquy, which he refused, then seeing Cæsars preparations against the City hee sayled away and left Brundisium and all Italy to Cæsar. The next day Brundisium was yielded, and Pompey bending his course to Spain, where he thought, that the people would stick to him, Cæsar went to Rome, and without bloodshed brought all under his power, offering still to the Senate to have Embassadors sent to Pompey for peace, but none durst undertake that task. Then Cæsar demanding money out of the treasury for his souldiers was denied, but the treasury being by his men broken open, he took abundance, and immediatly sent forth one of his Captains to take in Sardinia, another to Sicily, and a third to Africk, which they did. But Pompey commanded over all Spain, Syria, and the Eastern parts. Wherefore Cæsar let loose Aristobolus, who had been hitherto prisoner at Rome to go into Syria to repossess his Kingdom in Judea, for this he thought, would be a weakning to Pompey. But he was poysoned and dyed by the way by some, that favoured Pompey, and order was also immediatly taken, that Alexander his sonne being in Judea should be slain also, lest he should make any new stirs there, and this was done by Scipio, President of Syria under Pompey. Then Cæsar himself hastened into Spain, passing thither by France, and there increasing his army. Being come into Spain and besieging Massilia, hee was sometime brought into great streights for want of provision. Yet he was soon again delivered out of that danger, and in a Sea-fight his overcoming their enemies, Massilia being terrified yielded, and so did many Cities more in Spain, a great motive to them still being his humanity towards all. Cæsar then returned to Rome again where he was made Dictatour, but leaving that office within 14 dayes, the 11 year being now come wherein hee might be made Consul according to Law, which willeth that 10 years come between the same mans being Consul the first and second time, he and P. Servilius were made Consuls. This being done, he applyed his minde chiefly to pursue Pompey, who had at Cæsars first comming into Spain before spoken of left it and gone into Asia to raise forces there, For he thought whilst he continued, he could not come to that power which he desired. Into Asia therefore he followed him, and came to Ephesus, where all readily yielded unto him.

Pompey hearing this, leaves Thessalonica, where he had thought to have wintered, and travelled night and day till he came at Durrachium, where all his provision lay, Cæsar also hastening to the same place, so that now their Armies were neere one another, a river only parting them. Then some attempt was made again by Cæsar, to come to agreement, but in vain, seeing both aymed at the

the chief power, and Pompey would not live through Cæsars favour. For Pompey, he had far greater forces, and was better provided then Cæsar, having such forces at Sea also, under the leading of Bibulus, as that he had the command thereof, and Anthony a Captain of Cæsars with his power, deferred also to come unto him. But at length he came, and Scipio out of Syria to Pompey, and then Cæsar had a great desire to fight, but Pompey would not stir from an hill, where hee had seated himselfe for his most advantage, untill that Cæsar making away, as if he would depart thence, he came down, at what time he turning back upon him, and the battell began, Cæsar not having halfe the number of men that he had: for Pompey had 45000, Cæsar but 22000, yet so cunningly was it ordered by Cæsar, that Pompeys horsemen were first put to flight, and then his foot, which he seeing fled to his tents, but being immediately pursued by Cæsar, he changed his habit, and fled by water from place to place, till he came into Egypt, where he thought that for his former good deserts he should be protected. But Ptolomee the King being very young, his Council considering the danger that the Kingdom might be brought into by Cæsar, if Pompey should be there harboured, or if they dismissed him being come into their power, resolved to slay him, and therefore this being committed to the trust of two men, they treacherously acted this bloody part, when they had drawn him on to the Sea in a fishers ship, and then cutting off his head, reserved it till Cæsars comming, but so far was he from giving them thanks, that he slue them, and wept at the sight of it, calling him his friend, that had done him many good offices, and his sonne in law, and so buried his head honourably. Touching the losse of men in the foresayd War, some say, that Cæsar lost not above 200, some 1200, and Pompey 15000 according to some, 6000 according to others. However, his losse was not so great to drive him to that cowardly fleeing away, neither regarding more to gather together his scattered forces, that he might give his enemy battell again. But God would thus make way to the Roman Monarchy, so long before prophesied of by Daniel, by prospering Cæsar in all things, and daunting his enemies. And of this Cæsar was also so confident, that he feared no danger, as appears in that going privately upon a time to sea, and the sea growing tempestuous, which made the Governour of the ship affraid, he spake to him saying, fear nothing, seeing thou carryest Cæsar. Pompey having left his forces, they for the most part soon yielded to Cæsar, all whom he pardoned, lifting some together with his own men, and sending some home to Rome, with letters to the Senate, signifying his care to save as many Romans as he could. Only such Senators and Commanders as came into his power, whom he had formerly taken and dismissed, he put to death, and all the Auxiliary forces of other Countreys, whom he could easily distinguish from Romans by their language. Yet after this victory, Cæsar was in great danger when he came into Egypt by reason of the few forces, only two Legions, and 900 horsemen whom he took thither with him. For there being then war betwixt Ptolomee the King, and his sister Cleopatra, and Cæsar seeming to favour Cleopatra most, when he undertooke to compose the difference between them, a tumult was suddenly raised through the Kings exclamations hereupon, and 20000 gathered together under one Achillas, and by sea 120 saile were gathered together to stop any other forces of Cæsars from comming to him, wherefore encouraging his men which he had with him, he brake through that multitude, and comming to the Sea coast, set the ships on fire and burnt them all, and then the fire from them fleeing to the most famous library in Alexandria, a great number of excellent books were burnt also. Cæsar then having cleared the coast, sent for ayd and provision from divers parts. But before they could come at him, he had many battels with the Egyptians, and sometimes was in great danger of perishing, insomuch that he was once constrained to swim for his life a great way with one hand, for he held his books above the water with the other, yet at length with the help of Mithridates, son of the famous Mithridates King of Pontus comming to his ayd, he got such a victory over the Egyptians that twenty thousand of them were slain, and Ptolomee their King also. Then he gave the Kingdom to a younger brother, and Cleopatra his sister, who had formerly reigned together with Ptolomee, and was his wife, as their father had by his Will appoynted, Sister & brother married together.

Here it was that Cæsar had so speedy a victory, that hee wrote of it to the Senate
thus, Veni, vidi, vici.

*Diodorus.
Hircius.
Plutarch.*

and then shee became wife to him. But Cæsar had first a sonne by her called Cæsaron. In the time of this Egyptian Warre, Antipater, the father of Herodallo, who had before cleaved unto Pompey, hee being dead, came into favour with Cæsar, for hee came to helpe him at Alexandria with three thousand Jews, wherefore when hee had gotten the foresaid victory, he comming into Judæa, confirmed Hircanus in the High-priesthood, and made Antipater Governour in Judæa, according to his own desire, granting liberty to Hircanus to build the walls of Jerusalem again, which had beene beaten down by Pompey. And indeede, as Josephus sayth, Antipater had fought very valiantly, together with Mithridates for Cæsar, inso much that Mithridates acknowledged that he was saved in that War by his valour. Therefore Antigonus the son of Aristobulus comming after this to complain to Cæsar of him and Hirca-nus, and to move him to some pity, by recounting, that his father was slain as he was comming to Judæa by his appointment, and his brother cut off by Scipio, in respect of Cæsar, to despight whom, Scipio at the command of Pompey did this, could not be heard when Antipater had spoken, but Cæsar did him all the honour that might be, and declared him a friend to the Romans. Cæsar now hearing of troubles at Rome, would have hastened thither, but because he thought it needfull first to settle things in Asia, he stay'd a while about Pontus, which Kingdome Pharnaces the son of old Mithridates had taken into his possession, as of right belonging to him, after that he had overthrown Domitius a Captain of Cæsars that came against him. But when he heard that Cæsar was comming thitherward, he sent Embassadors to him for peace, and a Crown of gold, but Cæsar would not consent, except he went out of Pontus, and made satisfaction for the hurts which he had done, upon this a great battell was fought, and Pharnaces was overthrown and put to flight, and soon after slain, and the kingdom was bestowed upon Mithridates his brother. But whilst Cæsar was thus busied, Cato went to Cæleſſyria, having with him Cicero, and Octavius, and Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great, and Scipio with many others, who were against Cæsar, thinking to strengthen themselves in Africa and Spain against him, and so with a great power to come to Rome. But Cæsar hearing of it in the winter time, tooke shipping without further delay, to come upon them before they were aware, which he did, though in his passage to Africa he sustained much losse. Being come thither, at the first he layd about him for provision, vvhereof he had great vvant a long time; and having but small forces, hee vvvas in great danger of being quite overthrown, by the great preparations that vvvere made against him by Scipio, to vvvhom the chiefe government of this Warre vvvas committed, and by Juba King of Namidia. But it so fell out that one Sutius, a man banished out of Italy, gathering together divers other exiles, came at that time to Bocchus, and of him obtaining more forces invaded the Kingdom of Juba, vvwhereby he vvvas forced to return to defend his own Countrey, and by this means Scipio his Army vvvas vvweakned, so that he durst not yet goe against Cæsar.
He therefore tooke Ruspina, and attempting to doe the like to other places, La-binius and Petrinus, being of the Pompeyan faction, encountered vvwith him, and after a long fight vvvere beaten by him. Then Scipio sent to Juba, making great proffers to him to come again and helpe him. Hereupon he came, and brought vvwith him many Elephants, vvvhich the Romans vvwith Cæsar seeing, vvvere greatly terrified: but Cæsar so ordered the battell, setting bowmen to shoot at the Elephants, that they being intraged by the vvwounds vvvhich they received, turned upon their leaders, and disordered the whole Army, and made the victory more easie for Cæsar. Then vvvere slain of the Pompeyans 10000, according to some 30000, but of Cæsars men only 50, and all the Elephants being 60, came into Cæsars power. Cato being all this time at Utica, vvwhere many favoured Cæsar, and therefore vvvere, by such as fled thither out of the battell, spoyled of their goods, & some slain, vvwhen he sought to dissuade them from such outrages, and could not, vvwith a weapon vvvhich he carried vvwith him, when he went to bed, thrust himself through and although the vvwound vvwere not mortall at the first, yet his servants coming and seeking to save him, he rent it vvvider, till he dyed, saying that he had rather die
then

then receive the favour at Cæsars hands to live. Scipio by fleeing away by water saved himselfe, but Juba returning into his own Kingdom perished, as some say, by laying violent hands upon himselfe also: For returning secretly into his Kingdom, together with Petereius, and being from every City to which he came shut out, he despairing of safety first fought with Petereius, and slue him, and then himselfe by the helpe of a servant. Scipio being long tossed upon the Seas, came at length to Spain, where Sitius being with his horsemen, came upon him and slue him. Cæsar then made the Kingdom of Numidia a Province, and having settled things in Africa returned to Rome, and kept foure most stately Triumphs. 1 Over France. 2 Over Egypt. 3 Over Pontus. 4 Over Africa, and was made by the Senate Dictatour for ten years, and had sumptuous Statues erected to him, being written underneath Cæsar semideus, although he was so modest as to cause this to be expunged, and shewed great humility towards the gods, by going up to the Capitall upon his knees, after that in the first dayes triumph, the axletree of his Chariot broke, which hee tooke as a check given him by them: And with many good words he comforted the Citizens, saying, that from his forces they should have no hurt, but they should be a guard to the City. Then he also rectified the account of the yeare, by the help of a famous Mathematician called Sofigenes, who found that the yeare was now overgone the due time 67 dayes, and that the Sommer Solstice, fell the third of the Calends of August, and therefore between November and December that year, which was the third of Cæsars Consulship, Annoq; mundi 3918, two moneths more were interposed, and foure dayes, for which it was called, annus confusionis, and from thence forward every fourth year hath a day added to it, being for this called the Leap-year, and in honour of Julius Cæsar, one moneth in the year was called Julius, which before was called Quintilis.

Touching the Jewish affairs at this time. Hircanus being still High-priest, was honoured with the friendship both of the Romans and Athenians, and by the help of Antipater the walls of Jerusalem were repaired, he commending to the Jews their High-priest Hircanus for their Prince, & exhorting them to live quietly under him without stirring up new troubles, and threatening them if they did not, that he would be their Ruler. But when he perceived of how little spirit and courage Hircanus was, he made his eldest son Phasaelus Prince of Judæa, and his other son Herod being young, he set over Galilee, being then but 15 years old, yet even at that age, having wit and courage above his years, he set his minde to do something worthy his high place, and did. For he went out against Execias Captain of the Thieves that infested the borders of Syria, and slue him, whereby he wan to himselfe great credit, and his fame came to the ears of Sextus Cæsar Governour of Syria, and kinsman to Julius Cæsar, and his brother Phasaelus being pricked on hereby with emulation, endeavoured by all means to get himselfe credit also by well governing over the parts committed to him, and by his continuall care to doe every one justice, Thus Antipater and his sons came to be much honoured both amongst the Jews, and were in singular friendship with the Romans, to whom Antipater sent gifts from time to time in his own name, but pretending to doe it for Hircanus, of whom he received the money for that end. This being observed by some of the Jews, they informe Hircanus of it, and how he was made but a stale, all the Kingly power being in Antipater and his sons, and specially against Herod for killing Execias without judgement given upon him according to Law. Hircanus therefore sent for Herod to answer it, and he being forewarned by his father, came with a Band of men to the Councell, insomuch that all his enemies were terrified from comming to witnesse any thing against him. But there was one Sameas a just man in the Councell, who stirred up Hircanus and the Councell against him for comming in such a manner, and not as the accused of such crimes ought to doe, foretelling if they suffered this, that they should by Herod be destroyed, which afterwards came indeed to passe: yet Hircanus out of his great love to Herod, privately admonished him to flee away to Damascus, lest the Judges should determine against him, which he did, and came to Sextus Cæsar, by whom he was also preferred to the Principality of Cælosyria. Then gathering Plin. l. 18. c. 20.

Anno mundi,
3918.Ioseph. lib. 14.
c. 16, 17.Anno mundi, 3922.

an Army, he would have gone against Jerusalem and Hircanus for his former disgrace, but that he was turned by the perswasion of his father and brother herefrom. Hircanus then sending to Rome, renewed the league of friendship with the Romans, which was done, and writings divers given hereof by Julius Cæsar, wherein Hircanus and his sons were confirmed in the High-priesthood, and many priviledges were granted to them and to the Jews, and the like was done by Anthony and Dolabella, Consuls after Cæsars death.

But to return to Cæsar again. He having given amongst the Romans many great gifts according to his power, being now sole Consul, hastened into Spain, against the two sons of Pompey who remained yet to be subdued with their forces. And his haste is sayd to be such, that he came thither in 24 dayes, and had many battels with them, till at length in one great battell, with much hazard first undergone, to his own person and Army, he overcame Pompey, and slue of his foot men 30000, and of his horsemen 3000, losing of his own 1000 and 500 wounded. In this battell, Pompey himselfe was also wounded and fled, but was soon taken in a cave where he hid himselfe, and his head being cut off was brought to Cæsar his brother being in the City, when he heard of this great overthrow, immediately yielded. Then Cæsar having settled things in Spain, and placed Anthony Governour, returned to Rome, and held another triumph, when by the Senate all honours were given unto him as a King, but only the Title. For he was made perpetual Dictatour, and Emperour, and High-priest, and it was decreed that all other Officers should be obedient to him, and that the Empire after him should remain to his adopted children, for he had none of his own, and was now aged 56 years. They also built Temples to his honour, as to a God, and gave him power in all things to rule at his will. Thus after foure years of civil War, they ended, and in the beginning of the fifth Cæsar thus triumphed. But Sextus Cæsar in the mean season being President of Syria, was slain by Bassus a Pompeyan, whereupon much trouble arose in those parts, as Josephus sayth, the Cæsarians comming in great numbers against the Pompeyans to be revenged, in which was also Antipater acted a part for the Cæsarians. Appian sayth, that Bassus was one set over a Legion by Cæsar, and when he saw Sextus Cæsar addicted altogether to riot, and not to attend his Prefectureship, he admonished him thereof, but was contemned, and by him sent for, and when he came not, some were sent to bring him by force, at which his Souldiers disdainig, tumultuated and slue Sextus Cæsar. Then fearing Julius Cæsar, they resolved unless they could have pardon, to fight together for their lives, and having drawn another Legion unto them, one Marcus with three Legions came against them and was foyled, then the Governour of Bythinia comming to his ayd, Bassus and his men were overcome, and so this tumult ended. Cæsar having thus quelled all enemies except the Parthians, was desired by the Senate to goe against them, and because it was thought that it would require a long time before he could return again, he was desired to nominate Consuls before his going, and so Anthony and Lepidus were appoynted. But his untimely death prevented him of that expedition, the envie of many at his excessive honours, putting them on to murder him, under a pretence of freeing the Common-wealth from a tyranny, yet he was most excellent for clemencie and liberality, and did many good things for the benefit of the Common-wealth, in that short time of his continuance at Rome, which was but six moneths, as the rebuilding of many Cities decayed, and placing in them many Colonies of the Romans. The chiefe conspiratours against him were Brutus and Cassius, the one greatly favoured by him, so that he had made him Governour in France, and appoynted him another year to be Consul, and given him a large legacie by his Will, and in case that he dyed, whilst Octavius his sisters son, whom he had adopted were under age, he together with Anthony, should be his tutors. Yet this Brutus was by some put on, who made him believe that he was of the race of that Brutus, who long agoe by killing the King, had freed the Roman State from servitude, and therefore if he would doe any thing worthy the stock of which he came, he should kill Cæsar, that tooke upon him to be King, and with him and Cassius many more conspired, to the number of a hundred and upward.

The

Appianus.
Hircinus.

Josephus.

Appianus.

The causes of their enemy were partly his ruling in all things, partly Anthony offering to Crowne him, although hee modestly refused it and sayd, that hee would not be called King, but Cæsar causing the Crown therefore to be offered to Jupiter in the Capitoll, saying, that none was King of the Romans but Jupiter. For notwithstanding this refusall they thought, that he desired it, and only because hee perceived by the countenances of the people, that they disliked, hee made this refusall. For hee ruled over all as a King, and this the free spirits of the Romans could not endure, that the soveraigne power should be in one, although it had been better for them, having been for many years of late so much oppressed by civill dissensions. Partly also there was a prophesie, which foretold, that the Parthians should never be overcome, but by a King, which made them to suspect the more, that Cæsar must be he, before his going out against them. And lastly, his disrepect at one time to the Senat comming unto him, for he received them sitting, which was taken as an argument of an high aspiring minde. Therefore upon the 15 of March, a meeting in the Senate house with the Senators about weighty affairs of the State being appointed, the Conspirators agreed together at that place and time to dispatch him, as an invader of the liberty of the Romans, neyther had he power, although hee had many forewarnings to keep away to avoid those fatal strokes. For the Wizards looking into the entrails of a beast, which was without an heart, took this for an evill signe, and advised him not to go out that day, moreover, he was before by them admonisht to take heed of the Ides of March, which was that day, his wife also Calphurnia was troubled about his going to the Senate, and being slain there in her dream, and therefore earnestly besought him not to go. In somuch, that he had thought once to have sent to dismissee the Senate, and not to go at that time. But Brutus, a Favourite of his and brother to Brutus, the chief conspirator came and importuned him to go so, that he yielded, when hee told him, that the Senate had a purpose that day to make him King of all other Countreys round about, but only of the Romans, and told him, how ill the Senators would take it to be dismissed, and against the ill presages sayd, that they were not to be regarded, and so taking him by the hand he went with him. But by the way, and when he was placed in his chair of State, he was much troubled by suitors comming with petitions to him, and the conspirators placed themselves neer about him, as his friends to do him service, sometime talking to him, and sometime to one Cimber, that was a suitor to him for his banished brother, whom Cæsar denied, then he layd hold upon his gown with both his hands to pull it from his neck, and upon this, as a signe given of beginning the murder, one Casca thrust him first in the neck vvith his sword, but made no great wound, then Cæsar arising, pursued him, amazed at his own bold attempt, but he called his brother to his help, and by and by Cæsar savv many sword dravv about him, and amongst others Brutus, to vvhom he sayd, O my son Brutus, and wrapt up his head in his robes, but he was immediatly slain, 23 wounds being given him. And this Brutus was thought indeed to be his son by Servilia, with whom Cæsar had been very familiar. All things were full of tumult, but the conspirators fled to the Capitoll to the gods for succour, and continued there a night and a day, till that by their messengers having apologized for themselves that they did this meerly for the good of the Common-wealth, and sworn to, mayntain all the good Ordinances of Cæsar, some agreement was made, especially because the Senate liked well enough of their fact, and so they came forth. But Cæsars Will comming to light, in which, as was sayd before, he had made Brutus and Anthony with others his executors, &c the people were enraged and sought to slay Brutus and his fellows & the Senators also, because they seemed to favour these murderers, and making a fire in the market-place, they burnt the body of Cæsar, so, as that withall they set fire upon the houses of some of the conspirators, and then they setup an Altar there to Cæsar, and worshipped him as a god, till that the Consuls, Anthony and Dolabella overthrew it, and with much ado repressed their fury.

Thus Cæsar after foure yeers dominion, or three and an halfe as Josephus sayth, was cut off, and all things were again stilled by sending the chiefe conspirators away

Cæsar forewarned.

Plutarch.

Anno mundi, 3922.

away to certain Governments assigned unto them. Anthony then, as if hee had succeeded Cæsar in his power, took upon him the rule of all things, and carryed away out of his house abundance of treasure, and taking Cæsar's books, cancelled some of his Laws, and altered others, as he thought good, so offering them to the people, who called for Cæsar's Laws. The Senate also made a new Decree, that no man should hereafter be Dictatour, and who so sought this dignity, a reward was propounded to him that should kill him. Octavius the adopted son of Cæsar, the son of Atia his sister being at Apollonia all his time was a while doubtfull, what to do. But at length resolved to gather together such souldiers of his fathers, as he could, and to be revenged for his death. And to this end he took treasure, which Cæsar had left with him, when he prepared for his expedition against the Parthians, and went into Campania, and many resorted unto him, he being now but 18 years old. From thence hee went to Rome, pretending that hee came only to take possession of the inheritance left him by Cæsar, and although his mother and other friends dissuaded him from it, yet he took upon him his name also, being called Cæsar Octavius, nothing fearing the danger of the conspiratours, which he should thus be brought into. And indeed he did herein most wisely: for now, as if Cæsar himself had been still living, many mens hearts were moved towards him. Anthony, yet slighted him so far, that they in a short time grew to open difference, whereupon Cæsar Octavius his power increased much, some Legions of Antonies falling unto him. Anthony seeing this betook him into France, which was committed to the government of Brutus, willing him to go into Macedonia as President there, and when he refused, he was by Anthony besieged in Mutina, the news whereof being brought to the Senate, hee was required forthwith to break up his siege, and leaving France to Brutus to passe into Macedonia to govern there. Anthony full of wrath at the hearing of this urged the siege the more, for which he was by the Senate, Cicero putting them on, declared an enemy, and his Colleague Dolabella going against Trebonius, to whom Syria was committed and entering the City, wherein he was in the night, and slaying him, was likewise declared an enemy. This Trebonius was one of the conspiratours, that helpt to kill Cæsar, and therefore vengeance now befell him, and his head being cut off, was camped about by the souldiers, and his body indignly used cast into the Sea. Two new Consuls therefore were immediatly made, viz. Hircius and Pansa, to goe with Cæsar Octavius against Anthony, which Cæsar was now made Propretour, but the chief strength of his souldiers taken from him, lest he should become too great, and so over-rule all, as Julius Cæsar had done. For this was the Senats care, to employ him in the War against Anthony, that they two might never be reconciled to joyn together against the conspiratours, and to send the Consuls with greater power together with him. But Pansa and Cæsar comming first to Mutina, after many skirmishes with Antonies men had a great battle with him, wherein they were put to the worst, and Pansa was greatly wounded. Yet as Antonies men returned from the battle singing, Hirtius with 20 fresh troupes came upon them, and slue them, and forced Antonies tents, but in the entrance Hirtius was slaine, but Cæsar kept his ground and continued in his armour all night, which comming now on ended the battell for that day. Anthony calling a Councell in the night, resolved to raise his siege and be gone, then Decimus Brutus, who held the City Mutina, knowing what danger he was in now that one Consul was dead, and the other gone away sore wounded, so that all the power was in Octavius, because he was one of the conspiratours against his father, sent to him to give him thanks for delivering him from the siege, and to desire a reconciliation. Octavius answered that it was not for his sake, but to persecute Anthony an enemy of the Common-wealth, that he came, and therefore he lookt for no thanks from him, and for his desire of a friendly parle, this piety did forbid in him. Decimus therefore comming to the other side of the river, where he might be heard, read unto him the Decree of the Senate, that he had the government of France committed to him, and therefore he warned him not to comethither without the Consuls. Whereupon Octavius did forbear, and comming to the place, where Pansa lay, he heard by him that the drift of the

Revenge for Cæsar's death against Trebo-
nus.

Security after victory cost deere.

Senate was to keepe him down and to humble Anthony who was grown so proud, but he for his part would deliver the Legions taken from Caesar to him, and so he dyed. He being dead, Torquatus the Questor, being warned by the Senate so to doe, delivered those Legions to D. Brutus and to keepe Caesar from growing in power. Sextus Pompeyus had the government of the Navy committed to him, M. Brutus of Macedonia, and Cassius of Syria, all the Eastern parts being commanded to be subject to them two. Caesar Octavius came to Rome full of wrath for this and demanded to triumph, but was rejected, then hee perswaded Cicero, the Consuls being dead, to stand to be Consul, and that he might be another, but he was laughed at therefore by the Senate because of his youth. Then Octavius thought it best to reconcile himself to Anthony and Lepidus, another great Commander over divers Legions, and therefore to make way hereunto, heeuled the souldiers of Anthony, whom he had taken with all courtesie, and sent such an army to him as were desirous and wrote letters to him and to Lepidus, signifying in what danger they all were, if the conspiratours continued in their authority, and shewing the necessity, that there was of joyning together against them. Hereupon Anthony came with his army to Lepidus, and hee joyning with him after some pause, their forces grew very great. This strooke terror into the Senate, and stirred up much hatred against Lepidus, more then against Anthony, insomuch that Cassius and Brutus were sent for to helpe against them and two Legions, which were with Sextus Pompeyus, and Caesar Octavius was joyned in commission with D. Brutus to pursue Anthony it being from the Senate yet concealed, what he had done to joyne with Anthony. Octavius hearing of this stirred up his souldiers against the Senate for want of their pay, and when they were not after means used herein satisfied, hee made a speech unto them declaring, that the ayme of the Senate was to set up the Pompeyans and to suppress the Cesareans, and to hinder such, as Julius Caesar had given possessions to, from enjoying them, but if he might be made Consul, he would be revenged upon the conspiratours, and helpe every man to his right. To this a great acclamation was made by his army, and the Centurions were forthwith sent to the Senate to propound it. But before this they had made Flancus and D. Brutus Consuls, thinking, that they together with Octavius should go against Anthony. Therefore the Senate refused to hearken to this motion, although they were much urged, and their objection of his youth answered by the Legats, saying, that Scipio had been made Consul being under the age required ten years, and some others also. The Centurions returning to the army exasperated them so, that they marched forthwith towards Rome, being eight Legions. Then the Senate sent with all speed to pay Cesars army, and signifie that he should keep aloof from the City, and so be cholen Consul, but two Legions comming from Sextus Pompeyus at that instant, they repented and sent out other messengers to signifie it. Hereupon Cesars army was more enraged and came to the City, and without resistance took a great part thereof, many falling to him both of the noble and common sort. The Senate seeing this for fear made him Consul immediatly, and so he came to the Senate house in pomp, taking into the Society of his Consulship Q. Pedius his Kinsman. The Senate then to flatter with him gave him all the power, that his father Caesar had to rule according to his will, and to be keeper of the City. And after this at his motion Anthony was sent unto by the Senate for reconciliation, and Lepidus, who also had been condemned for a publike enemy, and all the conspiratours against Julius Caesar were condemned to die. D. Brutus hearing this prepares to flee to Cassius, & M. Brutus: but of the ten Legions, that were with him all revolted some to Caesar, and some to Anthony, except 300, and with them seeking to get over the river Rhene, but making some delay because of the difficulty of the passage, they also forsook him all but 10. Then hee travelling disguised as a Frenchman was taken by robbers, and brought to the Governour of the Countrey, who at Anthones command, when he knew of it, cut off his head and sent it to Anthony, thus the second conspiratour against J. Caesar fell a year & a half after the murder, Octavius being yet but 20 years old: for he was not fully so much, when he was made Consul, in the moneth Sextilis, which hee would for this have called August, after his ovvne title,

Diodorus.

D. Brutus gain.

title, Cæsar Octavius Augustus, and so it is called to this day, but because hee was born in September, some of his friends would have had that moneth called so. When Anthony and Lepidus had received the message for reconciliation they went towards Rome, but not without the greatest part of their armyes, making account by their power to prevaile so as to agree upon what terms they pleased Cæsar, then went out with his army to meet them, and at their meeting all three parled together, because although neyther loved other, yet they thought it best to agree for a time the better to be revenged upon the conspiratours. Wherefore they three went into a certain Island, wherein the view of their armies they consulted two or three days together, and agreed finally that the enemyes of eyther of them should be proscribed, of which they reckoned 200, amongst whom Cicero was one, and that they three should have the chief power in all things, and that Anthony should be Governour of France, and those parts, Lepidus of Spain and Italy, Octavius of Africa, the East parts, Syria, &c. being left undisposed of, yet because M. Brutus and Cassius held them. To the City then they came, and first published a proscription against 17, promising a reward to any that should bring in any of their heads, whether he were free or bond, and threatening proscription to such as concealed any of them, whereupon great feare arose in Rome, and many fled to Cassius and Brutus, and soon after 30 more were proscribed to be slain and spoyled of their goods, and lastly 150 more, and yet they thinking, that they had not money enough for their Warre, condemned 1400 rich women also, but spared 1000, because this was cryed out upon, as a point of greatest cruelty, and took that which should have been taken from them, from other men. And in all this Cæsar Octavius was least blamed, as by whose desire this cruelty was not shewed, for he was milde and kind like his father, but of the other two especially. Thus a new office of Triumviratus was set up to continue five yeares, because a Dictatorship was odious ever since Sylla, but under them, when Octavius had deposed his Consulship, and his Colleague was now dead, two more Consuls were made, viz, Ventidius and Carinus. But the three abolished some Laws, made others new, and ruled all things at their will, so that the time of J. Cæsar seemed to be a golden time to this-ward. Soon after this, Anthony with his Army sets forth, and then Octavius, but they were both hindered in their passages, Anthony by Marcus with his sea forces, Octavius by Sextus Pompeyus, who then held Sicily. Yet they went forward towards Macedonia, to which place Anthony came with all his power, but Octavius stayed behinde because he fell sick. Cassius and Brutus having gathered abundance of treasure, met together near Rhodes, and agreed first to take that City, because a friend to Anthony, which Cassius did, and then the Countrey of the Lycians, which was done by Brutus, who both spoyled them of all their goods, threatening such with death as concealed any. But amongst the Xanthians, that were of the Lycians, a memorable thing happened. A rich man that hid his gold, was taken and led away to be punished, he saying nothing, his mother following cryed, it was not he but I that hid it, then the servant that discovered it, sayd, it was not she, but my master, this Brutus hearing, was so moved with the modesty of the man, and the affection of the mother, and the treachery of the servant, that hee dismissed the mother and son with his gold and hanged up the servant. Cassius and Brutus his forces now together were 80000 foot and 12000 horse, besides, 5000 horse that were brought in by friends. Anthony and Cæsar likewise had 12000 horse and more foot, but their Army was not so well provided with victuals, and Octavius also was sick still, or not fully recovered, although through divers jealousies about Anthony he followed him and came to the Campe within ten dayes. Cassius and Brutus thought it best to delay to fight, that the provision of their enemies being wasted, they might the more easily subdue them. But Anthony provoked them daily to it, so that at length the Souldiers of Brutus would no longer be held in, but rushed out upon their enemies, and falling upon Octavius his men, he being absent, put them to the worke, but of them 8000 were slain, of Octavius his men twice so many, then he coming to his Army the fight was renewed, and Cassius thinking that Brutus was overcome, first ran up to an hill to see, but by reason of the Diodorus.

A servants treachery against his Master punisht.

the dust not able to see any thing, he sent one to see, but before he returned, conceiving the worst he caused his Armour-bearer Pindarus to slay him, when as indeed Brutus had the victory. The next day, having buried Cassius, he would have kept in his Souldiers, hoping to prevail with lesse bloodshed, for the want of provision in his enemies army: but they refusing to be kept in, joynd battell again, and then were overcome and put to flight in the wing, which was not led by Brutus, and then although he hitherto had stood his ground, he was also hem'd in by his enemies behinde, and made to flee to an hill with foure Legions, upon which having continued all night, he seeing his men discouraged, procured a friends servant also to kill him. And thus the two chiefe of the murderers of Caesar, by a just judgement, procured their own murders within two years, being brought into a desperate condition, when in all humane reason, they were most likely to have prevailed: For they had two Navies by sea, their enemies but one. And that wracked, they had the advantage of provision, were equall in forces, and wonderfully rich in money, and most free to every Souldier, to put courage into them, and to make them stand with them, and began also victoriously by advantages given them; yet being guilty of the blood of an Emperour and a friend, vengeance would not suffer them to live. But as I should have sayd before, Anthony and his fellows did great honour to dead Caesar before their comming out of Rome, for they erected a Temple to him in the place where his corps was burnt, and made it an Asylum, so as no Temple in the City was besides, for though that of Romulus were, yet it now stood so that men could not come at it, Brutus his men that remained, fell all to Anthony and Octavius, being fourteen thousand, who tooke them into their Armies, the rest fled some to Marcus and some to Ocnobarbus, Sea-captains. Anthony and Octavius having sacrificed for their victories, and honourably buried Brutus, now began to thinke of a new division of the World between them, Lepidus being excluded, all the East to Anthony, and the West to Octavius, Italy being left in common to them both, and so it is agreed that Octavius with part of the Army should return to Italy, & to give the souldiers the portions of land assigned to them, for a reward, and Anthony went with the other part into Egypt, where he was honourably entertained by Cleopatra and tooke with her beauty, he continued with her all that winter, neglecting all other things to his own ruine and hers. Caesar comming to Rome, went about to divide the lands promised both to Anthonyes Souldiers and his own, but they vvvhich then had them in possession, tooke their expulsion so heavily, that they resorted to L. Antonius being then Consul, stirring him up to warre against these Souldiers vvvhich ranged about so licentiously, that they filled all Italy with rapine and trouble, he therefore received them, and gathering more forces, thought to reduce the Common-wealth to the old form of government, that of the Triumvir seeming unto him intolerable. And to this, Fulvia the vvife of Anthony, ceased not to instigate him, because shee was vexed for her husbands stay vvith Cleopatra, and thought by this means hee vvould be moved to hasten to Rome. Octavius hereupon put away his vvife, the daughter of Fulvia, and so the contention increasing. Lucius Antonius gathered together 17 Legions and came to Rome, vvvhich he entered vvithout fight, through the sluggishnesse of Lepidus, and having stirred them up against Caesar, hee vvvent forth towards Perusium to fight vvith him, vvho had then but foure Legions, and six vvvhich he sent for out of Spain, and the Pretorian Souldiers. But before they joynd battell, other helps came to Caesar out of France, being led by Salvidienus, but against him vvvent Ventidius and Asinius, till that Agrippa, another Captain of Caesars comming in, made them turn away. Then they both beat their course against L. Antonius, vvho to avoid the danger, shut himselfe into Perusium. But Caesar and they both besieged him, and the City of Perusium being unprovided of victuals, Lucius vvvas soon brought into a great streight through famine, vvwherefore hee made divers sallies out, but in vain, and at length sent to such for peace, and vvhen hee could not so prevaile, but upon cvill conditions, he vvvent himselfe in submisse manner, and was by Caesar accepted, and the next day his men being suffered to depart, Caesar

Appian.

Cassius and Brutus, pay for murdering Caesar.

entred into the City, pardoning all but a few which were Decurions, amongst whom Xestius set fire desperately upon his own house, whereby the whole City was burnt down. Of the Souldiers of Lucius Antonius that went away, some hastened with Julia the mother of the Anthonyes, to Sextus Pompeyus, and some with Plancus and Fulvia the wife of Anthony to him: Cæsar Octavius in the mean season going to France, and taking Anthonyes forces which were there under Calenus, who was then dead, unto himselfe, whereby he increased his power to 11 Legions. Anthony in the spring tooke shipping, and came from Egypt to Athens, where his wife met him, whom he blamed much for the War at Perusium, and L. Antonius also. Then his mother came to him, being honourably sent out by Pompey to draw him to his part against Cæsar Octavius, but Anthony replied, that for his mother sending to him, he thanked him, and would requite it. But to breake with Cæsar Octavius he had no purpose, if he would hold to his covenants with him, in case he should not then hee would use his help and if Octavius and he continued still in amity, he would doe his best to reconcile Pompey also to him. But Octavius being now very potent, for he had gathered together 40 Legions, as being Lord over all France and Spain, began to devise how to destroy Anthony, that he might rule alone, and to this end he both sought to stir up such Anthonyans against him, as to whom he had divided possessions, and to make friendship with Pompey, being in Sicilia, by sending and taking to wife the sister of his father in law Libo, called Scribonia, and by sending Lepidus away into Africa with six suspected Legions of Anthonyes, and Lucius Anthonyus with an Army into Spain, joyning with him the Propretours as Legats. Antonius on the other side came with a mighty Navy of two hundred ships to Brundisium, and then Oenobarbus came to him with all his Navy also, and was accepted by him. Cæsar Octavius hearing this, hastened with his Army against him. Anthony therefore sent to Pompey to invade Italy in his ayd, so that much blood was likely to have been shed, but that L. Cocceius who was a friend to both, mitigated their mindes so as that a peace followed, and reconciliation: The wife also of Anthony dyed at the same time, who had bene a chiefe incendiary to warre, and so a marriage was made betwixt Anthony and Cæsar Octavius his sister Octavia, and they feasted one another. As for Pompey it was agreed that hee should return to Sicily, Oenobarbus to Bythinia. But Cæsar would not be reconciled to Pompey, because he had lately expelled Helenus a Captain of his out of Sardinia. Pompey hearing this, tooke all the passages to Italy, whereby was caused a great famine, which made the people to tumultuate, and presse Cæsar and Anthony both to a reconciliation with Pompey, and that with such vehemencie, stoning the Magistrates when they came to appeale the tumult, and the Emperours themselves, although many of them were slain by their Souldiers, so that Libo also, whose daughter Cæsar Octavius had lately married, mediating betwixt them and Pompey his sonne in law, and Antia the mother of Pompey, it was agreed that all they three should come to a conference, which they did, and at the second meeting agreed, that Pompey should rule in Sicilia and Sardinia, and some other Islands, and have Peloponnesus delivered unto him, and this his rule to continue as long as their Triumviratus. The Emperours then feasted one another, Pompey beginning in Menodorus his Ship, where when the other two were, Menodorus moved Pompey to kill them, and so to be avenged for his fathers death, he answered that he wished Menodorus had done it without telling him, saying: Menodorus might have been perjured, but Pompey not. Then were Pompeys forces withdrawn from Italy, and they being by this means delivered from famine, rejoiced greatly in Rome, and gave exceeding great honour to Cæsar Octavius and Anthony as the saviours of the Countrey, in so much that they sacrificed to them. But this joy lasted not long, for Anthony returning into Asia, and Cæsar into France, Pompey finding that Covenants were not kept as hee expected, about the delivering of Peloponnesus to him, but being first exhaust of their treasure by Anthony, living then at Athens, began to prepare for Warre again, first infesting the Seas by his Pyrates, whereby Italy being being again troubled cryed out, as oppressed now with foure men instead of three. Octavius hearing of this tooke some of the Pyrates, and when they confessed Pompey to be the authour of their practices, he prepared again to war, and sent to Anthony to meet him at Brundisium to consult about it, which he did, but Cæsar Octavius being absent at his coming, he stayed not, but returned again to Athens. Then Cæsar with the forces which he had, invaded Sicilia, but being by Pompey encountered, who was far better provided of shipping, he was at the first brought into great streights. But he sent Mecenas to Anthony to come to his ayd, who came and exchanged with him 120 ships, of which Cæsar had most need for 20000 Legionary souldiers, which Anthony most needed to goe against the Parthians, and then returned again, leaving his wife Octavia with her brother, because he doted still upon Cleopatra, who offered to accompany him into Parthia. Then Cæsar spent a year or two in preparing more ships, in which time Anthony with a mighty Army went towards Parthia, but had no better successe then Crassus in times past, for which he thought by craft to come upon Phraates their King unawares, he found him so prepared that he could doe no good against him, wherefore understanding that the King of Armenia was coming with a great power to the Parthians, he went another way to his Countrey, but not being able to enter suddenly, his army perished a great part through famine, cold, and sicknesse, for it was winter time, inso much, that being in great streights, he swore a servant of his to kill him, but after this, finding means to flee away, hee posted with a few into Syria, where Cleopatra met him, bringing with her great treasure to pay his Army that survived, for 20000 foot were dead, and 4000 horsemen.

Appian.

By thistime Octavius having prepared fully to go against Sicily, set forth to invade it on three parts at once, but with so ill successe by reason of tempests arising, that after the losse of many ships and men, hee returned back again to Italy only with one ship, the rest, which remayned, being diversly dispersed, yet after this being challenged by Pompey to a Sea-fight for the finall ending of the quarrell, he being ashamed to refuse the offer, although hee had never yet fought prosperously by sea, accepted of it, and so they met with 300 ships on eyther side, their foot forces remayning upon the shoare, anxiously expecting the issue. In this fight also Lepidus was with Cæsar with many ships, which hee brought out of Africa, and after a long and bloody fight the victory fell to Cæsar, 28 ships of Pompeys being sunk, and the rest yielding all but 17, with which he fled away, and taking his treasure, and wife, and children with him, hee hastened away into Syria to Anthony. Whereby wee may see the instability of this World in that hee which fled a little before now puts his adversary, by whom hee was brought into danger of his life, to flight. Lepidus after this considering the great power, which he had about him, for he had 22 Legions, thought it a fit time to take the dominion of Sicily upon him, and to breake with Cæsar, because being of equall authority with him, he used him as a Legat only. Therefore he put out Cæsars men, and placed Garisons of his own there. But when they should come to try the matter by battell, the souldiers of Lepidus both foot and horse, loving Cæsar better then him revolted, the greater part of them, whereby he was so discouraged, that he also came to him desiring mercy, and was by him well received, but deprived of his Triumvirship, and suffered to enjoy his High-priesthood, whereat, some say, hee was so discontented, that hee went into voluntary exile. Cæsar now had 45 Legions of foot, 25000 horse, 600 long ships, and ships of burden innumerable: then he committed Africa and Sicilia to the Propretours to be governed and returned to Rome, where he was received with all honour. And when hee had made an Oration to them, and promised upon Anthonys return to lay down the Triumvirship, they made him Tribune of the people, so that his person should be sacred for ever. Pompey fleeing towards Anthony, heard of his overthrow in Parthia, & therefore began to meditate, how to get his Dominions into his hands. Then he used this policy; he sent Embassadors to him to offer his assistance, but at the same time hee sent also to Phraates King of the Parthians, offering as a Captain to fight for him against the Romans. But his policy succeeded not; for those that went from him

The instability of worldly things.

Pride brought down.

Suetonius.

towards Parthia, were taken by Anthonyes men, and being brought to him to the great shame of the other Embassadours confessed the matter. Yet they excused it by saying that he sent not to the Parthians with an intent to joyne with them, unlesse he were by Anthony rejected, for he had rather associate himselfe to him then to any other man, and this Anthony tooke for an excuse. But before he heard any thing again from him, he put on Imperiall apparell, mustered more Souldiers in Syria, and tooke divers Cities, whereby he marred all. For Anthony now was very strong again, Titius bringing to him 120 ships, and 70 comming out of Sicilia, whereby Pompey being terrified, fled into Armenia, and his best friend Liso forsaking him, went to Anthony with others. Titius then, and Furuius and Amyntus, pursued him and overtooke him and slue him, and this Titius was one whom he had before saved. After this Anthony goeth again into Armenia, pretending peace and a match between his son Alexander, whom he had by Cleopatra, and that Kings daughter, whereupon the King came into his Tent, and so was treacherously taken, and after a while, bound with silver and golden chains, and carryed to Alexandria in Egypt, and there he led him, and his wife and children in triumph, causing them to be brought before Cleopatra sitting upon a Throne, but they would not bow to her. Then doting exceedingly upon her, he made her Quecn of Egypt and Cercyra, &c. together with his son Ptolemeæ Cæsareon, affirming him to be legitimate, and that shee was J. Cæsars wife, that Octavius might be put down, and he gave her the title of Queen of Kings, and her other children which shee had by himselfe, of Kings of Kings, giving to the one the Kingdom of Armenia, to the other of Media. By all which, and his triumphing there to please Cleopatra, great distaste was taken at Rome. Yet Cn. Domitius and Suffius being both Antonians were made Consuls, and carryed themselves insolently against Cæsar, whereupon he came guarded with his friends and Souldiers to the Senate, where he spake against them and Anthony, no man daring to answer. But both they and many Senatours fled into Egypt to Anthony. Then after many letters written from Cæsar to Anthony and from Anthony to Cæsar, wherein they laid divers things to the charge of one another, they came to an utter breach, and Anthony sent a divorce to Octavia. Such then as were good Common-wealth-men, especially Tullius and Plancius, leaving Anthony came to Rome, and by declaring the will of Anthony, that Cæsareon was the legitimate son of J. Cæsar, and Octavius had no right to any thing through him, and that wheresoever he dyed his corps should be interred by Cleopatras in Egypt, stirred up the people, so that immediately war was denounced in the Temple of Bellona, against Cleopatra, it being presumed that Anthony would never leave her. And another thing which exasperated the Romans against him, was his treachery towards the King of Armenia, to the great disgrace of the Roman Nation. Then great preparations were made on both sides, all the West being for Cæsar, and all the East for Anthony, so that he had 11 Kings to help him, and 500 ships, as some say, according to others, 800. Cæsar also drew with him the chiefe power of Italy, France, Spain, Africa, Sicily, and other Islands. Their meeting was at Actium, and their fight both by sea and land. The sea forces of Anthony were compassed about by Cæsars, and many burnt and 300 taken, Cleopatra then fled with 60 ships, and after her Anthony, when as he had yet 19 whole Legions, and 12000 horse, so Cæsar tooke the rich spoyles which were brought out of Asia and Egypt, whence Cleopatra alone brought 20000 Talents, but Anthonyes men first fought a long and bloody battell with him, when their Emperour was gone, and at length yielding many were taken into Cæsars Army. After this, Cæsar not being able by the ships which he sent out after Anthony to overtake him, returned to Italy, and Cleopatra by robbing of Temples, and pilling the people, gathered again all the treasure shee could, and sent to the King of Media, the head of the King of Armenia, which she caused to be cut off, that she might procure his assistance, and forsaied a great power. But Cæsar being bent to Italy went no further then Brundisium, and being there met by the Senatours and many others, was made Consul the fourth time, his Office of Triumvirship for five years, and five being expired, and so with all speed after twenty or thirty dayes stay at Brundisium, hee went into into Syria and towards Egypt, against Anthony and Cleopatra, who were astonished at the suddenness of his coming, it being also then Winter. Now therefore Anthony and Cleopatra, sent Embassadors to him for peace, together with a golden Crown and other Regall ornaments sent by Cleopatra. To her he answered, that she should have favour, but to Anthony nothing, wherefore he sent the second and third time, but received no answer, although he sent great gifts also, and Tullius a Senatour, who was one of the conspiratours against Julius Caesar, whom Octavius forthwith slue. Yet lest she should despaire, he sent one to Cleopatra, to promise her the Kingdom of Egypt, and to signifie, how inclining he was to shew her favour, and what love he bare to her, if shee would kill Anthony, because he feared eyther a long War in Egypt, and the burning of the treasure, which he desired to take, or their fleeing into Spain to stir up new troubles. Cleopatra then not being without hope to invigle Caesar, if Anthony were dead, as she had done his father & Anthony, goeth amongst the monuments, as if she would, forthwith dye there. Anthony being of this certified, attempted to kill himselfe and fell down in his blood, as if he had been dead, then shee getting up to the top of the building lookt over to see him, and Anthony being rayled up again espied her, and caused himself by ropes to be drawn up to her, and then hee immediately dyed even in her bosome. Then she coming into the power of Caesar, when he would make no faith to her, shee suspecting, that shee should be referred for a triumph made a shew, as if shee would go into Italy with Caesar, but in truth to get an opportunity to kill herself, because otherwise Caesars men by his command were so vigilant over her, that she could not. Having then apparelled her self in most sumptuous manner in Queens attyre, she with a small sharp ended instrument dipt in poyson, which she used to weare on her head prickt her own arm, through which shee presently dyed without any sense of pain: for such was the nature of that poyson, so soon as it met with the blood, to kill, no pain being felt, some say, that shee applyed an Aspe to her arme, whereby she suddenly dyed, which Caesar hearing caused all means to be used to suck the poyson out againe, but in vaine, at which he was much grieved, as she had in her life time desired of him, he buried her most sumptuously in the same Sepulchre with Anthony; and thus all civill Wars ended amongst the Romans, Caesar Octavius from thence-forth reigning in peace. And this Macrobius noteth to have been in the sixth moneth, and that it was therefore called August, after his name Augustus, happy, but improbably, because all this was done by the Spring.

To return now again to the Jewish affairs, Julius Caesar being slain, and civill Wars thereupon arising, of which at large before, Cassius came to Syria, and exacting much money there to mayntain his army he most grievously oppressed the Jews, exacting of them 800 talents, or neer upon it. Antipater then committed the gathering of this money to his two sons, and one Malichus, who was but a treacherous friend unto him. Herod his younger son with all diligence gathered the money, which he was to gather throughout Galslee, and bringing it to Cassius, obtained generall favour at his hands. Some Cities under other Procuratours for want of payment were sold and money rayled, and so angry was Cassius with Malichus, that hee would have slain him, because hee had not gathered his part, but that Hircanus at that instant sent by Antipater 100 talents of his own unto him. But Malichus requited him ill by plotting treacherously to kill him, of which Antipater being aware rayled forces to goe against him, Malichus then craftily denying his treacherous purpose was againe reconciled to him. But Marcus being Preident of Syria, hearing of the attempts of Malichus would have slain him, but that Antipater entreated for him. But in so doing hee did but save a Serpent to sting him. For soon after he corrupted the Butler of Antipater, and poysoned him. This Phasaelus and Herod his sons conceiving to be done by Malichus, would have been revenged upon him, but he seriously denying it, and professing his grief for him, they refrained to be revenged openly. Therefore they friendly continued in friendship with him, but plotted his death secretly, and therefore Cassius being by Herod acquainted with it, he sent to the Tribunes to be assistant to Herod in his just attempts. Then they, as they were by him directed,

Anthony payeth for his inordinate lust.

Macrobi.

Ioseph. lib. 14. c. 18.

Ingratitude
Cap. 19.

mer

Bloud payeth for bloud.

Lib. 14. 21.

Cap. 22.

Cap. 23.

Cap. 24.

Dio.

met Malichus, as hee was passing and slue him with their daggers. After this when Cassius went out of Judea, tumults arose there by means of Felix left behind with an army, for he went with his forces against Phasaelus, but he was by him overcome and driven away. About this time also Antigonus the son of Aristobulus having gathered a power together infested Galilee, and took three towres, but Herod going out against him drave him away and regained the towres, for which he was much honoured by Hircanus and the people, so that Hircanus gave him his Niece, the daughter of Alexander son of Aristobulus to wife. And these things fell out whilst Cassius reigned or ruled in Syria, but hee being overcome by Cesar Octavius, and Anthony at Philippi. Anthony ruled over all Asia subject to the Romans, and came into Syria. Then Embassadors came from all parts unto him and from Judea came some, that accused Phasaelus and Herod for taking the rule upon them, using the High-priest Hircanus as a stale. But Herod comming speedily to Anthony, obtained such favour also with him, that his adversaries could not be heard. Then Hircanus sent a Crown of gold to Anthony, and other gifts, desiring him to set such of his Nation free, as Cassius had sold for slaves, and to restore such lands, as were by him taken away, and given to the Tyrians. To which Anthony answered by writing, and granted all his requests, and wrote to the Tyrians also to restore the said lands, because Cassius, who was now justly slain for his wickednesse, had unjustly therewith graued his adherents, and if any presumed to hold them still he threatened punishments according to their demerits. Anthony after his comming into Cilicia, where hee met Cleopatra and was ensnared with her love, many others of the Jews came to seeke to Cleopatra against Herod, but one Messala being set to plead for him, and Hircanus assisting him, Anthony for his father Antipaters sake also, whom he had dearly loved, made him and Phasaelus his brother Tetrarchs. But the Jews being discontented hereat came again, 1000 of them to Anthony speaking against him, yet he having received great gifts from these two brethren rejected them, and put 15 of them in prison, and yet when he could not yet appease the tumult, he slue those 15, and commanded the Toparch of that place to ayd Herod, in his Tetrarchship, who thereupon entreated the Jews to depart, foretelling them of the danger, that would follow, but they being obstinate stayed still and departed not, till that some of them being destroyed they were enforced to be quiet.

The next year another great trouble arose in Syria by means of Antigonus the son of Aristobulus, who stirred up Pacorus the King of Parthia to help him to the Kingdom of Judea, promising to him 1000 talents, and 500 women. Hereupon Pacorus, who as Dio sayth, was the son of Orodes the King was sent together with Labienus a Roman, who was a great instigator to this War, because Anthony was more given to take his pleasure with Cleopatra, then to anything else, and now dissentions began to arise betwixt him and Cesar, so that he thought this to be the opportunity to subdue all Syria to the Parthians. And a Prince of Parthia called Barzaphernes was also sent with him. Then they comming with their forces in Syria subdued all, as they went and so came to Judea, and to the City Jerusalem, where Herod had many skirmishes with them, and slue many of them. But the Feast of Pentecost comming on, many thousands of Jews resorted to the City and took all but the Kings Palace, which was kept by Herod, his brother Phasaelus defending the Walls without, and Herod sallying out, put Pacorus and many thousands of his men to flight and returned. Then Antigonus perswaded him to go with a few souldiers into the City again, under a pretence of agreeing. Meeting therefore with Phasaelus, hee perswaded him to goe into Galilee to Barzaphernes in embassage, that there might be a peace concluded. Phasaelus, though against his brother Herods will, who premonisht him of the perfidy of the barbarous, went together with Hircanus, and was at the first friendly entertained by Barzaphernes. But hearing there what an offer Antigonus had made the Parthian to help him to the Kingdom he suspected treachery, yet he would not flee away in the night, as he was by a friend admonisht to do, but stayed to expostulate about it with Barzaphernes, who stiffly denied it, and then went away to Pacorus. So soon as he was gone, Phasaelus and Hircanus were taken by his men, men, and bound, and a messenger dispatched to Herod to draw him out of the gates, that he might be taken also. But he having intelligence before from Phasaelus, could not be moved to go out, although Pacorus under a pretence of letters brought since by a messenger of good news sought to draw him. Being therefore disappointed of this treachery the Parthians consult what to do, and Herod in the mean season fleeth away in the night with his souldiers and women towards Idumea, but was pursued by the Parthians, and many Jews also upon whom hee turning gave them many overthrowes, and so came to the Castle Massada, where leaving the women and some others to the number of 800, hee went into Arabia petrea, thinking to crave ayd of that King for the friendship, that had been betwixt him and his father, and being denyed for feare of the Parthians, he went to Egypt to Cleopatra and Anthony, and finding no help there, for Anthony was then at Rome, he took shipping in the midst of Winter, and sayled to Rome, a most dangerous voyage. In the mean season the Parthians spoyled the Jews inhabiting Jerusalem of all their goods, and the Kings Palace also, and Phasaelus and Hircanus came into the hands of Antigonus, who cut off Hircanus his eares, that hee might never be High-priest again, & Phasaelus impatient of his captivity, because he could not otherwise make away himself, being bound, beat his head against the wall & brake his skull, and so dyed, that he might not be abused at the will of his enemyes. And not long before Herod, when he was upon the way to Arabia, the Waggon wherein his was carryed being overthrown, drew out his sword thinking also to kill himself, but that hee was dissuaded from it, seeing thus hee should leave his mother and Wife and children to become a prey to his enemyes, whom he ought rather to live to defend. Herod being come to Rome, was much commiserate by Anthony and Cesar, and the more for his father Antipater's sake, whom they both greatly loved. And then the Senate being called together he was made King of the Jews, Antigonus being condemned for his turbulent spirit; wherewith he was carryed, and his father before him against the Romans, and for his bringing the Parthians their enemyes into the land. And thus they, that always hittherro, since their return out of captivity had been under a Governour of their brethren, as of Princes of the Tribe of Judah, till the time of Mattathias, and afterwards of High-priests and Kings comming of that Tribe by the mother, began first to be subject to a stranger, whereby they might know, that the comming of the Messiah was not far off, according to the prophesie of Jacob, the scepter shall not depart from Judah, &c. for Herod became absolute King, all competitors being put down, and reigned anno Mundi 3930, and anno 34 of his reign Christ was born. Herod's reign began not immediately after his comming to Rome, where hee was declared King, but 22 years of Hircanus his High-priesthood being first expired, after his restitution to it, from which he had been put down by his brother Aristobulus three years and some months, so that hee was High-priest first and last 31 years, nine in the time of Alexandra the Queen, his mother, and then almost four years of the reign of Aristobulus the Usurper comming between, being again restored by Pompey 22 years, after which Antigonus possessed the Kingdom five yeares, and then Herod putting him down reigned, till that Christ was born. Herod being thus made King especially through Ambinys favour, who thought it needfull to confer this honour upon him, in respect of his Wars with the Parthians, (for Herod came not to Rome with any hope to obtain this dignity, because it was contrary to the custome of the Romans to prefer any man to that Kingdom, but one of the blood royall, and therefore he thought to have made suit for Alexander, brother to his Wife, that he might be King) was taken between Anthony and Cesar to the Capitoll to sacrifice there. In the mean season the Castle of Massada was in danger by Antigonus who came to besiege it, and they within were brought to a great streight for want of water, insomuch that Joseph Herod's brother thought again to try the King of Arabia for help, but store of rain falling, their Cisterns were again supplied with water, whereby being encouraged, they within often issued out, and fought with Antigonus, killing many of his men.

Then, as Appianus hath it, Vennidius was sent with forces against the Parthians.

Cap. 25.

Selfmurder.

C. 16.

Gen. 49. 10.

Anno mundi,
3930.
F. 11. 11.

Appian.

ans.

Joseph lib. 14.
c. 17.

ans, who encountered with Labinus and prevailed, putting the Parthians to flight which, which Ventidius seeing feared, and disguising himselfe fled, but was taken and slain, and Pacorus sayth, Velleius was slain also. Herod then returning from Rome came to Ptolomais, and having gathered forces went first towards Massada. to deliver his besieged, then his army being more increased by many that flockt unto him, partly for his fathers sake, and partly because they heard that he was by the Romans made King, he moved towards Jerusalem, Silo and Ventidius being commanded by Anthony to assist him when he came to the West part of the City, they shot arrows, and threw darts at him, but he by a Trumpeter declared that he came not but for peace, and if they would open to him, he would forgive his most insense enemies, whereunto Antigonus answered, turning to the Romans, that they offered injury to help an Idumean, that was but of the halfe bloud of the Jews, to the Kingdom, seeing if he himselfe were thought unworthy to be King, yet there were others of the bloud Royall, of whom one might beset up. Then Silo being before corrupted with money by Antigonus, began to be treacherous towards Herod, for by his means his Souldiers mutined, saying, that they wanted provision, and hereupon he offered to remove to some other place to winter. But Herod importuning him to stay and supplying the army with all necessities, he could no more have any colour to go away, yet he provided that Antigonus within the City might know of it, to the end, that by sending out forces to meet with those that went out to get provision, he might hinder their being supplied without. But against this Herod provided, by sending out forces, and then following himselfe to their destruction. And by this time, Ventidius having beaten the Parthians out of Syria, sent to Herod one Machera, with two Legions, but Herod finding him also apt to be corrupted by Antigonus, resolved to go to Anthony, but that voyage was not without much opposition of barbarous enemies, whom he yet overthrew and came to Samosata to Anthony, of whom hee was honourably entertained, and by and by the place was yielded to Anthony, and he appoynted Sosius over it, commanding him to supply Herod with two of his Legions, and soon after to follow himselfe with his Army to help him, Anthony himselfe going from thence into Egypt. Now whilst Herod was thus absent, Antigonus prevailed much in Judea, and Joseph, Herods brother, with many of his men were slain. This he hearing upon the way, hastened first to Gablos, where that was done, to be revenged upon his enemies, and then to Jerusalem, and this was three years after his being made King at Rome. And here Josephus telleth of two strange preservations of Herod, by a singular divine providence: the one, in that having been feasted in an upper room, so soon as he was gone out to take his rest, it fell down; the others, in that being in a room of an house washing, with only one Page to attend him, three armed men lurked there behinde the hanging, hiding themselves, and first one came out with his sword drawn and went his way, as glad to save himselfe, and assaulted not Herod, and then the second and the third likewise.

Herod wonderfully preserved

When Herod was come to Jerusalem, Sosius also joyned himselfe there with him, and so their armyes together were 30000. Then they assaulted the City and lay long about it, by which means they within suffered by famine, yet their courage to repell the enemy continued unto the end. But Herod gained first one wall and then another, till that he came to the Temple, out of which still they fought, but in the end the Temple was entered and many were slain; and then Antigonus came and submitted himselfe to Sosius, who upbraided him by the name of Antigona, and put him in bands to be sent to Rome, yet Herod importuning him to it, for feare of future contention about the Kingdom, he sent him to Anthony, who to procure the more quiet to Herod, beheaded him. Joseph. lib. 15. c. 1. When Jerusalem was thus taken, the souldiers killed up the people without any respect of sex or age, and spoyled them of their goods, till that Herod with great difficulty prevailed to cause them to cease, when he had promised to every souldier a reward, and thus the rule of the Assyrians came to an end 126 years after it began, and Herod came to possesse the Kingdom. Having gotten it, he slue 45 of the principall of the faction of Antigonus, and otherways consumed many more

Anno mundi, 3930.

more that had been enemies to him, and tooke all the stuffe of the Kings house, and the gold and silver in the City, whereof he sent great gifts to Anthony. Hircanus all this time was in the power of the Parthian King Ptraates, since his taking, together with Phasaelus, by Barzaphernes the Parthian Lord, who used him kindly, and placed him in Babylon, to rule over the Jews there, of whom there were many, and he was amongst them had in great reverence, so that his captivity now seemed light unto him. Yet hearing that Antigenus was slain, and Herod King, he had a great desire to return to Jerusalem again, nothing doubting but that Herod, whom he had always so dearly loved, as he had also done his father Anipater, would greatly honour him, being also now as a father to him in respect of his wife of the house of Hircanus, whom he had married. Herod also hearing of his desire, wrote lovingly to him, promising him all honour, and so means being made to King Ptraates he dismissed him. When hee was returned, Herod entertained him with all honour, placing him on his right hand, and calling him father, but because of his ears cut off, he made Ananelus another Priest of no obscure stock High-priest, and not one of the Assamoneans, for feare of future danger. But Alexandra his wife, Mariannes mother, who had also a sonne sixteen years old, called Aristobulus, exceeding beautifull, as also her daughter Mariamme was, stomackt it greatly, that her son, to whom of right the High-priesthood belonged, should be neglected, and another preferred (for she bare him to Alexander, son of Aristobulus the King, and was Hircanus his daughter, and so Mariamme her daughter was Grandchilde to Hircanus) she sent to Anthony to desire the High-priesthood for her sonne. But Anthony neglected it, till that one Gellius a friend comming to Jerusalem, saw the beauty of her two children, and was wonderfully taken with it. To him then she spake for her son, and by his advise sent by him his picture and his sister to Anthony, who also highly extolled them unto him, insomuch that hee was taken with their love, and would have sent for them both, but that he feared Cleopatra taking it ill: yet he sent for her sonne, but Herod excused his not sending him, because, if he should, all Jerusalem would be in an uprore, and so he rested satisfied. Yet Mariamme, Herods wife, ceased not importuning him for her brother, that he might be High-priest, and at length prevailed so far, that Herod calling a Councell of his friends granted it, at which both Alexandra and shee greatly rejoiced, and thanked Herod: yet he thought it still necessary to watch over Alexandra, fearing that she would attempt something further afterwards. This shee seeing took it indignely, for that shee thought her life, as it were, but a prisoners life, and therefore wrote to Cleopatra to complain hereof. She received her letters, and wrote back to her, that she should come over with her sonne into Egypt, but whilst she prepared in great secrecie to doe so, she was discovered to Herod, when she had conveyed herselfe and son away to the seas side, being carried in chests, as if they had been filled with stuffe, and so they were brought back again to him. Yet Herod in great cunning carryed it fairly towards them, having a purpose in his heart to make Aristobulus shortly away. But in the mean season Ananelus being put down from the High-priesthood, and Aristobulus at 17 years of age, in his 18th. he was moved, by the affection which he perceived to be extraordinary in the people towards him, to hasten his end, for at the Feast of Tabernacles the people beholding the great comlinesse of their High-priest, being adorned with his Pontificall attire, they expressed great affection towards him. Herod then feigning the like good affection, took him to him, and condescended to his youth, to play with him, till that their sport being ended, they went both out into a garden, wherein were fishponds, to take the aire. And there being then certain young men washing them, and swimming in the pond, Aristobulus, at Herods motion, did the like. Then the swimmers, as they were before instructed by him, played with Aristobulus, in the water, and often duckt him, till at the last he was drowned. This being known, his mother and sister, and the whole City also, made great lamentation, and Herod with Crocodiles teares, seemed to doe the like, and spared for no cost in the burying of him, yet Alexandra his mother presuming

That by Herods means her son had lost his life, studied how to be revenged, and to this end wrote to Cleopatra again, to move Anthony to call Herod in question. Therefore he going to Laodicea, sent for Herod, at which although he were much grieved, yet hee durst not but goe to him. Yet fearing the worst, hee committed the government in the interim to his brother Joseph, as Josephus sayth, forgetting himselfe that he had before written of Josephs death, whilst Herod was with Anthony. But haply he means a brother in law, husband to Salome his sister, of whom soon after. To this Joseph then he gave charge, that if it should fall out ill unto him from Anthony, he should forthwith slay his wife Mariamme, pretending that no other man might enjoy her beauty, which he sayd he suspected, Anthony would doe, if he were cut off. Being gone, Joseph often visits Alexandra, and her daughter, and sometime talked much of Herods love to her, for prooffe whereof he told what he had given him in charge, if he should miscarry. But they both construing it otherwise, were much exasperated. A rumour then comming to the City, that Anthony had strangled Herod, they consulted with Joseph about fleeing away to a Roman Legion, but letters soon came from Herod, signifying how Anthony by his gifts was moved to use him kindly, and to answer Cleopatra, that he being now made a King, ought not to be questioned, and to pacifie her gave her the rule of Caesaryia, but to ambitious of dominion was she, and greedy of gain, that she asked of him all Syria also, and Judea, inso-much that hee gave her all betwixt the river Euphrates and Nilus, except Tyrus and Sidon, and shee had before poysoned her brother Ptolomee being but fiftene yeares old, that shee might reign over Egypt alone, and her sister Arfinoe she caused to be slain, neyther was there any Temple within her power, but shee robbed it. Herod being feasted and dismissed by Anthony, returns home to Judea, then Salome his sister told him all, what Joseph her husband and Alexander and Mariamme had conspired to doe, thereupon Herod was much offended with his wife, as being jealous for Joseph, but shee at the first clearing her selfe, they two fell to kissing and imbracing again. Then shee objecting that his love was indeed great towards her, when as if he had miscarried, he would have had her put to death, he thrust her from him, and cryed out, now he knew she was an whore, and therefore Joseph had opened this secret unto her, and with much adoe refrained he from killing her, but Joseph he caused forthwith to be slain unheard, and cast Alexandra into prison. Anthony about this time went into Armenia, where Cleopatra accompanied him a great part of the way, and then returned by Judea, to receive the profits of the parts given her by Anthony, there Herod, although he knew her to be his enemy, yet entertained her honourably, and when she had a while tarried with him, like an impudent whore, desired to lye with him. He at the first instead of so doing, thought to take his opportunity to be revenged on her by killing her, but upon the perswasions of his friends he did not, but accompanying her homeward, dismissed her into Egypt. Then there fell out an occasion to Herod of warring upon the Arabians, because they denyed to pay Herod the tribute given him by Anthony. He therefore going forth with an Army, fought against them and overcame them. But they renewed their forces again, and so they had another battell, wherein also Herod prevailed, but immediately after this victory, Athenio a Captain of Cleopatras in those parts, for the hatred which hee bare to Herod came upon his men being weary and slow many of them, and the Arabians seeing this turned into the battell again, whereby many more of the Jews fell, therefore Herod after this came against the Arabians at sundry times, not to open battell, but after the manner of robbers. But whilst he and his souldiers were thus doing, there happened in Judea a grievous Earthquake, whereby 10000 people perished, and much cattell, but none of the souldiers, because they lay abroad in their Tents. The Arabians hearing this rejoyced greatly, as thinking now easily to subdue the Countrey. Wherefore they first killed the Embassadours who were sent unto them to sue for peace, then raising an Army they hastened towards Judea, neither was there any courage in the Jews at the first to fight, so dejected in minde were they for the late destruction by the Earthquake. But Herod making an

Cap. 5.

Cap. 6.

Chap. 7.

an Oration to encourage them from the justice of their cause, to which, he layd, God would never be wanting, and from the consideration of their two former victories over the Arabians; and lastly, from their suffering so much by the immediate hand of God, which argued, that having himselfe so grievously punished them, he would not give them over into the hands of their enemies, they were greatly animated, and so Herod having sacrificed, led them over Jordan to meet their enemies, and after a sore fight they put them to flight, having slain 5000 of them, then pursuing them to their Tents, they made them seeke by their Embassadors for peace, which yet Herod would not grant, as being desirous to be revenged for his Embassadors sent to them before. The Arabians seeing this, put themselves, to the number of 4000, upon his mercie, the residue being irked at it, resolved desperately to fight it out, rather then to come into such thraldome, out being over-pow'ed by the Jewish army, they fell, to the number of 7000, the rest after this yielding. Herod by this victory, getting great honour amongst the people, returned home in great pompe, but Anthony being now overcome by Caesar, he was greatly troubled for feare of his wrath, because of his friendship with Anthony, having also offered to ayd him in his last battell against Caesar, but that he sent him back to curb the Arabians. Therefore he expected no good from him, but ruine. Now because he thought, that if he were put down, Hircanus should again be advanced, as being the only man remaining of the royall stock, he had a desire to dispatch him, before he went to speake to Caesar. And whilst he was thus thinking, an occasion to execute his bloody intention happened thus. His daughter Alexandra moved him, seeing Herod was like to be put down, to write to Malichus King of Arabia, to send him a convoy to bring him safely to Arabia, for he had a desire to come and sojourn with him. The Messenger by whom the letter was sent, treacherously shewed it first to Herod, to curry favour with him, although he had been greatly wronged before by him. Herod having seen it, willed him to carry it, and to bring him the Arabians answer, which he did, and then Hircanus being called into question for it, and when he was asked denying, that he had written any such letter, he was by Herods command immediately slain being above 80 years old, having continued High-priest 40 years, being always a man of a milde disposition, and patient upon all accidents, and towards Antipater and Herod his son, very beneficent, yet he was thus at last requited by him in his old age, being put to a vile death. The 40 year of Hircanus his pontificality from the first beginning, are by Fuuccius reckoned thus. In the time of his mother Alexandra her reign, years nine, then Aristobulus his younger brother got the Kingdome foure years, after this, Pompey confirmed him in his Highpriesthood again, & he continued 22, then his ears being cut off by Antigonus, hee was led captive into Parthia, and under that King was placed as High-priest over the Jews in his dominions five years, during which time Antigonus was King, then he being slain by Herod the King, he made Ananelus High-priest, and then Aristobulus son to Hircanus his daughter Alexandra, and he being dead, Ananelus again in the fourth year of his reign, wherein Hircanus dyed, therefore if the whole time be counted from the first beginning of Hircanus his High-priesthood, it was 44 to his death, and this was Anno Mundi, 3935. Then Herod preparing for his journey to Caesar, committed the government of his Kingdom to Pharasa his brother, leaving his mother and sister, and the rest of his kindred in the Castle Massada, and Alexandra and Mariamne his wife in Alexandrium with Ioseph his Questor and Sohemus, commanding them if hee should miscarry, to kill them both, and to preserve the Kingdome for his children.

Things being thus ordered, hee hastened to Rhodes to speake with Caesar, and when they were met, he only laying down his Crown with great courage and freeness, told Caesar that he had loved Anthony much, and it hee had not been hindered by his wars with the Arabians, he would have been with him in his last fight against Caesar, for he was bound by his good deserts towards him to spend his life in his quarrell, and many other wayes hee spared not to shew how he had constantly cleaved unto him, in the end telling him, that if hee would Herods piety.

Vniust dealing against the Law of Nations punish in the kind.

C. 9.

Anno mundi, 3935.Fuuccius Chro-nolog.

Cap. 20.

make tryall of his friendship, he should in like manner finde what it was. Cesar being delighted to heare his resolute speech, restored him his crown, and willing him to be as faithfull now to him, as he had formerly been to Anthony, he used him with all kindnesse. And Herod having conducted him to Egypt, returned home more confirmed to the admiration of all men. And then going again to Cesar to Ptolemais he came yet into more grace with him by the present which he gave him of 800 talents, and his liberality and officiousnesse to his friends and army. But comming home the second time, he first went to his wife Mariamne, whom he loved above all his wives, kissing and embracing her, and telling her of his honour with Cesar, and how he had enlarged his dominion by adding thereto divers places, which Anthony taking away had given to Cleopatra. But she seemed to take no pleasure in hearing of it, because she was grieved at other things, viz. the death of her father and brother, and his late giving order again, that if he had miscarryed, she and her mother should have been slain. Herod then perceiving her discontent, whom he loved so dearly, was much offended, and his mother and sister perceiving this, put him on all that they could, because they hated her, as one that out of her pride for the high stock of which she came, did oft reproach them by their base pedigree. Yet he being still uncertain whether hee should be swayed most by wrath or love, brake not out into any thing harsh against her, till that his mother and sister accusing her for incontinencie with Sohemus, to whose custody she had been committed: neyther yet was he hereby much exasperated against her, because he beleevd it not, till that upon a certain day, being disposed to goe after dinner into his chamber, and there to ly down upon his bed, he sent for her to come to him, and being come he willed her to sit upon the bed by him, but shee denyed and thereupon he was much more provoked. And to make her matter worse, Herods mother had secretly waged his BURLER to present unto him, as from Mariamne, a cup, as she bad him call it, of love drinke, and he prepared and brought it in at the same time that he was thus vexed at her, telling him, as he was instructed, that it was prepared for him at the Queens appoyntment. Herod then thinking that she would hereby have poysoned him, was much more intraged against her, and calling his Councell together, told them what had been done, and then a Page that waited upon her was fetched and put upon the wrack, because it was thought that if the Queen had plotted any such evill against him, he could not be ignorant of it, then he cryed out that he knew nothing, unlesse because Sohemus had told her that he had taken order, that she and her mother should have been slain if he had miscarryed when he went to Cesar, shee therefore to berevenged on him, had prepared for him this potion. When Herod heard this, he concluded immediately that she had been nought with Sohemus, and so served him as he had done Josephus before. And his Councell seeing it was his will, condemned Mariamne to dye, yet the King would not have execution suddenly done lest he should afterwards repent it, but he commanded that she should be kept in prison, to which, as she was going, her mother Alexandra came out and rayled upon her, saying, she was worthy the most cruell death, that would have destroyed her husband being so loving to her, to whom she answered nothing, but lookt upon her, as giving a check to her unnaturalnesse by her countenance. Then Herods mother and sister perswaded him to hasten the execution, because if the Jews should know of her imprisonment, there would be danger of great tumults amongst them, wherefore she was brought out to execution; and suffered with an undaunted courage, as one not fearing to die, being in her own conscience innocent. Yet by her example let all women of high birth, take heed of insulting over others, and vaunting themselves of the nobility of their stock, or glorying in their beauty and comely carriage, for herein she excelled all other women whatsoever. When she was thus cut off, Herod soon repenting him grew most melancholy, and full of wrath against every one about him, he could not eat nor rest, but called out for Mariamne, till that he went under a pretence of hunting, and hid himselfe in a wood, whereupon hee fell into a dangerous disease, inso much, that it was despaired of his life. In which time Alexandra sought to have two principall Castles put into her hands, that if Herod dyed the Kingdom might

The treachery of a mother in law.

Alex. against her own daughter to flatter Herod.

Against glorying in Pedigrees.

might return to her, and after remain to the Jews. But Herod by the industry and care of his Phylitians, recovered, and hearing what Alexandra had attempted, though in vain, he put her to death. After this, to drive away melancholy, he set up a Theatre, and there delighted himself in beholding divers shews, and fightings of wilde beasts and men condemned to die, professing that he did this to the honour of Cesar, writing his name therefore in divers places about it in golden letters. But the Jews being zealous for the law of God, had great indignation at it, and at the first attempted, by a conspiracie of ten desperate persons to slay him, but this being discovered, they were taken and slain, and when they went to execution, they suffered with an undaunted courage, as dying for the Law of God, against which they sayd it was, and their Countrey manner to have any such pastimes, in beholding one creature fighting with and killing another, especially, men and beasts put together to fight. The party discovering them, was soon after by some of the Jews cut in pieces, whereupon divers were tormented, to make them confesse who they were that did it, at length when no man could be made to confesse, a silly woman forced by torment, discovered them, and so they and theirs suffered for it. Herod seeing an aptnesse in the Jews to rebell about these things, built more strong places to curbe them, and enlarging and walling Samarina about, called it Sebaste, and there hee built a magnificent and large Temple.

The spectacle of men and beasts fighting together condemned.

But to leave the Jewish affairs again for a time, and to return to Cesar Octavius Augustus, he having, as was sayd before, put an end to the Romans civill Wars, lest they should afterwards breake out again, sent first and slue Antyllus the eldest son of Anthony by Fulvia, and soon after Cesareon the son of Cleopatra, as he was fleeing into Ethiopia, but Cleopatra, Antonies daughter by Cleopatra, he married to K. Juba, his sonne Juba, and gave him his fathers Kingdom, and unto them he gave Alexander and Ptolomee, two sons of Anthony by Cleopatra. Then seizing upon the treasures of Cleopatra, he gave to every of his souldiers 250 drams a piece, and returning to Rome had all honour done unto him, and having held three Triumphs, was made Emperour, not as others formerly, but all power being given unto him, to order things as he pleased in all places, as his father Julius Caesar had. And then Temples were built both to Julius and him, and they were honoured as gods with sacrifices in divers places, and this was 14 years after the death of Julius Caesar, then the Temple of Janus was shut, in token of an universall peace, and after this he reigned 42 years. But the son of Lepidus meditating revenge for his fathers injury, conspired to slay him, yet without effect, for Mecenas the Governour of the City, finding out his conspiracy soon extinguished it. Augustus being thus dignified, would yet be Consul another year, and joyned Agrippa unto him, as being his intimate friend, giving him his sisters daughter to wife, and using his counsell in all things as he did the counsell of Mecenas also, yet he was nothing the more lifted up in his minde hereby, but referred all to the greater honour of Augustus. After this Cesar built Theatres, and shewed fights to the people of divers sorts, wherein they much delighted. For his love to learning, he then built a Temple to Minerva, and a famous library to it, furnishing it with all sorts of Latine and Greeke books. After which, he bent his course towards Brittany, but being in France, Oratoours were sent over to entreat for peace, and so he passed away to Spain against the Cantabri, who, with all others in Spain, relucting against the Roman yoke were in a yeare or two brought under, and then the Temple of Janus was again shut up, because there was universall peace.

Funk. Chronol.
Anno mundi, 3936.

Whilst things went well thus with the Romans, the Jews suffered greatly by famine and many thousands were ready to perish hereby. Then Herod commiserating their caseooke all the vessels of gold and silver and ornaments that hee had and made money of them, which he sent into Egypt to buy corn, for the famine continued two yeares. This wonne him such love amongst them, that now all men forgetting things past greatly loved and honoured him. The people nourished by him in this time of famine were 50000 of his own subjects, besides strangers. Then plenty returning again, he beautified his Palace and erected many buildings

Anno mundi, 3936.
3942.

Cap. 13.

An oath put upon the people.

A prophesie touching Herod.

Ioseph. lib. 15.
cap. 14.

things in honour of Cesar and Agrippa, and other great men of Rome, calling them by their names. After this espousing a beautifull young damicell, the daughter of Simon a noble Priest, hee was in love with her and took her to Wife, and that this match might be son what worthy of a King, hee made her father High-priest, Iesus the son of Phabes, being put from it, who had bin made High-priest the year after Hircanus his death, anno mundi 3936, and was put from it anno 3942, when he had sitten six years, and then Simon the son of Boethus began. anno 13 of Herods reign. annoque 13 after the Assamonean family first put down, Soen after this Herod observiſg a place neer the Sea fit to build a City upon between Dora and Ioppe in Phanice, built one there, and an Haven very sumptuous, and that hee might in all things attein more favour still with Cesar, he called it Casarea, and built there a stately Temple to him, and erected two Statues, one called Roma, another Cesar, and a Theatre also, at which the Jews were not well pleased, although it were out of their limits, as seeing by this in him a declination from the true Religion. And about this work he spent 12 years. He also sent his two sons Alexander and Aristobulus to Rome to visit Cesar, and had his dominion by Cesar, enlarged by adding to it Trachonitis, Batanea, and Auranitis, which were before held by Zenodorus, a favourer of robbers, who had spacious caves in the ground with narrow entrances, out of which they issued and did great mischief. Herod therefore by the means, that he could bringing these Countreys into better order possessed them, the Auranites, that would not yield, but kept him out by hostile means growing at length desperate, killing and drowning themselves and Zenodorus dying by the overflowing of blood in his body, through the breaking of his heart-strings. Cesar also gave Herod leave to appoint, whether of his sons he would to reigne after him. Then Agrippa coming as President into those parts shewed all kindnesse to Herod, although there came many complaints against him, and afterwards Cesar himself comming thither honoured him likewise, and adjoynd him so to the other Governours of Syria, that they should do nothing without him. Herod being growne thus great called all his subjects to sweare fealty to him and many, that refused, were imprisoned. But the Pharisees, who were followers of Pollio and Sameas men always gracious with Cesar were not so harshly dealt withall, although they refused, nor yet the Esses for the sake of Manahemus, who long ago, as it is sayd, when Herod was a boy and went to school, foretold him, that he should be King, and gave him good counsell to doe justice to every man, and to use clemencie, but he told him he knew that he would be cruell and treacherous, but otherwise he should doe great things and attein to much honour. And afterwards when he was come to the Kingdome, he asking him how long he should reign, whether to ten years or more, he answered, to 20, to 30, and so left him. Iosephus also noteth, that there being but two men of power above all others in the Roman Empire, viz. Augustus and Agrippa, Herod was made the third. After this he built a Temple of marble to the honour of Augustus, and to make the Jews lesse offended with him, he remitted them the third part of their Tribute, because they tooke some works that he made to tend to the depraving of Religion, and were hereby somewhat provoked against him. And in the 18 yeare of his reign to please them more, he prepared to build a magnificent house to the honour of God, because that house which the Jews had built after their return from the Babylonish captivity was too low and in statelinesse far inferiour to the Temple built at the first by Solomon, wherefore he propounded to build a Temple 100 cubits high, and 100 long, and that the Jews might be sure hereof, he sent up a 1000 carts to fetch materials, and provided 10000 workmen and 1000 Priests, who had skill in Masonry, whereby all things being brought together and made ready, the old Temple was taken down, and this new house built in most magnificent and sumptuous manner, the King giving 300 oxen for sacrifices, and the people so many as could not be numbered, and this building was finished in lesse then a yeare and a halfe, in all which time it reigned not in the day to hinder the worke, but only in the night, and at the finishing thereof, and the porch and the Courts the whole people of the Jews had great joy, and prayed for all happinesse to Herod, by whose benigntie and bounty they had had now again so flatly a Temple built them. Josephus also describeth all things more at large concerning this rare fabrick, so that who so desires to see more thereof, may read his 14 chap. lib. 15. where he sayth, that the Temple built by him at the first was 20 cubits longer then hath been spoken, but so much fell down again within a short time after and he describes the courts both of the Priests and Levites, of men that were clean, of women and of Profelytes of other Nations. But Herod according to others did not new build, but added to Zerobabels Temple. The Temple with all things belonging to it being thus finisht, Herod made a law, that whosoever were found to have digged through a wall into a house, should be sold for a slave to foreigners for ever, at which the Jews were greatly offended as tending to the overthrow of their Laws against theft. But hee not passing for their offence sayled over into Italy to visit Cesar, and to bring away his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, who hee thought, had now been long enough at Rome to be seasoned with learning. Wherefore after honourable entertainment given him there by Cesar, he returned home with them. This Salome his sister seeing & envying them, because of their mother Mariamne, they being goodly young men, and of a majestickall port studied to stir up Herod to enmity against them, and to this end shee caused it to be given out, that they loved not their father, but were averse from his company, as reputing him the murtherer of their mother. But Herod was not moved at this rumour, wherefore his favour towards his sons was never the lesse, inso much that he married them being now grown up, Alexander to Glaphyra the daughter of Archilans K. of Cappadocia and Aristobulus to Bernice his sister Salome her daughter. Then hearing that Agrippa a Roman Captain was come into Asia, he went and invited him, and entertained him to his high content. And the next Spring Agrippa going against Ponticus, Herod with a many hastened unto him for his ayd, who was very joyfull at his coming, and the Pontick businesse being dispatched, they returned together to Ionis by the way, and there Agrippa gratifying Herod in any request, that he made for the Jews inhabiting those parts, hee leaving Agrippa President of Syria, returned home and told the Jews, how much favour and freedom he had procured them in all parts, as his care had always been to do them good, and remitted them now to oblige them the more to him the fourth part of their tribute, at which they much rejoiced and gave him great thanks. But whilst Herod was thus happy in publicke, he wanted not corraives at home. For his sister Salome and Pherota sought by all means to provoke Alexander and Aristobulus, to speak in justification of their dead mother, by traducing her as worthy of her death, whereby she had suffered, and they being thus urged layd, that the she was wrongfully cut off, wherein their father Herod being somewhat touched, their speeches were soon brought unto him. Wherefore he having a younger son called Antipater, took him into his speciall favour, so that it might easily be perceived, that putting down the two elder hee had a purpose to advance him to the Kingdome after himself. Antipater being thus preferred observes all occasions to exasperate his father yet more against them, and therefore he set some of his friends to espy their carriage secretly, that they might thence to be accused to Herod, and hee more alienated from them. Then they were observed sometimes to weep at their fathers unjust dealing towards them, and to speak against him for it, which being told him he sent Antipater with Agrippa to Rome to be acquainted with Cesar, thusto make way for his preferment, and the ruine of his other two sons. Antipater being there cealed not by letters to importune his father against his two brethren, so that now he grew more infest against them and went to Rome to accuse them to Cesar, carrying them with him, and making there a speech against them. After this both his sons stood mute for a time, but at length Alexander spake and answered all his fathers Oration, so that both he himself and all present were moved to pity. Then Cesar having spoken for them, Herod embraced his sons, and after hee had well gratified Cesar returned home with them, where he declared before the people, that his son Antipater should reigne after him, and then Alexander and Aristobulus but thus he layd a foundation of greater troubles to his family. For the two elder stomackt it, as a wrong done to them shewing enmity against their mother, and Antipater was not satisfi-

Joseph. l. 16. c. 1.

Ios. l. 16. c. 12.

Diffimulation notorious.

Ioseph. l. 17.

tied in that he should enjoy the Kingdome but for his life time, whereof he should also be in danger as long as they lived. And Salome also his sister and his brother Pherotas envied them this preferment. Then Herods domestick troubles began greatly to increase, for Salome wrought by her daughter: Bernice to discover his secretest talk and actions, and to bring them to Herod, whereby hee and his brother were again ill thought on, and by Salome her instigation, Bernice separated from her husband, and Pherotas fell in love with her mayd-servant to draw him from the love of whom Herod offered his daughter, whom he promised sometime to take, but soon after through the love of that mayd-servant he refused her.
 At this Herod was greatly displeased & banisht him from his Court and his sister Salome also, and some others of his neerest friends he cast off, and made away some others. Archilaus King of Cappadocia hearing of Herods displeasure against his son-in-law Alexander had thought to have gone over to him to endeavour a reconciliation, but upon better advice he rather sought it another way, by feigning himself very angry with his daughter for that she discovered not unto him the treachery of her husband against Herod, his father threatening to reject both her and him, if she did not, as being both guilty. Herod seeing this was moved with compassion to his son, and prayed Archilaus, who he now thought, dearly loved him, to be reconciled to his children. And Pherotas also seeking unto him to reconcile his brother to him following his direction prevayled, and so all breaches were made up, and Archilaus went home honoured with great gifts by Herod.
 But this lasted not long, for one Eurycles a Lacedemonian being a subtle man and a great flatterer insinuated himself into the friendship of Antipater and Alexander also, pretending himself to be a speciall friend to Archilaus, his father-in-law.
 By him the young man was so taken, that supposing him to be a dear friend, hee opened the secrets of his heart unto him. Then he treacherously told all to Antipater, and hee to his father Herod, who upon this was more incensed against his two sons, and committed them to prison. For Eurycles told, that Alexander and Aristobulus meditated an escape to Archilaus, by him to be conveyed to Rome, and that their hearts were bent to mischief against Antipater and their father, for which he had 50 talents given him by Antipater, and returning towards his own Country by Archilaus, he told him, what a good office he had done in reconciling Alexander and Herod together, when hee was very wroth with him, for which he also received a great reward at his hands, and going home into his own Country he went on in the same craft there, till at length he was banished for it.
Herod having upon his relation conceived most hardly of his sons, and discovering also somthing by letters and confessions of the tormented for this purpose, examined them upon it, and all treachery being by Alexander denied, but only hee confessed, that they intended to go to Archilaus, &c. because they could not live there out of danger by reason of their enemyes, and hee continued alienated in his affection from them, and sent to complain of them to Cesar, from whom having liberty given him to proceed against them, as he thought good, first having assembled together his two Presidents of Councell of Syria, he cast them into prison, & after a while caused them to be strangled there. And when as one Milo an old souldier of his cryed out more freely against this unjust proceeding, & being admitted to speak with him in private, told him what feares & hatred against him it might breed in the people to the indangering of his person, he also caused him to be put upon the Rack, as a Conspiratour with his sons, and when the Kings barber came in and accused him, that hee offered him a reward, in barbing of him to cut his throat, he forthwith executed him, when Antipater saw that his brethern were thus made away, so that he should not need to feare, their aspiring any more to the Kingdome, to his hindrance, he began to devise how his father might be made away also, who now only was an hindrance to him, yet Herod had many children, for he had many wives, viz. nine at one time, and his son Alexander left two sonnes which he had by the daughter of Archilaus King of Cappadocia, and Aristobulus three and two daughters. And Herod their father had a sonne called Herod by the High-priests daughter, and Antipas and Archilaus by a Samaritan woman, and divers others. And suspecting nothing of Antipaters evill minde towards towards him, he married him to Bernice, his sister Salome her daughter, and made marriages between their children, to take away all grudges, yet Antipater closely medicated mischief, and although neither his father, nor any other perceived it, yet Salome did, and bad him beware of him. Then he seeing that he could not compass his ends, fearing lest his treason should be discovered, wrote to some private friends, that Cesar might be moved to send for him, which he did, and his father knowing nothing how this was wrought, sent him with most precious gifts to Cesar, & by letters declared him King after his decease. But whilst he was at Rome, Pherotus Herods brother fell sick, & sent for Herod to come to him, who did & then he learned that by the procurement of his son Antipater he should be poisoned, & that he had bin heard complaining to his mother of the long life of his father, and of his many children, so that if he should come to the Kingdom after him, it would do him little good, because he should then be old, & his other sons being grown up he should not reign in safety: moreover, he was vexed, because Herod the son of the Priests daughter was appointed to reign after, or if he dyed before his father, after him, & not one of his own sons. These things being thus discovered to Herod, he put away Antipaters mother called Doris, being spoiled of all her costly ornaments & the Highpriest Simons daughter, deposing her father, & making another Highpriest, viz. Mathias the son of Theophilus, & putting his son Herod out of his Testament, because she knew of all his treachery and discovered it not. Antipater knowing nothing all this while of his treason comming to light, wrote to his father of the evil sayings of his two sons at Rome, Archelaus and Philip that they murmured against him for murdering his own sons, their brethren, and sayd, when they were sent for home, that he sent for them only to take occasion to add to his unnaturall murders. Herod receiving Antipaters letters dissembled his wrath against him, & wrote to him to hasten home again, as being desirous to see him. Thus he did, but hearing by the way of his mothers disgrace he feared, & therefore went not forward till after consultation had with his friends. But then being perswaded by them he came to Sebastie, & thence to the Court, where Herod sat together with Varus the President of Syria, to whom he had sent that he might consult with him. Antip. his son coming in he would not salute him, but laid open his wickedness and aggravated it before Varus, by telling how he had made him consort of the kingdom, and given him liberally what he desired, & declared him successor in the kingdom, til he could speake no further for weeping. Then Nicolaus his Orator, to whom he committed the matter, proceeded to accuse him, and more fully to lay open all things, and when Antipater had nothing to say in his own defence, but called upon God to shew some judgment upon him if he were guilty, Varus having called for the poison which had before bin discovered, & brought forth by Pherotus his wife, for he corrupted with gifts should have bin the instrument of the death of his own brother whilst Antip. was at Rome, tryed the strength of it by giving it to a condemned man, who presently upon the taking of it dyed. Then he arising, after some conference had privately with Herod, departed, and Herod bound Antipater and put him in prison. Then he sent Embassadors to Cesar to lay open his treachery to him, who sent answer that he should proceed against him as he pleased: but when the answer came, Herod was sick of a grievous disease, whereinto he began to fall so soon as he had sent his Embassadors away, insomuch that men thought generally now, that it would be his death, wherefore certain young men, disciples to two most learned, Indas and Mathias, by their instigation gathering together many people, went to the great gate of the Temple, and brake in pieces an Eagle of gold, set up there by Herod, which, they sayd, he had done against the Law of God. But Herods Captains hearing of it, went with a band of men, and others fleeing, tooke 40 resolute young men, that stood to maintain what they had done, and their two Masters Indas and Mathias, who were ashamed to flee, and brought them to Herod. He being very angry with them and threatening them for this, they were nothing dismayed, but sayd, they must obey God and the laws given by his servant Moses rather than him, and by his law the making of Images was forbidden, and therefore they were ready to suffer any death, and feared not his wrath, seeing it was for Gods cause. Then Herod sent for the most honourable of the Jews, and declared to them his good deierets towards that Nation, and what he had done to the honour of God, yea,

The son sick of the father.

Gods judgements upon Herod.

Parricide revenged.

Anno mundi, 3963.
Funeii Chron.

August. breviar.

more then ever had been done by the Aslamoneans, during the space of 125 years, wherein they reigned, upbraided them for their ingratitude, and aggravated that which was done by these men as a sin against God, to whose honour this costly Eagle had bin set up requiring them to tell who was the author of this insurrection. They fearing his tyranny, denied all that they had any hand in it: and then he burnt the authors hereof without delay. & because he presumed that Mathias the High-priest could not be ignorant of it, he put him from the High-priesthood, and gave it to his wives brother Jozabab. But when he had raged, thus against the demolishers of the Eagle, his disease greatly increased, for he had an extream burning within, making him most greedy of meat, he had also grievous fits of the collick and an ulceration in his bowels, his feet also swelled, and his entrails and his privities were corrupt and bred wormes, and an intollerable stinke came from him, and to all these were added the shrinking of his sinews, and difficulty of breathing. Yet when all this came upon him, and he saw that he must die, he sent for all the principall men of the Jews and shut them up, requiring his sister Salome and her husband Alexas with tears, so soon as he was dead, before any knew thereof, to let the armed men upon them to slay them, because hee knew that the Jews always maligning him would rejoyce at his death, but thus their joy should be turned into mourning. Antipater all this while lying bound in prison, when he heard of the desperate case wherein his father was, offered large gifts to the prison keeper to set him at liberty, thinking now easily to get the kingdom, but he was so far from granting his request that he went and told the King of it, who thereupon sent immediately and put him to death, and so he paid for his parricide and treachery, as hee was well worthy. Then Herod having made his Will, wherein he gave the kingdom to Archilauus, & a Tetrarchy, that is, the government of foure Regions to his brother Philip, and to Antipas, Galilee, and other great gifts to Salome, and to his other children and kindred, and chiefly to Cesar and his wife Julia, he dyed five dayes after Antipater, anno 70 of his age, 34 after Antigonus subdued, & 37 after he was first made King by the Romans. But Salome instead of putting the Nobles of the Jews to death, let them at liberty, saying that Herod willed her so to doe, that every one might goe home to his own house, which got her and her husband much love of the whole Nation. And in this 34, being the last yeare of Herods reign, was the son of God Jesus Christ borne of the Virgin Mary, Anno mundi 3963.

To return now again to Augustus Caesar, when he had put an end to civill Wars by the death of Anthony & Cleopatra, as was before sayd, to the end that they might be prevented for time to come, he sent & slue Anthony the son of Anthony by Fulvia, who was fled to his fathers Chappel built by Cleopatra, and Cesar on fleeing into Ethiopia, was taken by the way and slain, Cleopatra the daughter of Cleopatra, and Anthony he gave in marriage to King Juba, & to him also he granted two other of their sons, Alexander & Ptolomee. Then having spent the winter following in Syria, where Herod by his bounty and care to do him all good offices, insinuated greatly into his favour, he came into Gracia the next sommer, and permitted Temples to be made to the honour of Rome, and of his father Iulus at Nice, and Ephesus, and from thence he went into Italy and to Rome, where he was received by Valerius Potius Consul, with all honour, he sacrificing for his prosperity and S.P.Q.R. which was a thing not formerly done, & instituted for him three triumphs, and used other great bounry towards him. Then was he made Emperour, not as others formerly, but to rule all things according to his own will, which was in the time of his 5th. Consulship, the 15 year after the death of J. Caesar, for from thence doth his Empire begin, according to the account of Chronologers, who number of his Empire 56 years, but before the subduing of all his enemies, 15 of them were spent in wars, and now they being ended in the East, the Temple of Janus was shut by the Senats comand, but in way off flattering Cesar, because all war in Spain was not yet ended, August. being now established Emperour, had two friends Agrippa and Mecenas whose counsell he specially used in all things, and by Mecenas a plot of Lepidus, the son of Lepidus one of the Triumviri to kill Augustus, was discovered and prevented. The next yeare he was Consul the sixth time, and made Agrippa his Colleague, who, by his appoyntment tooke the summe of the people to Rome, who who were found to be 400063000, and having made divers famous works, he caused the Temple of Ianus to be opened again, because the Cantabri and the Astures, two most warlike people in Spain, were not yet subdued, after it had been shut one yeare. But before his going out to those Wars, he very magnanimously calling the Senate together, offered to lay down his Imperiall power that the rule might goe as it had formerly done, professing that he tooke it upon him to punish his fathers enemies, and to quiet the civill stirs of that Common-wealth, now this being done, he would disburthen himselfe of this trouble, and live the rest of his life in quiet. The Senate hearing him speake were at the first amazed at it, but by and by they besought him with many words to continue their Emperour, as conducing most to the good of the Common-wealth, wherefore he still retained it, and had it confirmed by the consent of the Senate and people, yet hee sayd that he would hold it but ten years, whilst all peoples about were subdued, and then hee would again resigne it, yea, in a shorter time, if he could end the wars sooner. But those ten years being expired, it was granted him for five years more, and so from five years to five years, all his lifetime. And hereupon sayth Dio, the Emperours his successours after ten years from the beginning of any of their Empires kept a feast of renovation, and so every 10th. yeare as long as they lived. Then he passed over into France, intending to goe against Brittany, but they yielding to him he passed into Spain, and there against the most Northern parts, where the Cantabri inhabited. Against them, he falling sick, used Antistius, Furnius and Agrippa, his Legats against them, who fought so valiantly that they were made to flee to a strong hold, and finding themselves unable to resist, they almost all killed and poysoned themselves, because they would not come into bondage. They being thus subdued, the Astures also were brought under soon after, although the war with them would have proved terrible to the Romans, whom they meant to have set upon in three places at once, to their own best advantage, but that by some of theirs this was treacherously discovered, and so the Romans prevailed, and they were brought under and caused that they might no more rebell hereafter, to remove from mountainous to plain places to inhabit there, as not being not so hard to be come unto and more profitable. Then Caesar returning to Rome, caused the Temple of Ianus to be shut again, and this was the fourth time of shutting it, since the City was built, which had now stood 728 years, and it was anno 19 of Augustus his Empire. Anno 21 of his Empire, he fell sick so dangerously, that all men thought he would have dyed, but he appoynted no successour in the Empire, yet by Antonius Musa, a most skillfull Physitian he recovered his health again. And the same yeare Marcellus, his sister Octavia, her son dyed, who it was thought, should have succeeded his Uncle in the Empire. Anno 22, a great Plague, and after that a Dearth, was in Rome, which the people supposing to be, because Augustus was not that yeare Consul, they would have forced him to have bene Dictatour. Anno 23, hee went in progresse to Sicilia and thence to Greece, but in his absence great stirs were at Rome, about choosing new Consuls for which it was much desired that Augustus would return, but he causing Agrippa to dismisse his sisters daughter, whom he had formerly given him in marriage, gave him now his own daughter Julia, that had been wife to Marcellus, and sent him to celebrate these nuptials at Rome, and so being his son in Law to rule there for him, and thus all tumults were again appeased. And as he thus wronged the former wife of Agrippa, so he had before Tiberius, whose wife Livia being big with childe, he took from him and marryed, and she was now with him at Samos.

Anno 24, Phraates King of the Parthians yields to him and restores the Ensignes and all other things, and prisoners before taken from the Romans, at which he much rejoiced, and tooke foure sons of his for pledges, and then having visited Syria returned to Rome. Anno 26, new stirs arising in France and Spain, Agrippa was sent to govern there, and having settled things in France, he passed into Spain, where was a bloody warre again, many of the Romans being slain by the Cantabri, but at length they being subdued, there was peace again. Then Agrippa returning to Rome, was made Consul the third time, and by Augustus made almost his equall, that whilst hee did many Ianus his Temple shut.

August. anno 19

Augustus marryeth another mans wifes

The Virgin Mary born.

Dio.

A pretty story.

The Sybils
books.

A rare favour-rite of an Em-perour.

Adultery punished with death.

businesses for him, he might be out of danger, of which he was much afraid through the envy of divers, which a man in high dignity can never avoyd. But Agrippa had a sonne by his daughter Julia, whom he called Caius, and three years after another, called Lucius, whereby Augustus to make himselfe the more secure, adopted them for his sons, without staying till they came to more years. and his successours in his Empire, anno 27. And to this year is referred the birth of the Virgin Mary, the mother of our Lord Jesus. Augustus after this, prepares to goe into France, pretending to quell the stirs arising there, but indeed to avoyd the danger which might befall him at Rome in punishing some that had offended against his Laws, unlesse he would suffer them to lie neglected: and then he committed another foule fault, in taking with him the wife of Mecenas, Terentia, and casting him off, who had formerly been a deat friend unto him, wherefore he left the government of the City, not to him, but to Statilius Taurus, and likewise of all Italy, and so departed. And Agrippa by his appoyntment went into Syria to govern there. When Augustus was come into France, the Germans hearing of it were afraid and returned into their own Countrey, for they had hitherto infested France, and so both Nations were brought to quiet. And here Dio telleth a story worthy relating. Pollio a noble Roman, but most cruell, entertaining Augustus one day, and having a chrystall glasse broken by a servant, would have him cast into his pond, where he used to feed Lampryes with mans blood therefore. The servant falls down at Cesars feet to beg pardon, but Pollio not being moved, the Emperour caused him to bring forth all his glasses, and brake them all but one, which was hidden, at which he being much grieved, Cesar replied, that they might better be all broken, then one man destroyed. Augustus having settled all things in peace in France and Germany, returned to Rome, anno 31, and then Lepidus, who had been hitherto High-priest, dying, he was made High-priest, and then gathering together fatidicall books, of uncertain authors, to the number of 2000, he burnt them, and reserved only the true books of the Sybils, which came to passe by a singular providence, because they spake of Christ and his miraculous birth and acts. Augustus hearing of warre that began in Pannonia this year, sent Agrippa thither, at whose coming the Pannonians were afraid, and soon layd down their Armes, and then Agrippa returned, but before he came at Rome dyed, and his dead corps was by Augustus brought to Rome, and buried with great honour, being layd in his own Sepulcher: and of this and all other honour, which Augustus did to him living, he was well worthy, because of his care, fidelity, and humility in the midst of all his honours, whereby hee sought not himselfe, but Augustus, and carryed himselfe so betwixt him and the people, that he was not envied but beloved of all, a noble example to all favourites of the highest upon earth to be always followed by them. After his death the Pannonians rebelled again, but Augustus preferring Tiberius his sonne, that is, of Livia sent him thither, giving him Julia his daughter, the reliet of Agrippa to wife, who coming thither overthrew the Pannonians in divers battells, and brought the Countrey under again. And about the same time there being a great rebellion in Germany, Drusus after many perilous battels undergone, brought that people again into subjection. A rebellion also that arose in Thracia was quelled by Piso. Anno 34, the Temple of Janus should have been shut again, these wars being ended, but that the Dacians invaded Pannonia, and so another warre began. This year also Julius a Consul tasting Augustus, and committing adultery with Julia, was put to death, and Octavia the sister of Augustus dyed, and was honourably buried.

After this, the Germans rebelling again, Drusus was sent thither, and when he had mightily overthrowen and pursued them as far as Suevia, and returned to the River of Rhene, he was by a great woman, appearing to him and speaking in Latine, forbidden to goe farther, for the time of his lite was short. Hereupon he stayed, and by a bruise which he had by his horse falling with him, he dyed within 30 dayes, being then Consul, and but 30 years old: his death was much lamented, especially by Augustus, whose son he was thought to be by Livia, before hee married her, as also Tiberius, although having taken her from her husband and married her, he could never more have sonne by her, but one abortive. At his buriall, Augustus made one funerall Oration, and Tiberius another, then his corps being burnt in the field Martius, his ashes were layd up in Augustus his Sepulcher. After Drusus, Tiberius his brother was sent into Germany, who having perfected the subduing of it, had the title of Emperour. The same yeare being 36, Augustus had the Empire renewed to him for ten years more, and Mecenas to his great griefe dyed, who had always been a faithfull friend to him, and a lover of learning, he first invented short wrighting by characters, and left all his goods to Augustus. Tiberius after his victories in Germany, held two Triumphs at Rome, and was had in high honour amongst all men, next to Augustus. But Caius and Lucius, the two sonnes of Agrippa, whom Augustus had long agoe adopted, being now grown up, (for Caius was 16 years old) they desired to be made Consuls, but because their age would not permit it, they were for the present denyed by Augustus, yet he taking the Consulship the 12th. time upon him, brought them in to the Court, and Caius being three years older then Lucius had the Virilis toga put upon him, and it was decreed that he should be Consul five years after, and in the mean season Prince of the youth, which was a great honour. But lest Tiberius should seem to be neglected, he was made Tribune for five years, which the youths seeing were offended at, and he to avoyd this, left the City and went to Rhodes, to the great admiration of all men.

hus-

Anno 42 of Augustus Iesus Christ, the Son of God and our Redcemer, was born of the blessed Virgin Mary, who, as Enodius sayth, was brought up in the Temple, being committed to the care of the Priests 11 yeares, and then was by them delivered to Joseph, and to him contracted foure moneths before her conception by the Holy Ghost, and this birth was anno 36 of Herods reign, though some say, anno 34, some 35, &c. and about the time of the year, there be no lesse difference, but this is the common received opinion. But for Herod after the seeking of his destruction, and so cruelly murdering the Infants in Bethlehem, vengeance suffered him not to live above a year, but he dyed most miserably, as hath been before shewed. Yea, Ensebius and some others consent, that hee lived not above three moneths after. And this was the 21 yeare of Simon the High-priest, so that the conjecture, that Zachary, the father of John Baptist was now High-priest, falls to the ground although both Augustine and Ambrose be for it, and indeed how could he, seeing he offered incense by course, as others of the 24 courses did, whereas the High-priest executed his office always alone, and had no fellows to take their turns before or after him. And in this year was that tax layd upon Syria, which is spoken of Luke 2, and as Ensebius sayth, by the decree of the Senate, and this sayth Luke, was, when Cynus was President of Syria, that is, together with Caius the adopted son of Augustus, as his Governour, he being very young, and it is probable, that this tax was imposed for the Parthian War, but of it al-tum silentium amongst other Writers, because Livy wrote now no more, and Dio hath nothing for ten years together, in the midst of which Christ was born, and Suetonius began not his History, till after these things. Augustus also now entred upon the Consulship the 13th. time, wherein he brought forth Lucius, as he had done his brother Caius, and honoured him in like manner. But he had much shame and grief by his daughter, formerly the Wife of Agrippa, now of Tiberius for her common and base whordoms, whom hee therefore sent into banishment, and sent a bill of divorce in Tiberius his name after her, and set keepers to look to her. Then Caius was sent into the East to govern there, and as he went, he turned for honours sake to visit Tiberius at Rhodes, as other Roman Nobles used to doe, where he found Tiberius living privately, and departing thence he went to Armenia to fight against Phraates, King of the Parthians, who had newly taken up arms, but being terrified at his comming he sought peace, and so their warre was turned into feasting. And this time of peace had continued 12 years, since the shutting up of the Temple of Jannus, as sayth Orosius, so that the time of *Christ*s birth was a time of longer continued peace, then ever was before, since the building of the City, from which time were now 751 years, as will appear to him that readeth the foregoing History. And here it is noted of Caius, that as he passed by Livia bearing children in adultery, could have none after.

Funerall Orations.

Stenography invented.

Anno mundi, 3963.
Euseb. Chron.
Enodius.

Aug. tract. in Iohan.
Ambro. in Luc. cap. I.

Orosius.

In devotion in Cains.

Orosius.

Gen 49.v.10.
Dan.9.24.

Jerusalem he contemned to goe to worship at the Temple there, which was then very famous, and herein he was applauded by Augustus, but he joyed not long after, but dyed and a few years after a great plague came upon Rome. To conclude, this most happy year of Christ's coming into the World for our redemption, it hath not been the least part of the reason, why I have hitherto drawne downe the History so far beyond the sacred History. viz. 424 years, that some light might be attained into the prophesie of Jaacob. The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, till Shiloh comes, and into the 70 weeks of Daniel to the Messiah.

For the former, it will appear to the diligent Reader, that although the Jews were many years without a King of their own to sway the scepter amongst them, yet no stranger had ever this title of King of the Jews, till Herod the Great, through the great favour, in which he was with the Romans, and till a stranger set up for King, the scepter was only suspended or intermitted, but not departed. Now, how long it should be departed, that is, how many years of this strangers reign, it is not sayd, but only that it should not depart, till this blessed birth, implying, that he should be born in the time of his swaying the scepter, to set up a Kingdome over all true Jews, that should destroy all others, and never be it selfe destroyed, but abide for ever, and it is excellent to consider how it presently began to do so, indeed in that Kingdom. Herod could continue King but very little time after, and then was taken away being long and grievously tormented, and after him, no regall scepter could be there attained more by any of his posterity. For Archelaus his son taking the Kingdom upon him after his fathers decease, as hee had appointed through the permission of Augustus, also was not permitted to enjoy the title of King, but of a Toparch, as shall afterwards be shewed. Again, the scepter cannot be sayd to have departed from Judah in the time of the captivity, because there was a seed of David still preserved, which after the interruption of those 70 years came again, and one Prince succeeded another, till that Antiochus raging so greatly, and they coming to an end, Mattathias began, being High-priest, to execute the office both of Priest and Prince, and his posterity after him for 200 years, some of them attaining again to Kingly glory, and so continuing, till that Aristobulus contending for the Kingdom with his elder brother Hircanus was cut off by Pompey, and so a way was made for Herod to get the Kingdome. If it be sayd, but what was this to Judah, seeing Mattathias and all the Assamonean family were Levites? I answer, hee took to Wife a daughter of the house of David, and so his posterity was of the tribe of Judah by the mothers side, although of Levi by the fathers.

For the prophesie of Daniel, it is a work of far greater difficulty to shew, how those 70 Weeks ended at the death of Christ by reason of the divers times of beginning their account, eyther at the time of Cyrus his decree going out, or as Furnius singularly hath it, at the time of Ezra his being sent by Artaxerxes, anno 7 of his reign to supply the Temple with more vessels, & to set up government, and to order all things for the good of the Common-wealth, or at the time of Nehemiah his being sent to build the walls of Ieruf: for some there are that stand for every of these beginnings, to say nothing of other so groundlesse opinions beginning this time either at the beginning of the Babylonish captivity, or 50 years after: the words of Daniel being well considered, will be the truest direction about the beginning & end, one being hereby found all others will fall of themselves. Now the words are these, From the going out of the decree to restore and to build Ierusalem to the Messiah shall be seven weeks and 62 weeks, and the street and wall shall be built again in a troublesome time. At what time then such a decree went out, these weeks must begin, and that was not at Cyrus his entring upon his Monarchy, for then liberty was given only to build the Temple and to return and to sacrifice and worship God there, as appears, Ezra 1, and if we should begin them here, because not only building, but restoring also is spoken of by the Angell to Daniel, which may imply the refurbishing of that City with inhabitants and a Temple, we must be forced from this beginning again, when we find not the end answerable, but to come out long before the Messiah his coming. Again, although such a decree decree went out in favour of Nehemiah, anno 20 of Artaxerxes Longimanus, yet if counting from thence to the end of these Weeks they go out after Christs passion, this beginning is to be rejected also. And therefore they cannot be begun at any other time; but when Ezra obtained a decree, anno 7 of Artaxerxes, to go with all such, would willingly accompany him to replenish the City, to provide for sacrificing fully, as by the law is required, and to do whatsoever else he should think would conduce for the good thereof, for which the King gave most liberally unto him both money and other things. Because if wee compute the time of these Weeks from hence, wee shall find them to end, as Fanccius sayth, both for year, moneth and day at the time of Christs passion, or as others hold, at his inauguration to his office by the voyce, that came from heaven at the time of his baptizing, he being then 30 years old, if we respect the first numbers of Weeks, seven and 62. And then in the midst of the Week remayning he caused sacrificing to cease by offering of himself, the only true and al-sufficient sacrifice prefigured by all the sacrifices before going, the other halt of the Week being spent in confirming the Covenant or New Testament by his Apostles with signes and wonders, which he had before confirmed during the half Week of his preaching before his death. To set therefore upon this computation to prove what hath been sayd. This may be done by the Olympiads of the Greeks, or the yeares from the building of the City of Rome most certainly, seeing so great difference is amongst Chronologers in setting forth the times of the Kings Reignes, or of High-priests continuing, but about the Olympiads and yeares of the City of Romes building, there is good agreement with, but a little difference especially about the Olympiad and year thereof, which was coincident with Artaxerxes his 7th. yeare, and the yeare of Rome built and it, and likewise about the 15 yeare of Tiberius Caesar, when Christ began to preach, and the yeare of the Olympiad then, and of that City. For the 7th. year of Artaxerxes, fell in the first of the 80 Olympiad, and the yeare of Christs Baptisme, he being then 30 yeares old in the 4th. year of the 201 Olympiad, betwixt which counting to each Olympiad 4 yeares, were 488. Touching the beginning and cause of these Olympiads, Iphitus the sonne of Hercules instituted, or rather renewed them being first instituted by his father long before in the honour of his mothers grandfather Pelops, but fallen again, so that, till their renewing by Iphitus, King of the Elans, no account was kept by them, but now by the Olympiads beganne the most certaine way of reckoning throughout many ages. For there was a solemne play of trying masteryes held amongst the Gracians every fourth yeare, at what time the Victour had his reward, and his name written in brasse, always to remain. Before the Olympiads, the reckonings of all Heathen Writers were very uncertain, but the reckonings of Gods people the Jews, most certain, for the Olympiads began Anno 52 of Uzziah King of Judah, before which all times were reckoned by the Fathers that lived before the Flood, and after unto Abraham, and from Abraham unto Moses by the Patriarks, from Moses to Saul by the Judges, and from Saul to the captivity by the Kings, from whence the reckoning goes on by the 70 yeares captivity, and thence forward so far as the holy History of the Old Testament extends by the Persian Kings, yet uncertainly, so that help now is to be fetched from the Olympiads of the Greeks, and the yeares Urb: condita of the Romans. For the first, by that which hath been sayd, it appears that there is a difference but of two yeares, and if we reckon by the other, of three for Artaxerxes, seven was anno 293, Urb: condita, and anno 15 of Tiberius, when Jelus was baptized. Urb: condita 780, which time if it be computed, amounts to 487, which difference might easily happen in so long a time, and if not, the Messiah came to be manifested but seven or eight yeares after the time of 69 weeks set, and it is most probable, that there was not this difference neyther, but that we cannot by any means come to the certain knowledge of the concurrence of the very yeare, because although the account by the Olympiads be certain, yet the account of the Persian Kings times may be not rightly layd hereunto, through the diversity of Writers, and so the seven of Artaxerxes reckoned to be anno 1 of Olympius, so might be anno 2 Olympius 78, or if we reckon by the High-priests according to Josephus and Herod Nehem. 2.

Ezra 7.

the the King, the result will be much alike, for when Ezra obtained a Decree of Artaxerxes, Joachim had been High-priest 15 years, and his whole time was 28. Reckon wethen to

Joachim	13	Manasses	27	Simon	8
Eleazar	41	Simon Justus	28	Iohannes Hircanus	31
Ioiada	25	Onias fil. Sim.	39	Aristobulus	1
Jonathan	24	Iafon	3	Alexander	27
Iaddua	27	Menelaus	12	Hircanus	35
Onias	27	Alcimus	4	Antigonus	5
Simon Priscus	13	Vacantia	5	Herod	34
Eleazar Sim. frat.	20	Jonathan	10	Christus	30 sum 439, which disagreeeth not from the prophesie, if wee take the 70 Weeks, which are 490 years for the whole time to the Messiah, after which he was slain. However, it is manifest, if by these Weeks, so many seven years are meant, that about that time when Jesus shewed himself, was the undoubted time of the Messiah, and of his suffering death for our sins, so that the time of expecting him is long ago passed & not yet to come, as the Jews fondly imagine. Now the ground of reckoning seven years to a week by the consent of the Rabbins themselves is the ordinance, Levit. 25. of counting seven Weeks of years to the Jubilee. But to hinder themselves and others, as much as they can from seeing by the direction of this prophesie Jesus to be the Messias, some against all sense will have Cyrus to be meant by the Messiah, when as he was dead long before this decreed some Herod, but as much against sense, seeing no remission of sins and everlasting righteousness comes in by him, to say nothing, that he was not slain. Lastly, some by the Messiah understand the anointed Temple, which should be destroyed within the compass of this time, in the first seven Weeks, that is 49 years, 24 being built in Darius his Reign, and then the wall of the City in the Reign of Artaxerxes by Nehemiah, and falling again by the Romans. But neyther can the Temple be understood by the Messiah, because it is never so called elsewhere and if it were, yet it is sayd to the Messiah, the Prince shall be seven Weeks and 62 Weeks, so that if the Temple were meant, it must not have been built, till 480 years after the decree, and then in three years and an half more have perished again, to say nothing, that the destruction of the Temple cannot possibly be fitted to the time here described, because the Temple perished not, till anno 36, after the passion of our Saviour Christ. And this is a thing remarkable in all the chief Rabbins, who composed the Talmud, that they determine the time of the coming of the Messiah to be the time of the destruction of the Temple, and so by consequence, that in Daniels prophesie his coming is pointed at, and the time thereof shewed: as Rabbi Moses, R. Osia, R. Joshua, R. Barnabaman, R. Barachias, R. David, &c. And if that were the time they erre most grossly, that expect his coming still after 1600 years more. But what marvell, that they erre so, seeing a Jew having been convinced by this place hath annexed, that if it were made as cleare as the noon day light, that Jesus is the Christ, hee would not yet believe it. But to us that are Christians, and to all, that are appointed to like it is so cleere from hence and other undenyable arguments, that we resolve most confidently upon it, and by this faith hope to be saved, and that all of what Country or Nation soever that would be saved, must do likewise. To conclude then, here is a dividing of the time unto the Messiah into two parts, seven Weeks, that is, 49 years, and 62, that is, 434: because from the going out of the decree, which Ezra carryed, things succeeded well unto the Jews so long, although they met with trouble and opposition, till Nehemiah had finished the Wall. For from the going out of that decree to Nehemiah, were 13 yeares, he having carryed 12 years returned to the King, and eight years after went to Jerusalem again, where hee lived, as some write till hee was very aged, and there dyed, and had his monument, but in what yeare of his age, is not recorded, if he lived but 16 years after his second coming to Jerusalem, we have the 49 from Ezra to his death, in which time it went well with the Jews, but afterwards they went through divers miseries in the times of other Persian Kings, and afterwards of the Syrans, and specially of Antiochus Epiphanes, Ioseph. l. 11. c. 5.

for

for which those 434 are disjoynd from the 49, and so 69 weeks of yeares passed to the Messiah baptized. For the 70th. which is the last weeke, that also is divided by the Prophet to shew the time of his age, when he suffered death, viz. three yeares and an halfe, and the time of the Apostles confirming the Gospel by Miracles, after which revenge was taken upon Jerusalem for his death by the Romans, when the people and City were swept away as it were with a flood, and so hath remained desolate unto this day, and shall to the consummation of the World, Dan. 9. 27. not that this confirmation by the Apostles was continued no longer then three years and an halfe, but in that time principally, they from thence forward dispersing themselves into other parts of the World.

To returne now to Archelaus the son of Herod, whom he appoynted to reigne after him, (for Herod dyed the same yeare in which Christ was borne, viz. about the Pasch, after that he had so cruelly caused the infants of Bethlem to be slain, so that it may well be noted as a just judgement of God comming swiftly upon him, the diversity of miseries under which he was pressed) the sayd Archelaus his father being dead, first kept a mourning for him seven dayes, and then feasted the chiefe of the Jews according to the Countrey manner. He was then commonly congratulated as King, but he would not take that title upon him till he had been at Rome for Augustus his consent. But before he could doethis, a great tumult arose amongst the Jews, exclaiming upon Herod for his murdering of their Doctors and holy men, for breaking down the Eagle before spoken of, and crying out for Herods principall friends to bee delivered unto them, who had been agents in this murder. Archelaus sought by good speeces to pacifie them, but could not doe it, till that bringing his forces upon them, hee had slain 3000 of them. Then immediately he prepared to goe to Rome, and with him his mother and Nicolas, and Ptolomee, and Salome with her children, hee leaving the Kingdom in the interim to be governed by his brother Philip. Antipas also goeth by the instigation of Salome, to get the Kingdom from him, taking Ptolomee the son of Nicolas with him. This company being all come, and Archelaus having shewed to Augustus his father Herods Will, and a booke of accounts of his goods and revenues. He calling his Councell about him gave them audience first, who came against Archelaus, then Antipater, the son of Salome, began, and accused Archelaus as an unnaturall son to Herod, weeping and mourning indeed in the day time for him, and feasting and rejoycing with musick in the night. 2. For taking the Kingdom upon him, and doing Regall acts, and killing and slaying so many about the Temple at a most holy time, before any authority by Cesar given unto him. 3. He pleaded that Herod in a former will, when his senses were more perfect, had made Antipas King, who was another and better son of his, and not Archelaus, but in a later Will, when he was tormented and crazed with sicknesses. To all these Nicolas answered for Archelaus, so as that Augustus tooke up Archelaus being fallen at his feete with all courtesie, saying, that he would goe according to the last will of his father, and so for that time dismissed the Assembly. But whilst these things were thus in agitation, news came from Varus President of Syria, that great tumults were raised again in Judea, when the people came together to the Feast of Pentecost, but the occasion was, the covetousnesse of Sabinus Casars Procuratour there, who would have taken the treasures of the King, but was by the people resisted, whereupon great slaughters followed, and burning of the Kings Palace, and divers tooke upon them to be Kings, amongst whom, Judas the son of a great robber, whom Herod had quelled, was one. But by the comming of Varus upon them they were subdued, and 2000 of the chief instigators executed: then an embassage of 50 Jews with a train of 8000 went over to Rome, and made a great complaint against the government by Kings, laying open their miseries by means of Herod, and how greatly the chiefe of them had bin impoverished, & what rapes & outrages had bin by him committed, and that Archelaus to give them a taste of his cruell disposition, like his father, had committed the outrage before spoken of, and therefore their desire was, that they might not live under a King any more, but under the President of Syria, and so it should appear whether they were so tumultuous or peaceable. To this, though Ioseph. l. 17. c. 11.

Cap. 12.

Iosef. l. 17. c. 13.
Anno Dom. 4.

Cap. 15.

Wickedness in a Prince punished seve. dy.

Seneca.

Of clemency a rare example

Anno Dom. 9.

Marriage preferred.

Anno Dom. 12.

Nicolas made some answer, yet Cesar upon consultation would not make Archelaus King, but an Ethnarch, giving him only halfe of his fathers Kingdom, and to Antipas one part of the other halfe, and to Philip the other, making them Tetrarchs. So Archelaus had Judea, Idumea and Samaria his revenue being 600 talents yearly, and was promised by Cesar when he deserved it, that he should be a King. Antipas had Galilee, and his revenue was 200 Talents. And Philip had Baiana and Trachonitis and Auranitis, and his revenue 100 talents. But Archelaus injoyed not his Principality above ten years, for being both cruell, and carryed by lust to marry his brothers wife, the Jews hated him, therefore, and complained of him to Cesar, who thereupon sent for him and banished him to Vienna in France where he spent the rest of his time in misery, and then Quirinus a Consular man was sent to raise a taxe in Syria and to sell the house of Archelaus, and to joyne Judea to the Province of Syria. This Archelaus in the beginning of his Principality, removed Jozabarus from being High-priest and set up Eleazarus his brother, but within a short time he put him down also, and set up Iesus the son of Sias for High-priest. But these and other his wicked doings went not long unpunished, as hath been before sayd. Whilst these things were in doing amongst the Jews, Lucius the adopted son of Cesar, dyed at Massilia in Spain of a languishing disease, and within lesse then two years after Caius his brother dyed also of a wound received by treachery in Armenia. And then Tiberius, who almost all the time that these young men were in such high honour, lived in exile at Rhodes, was adopted by Cesar as heire to the Empire. And then he was sent away into Germany to govern there, Cesar in the mean season doing a strange act of clemency towards Cinna, a son of the daughter of Pompey the Great, for he being detected to conspire the death of Cesar, he by the perswasion of Livia his wife sent for him, and causing all men to depart out of the room, he made him sit down upon a seat neere unto him. And then having told him how beneficiall he had bin unto him, he asked why contrariwise he plotted his destruction. At this Cinna crying out, as abhorring from it, he commanded him silence, and layd then open the whole plot, the time and the persons, reproving him two houres together for his ingratitude, and in fine forgave him, and exhorted him to firme friendship with him, and so had him ever after a most firme friend, and he advanced him to the Consulship to the admiration of all men. Tiberius being in Germany subdued all that rebelled, and although hee had one Warre after another to attend upon, yet hee could not keepe long away from Rome for feare of some other to be preferred by Augustus before him. But whereas there was a third brother to Caius and Lucius, called Agrippa, by whom he might have been endangered, he was so addicted to fishing, that Augustus tooke an utter dislike of him, and because hee had no Noble qualities in him, that hee banished him into an Island neere Corsica, from whence hee never returned again. Tiberius then followed the German and Palmatian Warres again, and when much time was spent and little done, Germanicus was sent thither with an Army also, and prevailed, whereof there was great joy, but this was again soone damp, by news comming of Varus his overthrow. who was also sent out with three Legions, and in one fight, wherein the enemy came upon him unawares, they were all overthrowen through his security and want of providence.
This so much affected Augustus with griefe, that he refused all delights, and beat his head sometimes against the wall, crying out unto Varus to restore his Legions, he also rent his clothes, and neglected the cutting of his haire. But the next yeare Tiberius going again with a great Army into Germany, overthrowed all where he came, neyther were any able to resist him. About this time Augustus made an Oration to commend marriage, and to inveigh against fornication wherein hee did notably set forth the praise of the one, and the baseness of the other, because some, though incontinent, would not marry. Yet the Vestall Virgins who kept themselves pure he greatly commended and rewarded, but for such as refrained from marriage to avoyd the trouble and charge, yet following their fleshly lusts, he greatly condemned. Whilst these things were doing at Rome, or soone after, Judas Gaulonites rose up, who is otherwise called Judas of Galilee.

Galilee, of whom mention is made, Acts 5. and taught the people that this tax imposed upon them was nothing else but a bringing of them into servitude to men, whereas indeed they ought to be servants to none but only to God. By this means another Sect arose amongst the Jews, which because it was chiefly amongst the Galileans made them very hatefull, and consequently the Disciples of Christ. And to wipe away this blot, both Paul, Rom. 13. taught obedience to the higher powers, and paying taxes, and Peter, Chap. 2. and Christ before saying, Give to Caesar the things of Caesar, and to God the things of God. When the people stirred up by Judas, gathered together to make a rebellion, they were pacified by Joazarus the High-priest, sayth Josephus, where by it should seeme that he was restored to the High-priesthood again, from which he had been put down by Archelaus, yet Quirinus the Roman Consul, suffered him not to sit long, but removed him again, and set up Ananias the son of Seth, so unstable and wavering was the High-priesthood in those dayes, when the true Priest, Christ Jesus, after the order of Melchisedeck, was come into the world. But chiefly when Valerius Gracchus another President of Syria was sent by Tiberius at his comming on to the Empire, for being the fift from Quirinus, he put down Ananias from being High-priest, and set up Ishmael the son of Fabius, and little after Eleazar the son of Ananias was set up, he being put down, and within a year after he being put down, he made Simon the son of Cannibius High-priest, and within a year more, Josephus surnamed Caiaphas. After this Valerius Gracchus returned to Rome, and Pontius Pilatus came to be governour there, which serves to give no little light into the sacred History, as where Caiaphas is sayd to be High-priest that year, and where Paul sayth, I know him not to be the high-priest, because there were so often changes in those dayes.

To returne to Augustus, hee with Tiberius, whom hee made Tribune, tooke again the number of the people in the field of Mars, where an Eagle having flown somtimes about, a strange thing happened, a Thunder being at the same time, the name Caesar, was therewith stricken so, that the first letter was blotted out, hereupon, the Augustus sayd, that hee should live but an hundred dayes, and then be a God, as the rest of the name Aesar in the Hebruscan tongue signified. And accordingly hee dyed, being 77 yeares old, anno 57 of his Empire, and his adopted sonne Tiberius succeeded him, being aged then 55 yeares, but of the 57 of Augustus his reigne, 14 were spent in the time whilst hee ruled together with Anthony, as Josephus sayth. Augustus being dead, hee was burnt according to the manner, and his ashes buryed, and one there was a Pretour, who to flatter with Livia his wife, sware that hee saw her likenesse, when hee was in the flames, ascending up to heaven, for which shee gave him a great reward. Tiberius although hee were Emperour after him, yet did sometime hold the people in suspence, whether he would bee or no, calling the Empire a great Beast and a miserable and burthenome servitude, but at length hee being importuned about it, accepted of it. The forces in Germany hearing of the death of Augustus began to tumultuate, as if they would goe against their Countrey, and bring both the new Emperour and Senate under their girdle. But Drusus the sonne of Tiberius being maturely by him sent by the assistance of Junius Blefus, Dellobella and of Tiberius his Letters wisely soone appeased this tumult again. Germanicus then, who had hitherto warred in Germany was by Tiberius made Consul, and called to Rome to triumph, indeed, because hee feared, that hee being great amongst the Souldiers, might attempt new stirs, if hee continued there still, and Drusus abode there to mannage the affairs of that Countrey. The Triumph held by Germanicus was great, hee being the grandchilde of Augustus the sonne of Agrippa Germanicus, and the son-in-law, and adopted sonne now of Tiberius. But whatsoever honour Tiberius did him, hee secretly harboured jealousies and feares of him, wherefore there being occasion by reason of great stirs in the East, he caused him by the Decree of the Senate to be sent away thither, for great tumults were then in Parthia, and Armenia by competitorers for those Kingdoms which Germanicus comming quieted,

Joseph. l. 18. c. 3.

Anno Dom. 15.

A Kingdome
what.

Ioseph. l. 18. c. 3.

Murther animated by an Emperour punisht.

Ioseph. l. 18. c. 4.

Zeal against Images.

A knack of knavery.

and as great power was given him over all parts Eastward beyond the sea, as ever Pompey had. But withall Tiberius sent out Piso to be President of Syria, that he might be an instrument secretly to bring him to his end, wherefore hee was alwayes most crosse to Germanicus, and often quarrelled with him, and at length, as was thought, found means to poyson him, whereof he, after long sicknesse, dyed. This being heard at Rome, the people were mad with Piso, and the Senate condemned him to die. Neither was this murther long unrevenge to Tiberius, for God suffered not his son Drusus to live to attain to the Empire, but the son of Germanicus had it, as shall afterwards be shewed.

But to return to the Jewish affairs, Archelaus being banished, as hath been sayd, his two brethren, Antipas, called also Herod, and Philip, provided better for themselves by insinuating into Cesar, by all the means that they could. For Herod built a City, or rather strengthened it, and changed the name from Betransphtha to Julias, after the name of Cesars wife, and Philip doing the like to Pancas by Jordan, named it Casarea. And Tiberius being Emperour, Herod built a new City, and called it Tiberias, to his honour, giving great immunities thereunto, whereby he came to be numbred amongst his friends. Pontius Pilate being sent, as was sayd before to govern over Judea, he gave occasion of a great tumult in Judea, because he brought into Jerusalem the Imperiall Banner with Eagles, and set it up there. For this the Jews tooke heinously, and in great multitudes came about him to desire the removing thereof, and although he rejected their request, yet they ceased not to importune him in the same thing from day to day: wherefore one day he appoynted his Souldiers to be ready in secret, and the Jews coming again to importune him, he drew them to the place where they lay, and then he giving a signe, his men rose up, and Pilate commanded them quietly to depart to their own houses, or else they should be slain all, but they shewing no feare of death, fell down, and offered their throats to be cut, rather then their law should be broken, this Pilate seeing, removed his Ensignes from Jerusalem to Casarea, and so the people were quieted again. About this time both the Egyptians and Jews were expelled out of Rome upon these occasions. The Egyptians because Paulina a noble woman, addicted to the worship of their god Isis or Anubis was fraudulently corrupted by means of his Priests. She was a very faire woman, and married to a Noble man in Rome, but extreemly beloved by another Nobleman called Mundus, who sought by all means to have his pleasure of her, but could not prevail, though he offered her 20000 drachmes for once. Iden a bond-woman of his, seeing her master much troubled, and resolving by macerating his body upon this occasion to dye, offered if he would give unto her 50000 drams, she would help him to his desire with Paulina. He glad of the motion, payeth her the money, and she hastens to the Priests of Isis, offering them this great reward to perswade Paulina, that Anubis their god desired to enjoy her company one night, through the great love that he bare unto her. The chiefe of them therefore went, and prevailed so that shee came at night, and there in a darke place, Mundus lying hid, had his pleasure of her all night. And afterwards meeting her, derided her for her former coinesse, and told her what he had done. Hereupon shee was so moved, that shee incited her husband to complaine to the Emperour, who did so, and then the Priests and Iden were hanged, and their Countrey men all banished from Rome, and so was Mundus also.

The Jews were expelled because a certain Jew taking upon him to be an interpreter of the Law of Moses, but a wicked fellow who had fled from his own Countrey for feare of punishment for his wickednesse done there, taking to him three others like unto himselfe, perswaded Fulvia a noble woman of Rome, being addicted to the Jewish Religion, to send gold and purple to the Temple at Jerusalem, but they receiving it, converted it to their own use. This being complained of to Tiberius, all the Jews weretherefore banished from Rome, 4000 of the ablest bodies being taken into service for the Warres in Sardinia, against the robbers there.

Touching the death of Piso President of Syria, by whose means and his Wives Ger-

Germanicus was poisoned, he after this returning to Rome, where he thought to come into greater grace for this his bloody fact, when hee saw, how hatefull hee was both to the Senate and people, flue himself, and two years after Drusus the son of Tiberius, who should have reigned after him, was poisoned by Sejanus, a man advanced by Tiberius, who through his pride, aspired to the Empire. So he, through whose instigation Germanicus had been unworthily poisoned by a man set in office for that purpose in Syria by him, had his own son poisoned by a man, whom he preferred, thinking, that hee should be an help unto him. But Drusus was by his father made Consul, together with himself before he dyed, whereupon it was foretold, that hee should dye a violent death, because so Germanicus, being Consul with Tiberius did before, and Piso also, and whosoever else was joynt Consul with him. The year before Drusus his death, Lucretius Priscus a Roman Squire having written verses in commendation of Germanicus, as a funerall Elegy, was by Tiberius well rewarded therefore, but being hereby animated, when Drusus was sick, he wrote again upon him the like verses, thinking he should have a greater reward, but they being contrariwise taken, as a prediction of his death at hand (his Epitaph being, as it were, all ready written) and hee that wrote it, one that rejoiced at it, he was put to death therefore. For the manner of Sejanus his poisoning of Drusus, it was by Drusus his own wife Lenilla, with whom he had committed adultery before, & drew her now to give poyson to her husband by the promise of marriage, and hopes of thus making her Emperesse, for he thought, that after Tiberius, if Drusus were dead, none could attaine to the Empire but himself. And this he conceived because Tiberius favoured him so greatly and most highly preferred him: and to make way to this marriage, hee put away his own wife after that he had three children by her. But Drusus being dead, Tiberius came to the Senate and commended unto them Nero and Drusus, the two sons of Germanicus for his successors, for which they all rejoiced, and Sejanus was vexed. And now he studied, how to make away these two and their mother Agrippina, and to this end first he procured the death of two principall men, their friends, under a colour of treason against Casars Majesty, and afterwards sought to make them odious to Tiberius, by laying to their charge speeches against the Emperour, to which he was also prone enough as repenting him, that he had declared them his successors. In those dayes divers were cruelly put to death by Tiberius, whereby he shewed the tyranny of his minde, one amongst the rest Asinius Gallus comming to him in an Embassage hee feasted and used kindly, but when hee went from him to the Senate, hee wrote to the Senate to condemne him to death, and yet would not suffer him to be put to death a long time, but caused him to be kept with poore fare to make him weary of his life, neyther was any man permitted to speak with him, so that at length he counted it a favour to be executed. And this was because he sometime spake too freely against the Emperour, and his unjust comming to that dignity. Sabinus likewise for speeches was condemned and imprisoned, and then killed and cast into the river, after whom his dog, that kept in prison with him: leapt into the water and was drowned also. Besides his great tyranny, Tiberius was also greatly given to fleshly pleasure, and sensuall living in his old days, spending sometime two days and nights together in drinking. Also he once caused a certain friend of his to be put in bonds, and being demanded, when he should be put to death, he answered, not yet, because he was not yet reconciled unto him, as counting it a favour to put such as had offended him to death. One being by him tormented, when he found him guiltlesse, he caused forthwith to be slain, because, sayd he, his sufferings had been so great, that it was not fit for him to live. Another, a Rhodian being likewise by him tormented, and found to be without fault hee flue also, lest living he should exclaime against him, and divers did he cause to be cast down before his eyes from an high rock upon ships, being so broken in pieces. But all this while Sejanus was more and more honoured by him, for it was decreed that his birth day should be publikely kept as the Emperours, and many Statues were set up unto him, and to his Statue they sacrificed as well as to Tiberius his, and to him were Embassadors sent, and by him and Tiberius they sware, and sometime they were both set forth in one picture. When Tacitus.

Sin punished in the kind.

Officioufnesse turned to destruction.

A wife against her husband.

Tranquillus.

Tacitus.
A dogs love.

Examples of cruelty.

Ti-

<sup>a</sup> Caius Caligula was son to his brother Germanicus, but Tiberius had a grandchild called Tiberius being son to his son Drusus, being doubtfull, whether of these two should succeed him, he consulted with the oracle, and it being answered, he that came first to him in the morning, Caius Caligula came, and though against his mind declared Emperour, being called Caligula from the place where he lived, Nauticus. Ioseph. 18.8.
<sup>b</sup> Ambitions end.
<sup>c</sup> On murderers vengeance.
<sup>d</sup> Cruelty unparalleled.

Anno Dom. 30.

Herod's incestuous marriage.

Tiberius saw this, hee was much troubled at it, fearing his direct aspiring to the Empire. But by plain force to goe about to suppress him, hee thought it dangerous, he having the Pretorian souldiers at his command, and so many Senatours on his side. Wherefore hee wrought another way, making him his fellow Consul; by which he was yet puffed up more, and accounted himself Emperour, and Tiberius only Ruler of the Island Caprea, in which for his pleasure he then lived. Wherefore through his pride, as Tiberius soon rejected the Consulship, so did he, and others were chosen. Then Tiberius used this art, Nero the son of Germanicus being dead, and Drusus his other son out of favour, through the means of Sejanus, he one day declared to the Senate, that <sup>a</sup> Caius Caligula should be his successeur, and made him High-priest, whereat finding, that they rejoiced, hee wrote sometimes to them praying Sejanus, and sometime blaming him, and sometime that hee was even ready to dye, and sometime that hee would come amongst them, and sometime shewed favour to Sejanus his friends, and to others of them enmity. Hee lastly wrote to them by Macro, whom hee secretly made Pretour, giving him instructions, to put Sejanus in prison, and his two chiefe friends amongst the Senatours, whom he named. At the hearing of this all men were amazed, but one of the Consuls immediatly took him and carried him away, and then the people offered many indignities to him, as he went and brake down all his Statues, and the next day hee was condemned by the Senate, and executed, and his dead body cast upon the banks of Tyber. His <sup>b</sup> sons also were slain and his daughter, a Virgin strangled, and many more of his chief friends through the rage of the people then perished, he being herein made an example, as Haman. Thus vengeance suffered not him to live, who had been the death of <sup>c</sup> Drusus, and she that had been the instrument now confessing it murdered her self. Many more of Sejanus his friends were afterwards slaine, both men and women, and their dead bodies cast into the River Tyber, at Tiberius his command, who used this policy to finde them out. Hee pretended to be pacified towards him, and to forget all things past, so that now who so would might mourn for him. But such as were hereby found out to love him, were cruelly slaine, and a mother <sup>d</sup> but mourning for her son slain amongst the rest was put to death also. Inasmuch as some of high rank and quality abhorring these doings, denied food to their own bodies, till they dyed. Agrippina also the Wife of Germanicus and her son Drusus were slaine, that were of a faction contrary to Sejanus. A certaine Nobleman also his familiar friend, because hee having a fair daughter conveyed her away for feare of him being so lecherous was accused for incest with her, and presently both father and daughter were executed, and all his goods seized upon by this bloody Tyrant.

To return to the affairs of Judea again, Herod Antipas most wickedly rejecting the daughter of K. Aretas his Wife, took Herodias the Wife of his brother Philip, who like a vile adulteresse forsaking her own husband came unto him. For this John the Baptist afterwards reprov'd him, and was beheaded, but King Aretas for this made War against Herod, and overthrew his army, through Gods just judgment, as it was generally thought amongst the Jews, for his taking away of the life of so holy a man. For as he taught Christ, so did he justice and righteousness and repentance, for which he was much revered of the people. The time of John's beginning to preach is noted, Luke 3.2. to have been when Annas and Caiaphas were High-priests. Caiaphas, as hath been already sayd, was High-priest and so continued certain years more after this, being, as is reckoned the 12th year of his Pontificality. Annas whom Iosephus calls Ananus, had been High-priest, but was removed long before, as hath been already shewed, by Valerius Gocatus, Prefident of Syria, and three others one after another preferred between him and Caiaphas. Annas therefore is only sayd to be High-priest also, because he had once been & living still, and being father-in-law to Caiaphas, he did him most probably that honour to entitle him High-priest also, seeing there was never any more then one High-priest at a time, who executed that office, see a place somewhat like this 2 Sam. 8. 16, 17. where Zadok and Abimelech are sayd to be Priests, meaning chiefe Priests, but Abimelech then alone was High-priest, so Zadok was but the chiefe chiefe of another family, and to be High-priest when Akimelech, otherwise called Abiathar should be put down, as hee was in Solomons time. Pontius Pilate had now been Procuratour of Judea about five years, and Tiberius Cesar in the 15th. yeare of his Empire. And now Jesus came and was baptized, of John, as is thought January the sixth, and from thence was led of the Spirit into the Wilderness to be tempted, but returning to John again sometimes, hee shewed him to bee the Lambe of God, taking away the sinnes of the World, and then Disciples began to follow him, and hee wrought that miracle of turning water into wine, after which he went about doing many more, in healing the sick, cleansing Lepers, casting out Devils, raising the dead, &c. so that many were hereby moved to believe, that hee was the Christ, and in particular Nicodemus, and Abagarns King of Edessa, who wrote unto him being drawn by the same of his miracles to desire him to come unto him, and heal him, and dwell and enjoy his City together with him, because he heard, that the Jews amongst whom hee was, carried themselves spitefully towards him. But Jesus answered, that for his believing he was blessed, for he wrote, that by his miracles hee gathered, that eyther he was God or the Son of God. And for comming to him, hee sayd, that he must fulfill all things for which he was sent, there and then to be taken up again to him, that sent him, but after his taking up hee would send one of his Disciples to heal him, and to give life to him and his, which he did, for Thaddaeus was sent unto him and converted his Countrey soone after Christs deaceale. Josephus also giveth him this testimony, that he was a wise man, if it be lawfull to call him a man: for he wrought many wonders, and had many followers both of the Jews and Gentiles. This was Christ, whom by the instigation of the chiefe of the Jews Pilate crucified, but hee shewed himself alive again the third day, and foretold many things, and from him the whole stock of Christians have their name. The time of his suffering death by the consent of all Writers was, anno 34 of his age, after that since his beginning to shew himself at his Baptisme hee had kept three Passcovers, & to prepare for his death had kept a fourth instituting the Sacrament of his Supper, the night before, anno 35, James, Peter, John, according to Clement, being the chiefe of the Apostles, as to whom the Lord imparted all knowledge, did not yet take any principality over the rest upon them, but made James Bishop of Jerusalem, where he fate thirty years. Immediately the first persecution began, wherein Steven was stoned. And Pilate wrote to Tiberius, the news of Christs miracles, death and signes, for which many believed him to be a God. Tiberius then being moved hereat, would have had the Senate to put him into the number of Gods: but they affirming it to be contrary to their Law to make any a God, but such as should first be propounded by the Senate, refused to doe it, whereat Tiberius was angry, and found means to cut off Sejanus, who was chief in withstanding it, and almost 20 Senatours more. Yet the Senate made an Edict to expell all Christians out of Rome, but Tiberius contrariwise made it death to accuse any man hoc nomine, that hee was a Christian. So that God made him although a cruel Tyrant, a means to propagate the Gospel, when as through his favour Disciples were in all Countreys dispersed to preach Christ Jesus. Tiberius lived after the passion of Christ to the third yeare, being then aged 78, and having first appoynted Caius Caligula the son of Germanicus his successour, as was before sayd, and then dying of a Feaver, too good an end for one so wicked and tyrannicall, but for his good will declared towards Christ Jesus, haply this favour was shewed unto him, contrary to that which hath been usuall to others so exceedingly wicked. A little before his death Pompeius Pilate was accused by the Jews for many crimes unto him, whereupon he was sent for to Rome to answer them, when he had been now Procuratour of Judea 10 yeares, but before he came at Rome Tiberius dyed. Yet his wickednesses wherewith he was charged dyed not, viz. his unjust putting of some to death, and causing tumults amongst the Jews by putting Cesars Image in the Temple, and polluting their sacrifices, and employing publike moneyes to his private use: for Vnellius President of Syria being complained to hereof caused him to goe to Rome to answer it, and Tiberius dyed at that instant. But in the time of Caius Caligula his successour, he was banished

John 2.

Abagarns King of Edessa.

Nauclet. ex Clemente.

Ioseph. l. 18. c. 4.

Anno Dom. 34.

Nauclet.

Gods providence in propagating the Gospel.

Anno Dom. 39.

Euseb. 7.

Cap. 7.

Pilates death.

Anno Dom. 41.

Ioseph. 18. c. 6.

Caius Caligula was son to his brother Germanicus, but Tiberius had a grandchild called Tiberius being son to his son Drusus, being doubtful, whether of these two should succeed him, he consulted with the oracle, and it being answered, he that came first to him in the morning, Caius Caligula came, and though against his mind declared Emperour, being called Caligula from the place where he lived, Nauticus. Ioseph. 18. 8.
 b Ambitions end.
 c On murderers vengeance.
 d Cruelty unparalleled.

Anno Dom. 30.

Herods incestuous marriage.

Tiberius saw this, hee was much troubled at it, fearing his direct aspiring to the Empire. But by plain force to goe about to suppress him, hee thought it dangerous, he having the Pretorian souldiers at his command, and so many Senatours on his side. Wherefore hee wrought another way, making him his fellow Consul; by which he was yet puffed up more, and accounted himself Emperour, and Tiberius only Ruler of the Island Caprea, in which for his pleasure he then lived. Wherefore through his pride, as Tiberius soon rejected the Consulship, so did he, and others were chosen. Then Tiberius used this art, Nero the son of Germanicus being dead, and Drusus his other son out of favour, through the means of Sejanus, he one day declared to the Senate, that <sup>a</sup> Caius Caligula should be his successeur, and made him High-priest, whereat finding, that they rejoiced, hee wrote sometimes to them praying Sejanus, and sometime blaming him, and sometime that hee was even ready to dye, and sometime that hee would come amongst them, and sometime shewed favour to Sejanus his friends, and to others of them enmity. Hee lastly wrote to them by Macro, whom hee secretly made Pretour, giving him instructions, to put Sejanus in prison, and his two chiefe friends amongst the Senatours, whom he named. At the hearing of this all men were amazed, but one of the Consuls immediatly took him and carried him away, and then the people offered many indignities to him, as he went and brake down all his Statues, and the next day hee was condemned by the Senate, and executed, and his dead body cast upon the banks of Tyber. His <sup>b</sup> sons also were slain and his daughter, a Virgin strangled, and many more of his chief friends through the rage of the people then perished, he being herein made an example, as Haman. Thus vengeance suffered not him to live, who had been the death of <sup>c</sup> Drusus, and she that had been the instrument now confessing it murdered herself. Many more of Sejanus his friends were afterwards slain, both men and women, and their dead bodies cast into the River Tyber, at Tiberius his command, who used this policy to finde them out. Hee pretended to be pacified towards him, and to forget all things past, so that now who so would might mourn for him. But such as were hereby found out to love him, were cruelly slain, and a mother <sup>d</sup> but mourning for her son slain amongst the rest was put to death also. Inasmuch as some of high rank and quality abhorring these doings, denied food to their own bodies, till they dyed. Agrippina also the Wife of Germanicus and her son Drusus were slain, that were of a faction contrary to Sejanus. A certaine Nobleman also his familiar friend, because hee having a fair daughter conveyed her away for feare of him being so lecherous was accused for incest with her, and presently both father and daughter were executed, and all his goods seized upon by this bloody Tyrant.

To return to the affairs of Judea again, Herod Antipas most wickedly rejecting the daughter of K. Aretas his Wife, took Herodias the Wife of his brother Philip, who like a vile adulteresse forsaking her own husband came unto him. For this John the Baptist afterwards reprov'd him, and was beheaded, but King Aretas for this made War against Herod, and overthrew his army, through Gods just judgment, as it was generally thought amongst the Jews, for his taking away of the life of so holy a man. For as he taught Christ, so did he justice and righteousness and repentance, for which he was much revered of the people. The time of Johns beginning to preach is noted, Luke 3. 2. to have been when Annas and Caiphas were High-priests. Caiphas, as hath been already sayd, was High-priest and so continued certain years more after this, being, as is reckoned the 12th year of his Pontificality. Annas whom Iosephus calls Ananus, had been High-priest, but was removed long before, as hath been already shewed, by Valerius Gocatus, President of Syria, and three others one after another preferred between him and Caiphas. Annas therefore is only sayd to be High-priest also, because he had once been & living still, and being father-in-law to Caiphas, he did him most probably that honour to entitle him High-priest also, seeing there was never any more then one High-priest at a time, who executed that office, see a place somewhat like this 2 Sam. 8. 16, 17. where Zadok and Ahimelech are sayd to be Priests, meaning chiefe Priests, but Ahimelech then alone was High-priest, so Zadok was but the chiefe chiefe of another family, and to be High-priest when Akimelech, otherwise called Abiathar should be put down, as hee was in Solomons time. Pontius Pilate had now been Procuratour of Judea about five years, and Tiberius Cesar in the 15th. yeare of his Empire. And now Jesus came and was baptized, of John, as is thought January the sixth, and from thence was led of the Spirit into the Wildernesse to bee tempted, but returning to John again sometimes, hee shewed him to bee the Lambe of God, taking away the sinnes of the World, and then Disciples began to follow him, and hee wrought that miracle of turning water into wine, after which he went about doing many more, in healing the sick, cleansing Lepers, casting out Devils, raising the dead, &c. so that many were hereby moved to believe, that hee was the Christ, and in particular Nicodemus, and Abagarus King of Edessa, who wrote unto him being drawn by the same of his miracles to desire him to come unto him, and heal him, and dwell and enjoy his City together with him, because he heard, that the Jews amongst whom hee was, carryed themselves spitefully towards him. But Jesus answered, that for his believing he was blessed, for he wrote, that by his miracles hee gathered, that eyther he was God or the Son of God. And for comming to him, hee sayd, that he must fulfill all things for which he was sent, there and then to be taken up again to him, that sent him, but after his taking up hee would send one of his Disciples to heal him, and to give life to him and his, which he did, for Thaddaeus was sent unto him and converted his Countrey soone after Christs decease. Iosephus also giveth him this testimony, that he was a wise man, if it be lawfull to call him a man: for he wrought many wonders, and had many followers both of the Jews and Gentiles. This was Christ, whom by the instigation of the chiefe of the Jews Pilate crucified, but hee shewed himself alive again the third day, and foretold many things, and from him the whole stock of Christians have their name. The time of his suffering death by the consent of all Writers was, anno 34 of his age, after that since his beginning to shew himself at his Baptisme hee had kept three Passovers, & to prepare for his death had kept a fourth instituting the Sacrament of his Supper, the night before, anno 35, James, Peter, John, according to Clement, being the chiefe of the Apostles, as to whom the Lord imparted all knowledge, did not yet take any principality over the rest upon them, but made James Bishop of Jerusalem, where he fate thirty years. Immediately the first persecution began, wherein Steven was stoned. And Pilate wrote to Tiberius, the news of Christs miracles, death and signes, for which many believed him to be a God. Tiberius then being moved hereat, would have had the Senate to put him into the number of Gods: but they affirming it to be contrary to their Law to make any a God, but such as should first be propounded by the Senate, refused to doe it, whereat Tiberius was angry, and found means to cut off Sejanus, who was chief in withstanding it, and almost 20 Senatours more. Yet the Senate made an Edict to expell all Christians out of Rome, but Tiberius contrariwise made it death to accuse any man hoc nomine, that hee was a Christian. So that God made him although a cruel Tyrant, a means to propagate the Gospel, when as through his favour Disciples were in all Countreys dispersed to preach Christ Jesus. Tiberius lived after the passion of Christ to the third yeare, being then aged 78, and having first appoynted Caius Caligula the son of Germanicus his successour, as was before sayd, and then dying of a Feaver, too good an end for one so wicked and tyrannicall, but for his good will declared towards Christ Jesus, haply this favour was shewed unto him, contrary to that which hath been usuall to others so exceedingly wicked. A litle before his death Pontius Pilate was accused by the Jews for many crimes unto him, whereupon he was sent for to Rome to answer them, when he had been now Procuratour of Judea 10 yeares, but before he came at Rome Tiberius dyed. Yet his wickednesses wherewith he was charged dyed not, viz. his unjust putting of some to death, and causing tumults amongst the Jews by putting Casars image in the Temple, and polluting their sacrifices, and employing publike moneyes to his private use: for Vnellius President of Syria being complained to hereof caused him to goe to Rome to answer it, and Tiberius dyed at that instant. But in the time of Caius Caligula his successour, he was banished

John 3.

Abagarus King of Edessa.

Nauclet. ex Clemente.

Ioseph. l. 18. c. 4.

Anno Dom. 34.

Nauclet.

Gods providence in propagating the Gospel.

Anno Dom. 39.

Euseb. 7.

Cap. 7.

Pilates death.

Anno Dom. 41.

Ioseph. 18. c. 6.

Caiaphas his punishment.

Ioseph. l. 18. c. 9
Herods punishment.

Ioseph. l. 18 c. 6.

A pattern for Princes.

nished to Lyons in France, and there in trouble of minde slue himselfe. Caiaphas also the High-priest was now put down by Vitellius, and Ionathan the sonne of Ananus set up in his stead, but he also was soone after put down by the same Vitellius, and another set up in his stead.

Lastly, to shew together the punishments of all the great ones, who persecuted Jesus. Herod Antipas, the Tetrarch of Galilee, who had eluded him with his men of warre, being moved by the importunate instigation of his wife Herodias went with her to Rome to desire, that he of a Tetrarch might be made a King, as Agrippa Tetrarch of Trachonitis, after Philip had lately been at Rome, by the singular favour of Caius Caligula. But when he came thither, Caius understanding by letters, which Agrippa wrote purposely to him against Herod, although his sisters husband, that he had prepared 700000 armes to joyne with the Parthian King Artabanus, and that he had before conspired with Sejanus against Tiberius, he gave his Tetrarchy to Agrippa and all his treasures, and then banished him into France, whether Herodias, who was offered more favour for her brother Agrippas sake, accompanied him, so partaking of his misery. Before this time Herod, as his father Herod formerly, had sought with great cost and bounty in entertaining Caius and Artabanus together upon a peace concluded between them, to insinuate into his favour, but the just judgement of God would not suffer him to enjoy it, but thus to be rejected and contemned, as he had contemned our Lord Jesus. Philip his brother, whose wife Herodias had married, as hee lived alwayes in peace, so hee dyed, when he had continued 37 years Tetrarch of Trachonitis, &c. and was honourably buried. Hee used to goe in progresse with a few men, having a chaire alwayes carried after him. and if any man upon the way came to him to complain, he stayed, and there his chaire being set, heard the cause and judged it, he dyed, Anno Domini 37.

Touching Agrippa, to whom his Tetrarchy was given, and that of Trachonitis also, by Funccius called Herod Agrippa. Hee was sonne to Bernice, neere to Herod the Great, for shee was his sister Salome her daughter, and bare Agrippa to Aristobolus. He living at Rome after his mothers decesse, in the time of Tiberius was so prodigall in his expences to get favour with Drusus the Emperours sonne, that hee soon brought himselfe to poverty. Then Drusus dying, as hath been sayd, and all his friends forbidden to come at the Emperours Court, because, he thought, that the sight of any of them would renew his griefe for his sonnes death. Agrippa was necessarily inforced sometime to live poorly, but his wife making meanes to Herodias, shee moved her husband Herod, and so he was made Governour of Tiberias, and had maintenance given him. But when hee saw that Herod did this for him with much pride, casting in his teeth this his beneficence, he left Tiberius to goe to Rome again, borrowing much money to inable him so to doe, and comming neere the Island Capreas, where Tiberius lived, leave being first obtained, hee came, and was welcome to him. But within a few dayes hearing that hee came from Judea, greatly indebted to elude his creditours, hee was angry, and about to put him from him. He therefore borrowing money of Antonia, mother to Germanicus, and grandmother to Caius, payd his debts, and so the Emperour was pacified towards him. And into such favour he grew, that he made him tutour to Caius, whereby he came to be greatly beloved by him also. But Eutychus servant to Agrippa, and his Coachman hearing him once say, I would that the old man were dead, that thou o Caius, who art more worthy mightest come to the Empire, purposed to tell this to the Emperour, but going to the Court and declaring his end, viz. to discover somewhat to the Emperour, hee was taken and imprisoned long before hee could be heard, for this was Tiberius his manner towards such, as came to complain of any thing to him. At length Agrippa not suspecting, that hee would say any thing against him, procured liberty unto him, by the great importunity of Antonia, that he might be heard. But so soon as he was heard, Agrippa was sent bound to prison, and there continued five or six moneths, and then Tiberius dying, Caius soon delivered him, and honoured him with a Crown of gold, and made him Tetrarch of that Tetrachy which belonged to Philip, who dying without out issue, it was committed to a Roman Governour, but now given to Agrippa, and the Tetrarchy of Abilene, which Lisanius had, who was now dead also, and he made him a King, and when Herodias, the Wife of Herod Antipas envying him for this sought to have her husband equally advanced, his Tetrarchy of Galilee being taken from him, as hath bin shewed; that was also given unto Agrippa. Touching Caius Caligula, the son of Germanicus, he came to the Empire with the liking and good will of all the people, by reason of his fathers vertues, which made him to be in high estimation: for they hoped that he would be like unto him. But when he was Emperour, although he were well disposed before, he was so changed, as if he had never been that in him. For he was most intemperate day and night, not sleeping above three houres in a night, but following the pot, most libidinous desiring his own three sisters, and then banishing them, and most cruel and proud, in so much that he would have his Image set up in every Countrey, and worshiped as a god. Josephus sayth, that he ruled well a yeare and more, but then fell thus fowly. He first shewed his cruelty against Tiberius his brother, grandchild to old Tiberius, in murdering him, whom the dying Emperour, who out of meete grace adopted him, most earnestly commended to his brotherly love, desiring that only thing of him, to use him lovingly as a brother. Then he sent his Image to be set up in the Temple at Jerusalem, and the Jews withstanding it, he sent Petronius to be President there, and with his Army to slay all the Jews, who made resistance. The Jews hearing this lay down before him, offering their throats to be cut, and would none of them doe any husbandry worke for 40 dayes together, although then it were sowing time. Whereat Petronius was so moved with compassion, that he wrote to Caius, though to the hazard of his own life to beseech him to revoke his Decree, and so willed the Jews to goe about their husbandry businesse, and promised to doe nothing about the Image setting up, till he heard answer from Caius. Now it was noted, as a signe of Gods good liking of this, that there fell immediately a gracious rain to make the ground fitter for tillage. And when Petronius his letters came to Caius, Agrippa was feasting him in such sumptuous manner, that he offered to grant him whatsoever he would aske, and when he through modesty refused to aske any thing, because he was so much bound to him, for his bounty already extended towards him, he would not cease pressing him to aske something, vowing to performe it, whatsoever it should be, till that he asked the revoking of the Decree of setting up his Image in the Temple at Jerusalem: Caius hearing him aske that, was much troubled, but because he had sworn, he granted it, yet within a short time hearing by some that came from Jerusalem, how stiff and stout the Jews were, he was enraged against Petronius, and wrote to him to kill himselfe, but before that letter came to his hands Caius dyed, and the newes thereof came unto him, whereby that mischief was prevented. Caius dyed by the hands of Cheranus and Sabinus by the counsell of the Senat, as he came from the Circean playes, when he had reigned three years, ten moneths, and eight dayes, and because it was feared, that if his wife and daughter should live still, they would be revenged for his death, they were forthwith slain also. Then the Senat consulted to have no more Emperours, but Censuls to govern again as of old, but the Souldiers loving the liberality of the Emperours, set up Claudius, the Uncle of Caius, an honest and quiet man, for Emperour. And now Agrippa dealt politickly to raise himselfe yet higher, for talking with the Senatours he offered to goe in their names to Claudius, to pray him quietly to lay down the Empire, for feare of further danger, and this by their consent he did, but when he spake thus openly to him, he whispered in his eare by and by, that he should not lay it down, telling him, that most of the Senatours were for him, whereby Claudius being animated, refused to lay it down, and Agrippa returning to the Senate told them how strong he was by reason of the Souldiers, and therefore to avoyd further danger, perswaded them to establish him Emperour. Hereupon they consented, and to Claudius was Emperour by consent of all, who a little before, fearing lest all the race of Tiberius Caesar should be cut off, hid himselfe in an old brick wall, but was drawn forth by the Souldiers and thus advanced, And to Agrippa for a reward he gave the Tetrarchy of Judaea, so that now he was

C c

Josephus lib. 18. de Bel. c. 11.

Nauclerius.

A cunning Politician.

Josephus tells this story in a different manner, lib. 2. c. 10.

Anno 43.

was King of all foure. And at the beginning of his Empire, saying that hee cut off some Senatours, which had conspired the death of Caius, hee carryed himselfe graciously towards all men, releasing out of prison such as Caius had imprisoned, and remitting Tributes to the Trojans, and reducing exiles home who had been by Caius banished.

Anno 44.

About this time, viz. Anno 44, the twelve Apostles dispersed themselves into all parts, preaching the Gospel, and James went into Spain, but when he could doe no good there, he returned to Judea, seeking to convert men there. But Abiashur being High-priest stirred up the people against him, and Herod Agrippa the King, to pleasure the Jews cut him off, and layd hold upon Peter, thinking to doethelike to him: but hee was by the Lord prevented, Peter being miraculously delivered, and he suddenly smitten by the Angel of God, when he was by the people most honoured. Iosephus sayth, that immediately after his Ora-

Acts 12.

Iosephus Antiq. lib. 19 c. 7. the words of Agrippa. En ego vestra appellatione Deus vitam relinquere cogor, futuri necessitate coarguente vestrum mendacium, & quem immortalem salutastis ad mortem rapior. Iosephus lib. 2. de Bel. c. 11.

tion an Owle appeared unto him as a signe of death, whereupon he sayd, Behold, your God must dye, and being tormented five dayes, with worms eating his guts asunder, he dyed, when he had reigned seven years, almost foure in the time of Caius, and three of Claudius. His son Agrippa being very young, was not thought fit to have the Kingdom committed unto him, wherefore a Roman Governour was again set over it, called Cuspius Cadus. Yet Agrippa the son was 17 years old, and he left also three daughters, whereof Bernice was one, who was married to Herod her Uncle King of Calceide, at 16 years of age, and Drusilla another. But the same Iosephus, de bel. l. 2. 10. as forgetting himselfe sayth, that Claudius reducing the Kingdom of Agrippa into a Province, made Cestus Felix President there, which is the more probable, because of Festus, mention is made in the Booke of the Acts. After Festus, Cumanus was made President, one only Alexander comming between, and Herod of Calceide being dead, Claudius made young Agrippa King there. In Cumanus his time, Anno Domini, 49, at a festivall time of the Jews, Gods judgements began to worke to the destruction of many of them thus. The Roman Souldiers standing armed in a gallery, when they saw the Jews come thick to the Temple, one of them put down his breeches, turning his buttocks towards them, and speaking to them accordingly, hereupon the Jews were provoked and threw stones at the Romans, and pressing towards Cumanus would have that Souldier punished, Cumanus seeing this, sent for more Souldiers, who came & then the Jews fearing, ran away, thronging one another with such violence, that 10000 of them perished by this means. And immediately after, a Jew being slain by some of Samarita, a great multitude of the Jews went against the Samaritans to be revenged. Their principall men sought to slay them, and complained to Cumanus, who neglecting to doe justice, they did many outrages, and suffered many. But at length the chief of them complained to Quadratus President of Syria, who came and did them justice, but hanged many of the Jews, and sent their ringleaders to Rome, and Cumanus to give account for himselfe, who was by Claudius banished, and Celer a Tribune was sent back to the Jews to be drawn through the City and hanged, and three of the chiefe stirrers in Samarita were punished with death at Rome. Then Felix was made President of Judea, and Agrippa his Dominion was increased by adding that, which Felix governed before, unto it. The Apostle Peter, having after the passion of our Lord, founded and confirmed the Churches in Asia foure years, and sitten Bishop in Antioch seven years, came to Rome, Anno 4 of Claudius, to which City Simon Magus had come before and deceived the people, inso much, that they honoured him as a god, and an Altar was set up to him there, with this inscription, Simoni sancto Deo. But when Peter came to Rome, Simon was soon by him confounded and perished, and Peter late Bishop there 25 ycers, as many Historians write. Anno 14 of Claudius, he waxing old prepared for his departure by making his Will, but before it was signed, his wife Agrippina fearing least Germanicus, whom he had by another wife, should be made Emperour, poisoned him, but concealing his death a while, she with her consorts made her son Nero Emperour: now Agrippina was sister to Caligula & daughter to Germanicus, Claudius his brother and Nero was before this married to Octavia, daughter to Claudius by another wife. Claudius dyed being aged 64, his Naucerus.

Anno Dom. 56.

vices vices were, that hee was wonderfully given to wine and women, changing his wives often. Nero being Emperour, carryed himselfe very modestly five years, being courteous to all men, very studious, remitting tribute, and so averse from cruelty, that when he was to signe a Warrant, for the execution of any man, hee used to say, he wished, that hee knew no letters: but afterwards hee proved a Monster for all manner of vice, exceeding his Uncle Caligula, whose sisters sonne he was. He spared neyther mother nor sister from defilement or death. He was but 17 when he began, and was ruled till he came of full age, by his mother and Seneca, a most wise and honest man his Tutor, and Burrus another of like wisdom and gravity, who together with Seneca, ordered all things, but soone after he came to rule without guides, he shewed how vile his nature was. In his second yeare, Paul the Apostile was sent by Festus to Rome, from whence he being alter two years released, went forth again preaching the Gospel. The Jews in the mean season were through Gods just judgement, diversly molested and wrested, sometime by robbers divers years together, then they being suppressed by such as were called Sicarii from Sica a short sword, which they did weare under their garments, being long, and secretly killing many at noon day, and their sword being soon put again, passing away unknown. Then by a pretended Prophet, an Egyptian, who drew together 30000 of them, and going towards Ierusalem, they were soone put to flight by the President there, and dispersed. Moreover, by robbers again, and a Sect that would destroy all those Jews that obeyed the Romans, and lastly, by the Syrians and Jews fighting against one another, for a City built sometime by Herod, either part challenging it to belong to them. There was also, sayth Nauclerus, a contention about a wall built by the Jews, after that Agrippa being increased in dominion by Nero, had built a Palace neere the Temple, from whence he might see into the Temple, and what was done there, for the Jews stomacking this, set up a wall so high that nothing could be seen, but by Agrippa and Festus then Governours, they were commanded to pull it down again. Or this they desired that Nero might be judge, and sending to Rome obtained that it should stand still, by means of a wife of his that favoured the Jewish Religion, called Pompeia, whom he had taken, putting away his wife Octavia. But greater miseries after this came upon the Jews, for Albinus succeeded Festus in the government of Iudea, offered many indignities to them, wherewith they being provoked, sometimes tumultuated, and were many of them slain and spoiled of their goods and when Albinus his time was out, and Florus succeeded in the government, their case yet grew worse and worse. For whereas Albinus had preyed upon particular persons, Florus impoverished whole Cities by his rapacity, so that many forsooke the Countrey, and at a festivall time Cestius Gallus, the President of Syria came to Ierusalem, they being then 300000 together, desired him to ease them of Florus, that pest of the Common-wealth, but reaped nothing but derision, their miseries stil continuing. At length a great quarrel arose in Casarea by reason of a great indignity done unto them before their Synagogue. For some of the Casareans set a Samian vessell there, and in it sacrificed birds, wherat the Jews were much provoked, & there was a hickering betwixt them & the Casareans, till that Incundus coming with his men (who had bin left to keep peace when Florus went away purposely to Sebasto to give them an opportunity to tumultuate, caused the vessell to be taken away, & then there was some quiet: yet Florus had received 8 talents of the Jews gift there to shew them favour a little before in prohibiting certain buildings of taverns neer their Synagogue, but he so soon as he had the money, doing nothing for them went away to Sebasto, and this trouble arose, and although for a time Incundus had pacified both sides, yet they of Casarea renewed their malicious device, wherupon many of the Jews thinking their Synagogue to be polluted, hereby went away from thence, taking the Books of the Law with them to Nabata being 60 furlongs off, and some of the chief went to Sebasto to complain to Florus. But he instead of helping them, or doing them any good for the money which they had given him, reproved them for carrying away the Books of the Law, and put them in prison. When the news hereof came to Ierusalem the Jews there were mightily enraged & spake disgracefully of Florus, wherfore he with his horde and Suetonius.

A changling.

Ioseph. l. 2. c. 12.

Nauclerus.

Ioseph. l. 2. de bello, c. 12, 13.

foot went to Jerusalem, and when they fearing sent to pacifie him, he by horsemen, whom he sent before, beat them into the City. not suffering them to come at him, and then entring the City went to take 17 Talents out of the Temple, and the people making some resistance, were slain to the number of 600 and upwards, and of their Nobles many being brought before Florus, were first whipped and then hanged, a thing, sayth Josephus, never done before, no, not in Rome, to any man that was ordinis equestris, as these were, a just reward for their whipping of our Lord, and thus much bloodshed for his blood. And this was in the twelfth yeare of Nero, and was the beginning of *Jerusalem*s destruction by Vespasian, which followed within a short time after.

But before I speak of it, to return to Nero, after whose time that destruction hapned, he was so wicked, that he meditated how to do mischief, amongst others, to recite only two or three. He caused secretly Rome to be set on fire at divers places at once, and standing in his Palace rejoyced to see the flames ascending. But he imputed it to the Christians, and thereupon began an hot persecution against them, in which both Peter and Paul suffered at Rome. And there being two men of greatest note, who had governed in his minority under his mother Burrus and Seneca, he found means soon to have Burrus poisoned, and Seneca a pattern of wisdom and all morall vertue, betwixt whom and Paul the Apostle had been much familiarity, he was stirred against by Pompeia his new Wife, and Tigellinus a new favourite, who came in the room of Afranius Burrus. Seneca seeing this thought to withdraw himself from employment, and so from all occasion of distaste in the Emperour, that he might be out of danger, and live the rest of his days and dye quietly. And to this end hee went to Nero thanking him first for all his favours towards him, and promoting him to that height of honour, and bestowing such large revenues upon him, then offering to restore all the lands given him to the Emperour again, and craving leave in regard of his age now to go and live upon his own privatly in Campania. To this Nero immediatly answered, that hee had done no more for him then he deserved, and that hee did him wrong to offer such restitution, whereby, if he should accept of it, he should be brought into disgrace amongst all men, who would say, that hee took from his best friend his lands and revenues. Wherefore hee encouraged him to go on to assist him with his counsell, promising that his favour should always be alike towards him, and so hee embraced and kissed him. But hee notwithstanding came little after this to the Court, but went home to his house in Campania, there living in private three years. But all this time his enemies ceased not to traduce him to Nero, saying, that hee might see, how little love he bare to the Emperour, by his keeping so long away from him. And then a conspiracy hapning to be against Nero by Piso, Natalis his friend was taken and put upon the Rack, who confessed Piso to be chief conspirator, and that Seneca was one; hereupon Nero sent to examine Seneca, and then to denounce death unto him, but because he had been his Tutor, he bade him choose what kinde of death he would. Hereat his wife and friends stood all amazed and stricken with griefe, but he being undaunted, comforted them. His wife yet refused to be comforted, and would dye with him by the same kinde of death, which was by bleeding, and although he earnestly sought to dissuade her, he could not, so they both were let blood, and yet he being dead, and shee surviving, shee was content to have her wounds bound up, and so her life was saved, but within a while after she dyed. The Senate then being weary of such a Monster, decreed that Nero was an enemy to the Common-wealth, and should dye, which hee hearing fled out of the City, only foure accompanying him, and when some followed to kill him, he with his sword slue himselfe, when he had reigned 14 years, and so there was an end of the race of the Casars and their family, no more of them succeeding in the Empire, and this was two years after Seneca his death, and many more cut off after him. Before this, James Bishop of Jerusalem being commanded by Ananus, the High-priest to renounce Christ Jesus, and denying so to doe, was set upon a pin of the Temple, and thence cast down, yet he still living. prayed God to forgive them, and then being stricken on the head with a Fullers club, he dyed, Anno 63, for which he being so godly a man, it was thought by the the Jews themselves, that God brought that great destruction upon Jerusalem by Titus and Vespasian, anno 33. Betwixt Nero and Vespasian there were three Emperours in two yeares, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. Galba chosen by the Souldiers in Spain and France, was for his covetousnesse and sloth slain within seven moneths after by Otho, who had been a familiar friend of Nero, Otho within foure moneths was overcome by Vitellius, whom the forces in Germany made Emperour and slue himsele. Vitellius a very bellygod continued but eight moneths, and then Vespasian being made Emperour, he was taken and drag'd through the City with his face upwards, and then slain and cast into Tyber. Vespasian taking the Empire by much intreaty upon him, for hee rather declined it as a burthen, had a sonne called Titus then in Judaea, from whence also he came to Rome to receive the Empire. For there being great tumults in Judaea, by means of Florus, Cestius Gallus then President of Syria, came with his Army to appease the tumults, and King Agrippa with him, but being beaten back by the seditious Jews with great slaughter on both sides, he sent to Nero to signifie this great rebellion. Then Vespasian with his sonne Titus was sent, and great forces were gathered, and many places assaulted and taken, and Jerusalem assaulted also, and the people greatly wasted by divisions within. At what time Vespasian hearing of Nero's death, paused for a time, whilst Galba, Otho, and Vitellius had run their race. Then he being chosen Emperour went to Rome, and left his son Titus in Judaea as Generall of the Army. Now in the tumults hitherto it is infinite to recount the destructions of the Jews, at Cesarea, Ptolemais, Johannes, Galilee, &c. who so please, may reade of them in Iosephus. There were also divisions in the City; Eleazarus against Jonathin, and Simon without with 40000 men against them both. But he being let in by one part, made the confusion greater, because he stood upon the magnifying of himsele above all. Then the old men and women made great lamentation, and thought long for the coming of the Romans again, as thinking themselves now in a worse case then if the Romans should come against the City. For great murders were daily committed, and many outrages done, so that it could not goe worse with them then if the City were full of most barbarous enemies. Titus then advanced with his Army from Cesarea, but when he was within 30 furlongs of Jerusalem, he causing his Army there to stay, went before towards Jerusalem to see, whether for fear the Jews would not now seeke to him for peace, and he went attended only with 800 horsemen. The Jews instead of coming out to parle about peace, came forth in great multitudes about him and his men to destroy them, so that Titus was in great danger, and was constrained to make his way through them with his sword, escaping the many darts that were thrown at him, more by a singular providence of God, then otherwise, for he was unarmed, and yet passed away to his Army without wound, two of his men only being slain. Then he brought up all his Army, but the divided Jews now agreeing together went out and fought furiously against the Romans, so that they made them to feare, and to begin to run away, till that Titus encouraging them, and coming to their helpe, turned again the course of the battell, killing many and putting all the rest to flight. Then the Romans fell to working, to make a wall for their defence against sudden incursions of the Jews. But the Jews came fiercely upon them again, and then Titus the second time escaped narrowly a great danger, and beat the Jews away again. After this, Mounts were in divers places cast up about the City, and these were again by the Jews undermined, and fire being put to, burnt. Then more were erected, and the outward wall battered and won, and after that the second. But before this, Titus requiring it, Iosephus whom he had with him, being taken at Ptolemais, made an Oration to the Jews to yield and save their City, but they did nothing but revile him, and many bloody skirmishes coming between, he exhorted them again, but all in vain. Then with great difficulty the third wall was won in that part next the Temple, and Titus exhorted them to save their Temple, professing how unwilling he was to destroy it. But they fought against the Romans so fiercely from thence, that he was forced at length to put fire to part of it, and much being burnt, he caused the fire to be quenched again, being willing to save the rest, but the fight continuing, the souldiers

Anno Dom. 72.

Dan. 9. 2.

could not set fire to it, and so all was burnt down. Then they fought still against the Romans in the City, till that was destroyed also, the Temple, August 10, and the City in September, anno 2 of Vespasian, for which V. Vespasian and Titus his son afterwards held a glorious triumph at Rome. Johannes and Symon the two chiefe Captains of the Jews being reserved for it. During the time of this war 1100000 of the Jews perished, sayth Josephus, and 90000 were taken and sold into divers parts, yet Titus commanded, that none should be slain, but such as were in arms when the City was taken. Thus both the blood of Christ was revenged upon the Jews which they called for upon them and their children, and that came upon their Temple; which he foretold, not one stone being left upon another, their own obstinacy and not the Romans cruelty, through Gods just judgment bringing this upon them. And it is remarkable, how that all Christians were by divine admonition before this gone out of the City to Pella, and preserved from perishing together with them. Thus I have drawn down the History of the Church of God, interlaced with some others of the World, with whom the Jews had to doe, and without the knowledge of which, this cannot be well understood, not only to the time of the Passion of our blessed Saviour, but also to the time of their extirpation, that were his betrayers and murderers, and of their Countrey, City and posterity for the further confirmation of Christian people, in their believing, that he whom they so spitefully slue was the dearly beloved Son of God, and therefore God ceased not ever after that to lay heavy judgements upon them from time to time, till they were thus consumed, in their own Countrey and in other Countries, whersoever they became. For before, although they lived under the Romans, yet they were by them honourably used as confederates, and had divers favours done them. Yea, after that upon their own desire, Archelaus, the sonne of Herod the Great being banisht, Judaea was made a Province. But after they were vilified, derided, and indignly used in all places, and could never recover their credit any more, and more of them in a shorter time were destroyed then ever before. And now the prophecie of Daniel touching the Messiah slain, and the judgement following thereupon, appears to be fulfilled, where he sayth, He shall destroy the City and the holy place, and the people, and the end of it shall be with a flood, that is, not of water, but fire burning down all things. I have also in great brevity given the Reader a taste of the State of the great Monarchy of the World then ruling, being of much avail to be known, because hereby especially God executed his wrath against the Jews, as formerly by the Monarchy of Assyria and Babylon, great varieties occurring herein, being full of delight and profit to the discreet Reader. Now to God only, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, who hath strengthened me to perfect this great Work, extending from the beginning of the World to the foresayd fatall downfall of Jerusalem, through 4034 years, be all honour, prayse and glory for ever and ever, A M E N.

---

F I N I S.

---

An Alphabetical Table of the principall Contents in Ezra, Nehemiah, Ester, and the continuation of the History.

A	E
Assyrians subdued by Babylon,	Egypt subdued by Nebuchadrezzar,
Of the Areopagites,	Ezekiel martyred,
Who Ahasuerus was,	Ezra's his relations false,
Alexander deriding his father,	Effeminate living of Lydians,
Alexander reverencing the High Priest,	The Ethiopians strength and stature,
Alexanders admirable continency,	Ezra, whether Malachi, whether he wrote the Bible,
Turned into Luxury,	Ester and the Church paraleld.
Alexander slayeth his friends,	F
Alexander would be a god,	Fasting before Feasting,
Apostatizers for fear punishd,	Few overcoming many,
Archimides in his study slain,	A Feast exceeding.
Antiochus a type of Antichrist,	G
Ambition and impiety punishd,	Of false Gods contempters punishd,
Antigonus King of Asia,	Gracian Wars begun,
Accusers how dealt with,	Our Glorification figured in Mordcai,
Agrippa called Herod Agrippa,	Against Glorifying in pedigree,
Antiochus Epiphanes,	Of Glasses breaking a story,
Antiochus Eupator,	Gracian Monarchy begun.
Aristobulus and Alexander King of the Jews,	H
Artes King of Persia,	Heresies discovered by Pastors,
B	Haman a figure of Nero,
Babylon described,	In Horses a strange instinct,
Belshazzars Feast,	Haman compared with Julius,
A Brother preferd before a husband,	Hannibals prevailings,
A Brother marrying his sister,	Hannibal dyed by poison,
Of Bowing to Princes,	Horcanus High Priest 3 years,
Of Burying places,	Herod saved wonderfully,
A Buriall most pompous,	Of Hannibal,
To Beasts putting men to fight.	Herod King of the Jews,
C	I
After Captivity of Jews what done,	Eremlah stoned to death,
Cyrus his History,	Jeremies prophesie,
Cyrus overcome,	Of Jupiter Ammon the State,
Ezra slain,	Ingratitude to benefactors,
Ambyses his wickednesse,	By Josephs wisdom danger averred,
Of Cruelty an example,	An Idoll chasing away enemies,
Contentation in missing honour,	Jonathan High Priest slain,
Cruelty to a friend,	Iesus writes to Abagarus King of Edesse,
Called many, few chosen,	Iesus born,
In Covenants fraud,	The Italian War,
Christ figured in Mordcai,	The Jews free and tributary,
Contention by means of tumults,	Of Julius Caesar,
Contempt of God punishd,	He is deified,
Country loved above himself,	Iosephus his testimony of him,
Carthage destroyed,	Vpon the Jews judgments,
Cruelty alienating Subjects hearts,	Iames put to death,
Of the Cruell acruell death,	Iudas Maccabaeus,
Clemency to a Traitor,	K
Cassander King of Macedon,	A King chosen strangely,
The Cymbrian War,	A Kingdom attained by murder,
D	King of South &amp; North linkt by marriage, Dan. 11. 6.
Darius bloody Laws,	L
Daniels Visions when,	Of Lots casting,
To Drink none compeld,	The Library of Ptolomet,
Drunkennesse death,	Lupanaria, Stews called,
Drunkards fury,	Love won by yeilding,
Death nor feared but desired,	Love and treachery,
Of Divinations a contemner,	Lyfmachus King of Hellepont.
Deceit punishd,
Darius Nothus King of Persia,

THE TABLE.

M		R
Mlle foaleth,	19	REbels destroyed,	79.10
With Myrrh perfuming,	57	Romans ill successe,	109.110
Marriages with Idolaters,	57	Romans beginning,	114
Mutability of honour,	78	Resolution present required,	131
Mordcai a figure of Christ,	73
Murth'r revenged,	145.13
A cunning Murth'r,	177	SEleucus Callinicus,	111
The Murth'ers of Caesar,	167.169	Seleucus adds Asia to Babylon,	103
Murth'ers to get favour murdered,	161	Seleucus King of Babylon,	101
Macedon Kingdom; 84. ended	130	Sogdianus King of Persia,	76
Mary born,	188	Sacrilege of Idols Temples punish'd,	129.10.86
With Methridates warre,	149	A stratagem of War,	83
Marins his exploits,	248	Of Signes divine a stieghter punishment,	73
		A Stratagem for a Traitor,	97
		Seneca put to death,	204
NEbuchadnezzar's Image,	2	Septuagints translation,	104
Nebuchadnezzar his judgment,	3	Stenography invented,	182
Neroes goodnesse and wickednesse,	203	Sin punish't in the kind,	105
		Sin in Professours most intollerable,	107
		Self murth'ers,	147.150
AN Oath sacred among Heathen,	110	Stratagems of Hannibal,	110
Of Oracles asking counsell,	147	For Souldiers hardthip best,	121
Oathbreaking judged,	158	Scipio dying in exile,	118
		Of the daily Sacrifice ceasing Dan,	114
THE policy of Zopyrus at Babylon,	19	Sights in the ayre,	131
For Princes a pattern,	60	Sacrilegious not prospering,	148
Against praying to Saints,	82
Perjury in a Prince punish't,	91	THE Temples building hindred,	11
Poysoning cunningly,	80	Cenths of ipoyls given to God,	81
Pastors to lay open Heresies,	60	From Taxes Cleigye,	37
A Prey taken lost again,	99	Temple in mount Gerizim,	39
Philips pride punish't by death,	90	The Treacherous punish't,	79.113.117
Of Prayer the force,	94.118	Tyrants soon cut off,	104.113
Perthus his pride and death,	104	Thankgivings after victories,	127.133
Pride for Victories puld down,	169	Tiberius would make Iclius a God,	139
Prophaning the Temple punish't,	118
Parricide judged,	190.129
Gods providence over his freighting,	134	AN Vlturper slain,	15
A Perjured and persecuting King punish't,	135	Victors returning perish,	109
The last Prince of Iudaea,	130
High Priests often changed,	135
Pharisees and Sadducees,	144	W
Poysoning punish't in kind,	144.157	190.70 Weeks of Daniel begun,	109
The Peloponessian War,	74	Wickednesse in Athenians punish't,	14.79
Philip King of Macedon,	86	A strange Water,	25
Ptolomee Laeus King of Egypt,	101	War Civill in Iudaea,	147
Pyrthus King of Sparta,	109	Worldly things mutable,	149
Ptolomee Philadelphus King of Egypt,	111
Ptolomee Evergetes,	111	X
Peter and Paul put to death,	204	Xerxes son of Artaxerxes,	76
Persecutors of Christ judged,	200
		Z
		Zedekiahs death,	2

Errata in Ezra, Nehem. Ester, &c.

Pag. 1. for set his throne should set his throne p. 4. second like a beare, &c. for two like a beare, &c. p. 7. for Thamai,
 7. for Talmi, p. 9. children of the Province for children of the promise. p. 14. for Pretaspes Prexaspes, p. 17. for S. B.
 SP. p. 18. for by the name, by his name, p. 26. for imploying, intimating. p. 29. for should,ould p. 30. Abid for Abid: for Teknah Tekoab, 33. for thirdly 3. p. 36. for sedond and thid d, second three 36. for rules ruler 43. for see feed, p. 44. for leemed, served 46. for him, her 53. for Tharsian Persian 59. for plain yain, 61. hanc adeo appetet babe.
 93. corrig 97. for faith, fathers, p. 101. for immodestly immodestly, for gare, goat. for oo. 100. p. 111. for calinius calinius, 128. for sent, but 88 for two 27. p. 142. for 1779-379. 139. 3826. for 3426. 142. affected for offended.
 149. for Sylla Cynna, 156. for exempted, executed 169. for lueh, sue. 183. for many, navy.

AN ALPHABETICALL TABLE

OF THE
Principall Contents in Josh. Judg. Ruth, 1st. & 2<sup>d</sup>. Samuel.

A
R om the Arke to pitch 2000 cubits	page 12
Apostles preaching as rams-horns blow	29
Achan whether saved	35
Of Antick. Abimelech a figure	172
An Asses jawbone a spring	162
Into Arke looking punisht	238
Adjuring the people	276
Spir. Armes taken away how	271
B.
The Bookes of the Old Test. dist.	1
Of Bethel and Bethaven	30
Bochim where	100
The Booke of Jasher	46
Baalim and Ashteroth	101
Bishops not Lords	134
Of Baal-berish	136
Blind and lame in Zion	375
Blind and lame subdued by Chr.	377
Beards long and garments	400
Of Beauty the miseries	420
Of the Bow the use David taught	359
Burials amongst heathens	371
C
Of Christs death seven figures	2
Of the Church Rahab a figure	11
Of the City Adam	16
Circumcising the second time	19
Of not Circumcise . in wilder. reasons	19
Cherem what	28
Against Covetousnes the best fence	34
To Caleb Hebron promised, when	60
Called many, few chosen	130
Christ contemned as Gedeon	136
Concubines and wives	136
Christ as Jephthah , wherein	154
Christ figured in Eliamelech	189
Christ & his Chur. in Booz & Ruth	191
Christ as Booz sitting in the gate	196
Christ eaten by faith under the O.T.	201
Christ as David playing on harp	292
Christ conquer. devil, as Dav. Golia.	297
Of Christ watcht in his sepulchre, a type	307
To Christ to slee in distresse	319
Christs mariage with a peoples fig.	366
Christs kingdom & Dauids compa.	374
Christs everlasting kingdom	390
Cherethites and Pelethites , who	397
Conversion and destruction typified	330
Upon his own conf. whether cond.	358
Christs 3 anointings typified	302
D
Of Disimulation in warring	30
The Destruction of the world	29
Dew figuring grace	128
Deriders of Gods servants	133
Dagon the Philistims Idol	166
In Death all sin destroyed	167
Of Doulia and Latreia	240
Drawing water at a fast	241
Dauids age and spirit	290
Of Duels , and their unlawfulness	294
Of Dowries of women	303
Of Disimulation and lying	317
David cursing Joab in 3 things	370
E
Enemies the converted have	43
Enemies left to prove us	103
Ehud lame on his right hand	106
Execut. done by men of quality	134
Elis sons sins	216
Enemies entertained to fight	341
Errors to be recanted	391
F
Of Food three kinds	25
By Fables to teach	138
Fickleness of the people	140
Fornication punisht	165
To lay the Finger on the mouth	174
Foolishnesse dissembled by the wise	316
G
God served amisse, Idolatry	103
Gedeons fleece the mystrie	128
Gedeons pitchers and rams horns	131
Gedeons Ephod , what	135
God wils, and wils not a sinners death	219
God said to repent, how	282
Giants what, and how called	293
Grounds of confid. against danger	297
Against Gospel attempts vain	42
A Good intent justifies not	85, 170
Of God , erroneous conceits	87
*	Of

The TABLE.

Of Grace before meat	250	Of Marrying a Neece	94
Gentiles blessing Jewes under N.T.	453	Against Mourning for the dead	88
H		Of cursing Meroz	121
Hebrew the Canaanites language	9	From Marriage contention	156
Hearers some hardened, some turn	39	Of Micahs Priest Jonathan	169
Horses to be houghed, why	51	Of Marrying a brothers wife	194
Humiliation before war	178	Ministers sinning as Eli's sons	224
Upon Hannabs song, Rabb. gloss.	214	Ministers of Christ not shed blood	285
Honour to be declined	258	Of Musick the force aga. evil Spir.	291
Husbandmen made Kings	260	Marriage justified from unclean.	313
Hypocrisie in the malicious	302	Against self-Murder	353
Hereticks like Shebah & Absol.	441, 451	The Marriage of Ministers justified	313
Of Haire long divers opin.	422	Of Michahs reproving David	387
Of the Haire of Absol. the weight	425	Mosh measured with a line	394
Hearers reproving teachers	382	Mourners covered, why	428
The Host carrying about	382	O
I		An Oath binding, and not	41
Of Idol and heathen Oracles	233	Old men generating	185
Against Judges unjust	245	An Old man not fearing death	286
Jonathan eating honey taken	279	Of Old mens doings	446
The Jewes conversion typified	304	P
And the Jewes railing against Chr.	337	Punished all are for one	29
The Jewes persecute Chr. as Absol.	441	Pride of Conquerors	93
Justice and Judgement differ.	396	Prevaile at the first wicked may	141
Against Idleness	403	Prayer without putting sin away	146
Joshua a figure of Christ	2	Praying for outward things	203
Of Jordan divided, the mystrie	16	Of Prophets false and true signes	223
Images not to be set up	17	Preaching often or seldome	224
Jesus fights against the devil, how	38	The Pledge that David must take	295
Jesus hath enemies after enemies	50	Perfidiousnesse punished	305
The Jebusites why not expeld	73	The Power of Preaching	305
Of Joshua's age and government	86	Prophets why und. law, but not now	319
Just. not by the Law but Gospel	88	The Priest subject to the King	321
Between Judges & Kings differ.	185, 90	The Power of Princes in eccl. things	383
Joels killing Sisera	112	In Praying, the gesture	391
Jephthah his vow	149	Two High-Priests at one time	397
Israel falls before Benjamin	179	Murderers troubled in conscience	420
Jewes dwelling out of Canaan come to		R
feasts	187	Rahab whether an harlot	7
Turning Jewes	188	Reproach of Egypt, what	22
Of Jewes two callings	382	Against Racking for confession	33
K		Reverence to the Word	107
Kings trod upon	48	Of Riddles at feasts	157
A good King prefers his peop. good	80	Rahab's history, when	185
No King in Israel, when	169	Of Ruhs going to Booz	193
What Kings may doe, and not	246	Raine rare in Canaan	266
Kings sons brought up, how	248	Reproachfull speeches intolerable	331
Kings reproved by Prophets	270	At Revenge taking joy	336
Against Killing Kings	327	S
Of Kings covenant required	374	To Servants cruelty punish	351
L		Of Samuel appearing to Saul	344
By lots delinquents found out	33	The Scriptures hidden to Jewes	312
Whether any Lying lawfull	8	Severity in Generalls to Captains	273
All the Land taken by Josh. how	54	Spirit. armes taken away, how	371
All the Land promised given Israel	82	To Sanctifie themselves, what	13
Levites being poor sin	172	To Sanctuaries fleeing	306
Letters carryed against himself	405	The Salt sea	16
M		Sauls evil spirit from the Lord	290
The Mountains of Israel, what	52	Stones

The TABLE.

Stones out of Jordan set up	17	Thumbs cut off, why	93
Against Sacriledge a caveat	30	Treachery to his Country punisht	99
Sun and Moon stood still	45	Teraphim what it was	171
Shiloh stood, where	77	Against the Trecherous enemies	324
Sorrow from two causes	90	Two Tabernacles at once	387
Saints falsely called saviours	104	V
Sin subjecteth, repentance exempts	105	The Vine chearing God and man	139
Songs of thanksgiving	113	Vain talk set forth by Siboleth	152
The Stars fight, how	120	The Viſtorer killing himself	365
Signes asked lawfully, and not, 125, 128		Uzzab smitten with death	381
Samson smote them hip & thigh	160	Uzzab a type of proud Bishops	381
Samsons hair cut, weakens him	164	W
Of Samsons killing himself	167	Worldlinesse destroyed, how	29
Superſtition in Church how begun	170	Not of Works , but grace salvation	19
Slingers and Shooters admirable	178	In War how to prevaile	92
The Shoes put off to give poſſeſſion	195	Worldly things uncertaine	93
Shoe taken four wayes	212	Walls of Cities valiant men	115
Sauls ſlaying the Gibeonites	453	Womens barrenneſſe & fruitfulneſſe	201
Sword players killing one another for ſport	364	Womens offerings after puerpery	206
Strength turn. to a mans own ruine	365	Of Womens ſpeaking in the Church	209
Servants of God entertain. profitab.	384	Wordlings place the Ark by Dagon	235
In Solomon what typified	391	From the Word to go in any thing	171
Sin puniſhed in Kings	413, 438	Of Wives giv. without huſb. conſet	342
Against Sons diſobeying ſeverity	439	Of Wiſcher and evil ſpirits	344
Servants accusing their maſters	445	Widows not to marry how long	406
The Lords Supper received unwor.	382	Against marrying a Widow by him deſoured before	208
Superſtit. by truſting to outwards	330	From Wives abſtain. before commun.
Of Sauls ſacrificing	269	T	(313)
T		Tear the 40 Abſalom rebelleth	435
Thanksgiving for three things	25	Z
Times computed to Solomons	89	Zeale moderated	29

An Alphabetical Table of the Principall Contents in 1 and 2 Kings and Chronicles.

A	D
 Amugim trees, what	Of Dauids age and coldneſſe
Of Ambition the evil effects	Dauids rich ſepulchre
Anointing to high offices	David a type of Chriſt
Answers of Oracles	A Devill caſt out by exorcism
Of the Arkes ſetting into its place	Difference reconciled about Rul:
B	Diff. about names reconcil:
Burning of dead mens bones	Diff. about Jehoram reconcil.
Burying with ſweet odours	Of Debts paying
Baalzebub Belezebub	Diff. about Joram reconcil:
A Bald head a ſhame	Dauids line endangered 3 times
Baptiſme ſaveth Infants	Diff. in Chronol. reconciled
Burying not to be deſerr'd	Diff. about Haſhea
The Book of God ſometime rare	Diff. about Ahaz and Syrians
E	The Dead revived, the myſterie
For Corn ſmitten, humiliation	E
Of the Chronicles , what	The Evang. Ch. fig. by the Temple
Against Coremon: idolat:	Elijah , who
The Church like Eliſha	Elijah ſceing from Jezab.
	* 2
	To

The TABLE.

To Elijah Gods appearing	116	Of Ministers seven Orders	9
Elijah calls for fire	148	Of Marriages with heathens	196, 17
Elijah whither carried	151	A Minstrel called for by Elisha	160
Elijahs spirit doubled on Elisha	153	Ministers not to beare armes	217
Elijah a type of Christ	154	Manasseh miraculously delivere	301
Elisha his staffe	169	By Naaman earth askt, the mystery	178
Elijahs letters to Joram	197	Of Names changing	319
Eyes of divers put out	324	Old men wise	1
The Forest of Libanus	34	Praying towards the east	29
Of Flesh and Fish eating	99	The two Pillars of the temple	35
By Faith Christ touched revives	132	To the Priesthood ambition	70
Good Princes turning evil	35	Of the old Prophet and Jadon	74
Gods of the heathen	261	Of Priapus	89
Horses of the sun	306	A true Prophet known, how	137
Of Hezek rebell. against Sennach.	273	Of the Prophesying of women	311
The Habit Monasticall , whence	118	The Passover in Josiah s time	316
Of High-places tolerated	85	Popish Priests converted not Minist.	306
Hezekiabs pride	295	A Preacher puffed up	181
Of India to which Solomon sent	46	A Preacher as Elisha , 2 King . 6.	185
To Idols Solomon built houses	54	Prophets like mad men	202
Against Images	69	Passover eaten in uncleannesse	267, 268
Jericho built again	96	Rebelling against K. in Gods cause	270
Against Ignorant Teachers	170	Of Ravens	99
At Idolat. worship to be present	178	Solomons age	4
The Jewes like Athaliah	219	Sacrificing in High-places	18
Idolatry not to be tolerated	223	Solomons wisdom and life	20
A Jew overcomming many	226	Solomons expences daily	23
Israel ceased to be a people	259	With Solomon others wife compar.	25
Idols beaten down by the people	268	Solomons letters to Hiram	27
Of the slaying of Joab	16	The Sea of brasse	37
Josiah going against Necho	347	Solomon gives Cities to Hiram	43
Jeboiakim favoured in Babylon	329	Whether Solomon worshiped Idols	53
Kings anointed, why	4	Whether Solomon repented	56
The Kingdom safe, when	11	Solomons heavie yoke	65
The Kings power over the Priest	15	To Scourge with Scorpions	66
Kings pitying poor Kings	58	Of Sacrificing men	163
The Kingd. of Israel had 10 kings	60	Sacrilege and unjust gain	180
Kings virtues figured out	50	To Smite sin without end	231
The first King murderher	93	Against going to Sepulchres	232
Kings friends their death	194	The Suns going backward	291
Of Kings the murderers judged	234	Tribes of holy things, what	269
No King like Hezek. or Josiah	263	The ten Tribes not separat. ever	68
Kings in youth godly	304	The Temple of Diana	31
Levites made Judges	8	By the Temple the Courts meant	33
Of Leagues with Idolaters	97	The Uncleane might come to worth	33
Of Levites divers numbrings	270	Uzziah s sin how great	243
Of Life the time set	290	The Word corrupted and pure	157
Minist. corrup. Gods worsh. as Abaz 259		70 Yeares captivity begun, when	328
		Zede carries to heaven	157

Isaiah, Judges, &c.

Errata. Pag. 11. for [1] r. [1]. p. 22. for irrecoverably, irrevocably. p. 26. for Abid, Ab. p. 28. for to destroyed, to be destroyed. p. 61 for 71, &c. p. 105. for renbred, rendred. p. 135. for now, as. p. 147. for what, that. p. 148 for Tolam, Tolab. p. 165. for Captains, Captives. p. 173. for fast, fat. p. 188. for rebated, related. p. 238. for vows, prayers. p. 323. for food, bone. p. 362. for Caleb, Hebron. p. 368. for Nation, named, and missing, Israhelites herupon threatened. p. 411. for labbor, labber. p. 426. for Pigeftis, Digeftis. p. 431. for warre, ware.

Errata in Kings and Chronic.

p. 9. for Priests, Bishops. p. 16. for sin, sum. p. 35. for Patablus, Uasablus. p. 37. for cepar, ceder. p. 47. for quidam, p. 61. for pal, pul. p. 84. for oration, ocasion. p. 95. for state, fat. p. 105. for others, other words. p. 125. for strong, strange. p. 127. for icorn, form. p. 146. for deited, detained. p. 179. for King, knée. p. 177. for more, word. p. 192. for unlawfully, lawfully. p. 149. for [1] r. [1]. p. 153. for Assyrian, Syrian. p. 159. for 40.4. p. 293. for letter, litter. p. 320. NYU to be read last. p. 330. for proliffious, prolifficous.

